Comprising nine vahids (unities) of nineteen chapters or babs (gates)—with the exception of the last unity, which has only ten gates—the greater part of the work was written in the prison of Mákú, but, contrary to some prevalent assumptions, the last parts may have been written in Chihriq, after the Báb was interrogated by the clerics in Tabriz. The Persian Bayán abrogates Islamic laws and traditions and sets down new laws and teachings. However, the various laws are discussed as symbols referring to deep spiritual meanings and vehicles to prepare the people for the advent of Him Whom God shall make manifest. Both the form and content of the book affirm the underlying metaphysics of unity in which all things are manifestations of an inner reality which is the revelation of God within them. Subjects: the Word of God; influence and centrality of, superiority; incomparability of the Word of God, return of the Manifestations of God, transcendence; unknowability of God, progressive revelation; renewal of religion, divine unity [tawhid] and degrees of unity, The Primal Will, the divine emanation; the all-pervading bounty of God, the Bab; the Primal Point; station and claims of the Bab, proofs of the Manifestations of God, the Imamate; the Caliphate, names and attributes of God, He Whom God Shall Make Manifest; the Bab and Baha'u'llah, inmost heart [fu'ad], modes; manner; speed; size of divine revelation, station of the Manifestation of God, twofold; threefold station of the Manifestation of God, Islamic rituals; holy days; practices; etc., rejection, opposition and persecution, oneness or innumerability of the Manifestations of God, Word of God the cause of creation, Word of God is its own standard, lack of formal education of the Manifestation of God, Manifestation of God as mirror, Qur'an and Hadith quotation and interpretation, Letters of the Living, Primal Will and the Word; Remembrance; Manifestation of God, Manifestation of God speaking in the voice of Divinity, suffering and imprisonment, the Bayan, its laws and their abrogation, The Holy Spirit, purpose; goal of creation, Manifestation of God as sun, God's knowledge, attaining good pleasure of God, the Twelfth Imam; the Qa'im, predictions and prophecies, identity; relationship of Manifestation of God to God, chastisement and requital, knowledge; recognition of God, unity of existence [wahdatu'l-wujud].

Additional ms in Atatürk Kitaplığı Library, Istanbul, OE Yz 1724 Abstract: A condensed form of the Persian Bayán, written in the language of divine verses. While much shorter in length than the Persian Bayán, the Arabic Bayán contains eleven full unities, whereas the Persian Bayán ends with gate 10 of the ninth unity. The parts of the Arabic Bayán that are not matched by the Persian Bayán (from gate 11 of the ninth unity to the end of the eleventh unity) were written after the Persian Bayán was completed. This work is sometimes assumed to have been written before the Persian Bayán for the simple reason that it seems as if the latter is an elaboration of the former. In reality, however, like the Persian Bayán, most of the Arabic Bayán was written in Mákú, although the last sections may have been written in Chihriq. Subjects: law of obligatory prayer, laws of marriage and dowry, law of inheritance, contention and conflict, law of burial and cremation, law of Huququ'llah, station of the Manifestation of God, begging; mendicancy; idleness and sloth, alcohol and drugs; tobacco; opium, law of pilgrimage, the Word of God; influence and centrality of, Manifestation of God speaking in the voice of Divinity, laws of God; of the Kitab-i-Aqdas.

