The principles are either spiritual or administrative; the spiritual ones are in the addresses of the Master, etc. The Administrative ones are in His Will. They are embodied in the Administrative Order. The friends in America in the West, have Faith. They are well grounded in both of these principles, but they are just beginning to know the laws that are in the Aqdas, these are a grater challenge. The Cause is growing within the Administration. The VI volume of “World Order” will have the original reproductions of those portions of the Aqdas prepared by the Egyptian N.S.A. for presentation to their Government. This is a beginning, eventually it will lead to the printing of the Aqdas. The laws are from Bahá'u'lláh's Ordinances, secondary laws are from the International House of Justice.

We must not be afraid to say we have doctrine; all that is in the Dispensation is doctrine. We have doctrine but no dogmas; we have mysteries but no superstition.

Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, Some Answered Questions, and the Íqán: are essentially books in teaching.

All titles of the chapters of the Qur'án were given by those that compiled it and have nothing to do with Muḥammad. He never divided them. They put the latter part of His Revelation at the beginning; Those passages regarding the Promised One, those that announce the coming of the Day of God, which were revealed at the beginning of His revelation they put at the end. Just as the Báb, in the Qayyumu'l-Ama, His first book was His most powerful one and is comparable to those Súrahs of Muḥammad at the end of the Qur'án.

The friends should read and study the Will and Testament. We are too near to it to see it in its proper light. It is like a huge edifice, we can not see it in perspective. This and the Aqdas are the two chief depositories of the truths enshrined in the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. There are gaps in the Aqdas which the Will fills in as if the Master and Bahá'u'lláh had arranged it. An example of this complementarity between the Will and the Aqdas is Ḥuqúq. Ḥuqúq is referred to in the Aqdas, also endowment, fees, fines, inheritance, etc, if their heirs are dead the endowments all payable to the House of Justice. He established the House of Justice and fixed its revenues. Regarding Ḥuqúq, He does not say in the Aqdas to whom it is to be paid, neither in text on questions and answers. Bahá'u'lláh says what Ḥuqúq is emphasizes its importance, but does not say to whom it shall be given and does not say that it goes to the House of Justice. In the Will the Master makes it clear. The ordinance of Ḥuqúq is established by Bahá'u'lláh in the Aqdas, but He never said whom it was to be payable to, so He left a gap which the Master, in His Will, fills. He anticipated an Institution but does not refer to what it may be anywhere. Were it not for the Will, this would be very perplexing.

Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, part I, page 8: by a "Just King". "Just Government," the Master means and established, legitimate form of Government; that we must give our allegiance to. Any established form of Government.

"Will," part I, page 13: referring to the Hands; they must report the delinquent member to the Guardian, he that puts him out. Three elements in the Will: the Guardian is the Interpreter, the International House of Justice the Legislator; the Hands propagate and teach the Cause, through research work and the example of their lives and conduct. The Administrative Order would be paralyzed if one of these institutions should cease to function.

The friends do not realize that some of the passages in the Gleanings were written by Bahá'u'lláh as a Bábí, before He declared Himself. Gleanings, Page 73, refers to Himself who will be manifest. When He says “We” He means we Bábís; “As well as those who shall come after Him to the end that hath no end...” refers to the Prophets who will come after Him. Once He has declared Himself.

In the Gleanings top paragraph, page 212. Is and excellent quotation related to politics.

The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf,; is the last book revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. No doubt part at least of it was revealed in 'Akká.

Compare the Gleanings,; page 285 with The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf. Page 75.

Jesus abrogated two laws of Moses, Sabbath and prohibited divorce. The Master explains — Tablet to Miss Rosenberg — that monogamy was not thought by Jesus. The Gospel prohibits divorce but says nothing about monogamy. The Fathers of the Church made it a law, but Christ never did. There was polygamy in His days, and it was not prohibited among the early Christians. Then they not only established monogamy, but said that celibacy should be the rule. When Jesus had not even enjoined monogamy, and had tolerated polygamy, the Church Fathers went so far as to establish celibacy.

The Qur'án prohibited polygamy, but the commentators misinterpreted the text. The text says polygamy is conditioned upon Justice, in another passage Muḥammad says Justice in these circumstances (i.e. polygamy) is impossible. So we see that Islám is a step in advance of Christianity. The mission of the Bahá'ís in proving Islám is a further step in Revelation than Christianity, must cite this evidence. These things should be taught in the summer schools in relation to comparative religion and Islám.

We have to consider the Aqdas in the light of the authorized interpreter, the Master. Bahá'u'lláh in a passage say marriage with two wives is conditioned upon Justice. The Master say in a tablet to Miss Rosenberg, that Justice is impossible, (to be just to two wives). It is just like the Qur'án. Both the Qur'án and the Bahá'í Teachings are a step further than the gospels. The Missionaries, the enemies of the Cause will quote the Aqdas and claim that we do not advocate monogamy. Then we must quote the Master's Table. Bahá'í says in the Aqdas, “Refer ye to what is not in the Aqdas to the Most Great Branch;” and in the Tablet of the Covenant, (Kitáb-i-'Ahd) He quotes this passage of His and says the Master is that Branch. The church Fathers had no right to prohibit what Christ had not prohibited, and yet they went a step further and established celibacy.

Hidden Words, Persian, verse 63; corresponds to the Words of Bahá'u'lláh; as to the Great Calamity; it is a punishment from God for their negligences and indifference to His Revelation. It is Retribution. “Unforeseen” agrees with “all of a sudden.”

of the Qur'án misinterpreted the text in order to agree with the Ptolemaic system. Galileo 1000 years later supported Qur'án's text.

We must not be afraid in stating truths in spite of the fact that they may run against what the biologist, the astronomer, the physicist, etc., say. His point is that we should not impose it on the scientist. But we should have the courage to make these statements and not be afraid of stating them and saying we have no proof. We must admit we have no proof, but state these are our teachings and express the hope that science will prove them. The statements are Divine Revelation and we believe in them. We should not do what the Muslim and Christian leaders have done and compromise. It is a very subtle form of corruption that the Muslim leaders have introduced into the Qur'án (regarding marriage, astronomy etc.,). If science discovers a fact contrary to the text of the teachings, the Bahá'ís must adhere to the text of the teachings, even if it takes a thousand years to prove it as it did with the text of the Qur'án (Súrah 36)

Tablet of Ishraqát, where it says, "God will inspire them." Corresponds to the Will and Testament.

The Guardian and the House of Justice are under unerring guidance and protection. Experts, non-Bahá'ís, will have to examine the Aqdas so that it may be published with many notes and commentaries of a clear, explanatory nature. In the Aqdas there is modification, abrogation and addition to religious law. Fasting, Pilgrimage and Obligatory Prayer are modified. The Bahá'ís will not be prepared for the Aqdas with its wealth of technical notes, unless they study Islám, its history and teachings. The summer schools are doing this now.

Bahá'u'lláh alludes to the Aqdas in the Íqán, where he enumerates the books of laws of the different Faiths, and then mentions the book of "Him Whom God will make Manifest."

The "Holy Book" is the Gospel, the "Most Holy Book" is the Aqdas. The "Holy Spirit" is in the Bible, the "Most Great Spirit (E see D) in the Bahá'í Revelation. Always the superlative "Most." This Revelation cannot be surpassed, all future Prophets being under His shadow for five hundred thousand years.

We can increase our faith and strengthen it through observation, mediation, prayer and activity.

It is better not to change the personal pronouns in saying the prayers. (from me to us, my to her, etc.,) but leave them exactly as revealed. However, before we say the prayer we can address a few to God saying the prayer is on behalf of such a person or such a group, and then read or say it as it is in the text.

Gleanings,: page 114: "Spread thy skirt, Oh Jerusalem," means a fuller revelation, His Revelation. (See also under Palestine.)

"The Kingdom is God's" alludes to that Kingdom which the Christians have been praying for and Christ announced. This is the Kingdom of Bahá'u'lláh which will be raised on the ruins of western civilization. It is referred to by Christ as the “Kingdom of God;” by the Jews as the Reign of Righteousness;” and by Muḥammad as the “Day of God.”

The story of Joseph and his brothers is paralleled by the treatment by Suḥh-i-Azal of Bahá’u’lláh, and His troubles. The Báb’s commentary on the Qayyumu-l-Asma is about Joseph and his brothers, and was a prophecy of the treatment Bahá’u’lláh would receive from His brothers. It is the most significant, the most eloquent work revealed by the Báb. It is very intimate too, as He refers to His mother and His wife in it.

Bahá’í Scriptures, page 255, paragraph 527, “Verily the tongue of the Ancient gives Glad Tidings to those who are in the world concerning the appearance of the Greatest Name, and who take His Covenant among the nations. “The “Who” in “who takes His Covenant...” “refers to the tongues of the Ancient, i.e.: God. This is the Greater Covenant that God takes with all the people of the world regarding His Manifestation; in this case, Bahá’u’lláh.

(In connection with translations of the teachings being misleading, confused, inaccurate. ) Due to insufficient understanding of the Master’s statements, inability to express it on the part of the translator and also whether the person is translated to has understood it.

“Verily, He is Myself, the Shining-Place of My Identity; the East of My Cause,” etc. All this part is God speaking; i.e, the Tongue of the Ancient, referring to Bahá’u’lláh and testifying to Bahá’u’lláh as God’s Covenant. It has nothing to do with the Master.

Some Answered Questions. “page 42, Chapter XII; “And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a Branch shall grow out of his root:” The words “rod” and “Branch” are one and the same thing in this sentence, it is repetition of the same thing and refers to only one thing and this is Bahá’u’lláh. There are Tablets revealed by Bahá’u’lláh, (not yet translated) in which He refers to Himself as the Branch, but He means by this the Branch of the Tree of Divinity. The Chapter in Isaiah does not refer to the Master at all but Bahá’u’lláh. The Manifestations are all Branches that grow out of the Tree of Divinity, as They are all the Rays of the Sun. When Bahá’u’lláh refers to Himself as a Tree, then the Master is the Branch of That Tree. (See “Bahá’í Scriptures,” page 256, paragraph 529;) “Verily the Branch of Command has sprung from this Root.” On page 76, in chapter XII of Some Answered Questions, the Master says: “Universal peace and concord will be realized between all the nations, and that incomparable Branch will gather...” etc. Surely the friends must see that He, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, could not refer to Himself as the “Incomparable Branch”. The term “Lordly Branch” refers to Bahá’u’lláh, (also Page 76.) This means the Branch of Divinity, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the ??? of the Manifestation, The friends read the writings but they do not ponder them.

In Some Answered Questions, Chapter XII, page 73, we find that the Master shows that this Prophecy of Isaiah, Chapter II verses 1-10, not only proves that the “Branch” from the stem of Jesse did not refer to Christ but to Bahá’u’lláh, but also states this immaculate conception: “This rod out of the stem of Jesse might be correctly applied to Christ, for Joseph was of the descendants of Jesse, the Father of David: But as Christ found existences through the Spirit of God, He called Himself the Son of God. If He had not done so, this description would refer to Him. Moreover, the prophecies were fulfilled at that time. Universal peace did not come into existence at the time of Christ. In the word “but” the Master makes the immaculate conception quite clear. In a Tablet that has not yet been translated from the original Persian, the Master says the conception of Christ was extraordinary, against the natural laws. The Bahá’ís must accept the immaculate conception. Every religion has its mysteries. The Virgin Mary’s perplexity was not due to shame, but because she could not explain her condition. The Íqán, where Bahá’u’lláh refers to Mary as “that mild and immortal countenance”, if she were not blameless, how could He refer to her in such term?” “Mild” here means the essence of chastity. But even if Bahá’u’lláh and the Master had not said these things about the Immaculate conception, to a Bahá’í the mention of it in the Qur’án would be quite sufficient proof.

There are many references to the coming of Muḥammad, in both the Old and New Testament. Deuteronomy, Chapter 33, verse 2; “And He said, the Lord come from Sinai, and rose up from Sier unto them; He shined forth from Mount Paran, and He came with ten thousand of Saints: from His right hand went a fiery law for them.” “The Lord coming from Sinai” refers to the Mosaic dispensation. “Rose up from Sier unto them,” refers to mountain in Galilee and means the Christian dispensation. “Shined forth from Mount Paran” refer to the Muḥammadan dispensation; “and He came with ten thousand of saints” is the Bahá’í dispensation; all references to Mount Paran refers to Muḥammad. Paran is a mountain in Arabia. The word Paraclete also refers to Muḥammad. Paraclete means “the Praises” in Greek, and Muḥammad means “the Praiser in Arabic. Further references to Muḥammad in the Answered Questions, page 78, etc. Genesis Chapter 21, verse 21: “And he dwelt in the Wilderness of Paran: refers to Muḥammad. The Arabs are the descendants of Ishmael. Numbers, Chapter 13, verse 3, the word Paran occurs. The wilderness of Paran is in Trans-Jordan. David could easily get to it. The references Deuteronomy is the most important reference. (Chapter 33, verse 2.) Genesis, Chapter 17, verse 20, “And as for Ishmael... and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, etc.” The twelve princes are the twelve Imáms. Also in Deuteronomy, Chapter 18, verse 18, “I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren.” This refers to their cousins, the Arabs, brethren meaning cousin herein relationship, and the prophet is Muḥammad. If it had meant Christ it would have said “Seed” and not “brethren.”

The twenty four elders who will stand before the Throne of God refers to the 19 Letters of the Living and 5 others will be made known, said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In Arabic there are two words:

Ilham            and            Vahy
Inspiration            Revelation

The word for Revelation is confined to the Manifestation of God in Arabic, and has a companion word: Ayih — which is applied to any verse or sign revealed by the Manifestation. So that the use of the word “Ayih” is the criterion. All others are inspired:” Ilham, The Master, the Guardian, the poets, etc., are inspired.

Soul, Mind and Body — Also Future Life.

The master says death is when the mirror ceases to face the sun. The sun is the soul, the body is the mirror. The soul is the prime mover of the dream. The body reacts on the soul and the soul on the body. Dreams are due to various influences; fatigue; fear, etc., of the body reacting on the soul, also when the soul comes under an influence and reveals itself in a dream, is another; and the Holy Spirit influencing the soul, prophetic visions, an intimation from God to man in a dream. Three types of dreams: first the body influencing the soul; second the soul manifesting itself; third the holy Spirit influencing the soul. But then we must be very careful, most of our dreams are the body influencing the soul. The soul starts when the embryo is formed. The soul has a beginning but no end. Man has a beginning but no end. God alone has no end and no beginning. The body of the manifestation and His soul have a beginning too because this part of them is human, but the spark from God in them partakes of the pre-existence of God. Pre-existence is the soul prerogative of God. But man is immortal. Conception is the beginning of the soul. We cannot understand the nature of the world of the Manifestation because it is above us, as the mineral cannot understand the vegetable's state, etc.

The way we use our capacity in this world helps it to develop for the next world. If we misuse or neglect it. The progress of the soul in the next world will suffer.

We lose a great opportunity if we do not use the body in away that will prepare the soul for the next life. The importance of the body lies in that it is an instrument for the preparation of the soul for the next world. The soul will enter the next world in an immature state if it does notice its opportunities in this world. To wish death is not a wholesome inclination. Discipline, struggle, suffering disappointments, these are things that train the soul. Mental, physical, struggle is an exercise for the soul. If we fail we must not be disappointed, because if we fail we must exert our will to pull ourself out of it. Think about what you have to do today, and not speculate about the past and the future. Forget the past, don't brood over it, it paralyzes us.

The soul is the center, the spirit is a Manifestation of the soul, so is the mind. The soul is the image of God. Embryonic evolution is the history of mankind.

There are certain limitations of the human mind that no science can transgress, otherwise we would not be human.

The soul has developed ever since the embryo: the embryonic world, this life and the future Life three stages; hence there is not re-incarnation. God reveals Himself but never enters into anything. We retain in the next world our identity and self-consciousness, but our self-consciousness is greatly increased.

Imperfection is a mixture of good and evil. It manifests itself differently in this world to its manifestation in the world beyond, because evil always exists: ego; because God alone and His Manifestations are perfect. We may have set-backs in the next world too.

There are mysteries in all the worlds of God, ever deepening mysteries as we advance. God's mercy over-shadows all, even covenant breakers. His mercy and forgiveness are infinite. We must not dogmatize about these matters or set any limit on God.

What is imperfection? A mixture of good and evil. We are never perfect, but always becoming perfected. God works in a mysterious way not only in this world but in the next one. The more we understand the greater the mysteries are. In the next world as in this one there are set-backs, they can be blessings in disguise as they are here.

THE FUTURE — PEACE, WAR, CIVILIZATION, ETC.

The circumstances of the next war will produce the great peace-builders of the epoch to come. The change will come 100 years after Bahá'u'lláh's declaration. We can only try to localize the war which will be swift and destructive in its scope.

Japan is similar to Germany: youth, virility and not yet mature. The Japanese will have to suffer. The coming war is a providence to the whole world. The coming conflict will be sudden, swift, short.

What is now being done in the Cause is infinitesimal compared to what will come after the world conflict. They will come in troops, create a new race of men — these are the days of dread and fear, after will arise His mercy. First the punishment, then endless peace.

After the war Lord Lenington went to Persia. (He was much inspired by the Cause there.) He wrote and asked the Master about the future. The Master said the distant future is very bright. He meant the near future will be very dark.

They (nations of Europe) will be fused in the crucible of war. One year after the armistice the Master foretold the next war. There will be no line between combatants and non-combatants in the next war.

Does not think the Cause will in the West reach stage of sufficient numbers and importance to be opposed by the Governments before the next war. The fall of Western civilization is really the destruction of the whole fabric of civilization, East and West. There will be a mass reaction in favor of the Cause — people entering the Cause in troops. The Cause is now being consolidated but is not yet proclaimed. It will be proclaimed after the war.

All these cults, etc., are a natural outcome of the deterioration of society, giving rise to them. Cults, these fancies, these fashions, superstitions. All this is but the beginning of decline. We are only just entering the fringe of darkness. People are drifting, perilously drifting. Society has lost its anchor, institutions are drifting, drifting, drifting. The explosions the next war. There is a slow process of destruction along with decay-what remains the explosion will destroy. There is a reason for this: Explosion being a violent thing it will be revived, released. It is what is left of the human race, the remnant, a powerful minority will arise to spread the Cause. We can only imagine the bare outlines of what will take place, but the results we know. One thing is certain, it will be very violent, very sudden. The last war was but drop compared to it. The great war was but a prelude to the Greater War." Which will be the war to end war? America will suffer between two great storm centers. Europe and the far East. Compare the state of the early Christians and their institutions before the fall of Rome and the Bahá'í institutions now, before the coming war.

Who knows, maybe the race prejudice will become worse. We are now only on the fringe of the darkest period of human history, the Cause is progressing in spite of these weaknesses of the Bahá'ís, but what would have been their progress if they had overcome these things? Their concentration on the administration has blinded them to their weaknesses. They think because they are building it, that is enough.

First is national civilization, such as England and France have and Germany is developing. Then comes European and Pan-American civilization and then comes world civilization, world unification. Prior to the conversion of nations, first the nations will establish, as non-Bahá'ís, the Lesser Peace. Then as great groups come into the Cause, gradually nations will become Bahá'í and then consciously develop the Most Great Peace. The Most Great Peace implies the political association of the United States with Europe.

The stages of mass conversion will come after the war. Accepting the Cause in the day of the Manifestation when its glory is not yet manifest is one stage, and then conversion in the Golden Age which is the easy. Three stages, the heroic age, the days of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and the Master: next is the formative stage, consolidation of the administration" (now) and then the Golden Age mass conversion.

Strange, the process of disintegration outside of the Cause and integration inside it. These are the days of dread and fear. After will arise His mercy. First the punishment, then endless peace. Morally people will become worse than ancient Rome and this is a result of irreligion. Irreligious will bring in its weak moral laxity, and this will increase with the next war, the "unforeseen calamity." There will be a tremendous protest, a reaction, after the next war.

China with Russia, Japan against Russia, Europe against China and Russia. Africa will revolt when she sees the decline of European civilization. The whole world will be involved, South America, — the whole world wide. Bahá'u'lláh says all of a sudden it will appear. In a sense it is correct to say this is a calamity that will visit the whole world because it failed to appreciate Bahá'u'lláh, as Rome failed to appreciate Christ. The present League of nations is the outcome of the last war. Agony begets something, as the last war was not the war to end war, the next war will beget a true League of Nations, it will appreciate it. A result of the coming war will be to inaugurate peace, the true League of nations. Just as the last war was the prelude to the coming war., the late League, begotten by the war, was the prelude to the future League of Nations. The Lesser peace will be established by the nations not yet Bahá'í and gradually develop into the Bahá'í World Order. The present League of Nations is the dawn of Universal Peace, but the sun is the future League of nations.

Dictatorship is an instrument that is hastening the war. The dictators release forces which they cannot control. The masses are so organized, so controlled, that even the dictators cannot control them, he becomes a tool in their hands when they become out of control. If the next war is not fiercer than the last it will not stir the people enough. It must be much worse. He thinks the war will break out internationally and then there will be a series of civil wars. Probably the whole world will be involved in the next war. The Master said that when women will arise for peace there will be peace. Then the true League of Nations will be born. There will be such universal reaction in favor of peace that both small and big powers will work together to establish a real League. They will be converted through suffering, not the rulers but the masses, and the masses will force the rulers. Patriotism has been the ruling force of the past. Then there will be mass conversion to the Cause. The present mentality is un-Bahá'í nationalism is the fashion at present and hence the Cause is extremely unpopular; when the masses, as the result of intense suffering, realize that nationalism is not enough, then they will be ready for the Faith. Another thing that will attract them to the Cause is when they realize all this has been prophesied by Bahá'u'lláh. Suffering will purge them and refine them, the new race of men will be raised up. It will be more than a new generation — as new race men; not only with a new mentality, but with a new spiritual power, a new capacity. They must establish this peace through their hearts as well as their minds. The prophecy of 100 years after the declaration of Bahá'u'lláh, 1963, (see Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era) does not mean that the Bahá'ís will then become the world government, but that then will be the beginning of Th. Lesser Peace, that of the nations of the world without necessarily becoming Bahá'í. Gradually afterwards, the nations will become Bahá'ís. There will be a tremendous reaction in favor of the Cause, Bahá'í Government will be formed and then they will, conscious of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, establish as Bahá'ís the Most Great Peace. The Lesser Peace will mark the coming of age of humanity and the inception of the Golden Age. The Most Great Peace is like the age of maturity which comes later, as in man. This new world civilization will supersede the Christian civilization, on the ruins of Western civilization, the world civilization will arise. It will be totally unlike all former civilization; this is a world civilization. From the dawn of history it was quite impossible to establish a world civilization because the world was not discovered. Napoleon could have conquered it perhaps, but never have unified it because the physical means were not yet perfected. The world above the nations and not any particular nation first. Assuming the interest of the nation to be required to sacrifice itself for the good of the whole, it should be ready to do so. the peoples of the world must have such a love for this entity which is humanity, that they will be willing to sacrifice themselves for this entity. What will induce such Love? Such a sense of human solidarity? Teaching campaigns, the Temple, committees, will into be enough. It must suffer; humanity is like an unruly, tempestuous youth who like an unruly, tempestuous youth who must go to school, be trained. What will do this except the school of adversity, this is the next war.

The coming of age of the human race is the core of the Bahá'í teachings. Every Bahá'í should stress this, the significance of the stage which the world is approaching: its highest stages. If the people say they don't see it, we must tell them after the next war they will see it clearly. He believes after the federal unity. The present League of Nations is a fore-runner only, not a nucleus. The league which will be founded after the next war will be a nucleus, as it develops will become a pattern. Western civilization will commit suicide in the next war, because by the very weapons it has created it destroys itself. He should not be surpassed if the League of Nations will entirely disappear from Geneva, but will resurrect after the next war. (next one). The League will never die, it will evolve after the next war, it will establish the Lesser Peace and later the Most Great Peace, when the International Government becomes Bahá'í. The world will be prepared after the next war for a still more Bahá'í League than conceived by Wilson. The coming war is a providence to the whole world. The coming conflict will be sudden, quick, short. A federal international state can be established; a unitary state, as in Germany, is impossible for the whole world.

The new world is so young and tender that one can hardly recognize it. But it was born after the world war.

There is a tremendous fight before the Cause, the friends do not realize it. It will spread as far as China. China and India will be the last to fall. "The wailing of China and India will be raised." said 'Abdu'l-Bahá; this refers to the religious leaders opposition to the spread of the Cause. Who knows, perhaps Mussolini's conquest of Abyssinia will facilitate the spread of the Cause. Now the Protestant missionaries are beginning to oppose — this opposition will spread to the Anglican Church in England, and if there is anything left, the Lutheran Church in Germany Catholicism will be the last of all. The Pope, their head, will oppose and this will precipitate its downfall. After Catholicism Christianity is done. Then it will spread to the far East; two hundred million Hindus, then to China, the four million Buddhists. When we compare this great upheaval, when the Catholic Church will be aroused, to the scratchings of the New History Society, Farid, etc. It is a twofold process, decline within the Church and the opposition to the Cause. The Muhammadans are destined to oppose the Cause very fiercely in India, also the Hindus in the distant future. The wailing and lamenting of India and China which the Master referred to, is the opposition of Hindus and Buddhists to the Cause.

After the lapse of a thousand years there will be a new prophet to give new laws. After five hundred thousand years, it may sound preposterous but what he would describe as inter-planetary unity may be possible — it is even probable that in three or four thousand years there may begin inter-planetary communications with human beings, not human beings.??

Future generations will appreciate what is taking place now in the formative period of the Cause, even as we appreciate the Heroic Age. There is no doubt that all these cults that are sprung up the world over, is because the foundations of religion are tottering. Europe must suffer something equivalent to the Civil War in the United States before they can be untied; (its nations) they will be fused in this crucible of war.

GUARDIAN

In The Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Bahá the words "irremovable and expounder" are found (irremovable Head of the International House of Justice and expounder of teachings.) The Huqúq is a fixed revenue for the Guardian, paid direct, and has nothing to do with the administrative funds, local, National, or International.

The Guardians are the equivalent in the Bahá'í Revelation to the Imáms in the Muhammadan Revelation.

It is the Guardian's responsibility to prevent the International House of Justice from abrogating any of the laws of the Aqdas.

The Master shares with the Prophet His perfection, Shoghi Effendi shares with the Master the right of interpretation.

In a very vital issue the Guardian could know the true fact of a matter even if not told — or mis-informed. If it is essential for the Guardian's protection or the protection of the Cause, he will be guided.

The English King reigns, but the Guardian is active as the hereditary element in the Universal House of Justice. The aristocratic element exists in that the elect rule, not the people, not a dictator.

Referring to The Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "That tree which overshadoweth all mankind." Through the influence of the Cause the Guardian overshadows all mankind. Infallibility is either inherent or derived. The Guardians and the International House of Justice's infallibility is acquired. The power that overshadows all mankind is nothing in the Guardian as himself. The integrity, the purity of the teachings is the most important thing.

Bahá'u'lláh purposely left a gap in the Aqdas which was filled by the Master's Will and Testament with the Guardianship. (Ḥuqúq)

There was a danger that the friends might misunderstand the Master's Will and so the Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh was written, his (Shoghi Effendi's) spiritual testament in detail. He has fixed in it the relations of things to each other. We cannot go beyond what he has defined, however the second Guardian can interpret the "Dispensation" itself, if he has the same promise to be the inspired interpreter. The Guardian is the Interpreter, the expounder of the Cause and the protector of the Cause.

The Guardian can over-rule a decision of the International House of Justice if he conscientiously feels it is not in accord with the teachings. This is the interpretive right. The second part of this work is participation in the legislative body. All endowments, in international and local, are to be deferred to the International House of Justice. The Guardian has no right what-so-ever in these matters. He has the Ḥuqúq. Fines specified in the Aqdas and inheritance, go to the International House. Ḥuqúq is 19% of one's capital and 19% of one's income. The individual is free to decide what his expenditures are to be, if he expends his total income he does not need to pay Ḥuqúq, but if he does not, then on the surplus of income over expenditure he must pay the Ḥuqúq on his capital.

It is the duty of every Bahá'í that remembers statements of the Master that are confusing, to write to him about it, because that is his business, (Guardian) his chief work, to elucidate these things. Anything that confuses any believer, they must write to him so he can help them. The Master has not contradicted Himself, there is no duality in the teachings.

He does not mind if the friends think of him, concentrate on him, as long as they have the right concept of him. He is linked to the Administrative Order. He is not an independent entity, he is a part of a unity, not an entity as the Master was, (see Dispensation). He agrees that the Institution of Guardianship takes precedence over the International House of Justice. The “Beloved” is a new word used by Bahá’u’lláh. It is confined to the Bahá’í teachings.

The Will of the Master is like a huge edifice, we must recede from it to properly grasp its import. “Even if I had the time I could not do it,” said Shoghi Effendi regarding elaboration on it. It must recede from us. The lapse of time and unfoldment of the Revelation will enable us to fully appreciate it. The words of the Guardian are as binding, have the same authority, as the words of the Báb, Bahá’u’lláh and the Master, but the stations are different. In The Dispensation of Bahá’u’lláh what he says about the Guardianship is binding on the future Guardians. The Will of the Master is a third kind of covenant, Bahá’u’lláh’s Will is the lesser covenant — (see under “Religion”)

Two Statements From the Guardian

There is not a Bahá'í in the world that can be hurt if they follow a very simple rule. They can stand all the unwisdom of their sisters and brothers, the slights and the slanders, if they will do one thing only (three times he struck his hand, the back of it, into the palm of the other while he said)

“Say the Greatest Name instantly, Say the Greatest Name instantly, Say the Greatest Name instantly.”

The Guardian's other statement was this: “Every Bahá'í in the world could be a teacher and a speaker. How? Like this:

Every Bahá'í should memorize Bahá'í Prayers. Every Bahá'í should memorize Bahá'í Principles. Every Bahá'í should memorize some of the talks of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, some of the writings of Bahá'u'lláh (short passages), also some of the other writings. Then, he said, these are the tools that you put into the subconscious mind; and you can stand before any audience and never be struck for something to say.

Even if you start out with a prayer in a sincere and humble manner, the Supreme Concourse on high will assist you and you will never be at a loss for words.

The Greek Orthodox Patriarch, a tall man with an exceptionally thick grey beard and very long hair, received me in his little sitting-room in the Patriarchate. There was something strangely Byzantine about the room, overcrowded with furniture, ikons, photographs of priests and flowers. The Patriarch was outspoken, yet he remained dignified.

He was sceptical about the possibility of a collaboration between the Churches. "Yes," he said we meet in public and at congresses and love each other in front of the others. But all this is sheer hypocrisy. His of other Churches come and visit me and speak of unity and fellowship. But after they have left they go to their missionaries and make them proselytize among the Greek Catholic, even more than before. Their one concern is how to increase their own flock. Universal fellowship interests them only for reasons of propaganda. They don't really have it at heart. I have ceased to believe in the words wit and fellowship when they come from the heads of Churches in Palestine."

I asked Shoghi Effendi whether the Bahá'ís did not try to do something to avert the coming disaster. His answer came without a moment's hesitation: "Nothing whatsoever because we know that t the next war the will of God and is bound to happen. He revealed this to 'Abdu'l-Bahá more than forty years ago"

I was both impressed and irritated by this unshaken faith. It was responsible for what could be regarded as indifference to the problems of the moment. Has anyone the right to a present responsibility, even as that he possesses true knowledge of the future? Even, if many of the prophecies of Shoghi Effendi's two great ancestors have been proved true, were is the certainty that this particular one may not be wrong Was not his answer an expression of doctrinal egotism True religion means action today and not only tomorrow. The events of a life may be predestined, but were we not given die power or free understanding with which to meet them? Have we the right to say, when a house is on fire, "What's the good of trying to save those inside Anyhow, they are probably predestined to be burnt?" Those who believe in God usually also believe in miracles. Even in the face of certain prophecies they will still hope for a miracle that will make the prophecy untrue.

I had prepared a number of questions, bur, since Shoghi Effendi made himself merely the mouthpiece of the Bahá'í Krishnamurti, Hindu mystic and teacher, whose ideas have perhaps influenced Western thought more than those of any other modern thinker from the East.

Maxwell-Baldwin letter 1939

Maxwell “Haifa Talks”, Vol 1

(Extract from a letter from May Maxwell to Katherine Baldwin, Honolulu. February 1939)

You already know of the wonderful “notes” of the Guardian which Rúḥíyyih Khánúm took at the table by his side during the winter of 1937, how she transcribed them later at his request in two little books and sent them to me in time to have a few copies made before the Convention..

Never have I seen anyone work as hard as Shoghi Effendi, and it must be very trying to him with his universal creative energy, his world horizon, his soaring ideals, to say nothing of the unfathomable depths of knowledge and wisdom which flow like undulated waves through his sacred entity at all times, it must be a cruel restraint that he has not a greater vehicle or channel through which to pour all this power throughout the world...

These “notes” will rejoice and inspire you and show you once more, as all his writings reveal to us all, the sublime promise of the future, the world-sweeping cataclysm destined to reduce the present system to ashes, out of which will be born a new humanity, the promised Kingdom, the World Order of Bahá’u’lláh.

Mankind has sunk so low, has so utterly forgotten the source from which he sprang, has wandered from divine guidance following his will-o’-the-wisp of the feeble leadership in every country today even, as the Guardian says, “World leadership has failed,” and only as we are directed back into the path of God is there any hope for this lost world...

Now is the spring of our life on this earth today the only living link and direct channel to the Supreme Being, concealed from our view, yet manifest as the sun in heaven in all the surging power and transformation of the world.

As I wrote Shoghi Effendi, she (Rúḥíyyih Khánúm) was transported almost in a breath from the world of humanity to the very threshold of God, and often I have felt left behind in her flight. Her life was cut off as by a sword and only God can do these things, and only He can sustain us and recreate us for that higher rarified air she now breathes.

In this last visit to Haifa I came to understand as never before something of the agony our Guardian has endured. He spoke of it very simply one night and his uplifted gaze, the white purity and beauty of his face are forever graven on my heart. Nothing is too great to suffer for him, no daily discipline, effort or sacrifice, no surrender of all that is upon this earth can even touch the hem of his sacred suffering, the depths of the cup from which he has drunk. With all my heart and soul I thank the Beloved that He gave us such a daughter for him, who is, in the words of the Master, "The apple of His eye and the jewel of His heart."

Beloved Friends,

It is a great privilege to share these notes with those Bahá'ís who have asked for them both for themselves and to share with other Bahá'í friends. It will greatly simplify our understanding of their status if we bear in mind that they are not the official statements of our blessed Guardian, that he has not sent them through the Administrative, official channel, but that inasmuch as he sanctions both their recording in his presence and subsequent sharing with fellow Bahá'ís, they are of priceless value being his free and spontaneous utterances to those Bahá'ís who are actually in his beloved presence. These notes taken by Rúhíyyih Khánum (then Miss Mary Maxwell) have the same status, in a vast field of subjects, as the notes of all others.

Lovingly yours,

The Greatest Holy Leaf's name will be added by Shoghi Effendi, The Virgin Mary (Maryan) did not recognize the full station of Christ till after His Crucifixion.

All things proceed from God. God is the origin of all things, including human characteristics.

Why did God allow evil to exist in the world? A satisfactory explanation has never, and can never be given. Surely God could have created some other scheme that would have allowed less evil. His motives, the way He works, are beyond us. It would cease to be a Revelation if Americans could resolve all these mysteries — it would be a product of the American mind.

The Protestant movement is a protest against the abuses of the Catholic Church and, being a protest, it is negative.

Social reform is of great value, but its area is very limited. It is the influence of religion on the individual that can bring about the results. Any philosophy that is based on materialism is fundamentally defective. This does not mean social reform has no value. Its value is restricted.

REVELATION has three aspects. God its Revealer, the Prophet, and then His successor appointed by Him.

Every religion has its mysteries — it must, because it is perfect from God and we are human, hence mysteries must exist for us because we cannot encompass religion, it not being man-made.

There are two Covenants; the Greater and the Lesser. The Greater Covenant of which God is the Author. The Manifestation the object, and the people of the world the ones covenanted with. The Lesser Covenant the Manifestation is the Author, His successor the object and the believers are the covenanted with group. Page 255, paragraph 527, of the Bahá's Scriptures refers to the Greater Covenant.

Krishna was the Prophet of Hinduism; Buddha of Buddhism. The religion of the Sabians exists but we do not know the name of its Prophet.

Confucius and Laotze were reformers, not Prophets. The remnants of Sabianism are the idolaters of Africa, it appeared in Mesopotamia. The religion of Abraham was revealed among the Sabians just as Jesus appeared among the Jews. All prophets have had followers; Hud, for instance, but the followers have ceased to exist. {{p3}}

There was a time when they not only existed but flourished. All these Prophets are within historic times. The followers of Hud lived in Petra, Transjordan. The religion of Abraham was revealed among the Sabians, whose original Prophet is unknown.

Buddha and Krishna were the Prophets of Buddhism and Hinduism, but all their authentic teachings have been lost. In the case of Sabianism, we do not even have the name of the Prophet. Sabianism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity, Muhammadanism, the Bábí religion, and now the Bahá'ís. These are the nine great religions, whose followers still exist. This does not mean that there were not many other religions. These 9 great religions are one of the significances of 9. Another is the name of Bahá', symbolic of the name of Bahá'u'lláh; the third meaning is that it symbolizes perfection. 9 is symbolic, as it symbolizes the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, which is the culmination of all religions, even as 9 is the culmination of all numbers.

The Prophets retain their identity and authority in the next world. The Letters of the Living retain their identity, their position, in the next world, but we cannot tell in what way or manner these function. (See page 141 of Íqán.) There are three worlds. God lives in a world of His Own, but who can picture, who can conceive of that world; then the world of the Prophets and the world of Creation. God is immeasurably exalted above the comprehension of all the Prophets and Messengers. Words he is translating on meditation of Bahá'u'lláh. We retain in the next world our identity and self-consciousness, but our self-consciousness is greatly increased. {{p4}}

THE PROPHET {{p5}}

Prophets, “endowed with constancy,” means that They are the bearers of a new law and that, having revealed the Law of God, they can endure every persecution. They are determined to uphold the Revelation of God against every opposition.

Christ's Words; “Why has Thou forsaken Me?” Bahá'u'lláh says Jesus was overwhelmed and the human element in Him became impatient. Jesus has His moments of fear and agitation, and this sentence reveals it. The Prophets have their moments of fear and agitation; the human element is always there in the Prophet.

The body of the Manifestation and His Soul have a beginning — because this part of them is human. But the spark of God in them partakes of the pre-existence of God.

The human element in the Prophets is human, but the power working through their atoms is from God, is stronger than in other humans. The soul works through our bodies...the Spirit of God through Theirs. If the Prophets were apart from us entirely how could we know them? They have something in common with us, in other words, Their human bodies, which are subject to sickness, etc.

The soul will see the Prophets in the next world. They have always existed as themselves.

Any specified science, etc, is outside of the province of the Prophet in the sense that He does not wish to pronounce upon it. We must always disassociate the human part of the Manifestation from His Spirit. It is the rule that the powers of the Manifestation are stronger; His sense of beauty; his memory; His power of endurance and strength. It is the Spirit in Him that is more powerful. This does not mean that the body of the Manifestation is of a different stuff — no, keen is the word, everything in Him is keener. This is due to His unique Spirit, but does not mean His atoms are different. His body is not of a different order than that of human beings, they are all the same. Although the body is the same the soul is not the same.

It is not a more intense reality, it is of a different order, quite different. If the body shows a keener perception it is due to this soul. The Master, the Guardian, the Saints, all else apart from the Prophets belong to the human order. {{p6}}

The Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, `Abdu'l-Bahá and the administrative order are the correct way of mentioning the Cause. The administration was conceived by Bahá'u'lláh, but matured in the womb of the Master's mind. Bahá'u'lláh is its Father, `Abdu'l-Bahá, its Mother. The Guardian is the interpreter, the House of Justice the legislator. Formerly all other Faiths had one person as these two things; the Caliphate, the Primate and the Pope. Revelation has three aspects: God the Revealer, the Prophet, and His successor appointed by Him. The Guardian may be the heart, but the heart is part of the body, the Administrative Order is the body. {{p8}}

THE BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Also References To Bahá'u'lláh, The Báb, The Master And Their Lives. {{p9}}

The World Order was anticipated as announced by the Báb, conceived by Bahá'u'lláh and formulated by the Master, and is now being built by the Bahá'ís.

Bahá'u'lláh abrogates, modifies and augments the Báb's laws. The laws of the Báb went into effect for about 19 years. Bahá'u'lláh revealed His laws only after His arrival in 'Akká. The interval must be short between a fore-runner and a Manifestation. It happened the fore-runner was a Prophet — a law-giver. Years are not of much importance. God can cause the fruit to ripen very fast. The first intimation was in the dungeon in Tíhrán. 19 years after the Báb's declaration He declared Himself in Baghdád. The most stirring, the most fiery of Bahá'u'lláh's Tablets were revealed in Adrianople (not yet translated.)

Christianity advocated union, Bahá'u'lláh unity. The world is ready for unity today.

In 1844 the Báb released the forces which were destined to enable mankind to attain maturity. (See "Gleanings" page 77, where Bahá'u'lláh refers to year 60.)

The Báb prophesied that His religion would spread to the whole world. One of the chief causes why this will be possible is because schism has been made impossible in the Cause due to the appointment of a successor in the "Book of the Covenant" and "Will and Testament" therefore there will be no opposition to its spread, such as Protestantism and Catholicism, Shí'ah and Sunní.

Previous religions have been more for the individual than society, whereas this religion is primarily for society.

The "Golden Age" is the maturity of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and it will start with the unification of the world; that marks its beginning. We have passed the period of infancy and are now in the formative period. As far as this planet is concerned, there is nothing beyond this Golden Age (i.e. unification of entire world.) Thence its endurance for five hundred thousand years, just as the individual States in the U.S.A. united to form one federal government, so the nations of the world will unite to form one federal international government, which is the highest thing for this planet. Every five hundred thousand years a Revelation equal to that of Bahá'u'lláh will appear. The Prophet who next comes has the right to abrogate the whole of the Aqdas if He wishes to, but all Prophets will be under the shadow of Bahá'u'lláh. It is the spiritual influence of Bahá'u'lláh that will over-shadow for five hundred thousand years. {{p10}}

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “A. / See / B.” -ed]

He is not sure all the American Bahá'ís recognize that Bahá'u'lláh is the coming of the Father, they identify Him with the coming of Jesus and think the Father is God and cannot appear. When we say Bahá'u'lláh is a final Revelation of God to mankind, when the Father appears, it means the fullest Revelation has appeared. The followers in every Revelation believe it is the final one. The Bahá'ís must not believe this, there is no finality: “From the beginning that has had no beginning to the end that has no end.” In the Gospel is only a reference to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. The Qur'án refers to both the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh.

He strongly feels we must safeguard the integrity of the Cause, its purity, in presenting it to the public. Not to make compromises, not to dilute the teachings to please the public. When you compromise you undermine the integrity of the Cause. Everything is being compromised in these days. In teaching we must start with the spiritual principles of the Cause, as the Master did. The laws are not mild, they are hard bread, we must wait until they have teeth for it.

In the Aqdas the House of Bahá'u'lláh, and the House of the Báb in Shíráz are established as the pilgrimage — the friends can choose one or the other. This is a law, obligatory for men, optional for women; this is a rule in favour of women. The institution of pilgrimage is to these two Houses. We visit Haifa and the Shrines. The House of Bahá'u'lláh takes precedence over that of the Báb. The Qiblih and the pilgrimage are the same in Islám, but in the Cause they are separate.

This is a stage in the evolution of the Cause, being persecuted by the politicians. They are afraid of the Administration. The reason why the German Government does not oppose the Cause is because their numbers are negligible. He does not think the Cause in the West will reach the stage of sufficient numbers and importance to be opposed by the Government before the next war. The fall of Western Civilization is really the destruction of the whole fabric of civilization, East and West. There will be a mass reaction in favour of the Cause — entering the Cause in troops. The Cause is now being consolidated, but not yet proclaimed. It will be proclaimed after the next war. This teaching work and construction of the Administration is only the first step to enable the Spirit to function in the body; it is more than a new religion, it is a new type of civilization. He prefers Bahá'í Faith to Bahá'ísm. It is all so simply expressed by Bahá'u'lláh and the Master, that the friends have failed to realize its greatness.

Bahá'u'lláh has come primarily to organize humanity and this cannot be done without Justice.

The Cause is impelled forward through crises. The spread of the Cause precipitates crises, and the crises gives the spread of the Cause a chance to overcome it, and the solution of the crisis through the operation of the Cause facilitates the spread of the Cause. {{p11}}

Growth, crisis, and the manifestation of the spirit of the Cause; and then it starts again, further growth, crisis, triumph, etc.

The Báb's Revelation released the forces required to bring about the maturity of the human race. When we enter the Golden Age of this Cause, then this maturity becomes a fact. The Golden Age is when it yields its fruit. The culmination of a process, the consummation of a cycle, is what is meant by "Knowledge was contained in 27 Letters, two of which have been revealed before the coming of the Báb." When the world is unified it marks the beginning of a development, which is world civilization. The coming of age of humanity marks the beginning of the unfoldment of world civilization. How could the whole world be unified by the coming of Jesus? — America was not yet discovered. It was too early — premature. In the prayers of Bahá'u'lláh there is reference to: "His Sovereignty" and "His Government." This passage refers to the last stage in the Bahá'í evolution, when all nations are unified as a Bahá'í Commonwealth. Evil will almost disappear. There is nothing in the Teachings to make us believe there will be a decline. In previous Revelations there was the rise and fall, previous Revelations were preliminary. The character of this Revelation being fundamentally different, its results must be different — there was corruption in other Revelations, there cannot be any in this one, owing to the Administrative Order. Evil will cease to be the force it is at present, it will become negligible.

This is the Law of God. The Prophet appears amongst the most backward of people, they become the greatest. A Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh states that the Government of His land will become the most honored. He feels Persians are quite wrong when they claim, some of them, if not all of them, that it was their capacity that made them worthy of having Bahá'u'lláh appear in their midst; quite the opposite. They should be proud because Bahá'u'lláh has brought about such a change. He has no sympathy with the attitude, in fact very much resents it, that they admire the Cause, love the Cause, because of what it will mean to Persia; in other words a nationalistic viewpoint. The Orthodox standpoint is the Cause first, be ready to sacrifice the interests of Persia to those of the Cause. Not Bahá'u'lláh for Persia, but Persia for Bahá'u'lláh. The national interests must be subordinated to the interests of the Cause.

There is a Bahá'í standard to which everyone must make sacrifices. It is not an American thing. It is God's Will that America should happen to be the first to build up this new civilization (Bahá'í), it is not that America happens to be superior. The prejudice and corruption prevailing in America is responsible for the initiation of the Bahá'í Civilization in that country first, as the Faith first dawned in the darkness of Persia. Although the Cause was born in the East its proclamation was in the West. There is a Tablet of the Master where He says the mysteries of the Cause will be made manifest in America, etc. What they are establishing is not American, {{{p12}}} it is Bahá'í, and the Americans themselves must make concessions to it. Is it American that nine people should conduct things and not be responsible to anyone? This is anything but American.

The friends of Persia do not realize it was Persia who lead in the Heroic Age, and now it is America's turn to make its contribution in the formative period. In the Golden Age they will all be merged into a mysterious entity.

The Báb had His first intimation of His Revelation when He had the dream of drinking the drops of blood that fell from the severed head of the Imám Ḥusayn. The Báb was a descendant of Fátimih through Imám Ḥusayn.

The Báb and Bahá'u'lláh were constantly in communication by letter. The first chapters of the Qayyúmu'l-Asmá' were those papers which the Báb sent to Bahá'u'lláh by Mullá Ḥusayn.

In the Name of Bahá'u'lláh the name of Ḥusayn has precedence over the name of 'Alí. This precedence establishes the greatness of Ḥusayn. Ḥusayn was the 3rd Imám; 'Alí the first.

It is the worse form of heresy to identify Bahá'u'lláh with God, and when we say He is God, we must be careful to explain the relationship.

Bahá'u'lláh has come primarily to organize humanity and this cannot be done without Justice.

Sinlessness is like the rays of the Sun, inherent. It can be compared to the light of the Sun. Sinlessness means free from error, which is infallibility. There are two kinds of infallibility, one derived, the other inherent. In the case of the Sun, the Manifestation, it is inherent; the other, derived, is like the Moon and its Satelites. The Satelites revolve around the Moon. (Moon is like the Master; the Satelites, the Guardian and International House of Justice) but they receive their light from the Sun. The Master's statement in His Will makes it clear that they are under the direct guidance of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb. In this connection we must not think of the Báb as part of the Bahá'í dispensation, but the Báb's Dispensation. As They are both Manifestations the infallibility is derived from two independent Sources. Because infallibility is of two kinds it does not necessarily imply being a Manifestation. The Master is all-knowing, but not the Satelites, the Guardian and the International House of Justice, they are neither all-knowing nor perfect as the Master was. Perfection and omniscience are the attributes of the Master and these are not inherent but derived.

The Master is essentially human, the Prophet essentially divine. The Prophet must assume human form, the human shape in order to reach us. Divinity is not incarnation. Divinity means manifestation, revelation, the mirror. The Master is essentially human but had the attributes of the Prophet. This is the thing that makes Him a mystery. {{p13}}

How can you believe a human being is perfect and all-knowing, this is the paradox — when one starts by saying the Master is human not divine and has the attributes of the Prophet. This is a mystery. The Guardian and the International House of Justice are also human, no divinity should be associated with them. Although they are human, as the Master is, they cannot claim to have the attributes of divinity as He had. They are fundamentally different from the Master as He was from the Manifestation.

The Guardianship and the International House of Justice are the two pillars that support the edifice of the Administrative Order. It is not supported by the members (or their calibre) of the International House of Justice; it has nothing to do with their being representative of the believers, of the National Assemblies, etc., it is the fact that they have been given this derived infallibility. Each of these two pillars has its Satelites; the International House of Justice has its local and national Houses of Justice. The Hands of the Cause are a corporate body, an organized body, these are the Satelites of the Guardian.

All the Prophets following Bahá'u'lláh for 500,000 years are Prophets of constancy, but under the shadow of Bahá'u'lláh and derive their authority from Him, and this authority is so great that they can abrogate the laws of the Aqdas in part or in whole. Their authority is not inherent but derived. See "Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh, Page 19, par., "Under the Shadow of the Ancient Beauty."

Bahá'u'lláh is the greatest figure in this planet's past and future life because He is the supreme figure associated with the coming of age of the human race. They (future Prophets) are supreme over their generation and Bahá'u'lláh is supreme over them all.

The unique greatness of the Cause: that the Founder should have a forerunner who was a Prophet.

If the followers of Muḥammad all repent, it will be the effect of the prayer in the Master's Will: the prayer was the means of forgiveness, the denouncing of the enemies to point them out for our protection. Purity of heart, of motive, is not sufficient. We must have faith, faith in God, be spiritually-minded, religiously-minded. One can have faith in God and not believe in the Administration and vice versa.

The influence of the believers is as mysterious as the mysterious way the Manifestations Themselves work. The nearer the believer is to the teachings, to the Manifestations, the more mysteriously he will work. The events taking place in the world react on the individual and help mature the seed of the Cause.

The leading Bahá'í countries are, first Palestine, the Qiblih, (point of prayer) of the Faith, the place of Ascension; second Irak (Baghdád) Center of Pilgrimage, the place of sojourn; third Persia, the birthplace of the Faith. The Báb said the Manifestation, "He whom God will make manifest" should be the Qiblih, not the place He revealed Himself, not as in Islám, where Mecca is the Qiblih and not the resting place of Muḥammad in Medina. These three countries are contiguous, geographically they touch each other.

The Cause of God has always been born in the East. The Administrative center has shifted to the West and then been reflected back into the East. The civilization begotten by the Faith was born in the West. Hence the Sun of Civilization appearing in the West: “O Beauty of God, unveil Thy Face that the Sun may arise from the West,” says Bahá’u’lláh in one of His Odes. The unveiling took place in the East, but the Sun of the Civilization of the Faith arose in the West. There is a Muḥammadan tradition that when the Promised One appears, the Sun will arise in the West.

Five hundred thousand years is an indication of the greatness of this Revelation.

Abraham Lincoln’s vision for the United States is comparable to Bahá’u’lláh’s vision for the whole world. Now it is possible for a man to conceive of a greater destiny for the United States, a destiny incorporating her in the Federation of World States, encompassing the whole world. This is comparable to that Prophet who may appear after 500,000 years, and who would do the same thing for the planets. Inter-planetary, which corresponds to the incorporation of the United States with other nations. A scientist says there can be beings, not human beings, outside this planet. The cosmos includes many universes, as these are infinite and space is infinite, so divine revelation is infinite. The Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh is the biggest thing for this planet, because it has united it and there is nothing beyond unity. Is there anything beyond world unity for this planet? That is the answer. That is why it marks the coming of age of humanity — world unity. If there were at least one more planet, if science had discovered it, gotten in close touch with it, then a greater Revelation than Bahá’u’lláh would be needed to create the unity of these two planets.

(See Page 163 of “Gleanings” reference to: “Fixed Star hath its Planets, and every planet its own creatures.”) Revelation has had no beginning and will have no end. But divine revelation has had a beginning and will have an end on this earth. Isaiah prophesied 3,000 years ago the prophecy of the coming of age of humanity; the lamb and the lion will lie down together, the Kingdom of God on earth is nothing but the stage of maturity — the coming of age of humanity. It has also a political connotation and this will be fulfilled at the Coming of the Golden Age. This is for the German believers to realize (Isaiah being a Jewish Prophet.) Christ’s prophecy of “Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will be Done, etc.,” is a vague, hazy statement, compared to the prophecy of Isaiah. This does not mean Jesus did not make more definite prophecies, just that we did not have them. Justice is the hall-mark of the Kingdom. “Justice filleth the earth as the waters cover the sea,” can be a reference to the International House of Justice. World unity cannot be established unless it is founded on Justice. The lamb and the lion lying down together would require Justice. A strong nation might be a lion, and a weak one a lamb.

A man may be devoted to the Cause and not have a good character. A man may sacrifice his whole life to the Cause and yet have a despicable character. Character is different from faith, from devotion. Laxity in morals is as bad as thieving or lying or back-biting. A young Bahá’í may be devoted, sacrificing, but have moral laxity which is just as bad as stealing or lying. Not all the heroes of the heroic age led saintly lives. We must not confuse a hero with a saint. Hero primarily denotes the attitude of a person towards the Cause. We must not confuse loyalty to the Cause with character. A believer who is loyal, who will sacrifice for the Cause, is a tremendous asset and we must recognize it — but it is not enough. We must have character; a Saint who is a man of action becomes a hero too.

Bahá'u'lláh observed the Ramaḍán all His life and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for 25 years. The Master until the end of His life went to the Mosque and when He died the Muslims came and said the Muḥammadan prayer for the dead for Him. But after His death they were forced to change their policy, because of the declaration of the Muḥammadan religious court made in Egypt, that the Bahá'í Faith is independent; A Muslim is not a Bahá'í, a Bahá'í is not a Muslim. There was a difference of opinion among the Muslims as to the position of the Bahá'ís in relation to Islám, some contending we are a sect of Islám. In Egypt they proved we have laws that abrogate the laws of the Qur'án as their justification for our expulsion from Islám, they went too far. They consulted the Aqdas and then in their verdict quoted the laws of the Aqdas; pilgrimaged, Qiblih, fasting, etc. The Jews in their relation to us are neutral. We have sprung from Islám, it is the parent that opposes.

Bahá'u'lláh's Revelation synchronizes with inter-national unity.

Twenty-five people claimed to be the Promised One in Baghdád. This is the Master's statement. During the most troubled period when Bahá'u'lláh had left for Sulaymáníyyih, the Báb had appointed no successor. It was the most disturbed period in the history of the Cause. The Master was ten years old at that time. Nabíl says he met the Master at this age, and the Master said; “I am a boy, but I feel old.” Bahá'u'lláh sent Muḥammad-‘Alí to India about 5 years before his passing, He knew what was going to happen. The Master was all alone with the Greatest Holy Leaf after the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. All the brothers sided with Muḥammad-‘Alí. They expelled the Master and His family from the Mansion. There were almost a hundred people in the Mansion. The Master had no son, his daughters were young. It was only when the first American pilgrims came that it was changed. {{p16}}

After the turmoil of the Covenant breakers came the triumph in America of the Cause, its spiritual consequence was the rise of the Cause in the West. Every crisis in the Cause has its spiritual benefit, spiritual consequence. A crisis suffered by the Master or by the Cause has its direct spiritual effect in the Cause. It was a very severe test to the believers when the whole family sided with Muḥammad-‘Alí. The Master had no Sons, no man in His family to send messages by to the believers. His sense of mourning for Bahá'u'lláh was deepened by His family turning against Him. This was dispersed by the arrival of the first pilgrims from the West. The rise of the Armenians in Egypt against the Spiritual Assembly which they tried to undermine by establishing a “Scientific Society” and which they fought against is an example of this law. They sought to fight against the Spiritual Assembly and after this, as a direct spiritual consequence of it, came the first Bahá'í Convention in Egypt, the establishment of the N.S.A., and the pronouncement of the Muslim authorities, of the independence of the Faith. He believes all this was the direct consequence of the affair of the Armenians. Like Herrigal and Mrs. White in Germany; now Germany has been resurrected. But for this bitter experience, this agony, the Administration would not have been established. Khayru'lláh led to the beginning of the establishment of the Administration in America. The turmoil is the cause, and the rise and consolidation of the movement, the effect. Crises, trials and tests are like spiritual food — they feed the body of the Cause — they do not subvert it, because there is a foundation, the tempest does not uproot the Cause it reinforces its roots. The Cause works in a mysterious way. It has its ups and downs, its ups and downs. The Cause is growing and as it grows it must show signs of disorder. If there is no disturbance in the Cause it is a sign of stagnation. The greater the growth of the Cause the greater will be the disturbances which the Cause itself originates. This does not mean that every one of the disturbances is God-sent; the lesser disturbances are due less to the attacks of its enemies than to the unwisdom of its friends. We must not lose heart, get discouraged. The completion of the Temple (in America) will arouse agitation in the Cause. The achievement of such a triumph of the Cause will itself arouse turmoil; it will arouse its watchful enemies. The Muḥammadans are destined to oppose the Cause very fiercely in India, the Hindus in the distant future. The wailing and lamenting of China and India, which the Master referred to — (These allusions are in a Tablet of the Master addressed to the Great Afnán, the cousin of the Báb,) is this opposition of the Hindus and Buddhists to the Cause. Opposition is not yet even born in America. It will spread from America to England. The declaration of Bahá'u'lláh in Baghdád, His banishment from Persia which preserved His life, were all the direct consequence of the martyrdom of the Báb. His Tablets to the kings and rulers were the result of His banishment to Constantinople and Adrianople just after He had declared Himself and things were better. The fulfillment of all biblical prophecies was again the result of His being exiled to 'Akká, where no one thought He would ever survive. {{p17}}

The violation of the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh had as its first direct consequence, the establishment of the Cause in the West. As the Master was waiting for the ship to come and take Him away, He wrote the Tablet to the Great Afnán. (See: "World Order of Bahá'u'lláh," further considerations Page 5, "How Great, How Very Great, is the Cause!" etc.) He does not think the friends realize that the crisis begets the triumph, just as the coming war is the begetter of the Most Great Peace. Every crisis in God's plan is but the prelude to a triumph. {{p18}}

THE SUCCESSION

IN THE BAHÁ'Í, CHRISTIAN, AND MUḤAMMADAN RELIGIONS.

ALSO ISLÁM. {{p19}}

Luther could have never opposed the pope, nor Paul, Peter, if the terms of the Bible had been at all like this Dispensation. Peter was so simple he divided his food into seven portions and when he arrived at the last one he knew it was the day of rest. Forty days after the death of Muḥammad the schism started in Islām. Sunnī means democratic in Arabic: “Majority of the people,” Shí’ah means “Upholding the family of the Prophet.” ‘Umar appealed to the democratic element, “He said the people have to elect the successor.” We must become Shí’ah Muslims before becoming Bahá’ís. No Bahá’í in the West can be called a Bahá’í unless he is first Muslim (believer in Muḥammad’s revelation and teachings and the Imáms) and a Sunnī Muḥammadan can never become a Bahá’í unless he becomes first a Shí’ah Muslim. The Sunnīs were following a false line, they must recognize their error and accept the Shí’ah truth and then this Revelation. The fact that the Báb is a lineal descendant of Muḥammad is sufficient proof for us that the line of the Imám Ḥusayn (son of ‘Alí, son-in-law of the Prophet) was the authentic one. Could the Báb have descended from a line of usurpers? In the light of Bahá’u’lláh’s tribute to the Imám Ḥusayn could we doubt it? So must the Jews first become Christians, then Shí’ah Muḥammadans, then Bahá’ís. Paul usurped the right of Peter as the Caliphs usurped the right of ‘Alí. The Bahá’ís must sympathize with Peter as they do with ‘Alí, because both had their rights usurped.

In Christianity there are two weak points; There was no right of interpretation given definitely, and it was vague as far as the succession was concerned. Also no administrative Principles in the Gospels, no administrative order has been given. No statement that Peter is the sole successor and interpreter, thus giving a chance for Paul to say He is the co-successor; nor does the succession invest any successors after Him with the same authority. One of the reasons why we consider Islām an improvement on Christianity is because we have the laws, Pilgrimage, Fasting, Marriage, Inheritance; these were all in the Qur’án from the Founder and could not be corrupted by either Sunnīs or Shí’ah. This was an improvement of Muḥammadanism over Christianity, because of these administrative institutions and laws. There is not one reference in the Qur’án to succession, but traditions were enough to give the succession to ‘Alí, but as no quotations could be found in the Qur’án to substantiate these, the Sunnīs rebelled. Now comes the Bahá’í Revelation.

In the Bahá’í Revelation we have the institutions and laws and succession. The Báb referred to it, but it was vague again. In the Gospel there is a reference to succession, but no administrative principles, institutions or order. In the Qur’án there is reference to administrative principles, laws, etc., but no reference to the succession. The Bábí Revelation referred to both, but vaguely. The Bahá’í Revelation has administrative institutions established by Bahá’u’lláh and made clear in the Master’s Will and Testament. The Master’s Will appointed both the successor and interpreter. {{p20}}

No other Revelation has this. Forty days after the death of Muḥammad the schism occurred, the Caliph rejected ‘Alí. The split in Christianity was not

Luther, but Paul versus Peter. Decline is an inevitable result of schism. There can be no schism in this Cause, hence no decline. Differences are inevitable, but schism is impossible in the Cause. One is inevitable, the other impossible. The Cause is like the body of a man, growing continuously, and crises occur which are a sign of growth. There will always be crises even in the Golden age. The Golden Age will witness no decline. It is a new phase — the Golden Age. The Báb says: “All the world will accept My Revelation.”

After all Peter was the most stupid among the Apostles, and yet he was the successor to Jesus — that is what it amounts to. ‘Umar had more experience, was more powerful, and yet Muḥammad chose ‘Alí. The Bahá’ís must believe in the primacy of Peter as in the primacy of ‘Alí. Many of the traditions quoted by Bahá’u’lláh which He considers as binding in authority as that of Muḥammad (though the station of the Imáms is not the same) are from the Imáms. Peter’s position in relation to Christianity and ‘Alí’s in relation to Islám is represented by two institutions in the Cause: the Guardianship and the International House of Justice.

He considers the mission of the Bahá’ís in the West, more particularly the Americans, is to establish Islám in the West. Even if this Movement had not sprung from Islám, we should establish it, vindicate it, establish its divine origin because it is the later Revelation than Christianity, a step further in Divine Revelation. For its own sake we should do this. Not convert people to its institutions, but to the truth of the Muḥammadan Faith, the Imáms, etc. Now it happens that this fuller Revelation is the parent of the Bahá’í Revelation. A believer can never be considered a believer unless he recognizes the truth of Islám and accepts it as a fuller one than Christianity.

A Bahá’í must first become a Muslim before he becomes a Bahá’í, and how can he do this unless he studies and knows Islám? Not only become a Muḥammadan but a Shí‘ah Muḥammadan. We must be wholly detached from our feelings and beliefs, discard them, throw them away. People can appreciate the Cause much better if they are familiar with Islám. Islám is a fuller revelation. It is blasphemy to believe that Islám was not meant to be a universal religion. There is a point of similarity between our Faith and Islám that does not exist with Christianity because every word is a word of God, divinely revealed, this is not true of the Gospels. The Gospel is so fragmentary, so unreliable, we can scarcely trust everything in it. We cannot be sure these are the exact words of Jesus. The Trinity, for example, each a God and all three Gods are One — they call it a mystery, it is nothing but supposition. The “Beloved” is a new word used by Bahá’u’lláh, it is confined to the Bahá’í teachings.

Secularization will increase in Irak to such an extent that maybe the Holy Tombs of the Imáms may be desecrated. {{p21}}

Islám will greatly suffer. The Jews were punished for two thousand years. The Muslims — Sunnís and Shí‘ahs — will suffer for a long time (because of persecuting the Báb and Bahá’u’lláh, opposing the Cause, etc.) It is their turn now to suffer, they will suffer in proportion to their crime. Then it will be the role of the Bahá'ís to vindicate the glory of the Imáms, establish their spiritual position and significance. The important thing to remember about the 12th Imám is that he died — not disappeared — died.

We must teach Islám with courage and not mind criticism.

Mustapha Kemal, an avowed Muslim, overthrew the Caliphate. That is very significant. The Temple of Solomon was destroyed by a Roman, but a Muslim, calling himself one, has dealt such a blow to Islám! The Caliphate and the Sultánate were both overthrown by him. How humiliating this is to the Faith of Islám. Mustapha Kemal did it; he overthrew the Caliphate and Sultánate, the arch-enemy of this Faith. To re-establish Islám from a spiritual point of view, will be one of the tasks of the Bahá'ís in the Golden Age. To vindicate the spiritual position of the Imáms, not to re-establish the machinery of Islám. It is these crises in the world than unfold to us the importance of these events. {{p22}}

EXPLANATION OF SACRED WRITINGS.

Bahá'í Christian Muḥammadan {{p23}}

Meanings of, “He is God,” the identity of God with God, of the Prophet with God, of Bahá'u'lláh with God, of the Báb with Bahá'u'lláh.