For brief commentary by Baha'u'llah see BH03705. Abstract: Treatise addressed anonymously to the entire Persian nation, outlining both the secular and the religious bases of true civilization. Identified by Shoghi Effendi as Abdu'l-Baha's "outstanding contribution to the future reorganization of the world." Presents a defense of Western-style modernization in the face of opposition to the Shah's reforms. Explores the qualities of the spiritually learned through the lens of an Islamic tradition that the learned "must guard himself, defend his faith, oppose his passions and obey the commandments of his Lord". Presents the essential outlines of the Lesser Peace. Argues that religion is the greatest instrument for achieving true civilization, but warns that it can be diverted to the wrong ends. Rejects the possibility of a secular morality based on an "innate sense of human dignity", since "self-love is kneaded into the very clay of man". Issues a call for education reform, borrowing from other cultures as necessary, to restore the ancient glory of Persia. Subjects: past, present and future of Iran, religion as basis of morality; of divine civilization, serving humanity; working for progress, betterment of the world, praise of Eastern values; culture, Muhammad; Islam, status of kings; future of monarchy, progress and the continual ascent of material civilization, historical episodes and the lessons of the past, universal peace; world unity, justice [‘adl]; social justice and divine justice, mind as principle emanation; activity of the human spirit, rejection, opposition and persecution, war and peace, Christ; Christianity, heedlessness and ignorance of the people, bribery and corruption, education of children; moral education, parliaments; constitutional government, promotion of commerce and industry, call to action, spiritual assemblies; administrative matters, purity of heart; sincerity of intention; sanctity, religion as source; stimulus of knowledge and science, detachment; severance; renunciation; patience, power of the mind over nature, walking the spiritual path; spiritual wayfaring; the virtuous life, universal education, excellence; distinction, justice and wrath of God, self-improvement; self-perfection; discipline, symbolism.

Abstract: Treatise highlighting the intimate connection between physical and spiritual realities and laws. Opens with an exordium on the names and attributes of God, which move "in the firmament of perfection in descending and ascending arcs", and "in the orbits of sanctity and circles of glorification", occupying "spiritual spheres" which are "subtle", "fluid", and "vibrating". Explains that since motion is intrinsic to existence, and this motion must be governed that order and perfection may be maintained, a universal attractive force was brought into being between the "holy and resplendent suns" and their planets and satellites. Emphasizes that the creation of God has no limits. Clarifies that the preceding are "spiritual truths pertaining to the spiritual world" and that material truths can also be inferred from this, for "physical things are signs and imprints of spiritual things". Describes the interconnected and relative nature of "earthly" and "heavenly", "material" and "spiritual", "accidental" and "essential", "particular" and "universal", "foundation" and "structure". States, quoting a Hadith, that particular and universal realities in both the physical and spiritual realms are infinite. Explains that the divine grace is manifested according to capacity, both individually in the human reality and collectively in this new cycle: thus "in this most great manifestation ... the gates of revelation and discovery have been thrown wide open". Clarifies that it is not possible that God's grace should have appeared all at once, but that a gradual and progressive revelation is necessary. Warns that the knowledge and sciences of past ages are "superstitious fancies" compared to those realities which have become unveiled in this Revelation, and so all matters must be weighed in the balance of this Cause. Directs that all things be investigated "in a methodical and scientific way", and that conventional wisdom be rejected, in order "to discover the undisclosed verities and the hidden mysteries, which are concealed in the inmost heart of the universal realities". Reiterates that the discoveries and opinions of earlier philosophers, including those regarding the celestial spheres, were unsound, since it is only in this age that the mathematical sciences have been systematized. Defends the statements of the Prophets about the celestial spheres, that they merely referred to the orbits of the planets. Affirms that the planets move within a subtle, fluid and vibrating substrate, and that "the heavens are a restrained wave because a void is impossible and inconceivable". Rejects the notion that the celestial spheres are solid and glassy. Returns to the topic of the errors of the ancient philosophers, in relation to the orbit of the Earth around the sun: while Pythagoras, Plato and Aristarchus affirmed the correct theory, their opinions were based on presentiment and not on evidence; while most of the sages, including al-Farabi, followed the erroneous theory of Ptolemy (in contradiction to the explicit text of Qur'an 36:38). Reiterates that sound scientific theories are supported by logical proofs and careful observation, as well as being "in conformity with the principles of the universal themes expounded in the divine sciences". Praises the careful observations of Copernicus. Closes with a prayer in praise of God and this Day and asking for steadfastness. Subjects: celestial spheres [aflak]; planets; astronomy, infinity and eternity, interconnectedness; all things involved in all things; chain of being, microcosm and macrocosm