The Báb in Chapter III of the Bayán, uses the word “Order”: “Happy is the man who fixeth his gaze upon the Order of Bahá'u'lláh and renders thanks unto his Lord.”

The Qayyúmu'l-Asmá' was regarded as the Qur'án of the Bábís.

The correct term is Bábí dispensation and Bahá'í dispensation.

The Shaking in the Qur'án: “The earth shall tell her news,” refers to The Most Great Peace. The Daybreak, in the Qur'án; “When the earth is made to crumble to pieces,” refers to the next war and be taken literally. Bombs, etc.

Súrah of Joseph was the only work of the Báb in the possession of those who were martyred in Zanjan, Nayriz and Tarbari. Ṭáhirih was the one who translated it into Persian.

Íqán was written by Bahá'u'lláh while He was a follower of the Báb, before His own Revelation. The title page of Nabíl is Bahá'u'lláh's reference to the Báb from the Íqán.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “A. / See / B.C.” -ed]

Page 16 of “Gleanings” — ‘Ere long He will sail His Ark upon thee,’ etc., Ark symbolizes the legislative body — the International House of Justice who will sit in Haifa.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “B / See / A.C.” -ed.]

Page 16 of “Gleanings” — ‘Call out to Zion,’ Zion is a hill near Jerusalem and here it means Jerusalem the Holy City.

Page 9 of “Gleanings” — ‘Except them whom God was pleased to guide.’ Predestination and free will will always be a mystery, we can never draw a clear line between them. Like the origin of evil, we cannot get at the bottom of it. We have a certain amount of free will, if we don’t use it we are deprived of the flow of these forces, (i.e. promises made in the teachings regarding progress, etc.)

“The lamb and the lion will lie down together;” One explanation is big and little nations; they will have equal rights and representation in a world government, like the States in U.S.A.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “C / See A.B.” -ed]

Pages 15-16 of “Gleanings,” the terms “His Throne,” “City of God,” and “Celestial Kaaba,” all refer to the Holy Shrine either of the Báb, or perhaps in the future of Bahá’u’lláh.

Bahá’u’lláh refers to two wholesome things in “Gleanings,” (Pages 216, 342, 3) civilization ends liberty [“civilization and liberty”? -ed] which, if carried to excess, will exercise a pernicious influence on man, and also civilization which if allowed to overleap its bounds will bring evil upon men. So even devotion to the Cause, if carried to excess leads to fanaticism. References to Civilization .. “when its flame will devour the Cities.”{{p24}} is a prophecy referring to the bombing of the cities in the next war. Western civilization will commit suicide in the next war because by the very weapons it has created it will destroy itself.

Súratu’l-Haykal is the fulfillment of the prophecy in the Bible, “the Branch shall build the Temple of the Lord.” Bahá’u’lláh stated this after He had revealed it.

The “Evil One” is the self, the corrupt nature within man, (See ‘Bahá’í Administration.’)

The divorce law is made very easy by Bahá’u’lláh and marriage very difficult; but the Master, because of the ease of the divorce law, discourages divorces extremely. There is in Bahá’í divorce absolute equality. According to Bahá’í law the husband must pay the wife’s expenses for the year they are separated, then they come together and if they still wish for divorce it becomes immediately effective. They can remarry. Regarding marriage, the parents must be quite detached and uninfluenced by the wishes, the standards and the ideas of the marrying ones. But in divorce they need consult no one. “We have a wisdom in requiring the consent of the parents. Our purpose is to promote unity and not disunity,” says Bahá’u’lláh. Marriage is not something that concerns two people, it is a social institution.

In Bahá’í marriage they must go to the Spiritual Assembly, not to an individual — this is priesthood.

Page 12. Epistle to the Son of the Wolf: Book of Fátimih referred to was a book which the daughter of the Prophet, Fátimih, saw revealed to her in a dream by Gabriel. She was overcome by grief after the death of her husband, ‘Alí, the martyrdom of the 3rd Imám Ḥusayn, and the death of the 2nd Imám Ḥasan, both of whom were her sons, as well as the death of her father the Prophet. The Angel Gabriel revealed words of consolation to her which, however, were never known; and also promised her that from her issue the Promised One would appear. Shí‘ah tradition believed that the Promised One would bring these words again. When Bahá’u’lláh revealed the Hidden Words, He called them the “Book of Fátimih.” They were revealed before His declaration. Later they became known as the “Hidden Words” because they were hidden all the centuries between Fátimih’s vision of them and the appearance of the Promised One.

The prayer for the dead is the only congregational prayer in the Cause — (not yet translated.)

What the friends consider to be the Star Tablet is not the Star Tablet to which the Master refers. The Báb revealed many Tablets in the star shape, but the original Tablet with the 300 odd derivations of Bahá is lost.

Quddús’s station is higher than any other Letter of the Living.

The Báb’s taking Quddús to Mekka with Him apparently invested him with that peculiar authority he later manifested.

The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf: Page 37; “He will stand by you and your Empire shall extend over all the lands lighted by the Sun.” This is to be taken literally. If Napoleon the III had accepted the Cause his material empire would have extended over the whole earth. He (i.e. Manifestation) gives men the means to use what God has given them. Men are not born equal; that is a fundamental principle of the Cause.

The power of the Greatest Name can either mean power in the name of Bahá’u’lláh and His Attributes, or in the repetition of the Greatest Name, Ya-Bahá’u’l-Abhá. {{p27}} “Hidden Words:” “Myriads of hidden mysteries are made vocal in a single speech, etc,” refers to the manifold meanings of Bahá’u’lláh’s utterance.

In the Christian dispensation that ray that proceeds from God is called the Holy Ghost. In the Qur’án, the Muslim dispensation, it was the Angel Gabriel. The trinity in Christianity was the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost was in the form of a dove. In the Muḥammadan dispensation it was Alláh, the Apostle and the Angel Gabriel who were the trinity. In the Bahá’í dispensation the Most Great Spirit is the Holy Ghost or ray. On page 17 of the “Dispensation of Bahá’u’lláh” it says: “The Holy Spirit itself hath been generated through the agency of a single letter revealed by this Most Great Spirit, (D. See E.) — “if ye be of them that comprehend...” This only means the superiority of the Bahá’í Revelation and is not to be taken literally. In the Bahá’í Revelation it is not symbolized as in the dove, in the Christian and the form of the Angel Gabriel in the Muḥammadan dispensations. The term “Most Great” means the consummation of a cycle but not finality, finality is different from consummation and culmination of a cycle. Most Great in the sense of consummation and not finality.

We believe in the trinity; in God, the Prophet and the Holy Spirit, but not as the Christians do. To us it is heresy because we believe that the sun, the ray and the mirror always remain each themselves. The mirror never becomes the sun, or the ray the mirror, or the sun the ray. So God, the Holy Spirit and the Prophet are each distinct and Their relation that of the Sun, the ray and the mirror.

In the “Epistle to the Son of the Wolf,” there is a reference to a hidden language and a hidden script. Shoghi Effendi himself asked the Master regarding this, and He said that no one ever asked Bahá’u’lláh regarding this, so it remained hidden in the stores of His knowledge.

“The shrill of the Supreme Pen,” is Bahá’u’lláh’s reference to the reed pen with which He wrote.

When the Aqdas is translated the Bahá’ís will realize to what extent Bahá’u’lláh has abrogated the laws of previous dispensations.

The spiritual significance of the resurrection we believe in absolutely on the authority of Bahá’u’lláh. It often happens that Bahá’u’lláh’s quotations differ from that of the text of the Gospel. We must of course accept His words as the Gospels themselves do not agree and were written down many years later. The Gospel must not be taken literally. The text is not authoritative in the sense that the Qur’án is. The proof is that Bahá’u’lláh, when quoting Christ, quotes Him in a way that is different from the Gospels.

In the “Will and Testament” where it says, “Under the shelter and guidance of His Holiness, the Exalted One,” refers to the Báb. The Exalted One is always the Báb.

The friends in the West are familiar with the principles. There are two pillars of the Faith; principles and laws, they are the warp and woof of the fabric.

The principles are either spiritual or administrative; the spiritual ones are in the addresses of the Master, etc. The Administrative ones are in His Will. They are embodied in the Administrative Order. The friends in America, in the West, have faith. They are well grounded in both of these principles, but they are only just beginning to know the laws which are in the Aqdas, these are a greater challenge. The Cause is growing within the Administration. The VI volume of “Bahá’í World” will have the original reproductions of those portions of the Aqdas prepared by the Egyptian N.S.A. for presentation to their Government. This is a beginning, eventually it will lead to the publishing of the Aqdas. The laws are from Bahá’u’lláh’s Ordinances, secondary laws are from the International House of Justice.

We must not be afraid to say we have doctrine; all that is in the “Dispensation” is doctrine. We have doctrine, but no dogmas; we have mysteries, but no superstition.

“Bahá’u’lláh and the New Era,” “Some Answered Questions,” and the “Íqán” are essential books in teaching.

All titles of the chapters of the Qur’án were given by those that compiled it and have nothing to do with Muḥammad. He never divided them. They put the latter part of His Revelation at the beginning; those passages regarding the Promised One, those that announced the coming of the Day of God, which were revealed at the beginning of His Revelation they put at the end, just as the Báb, in the Qayyúmu’l-Asmá’, His first book, was His most powerful one and is comparable to those Súrahs of Muḥammad at the end of the Qur’án.

The friends should read and study the “Will and Testament.” We are too near to it to see it in its proper light. It is like a huge edifice, we cannot yet see it in perspective. This and the Aqdas are the two chief depositories of the truths enshrined in the World Order of Bahá’u’lláh. There are gaps in the Aqdas which the Will fills in as if the Master and Bahá’u’lláh had arranged it. An example of this complementariness between the Will and the Aqdas is the Ḥuqúq. Ḥuqúq is referred to in the Aqdas, also endowments, fees, fines, inheritance, etc. Bahá’u’lláh specifies in the Aqdas that fines, fees, inheritance, if the heirs are dead the endowments are all payable to the House of Justice. He establishes the House of Justice and fixes its revenues. Regarding Ḥuqúq, He does not say in the Aqdas to whom it is to be paid, neither in the Aqdas text on questions and answers. Bahá’u’lláh says what Ḥuqúq is, emphasizes its importance, but does not say to whom it shall be given and does {{p29}} not say that it goes to the House of Justice. In the Will the Master makes it clear. The ordinance of Ḥuqúq is established by Bahá’u’lláh in the Aqdas, but He never said whom it was to be payable to, so He left a gap which the Master, in His Will, fills. He anticipates an Institution but does not refer to what it may be anywhere. Were it not for the Will, this would be very perplexing.

‘Will of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá,’ part I, page 8: by a “Just King,” “Just Government,” the Master means an established, legitimate form of Government; that we must give our allegiance to. Any established form of Government.

“Will,” part I, page 13: referring to the Hands; they must report the delinquent member to the Guardian, he puts them out. Three elements in the Will: the Guardian is the Interpreter, the International House of Justice the Legislator; the Hands propagate and teach the Cause, through research work and the example of their lives and conduct. The Administrative Order would be paralyzed if one of these institutions should cease to function.

The friends do not realize that some of the passages in the “Gleanings” were written by Bahá’u’lláh as a Bábí, before He declared Himself. “Gleanings,” page 73, refers to Himself who will be manifest. When He says “We,” He means we Bábís; “As well as those who shall come after Him till the end that hath no end...” refers to the Prophets who will come after Him, once He has declared Himself.

In the “Gleanings,” top paragraph, page 212, is an excellent quotation in relation to politics.

“The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf,” is the last book revealed by Bahá’u’lláh. No doubt part at least of it was revealed in ‘Akká.

Compare “Gleanings,” page 285 with “The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf,” page 75.

Jesus abrogated two laws of Moses, Sabbath and prohibited divorce. The Master explains — Tablet to Miss Rosenberg — that monogamy was not taught by Jesus. The Gospel prohibits divorce but says nothing about monogamy. The Fathers of the Church made it a law, but Christ never did. There was polygamy in His days, and it was not prohibited among the early Christians. Then they not only established monogamy, but said that celibacy should be the rule. When Jesus had not even enjoined monogamy, and had tolerated polygamy, the Church Fathers went so far as to establish celibacy.

The Qur’án prohibited polygamy, but the commentators misinterpreted the text. The text says polygamy is conditioned upon Justice, in another passage Muḥammad says Justice in these circumstances (i.e. polygamy) is impossible. So we see that Islám is a step in advance of Christianity. The mission of the Bahá’ís in proving Islám is a further step in Revelation than Christianity, must cite this evidence. {{p30}}

These things should be taught in the summer schools in relation to comparative religion and Islám.

We have to consider the Aqdas in the light of the authorized interpreter, the Master. Bahá’u’lláh in a passage says marriage with two wives is conditioned upon Justice. The Master says in a Tablet to Miss Rosenberg, that Justice is impossible, (to be just to two wives). It is just like the Qur’án. Both the Qur’án and the Bahá’í teachings are a step further than the Gospels. The missionaries, the enemies of the Cause will quote the Aqdas and claim we do not advocate monogamy. Then we must quote the Master’s Tablet. Bahá’u’lláh says in the Aqdas, “Refer ye to what is not in the Aqdas to the Most Great Branch;” and in the “Tablet of the Covenant, (Kitáb-i-‘Ahd) He quotes this passage of His and says the Master is that Branch. The Church Fathers had no right to prohibit what Christ had not prohibited, and yet they went a step further and established celibacy.

Hidden words, Persian, verse 63; corresponds to the Words of Bahá’u’lláh; as to the Great Calamity; it is a punishment from God for their negligence and indifference to His Revelation. It is retribution. “Unforeseen” agrees with “all of a sudden.”

The text of the Qur'án does not agree with the Ptolemaic system and the commentators of the Qur'án misinterpreted the text in order to agree with the Ptolemaic system. Galilee ["Galileo" -ed] 1000 years later supported Qur'án's text.

We must not be afraid in stating truths in spite of the fact that they may run against what the biologist, the astronomer, the physicist, etc., say. His point is that we should not impose it on the scientist, but we should have the courage to make these statements and not be afraid of stating them and saying we have no proof. We must admit that we have no proof, but state these are our teachings and express the hope science will prove them. These statements are divine Revelation and we believe in them. We should not do what the Muslim and Christian leaders have done and compromise. It is a very subtle form of corruption that the Muslim leaders have introduced into the Qur'án (regarding marriage, astronomy, etc.,). If science discovers a fact contrary to the text of the teachings, the Bahá'ís must adhere to the text of the teachings, even if it takes a thousand years to prove it as it did with the text of the Qur'án, (Súrah 36) and (Answered Questions page 28).

Tablet of Ishráqát, where it says, "God will inspire them," corresponds to the Will and Testament.

The Guardian and the House of Justice are under unerring guidance and protection. Experts, non-Bahá'ís, will have to examine the Aqdas so that it may be published with many notes and commentaries of a clear, explanatory nature. In the Aqdas there is modification, abrogation and addition to religious law. Fasting, Pilgrimage and Obligatory Prayer are modified. The Bahá'ís will not be prepared for the Aqdas with its wealth of technical notes, unless they study {{p31}}

Islám, its history and teachings. The summer schools are doing this now.

Bahá'u'lláh alludes to the Aqdas in the Íqán, where He enumerates the books of laws of the different Faiths, and then mentions the book of "Him Whom God will make Manifest."

The "Holy Book" is the Gospel, the "Most Holy Book" is the Aqdas. The "Holy Spirit" is in the Bible, the "Most Great Spirit" (E see D) in the Bahá'í Revelation. Always the superlative "Most." This Revelation cannot be surpassed, all future Prophets being under His shadow for five hundred thousand years.

We can increase our faith and strengthen it through observation, meditation, prayer and activity.

It is better not to change the personal pronouns in saying the prayers, (from me to us, my to her, etc.,) but leave them exactly as revealed. However before we say the prayer we can address a few words to God saying the prayer is on behalf of such a person or such a group, and then read or say it as it is in the text.

(In connection with translations of the teachings being misleading, confused, inaccurate.) Due to insufficient understanding of the Master's statements, inability to express it on the part of the translator and also whether the person it is translated to has understood it.

"Gleanings," page 114: "Spread thy skirt, oh Jerusalem," means a fuller revelation, His Revelation. (See also under Palestine.)

"The Kingdom is God's" alludes to that Kingdom which the Christians have been praying for and Christ announced. This is the Kingdom of Bahá'u'lláh which will be raised on the ruins of western civilization. It is referred to by Christ as the "Kingdom of God;" by the Jews as the "Reign of Righteousness;" and by Muḥammad as the "Day of God."

The story of Joseph and his brothers is paralleled by the treatment by Suḥb-i-Azal of Bahá'u'lláh, and His troubles. The Báb's commentary on the Qayyúmu'l-Asmá' is about Joseph and his brothers, and was a prophecy of the treatment Bahá'u'lláh would receive from His brothers. It is the most significant, the most eloquent work revealed by the Báb. It is very intimate too, as He refers to His mother and His wife in it.

Bahá's Scriptures, page 255, paragraph 527, "Verily the Tongue of the Ancient gives Glad Tidings to those who are in the world concerning the appearance of the Greatest Name, and who takes His Covenant among the nations." The "Who" in "Who takes His Covenant..." refers to the Tongue of the Ancient, i.e.: God. This is the Greater Covenant that God takes with all the people of the world regarding His Manifestation; in this case, Bahá'u'lláh. "Verily, He is myself, the {{p32}} Shining-Place of My Identity; the East of My Cause," etc. All this part is God speaking; i.e. the Tongue of the Ancient, referring to Bahá'u'lláh and testifying to Bahá'u'lláh as God's Covenant. It has nothing to do with the Master.

"Some Answered Questions," page 42, chapter XII: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a Branch shall grow out of his roots:" The words "rod" and "Branch" are one and the same thing in this sentence, it is a repetition of the same thing and refers to only one thing and this is Bahá'u'lláh. There are Tablets revealed by Bahá'u'lláh, (not yet translated,) in which He refers to Himself as the Branch, but He means by this the Branch of the Tree of Divinity. This chapter in Isaiah does not refer to the Master at all but to Bahá'u'lláh. The Manifestations are all branches that grow out of the Tree of Divinity, as They are all the Rays of the Sun. When Bahá'u'lláh refers to Himself as a Tree, then the Master is the Branch of that Tree, (see "Bahá'í Scriptures," page 256, paragraph 529;) "Verily the Branch of Command hath sprung from this Root." On page 76, in Chapter XII of "Some Answered Questions," the Master says: "Universal peace and concord will be realized between all the nations, and that incomparable Branch will gather..." etc. Surely the friends must see that He, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, could not refer to Himself as "that incomparable Branch." Mr Kinney knows more than anyone else the tone of the Master and that He would never refer to Himself as the “incomparable Branch.” The term “Lordly Branch” refers to Bahá’u’lláh, (also page 76.) This means the Branch of Divinity, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the Branch of the Manifestation. The friends read the writings but they do not ponder them enough.

In “Some Answered Questions,” Chapter XII, page 73, we find that the Master shows that the prophecy of Isaiah, Chapter II, verses 1-10, not only proves that the “Branch” from the stem of Jesse did not refer to Christ but to Bahá’u’lláh, but also states the immaculate conception: “This rod out of the stem of Jesse might be correctly applied to Christ, for Joseph was one of the descendants of Jesse, the Father of David: but as Christ found existence through the Spirit of God, He called Himself the Son of God. If He had not done so, this description would refer to Him. “ Moreover, the prophecies were not fulfilled at that time. Universal peace did not come into existence at the time of Christ. In the word “but” the Master makes the immaculate conception quite clear. In a Tablet that has not yet been translated from the original Persian, the Master says the conception of Christ was extraordinary, against the natural law. He defines the natural law and says it was not according to this law. The Bahá’ís must accept the immaculate conception. Every religion has its mysteries. The Virgin Mary’s perplexity was not due to shame, but because she could not explain her condition. The Íqán, where Bahá’u’lláh refers to Mary as “that mild and immortal countenance”, if she were not blameless, how could He refer to her in such terms?” “Mild” here means the essence of chastity. But even if Bahá’u’lláh and the Master had not said these things about the immaculate conception, to a Bahá’í the mention of it in the Qur’án {{p33}} would be quite sufficient proof.

There are many references to the coming of Muḥammad, in both the Old and New Testament, Deuteronomy, Chapter 33, verse 2; “And He said, the Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; He shined forth from Mount Paran, and He came with ten thousands of Saints: from His right hand went a fiery law for them.” “The Lord coming from Sinai” refers to the Mosaic dispensation. “Rose up from Seir unto them,” refers to a mountain in Gallilee and means the Christian dispensation. “Shined forth from Mount Paran” refers to the Muḥammadan dispensation; “and He came with ten thousands of Saints” is the Bahá’í dispensation. All references to Mount Paran refers to Muḥammad. Paran is a mountain in Arabia. The word “Paraclete” also refers to Muḥammad. Paraclete means “the Praiser” in Greek, and Muḥammad means “the Praiser” in Arabic. Further references to Muḥammad in the “Answered Questions,” page 78, etc. Genesis, Chapter 21, verse 21: “And He dwelt in the Wilderness of Paran” refers to Muḥammad. The Arabs are descendants of Ishmael, Numbers, Chapter 12, verse 16, “And afterwards the people removed from Hazeroth and pitched in the Wilderness of Paran,” again in Numbers, Chapter 13, verse 3, the word Paran occurs. The wilderness of Paran is in Trans-Jordan. David could easily get to it. The reference in Deuteronomy is the most important reference, (Chapter 33, verse 2.) Genesis, Chapter 17, verse 20, “And as for Ishmael ... and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, etc.” The twelve princes are the twelve Imáms. Also in Deuteronomy, Chapter 18, verse 18, “I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren.” This refers to their cousins, the Arabs, brethren meaning cousin here in relationship, and the prophet is Muḥammad. If it had meant Christ it would have said, “seed” and not “brethren.”

The twenty four elders who will stand before the Throne of God refers to the 19 Letters of the Living and 5 others who will be made known, said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In Arabic there are two words:

Inspiration Ê Ê Ê Ê Ê Revelation

The word for Revelation is confined to the Manifestation of God in Arabic, and has a companion word: Ayih — which is applied to any verse or sign revealed by the Manifestation. So that the use of the word “Ayih” is the criterion. All others are inspired: Ilham, The Master, the Guardians, the poets, etc., are inspired. {{p34}}

SOUL, MIND AND BODY. ALSO FUTURE LIFE. {{p35}}

The Master says death is when the mirror ceases to face the sun. The sun is the soul, the body is the mirror. The soul is the prime mover of the dream. The body reacts on the soul and the soul on the body. Dreams are due to various influences; fatigue, fear, etc., of the body reacting on the soul, also when the soul comes under an influence and reveals itself in a dream, is another; and the Holy Spirit influencing the soul, prophetic visions, an intimation from God to man in a dream. Three types of dreams: first the body influencing the soul; second the soul manifesting itself; third the Holy Spirit influencing the soul. But then we must be very careful, most of our dreams are the body influencing the soul. The soul starts when the embryo is formed. The soul has a beginning but no end. Man has a beginning but no end. God alone has no end and no beginning. The body of the Manifestation and His soul have a beginning too because this part of them is human, but the spark from God in them partakes of the pre-existence of God. Pre-existence is the sole prerogative of God. But man is immortal. Conception is the beginning of the soul. We cannot understand the nature of the world of the Manifestation because it is above us, as the mineral cannot understand the vegetables’ state, etc.

The way we use our capacity in this world helps it to develop for the next world. If we misuse or neglect it, the progress of the soul in the next world will suffer.

We lose a great opportunity if we do not use the body in a way that will prepare the soul for the next life. The importance of the body lies in that it is an instrument for the preparation of the soul for the next world. The soul will enter the next world in an immature state if it does not use its opportunities in this world. To wish death is not a wholesome inclination. Discipline, struggle, suffering disappointments, these are the things that train the soul. Mental, physical, struggle is an exercise for the soul. If we fail we must not be disappointed, because if we fail we must exert our will to pull ourselves out of it. Think about what you have to do today, and not speculate about the past and future. Forget the past, don't brood over it, it paralyzes us.

The soul is in the center, the spirit is a Manifestation of the soul, so is the mind. The soul is the image of God. Embryonic evolution is the history of mankind.

There are certain limitations of the human mind that no science can transgress, otherwise we would not be human.

The soul has developed ever since the embryo; the embryonic world, this life and the future life are its three stages; hence there is no re-incarnation. God reveals Himself but never enters into anything. We retain in the next world our identity and self-consciousness, but our self-consciousness is greatly increased.

Imperfection is a mixture of good and evil. It manifests itself differently in this world to its manifestations in the world beyond, because evil always exists: ego; because God alone and His Manifestations are perfect. We may have set-backs in the next world too.

There are mysteries in all the worlds of God. Ever deepening mysteries as we advance. God's mercy over-shadows all, even covenant breakers. His mercy and forgiveness are infinite. We must not dogmatize about these matters or set any limit on God.

What is imperfection? A mixture of good and evil. We are never perfect, but always becoming perfected. God works in a mysterious way not only in this world but in the next one. The more we understand the greater the mysteries are. In the next world as in this one there can be set-backs, they can be blessings in disguise as they are here. {{p37}}

THE FUTURE PEACE, WAR, CIVILIZATION, ETC. {{p38}}

The circumstances of the next war will produce the great peace-builders of the epoch to come. The change will come 100 years after Bahá'u'lláh's declaration. We can only try to localize the war which will be swift and destructive in its scope.

Japan is similar to Germany; youth, virility and not yet mature. The Japanese will have to suffer. The coming war is a providence to the whole world. The coming conflict will be sudden, swift, short.

What is now being done in the Cause is infinitesimal compared to what will come after the world conflict. They will come in by troops, create a new race of men. We must fear God's justice and love His mercy — these are the days of dread and fear, after will arise His mercy. First the punishment, then endless peace.

After the war Lord Lemington went to Persia, (he was much inspired by the Cause there.) He wrote and asked the Master about the future. The Master said the distant future is very bright. He meant the near future will be very dark.

They (nations of Europe) will be fused in this crucible of war. One year after the Armistice the Master foretold the next war. There will be no line between combatants and non-combatants in the next war.

Does not think the Cause will in the West reach stage of sufficient numbers and importance to be opposed by the governments before the next war. The fall of Western civilization is really the destruction of the whole fabric of civilization, East and West. There will be a mass reaction in favour of the Cause — people entering the Cause in troops. The Cause is now being consolidated but not yet proclaimed. It will be proclaimed after the next war.

All these cults, etc., are a natural outcome of the deterioration of society, giving rise to them. Cults, these fancies, these fashions, superstitions. All this is but the beginning of the decline. We are only just entering the fringe of darkness. People are drifting, perilously drifting. Society has lost its anchor, institutions are all drifting, drifting, drifting. The explosion is the next war. There is a slow process of destruction along with decay — what remains the explosion will destroy. There is a reason for this: explosion being a violent thing, it will produce a violent reaction. The forces of religion will be revived, released. It is what is left of the human race, the remnant, a powerful minority will arise to spread the Cause. We can only imagine the bare outlines of what will take place, but the result we know. One thing is certain, it will be very violent, very sudden. The last war was but a drop compared with it. The great war was but a prelude to the “Greater War,” which will be the war to end war. America will suffer between two great storm centers, Europe and the far East. Compare the state of the early Christians and their institutions before the fall of the Rome, and the Bahá’í institutions now, before the coming war.

Who knows, maybe the race prejudice will become worse. We are now only on the fringe of the darkest period in human history. The Cause is progressing in spite of these weaknesses of the Bahá’ís, but what would have been their progress if they had overcome these things? Their concentration on the administration has blinded them to their weaknesses. They think that because they are building it, that is enough.

First is national civilization, such as England and France have and Germany is developing. Then comes European and pan-American civilization and then comes world civilization, world unification. Prior to the conversion of nations, first the nations will establish, as non-Bahá’ís, the Lesser Peace. Then as great groups come into the Cause, gradually nations will become Bahá’í and then consciously develop the Most Great Peace. The Most Great Peace implies the political association of the United States with Europe.

The stage of mass conversion will come after the next war. Accepting the Cause in the days of the Manifestation when its glory is not yet manifest is one stage, and then conversion in the Golden Age which is very easy. Three stages, the heroic age, the days of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and the Master; next is the formative stage, consolidation of the administration; (now) and then the Golden Age and mass conversion.

Strange, the process of disintegration outside the Cause and integration inside it. These are the days of dread and fear, after will arise His Mercy. First the punishment, then endless peace. Morally people will become worse than ancient Rome and this is a result of irreligion. Irreligion will bring in its wake moral laxity and this will increase until the next war, the “unforeseen calamity.” There will be a tremendous protest, a reaction, after the next war.

China with Russia, Japan against Russia, Europe against China and Russia. Africa will revolt when she sees the decline of European civilization. The whole world will be involved, South America, — the whole world. Bahá'u'lláh says all of a sudden it will appear. In a sense it is correct to say this is a calamity that will visit the world because it failed to appreciate Bahá'u'lláh, as Rome failed to appreciate Christ. The present League of Nations is the outcome of the last war. Agony begets something, and as the last war was not war to end war, the next war will beget a true League of Nations, it will precipitate it. A result of the coming war will be to inaugurate peace, the true League of Nations. Just as the last war was a prelude to the coming war, the last League, begotten by the war, was the prelude to the future League of Nations. The Lesser Peace will be established by the nations not yet Bahá'í, and gradually develop into the Bahá'í World Order. The present League of Nations is the dawn of Universal Peace, but the sun is the future {{p40}}

League of Nations.

Dictatorship is an instrument that is hastening the next war. The dictators release forces which they cannot control. The masses are so organized, so controlled, that even the dictator cannot control them, he becomes a tool in their hands when they become out of control. If the next war is not fiercer than the last it will not stir the people enough. It must be much worse. He thinks the war will break out internationally and then there will be a series of civil wars. Probably the whole world will be involved in the next war. The Master said that when the women will arise for peace there will be peace. Then the true League of Nations will be born. There will be such a universal reaction in favour of peace that both small and big powers will work together to establish a real League. They will be converted through suffering, not the rulers but the masses, and the masses will force the rulers. Patriotism has been the ruling force in the past. Then there will be mass conversion to the Cause. The present mentality is un-Bahá'í; nationalism is the fashion at present and hence the Cause is extremely unpopular; when the masses, as the result of intense suffering, realize nationalism is not enough, then they will be ready for the Faith. Another thing that will attract them to the Cause is when they realize all this has been prophesied by Bahá'u'lláh. Suffering will purge and refine them, the new race of men will be raised up. It will be more than a new generation — a new race of men; not only with a new mentality, but with a new spiritual power, a new capacity. They must establish this peace through their hearts as well as their minds. The prophecy of one hundred years after the declaration of Bahá'u'lláh, 1953, (see Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era)* does not mean that the Bahá'ís will then become the world government, but that then will be the beginning of the Lesser Peace, that of the nations of the world without necessarily becoming Bahá'í. Gradually afterwards, the nations will become Bahá'ís. There will be a tremendous reaction in favour of the Cause, Bahá'í Government will be formed and then they will, conscious of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, establish as Bahá'ís the Most Great Peace. The Lesser Peace will mark the coming of age of humanity and the inception of the Golden Age. The Most Great Peace is like the age of maturity which comes later, as in man. This new world civilization will supercede the Christian civilization, on the ruins of western civilization the world civilization will arise. It will be totally unlike all former civilizations; this is world civilization. From the dawn of history it was quite impossible to establish a world civilization because the whole world was not discovered. To the Romans it was not even discovered. Napoleon could have conquered it perhaps, but never have unified it because the physical means were not yet perfected. The world above the nations and not any particular nation first. Assuming the interest of a nation to be required to sacrifice itself for the good of the whole, it should be ready to do so. The peoples of the world must have such a love for this entity which is humanity, that they will be willing to sacrifice themselves for this entity. What will induce such love? Such a sense of human solidarity? The next war. Teaching campaigns, the Temple, committees,

- [Editor's Note: This date appears to be a typo for the year 1963. The reference is to page 250 of Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, where Esslemont quotes 'Abdu'l-Bahá as follows:

“Now concerning the verse in Daniel, the interpretation whereof thou didst ask, namely, ‘Blessed is he who cometh unto the thousand, three hundred and thirty-five days.’ These days must be reckoned as solar and not lunar years. For according to this calculation a century will have elapsed from the dawn of the Sun of Truth, then will the teachings of God be firmly established upon the earth, and the divine light shall flood the world from the East even unto the West. Then, on this day, will the faithful rejoice!”-T. Lovejoy and V. Sheline] will not be enough. It must suffer; humanity is like an unruly, tempestuous youth who must go to school, be trained. What will do this except the school of adversity, this is the next war.

The coming of age of the human race is the core of the Bahá'í teachings. Every Bahá'í teacher should stress this, the significance of the stage which the world is approaching: its highest stage. If the people say they don't see it, we must tell them after the next war they will see it clearly. He believes that after federal unity was achieved in the United States it marked the birth of American civilization. It would have been impossible without federal unity. The present League of Nations is a fore-runner only, not a nucleus. The League that which will be formed after the next war will be a nucleus, as it develops it will become a pattern. Western civilization will commit suicide in the next war, because by the very weapons it has created it destroys itself. He should not be surprised if this League of Nations will entirely disappear from Geneva, but will resurrect after the last war. (next one). The League will never die, it will evolve after the next war, it will establish the Lesser Peace and later the Most Great Peace. The world will be prepared after the next war for a still more Bahá'í League than than conceived by Wilson. The coming war is a providence to the whole world. The coming conflict will be sudden, quick, short. A federal international state can be established, a unitary state, as in Germany, is impossible for the whole world. The new world is so young and tender that one can hardly recognize it, but it was born after the world war.

There is a tremendous fight before the Cause. The friends do not realize it. It will spread as far as China. China and India will be the last to fall. "The wailing of China and India will be raised," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá; this refers to the religious leaders' opposition to the spread of the Cause. Who knows, perhaps Mussolini's conquest of Abyssinia will facilitate the spread of the Cause. First the Mullás of Islám arose against the Cause. Now the Protestant missionaries are beginning to oppose — this opposition will spread to the Anglican Church in England, and, if there is anything left, the Lutheran Church in Germany. Catholicism will be the last of all. The Pope, their head, will oppose and this will precipitate its downfall. After Catholicism Christianity is done. Then it will spread to the far East; two hundred million Hindus, then to China, the four million Buddhists. When we compare this great upheaval, when the Catholic Church will be aroused, to the scratchings of the New History Society, Faríd, etc! It is a twofold process, decline within the Church and opposition to the Cause. The Muḥammadans are destined to oppose the Cause very fiercely in India, also the Hindus in the distant future. The wailing and lamenting of India and China which the Master referred to, is the opposition of the Hindus and Buddhists to the Cause.

After the lapse of a thousand years there will be a new prophet to give new laws. After five hundred thousand years, it may sound {{p42}} preposterous but what he would describe as inter-planetary unity may be possible — it is even probable that in three or four thousand years there may begin inter-planetary communications with beings, not human beings.

Future generations will appreciate what is taking place now in the formative period of the Cause, even as we appreciate the Heroic Age. There is no doubt that all these cults that are springing up the world over, is because the foundations of religions are tottering. Europe must suffer something equivalent to the Civil War in the United States before they can be united; (its nations) they will be fused in this crucible of war. {{p43}}GUARDIAN {{p44}}

In Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the words “irremovable and expounder” are found (irremovable Head of International House of Justice and expounder of teachings). The Ḥuqúq is a fixed revenue for the Guardian payed direct, and has nothing to do with the administrative funds, local, National or International.

The Guardians are the equivalent in the Bahá’í Revelation to the Imáms in the Muḥammadan Revelation.

It is the Guardian’s responsibility to prevent the International House of Justice from abrogating any of the laws of the Aqdas.

The Master shares with the Prophet His perfection, Shoghi Effendi shares with the Master the right of interpretation.

In a very vital issue the Guardian could know the true fact of a matter even if not told — or mis-informed. If it is essential for the Guardian’s protection or the protection of the Cause, he will be guided.

The English King reigns, but the Guardian is active as the hereditary element in the Universal House of Justice. The aristocratic element exists in that the elect rule, not the people, not a dictator.

Referring to Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to: “That Tree which overshadoweth all mankind.” Through the influence of the Cause the Guardian overshadows all mankind. Infallibility is either inherent or derived. The Guardians and the International House of Justice’s infallibility is acquired. The power that overshadows all mankind is nothing in the Guardian as himself. The integrity, the purity of the teachings is the most important thing.

Bahá’u’lláh purposely left a gap in the Aqdas which was filled by the Master’s Will and Testament with the Guardianship. (Ḥuqúq)

There was a danger that the friends might misunderstand the Master’s Will and so the “Dispensation of Bahá’u’lláh” was written, his (Shoghi Effendi’s) spiritual testament in detail. He has fixed it in the relations of things to each other. We cannot go beyond what he has defined, however the second Guardian can interpret the “Dispensation” itself, he has the same promise to be the inspired interpreter. The Guardian is the interpreter, expounder of the Cause and the protector of the Cause.

The Guardian can over-rule a decision of the International House of Justice if he conscientiously feels it is not in accord with the teachings. This is the interpretive right. The second part of his work is participation in the legislative body. All endowments, international and local are to be deferred to the International House of Justice. The Guardian has no right what-so-ever in these matters. He has the Ḥuqúq. Fines specified in the Aqdas and inheritance, go to the International House.

Ḥuqúq is 19% of one's capital and 19% of one's [surplus -ed.] income. The individual is free to decide what his expenditures are to be, if he expends his total income he does not need to pay Ḥuqúq, but if he does not, then on the surplus of income over expenditure he must pay 19% Ḥuqúq. It remains entirely with the individual, once he has paid the Ḥuqúq on his capital.

It is the duty of every Bahá'í that remembers statements of the Master that are confusing, to write to him about it, because that is his business, (Guardians) his chief work, to elucidate these things. Anything that confuses any believer, they must write to him so he can help them. The Master has not contradicted Himself, there is no duality in the teachings.

He does not mind if the friends think of him, concentrate on him, as long as they have the right concept of him. He is linked to the Administrative Order. He is not an independent entity, he is a part of a unit, not an entity as the Master was. (See "Dispensation.") He agrees that the institution of the Guardianship takes precedence over the International House of Justice.

The "Beloved" is a new word used by Bahá'u'lláh. It is confined to the Bahá'í teachings.

The will of the Master is like a huge edifice, we must recede from it to properly grasp its import. "Even if I had time I could not do it," said Shoghi Effendi regarding elaborating on it. It must recede from us. The lapse of time and unfoldment of the Revelation will enable us to fully appreciate it. The words of the Guardian are as binding, have the same authority, as the words of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and the Master, but the stations are different. He considers he has written his testament, his statement, in "The Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh." What he says about the Guardianship is binding on future Guardians. The Will of the Master is a third kind of covenant. Bahá'u'lláh's Will is the lesser covenant — (See under "Religion.")

End of Volume One.

Dear Bahá'í Friends

I humbly submit my translation of my Arabic Pilgrimage diary, about which you wrote in your kind letter of 16th February 1983, that it was the first Arabic Pilgrimage diary. The sixth day is historical.

I would be grateful if you would acknowledge receipt of this letter.

Yours humbly

'Azíz Sabour

The first day in His presence on Saturday 24th February:

At quarter past five we three, the only pilgrims from 'Iráq, stood at the door of the guest-house on Mount Carmel to welcome the Guardian. We were: Mr Adíb Baghdádí, the N.S.A. Secretary; Mr. Salmán Dloomí, the N.S.A. Treasurer and myself, a teacher in Kurdistan, Arbil. We saw the Guardian afar, standing in the high "Monument Garden" by the Resting Place of The Purest Branch, and we heard his voice sometimes, talking to the gardener, Mr Barzu Bemán.

Then he came walking along the street which leads to the guest-house, with a white handkerchief near his face which he opened with both hands. Who am I to describe his majestic pace, his form and beautiful face; the young, healthy, Promised Guardian of our Faith?

When he came near he smiled and said to me, "Welcome! You are 'Azíz Effendi?" I came forward and said "Yes, Beloved Guardian", and I bent before him, but he held me up and said, "God forbids, it is not permitted; but we may embrace." Then he greeted my two colleagues, who had been in His presence three days before me, and he said to them, "Please, come forward".

He asked me "When did you arrive?" I said "I arrived today." He asked "By which route?" I replied, "By train via Mosul" He asked "Past which cities?" I replied, "Past Aleppo, Hama, Homs, Tripoli and Beirut." He said "Did you stay in Beirut?" I replied, "No, because I arrived at midnight." He said "Did you meet anybody in Beirut?" I said, "I wished to meet Mr Húsayn Iqbál, but I did not have the opportunity.

Here, Adíb pulled me back when I was near the Guardian, but the Guardian noticed that and said, "No, no. I don't agree. Please come forward. Don't stay behind."

Then the Guardian said to me, "Did you encounter any difficulties on your way?" I replied, "Everything was fine, through your Bounty." He said, "Did you come in the name of Pilgrimage?" I said that I was coming to visit the Bahá'í Shrine in Haifa.

Here, the Guardian stepped up the marble steps to the gardens of the Shrine and asked my two colleagues, "Did you come also in the name of pilgrimage?" They replied, "Yes, Beloved Guardian." He said, "To whom did you say this?" Adíb said, "To the French Consul." The Guardian said, "And to the Iraqi Government?" I said, "Yes, to the Iraqi Passport Officer." He said, "Yes, the believers should come in the name of Pilgrimage and not even in my name. They should say that they are going to visit the Holy Shrines in Haifa and 'Akká, the Bahá'í World Administrative and Spiritual Centre."

I said, "Beloved Guardian! The enemies of the Faith want to uproot the Cause!" He replied, "No doubt that they want that." I said, "Even those who know the Teachings oppose the cause." He said, "Some of them are afraid and some of them are ignorant. But the more the Cause progresses, the more shall be the opposition". The believers should study the Teachings, trust God and be steadfast. Then the Divine confirmation comes to their aid."

Here, the Guardian briskly, with broad paces, went up the garden overlooking the Shrine and turned to me and said, "Do you know the English language?" I said, "Yes, Beloved Guardian, through your Bounty." "Bounty," I said to him, I did not say to him that I learnt English through my personal translation of his Letters: "The Goal of the New World Order" and "The Unfoldment of World Civilization."

Then he said to me, "Where in 'Irâq are you?" I replied, "In Kurdistan." He asked me, "How long have you been there?" I said, "This year." He said, "What is your job?" I said, "A teacher in the secondary school." He asked, "Did you learn the Kurdish language?" I said, "Beloved Guardian! Little by little." He said, "Yes, little by little." He said, "Of course, you have the book 'Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era' in the Kurdish language?" I said, "Yes, Beloved Guardian, the Kurds are nice people. They maintain their religion." He said, "No! Not because of this, but because their nature is pure and not like the hideous Shí'ah of Baghdád." The Guardian said that with a smile.

Then he pointed to the entrance door below and said, "That is the entrance through which the High Commissioner and his lady came to visit the Shrine and that is the private entrance through which they left. To visit the Shrine, they took their shoes off outside, and entered.

Then the Guardian looked at the garden and said to us, "Look, how beautiful this side is! Where are our sacred Shrines compared to the Sacred Shrines in the hands of the Shí'ah? In 'Irâq, when Mrs Kehler wanted to visit the Shrine of Imám Ḥusayn, the Shí'ah leaders prevented her, saying, "She is Christian!" Salmán said, "They also said she was a woman." The Guardian said, "Yes, they did. The Bahá'ís are the only people who can prove the right of the Pure Imáms. Bahá'u'lláh proved their right in 'The Book of Certitude'. The friends of the West will prove their right and will promulgate Islám. This is an essential belief in our Faith. We acknowledge the validity of the Imámate Institute and the invalidity of the Caliphate. The greatest proof is the collapse of the Caliphate after thirteen centuries. The believers should study 'The Book of Certitude' and 'Nabíl's Narrative' for teaching the Faith."

I said, "Beloved Guardian! In Mosul, Mullá Aḥmad says that in the Qur'án, Súra Care, proves the right of the Imáms." The Guardian said, "Mullá Aḥmad is ablaze in his love to the Faith. He has communication with the believers in America, but Aḥmad Hamdi in Basrah has imperfect faith."

Then the Guardian said, "The National Assembly should establish new Centres. In America there are one hundred Centres. In Irán six hundred. In 'Irâq, nine. They should rise to nineteen Centres."

I said, "Please, we speak but nobody heeds." The Guardian said, "The people of the world shall suffer a great calamity. Unless they suffer, they do not wake up."

‘The unforeseen Calamity’ promised by Bahá’u’lláh in Baghdád eighty years ago (i.e. Hidden Words, Persian, No 63) and His Words: “And when the appointed hour is come, there shall suddenly appear that which shall cause the limbs of mankind to quake” revealed in ‘Akká seventy years ago, refer to the Calamity, and both have not yet been fulfilled. The believers should also be ready. Trials, opposition and upheavals will take place in all human society, but that will lead to the establishment of the Most Great Peace.” Then he said, “The belief of the Shí‘ah in dissimulation (i.e. recanting the belief under duress and danger) is not acceptable in the Bahá’í Faith. I informed the believers of this several years ago. It brings shame to the Cause and makes the enemies more daring. The Islámic court in Egypt, in Babbá, had issued its verdict saying, “Bahá’ísm is an independent religion.” So what do we Bahá’ís say?” He smiled and said, “Do we say we are Muslims?” Then he said, “In Baghdád, the Shí‘ah misappropriated the Great House of Bahá’u’lláh; and they thought that the judicial proceedings had finished and the Bahá’ís had been extinguished, but they shall suffer what the learned Muslims have suffered in Írán and Turkey, “Woe for people governed by their dogs” [i.e. the verse revealed by Bahá’u’lláh].

Then he asked us, “How are the learned Muslims in ‘Iráq? Are they dominating over the Government or is the Government dominating over them?” I asked, “Will any of the politicians arise to help the cause?” He said, “We should be pleased if they leave us alone and do not injure us. After this war they will approach the Bahá’ís to attract them to their aims, so you should be awake about this. You should teach the unprejudiced people.”

In our walk with the Guardian, we arrived at the door of the Shrine of the Báb, and he told the caretaker to open the door. He took off his shoes and entered, and we followed. He prostrated himself on the threshold and then stood up and chanted the Tablet of Visitation. Then he drew back to the door and we followed. He went to his car and with a shining face bid us farewell. Then I noticed that my thumb had swollen through my rubbing the index finger, unintentionally, over my thumb while I was replying to the Guardian’s questions and hearing his blessed statements.

The Second Day in His Presence on Monday 26th February:

After visiting the Holiest Shrine, the Mansion in Bahjí, the ‘Riḍván Garden’ and the high plain covered with red flowers outside the Mansion called “Albuq’atu’l Hamrá” the previous day, and staying overnight in the Mansion, we arrived at the house of the Guardian, which is the House of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When we arrived back at the house of the Guardian, we met the gardener, Isfandiyár, who told us to go up the steps to the Guest-Room where the father of the Guardian wanted to see us. We saw him for the first time. While we were drinking the coffee served to us by Mr ‘Alí Asghar, the gardener came to tell us that the Beloved Guardian was in the Shrine gardens and that he called us to join him there.

We hurried to the street leading up to the Shrine. When we arrived, we were told that the Guardian was in one of the three rooms of the Sacred Relics and Archives, next to the six rooms of the Shrine. We stood near the Shrine, waiting. When he came out, he welcomed us and said, “I was busy in the Sacred Relics room. Mr Khádím has brought me Valuable Relics from Írán. Amongst them is a bomb that was fired on the believers at Ṭabarsí Fortress. It is historic and not sacred. The friends in ‘Iráq have the privilege of seeing the Sacred Relics and the original Tablets on their way from Írán to Haifa, and they help in sending them safely on to us. This is a great service which they render to the Cause and at the same time is a service to the Bahá’í World Centre. They connect Írán, the Cradle of the Faith, to Haifa and ‘Akká, the Heart of the Faith.”

Then the Beloved Guardian asked us about our visit, yesterday, to Bahjí and said, “Did you visit the Blessed Mansion? It used to be the centre of the Covenant-Breakers, but now it has become the Bahá’í Museum of East and West Materials. It is an International Museum, because the relics within it are both Eastern and Western. Did you visit the Room of Bahá’u’lláh? It is very moving, isn’t it? I did not fix electricity in this Room, but left it with its old lighting. I also advised the Friends in Írán to leave the Blessed House of Shíráz with its original lighting when they rebuilt it. We shall remove the electricity fittings from the Greatest House in Baghdád when we repossess it.”

Here, the Guardian asked us, “What are the Shi’a doing now with the Greatest House?” Salmán replied, “They made the Greatest House as ‘Ḥusayniyyah’ (i.e. a place for their religious ceremonies) and they wrote on the door: ‘Enter ye therein in Peace, secure.’ (i.e. Qur’án 15:47). The Guardian said, “Yes, it is ‘Ḥusayniyya’ after the Name of Bahá’u’lláh: Ḥusayn ‘Alí, the name in which the second name Ḥusayn (he said in Persian: “Rukniduw — wúm”, i.e. The Second Supporting Pillar) has preceded the first name ‘Alí (he said in Persian: “Rukni-Awwal”, i.e. The First Support Pillar) and the Name of Bahá’u’lláh is a proof of the right of the Pure Imáms and all the Tablet of Bahá’u’lláh, known as the ‘Tablet of the Commander of the Martyrs’, refers to Imám Ḥusayn (i.e. second Imám in Islám) and ‘The Book of Certitude’ confirms ‘The Tablet of the Commander of the Martyrs.’”

Then the Guardian said, “In the Blessed Mansion I have collected five thousand precious books in forty languages, eastern and western. Amongst them is the book of Esslemont. The Covenant-Breakers tried to purchase one third of the Blessed Mansion, which belonged to the Sham’ah family in Damascus, while the two other thirds belong to the Cause. At that time Músá, the son of Muḥammad-‘Alí, was an official in the Estate Registry. At last they managed to possess one sixth, and that was through bribery and blackmail. They registered this one sixth in the name of Majdid-Din, who gave it as a gift to Muḥammad-‘Alí (i.e. the Arch Covenant-Breaker). When the structure of the Mansion became deplorable, after they had lived there for forty years without spending a penny on its repair, I sent a messenger to tell them: “Either repair it or vacate it.” They vacated it. I sent ‘Abdu’l-Samad to repair it. Then I furnished it and set the Relics and the Bahá'í books in such a beautiful way that the Covenant-Breakers were astonished. I invited the Governor of Haifa to Bahjí, where he first visited the Holiest Shrine, and then he visited the Mansion where he saw the model of the American Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and visited the Room of Bahá'u'lláh. I explained to him that the Mansion is a sacred place, exempt from tax and that the pilgrims only sleep one or two nights there, but they have their meals outside the Mansion."

I said, "Please, we wish to visit the Mansion again." He replied, "I shall send you for the second time."

Then the Guardian said, "After the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Covenant-Breakers took the key of the Holiest Shrine by force from the keeper, Abú'l-Qásim Khurasání. But cables and letters came from Írán, from the cities, towns and villages, in such a number that the Governor was astonished to know that there are six hundred Bahá'í Centres in Írán. He, himself, took back the key from the Covenant-Breakers and handed it over to the keepers."

Then the Guardian pointed, with raised arm, to the high lands of Mount Carmel, and said, "These lands are endowments to the Shrine. The friends of 'Iráq have shared in its purchase: Salmán Effendi, the Baghdádí family, 'Azíz Effendi and Dawood Effendi. Some of these lands I have registered in the name of the National Assemblies of America's and India's Branches in Palestine, with the Estates Registry. When the government of 'Iráq registers the Bahá'í Endowments, I shall register some of these lands in the name of 'Iráq National Assembly's Branch in Palestine."

Here the Guardian arrived at the door of the Shrine. He entered after taking off his shoes outside, and we followed. He prostrated himself on the Threshold and then rose up and stood and chanted the Tablet of Visitation.

When he came out he said to me, "Where did you hear about the transfer of the Purest Branch?" I replied, "I received a copy of your telegram to 'Iráq from my brother or from Mr. Adíb in Baghdád when I was in Arbíl." Then I asked, "We have known something about the Station of His Holiness the Báb from reading Nabíl's Narrative, but when shall we know about the Station of the Purest Branch?" He said, "Yes, the believers should say, "The Báb is the manifestation of God." The Station of the Purest Branch will be known in the second Bahá'í century." Then the Guardian walked to his car and bid us farewell: "KhudáHáfiz."

The Third Day in His Presence on Tuesday 27th February:

The Guardian had already arrived at the upper garden overlooking the Shrine while we were visiting the Sacred Relics in the three rooms next to the six rooms of the Shrine. He had arranged that we would join Him after visiting the Sacred Relics with his youngest brother, Mr Riyád, who was telling us some information about them. We hurried to the upper garden and when we approached, the Beloved Guardian said, “Welcome! Where is Mr Salmán?” Mr Salmán appeared from behind the trees and called, “Here I am, Beloved Guardian.” The Guardian said to us, “You have been busy visiting the Sacred Relics. Some of them were in the Blessed House in Haifa, in the room of the Greatest Holy Leaf. I have put them together in the three Archives rooms in order that they will be in the future ‘The International Archives Preservatory’. These precious Relics are Blessed Clothes, Tablets and other priceless Holy Writings.” I said “In this Dispensation, there are many Relics, whilst from past Dispensations there are none.” He said, “This is a distinction of this Dispensation.” I said, “Amongst them is the Blessed pot with chains.” He said, “Yes, it is there.” I asked, “What was the reason for the departure of the Blessed Beauty to Sulaymáníyyih?” He said, “The reason was the machinations of Azal; and after His departure, twenty five people claimed the Station of ‘He Whom God Shall Make Manifest’.”

Then the Guardian said to me, “You are in Kurdistan.” I replied, “Yes, Beloved Guardian, in Arbíl.” He said, “I want one believer to settle in Sulaymáníyyih and one to settle in Kirkuk.” I said, “They can teach the Faith in a wise way.” He said, “Yes, they can teach the Faith through good behaviour and attract the hearts through good actions. The National Assembly should consult about this matter and should exert their efforts.”

Adíb said, “Beloved Guardian! In Kurdistan there has appeared a faction group called ‘Haqqah’. Do they have any connection to the Faith?” The Guardian replied, “They have no base of truth. In this Dispensation, no schism appears as it has appeared in past Dispensations, where the Authority after the Manifestations was not appointed in their Laws; neither in the Qur’án, nor in the Gospel.” I said, “Please, what was the wisdom behind that?” The Guardian said, “That was in order to prove the distinction of this Revelation.” I said, “Mullá Aḥmad Malláh in Mosul says that in Qur’án the Verse: ‘They said “We have tarried a day or a part of a day” and the verse: ‘They tarried in the Cave three hundred and nine more’ and Bahá’u’lláh passed in the year 1309 A.H. and that refers to the Imáms whose right was proved by Bahá’u’lláh. Please, is that the meaning of the two verses [i.e. 18:19, 25]?” The Guardian said, “Yes, this is one of its meanings. The words of God have many meanings and everyone of the believers understands according to his capacity.”

Then the Guardian said, “Yes, in Christianity there appeared differences about the statement of His Holiness Christ, ‘Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church’ [i.e. Matt.16:18] and there has opened a great schism which has led to the emergence of Catholics and Orthodox. Then there happened the schism between the Sunnís and the Shí’ís in Islám. But in this Revelation only differences have happened and will happen in the future, but they will not cause schism. In this Dispensation the Covenant-Breakers wanted to create schism, but they failed and were driven away from the realm of the Cause. And if non-Bahá’ís object, saying, “What is your proof that no schism occurs to you? You should say, “Because in the Bahá’í Revelation, the Authority, to whom the believers turn after the Manifestation, is specifically appointed, while the Authority after past Manifestations was not appointed in Their Books.” Yes, the Caliphs in Islám usurped the right of the Pure Imáms.” I said, “Please, when we say this to the Sunnis, they shiver.” He smiled and said, “For the sake of this point, teaching the Faith to the Shí’ah is easier than to the Sunnis. You should be careful not to let this point lead to arguments. But, this is the belief of the people of Bahá. So don’t admit anyone into the Community, unless he has professed the truth of the Pure Imáms. In America, nobody is admitted into the Community, unless he professes the truth of Muḥammad and the right of the Pure Imáms. Mrs Kehler, in Írán, told the learned of the Shí’a that she was grieved in ‘Iráq when she was not allowed to visit the Shrine of Imám Ḥusayn. So they were surprised in Írán that an American lady becomes grieved because of her being not allowed to visit the Shrine of the Commander of the Martyrs.”

In future the believers from the West will come and will prove the right of the Pure Imáms and this point shall awaken the people in ‘Iráq and cause their entering by troops the Cause of God ‘And thou seest men entering the religion of God by troops.’” [i.e. Qur’án 110:1]. Adíb said, “Will that happen in the second century?” The Guardian said, “Yes, it will happen in the second century.” I said “How will that happen when it is promised — “It will be harsh for the Arabs.”” The Guardian said, “They will face a severe calamity. Look how they are seized ‘as a Mighty and a Strong can seize’ [i.e. Qur’án 54:42]. Then the Guardian said, “Look at their peninsula, at Palestine, at Egypt! These are Arab-populated. They say ‘We are independent’ while they are captive. They will be gripped by trials which will surprise the peoples of the world.”

Then I asked, “How will science serve the Cause?” He said, “Science can do this through scientists who turn to God and maintain detachment, straightforwardness and pure intentions. When a person has pure intentions, he can render important service to the Cause, even if he is illiterate.” I asked, “Is it spiritually necessary for me to continue my education?” He said, “Why not? It is indispensable as long as it is possible. The youth should study the Laws, the Principles and the History of the Cause. These three aspects. There is a difference between Laws and Principles. The Principles are in the Talks of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, such as: ‘The equality between Men and Women’ and ‘The Obligatory Education’ and ‘The Three Unities of God, of the Manifestations of God, of The Human Races’. The Laws are in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. The Universal House of Justice will enact the laws which are not in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. Nobody can change the texts of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas.

Adíb asked, “Will the House of Justice replace the governments?” The Guardian said, “Yes; but it is not permissible to say that now, because the governments will be disturbed. You should say that the Bahá’í Assemblies are institutions for the spiritual, social and administrative tasks in the Bahá’í Communities.”

Adíb asked, “Will monarchies survive, and for what are they necessary?” The Guardian said, “They should survive, because they are the Signs of God on earth, but the work will be in the hands of the Houses of Justice.”

I said, “Beloved Guardian! This is mentioned in your letter: ‘The unfoldment of World Civilisation’.” He said, “I have informed the West of all this.” I said, “Is it permissible for us to translate it?” He said, “Why? It should be translated. I write to the West and to the East.” I didn’t tell the Guardian that, in ‘Iráq, I was afraid to translate the sections in His letter under the titles of ‘The Collapse of Islám’ ‘The Deterioration of Christianity’.

The Fourth Day in His Presence on Wednesday 28th February:

It was half past four and we did not receive the order to be in His presence. So we decided to go to the Blessed House of the Guardian. We arrived at the gate and saw Mr ‘Alí Asghar carrying in his hand a bucket of water and when we entered, the father of the Guardian said that the Guardian was coming. Then we heard the Guardian say: “‘Alí Asghar! Where are the guests?” We came forward and bowed. The Guardian smiled and welcomed us and said, “How are you today?” We thanked him. He said, “Please, come along.” Then he said, “Today I was busy reading and arranging ‘The Bahá’í World’ Volume 8. Six parts of it have safely arrived by post. This is a wonderful thing in this disturbed day.” [i.e. World War II]. The Post Office didn’t open them because they are sure of our side. We have no secrets.”

Adíb said, “Beloved Guardian! People have even published Kitáb-i-Aqdas.” The Guardian said, “Yes. In Bombay they have printed it and I heard that they have also printed it in Baghdád. They will print it in America. Even the Ahmadiyyah [i.e. that faction of Islám in India] have printed it.” Adíb said, “Beloved Guardian! The Ahmadiyyah are childish and are backed by machinations.” The Guardian said, “Yes, the Ahmadiyyah faction is mere imaginations. This is the beginning of the humiliation of Islám. In London, the Ahmadiyyah have a mosque furnished with mats and it is miserable.”

I said, “Will the Muslims be humiliated for being astray?” He said, “No, but for their oppression. They have committed great oppression. The common people are not responsible. Their leaders will be humiliated.”

Here, the Guardian walked silently and then said, “The weather is fine.” I said “Beloved Guardian! What is the station of Dr.Esslemont?” He said, “He is a Hand of the Cause.” I said, “Today we have visited the Bahá’í Cemetery in Haifa.” He smiled and said, “When did you visit it?” I said, “This morning.” He said, “Did you go on foot?” We said, “Yes, Beloved Guardian!” He said, “Were you not tired?” We said, “No, we weren’t tired.” He said, “It is a very moving cemetery under the shadow of the Holy Shrines. East and West have met therein. Dr Esslemont from the West and the Afnán, the cousin of the Báb, from the East.” I said, “We wish to have a cemetery in Baghdád.” He said, “Yes, it is necessary, but now is not the time for it.” I asked, “Shall we acquire it amidst troubles like Egypt or shall we acquire it by law?” He said, “It is not known.”

Then he said, “In Egypt, they said that Bahá’ís are not Muslims and they should not be buried in Muslim cemeteries.” I said, “They declared the independence of the Faith.” He said, “They separated themselves from us and they declared our independence and publicly showed the independence of the Faith.” I said, “Beloved Guardian! They severed, and “The day of severance is fixed.” (i.e. Qur’án 78:18).” He said, “A dreadful Day!”

I said, “In ‘Iráq, in February 1939, the newspaper, Istiqlál, (has) printed Egypt’s verdict against the Faith.” He said, “This blessed movement of opposition has started in Egypt and from Egypt it spread to the other Islámic countries. In Egypt they separated wives from their husbands and this was an unprecedented legal case. Then they came to the burial of the dead. But in ‘Akká, when the Mufti (i.e. the Islámic Law expounder) heard that verdict, he said, “No. No we don’t agree. The Bahá’ís are in the shadow of Islám and this verdict acknowledges their independence.” Thus the Muslims are now two different parties: one in Egypt considers the Bahá’ís as infidels, and one in ‘Akká considers the Bahá’ís as Muslims.”

The Guardian added, “This opposition had started in Írán, by the Shí’ah, and resulted in the extinction of the governing dynasty. Then the opposition passed to Turkey and this led to the collapse of the Caliphate and of the Sovereignty by Mustafa Kamál Atatürk. From the East, the opposition passed to the West and the Presbyterians rose against the Faith and their opposition is still going on. The Protestants are less prejudiced than the Catholics, who are very prejudiced and have many vain imaginings.”

Then the Guardian said, “The Bahá’í Faith is independent and has no connection with any political institution. ‘Abd’ul-Bahá said “The Bahá’ís should not meddle in politics.” This statement has left no room for interpretation. Some Bahá’ís try to interpret it, but it doesn’t accept any interpretation. And if non-Bahá’ís oppose this statement, you should tell them: “Bahá’ís look to the hearts. They do not accept political jobs. Give them political jobs and test them! The Bahá’ís accept administrative jobs.” Then the Guardian said, “Administrative jobs are plenty and the Bahá’ís are now in forty five countries. The Bahá’ís cannot meddle in their politics, and if they do, they bring the shame of disunity to their communities. The politicians can tell lies, break promises, and have hypocrisy. They have different policies. For example, Russia’s policy is different from Írán’s policy which is different from England’s policy. To join any political party means to bring disunity.”

When the Guardian mentioned Russia, I asked, “Please, how are the believers in Russia?” He said, “They are very distressed. Some of them are in prisons and the rest have been dispersed. The enemies of the Faith shall suffer for their cruelty.”

Here, the Guardian, while walking along the clean street of Haifa below Mount Carmel, arrived at a point overlooking the city’s green stretches of land, surrounded by white houses. He said, “How delightful the landscape is.” Then he looked up at the side of the top of Mount Carmel. Raising his arm, he said,

“There, near the monastery, the Tablet of Carmel was revealed.” I said, “Please, was Muḥammad Mustafa Baghdádí among the believers at the time of revealing the Tablet of Carmel?” He said, “Why? This is not known”. I asked, “Is the verse: “Oh Carmel!” addressed to this mountain?” He said, “Yes, to this mountain. That is the top of the mountain and there, the heart of the mountain, where The Shrine is. Then he said,” “The address “Oh Carmel!” was to the mountain itself just as in the Tablet of Visitation of the Purest Branch is revealed: “When thou wast laid to rest in the earth, the earth itself trembled in its longing to meet thee” and an earthquake happened at the passing of The Purest Branch, but it was mild.”

I asked, “Beloved Guardian! In the Tablet of Carmel: “Book of Names” what does it mean?” He said, “It means the Knowledge of the Blessed Beauty, and it doesn’t mean anything else.”

Then he said, “The Verse: “The people of Bahá who have been mentioned in the Book of Names” means the members of the Universal House of Justice. The verse “Ere long will God sail His Ark” means the enacting of laws by the Universal House of Justice, which were not revealed.”

Adíb asked, “Can the number of members of the Universal House of Justice be more than nine?” The Guardian said, “Not only can that be, but the number of all the Houses of Justice, local and national, will increase afterwards, but not now.”

Then the Guardian said, “The Universal House of Justice will be built on top of Mount Carmel in the shadow of The Holy Shrines: The Holiest Shrine in ‘Akká and The Shrine in Haifa. The Qiblih has been appointed for the people of Bahá by His Holiness, the Báb, when He revealed, “The Qiblih is indeed He Whom God will make manifest; whenever He moveth, it moveth, until He shall come to rest.” (i.e. in The Arabic Bayán).

Then the Guardian said, “Through the sacrifices of the believers and through the power of the Almighty, we could purchase the lands around The Shrines. The day will come when all these lands will be in the hand of the Cause. These lands are eternal endowments and The Shrines are eternal Shrines. I wrote to Írán to exert efforts to purchase the Holy places. In future, pilgrims will come here by troops.”

Adíb asked, “Beloved Guardian! Is the site of the martyrdom of Ṭáhirih appointed? The Guardian said, “Its photograph is in Nabíl’s Narrative. The site is now the land on which the Bank of Russia is built.”

Then the Guardian said, “How are the Holy places now in ‘Iráq?” I said, “The Riḍván is now a government hospital.” Adíb said, “Yes, it is Health Institutions.” I said, “On the land next to the Riḍván is the Minister’s Guest-House. The Washásh farm (i.e. the place where the Tablet of the Holy Mariner was revealed) is now the Airport of Baghdád.”

The Guardian said, “Do you go to visit the Riḍván?” I said, “Yes, we go.” He said, "Do the believers gather there in the Feast of Ridván?" I said, "Half of them do." The Guardian said, "Do non-Bahá'ís go there?" Adíb said, "Yes, Beloved Guardian." He said, "Is it not prohibited?" I said, "No, Beloved Guardian." He said, "Is it pleasant gardens or just for patients?" We said, "For patients."

The Guardian said, "Yes, Mashriqu'l-Adhkárs and administrative institutions should be built over the Holy places, so that they shall be inspired by these Holy spots. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in a detailed Tablet has revealed: "This is that which the dust of the Spot around which circle the Concourse on High has inspired me." The Guardian said, "Not only the Holy places in Palestine, but also in the other lands they grant this inspiration."

I said, Beloved Guardian! The world's equilibrium hath been upset." He said, "The verse: "The World equilibrium hath been upset through the vibrating influence of this most great, this new World Order" means the collapse of all the present political systems. If they do not collapse, how will the new World Order be established?"

Then he said, "The Bahá'ís and the non — Bahá'ís are not aware! Bahá'u'lláh has revealed: "This, truly, is a Revelation which revealeth only once every five hundred thousand years. Thus have we removed the barrier and lifted the veils!" Then the Guardian said to us, "It is an Arabic Tablet, haven't you read it? The Manifestation who shall come after one thousand years is the Manifestation of He Who does what He wishes and He Who ordains what He wants. He can annul the laws of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. The changes of time necessitate His advent." I said, "Of course, great differences will happen in the Cause that shall necessitate His advent." He said, "No. Not differences, but great changes will happen that will necessitate new Law or necessitate changes in the revealed texts of Bahá'u'lláh. The next Manifestation is the Manifestation of He Who does what He wishes. You can know this when you read my English letters and you will know that I do not write from me, but I write excerpts from the Tablets." I said, "Beloved Guardian! You arrange the excerpts as you string the pearls in a necklace of jewels." The Guardian did not comment. I asked, "Please, in your letter 'The Unfoldment of World Civilization' (i.e. in the passage 'Humanity's Coming of Age') these words: "The Golden Age is the furthestmost limits in the organisation of human society" — will not man's progress necessitate a greater Revelation than this Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh?" The Guardian said, "What for? Another Manifestation will come and He will change some or all of the Laws of Bahá'u'lláh." Then the Guardian laughed with that shining face and said, "We can't imagine what will happen after five hundred thousand years." Adíb said, "Not even after one thousand years." Salmán said, "Not even after one hundred years." The Guardian said to us, "Read the verses revealed by the Pen of the Blessed Beauty, but with minute observation and attentively."

Here, the Guardian, in his walking along the street below Mount Carmel, arrived at the 'Germans Street' and looked up to the lights of the Shrine and said, "Look how beautiful is this view from the Shrine to the sea! The terraces are mentioned in the Tablet of ‘Abd’ul-Bahá.” Adíb said, “We hope that this street will continue down to this public street.” The Guardian said, “This is what I am thinking of, but the Municipality opposes, because some of its members do not love the Faith and are linked to the Christian Missionaries, and some are avaricious, but the terraces shall continue to the sea. In the Tablets, it is revealed that the terraces will be a spot of light and in the Bible: “The excellency of Carmel and Sharon.” (i.e. Isaiah 35:2). The translators of the Bible say: “Excellency” which is wrong.” I said, “Is that an intentional bad action?” He said, “No. It is out of ignorance. Here is a text which they cannot change.”

Here, the Guardian in his walking arrived at the gate of the Blessed House and said to us, “Yes, today I received parts of ‘The Bahá’í World’, Volume Eight and I am busy reading them.” He smiled and bid us farewell.

The Fifth Day in His Presence on Friday 1st March

We came back from our visit to Bahjí and The Most Great Prison in ‘Akká.

We went to the Blessed House of the Guardian and we sat in the Guest-Room where the Father of the Guardian and his youngest brother, Mr Riyad, were sitting. Then Mr ‘Alí Asghar came and told us that the Beloved Guardian had come.

We hurried to be in his presence.

With his smile and shining face, he said, “Welcome! Have you been to the Most Great Prison? Did you have a good day?” We said, “Yes, Beloved Guardian, we had, through your bounty.” He said, “Which hour did you visit the Most Great Prison?” We said, “About twelve o’clock.”

The day before, the Guardian gave us a letter written in his own handwriting and signed by him. On the envelope he had written:

To The Superintendent of Prisons ‘AKKÁ

The letter was dated Feb. 29th, 1940 and on top of the letter the shining red stamp:

I said, “Beloved Guardian! In the Room of the Prison we recited the Tablet of Wisdom where He revealed: “Cast into a prison built of unyielding stone.” Does this verse mean this Room?” He said, “It means the City of ‘Akká, which is surrounded by an enclosing wall built of stone and not this room only. ‘Akká is the ‘prison’. It was in ruins, but now it is being reconstructed. Haifa also, where the ship of the Blessed Beauty stopped for two or three hours, is being reconstructed and has been reconstructed to the extent you see. ‘Akká’s ignorant people, who were against the Faith, are being changed. Adíb said, “They will be loving the Faith.”

The Guardian said, “They have changed the place of the martyrdom of The Purest Branch. Had it been in our hand, we shouldn’t have changed it.” (i.e. The prison authority closed the skylight through which the Purest Branch had fallen while he was on the barracks's roof reciting Tablets at the instruction of the Blessed Beauty.)

Then the Guardian said, "The wisdom behind this Most Great Prison is the fulfilment of the Prophecies and the Traditions (i.e. the Traditions of Muḥammad), such as the Tradition: "Blessed is he who visits 'Akká", and the Tradition: "Blessed is he who visits the visitor of 'Akká", and the Tradition: "Blessed is he who drinks from the 'Spring of the Cow'." (The Guardian mentioned these Traditions which are in the 'Epistle to the Son of the Wolf'.)

Then the Guardian said, "The Christian Friars have built schools and monasteries here." We said, "Beloved Guardian! They also built schools and monasteries in 'Iráq." He said, "But they are busy with politics and with building the Pope's Government. The Pope is disturbed and is receiving blows from the politicians, but he will suffer his downfall." We asked, "When will he fall?" He said, "This is not known, but it is connected with events inside the Cause and the movements of the politicians, as it happened to the Caliphate when it attacked the Faith afflictively. Bahá'u'lláh revealed, "O concourse of Muslim divines! By your deeds the exalted station of the people hath been abased, the standard of Islám hath been reversed, and its mighty throne hath fallen." (i.e. from the Tablet of Proof.) The Guardian was reciting these verses with a ringing voice. A young man passing along the street turned to listen and passed.

Then, the Guardian said, "The Muslims ignore the Faith. The Jews praise. We are dispensing with both. The editor of the Egyptian newspaper, called Al-Muqattam, did not publish his correspondent's letter about the transfer of the Purest Branch. He is prejudiced against the Faith."

Then the Guardian, referring to the Most Great Prison, said, "The history of the arrival of the Blessed Beauty at the Most Great Prison is registered in the volumes of 'The Bahá'í World'. The Friends should not be satisfied with looking at its photographs, but they should study the eloquent articles, the detailed reports, and the translations therein."

Then he said, "Did you send the Annual Report?" Adíb replied, "Yes, Beloved Guardian! We sent the Annual Report 1939-1940, to America (which compiles the Volumes of 'The Bahá'í World') in the Summer." The Guardian said, "I am reading. I have not arrived at it yet. This is important and it is not like an ordinary letter. Its English language should be very eloquent. If you do not have someone proficient in English, seek the help of an efficient non-Bahá'í who should be good natured and unprejudiced.

Can you find such a person?" Adíb replied, "There may be such a person." The Guardian said, "In America, the Friends seek the help of efficient engineers and artists, but not in very private matters in the Cause. In Ṭihrán, they send their Bahá'í news in Persian." We said, "Mr Samimi and Mr Na'ímí are there." He said, "They are not efficient."

Then the Beloved Guardian stopped and looked up to Mount Carmel and said, "That is a pleasant view! The top of the mountain is there and there you see a land which belongs to the Cause. In the middle there is a piece of land which belongs to a German and a house on top of the mountain belongs to a Christian who has no land except the house and he tries to sell it to us. There, the government is opening a street. Our lands are exempt from tax."

Then the Beloved Guardian, pointing with his arm, said, "From here to here belongs to the Catholics. They pay tax. They sold some pieces of their lands to pay tax. They pay tax, because they purchase and sell lands and build houses. The Bahá'ís gave a pledge that they would not build houses and do not trade with their lands, which are eternal endowments, and they do not sell the fruit of their trees, but give it freely, as a gift. Others do not give pledges. They seek personal benefit from their endowments. They became polluted. They are not like the people of Bahá."

I asked, "Please, when shall the Cause rise?" He said, "You have haste! Unless rains fall heavily, no floods happen and no Spring comes. Calamities and trials are necessary for spreading the Cause and unless they happen the Cause will not spread. The material upheavals must precede the establishment of the Divine Civilization. Írán is the Cradle of the Cause. America is the Cradle of the Divine Civilization." Adíb said, "And Haifa and 'Akká are the Spirit of the Cause." The Guardian did not comment.

Adíb asked, "Shall the Divine Civilization be established in the year 1963?" The Guardian said, "This date is its beginning. The Americans spread the Cause everywhere." I asked, "Is this the effect of the visit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to America?" He said, "This is one of its effects and the effects of the 'Tablets of The Divine Plan'. Have you read 'The Divine Plan'? The Americans opened North America, South America, South Africa, Australia, France, Germany, Sweden and Balkan. They are energetic and attracted. The German Friends are meticulous. The present political condition shall change and they will open their neighbouring countries: Sweden, Norway, Balkan, France, England, Russia, Italy and Spain."

Adíb said, "My brother, 'Abbás, is in Germany." The Guardian said, "Yes, Mr Leena praises him highly." Salmán said, "Beloved Guardian! Do the German believers have communication with the American believers?" The Guardian said, "This is difficult now, but they may have. I have received a letter from the German believers through Írán and I write to them through the Geneva Bureau. They are steadfast." Salmán said, "This is a fact, nobody doubts it."

We asked about the Japanese. The Guardian said, "The Japanese are negligent, but they have capacity. The Jews have capacity, but are indulged in materialism." Here, the Guardian arrived at the gate of the Blessed House and smiled. He said, "I have much work to do, I beg your pardon. KhudáHáfiz!"

The Sixth Day in His Presence on Saturday, 2nd March:

We returned to the guest-house from our visit to the monastery on top of Mount Carmel with the brother of the Guardian, Mr Ḥusayn, whom the Guardian had kindly sent to us to take us to the monastery in the Guardian's car.

On our arrival back at the guest-house, the gardener told us that the Guardian was in the gardens of the Shrine. We hurried to meet the Beloved Guardian. We saw him not far away from the gate. He said to us, "Welcome! I have been waiting for you. Did you have a nice time?" We replied, "Through the bounty of the Beloved Guardian." He said, "Today I have been communicating with America and Írán, when the news of the passing of Mrs Maxwell in Argentina arrived." I noticed the face of the Guardian became pale with sorrow. He said, "She taught the Faith to Mrs Keith Ransom Kehler, to Mr Dreyfus, to Mrs Barney. Keith is her spiritual daughter." Salmán said, "Beloved Guardian! Many important persons have passed." The Guardian said, "No doubt; they shall be replaced." Then he said, "Forty years ago the Americans established the Faith in Europe and now they are establishing it in America! Men and women, young and old are serving the Faith in the South. The lights are shining from America. The Friends should be waiting for the glad tidings from America in order that they increase their own courage and follow the model of their services. All these are the fulfilment of the promises of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Mr & Mrs Maxwell were both invalid. Doctors told Mrs Maxwell that she was ill and should rest, but she did not heed to this advice. She travelled to Argentina and crossed twelve thousand miles. This is something hard. She had the hope of visiting the Blessed House of the Báb in Shíráz. General Jack was another handmaid of Bahá'u'lláh. She also, forty years ago travelled from Canada to North Europe and to the Balkans. She was detached, firm, sincere and of utmost contentedness. Both Mrs Maxwell and Mrs Jack were like the disciples of Christ. They dispersed far and wide and attained the Rank of Martyrdom. "The near became far and the far became near". Both established the Faith with utmost purity and glorification. It is a pride to visit their graves. All these are the effects of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Tablets of 'The Divine Plan' in souls and in horizons. "They are men whom neither trade nor sale can divert them from the remembrance of God"" (i.e. Qur'án 24:37).

Then the Guardian addressed the caretaker of The Shrine, saying, "Bring the flowers from the Sacred Threshold." He said to us, "I am sending these flowers to South America to be laid on the grave of Mrs Maxwell. She has attained the Rank of Martyrdom. I sent flowers to be laid in Írán, on the grave of Rahmatu'lla'h 'Alá'í. No doubt around the graves of these people there will be built great institutions in Írán and in other places."

Then he came to the car. He smiled and bid us farewell.

On our way to the Monastery today, before our being in His presence, we had seen in the hand of his brother, Mr Ḥusayn, the telegram written in the Guardian's handwriting, about Mrs Maxwell's passing. The following is an authorised translation of the text of this cable, written in Persian, announcing the passing of May Maxwell:

Adīb Baghdádí, Post Office Box 5, Baghdád

Notify Ṭīhrán: Mrs Maxwell, the selfless teacher, flame of the love of God and diffuser of His fragrances, left her home and hastened to distant regions, fired alike by love for her Master and by her yearning to proclaim the Cause of her Lord and her Inspirer, until at last, in the capital of Argentina, that distant clime, she ascended to the realm on attaining the rank of martyrdom. The Maids of Paradise now seek blessing from her in the mid-most heart of heaven. May she drink with healthy relish from the cup filled to overflowing with the wine of Divine bestowals: for such a recompense let all who labour in His Vineyard strive! Impart to all the friends news of this mighty victory.

Shoghi Rabbání, 2/3/1940

The Seventh Day in His Presence on Sunday 3rd March:

From the Guest-house door, at half past four, we saw the Beloved Guardian far away in the “Monuments Garden” overlooking the public street. He was walking around the Purest Branch with his hands behind his back. Then he stepped down the three marble steps to the public street and, after quarter of an hour, we saw him coming towards us along the street in front of the guest-house. We bent forward. Mr ‘Alí Asghar was today standing with us today.”

The Guardian approached and greeted us in Arabic: “Marhabah! (i.e. Welcome!) What did you do today?” I said, “Beloved Guardian! We were reading Volume Seven of ‘The Bahá’í World.’” He said, “Yes, in the guest-house there is a library, but it is small. In the Mansions, the Pilgrims are busy communicating with abroad, and in the guest-house they are busy reading.”

Then he said, “Today, I was busy sending cablegrams and receiving answers. The telegram officials are surprised. They do not know where is ‘Guatemala’ and ‘Puerto Rico’. They look for the names in their books and ask ‘Alí Asghar (i.e. his telegram carrier). The telegrams cost £30. The telegram’s language is very frank and they may know how far the Cause of God has extended.

I said, “The words of the telegram are moving.” He said, “My telegram to Ḥusayn Iqbál in Beirut is very frank. In Beirut, the Muftí (i.e. the Islámic Law Expounder) is very prejudiced against the Faith, and he had stopped ‘The Book of Certitude’ from entering Beirut.”

Then he said, “Ḥusayn Iqbál is the scion of the honoured Muḥammad Mustafá Baghdádí in Beirut and he has ignited the lamp of his father like the grand children in Baghdád.”

Then he said, "At the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the newspapers of Palestine published the news of His ascension. No doubt, you heard that his honourable friend, the High Commissioner of Palestine had come from Jerusalem to attend the funeral and, with utmost respect, he took off his shoes outside and entered, to visit the Shrine. Now he has written the introduction to Lady Blomfield's book about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Soon you shall see it published."

Then the Guardian said, "Today I was reading the Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed in honour of Mrs Maxwell. I shall give you them to read and so that you will know her great station. Forty years ago she attained the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká, with Mrs Lua Getsinger, in the first group of the early Pilgrims from the West who attained His presence. She, who established the Faith in Paris, had taught Mrs Scott in Paris. Forty years she worked, teaching the Faith and now, after she crossed twelve thousand miles around the earth's sphere, has passed in Argentina. Kehler (K. Ransom-Kehler) came to rest in Isfahán and Martha Root in Honolulu. Mrs Maxwell has attained the station of Martyrdom. This is a triumph and the spread of its news is a triumph. The Americans are very energetic and are performing great achievements."

Then the Guardian turned his shining face to me and said, "What about your passport?" I said, "It is in your power." He said, "Your leave has expired and they will punish you." I said, "Yes, they will, but I hope for the protection of my Guardian." He said, "Yes, caution should be taken towards the government officials."

[NOTE: Indeed, they did punish me for being one week late. They dismissed me from my job for four years. The Shí'í General Director of Education seized this opportunity. I immediately fulfilled the Guardian's wish on my third day in his presence, and pioneered to Kirkuk and established the new Centre.]

Then the Guardian said, "Tomorrow I shall send you for the last visit in order that you will achieve actions. You must establish Bahá'í Centres in the North and in the South: in Basrah, in the Persian Gulf; in Arabia; in Ahsá', the birthplace of Shaykh Aḥmad Ahsá'í. The Friends in 'Iráq and Írán are responsible for this task, but especially the Friends in 'Iráq. We have given the Friends in Egypt the task of opening the Sudan and, after that, opening Ethiopia." Adíb said, "Beloved Guardian! in Ethiopia there are some Bahá'ís, but the government refuses to grant legal acknowledgement to their Centre." Salmán said, "The Italians are very prejudiced." I said, "Alyas Sabri has done a great job." The Guardian said, "Have you seen the Ethiopian translation of Esslemont? An American believer was here. She heard that Negus (i.e. the Emperor of Ethiopia) was in Jerusalem. She travelled to Jerusalem and gave him a copy of the Ethiopian translation of Esslemont, before he travelled to London." Salmán said, "It is said that he is very troubled." The Guardian said, "Yes, he is distressed and has no hopes." Adíb said, "This is the punishment for his oppression." The Guardian said, "No. He was oppressed. He might have caused some oppression, because oppression has engulfed all the earth. The greater the oppression, the sooner will be the time of the establishment of the Universal House of Justice.” Salman said, “Turkey is disturbed.” The Guardian said, “All the East is disturbed from Japan to Palestine.” Adíb said, “Shall the Lesser Peace be established before the establishment of the Universal House of Justice or after?” The Guardian said, “Today my eyes are tired. My mind is tired. The National Assemblies should be my co-sharers.” I said, “Beloved Guardian! As you have given us directives for the building of our Ḥazíratu’l-Quds, we need your directives about teaching the Faith.” He said, “Yes, now as long as it isn’t the time for your government to recognise the Faithor for you to establish a Cemetery, it is the time now for teaching the Faith with caution and courage: ‘quiet but active’, with determination and eagerness.” Adíb said, “Beloved Guardian! Teaching is very difficult!” The Guardian said, “I know that.” Adíb said, “It needs the Friends to pioneer.” The Guardian said, “The Friends should not only do that, but they should sacrifice their comfort, their wealth and even their lives. Martyrdom shall happen in ‘Iráq.” Adíb said, “Shall we attain this?” I said, “I hope that we shall have this bounty.” The Guardians said, “How great is the effect of the blood! It attracts non-Bahá’ís and increases the steadfastness of the believers. In Írán the believers are ready for martyrdom, but the government is cowardly (i.e. afraid of the spread of martyrdom in Írán.). Adíb said, “In ‘Iráq they are more savage than in Írán.” The Guardian said, “They are less civilized, although the present civilization is savagery itself. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke and spoke, but they didn’t heed until the present second World War took place. This civilization can never meet with the Divine Civilization, as water can’t mix with oil. They always remain separate. The Friends and especially the Spiritual Assemblies should not imitate the politicians. They should serve the Faith bravely and with sublimity, with exaltation and with cleverness. Their criterion is to behave in an opposite way to the behaviour of the politicians, who can tell lies and make false promises. The Friends and the Spiritual Assemblies should maintain justice even with the enemies of the Faith. Before publishing Nabíl’s Narrative, I said that Áwára’s history was comprehensive in spite of its many mistakes. We promote justice. In Írán the believers prohibited teaching children according to Áwára’s history. I wrote to tell them that their decision had the smell of bigotry, while ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says, “Beware fanaticism!”, and if Áwára has anything, give him his due and do not encroach upon the rights of those who leave the Faith. Now Fádil Mázindarání is writing a comprehensive history. He has finished five volumes and the other four will follow. We are promoters of justice.”

Walking in the gardens of The Shrine near the gate’s marble steps, he said, “How beautiful are these circles of flowers. They have trees mingled with flowers. Have you such beauty and such a spot in ‘Iráq?” Adíb said, “When the Ridván comes to our hands it shall be a paradise.” The Guardian said, “No doubt it shall be.”

Then the Guardian asked the gardener Gushtásb: “Is there water enough?” and then he spoke about the lawn over the cement platform overlooking the sea and said, “This is a sea of green lawn!”

Then he ordered the door of the Shrine to be opened. He entered and we followed.

He prostrated on the Threshold and rose up to chant the Tablet of Visitation. Then he drew back to the road. When he came out he asked us, "Which way will you travel back to 'Iráq?" We replied, "The way you order." He said, "Go via Beirut and visit Ḥusayn Iqbál. He is my representative in Beirut." Then he asked Adíb, "Have you sent a letter to Baghdád mentioning the telegram? Let Baghdád send a telegram to Ṭíhrán about their acknowledgement." Then the Beloved Guardian bid us farewell and got into the car.

The Eighth Day in His Presence on Monday 4th March:

He greeted us and asked about our health, then he said, "When you go back to Baghdád, you shall be carrying great glad tidings that indicate the progress of the Faith and the rising of its institutions." Adíb said, "This is through the Rabbání arm." He said, "It is through the confirmations of the Blessed Beauty. We are in need of His confirmations. What is achieved is what He is achieving. What could we do? We are acquiring from the overflowing stream of both His Holiness The Exalted Lord and The Blessed Beauty. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said, "If you know what will happen after me, you will wish my passing sooner!"

Then the Guardian said, "The Station of The Báb is the Station of a Manifestation of God. Never before had it happened that a Forerunner was a Manifestation of God, but it happened in this Dispensation. The Báb is a Manifestation and a law-Maker. He revealed a special Law. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has explained the station of the Báb in His Will and Testament. The Friends should read the Will and Testament. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not satisfied to proclaim this truth of the station of the Báb, but he practically built His Shrine. The followers of Azal accuse the Bahá'ís of being enemies of His Holiness The Báb. This Shrine is a proof against their accusations. His holiness Bahá'u'lláh, fifty years earlier, had chosen the spot in which the throne of the Báb was to settle. This Shrine is a practical proof and it is stronger than traditional prophecies. 'Abdu'l-Bahá built six rooms of the Shrine and after him the three rooms were built. Haj Maḥmúd Oassabachi has shared with me in the building of the three rooms. This is one of his eternal services which I never forget. The Shrine is not completely built yet. Nine terraces will be built below The Shrine and nine terraces will be built above The Shrine, on this spot which the Cause possesses. Each one of the terraces will be called after the name of one of the Letters of the Living while The Shrine itself will be called after the name of the Báb himself. 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be transferred to another spot. I have informed the believers of his future transfer, but it is not known to which spot he will be transferred. Even the non-Bahá'ís know that it is The Shrine of the Báb. They call it "The Exalted Shrine" Did you hear this? Some of them call it 'Abbásiyyih."

I said, "Beloved Guardian! In Baghdád my teacher, Mr Maḥmúd al-Alusi, said in the class: "The street from The Shrine of the Báb to the sea is unique and has no similar." The Guardian said, "When was that?" I said, "Ten years ago." He said, "And what did he praise?" I said, "He doesn't love the Faith. He is a member of the Muslim Youth League and when we rescued the Kurdish translation of Esslemont from the clutch of the Home Office, the enemies of the Faith lamented.” The Guardian said, “Yes, I had heard that. Not only ‘Iráq lamented, but Írán before ‘Iráq, had lamented and then was lulled and extinguished. Írán is nothing compared to China. China, in the Far East, will rise against the Faith according to the explicit promises of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. India will rise. The Hindu are two hundred millions and Muslims and Zoroastrians are minorities there.” I asked, “Why will they rise against us?” He said, “They have traditions and because the Bahá’í Faith effaces their traditions, they start opposition and their fate will be the same as the others’ fate.”

I said, “All these victories happened in the first Bahá’í Century!” He said. “Yes, wait and see what glorious victories shall happen in the future centuries. When you go back to Baghdád, write in the Bahá’í News the present victories and publish them all over the world.”

Then He added, “You are youth. You should arise for the service of the Faith. Don’t be satisfied with prayers. Prayers and supplication alone give no results. You have to take the initiative and be enterprising.”

Then he said, “Today I have received a telegram from Paraguay telling me that they are travelling to the capital of Argentina to attend the funeral of Mrs Maxwell.” I asked “When will the funeral be?” He said, “Probably tomorrow. Were it not for telegrams, the news wouldn’t have arrived in less than two months. It is a long way. The distance between Canada and Argentina is like the distance between Canada and Haifa. Mrs Maxwell set out to teach the Faith although she was weak and 75 years old.” I said, “This shows the power of her belief.” He said, “It is the influence of the ‘The Tablets of The Divine Plan’ and their promises. In Germany also the Friends arose with great zeal and sent three teachers to different countries in Europe. One of them was Mr Spring from Leipzig. He opened Sofia and worked with Mrs Jack and died there and the Bahá’ís visit his grave. The government was afraid of the progress of the Faith and banned their activities, but they did not extinguish.” The Guardian smiled in the last sentence.

Adíb said, “Beloved Guardian! In Stuttgart there are many believers.” The Guardian said, “Yes, it is the oldest Bahá’í Centre in Germany and the most in number.” Adíb said, “When my brother [i.e. Dr ‘Abbás Baghdádí] was in Germany, we used to send the Bahá’í News through him to Germany.” The Guardian said, “Where is he now?” He replied, “In Baghdád.” The Guardian said, “They praise him very much in their letters to me, especially Mr Elena, and now what does he do in Baghdád?” Adíb replied, “Beloved Guardian! He is in the Ministry of Economics, a geologist.” The Guardian said, “Very good. An official.”

Here, we arrived at The Shrine. He went in to visit and we followed. When he came out he asked me, “What about your passport?” I quietly replied, “It arrived.” He said, “When did it arrive?” I replied, “Today.” He said, “I shall let you travel after you all go on your last visit to Bahjí. These are your last days.”

Then he said to me, "You are late going back to work. Rely on God!" I said, "I have, my Beloved Guardian, and it doesn't matter what they will do against me." He said, "Don't be late for the appointed time and don't give them a pretext in their hands against you. Attract the hearts of your superiors."

Then he said, "Today I have received the Bahá'í News of 'Iráq. Who is its editor?" Adíb replied, "This servant!" The Guardian said, "Its Arabic part is eloquent and its English part correct." Adíb said, "It is through your bounty!" The Guardian said, "I shall also pray for you." The Guardian asked, "How many copies do you send to me?" He replied, "Two copies." The Guardian said, "They are not sufficient. Send five and I shall distribute them." I said, "Beloved Guardian! The Sacred Relics in the rooms next to The Shrine are numerous. We request to visit them again." He said, "You shall visit them after you return from 'Akká. I have set the Sacred Relics in order that Pilgrims may visit them."

Then the Guardian asked Mr Gushtásb, the gardener, "Do you pick tangerines for the guests? Pick for them, from the trees in the gardens of the Shrine and also from the garden of the Greatest Holy Leaf."

Arriving at the car, the Guardian smiles and bid us farewell.

The Ninth Day in His Presence on Tuesday 5th March:

Before the arrival of the Beloved Guardian, we were, as he promised us the previous day, visiting the Sacred Relics with the help of his brother, Mr Riyád, in the third room of Archives next to The Shrine. We saw the shirt of the Purest Branch stained with his blood and we saw the shirt of His Holiness The Báb stained with his blood and we saw a piece of His green turban and we saw the ring of His Holiness Quddús and we heard Mr Riyád reading to us The Tablet of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to His Sister, The Greatest Holy Leaf, written in tender and gracious words. We were overcome with grief while we were visiting the Sacred Relics of the Wronged. Then we hurried to stand at the door of the Guest-House. The Guardian came walking along the street leading to the Guest-House. He greeted us and asked Salmán, who came back from his visit to an eye doctor, if he had faced any difficulty on his journey. He replied, "Beloved Guardian! I have seen a miracle. When I arrived at Tel Aviv, the police prevented me from going to Jerusalem, saying "You cannot go to Jerusalem" I said to him, "I am an Iraqi Bahá'í. I am neither a Jew nor a Palestinian. I am going to Jerusalem to see my doctor and to see my brother." He said, "Which doctor do you want to see?" I replied, "I want Dr Teekhu." He said, "He is here in Tel Aviv. Go and see him." The Guardian said, "You did say you are Iraqi Bahá'í. There is difference between Iraqi Jew and Iraqi Bahá'í." Then the Guardian said, "What did the doctor say?" he said, "The doctor said there was no difference." The Guardian said, "No need for an operation?" He replied, "No need for an operation." Then the Guardian said, "I shall also pray for you. You must see proficient doctors: 'Hold ye fast onto the Cord of means and place your trust on God, The Provider of all means', Bahá'u'lláh has revealed." [i.e. Aqdas 33]. I asked, "Is this different from Spiritual healing?" The Guardian said, "Bahá'u'lláh ordered us to go to material means when He revealed 'Hold ye fast onto the Cord of means and place your trust to God'."

Then the Guardian said, "Today you have visited the Sacred Relics for the second time. The Pilgrims visit them once. You visited them twice." We replied, "It was through your benevolent generosity." He said, "Tomorrow morning you go to Bahjí and you come back in the afternoon." Then he asked us, "When you go back to 'Iráq, do you travel via Beirut?" Salmán replied, "As your order will be, it shall be". The Guardian said, "You can go via Beirut and give my greetings to Ḥusayn Iqbal, but do not stay long in Beirut. Go straight to Damascus." I asked, "Can I travel back via Aleppo?" He said, "It is your way. There are believers in Aleppo. You can meet them, but don't let that delay you."

Then the Guardian said, "I hope that a chain of Local Spiritual Assemblies will be established between Haifa and India, to Calcutta and Burma and Rangoon. From Haifa to Damascus to Baghdád to Afghánistán, East Írán, and to Baluchistan. Baghdád will be joined to Haifa by the railway." Adíb asked, "Straight, all together?" The Guardian said, "Yes, Haifa will greatly develop commercially, industrially, in literature and in agriculture. It is the 'Key of the East', but I say 'Haifa is the Key of the Hearts'. It has the Exalted Shrine."

Here, the Guardian arrived, in his walk in the gardens of The Shrine, at the side overlooking The Shrine. He saw the Caretaker of the Guest-House Isfandiyár, working in the garden. He asked him, "Where is your namesake, Isfandiyár?" He replied Beloved Guardian! He is working there."

Then the Guardian said to us, "'Iráq is not joined to Írán by the railways. Its railways are only up to the frontiers, aren't they?" Adíb said, "Beloved Guardian! Every time the British wanted to extend the railways, the people of 'Iráq started opposition. Thus the problem remained protracted." The Guardian said, "Our hope is for the future, but why is this situation now?" Adíb replied, "The people of 'Iráq are afraid for their independence." The Guardian said, "They think that they are independent while they are captive and their rulers are captive. So they are captives in the hands of the captives. This is also the situation in Egypt and Syria. Írán has extended its railways." Salmán said, "Beloved Guardian! It cost Írán forty million pounds, but it is not lucrative. It doesn't give sufficient revenue to the government, because it only works during winter." The Guardian said, "It is also very slow." Salmán said, "In summer, motor cars work, because they are faster than railways." The Guardian said, "Írán extended the railways in order to say 'We are independent'."

Salmán, who is a banker, told the Guardian what he knew about Írán's currency and the Guardian said, "The people in Írán are not satisfied with their government. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that the people should be satisfied with their government and if the government does not serve the interests of the people, there will not be inter-blending, as honey and milk, and there will be no JUS-TICE. With the people of Bahá it is the Spiritual Assemblies which serve the interests of the Bahá'í communities which had elected them to represent them."

Then the Guardian added: "The members of Assemblies should serve the interests of the Cause and not their own interests. They should be accurate, faithful and punctual. The Bahá'ís resemble the nations while the National Assemblies, the Secondary Houses of Justice, (i.e. mentioned in the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Bahá) resemble the governments of the world. The Spiritual Assemblies should be elected through general, confidential, and free election so that the politicians of the World will adopt the institution of the National Assemblies. In the Faith we have 'The Great Law, Námús-i-Akbar', 'The Secondary Houses of Justice' and we have 'The Greatest Law, Námús-i-A'zam', The Universal House of Justice."

Here, the Beloved Guardian, in his walk in the high gardens of The Shrine, arrived at the spot overlooking The Shrine where Bahá'u'lláh had rested. Behind that spot was a large green circle with only one big tangerine tree in the centre. The Guardian stepped into the circle to that tree and said to us with a smile, "Do you eat tangerines?" I replied, "Yes, every day." He gently said to us, "Come forward, please" and he picked, for each one of us, a tangerine and said, "Look at this spot. It is a wonderful spot: a tree full of fruit and at the same time its branches are covered with red flowers and white flowers and jasmine. It is a unique spot." I said, "Beloved Guardian! That tall tree with horizontal straight branches is a very beautiful tree." He said, "It was planted around the Mansion at the time of the Blessed Beauty. They were increased in number when I brought one here."

Adíb said, "We have taken two small trees for Baghdád Ḥaẓíratu'l-Quds." He said, "Yes, take them and plant them there." Salmán said, "We brought flower-trees from Baghdád to Damascus Ḥaẓírat'ul-Quds." The Guardian said, "Indeed, the Friends in Baghdád have extended a great help to the Friends in Damascus for the building of their Ḥaẓírat'ul-Quds. It is not for the believers of Damascus only, but for all Syrian believers."

When the Guardian, in his walking, arrived at the square lawn overlooking the two entrances: the private and the general, he asked the gardener, Isfandiyár, "When did you come?" He replied, telling the hour of his coming. The Guardian said to him, "Your brother has gone."

Then the Guardian said to us, "Isfandiyár was serving The Holiest Shrine and I have brought him today to serve The Exalted Shrine, so that he will have both honours." Adíb said, "Beloved Guardian! These youth are ablaze in their love for the Faith." The Guardian said, "They are loyal. They guard The Shrines and The Shrines protect them. During the present disturbances, they are safe and The Shrines are safe."

Coming down from the high gardens to The Shrine, the Guardian told the caretaker to open the door. He entered and we followed. He prostrated himself on the Threshold and rose up to chant the Tablet of Visitation. We listened to his Persian accents and wished to retain his melody in our life. When he came back out, he said to us, “Come forward. Don’t remain behind, please.” Then he asked Rustam Bimán if he had brought the car. Then he addressed Isfandiyár, “You are the Trustee of the International Archives.”

After a few steps, the caretaker of The Shrine came forward and said, “Beloved Guardian! Tonight we have no electricity.” The Guardian said, “What is the reason?” He replied, “In that electrometer.” The Guardian said, “There and not here?”, pointing with his arm. Then he asked, “How long will its repair take?” He replied, “The official did not appoint the time, but he said tomorrow he would repair it.” The Guardian said, “Very good.”

Then the Guardian said to us, “Pilgrims see the lights of The Shrine every night, shining brightly to the east and to the west. When His Holiness the Báb was in Máhku, he did not even have a single candle. Now he has a hundred thousand shining lamps. Did anybody believe that the Throne of the Báb would be brought from Tabríz to the top of Mount Carmel? Today there are people who say that his body was scattered and vanished after He was thrown on the edge of the moat of Tabríz. Nabíl wrote of the event and, of course, you have read it. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has written that all the body of His Holiness the Báb has been brought to this Shrine. The historic transfer from Írán to Mount Carmel has not been recorded yet, but it will be recorded.”

Arriving at the car, the Guardian asked Rustam Bimán, “Where is Isfandiyár [Sháh Kawoos]?” He replied, “In the Guest-House.” The Guardian said, “Call him.” When he came out the Guardian told him to get into the car. Greeting us with a smile, he said “KhudáHáfiz”. (NOTE: Isfandiyár Sháh Kawoos accompanied the Guardian in order to come back, bringing to us the Guardian’s token of His kindness — our meal at dawn, as we were fasting during the remaining four days in His presence for the beginning of the month ‘Alá’. The Guardian had gently told us that we were travellers and we needn’t fast.)

The Tenth Day in His Presence on Wednesday 6th March:

We were returning from our visit to the Holiest Shrine at Bahjí. We arrived at the guest-house at five o’clock. We saw the Beloved Guardian, afar, standing near the Resting Place of The Purest Branch. When he came, he greeted us and said, “Have you just arrived from Bahjí?” Then he said “These Monumental Resting Places have a great beauty over the street below.” I said, “Beloved Guardian! Their beauty is greater at night!” He said, “The land [of the Resting Place of The Purest Branch and His Mother] did not belong to the Cause, but I have bought it recently. The Friends in ‘Iráq have shared in its purchase. It was the property of Faríd [i.e. the Covenant-breaker, Dr Faríd]. Although he knew our need for it, he sold it to the Jews with that land. The Jews built those houses which you see, over them.”

Here, the Guardian turned to look at those houses with majesty and authority and said, “‘Abdu’l-Bahá ordered them to purchase these lands. Had they known the majesty of what we have built on this Spot, they wouldn't have sold it. But now, after they have seen what we have built, they became repentant. And although I informed nobody of my intention to transfer The Purest Branch and His Mother, they understood and started their machinations to stop the transfer, but they failed and were disappointed."

Then the Guardian told us about the building of the 'Women's Guest-House'. He said, "I have built the Women's Guest-House with the stones of the church of the missionaries, which they sold to us with the Cross. They also had a house about which they threatened us if we tried to purchase, but at last they sold it to us. I have registered them both in the name of 'The Bank of the National Assembly of America in Palestine.'"

In his walking, the Guardian stopped on the green overlooking the site of that church. He said, "This is the sight of that church. It is below The Shrine. They thought that it was an insult to the church to be below The Shrine. What insult is it for the Cross of His Holiness Jesus Christ to be in the shadow of The Exalted Shrine? Now on its site we planted olive trees."

Then the Guardian said, "The official registrations were done by the official Músá, son of the Arch-Covenant-Breaker. Now he is paralysed like his father, 'The Great Firewood', who is now burning in the Under Hell."

Here the Beloved Guardian stopped to talk to the gardener, Isfandiyár. He said to him, "Was the rain sufficient?", because yesterday he complained saying "Irrigation is difficult" and today he was satisfied with the rain!

Then the Guardian continued his kind information about registrations. He said, "This official Músá Bahá'í, as he calls himself has officially registered thirty land-transactions in his own hand and then transferred them from my name to the names of the National Assemblies of America and India, because these two National Assemblies are officially registered in their countries. I shall register the remaining lands in the future in the names of other National Assemblies, like Germany, 'Iráq, Egypt, Australia and England, when I receive their official registrations in their own countries, and I shall send them to Jerusalem to make Banks for the National Assemblies in their names. I have consulted an efficient lawyer and discussed with him all the points of view. The National Assembly in 'Iráq hasn't got the official recognition of the Government yet, but they will get it in the future."

Then the Guardian said to us, "Today you have visited the Holiest Shrine and the Mansion for the third time. This is very good." I said, "Beloved Guardian! We have copied the Tablet of His Holiness the Báb to Muḥammad Sháh." The Guardian said, "His Holiness the Báb had invited Muḥammad Sháh to the Cause of God and His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh invited his son, Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháh. The Friends should understand the station of the Báb exactly, and they should not be satisfied during teaching the Faith by saying He is the Forerunner. The Bahá'í schools in Írán were all closed by the Government at the Celebration of the Martyrdom of the Báb, because they said, "Why do you close today, while the Báb is merely the forerunner of your Faith?" The Government had no objection to the Ridván Celebration. The Friends in Írán insisted on closing the schools at the Celebration of the Martyrdom and so the Government closed all the schools."

I asked, "Why do the enemies make such a difference between our celebrations?" The Guardian said, "Just for an insult."

Adíb asked, "Please, for how long will the Celebration of the Martyrdom continue following Hijrí calendar?" The Guardian said, "Until The Universal House of Justice shall be established, the East will celebrate it according to Hijrí calendar and the West according to the Gregorian calendar."

While the Guardian was walking in the high gardens overlooking The Shrine, he arrived at an oblong spot of lawn and said, "Look at the beauty of this spot with these small palm trees. It is at the same time a beautiful green lawn and a beautiful palm trees spot. Have you in Baghdád such a spot which combines these beauties together with these tall, evergreen cypresses which gave dignity to the spot? Yes, there isn't such a spot. This spot is adjacent to the Spot where His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh often sat and His tent was pitched." Adíb asked, "Did He stay here long?" The Guardian said, "Two or three days and nights."

Then the Guardian said, "Bahá'u'lláh ordered Badí'u'lláh to purchase this land from the Germans, but he failed. Then Bahá'u'lláh said to him 'You do not have the ability to do this job; it is the job of the Master.' Bahá'u'lláh fixed the Spot and 'Abdu'l-Bahá purchased it."

Then the Guardian continued walking as far as the wall bordering the public street on top of Mount Carmel and said, "Now from this street downwards belongs to The Shrine. At the beginning, the lower spot was purchased, then the upper spot was purchased, then this spot was purchased."

The Guardian walked back towards The Shrine and arrived at the edge of the circle spot to his right hand side, overlooking the far Guest-House and said, "The late MírzáJa'far Shírází purchased that far spot and built the Guest-House on it. Then the Pársí Friends purchased the spot between the Guest-House and The Shrine. They all bought them from the German Missionaries who had come here to wait for His Holiness Jesus-Christ."

Then the Guardian added, "It is the missionary, Henry Jessup, who spread the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh to the West. Do you know him?"

Adíb said, "Yes, Beloved Guardian! He was at Beirut University."

Then the Guardian said, "I purchased the lands for ten pence a metre and now it is two pounds; and down in Haifa it is six or seven pounds." We said, "We bought the land of Baghdád Ḥaẓíratu'l-Quds for one hundred Fils per metre and now it is one Dinar." The Guardian said, "The Friends in Írán have purchased about one million metres for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár of Tíhrán and its accessory buildings."

Then the Guardian said, “‘Abdu’l-Bahá started the purchase of lands and after Him the believers made sacrifices for the purchase of the remaining lands. Then these lands were registered in the names of the National Assemblies. These lands are exempt from the Revenue Tax. If these lands had not been purchased, the street below the Shrine wouldn’t have been extended. It shall extend to the sea.”

Then the Guardian added, “The Covenant-breakers told the Turkish Government that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was building a fortress to fight the Government. They sent Investigation Commissions (i.e. the two in 1904 and 1907). The result was the immediate downfall of the Government.”

I said, “Some of the members of the Commission went to Alexandria begging.” The Guardian said, “The grandson of Sulṭán ‘Abdu’l-‘Azíz, called Seifid’Dín, came to me begging twice, introducing his personal card. The first time I spoke to him about the Faith and gave him the book of Esslemont in the Turkish language. The second time I saw that he is not in these worlds. I did not speak to him about the Faith, but only gave him money. When he came to Haifa, he stayed in the Muslim houses.”

I said, “Beloved Guardian! It didn’t happen in the past Dispensations, that they had the Victories that we have in the first Century.” The Guardian said, “In this Dispensation, the Manifestation of God did not come with the sword, but with twenty thousand martyrs. Notwithstanding this, such Victories have happened in the first century. So in future, the Friends should not be distressed when tests, ordeals and upheavals happen, because these tests happen for the sake of the exaltation of the Cause and for cleansing the Sacred Hem of the Cause from weak-natured elements. These tests shall never cause any schism in the ranks of the believers.”

When the Guardian arrived at the Shrine, he told the caretaker to open the door of the Shrine of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He entered and we followed. When he came out he said to us, “Your Pilgrimage was elaborate. For the third time you visited the Holiest Shrine and the Mansion and ‘Akká. In future the distances will be crossed in a short time through fast communications. His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh travelled from ‘Akká to Haifa in a boat and it was slow, but now this journey is done in half an hour or twenty minutes. The believers in Írán and ‘Íráq are longing for Pilgrimage. You have to know the value of your pilgrimage through exerting efforts in the teaching field and in establishing administrative centres. These two tasks are important now.”

Then the Guardian said, “Tomorrow morning you will take my present to Baghdád Ḥazíratu’l-Quds: the collection of books.” He bid us farewell and got into the car and look at us with his smile.

The Eleventh Day in His Presence on Thursday 7th March; The Farewell Hour:

We sat in the Guest-room with the Guardian's father. His brother, Mr Ḥusayn, brought the Guardian's Valuable gift: Esslemont's book in twenty four languages. Salmán was telling the father of the Guardian about his journey to Jerusalem.

Our hearts were throbbing with the love of the Guardian. When he came, we rose up and his father sat in front of us near the door. The Guardian had his orange woollen robe on. His face was shining with happiness. He said, "Please, sit down. Today you are intending to depart. Yes, you will go with a new spirit. Give the Friends of God in 'Iráq my greetings and best wishes. Thanks be to God they are united and the disputes have completely vanished. They are now serving the Cause with utmost love and loyalty. Give my greeting to Háj Maḥmúd Qassábachí. I never forget his services and my greeting to Mr Dawood Toeg, who is serving the Cause with great love and loyalty. I have prepared for you these books as my gift to the library of Baghdád Ḥazíratu'l-Quds."

Then he added, "This is also the photograph from inside the Shrine. It was on my writing desk and it was not sent to the other Spiritual Assemblies. You will place it in a suitable place in your Archives room. God willing, you will continue collecting the Sacred Relics that ends at the repossession of the Great House of Bahá'u'lláh and building a Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár in Baghdád. Now there is a Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár in 'Ishqábád built on the plain. There is the Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár of America built on the shore of the lake. There will be a Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár on the slope of the mountain in Ṭihrán. There will be a Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár on top of Mount Carmel. There will be a Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár in Baghdád."

Then he added, "This is also my gift to your Assembly, the photograph of the Bahá'í Centre in Chicago of the American National Assembly."

Then he said, "In Írán, they stopped the building of the Ḥazíratu'l-Quds in Ṭihrán and closed its door. Didn't they do that? Now there are many Ḥazíratu'l-Quds that are being built in 'Iráq, Syria and Egypt."

Then the Beloved Guardian gave each one of us two photographs of the Mashriqu'l-'Adhkár in America; one of them has the glitter of the water of the lake. He said to us, "These are new photographs," and he said to me "show them to the Kurds."

Then he said, "God willing, I shall hear from you glad tidings. I am very pleased with the Friends in 'Iráq, especially in Baghdád. You will visit the Friends in 'Awáshíq and Huwaydir. I shall inform Ḥusayn Iqbál in Beirut to welcome you."

Then he rose up and said to us, "God willing you will arrive at 'Iráq safely," and he embraced us. Then he said to Adíb, give my greetings to your family." Here Adíb requested the Guardian's permission for the Pilgrimage of his mother, and the Guardian granted his permission.

When Salmán sobbed in his weeping, the Guardian said to him, “Don’t be sad! I hope you will go to America.”

Thus was our last look at our Beloved Guardian. When we came out to the street, we embraced Mr ‘Ináyatu’lláh Işfahání, whom the Guardian told to accompany us during our four journeys to Bahjí and ‘Akká. He was standing by the car which took us to Beirut at quarter to nine.

Jan. 15, 1945 Cairo, Egypt

Dearest;

Now to begin writing of my trip to Haifa, Palestine. It all started in a city called Cairo. Dorothy Clark, my roommate and I were in the PX, known as the United States Army Post Exchange, and we thought we would meander over to the booking office for air transportation, and just for fun see if it were possible to obtain some kind of plane to Haifa or nearby. At first it was "no", but with a little bit of flirting we managed to find out that a Headquarters flight would leave for Tel Aviv 8 A. M. the next morning and we could go along, "No charge."

Pardon me, I failed to mention that this all began January 5th. Dottie and I were so exited it was 3:30 P.M. and we did not have any visas, nor had we approached our bosses for leave from our work. Well I found my boss and he gave me his approval for time off (a miracle as he always refused me before), but to make a long story short it took me until 8 P.M. to obtain visas. I had to get the Egyptian Officer in charge to return to his office at 7:30 P.M. as he had already left his office. He was very nice about everything and it seemed so unusual for anyone to be so obliging, but later on I found that he spent several years in Washington, D.C. and had become rather fond of Americans. After keeping a taxi for three hours, I managed to get enough visas to make the trip.

Madly I returned home to pack and at twelve we were in bed only to have to get up the next morning at 5:30 without an alarm clock. But we managed this somehow and arrived at the airport in plenty of time before the take off. We certainly travelled in style and Karl Hubbell and other members of the baseball league were the guests of honor this trip.

Arriving in Tel Aviv we grabbed a bus for Haifa, Pardon me, back to the plane, we flew over the Suez Canal and several ships were passing through at this time. It was a very beautiful sight and certainly a wonderful piece of work.

The trip to Haifa was very beautiful, many hills and wide open spaces. Upon arriving, I immediately telephoned Rúhíyyih Khánum's residence and she immediately invited Dorothy to come along with me. We arrived at the House of 'Abbás Effendi where Shoghi Effendi resides and there we met Ruhhiyyih Khánum who was in the living room. Well I was very shy and when I met her my first impression was very confused, and I was not at all sure how Dottie was taking everything. She did not use make-up and wore a white shawl over her head. She escorted Dorothy and me over to the Pilgrim House for westerners, this is located across from the house of Shoghi Effendi. We were taken to our rooms by Bahá'í servants. I was given the room of Mrs. Maxwell and Dorothy was put in Rúhíyyih's ex-room. As it was very cold, Dorothy and I were furnished heat.

Dot and I decided to sleep together as we were both rather shy. This was around 6 P.M. and it was getting dark and I had just gone to the bath when Rúhíyyih Khánum came for me to see Shoghi Effendi. Madly I dressed, and was I afraid — scared to death. Over to the big house again and I was left in the living room waiting to see Shoghi Effendi. Well, I did not know what to say or do when I saw Him, but somehow He knew this and he took my hand and welcomed me so warmly. He told me to sit in the big chair which is so much like a princess chair in order that he could talk with me. Then he started discussing our Faith, and then I was assured that this was the Faith I always would believe in and love. Meringello has the same tone of voice as Shoghi Effendi. My heart was so happy and I loved Shoghi Effendi with all my heart. He is so kind, stern, sincere and so completely balanced in every way, dress, manner, approach, ideas, etc.

He stayed and talked with me about fifteen minutes and then He left. Rúhíyyih Khánum walked back with me and no longer was I afraid. She is such a lovely sweet person, so real and sincere.

I had previously met her father and I liked him instantly. I would judge him to be about 75 or 80 years old. I also met Shoghi Effendi's Brother Riaz, who appeared to be very quiet and so different from Shoghi Effendi.

We had dinner in the Western Pilgrim House, the four of us. The food was delicious. That night I learned how we as Bahá'ís should be. Rúhíyyih Khánum is very pretty and I enjoyed being with her so very much.

That night I was too excited to sleep and wondered what tomorrow would bring. We had breakfast in the den at 10:30 and then Mr. Maxwell took Dot and me to the Bahá'í gardens. No words of mine could ever express the beauty of these gardens. But I will try.

The Bahá'í community owns the center of Mt. Carmel from the bottom to the top. We entered the lower gardens on the inside or on this side of the highway.

Never have I seen such gigantic cypress trees, they encircle the gardens. The paths are of white stones, and the many steps of white marble with gorgeous marble vases. We saw the Foreign Pilgrim Houses which are on the inside of the gardens. We looked across the Mediterranean Sea from the shrine of the Báb and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the shrine of Bahá’u’lláh. (How I longed to go to ‘Akká). The gardens are open to all faiths and on the Sundays of each with you find the people here in the Gardens. I finally arrived at the Shrine of the Báb, removed my shoes to enter. Sadness at once touched me, and at that time I wished that I had been alone. Never have I seen a more beautiful, peaceful place. Everything was clean, beautiful, dignified and most of all so touching and sad. I said a few prayers and left to see the Shrine of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá next door. One does not feel so depressed there.

We continued to explore the gardens and saw the beautiful monuments of the Greatest Holy Leaf and other members of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family. Their bodies were placed here by Shoghi Effendi. He has done all the landscaping i.e., the planning — if only you could see this lovely place. Shoghi Effendi is working very hard and he has so much to do. So much to accomplish and has so little time to do it. Sometimes I wonder why we as Bahá’ís trouble him with such petty personal troubles. Although he is so proud of the Bahá’ís in America he is disappointed that we involve ourselves in petty gossip. He wants us to be above such things and he it against any gossip among believers.

Mr. Maxwell, Dot and I returned to the house, we were so tired. We had lunch and went to bed. Later on Dot and I visited the town which was very clean and so very progressive. The Jews and other races here are just wonderful people. Shoghi Effendi sent for me while I was exploring the town and of course I was very disappointed that I did not get to see him but of course did not think he would see me again. Haifa at night is so beautiful and Mt. Carmel is flooded with light.

After dinner the four of us talked and talked. Many questions were answered. Mr. Maxwell is such a fine man and a wonderful architect. He has assisted Shoghi Effendi in so many, many ways. The model of the Temple to be erected on Mt. Carmel is exquisite.

The next morning Riaz took me to the archives while Dot visited the monastery on top of Mt. Carmel. We did not feel as Dorothy would wish to visit the archives and therefore she was not asked.

As we entered the archives could not help but admire the dignity and cleanliness of the place. There I saw the pictures of Bahá’u’lláh and the Báb, and of course many pictures of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. How can one even dare try to describe Bahá’u’lláh or the Báb. I will only say a very few words. The Báb was so delicate and I loved his frailness, but Bahá’u’lláh is so different. He appeared to me to be fearless, firm, and his eyes were like someone who could read your very soul. His purpose is in his face and that is “to bring peace to mankind.”

Riaz and I returned to the Shrines and this time my heart was so heavy; in some small way I felt the sadness of the Báb and the power of Bahá'u'lláh. All I could do in the Shrine of the Báb was to sob and sob and Riaz chanted the prayer of the Tablet of Ahmad. I didn't even have a hanky so I used my coat. Riaz explained everything to me with all details and he is so very nice. Shoghi Effendi arranged a trip for us to Nazareth. Rúhíyyih Khánum, Mr. Maxwell, Dot and I were on our way. It is a lovely drive from Haifa, about 40 minutes, and when one sees Nazareth at a distance it is very lovely, but upon arriving, you see filth, people so poor and sick. We entered a church which was the most filthy place I have ever entered. It was near the well where the Virgin Mary obtained water. The people attending services were dirty, the church was dirty and I was so glad to leave the place. We saw the church of the Annunciation where Joseph's carpenter shop was supposed to have been. Since there were caves I have my doubts. I was glad to have seen Nazareth but happier to leave. Rúhíyyih was such a darling on this trip. Upon arriving home we had tea and I saw Shoghi Effendi again. I am so very lucky. Again we talked very late and retired around 11 P.M. Dorothy by this time was longing to meet Shoghi Effendi and loving everything.

The next morning the great desire of mine to go to 'Akká was to be fulfilled. Riaz, Dot and I left for 'Akká in the afternoon. Then I realized that the prophecy of Bahá'u'lláh that Haifa and 'Akká will be one is being fulfilled, as the homes are extending around the port and soon they will meet. This is a 30 Minute ride from Haifa. 'Akká is dirty, poor and the house that Bahá'u'lláh lived in for 17 years is very depressing. Also saw here the prison where He was imprisoned. Bahá'u'lláh's room is kept clean and is locked, i.e., the room in the house. We travelled for fifteen minutes more and then one sees in the distance a gorgeous building standing alone. Beautiful, well kept gardens, and the next to this home a building — which appears to be a hothouse. There are acres and acres of land that is next to this house. Which an orchard of olives and only an artist dare describe such beauty. This is the Mansion where Bahá'u'lláh spent his last days. First I entered the place which appeared to be a flower house and there is the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. The beauty of this place is breathtaking. The Shrine so suited His personality. So powerful. There I did not feel sad but only childish and so very happy and secure. I prayed that my dear friends and others could experience the joy I had the past few days.

Then we entered the Mansion of Bahá'u'lláh. This is now an archive for all the accomplishments of the Bahá'ís, i.e., books, models pictures, and each room is beautifully furnished so that one enjoys reading and seeing all the many things of the Bahá'ís. Saw the room where Bahá'u'lláh died. It is just as he left it and so very rich and peaceful. Prof. Browne on his interview with Bahá'u'lláh uses the very wording as he expressed himself that one feels when they enter this room. I wrote several letters from one of the many rooms in the Mansion. I returned to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and prayed for someone I so wanted to find happiness. Had tea in the Mansion and then returned to Haifa.

Shoghi Effendi called for me again and this was the night before I was to leave, how I hated to leave. I was given a photo of the beautiful Bahá'í Gardens from Shoghi Effendi, and before leaving he advised me on many things concerning the Cause. Here I cannot write many things but only to my dear friend Hannah who has been the most perfect friend a girl ever had. In Haifa I learned to appreciate the good of such a wonderful Bahá'í.

We stayed up late again and poor Dottie did not get to see Shoghi Effendi. Mr. Maxwell gave me several photos and Riaz gave me a picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá when He was young and Rúhíyyih gave me some lovely rosary and prayer books. I was so sorry but maybe I will be able to return again.

Dot and I Sunday morning at 9:30 A.M. and arrived in Jerusalem at 1:00 P.M. We immediately went to the Holy Sepulchre. It is impossible to describe such filthy Pieces and people we had to see before arriving. The first question we were asked "Are you Christians". Of course this made Dorothy furious as the Holy Sepulchre is not open to Jews. Dot asked the priest if the Jews didn't have as much right to Jesus as the rest of us, and of course being a Bahá'í they did not know what I was. Anymay this left me very disappointed as I believe so different. This place is very materialistic. One statue alone has $8,000,000 worth of jewelry, and of course I feel as if the Virgin Mary would prefer this money to be used for those dirty, poor people we saw. There are many things of interest here, but I did not have too much time to continue my visit, but I will return again. Before leaving we saw the Wailing Wall and I couldn't Believe my eyes. It is impossible to believe that any human being in this day could act as these people are doing. Most of them unclean. The more one sees these things, the more one realizes the necessity of Religious unity. All our past wars have been because of lack of religious unity. One sees selfishness here. When I left this place I thanked God that I learned of the Bahá'í faith.

Dot and I spent the night at Tel Aviv and returned to Cairo the following morning.

(This letter has been extracted from one to my friend Hannah and I do hope I have not missed anything here)

The Glory of Glories rest upon you!

O ye the faithful loved ones of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! It is incumbent upon you to take the greatest care of Shoghi Effendi, the twig that hath branched from the fruit (given forth by the Two hallowed and Divine Lote-Trees, that no dust of despondency and sorrow may stain his radiant nature, that day by day he may wax greater in happiness, in joy and spirituality, and may grow to become even as a fruitful tree.

For he is, after ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the guardian of the Cause of God, the Afán, the Hands (pillars) of the Cause and the beloved of the Lord must obey him, and turn unto him. He that obeyeth him not, hath not obeyed God; he that turneth away from him, hath turned away from God and he that denieth him, hath denied the True One.

Excerpt from the Will and Testament of Abdu’l-Bahá.

As a member of the American Bahá’í Community, it was my rare privilege to serve our Beloved Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, at the World Center of the Bahá’í Faith, in Haifa, (Palestine) Israel, from March 1947, until December, 1951, a total of four years and eight months. The fact that I was the “spiritual child” of Rúhíyyih Khánum, and a long time friend, accounted for the summons to Haifa during the troublous times of the above mentioned period.

While in New York City, awaiting the departure of the ship for Haifa, the Bahá’ís there were so kind to me and spoke of how I would be a help to the Beloved Guardian. It really had not entered my mind that I would work directly for Shoghi Effendi, I thought that perhaps I would perform odd chores in connection with the running of the household, and, perhaps help Rúhíyyih Khánum with some of her duties.

With mixed feelings of awe and love, and, the awareness of my great bounty, I was summoned to my first meeting with Shoghi Effendi shortly after my arrival. I had just returned from paying my respects at the Shrine of the Báb on Mount Carmel. Shoghi Effendi received his visitors in the Drawing Room, just to the left of the main entrance of number seven Persian Street, in the home that had been built for and occupied by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Rúhíyyih Khánum was always present during these wonderful interviews. My first impression was of his warm, loving smile and handclasp, making me feel instantly at ease, he indicated that I should be seated opposite him, across the room, a place that was mine whenever he summoned me thereafter. He inquired about my trip, and, about the Bahá’ís in the United States, spoke of the nature of the work carried on at the World Center, also, some of his hopes for the future. In the course of these interviews, I was to become increasingly conscious of his many great qualities, - his nobility, dignity, fire and enthusiasm, - his ability to run the scale from sparkling humor to deep outrage, but always, always, putting the Bahá’í Faith ahead of everything. On this first occasion, I could hardly be blamed if it seemed I was floating on air! Just to be at the “heart of the world”, to have visited the Shrine of the Báb and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, amid the exquisite gardens, as conceived and supervised by Shoghi Effendi; - to hear the lilting voice of Rúhíyyih Khánum as she chanted the Tablet of Visitation in Persian in each Shrine, surely my cup was running over, tears of joy were raining down my face as I tried to realize my great opportunity. As we strolled through the garden, on this, my first day in Haifa, the gardeners greeted us so respectfully and presented bouquets of flowers, which later filled my room at the western Pilgrim House with heavenly fragrance, Then, - to be called to the presence of our Beloved Guardian. This was a day to be remembered and savored. In his practical, logical manner, Shoghi Effendi made me feel both a welcome guest and a needed helper, he outlined some of my duties which started the very next day! His advice, given me on that initial visit, was to overshadow all my efforts on his behalf; he said he wanted me to follow his instructions explicitly, if I was unsuccessful, or, ran into difficulties, to report to him precisely and he would give me a new plan of action. At first, my duties were to send and collect the mail, daily. At this time, this was seven days out of seven, the Moslem day of rest was Friday, the Jewish, Saturday, and the Christians, Sunday. For the Bahá’ís working at the International Center, during this period at least, there was no special day of rest. It was then that one learned that each moment belonged to the Faith. As time went on, other duties were assigned, when the new state of Israel was born. In 1948, my fiancée came from the United States and we were united in marriage by the Bahá’í Spiritual Assembly of Amman, Trans-Jordan. The ceremony took place in the Old City of Jerusalem, the first Bahá’í marriage registered in the records of Israel. Then all sort of work came our way, we gradually came to learn the joys and sorrows of dear Shoghi Effendi. He said: - “the International Center of our Faith is like a powerful lighthouse, sending strong and brilliant beams out over the world, but, as with a real lighthouse, it is dark and in the shadow at the base.” The “joy” of Shoghi Effendi was to see the Cause of God progress, the “sorrow” was the petty struggles of everyday affairs in an upset country, with shortages of vital needs, ineptitude of some of those surrounding him, apathy, indifference, and finally downright disobedience of those who should have been closest to him, the members of his immediate family, who were no longer living with him when I arrived in March, 1947. This was a blow to the human side of Shoghi Effendi that left its mark, it's "stain on his radiant nature." Once he was speaking of the unhappy events that touch all our lives at one time or another and stated words to this effect,-" I am reluctant to tell the Bahá'ís bad news until I am certain there is no other alternative."

Those of us who were privileged to serve him during these trying times, developed a protective instinct, which is curious in a sense, as Shoghi Effendi was strong, sure, and capable in all his approaches to life! We loved and treasured him, longed to spare him any unhappiness that could possibly be averted. He often said the Bahá'ís were his family, and the ones who understood the events that led to the disaffection of his own relatives, yearned to compensate for this by earning his trust and love. To meet him face to face was to be won over completely, to inspire us to carry out his instructions as perfectly as would be in our power.

Personal contact with the Bahá'ís from all parts of the globe, would have cheered his heart, and it seemed he longed for it, however, his burning desire to make every waking moment count, sleeping little, sometimes his light burned far into the night, he, as was his habit, put away personal wishes in his dedication to the Cause. It was difficult for him to take any recreation, he rarely used the automobile for a pleasure drive. To try to estimate how much it would have meant for the Bahá'ís to have met Shoghi Effendi in person is beyond conception. One sure point emerges, he wanted them to be self sustaining, to be active and to "live the life" as outlined in the Bahá'í Writings, not to be influenced by personalities. His greatest yearning was to lift the friends, step by step, into their great role; - the unfolding of a New World Civilization, destined to lead eventually to the "Golden Age" promised by God, through His Manifestations, to all mankind.

How often Shoghi Effendi lamented the fact that he had accomplished so little! To us, he was "God's Sign" living on this earth, as such we considered him the greatest man alive, bar none! He was shaping the future policies of the Bahá'í Faith, based on the message contained in the Holy Writings of the Founder's of the Faith. We who served him marvelled at his zeal, we believed that such a magnificent man should be surrounded by experts in all fields, we were so conscious of our inexperience, our ineptitude, but, we were the tools at hand and ours was the duty to carry out his instructions to the best of our ability. How we dreaded to report any failure to accomplish plans he had set for us to carry out, not because he would scold us, we only longed to do it right, to bring him good news. We yearned to spare him any unhappiness, knowing full well his happiness was the progress and attainment of the work involved in establishing the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh on this earth.

He was the "Guardian" in every sense of the word! He was like a lion in his guarding! When the years have changed his “guardian-ship” into past history, books will be written telling of his accomplishments.

It is reported that he once said: - his greatest wish, as a youth, was to perfect his english, hoping to become a translator of the original Writings of Bahá'u'lláh. When he realized he was to be the first Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith. God alone knows what his inner feelings were, the indications are that he was overwhelmed, at first the responsibility crushed him. Eventually he made the adjustment to his new station in life, he then took the first steps in a lengthy process to establish the independence of the Bahá'í Faith, to disassociate the Faith from any other religion. This was not the easy road to travel, especially in the Holy Land, others, representing religious groups, wanted to claim 'Abdu'l-Bahá as one of their conviction, due to His beautiful character. His influence, His prestige, and they were accustomed to throng the home of Abdu'l-Bahá. The beloved Guardian had the courage of his convictions, he immediately began laying the foundation of the Bahá'í Administration, with emphasis on it's independence.

The indications show that very early in his Guardianship, Shoghi Effendi was aware that there were unscrupulous people who sought to use the prestige of the Faith to their own advantage. Though there were many individuals that Shoghi Effendi held in high regard, both inside and outside of the Faith, also near and far, -he possessed the faculty of a swift evaluation of character and personality. Many sought his presence and longed to share his spotlight, he was very well informed and had a keen interest in world affairs. We were constantly amazed at his grasp of the heart of a situation. There was a man who was high up in the Ministry of Religions, he begged us to arrange an interview for him with Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian felt it would turn out that there was an ulterior motive behind the request, he finally received the gentleman and discovered that he wanted to line up the Bahá'í Community behind his political party in the forthcoming elections!

It was the custom of the Guardian to visit the Shrines on Mount Carmel most every day, usually leaving in the afternoon and remaining until dusk. His plans for beautifying the gardens surrounding the Shrines, both in Haifa and Bahjí, were very dear to his heart, being a relaxation as well as an accomplishment. How his eyes shone when some difficult transplanting, or new effect turned out as he had anticipated. Though he did not claim to be a “landscaper”, he transformed the rough mountain area on every side, he dared attempt what others said would be impossible! Everything was utilized to the best advantage, he often pointed out that while the gardens had a lovely formal appearance, they were also a nursery, young trees and plants being skillfully placed in readiness to be moved where and when they were needed. When a new area was readied for expansion, so also were the plantings ready, each new development creating more and more beauty. The dear Guardian always lamented the fact that due to the climate, and the lack of sufficient water, it was not possible to have green lawns when all the exquisite flowering trees were in bloom. To compensate for this, he created lovely effects by special plantings under the trees, such as a huge bed of coral plants under the flame tree, (Royal Poinciana) each in the height of its season. He seemed to derive keen enjoyment in experimenting with various grass seed, always hoping for the most velvety green specie to be found. There was one variety that pleased him exceedingly, sometimes this was difficult to obtain. At one time he became intrigued with cactus plants and proceeded to lay out a plan for a cactus garden, later this garden was playfully nicknamed "Arizona" in honor of that state being the home of so many species. This garden became a focal point of interest due to the fact that it was built in a section of the main garden where there had been a huge depression, the usual refuse from the existing gardens would have taken a long period of time to build it up to the proper level. As an aftermath of the street battles that took place in the city of Haifa in 1948, many old buildings were being demolished. The Bahá'ís received permission to remove as much rubble as was needed to fill this large hole. In a matter of days, the cactus garden began to unfold, it was found that many Haifa residents were growing cactus plants organically on their terraces and balconies! Some were purchased but many were donated by friends and strangers, later they would stroll through the gardens to see how their offerings were progressing. Shoghi Effendi had earth of various colors brought to this garden, some clear golden yellow, some warm pink, providing a striding contrast to the walks filled with small rounded white pebbles or coral colored crushed roof tile. In a comparatively short time this garden was completed and Shoghi Effendi would be driven to Panorama Road, at the top of Mount Carmel, where he could look down on his handiwork. It truly resembled a large mosaic from this vantage point.

Another magnificent effect had been created by the Guardian in what is known as the Monument Garden, across the street from the main gate to the Shrine Gardens. In this beautiful place is the pure white marble monument to the Greatest Holy Leaf, the beloved Guardian once likened its structure to that of our Bahá'í Administration. He said the three steps forming the base, which are like three circles placed on one another, diminishing in circumference, could be compared to the largest circle, or the base, representing the body of the believers supporting the next Circle above, representing the Local Spiritual Assembly, and the third step up, the National Spiritual Assembly, then rise the nine pillars supporting the dome, or the crowning achievement of our administration, the Universal House of Justice! In this harmonious and charming garden rest the remains of the Purest Branch, side by side with the Most Exalted Leaf, the saintly Navváb, his mother. The twin monuments chosen to mark these Holy Spots are also made of the pure white marble and reflect the exquisite taste shown by Shoghi Effendi in all his undertakings. In this garden, during the aforementioned period, were undeveloped sections which have since been beautified, even then, due to the graceful outline of Cypress trees, it had the shape of a harp when viewed from the height of the mountain. When the breezes started the trees to swaying, one could imagine they were hearing strains of celestial music! Shoghi Effendi often spoke of future plans to complete the beautification of the entire side of Mount Carmel, from the bottom to the top in a series of eighteen terraces ending at the highest point with a fitting memorial honoring the Báb, then his thoughts would turn to the Temple site which will dominate the brow of God's Holy Mountain.

Over the years of his Guardianship, he had been consolidating our position in the Holy Land, building our prestige, step by step. This was a frustrating and gruelling task, often he would say; - "there are times when we are forced to take a step back, then a new way opens and we are further ahead than we expected to be." Only those who have had the experience of living under changing governments can appreciate the efforts made, only to have them tumble down like a house of cards. Due to the Guardian's diligence and determination, many obstacles were swept away with the result that we now have safeguarded, protected Bahá'í Holy Places. The magnificent Mansion of Bahjí was a ruin, a sorry neglected place, now it is as near to heaven on earth as one can get. Workmen were brought who knew what it looked like in the days of Bahá'u'lláh, walls were cleaned and restored to reveal hidden paintings and stenciling. The room of Bahá'u'lláh, located in the upper story, where He received Professor Browne of Cambridge University, His only Occidental visitor, and many other dignitaries of that period, is once again a treasured and hallowed spot, furnished very much as it was when He occupied it, with some of His personal belongings on view. Pilgrims visiting this room find a powerful peace and a peaceful power emanating from this Holy Place. A marble plaque has been set into the wall by the divan where Bahá'u'lláh usually sat, the "Place" where He sat is covered with a silken square, upon which fresh and fragrant blossoms are placed daily. To kneel in reverence and prayer, opening the heart in this room reminds us, once again, of the precious heritage bestowed upon us by the foresight of our beloved Guardian! The upper story of the Bahjí Mansion is a joy to behold, many items were placed there by the Guardian's own hands, then, as Bahá'í literature printed in countless languages arrived, they were not stacked haphazardly, but arranged on book shelves with an eye for color and artistic pattern. Everything was meaningful, the hangings, paintings, furnishings, all were placed with care and reason. One room a press room, another held the guest register, with the evidence of the world progress of the Faith adorning the walls. Everywhere and anywhere one looked were articles and items of interest, particularly the fascinating examples of calligraphy which will become more precious as the years pass. When the Guardian visited the Mansion, he had a favorite place to sit on the balcony, here he could look toward the Shrine of the Báb across Haifa Bay, while nearer to his right were the landmarks of the ancient city of 'Akká. Often he would invite someone to sit with him while sipping tea, many times no words were spoken, indeed they were not necessary, the silence was eloquent. It was a privilege to be in the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh at any time, but when Shoghi Effendi was present, it became an event. He always paid his respects at the Shrine immediately upon his arrival, chanting the Prayers of Visitation, if he had brought some treasure to be placed there, it was always done quietly and with great dignity, even when giving instructions to the helpers there, his voice was low and respectful. The surroundings of Bahjí were gradually developed and beautified under the supervision of our beloved Guardian, with his usual combination of patience and persistence his dreams for Bahjí materialized, the houses of the Covenant-breakers are now non-existent, the Government of Israel has granted enough land to safeguard the sacred precincts of this Most Holy Shrine. It is now well known how quickly Shoghi Effendi put his plan for beautifying this area into action, it was transformed in a matter of hours! The interior of Bahá'u'lláh's Tomb-Shrine is a delight in its gem-like appearance. Down the halls of time, the very walls will re-echo the voices raised there in praise and glorification of God and His Messengers. In the days of the Guardianship, one remembers his dynamic and musical chanting as he paid his respects, those precious, hushed moments when all present had bowed at the Holy Threshold, amid the vibrant fragrance of Attar of Rose, mingling with the scents of the flowers of the Shrine garden, the rare lamps lighted and the candelabra casting a soft glow on the scene, then our dear Guardian chanting the Tablets of Visitation, the tonal changes being especially impressive. On one occasion of the commemoration of the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh at three o'clock in the morning, the outside of the Shrine was bathed in a luminous light that reflected on the verdure of the blossoms in the adjacent gardens, as we were leaving this sacred spot, the dawn was approaching, the night birds had sung their songs, the birds of daytime were sleepily chirping, the first rays of sun were lighting the sky, in our hearts we felt that -God is in His Heaven and all is well with the world! This peaceful act of worship was made possible because we had a Guardian who looked to the future, who preserved and protected our Holy Places for posterity.

When the State of Israel was born in May, 1948, the slow process of the return to normal life began to take place. With it came new problems and possibilities, the Bahá'í position had to be reaffirmed and re-established with the new government. All during the hostilities, Shoghi Effendi had maintained an absolute neutrality, he had won the confidence of many because of his integrity. When asked for funds to support the "war of liberation" he ignored the request, instead, he made generous contributions to the "Mayor's Charitable Fund" which was dispensed to all the needy of Haifa, regardless of race, creed or color. When a machine gun nest was set up in the lower approach to the Shrine Gardens, on the bridge over 'Abbás Street, he did not seek aid from the military or the police, he simply sent some of the Bahá'í gardeners to ask the trespassers to remove the sand-bags and the guns, reminding them that this was Bahá'í property, and they complied immediately. On April 22, 1948, a battle developed in Haifa which lasted approximately twenty-four hours, this proved to be decisive for the Jewish residents of the city. A "citizens" group restored order and many dignitaries sent messages to Shoghi Effendi to inquire as to his safety and the security of the Bahá'í properties. They greatly respected him as he did not leave the city to get away from the troubles, as so many other prominent persons did. Among the first to phone were the two lawyers who had handled all Shoghi Effendi's legal affairs all through his Guardianship. They were his friends and well-wishers all through this long association that had involved all sorts of delicate and technical situations.

Although there were many newcomers, numbering in the thousands, flowing into Israel, some of which became officials controlling the affairs of state, the beloved Guardian received recognition as a religious dignitary, he was invited to attend all important events, such as the opening of their first Parliament, the reception held for the first Prime Minister, and a host of other occasions when he would often send his representatives. The members of the Diplomatic Corp invited him to their outstanding events, a number of world organizations valued his interest in their hopes and plans. The Esperanto Congress always sent him a greeting to which he would respond, the Men of Trees, another world-wide group desiring his friendship would contact him as well as others too numerous to mention here. In the late fall of 1950 and early in 1951, the Guardian sent for a few more helpers from the United States and one from England, this group formed a family type association, each being assigned various duties. When it seemed feasible, Shoghi Effendi named this group the “International Bahá’í Council” and appointed officers commensurate with their duties. He explained at the time of these appointments, that it was a temporary measure to lend dignity to our efforts in representing a World Faith at it’s World Center, he said that in due time it would be supplanted by other institutions. Some of us felt it was a “bridge”to carry us over to the new developments which were swiftly unfolding. Shoghi Effendi began to close this gap by announcing several important steps, among them, the completion of the Shrine of the Báb in the heart of Mount Carmel, the appointment of the “Hands of the Cause”, the four Intercontinental Conferences, and finally, the Ten Year Crusade culminating with the World Congress In 1963 and the election of the Universal House of Justice.

It was shortly after the gathering of the new helpers in the Holy Land, that the Guardian would bless us with his beloved presence at dinner each evening. He would lovingly greet us and used this time to share some of his hopes, plans and news from centers around the world. He made it clear that when he had something to tell the Bahá’ís, he sent his messages through the proper channels, therefore, no one made notes of his conversations unless he requested them to do so. Very often, his face beaming with joy, he would read some messages which would be sent out by cable the next day. At times the “Guardian would not appear for several days, when this happened it was like the sun going behind the clouds. We did not begin to be concerned about him if he missed one day, but when he did not come for several days, we would question Rúhíyyih Khánum, -”Is Shoghi Effendi feeling alright? - you are not keeping something from us?” She would then tell us that the Guardian was very preoccupied, busy with his work, hardly bothering with food or rest! It was then we realized that “divine inspiration” was working through him, for when he did rejoin us, he was usually sparkling with excitement and new plans, he would produce messages and letters from his pockets, oftentimes pushing his dinner plate away untouched, call for paper and pencil and thrill us all with his new ideas and hopes for the Bahá’ís to carry out. On one memorable occasion, he brought original letters he had received from Queen Marie of Roumania, showed them to us and read excerpts, these letters were very precious to him, along with certain others from prominent people. In his book, "God Passes By" you can read the tributes he paid to Queen Marie.

It was just after the State of Israel was born that Shoghi Effendi made the great decision to start the completion and beautification of the Shrine of the Báb situated in the heart of Mount Carmel, God's Holy Mountain. He had already received funds earmarked for this project, but for years he had been unable to carry out this work due to unsettled conditions. It became his conviction that now was the time! William Sutherland Maxwell, P.R.I.B.A. (Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects) - father of our dear Amatu'l-Bahá, Rúhíyyih Khánum, and the beloved husband of lovingly remembered May Maxwell had been chosen by the Guardian to create the design for the beautification of the exterior of the Báb's Shrine. Mr. Maxwell had been working over a long period of time, drawing the plans for the structure that was to enshrine and protect the original building of native Palestinian limestone, which contained the sacred remains of the Holy Báb, and where, at a later date, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was placed in eternal rest. The beloved Guardian had certain basic ideas which he shared with Mr. Maxwell, all during the process of creating the design, they consulted often together, eliminating - adding - until one day the stage was reached where a plaster model could be made. This model had a place of honor in the huge central hall of the Western Pilgrim House. (The building at number 10 Persian Street, now used for offices.) Shoghi Effendi often spoke of times past when 'Abdu'l-Bahá would stand on the front steps of number 7 Persian Street, His home, and gazing up at the Shrine of the Báb as it stood in His day, would say: - "it is still unbuilt" - He even quoted the amount of funds which would be required to complete it, -Shoghi Effendi said that in terms of present day exchange and currency rates, the figure was very close to the actual cost. Due to the unusual location of the building, halfway up the steep mountainside, which would cause it to be viewed from below, presented a unique architectural problem. Frequently, when studying the plaster model, we would remove the lantern, and the clerestory, leaving only the section comprising the arcade, then Shoghi Effendi would ponder the problems and possibilities, finally he decided to at least build the arcade, he stated, among other things, this will show the new State of Israel that I have faith and confidence in their future. A great deal of preliminary study had gone into the research of suitable materials, they must be beautiful and enduring, also every care must be taken to insure the protection of the existing building and the precious remains interred there. In talking matters over, Shoghi Effendi spoke of the loving care taken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá when the sacred remains of the Siyyidi Báb were transferred to this, His last resting place. The Bahá'ís of India had sent a unique sarcophagus to hold the "sacred dust" - when the place had been prepared and the sarcophagus was open. It was found that the wooden box holding the precious remains was a trifle too large to be lowered into place. In the presence of those assembled to witness the scene, the excess wood was sawed off to make it fit and all the chips and sawdust were enclosed in the marble sarcophagus before the lid was sealed on. This was done so that there would never be any legends develop around so-called relics with mystical powers. In the spring of 1948, Mr. Maxwell went to Rome, Italy, and aided by two other Bahá'ís, started a series of studies of available materials, craftsmen and marble dealers. Museums were visited, existing buildings and monuments were analyzed, keeping in mind the need for durability as well as beauty. One of the leading marble firms was finally chosen, employing the world's best marble cutters and draftsmen, also enjoying a long record of experience in erecting monumental buildings. Negotiations were commenced and when the facts and figures were ready, they were presented to the Guardian for approval. With some adjustments on both sides, the contract for the arcade was consummated. At one point in the discussion about costs, the marble firm said they would be willing to do the work without profit rather than lose the contract. Mr. Buffalini, the head of the marble firm, explained that due to the recent war and the resultant economic upheaval, there had been almost no construction requiring quality marble or skilled marble cutters. He said if we receive this contract it will hold our work-crew together until normal conditions return. He actually gave credit to the building of the Shrine of the Báb for saving the marble industry of Italy at this critical period. Mr. Buffalini ascended while work was in progress on the Shrine, his wife wrote that some of his last words were, - "be sure that the workmanship and materials for the Shrine of the Báb continue to be of the highest standard and quality." While discussions continued regarding costs, Shoghi Effendi stated that he didn't expect the marble firm to do the work without a fair profit, saying that business for the Bahá'í Faith was carried on in such a manner that a just price for both parties involved should be decided upon. Eventually a mutual agreement was reached and a very pleasant business relationship developed.

In Haifa, plans were shaping up to ready the area around the Shrine of the Báb for the new construction. In order to make way for the foundation of the arcade, many beautiful trees and gardens had to be removed. Meanwhile, the beloved Guardian was busily engaged in plotting the landscaping, he could hardly wait for the dust to settle before the new gardens began to take shape. Some of the new gardens were outlined as eight-pointed stars to honor the Báb who was eighth in the line of Manifestations. Not once, not twice, but many times Shoghi Effendi warned the engineers, through his representatives, that if there was any doubt about the construction disturbing the precious remains interred in the original building, they must abandon their present plan for sinking the supports that would eventually bear the weight of the clerestory and dome, study the situation and then submit a new plan. At length, Shoghi Effendi became satisfied and assured that his wishes would be carried out faithfully and the work commenced. Whenever construction was in process at the site, Bahá'í representatives were present, a pictorial record was made of the entire operation, many pictures and articles were published in the Bahá'í World Book and the Bahá'í News. It was during this busy period, when all those residing at the World Center had some part to play in this exciting project, that Shoghi Effendi began to visualize the completed building. He studied anew the Shrine model, the costs, he longed to see the entire structure finished. He felt keenly that the artistry and quality of workmanship might not be the same if a long period were to elapse between the building of the arcade and the super-structure. Finally, with his usual courage and vigor, he announced to the Bahá'ís that the work would continue until the entire structure was completed, he then asked the friends to send contributions for financing these final steps, directly to the World Center. This flow of funds to Haifa made a favorable impression on the newly formed State of Israel, they were still in the process of consolidating their policies and position and foreign exchange was like a blood transfusion to this young and struggling country

As the new beauty of the building unfolded, praise was heard from all sides, and when the arcade was finished, the authorities gave permission for it to be flood-lighted for one hour each evening, even at this time when electricity was rationed due to the increase of population and the corresponding drain on all public facilities. Under these conditions it was thrilling to be across the Bay of Haifa, on the upper balcony of Bahjí after dark to see the lights come on! It produced the effect of a precious gem placed on a background of black velvet.

What a bounty it was to be present on the occasion of the first commemorative visit to the Shrine of the Báb after the completion of the arcade. Picture, if you can, the glorious sight of the flood-lighted building, lights concealed amidst the garden shrubbery, the night air releasing the perfume of the flowers, the moon bathing all with its luminous rays! Inside, flowers, soft lights, the whispering rustle as the believers filed in to pay their respects at the Holy Threshold, then the expectant hush before the vibrant voice of our beloved Guardian broke the silence, chanting the Tablet of Visitation, Memories of dear Shoghi Effendi will be forever associated with what he brought into being and to fruition during his lifetime, carrying out plans initiated by Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

In 1947 the property known as Mazra'a was occupied by a retired English General and his wife, they had lived there for some time. The wife had been a long time friend of Queen Marie of Rumania and had become a Bahá'í through this association. She often visited the Holy Shrines and opened her home to Bahá'ís who wished to visit the rooms that Bahá'u'lláh had lived in after He left the prison-city of 'Akká, just prior to the move to the Bahjí Mansion. Shortly after the State of Israel was formed, this property became available, the military desired to establish Mazra'a as a rehabilitation center, due to its quiet location and serene beauty. The beloved Guardian presented our case so eloquently, stating that this was a Bahá'í Holy Place, and, as such should be preserved. It required time, patience and a great deal of correspondence, plus many meetings with officials, the army fought a good battle, but finally the Bahá'ís were able to add this historical house, completing the circle of Bahá'í Holy Places. The house at Mazra'a has characteristics that make it particularly charming, the interior plan is typical of houses built for hot climates, a two story high entrance hall, arched and vaulted ceilings in some of the rooms, terraces outside some of the rooms in the upper floor. Leading from the large hall on the ground floor is at steep stairway, the treads are worn and hollowed with the passing of many feet through the years. However, it is the outdoor patio which invites one to linger, passing through it on one side is the aqueduct which brings water from the hills, in turn, a small sluice or water gate can be opened to divert the water to a cistern, from the base of the cistern, water can be let out into a system of canals to the gardens and trees below the terrace of the patio. Near at hand are some palm trees, and the eye can travel out over the large groves of citrus trees nearby. On one occasion a rather large group gathered for supper on the patio, the moon was rising like a huge golden globe, making the palm trees exotic silhouettes, while at the water line in the cistern, frogs hung suspended in the clear water singing their chorus of mixed notes, close at hand a shepherd was playing on his simple pipes. All these combined to create an atmosphere of rare beauty. Another treasure that might have been lost if we had not had a vigilant Guardian.

When Palestine - as it was known then, - was under the British Mandate, recognition of the period that Bahá'u'lláh spent in the Most Great Prison in 'Akká, was noted with the placing of a metal plaque over the door of the room He occupied, stating that He was imprisoned there and giving the date. Eventually, the new Government of Israel released all the prisoners, most of whom were there because of political offenses. Thus, the Most Great Prison was empty and its fate undermined for a period due to the pressing duties concerned with the forming of a new government and the flow of refugees arriving in great numbers, creating problems of housing and re-settlement. Imagine what it meant to the beloved Guardian to receive a letter from the Government of Israel stating that they would like to place the room that Bahá'u'lláh occupied in the prison at 'Akká, into the permanent custody of the Bahá'í Faith, asking that a meeting be arranged with the newly appointed custodian to complete the formalities. Those of us privileged to represent Shoghi Effendi when the key to this room was placed in our hands, will ever treasure this memory of the simple ceremony that followed, there were three of us and the custodian. We all left our shoes outside the door, and after a reverent silence, Bahá'í prayers were chanted in english and arabic while the mind tried to travel back over the events that had made history within these walls!

The Most Great Prison was now to become a Mental Hospital, it is possible to visit the room where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned without contact with the hospital itself, a flight of stairs leads directly to the wing of the building where the room is located. It was not long before Shoghi Effendi gave instructions to have this dreary, grey prison room, with its barred windows, cleaned and whitewashed. A few simple possessions of Bahá'u'lláh were placed within in reverent memory of this episode in the life of the famous "Prisoner."

This added still another authentic historical site to be visited by the pilgrims. The beloved Guardian expressed his gratitude to the Government with a generous cash gift, to be used for the hospital. Later he was advised that the sum was sufficient to purchase radio earphones for every patients bed.

As a result of the preservation of the house of Udi-Khammar, in ‘Akká, where Bahá’u’lláh revealed the Kitáb-i-Acqdás, the Bahá’ís have a treasure of historical value and significance. It is a fact that this house was used for many purposes during the years after Bahá’u’lláh had left it to reside at Mazra’a and Bahjí. At one time a section of the lower floor was used as a school, at another time as a distribution center for clothes for the needy, and so on. Shoghi Effendi longed to repair and fittingly embellish this “link” in the chain of Holy Places. Finally the day came, in 1950, when he could turn his attention to these requirements, under his careful direction, there emerged the meaning and beauty latent for so many long years. He had the gardeners bring “verdure” to the tiny, Jewel-like courtyard on the upper floor, which was open to the sky above, each room became enhanced and interesting, especially the room where Bahá’u’lláh revealed the Book of Laws. Now, the pilgrims may visit this unique building where in remembrance and prayerful meditation they may recapture the spirit of that period in the life of Bahá’u’lláh, with its stress and strain, when He revealed the Laws that constitute the warp and woof of His World Order. In addition the building will be of great historic interest as a fine example of the architecture of that era.

Until the present Archives Building was constructed, the three rear rooms of the Báb’s Shrine contained many precious articles associated with the three Founders of our Faith. They were carefully displayed or stored, in the room honoring the Báb could be found His Bayán, personal effects, among them one of the beautiful garments of exquisite green taffete which He had worn. Outstanding in the room of Bahá’u’lláh was His portrait. His authentic writings, even the begging bowl He carried when roaming incognito through the mountains of Kurdistan, in the room honoring ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’, we became aware of His travels and the fact that He was the Perfect Exemplar of our beloved Faith. The dear Guardian gave instructions to have these priceless objects aired and cleaned by people he absolutely trusted, more often than not he was present to supervise this important chore. When Shoghi Effendi was convinced of the authenticity of any article he would have it placed in the Archives, otherwise they were stored and catalogued. Placed in the house located in the Monument Garden, termed the “little archives”, were interesting articles associated with the growing history of our Faith, such as a cup that had belonged to the father of Bahá’u’lláh, the ruby brooch that Queen Marie of Rumania presented to Artha Root as a token of her appreciation to Miss Root for bringing her the “Glad Tidings” - a sword that had belonged to Mullá Husayn and many other items that will acquire added lustre in the years to come.

In the plain near ‘Akká, surrounded by a moat which used to contain water diverted from the Ma’an River, lies the tiny oasis, the “Garden of Ridván” - so-named after the original in Baghdád, where Bahá’u’lláh made His public declaration. Shoghi Effendi was vigilant in the preservation of this beauty spot, a favorite retreat of Bahá’u’lláh. Once, we were served mulberries from the very tree under which Bahá’u’lláh had sat, needless to say that our thoughts tried to penetrate the past and picture the scene as it was during His visits. Here again, we felt a renewed appreciation of the safe-guarding of these Holy Places for posterity.

While consolidating the position of the Bahá'í Faith in Palestine, re-named Israel in 1948, the Guardian was carrying on avoluminous correspondence with Bahá'ís all over the world, with individuals as well as administrative bodies. Many were the hearts that were gladdened and comforted with the letters from Haifa, treasuring the message written in the Guardian's own hand, words that there is no doubt changed the lives of the persons who received them. The supreme patience of the Guardian with the Bahá'ís was an example to behold. He was their counselor and supporter in their griefs, the sharer of their hopes and aspirations, and, above all, the inspiration for their efforts to carry on the promotion of the Faith in all parts of the world. The cables sent by the Guardian were masterpieces of exact meaning, therefore, perfect copies had to be made from his own hand-written messages, oftentimes words were changed in the context by him and replaced with words of more precise meaning. Sometimes there were as many as five changes with arrows in the margins pointing to corrections! The typewritten duplicates were always returned to him with his original copy for his records. With the awareness in our hearts and minds of the greatness of our beloved Guardian, plus the fact that he was shaping global policy for the future of the Bahá'ís, we were scrupulous in our attention to correct detail, a good training and valuable asset in all of life's pathways.

Shoghi Effendi had told us that some of the manuscripts attributed to the Founders of our Faith, which were in his possession, would not be put in the Archives as he believed there was evidence that they had been tampered with. Although Shoghi Effendi had a truly unique handwriting style, not easily duplicated, we were careful to return his personally written messages and memos in order to protect their validity. Our own sense of protection to him and to our beloved Faith caused us to forego the impulse to keep something as a memento, other than what he actually inscribed to us. On one occasion we asked him why he sent such long messages to the Conventions by cable rather than by letters, he replied along these lines, - "the friends pay more attention to the cabled messages, it is my desire to stir them into action ." When we left Haifa to return to the United States, we asked the Guardian how we should answer questions that might be asked of us, especially those of a personal nature. He said that we should lovingly advise the friends that anything he wished to convey to them would be sent through the proper channels, then there would be no misunderstandings. Once again we had the heartwarming sense of his protection. He also emphasized that the friends should always feel free to write to him, when he received cables asking for prayers for someone who was ill or had gone to the Abhá Kingdom, he was most loving and thoughtful, usually responding immediately, sometimes sending one of us to the cable office just for a special answer. Did he not sign his messages, - "your true brother, Shoghi." One of the last instructions he gave us before we left was to - "give his deepest his deepest love to the friends whenever and wherever we met their."

Of the many accomplishments of our beloved Guardian, the writing of “God Passes By” will remain a lasting memorial to his great capacity to lend accurate meaning to both the letter and spirit of our great Faith. It is almost impossible to realize what this chronological record of the first hundred years of Bahá’í History will mean in the years to come. Can we appreciate the hours of labor involved in a work of this nature ? - only those close to the Guardian during the period of its compilation can evaluate the degree of effort, concentration and research such a gathering of facts required. As contained in the Writings of the Founders of our Faith, there are no “maybes or perhaps,” –there is the positive approach to the final and total consummation of the aims and purposes unleashed in the fateful days of the early rise of the Bahá’í Faith. The book is also unique because who else but Shoghi Effendi could have written it, who else had access to the authentic facts, who else was at the heart of the world at the conclusion of the first Bahá’í Century! In addition to this contribution to Bahá’í Literature, consider the messages written by Shoghi Effendi, too numerous to single out specific items, but, as a whole, the foundation of a workable administrative structure, conceived by our Founders and put into practical action during the years of his Guardianship. He not only planned the immediate present, but also for the years ahead, so well done that the momentum of his forethought is still animating the global plans of the Bahá’ís, and will continue to over-shadow these efforts for years to come. A firm basis of his divine guidance and inspiration during the embryonic stage of our administrative development.

It was a privilege and blessed bounty to be near the beloved Guardian. The chief aim of his life was the promotion and protection of our precious Faith, he was constantly planning our present and our future. He was way ahead of us, he once said something along these lines, - “ I do not ask more of the friends than I think they are capable of carrying out, - if I really told them what was in store for them, they would be overwhelmed!” Even now, so long after he has left us, we are carried along on the momentum of his plans. How fortunate we are to have the proper administrative bodies to continue the process of the spiritual unfoldment of humanity.

The beloved Guardian disliked very much to have his picture taken, therefore, any photographs extant do not reflect his true “image”. In the first place, the emotions flowed so rapidly over his features, that one would need a series to catch his many moods. It was a delight to see and hear him laugh, he was so often serious, he seemed to twinkle like a star when some plan had been successfully brought to a conclusion. His sense of humour was a Joy! He was like a high mountain, strong, always there, but never conquered, filled with unexpected heights and depths, at times, opening vistas of rare beauty, at times preoccupied with the fogs and mists of the times in which he lived, which he battled and overcame. He was extremely thorough and taught us all a new sense of perfection and attention to detail. He was in close touch with the expenditure of all funds, knew the figures involved with the placing of contracts in all phases of the building of the Shrine of the Báb, as well as the every day expenses of maintaining the World Center of the Bahá’í Faith. He was enthusiastically concerned with Bahá'í statistics, sometimes a fresh listing of figures for publication in the Bahá'í World would have to be re-typed several times as cables arrived with last minute information, changing the number of countries where Bahá'ís resided or where Bahá'í Writings had been translated into another language! We could never appreciate his grasp of all affairs connected with activities at the “grass roots” right on up to the World Center. He had the ability to scan reading matter and pick out the significant kernels of information. He most certainly had a wide knowledge of the vagaries of human nature through the voluminous correspondence he received over the years. He knew us well, loved us and valued us.

Many there were who dearly loved him and who were in constant touch with him, some would attribute powers to him, which he, in his own words, - “did not claim to possess.” However, the facts speak for themselves, he was far beyond our ken, he drew us to him like a magnet. We longed for his approval, to those fortunate enough to be Bahá'ís during his Guardianship, it was like a personal treasure, yet there was enough for all the friends, a veritable spring, flowing and never ending.

In this attempt to paint a word-picture of such a precious “Sign of God” on earth, the record should include a tribute to his wife and constant companion, whom he designated a hand of the Cause of God, Amatu'l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánúm, who shared the burden of his responsibility. She became his extra “hands and feet” and drank deeply with him the joys and griefs commensurate with the high station bestowed upon Shoghi Effendi according to the terms outlined in the Will of Abdu'l-Bahá. Their personal relationship was the secret of their own hearts, suffice to say that when their eyes met, the message conveyed was deep and meaningful, this exchange brought joy to the heart of the observer. It was obvious that Shoghi Effendi placed great value on her loyalty and devotion, one might almost say, “to one to whom much is given, much is expected.” She never faltered in her destined path.

Love for the blessed Guardian was the “spring” from which the words contained in this tribute flowed, co-mingled with respect reverence and appreciation, also, an overwhelming desire to bring the Bahá'ís close to the “heat and fire” of this unique man who became the first Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith. As one Bahá'í remarked while visiting the grave of Shoghi Effendi, who was attending the World Conference held in London in 1963 - “As wonderful as the Conference is, I'd give it all up just to have had one glimpse of the beloved Guardian.

He left us too soon, too suddenly, yet at what time would we have been ready to think of a world without his overshadowing presence, the comfort of knowing he was there to guide us on our destined way. Yet, it was Shoghi Effendi that often reminded us that his was “God's Cause” - and - “God doeth as He Willeth.” If the Guardian could give us a strong cord to hold on to, it could well be - “rest assured and persevere.” The greatest honor we can give his memory is to dedicate our hearts, minds and resources to bring about the ultimate victory of our beloved Faith. It may be near, it may be far and though we may not be fully aware of it, we, the Bahá'í Community are living in the shelter of the "Golden Age" as foretold by our Founders, our immediate aim is to share it with our fellow human beings as soon as possible.

A well known author, (Dimitri Marianoff) said: " The Guardian has a blessed pen!" We, and future generations have inherited the fruits of his pen, of his life, he was truly ours from 1921 until 1957, our true brother, Shoghi, so often and so lovingly remembered in our prayers and in our inmost hearts.

As John Stuart Mill said: One person with a belief is equal to a force of ninety-nine who have only interests."

The mysterious unfolding of an individual's experience in this physical existence is as normal as day and night, yet as exciting as the discovery of a new element. As human beings we have so much in common, but no two of us follow exact patterns in our lives. Why are certain ones touched with the ability to create great masterpieces in art, music, invention and science? The greater number come and go, leaving hardly a ripple on the surface of the pool of humanity. It has been said: "God must have loved the common people, he made so many of them!" Somewhere in between are the un-common ones, they are not the "genius" type nor in the slip-in and slip-out category. They are the people of the "book", the seekers after truth. Like a scarlet thread in a tapestry, they run through the pages of history as the ones who believed, the believers in God to such a degree that they recognize His Manifestations.

Such was my fate to discover the Bahá'í Faith, to believe in Bahá'u'lláh, the Manifestation for this day. As one of the ordinary individuals it was my joy and happiness to find a goal that lifted me out of my everyday routine and eventually led me into an experience that was the highlight of my life.

The great depression of 1929 in the United States was a time of testing, all material security was temporarily swept away, it was a period of self-appraisal and a probing of values. Either you lost something never to be regained or you gained something never to be lost! The latter applied to my situation, through the bounty of God the spiritual values emerged as the only ones that mattered, in 1933 my search ended when I heard of the Bahá'í Faith. Here was the answer to all human needs. Later I found this quote in Nabíl's Narrative of the early days of the Bahá'í Revelation: "Be thankful to God for having enabled you to recognize His Cause. Whoever has received this blessing must, prior to his acceptance, have performed some deed which, though he himself was unaware of its character, was ordained by God as a means whereby he has been guided to find and embrace the truth." I was anxious to share this wonderful discovery with all I encountered and found myself spreading the word before I knew what it was actually all about.

Among the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh, the Manifestation of God for this day, is a work entitled, "The Seven Valleys and the Four Valleys" describing the experiences of a true seeker. In retrospect I noted that I had already walked through the valley of search and had entered the valley of wonderment. While wandering in this valley, I looked at a new world with new eyes and began my life-long education. Each individual, regardless of race, creed color or nationality can be in the process of searching after truth, when it is found it answers all needs and forms a strong basis for a wholesome, fruitful life. A point to consider is the fact that so many seem to pass by the truth without seeing it. Jesus said: "Many are called but few are chosen." Also, when the truth is found, some can only take a spoonful, some a cupful and some submerge themselves entirely. The faithful ones, step by step, progress toward their goal through lifes storms and strifes, never turning aside, confident and inspiring confidence - adding their share to the heritage produced by those who had gone before.

Many ages have come and gone and much acquired knowlege has accumulated as this account is written, still more has to be learned and assimulated in the field of human relationships.

No century heretofore has experienced change to the extent this twentieth century has witnessed. God's Plan for the human race will evolve and materialize in spite of the apathy or unwillingness onthe part of the body politic. As stated in the Bahá'í Writings, "O Son of Being! Bring thyself to account each day ere thou art summoned to a reckoning; for death, unheralded, shall come upon thee and thou shalt be called, to give account for thy deeds" From, The Hidden Words, revealed by Bahá'u'lláh, #31.

A UNIQUE BAHÁ'Í EXPERIENCE.

While on a tour of the White Mountains of New Hampshire in 1932, at a natural beauty spot called Lost River, our party was joined by two girls from Montreal, Canada. As we were guided through this famous place, I became especially attracted to one of them, though both were very interesting. I had a summer cold at the time and going in and out of cold, stony caves soon caused me to wait while others went through. After a while, one of the young ladies asked me if I would hold her large pocket-book while she investigated every crook and cranny. We all dispersed after this tour and at the next point of interest, Indian Leap, our group decided to have our picnic lunch. As we two girls started to spread our lunch, our two escorts went exploring, when they returned they said they had met the girls again and that this was their first trip through the mountains, so they had invited them to follow us for the rest of the day. The girls were having lunch in the next town and said they would wait there and join us as we came along. We were somewhat offended with our escorts, to think they already had two girls and seemed to want two more! However we summoned up our good graces and sure enough, they were waiting by the curb as we came along. The top was down on our convertible and we called out, "come on Montreal, let's go." At the next point of interest both cars stopped and introductions were made all around. Their names were Rosemary Gillis and Mary Maxwell. During the day we enjoyed their company and when we came to the city of Dover, New Hampshire, the parting of our ways, we called out "so long, Montreal." Mary jammed on her brakes and said, "wait a minute." She came over to our car and said, "surely we will meet again, telling us that she would be at a summer school, called "Greenacre" in Eliot, Maine, near Portsmouth, New Hampshire for the next few weeks, why not come and visit her there. About two weeks later, our group planned a beach picnic and decided to see that lovely girl again and see if she would care to join us for our cook-out. As we drove onto the grounds I said, "Oh dear, this is one of those religious places," and wasn't so sure I was glad we had come, after inquiring at the desk, we were told that Miss Maxwell was giving a talk and would be through shortly. At that time there was a dock built out on the river and we wandered down to pass the time while waiting. I recall saying I had left my pocket-book exposed on the shelf of the car, and a young man nearby remarked, "it will be perfectly safe here." Mary was pleased with our invitation and we had another good time together. Our friendship grew and though I did not see her again that summer we corresponded during the ensuing year. How could I possibly know that meeting this lovely girl would change my entire life.

The next summer, when she came to Green Acre, she contacted me and said she wanted me to meet her mother who was staying at the Rockingham Hotel, Portsmouth, New Hampshire. I was most certainly impressed with this beautiful lady and her daughter, by this time I realized that they had something different than most people I had come in contact with. I invited Mary to come and visit me in Haverhill, Massachusetts, where I lived. After lunch together I impulsively asked her to stay overnight. We had no home phone, so we went to a nearby drugstore, both getting in the phone booth and called her mother so she would not worry. After retiring, we talked of many things until she asked to be excused in order to say her prayers. It was then I got up the courage to ask her about her religious belief.

During previous visits to Green Acre, I had been asked if I were a Bahá'í, a name which meant nothing to me at the time. In fact, religion was considered such a personal matter that one seldom raised the subject in social contacts. After knowing Mary better, I was told that in those days the Faith wasn't mentioned to a person until that person has expressed himself regarding his views on racial problems, prejudices, if any, towards other religions etc. In fact It was not until the second summer of my friendship with Mary that I even heard of the Bahá'í Faith.

Mrs. Maxwell and Mary invited me to visit them in Montreal and circumstances developed that enabled me to accept their invitation and stay in that city for about three months. Two weeks of that period was spent as a guest in the Maxwell home. After that, I spent some part of each day in their home until my departure. If Mary was absent, I had precious hours with her mother talking of the Bahá'í Faith. How many wintry evenings I would be with her and as I left to return where I was living, she would bundle up warmly and walk to the corner of Pine Avenue West and Guy Street, then, not having finished our conversation, we would retrace our steps to her front door, only to continue walking back and forth several times. In retrospect, I can still hear the squeaky snow under our feet as the murmur of our voices mingled with the night sounds. It was a precious and loving experience.

As the New Year approached, one of the Bahá'ís, Fred Schofflocher, opened his gracious home for a New Year party, to be held immediately after the Bahá'í Unity Feast. Since I was not a Bahá'í, I could not attend the Feast, and as it became later and later, I thought they had forgotten to call for me as planned. I thought the New Year would roll in without me! Later, when I became a Bahá'í I found out that the Feast can be quite prolonged if a lot of business has to be taken care of. It wasn't until quite a few years later that the beloved Guardian instructed us to hold the Feasts during the Bahá'í day which starts at sunset of one day and carries over to sunset of the next day. When Mary did come to get me, it was a pleasure to drive through the snowy city full of sparkling lights, to enjoy the hospitality of Freddy, as he was affectionately known, then - as we were on our way home, we passed a Shrine where long lines of people carrying lighted candles made their way up toward the flood-lighted building creating the effect of flickering diamonds.

Young as Mary was when I met her in 1932, she was already a dedicated Bahá'í and longed to serve her beloved Faith in a meaningful way. She had been to Haifa twice before I knew her and had been in the presence of Shoghi Effendi both times. In fact, the entire Maxwell family were devoted to the beloved Guardian, and their distinguished services to the Bahá'í Faith are examples of their devotion.

Mary had written to Shoghi Effendi asking him to advise her in which way she could best serve the Faith. He replied that, if possible, she should go to Germany, learn the language so she could give Bahá'í talks in public and help with the teaching effort in that country. It was while I was a guest in their home, after dinner one evening, that Mrs, Maxwell asked me to excuse them for a while. She said they were going to retire to a room upstairs together and pray for guidance on a matter that had arisen. Afterward I found out that they did not have the funds to send Mary to Germany as Shoghi Effendi had suggested, and by praying they hoped to receive guidance. I was very impressed with this action and wished this same thing could take place in my family. Eventually the way opened and Mary did leave for Germany, where that country was going through such agony. She did learn the language and was very helpful in teaching the Faith there. This language became so useful to her after she married the Guardian, as many many refugees from Germany came to Palestine to make new homes and open various types of business.

Mary was a lovely girl and it was always exciting to be with her. She once said that “life with her mother was never commonplace,” I believe that to be true of Mary, even to this day! The household in which she was raised was unique, her father, William S. Maxwell, was a gentleman of the old school, endowed with many virtues and talents, he was so gentle, courteous, had a ready wit and a generous portion of the “love of beauty.” Their home reflected his good taste in beautiful “objets d’art”. It was a great pleasure to be in their home when they entertained, socially, they were so gracious and hospitable. Mrs. Maxwell had a “way” with all individuals, especially in her relations with young people. She was young with them and they were at ease with her, enjoying her company. This was the atmosphere in which Mary spent her youthful life.

Some of my happiest memories stem from that period in Montreal. Up to this time, my life had been a work-a-day, uneventful routine, Mary planned many pleasant activities for me, each day we spent some time together, our ties of friendship grew strong, finally, the day came when I must return home and pick up the threads of my life. Mrs. Maxwell had been so kind to me, she made me feel like another daughter and took us on many happy excursions. The morning when I planned to leave came, I had stayed in the Maxwell home on my last night in Montreal, both mother and daughter went to the bus station with me for our last farewells. It was hard for me to leave, later, when I opened my purse to surrender my bus ticket, I found a most loving note from Mary tucked therein, she said we had become like sisters during my stay in that city. It was evident that Mary was the “apple” of her parents eyes and that her youthful years were quite carefree. This was the bounty of God, I am sure, her future was to have very serious aspects at times, as shown by the following copy of a letter that Mrs, Maxwell shared with me: -

Excerpts from a letter of Rúhíyyih Khánúm to her Mother, dated February 6, 1938.

“The Americans are already swamped in personalities, as a nation, and the Bahá’ís are also terribly personality conscious. Please do not let them follow their natural inclinations and fasten their thoughts on my personality. It would be a great, great pity, and if you share any of my thoughts with them, let it be this one: we Americans are adolescent, and I assure you, in my short year’s experience near the Guardian, I have come to realize that this is no time for people to go wandering around in a set of lovely and pleasant dreams. They should take to heart, Bahá'ís as well as humanity, that an “unforeseen calamity” is following them. I don't mean that they should be frightened, but we, all of us, should be preparing our souls for the tests which are bound to come to us as well as to all mankind. This is something I feel too deeply for words,”

I feel very keenly that instead of the people saying that I was destined from birth to become the wife of the Guardian, or that I am so fitted, so qualified.....they should be praying I fulfill my task as a representative from the west. They should ask what my life is like, and is its discipline a symbol of the discipline they need and will get. They should turn their thoughts to the Guardian and to no one else on earth, and associate no one in thought with him, and study him, and ask themselves what their faults are as American Bahá'ís, where our weaknesses lie, what in our personalities, or in the Body of us as believers, are vulnerable points which when attacked and tested may not be strong enough to withstand and protect us. I am very serious about this. I assure you my time is not spent in trying to enjoy life and skimming along as a young married woman usually does - on the contrary, I am realizing just how serious one lifetime spent in the Faith should be. The greatest fallacy in America is this, ‘Life, Liberty and the pursuit of happiness’. It is bad medicine for people to go on thinking that either liberty or happiness, or even life itself is the thing to be pursued, especially at this time. Steadfastness, character, devotion, loyalty and faith are what I am now pursuing hot-footed. And I am not a bit unhappy! On the contrary, I like it! I think you, yourself, laid the bedrock of my faith when you told me that I should have such a belief in this Cause, that if you - my spiritual and physical Mother, left it, I would remain firm. It marked a turning point in my life when you said that to me! If I sacrifice for the Cause - the Guardian is drawn and quartered for it. So it seems to me the friends should, ‘stiffen their characters.’ That is what Shoghi Effendi says he is doing to me, and I feel much improved by it, I assure you!”

“If I can be an instrument perhaps to help the friends realize more about the Guardian, if they see things as they in reality are, never if they just let themselves go the way of our national habits, which is to eulogize some personality and get no further. I was thinking today in the Shrine, we may surround the Guardian and through our human relations feel close to him, but in reality we are like earth around alily - is there any close kinship between the wonderful flower and the earth at its feet?”

.. “The Cause of God, in Haifa, is like a kettle boiling all the time! and by this I do not mean the Guardian, he and all of us are enmeshed in something whose power is irresistible. Of course it manifests itself through him, through his decisions, but the atmosphere is like that. At first I felt like something under pressure but now I am getting (so) used to it that I am astounded at myself!”

least to me he is a mystery and the result of my observations is that a Guardian is a, touchstone applied to us all the time There is no more dangerous maze for people to begin to wander in that the subject of the “personality” of either the Guardian, or the Master, or even the Manifestation. I do not doubt that Shoghi Effendi has his own personality and temperament, but I believe it useless to say “this is it, or this is not it”, because even his personality, I believe, is used in the grip of his station or the Will of God to test us. In other words, even the personality is shaped to further the interests of the Cause. It’s a wonderful subject to think about.”

“The Guardian Is training both my character and my soul. With all the richness of my life, I had outlived it and now here, in the presence of our own so dearly loved and long-beloved Guardian, he is training me with patience, with love, and yet with iron determination, and I have the assurance that he will make of me, if I will let him, what I should and can be. We get from Shoghi Effendi what we let come out! It is something in us that draws it out. It is a spiritual law. Just think, Bahá’u’lláh knew that hidden language and script all the time, even referred to it, but no one asked Him so He never gave it out.”

(Mrs. Maxwell enclosed these excerpts in a letter to me after I became a Bahá’í and was living in Worcester, Mass.)

By this time I was determined to study the Bahá’í Faith so that I would be qualified for acceptance. Mrs. Maxwell wrote a friend of her’s in the Boston area to find out who was the Bahá’í nearest me. It proved to be Lorna Tasker, in Beverly, Massachusetts. I called on her and she told me of a meeting soon to be held in Salem, Massachusetts.

In my correspondence with Mary, I had told her of personal problems in my life interfering with my study of the Faith, she suggested I write to Shoghi Effendi. Later I realized how bold I was to do this, however, I did write to him and opened my heart. His reply brought me so much hope and comfort. Mary had asked me to send her a copy of his reply, and wrote that she was very pleased with the fact that he addressed me as if I were already a mature Bahá’í. In his own handwriting he said: “ he would pray that these obstacles be removed from my path, that I should deepen in the Faith in order to help in the teaching effort and to rest assured and to persevere.

How surprised the Bahá’ís were at the meeting in Salem to learn that I already had a letter from Shoghi Effendi and was not yet a registered Bahá’í. The firm I was working for had decided to move to Worcester, Massachusetts, and much to my surprise there were two ladies from Worcester at that meeting. I had already found out that there was a Bahá’í Community in that city, and intended to make my declaration there. Needless to say, these two ladies were most gracious in their offer to help me settle in this city. Mrs. Florence Morton opened her home to me and was responsible for finding me a most pleasant place to live. As soon as I was settled in, I notified the Bahá’ís of my intention to join the Faith.

The Bahá'í Center was in a public building in the downtown area of Worcester. The Local Spiritual Assembly set a date for me to meet with them. I was asked to wait outside in the hall until the proper place on the agenda. When I entered I was asked the basic questions, then asked to wait in the hall while they voted. (Some different from today when this is written.) How happy I was when I found I was accepted. Then began a period of learning, deepening and experiencing, it was wonderful to have the guidance and loving understanding of the friends. Later on I was elected to the Local Spiritual Assembly which carried on the local affairs of the Bahá'í Community. Along about this time the Bahá'í Administration was unfolding under the guidance of Shoghi Effendi. I recall a visit with Millie Collins after she returned from Palestine, telling us of her meetings with Shoghi Effendi and bringing some of his instructions. She especially emphasized complete abstinence from alcohol, a Bahá'í Law which the Americans did not seem to take to seriously, she said we shouldn't even use it in cooking or eat candy which had alcoholic content. We Bahá'ís were beginning to realize that we had a strong Guardian and took comfort from this fact.

The news of the marriage of Shoghi Effendi and Mary Maxwell in March 1937 was announced while I was in Worcester. It was a complete surprise to everyone and a very happy union for the East and the West. In my immaturity, I felt desolated as I had expected to go pioneering with Mary after her German assignment was completed. We had often talked of going to Haiti, she loved the black race and believed we could accomplish something for the Faith in that country. When I wrote to Mary to offer my congratulations, I told her that due to her new station in life I felt our friendship would be on a different basis than heretofore. She replied that our friendship was like a circle, it had no beginning and no end! This heartened me considerably. I became convinced that our paths would cross again, somehow, somewhere.

Meanwhile the Bahá'ís were very much involved in the "Seven Year Plan" initiated by Shoghi Effendi to coincide with the ending of the first Bahá'í Century, in 1944. One objective was to have a Local Spiritual Assembly in every state of the United States. In 1941 I was a member of the New England Regional Committee, which covered all six states. In December 1941 the United States was attacked at Pearl Harbor and this changed my life, I was working for a company that manufactured shoes with rubber soles and we were notified that due to the war effort all rubber stocks would be confiscated, I could see that I would soon lose my position. It was just about this time that the Regional Committee planned to come to Worcester for their meeting. I went to the center early to prepare for their coming and the first to arrive was the secretary, she exclaimed - "all the New England States are covered except Vermont, if only someone could go to Vermont!" I spoke up and said, "I'll go," then I looked around and said, "who said that!" After discussion with the committee members they chose Brattleboro, Vermont as the objective, it was located in the southeast corner of the state and over the border in New Hampshire were a few scattered Bahá'ís who would support the activities in Brattleboro.

Mrs. Florence Morton very graciously offered to drive me, with my few possessions, to my post and she remained with me until I found a place to stay. Before she returned home she bought me a nice radio which shows what kind of a parson she was. She also was willing to subsidize me so that I could devote my full time working for the Faith. After a few months, I found I was not meeting people and felt I would have more opportunities if I obtained a position, which is the way it worked out. I was so grateful for her loving assistance and know she helped the Faith financially in many ways. Blessings on people like her!

It was all so new to me, trying to locate a suitable place to hold meetings, planning publicity, finding a few challenges and criticisms along the way. The small group of Bahá'ís in Hinsdale, N.H., just a short distance from Brattleboro, were loyal and devoted and supported all my activities. They were so glad to have a new Bahá'í contact to stimulate renewed interest in the Faith in that area.

Anyone who has tried to teach the Faith will agree that after an initial attempt, one has to settle down with a great deal of patience to await results, keeping busy meanwhile. It is like planting a garden, there is the preparation of the soil, the seeding, then the right conditions for growth, nurturing and finally the fruit. In the innocence of being an undeveloped Bahá'í, such as I was, you start out on a pioneering mission believing that the seeking souls are there and also that your every contact has a Bahá'í meaning. At least that was my attitude. This led me into a series of adventures, both good and bad. As an example, I entered into a friendship with a woman held in high esteem in the community, only to find out she was using this friendship to deceive her husband, saying she was with me when she was not. When I found this out, that was the end of her as a prospect for the Bahá'í Faith, she was only interested in her own ends.

At a book meeting in the Library, which I attended in the hope of meeting new prospects, a local minister was present. When he learned that I was a Bahá'í, he remarked that "I was undoubtedly attracted to the semantics involved!" At this point, I was not well enough informed to do verbal battle with a man of his background. (The day came when he resigned his pulpit and became a psychiatrist at a mental institution.)

Late that summer, Ruth Moffatt, (a very well known travelling Bahá'í teacher) notified me that she would be in Brattleboro, asking me to arrange a public meeting!! I plunged ahead with plans, arranging the meeting place, having notices printed to mail out and obtaining newspaper publicity. Our town had a "welcome Hostess" so I asked her if she could provide a mailing list, explaining what it was for. An interesting sidelight on this list was that I later found out that she had not put any Catholic names on it.

The Bahá'ís in this area supported this meeting and the publicity brought in a few inquirers with the result that Mrs. Moffatt considered this fertile ground, she obtained permission from the National Teaching Committee to return to Brattleboro for a weeks intensive teaching. What a week that was! We contacted several service clubs to see if they would like a speaker for any of their meetings, most were booked up for the period that Ruth would be in town. However, the local Kiwanis Club said they had an opening as a speaker had disappointed them for their dinner meeting. Since these service clubs did not permit talks on religion in those days, Ruth submitted several titles to choose from, they decided on "The Destiny of America" and gave her fifteen minutes to present this subject! The president of this club was Benjamin D. Weeden and this was his first exposure to the words, 'Bahá'í Faith', he later accepted this Faith, still later he was called to Haifa, Israel at the request of the beloved Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, where he served with distinction until ill health caused him to return to the United States.

Mrs. Moffatt had an excellent background, some people were especially interested in the fact that she had attended the forming of the League of Nations in Geneva, Switzerland. It was the custom of Mrs. Moffatt to advertize her talks on subjects of general interest, then have an intermission and invite all present to remain to hear about the Bahá'í Faith. It was my function to keep things running smoothly and one evening while she was speaking about the League of Nations, I noted a man in the hall outside of the meeting room, he had walked past the door several times, frankly staring in. I decided to invite him in, when I approached him, he said, "the most astonishing thing has happened, here I am in a small hotel in this remote town and I hear the name of my best friend mentioned when passing this door!" He was Rene Kraus, an author, who had come to a place where he was unknown to have peace and quiet for a book he was writing on the life of Winston Churchill. He did not wish to come in but asked me to come and get him when the meeting was over and Mrs. Moffatt was free to talk with him. They reminisced until the wee small hours. We never know who is listening!

There were some fruitful results from her visit and slowly we began to formulate our plans for a Local Spiritual Assembly. I was exhausted after this week of strenuous activity, I think I slept for almost three days, I had never seen a person with such vitality, Mrs. Moffatt did not retire any night during her stay until well after midnight.

When we realized that the date was drawing near when we must have an Assembly, we appealed to the National Teaching Committee for help and soon Bahá'ís began to move in assist us in obtaining our goal. The Brattleboro Local Spiritual Assembly was formed in April 1943 and there were only two so-called native believers, Edith Newcomb and Fred Hoffman. There has been an Assembly there ever since that date even though their numbers diminished at times.

Fred Hoffman was a staunch member of the local Methodist Church and a hard worker for it, how he labored on those church suppers! He had attended some of Ruth's meetings and we followed up with him after she left. You can imagine how I felt when he phoned and asked to see me, his first question was, - "how do I become a member of the Bahá'í Faith." I told him to get a transfer from his church to the Bahá'í Community, since I was the only resident.

Bahá'í this amused him, however I assured him there would be more. The Methodist Church was very sorry to lose him and tried to have him change his mind, he never wavered in his decision and became a devoted believer. In order to meet people I joined several groups, one being a Nutrition Class and that is where I met Mrs. Newcomb, she became interested, studied and later joined our Community.

Many fine Bahá'í speakers came to help the teaching effort in Brattleboro, to mention some, Dorothy Baker, William DeForge, Charles Krug, 'Alí Kuli Khán, Professor Glenn Shook of Wheaton College. Mr. Krug, who had met 'Abdu'l-Bahá when He was in New York City, came several times. Each time a speaker came we would mail out publicity to the mailing list we had on hand. The father of Charles Krug was in Haifa at the time of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's passing and was the one who closed those precious eyes. His name was Florian Krug, a famous New York City doctor.

On one occasion Kr. Krug chose the subject, "Life after Death" this was the first meeting that Benjamin Weeden attended although he had received notices of former meetings. He came because he had just lost his mother. After the meeting he asked me if we had any books on the Faith, music to my ears as he was very well known in Brattleboro and a most distinguished gentleman. I suggested that he stop in the bank where I was working and I would have some literature for him there. That was the beginning of our friendship, and we became constant companions and studied the Bahá'í books together. The first book he chose surprised me, Bahá'í Administration, he spent hours studying and because of the choice English in the writings of the beloved Guardian, he purchased a new dictionary in order to more fully understand Shoghi Effendi's writings. On page 197 of "The Priceless Pearl" Rúhíyyih Khánum writes, - "In his (Shoghi Effendi) translations of the Bahá'í writings, and above all in his own compositions, Shoghi Effendi set a standard that educates and raises the cultural level of the reader at the same time that it feeds his mind and soul with thoughts and truth." In 1952, when Ben and I were travelling around the United States telling the Bahá'ís about our experiences with the beloved Guardian, I recall a lady saying, "I don't understand the writings of Shoghi Effendi very well but I know he is a writer of long sentences!"

Ben also purchased a new Bible, like most new Bahá'ís there is a thirst for knowledge of our spiritual heritage, especially as one of the principles of the Bahá'í Faith is the "oneness of religion," Prior to his becoming a Bahá'í, Ben had studied many religious and philosophical books which made a good foundation for his recognition of Bahá'u'lláh as the Prophet for today. One evening when we were on our way to a Bahá'í meeting, Ben had been reading his Bible that day and he said "did you know that Moses had the first zipper?" I looked at him in surprise? Yes, he said, "he had his wife, Zippora!"

As Bill Sears said, "God loves laughter."

That first Local Spiritual Assembly in Brattleboro was composed of very different personalities, none of us had much administrative experience. We again appealed to the National Teaching Committee for help and they sent a mature Bahá'í with the Bahá'í Administration under his arm, a book we already had but didn't seem to know how to put into action, he didn't help us very much either. By this time Ben had become the tenth member of our community. He used to tease us saying he had nine people working for him! At the next Annual Meeting and Bahá'í election, Ben became a member of the Local Spiritual Assembly and I was elected chairman. In running the meetings, I was prepared to think that love conquered all, but the fact was, I was a very poor chairman, while Ben had a lot of administrative experience. How he must have suffered, I just do not see how he contained himself, he used to walk me home after the meetings and tried tactfully to tell me the functions of a chairman and how to control the meetings. At first I would be reduced to tears, even though I knew it was for the good of the Cause. Sometimes he would say, "you people just don't know how to run a meeting." Finally I said to him, "you are one of us now, so don't say you people, we are a unity, at least we are trying." Our friendship survived these discussions and I was determined to show him I could improve. Again referring to our travels around the United States, we found this same problem in many Bahá'í Communities. Things are much different now, I am sure.

Suddenly I realized that this friendship was not good for the reputation of the Faith, seeing so much of each other without it leading to marriage and I could see it bothered Ben also. He felt that it was too late in his life to start a new career and that he didn't have the income to support two people. We had talked about this problem, I also knew the local Bahá'ís were concerned. I loved Ben very much, he had such a beautiful character and such high ideals but it didn't seem to me that this love was reciprocated.

After praying for guidance, the way opened for action. A gift of money from an unexpected source prompted me to write to Rúhíyyih Khánum in November 1946, suggesting that we meet somewhere in Europe for a re-union, not having seen each other for over ten years. After that I would return to the United States and find a new pioneer post. She advised me that it would be impossible for her to leave the beloved Guardian but hopefully something would develop.

We had many tests and trials during the early days after forming our community, some Bahá'ís who came in to support us had to leave for one reason or another. They couldn't find work, or, as in one case had to return to their former state or lose their pension. There was quite a turnover, I personally felt that bringing in Bahá'ís from the outside was not the best policy.

Before I found a small apartment in Brattleboro, I lived in the Hotel Brooks for a month. During this sojourn I became acquainted with some of the regular guests plus two of the desk clerks. I had the opportunity to tell them what brought me to Brattleboro.

In the apartment building I found that I had several ladies as neighbors, I noticed that they were interested in my comings and goings. I decided to invite them to a buffet supper and tell them why I was there. They were always very nice to me after that but never showed any interest in the Faith.

I had been advised that a Bahá'í would be arriving on the New York train which stopped in Brattleboro at three o'clock in the morning, I had booked a room for her at the Hotel Brooks. The next morning I went up to greet her, I inquired at the desk if she had arrived safely, the clerk looked at me rather strangely, and said "is she one of your gang!" To say I had misgivings would be putting it mildly. This poor woman had the right spirit but she surely added to our problems. She had all her earthly possessions in a large duffle bag, including her cooking pots.

Needless to state that she did not fit into the scene and left after a period of a few months.

One of the Bahá'ís who came was black and caused quite a stir as I believe she was the first black to come and live there. She had difficulties at first but she was an excellent tailoress and obtained a position in the best department store in town and soon people were praising her work and the curiosity died down.

Imagine the joy and trepidation I experienced when I received the following cable in January 1947: - "Guardian approves your coming Haifa prolonged visit cable if you can arrange arrive early March dearest love. Rúhíyyih," I immediately cabled my acceptance and started to make my plans. It was difficult to arrange the trip so shortly after the war, the military had precedence for plane travel, the travel agency reluctantly secured passage for me on the "Marine Carp" a troop ship that had not been converted for civilian travel. It was the only way to get to Haifa at that particular time and I would sleep in a dormitory for twenty-four women. It really didn't matter to me, I believed I could stand anything just to get there. A visitors visa had been procured for me in Haifa and soon all the necessary documents were in order and I was ready to leave for New York City and expected to sail on March 1st, 1947.

I had contacted the National Spiritual Assembly and they had relieved me of my duties as pioneer to Brattleboro and supplied me with credentials to help me on my way. The night before I was to leave town the Bahá'ís gave me a farewell party and a gift of money. Ben walked me home as usual although I had asked him not to as I was feeling very low at the thought of leaving him. When we got to my door he suddenly took me in his arms and said:- "I just can't bear having you go out of my life like this!" I burst into tears and said this is a fine time to tell me when I am leaving for a war-torn country for an indefinite stay? With that, I invited him in and we talked about it and decided to say nothing about this development for a while and pray for guidance. I was so upset I didn't want him to help me to the train the next morning, I knew I would weep at this parting. However, he insisted on seeing me off and I wept most of the way to New York City! That evening he phoned and said it was like looking down the wrong end of telescope, I was getting smaller and smaller!

The Bahá'ís of New York City were so kind to me taking me around and showing me the city, taking me to Art Galleries, Museums and a variety of restaurants. Each day I had to phone the steamship office to check on the sailing date, it had been delayed several times, eventually they said we would sail on the 15th of March. I had been worried that I would not get to Haifa in March as had been requested, the passage would take fifteen days. Some of the Bahá'ís said I would be a secretary for Shoghi Sffandl, however I didn't believe this to be possible, my work had been as a bookkeeper, I did not have secretarial skills. When I knew I was going to Haifa, I tried to empty my head as to why I was asked and what I would be doing. My only idea was that I might be a companion to Rúhíyyih Khánúm and perhaps do household chores. I was willing to wait and see what happened.

On the morning of March 15th I took a taxi to Pier # 84 in the North River feeling a bit lost. I must admit my spirits sank when I saw the accommodations, the bunks were so close that if you turned over in the night you could end up in the next bunk, I had one advantage.

I was on the end of a row so had only one occupant next to me to consider. There were approximately five-hundred passengers on this ship with only one small lounge, very sparsely furnished, it was more like a bar. Our deck had no portholes, at night the creaking and groaning of the ship made you wonder if it would stand the trip.

After leaving New York City and had entered the Gulf Stream, it became very stormy, many of the passengers were seasick, this sickness makes people so ill they become more like animals than humans, for two days the ship was in a terrible condition. Even the lavatories were "troop ship" rows of units without the privacy of doors.

Needless to say, the plumbing at this time was not functioning properly, just like the people and there was always foul water sloshing back and forth as the ship wallowed through the storm. After the storm, when we emerged into the sunlight, order was somewhat restored, but there wasn't much supervision by the ship's officers and some of the passengers had too much to drink and bothered the other passengers.

I made friends with a young Jewish girl who had been sent to Palestine during the rise of the Nazi regime in Germany, her mother had gone to relatives in New York City during the war. After the war, Miriam had come to be with her mother, however, she had fallen in love with Palestine and wanted to return thereto live. Hence she was cutting all family ties to make a new life for herself. She was an artist and made many interesting sketches and her company helped me to bear the discomforts aboard. Later on, I was in Jerusalem on business for Shoghi Effendi and met Miriam on the street and she invited me to come to see her home. She had taken over an abandoned house in a dangerous zone and made it into her studio. She was a talented sculptress as well as a painter and later had her own one-man show in Tel-Aviv.

The first port of call for the "Marine Carp" was Beirut, Lebanon, the night before our arrival there was a ship's concert of sorts. Three groups predominated the passenger list, Greeks, Arabs and Jews. The Greeks had been in the United States for treatment of injuries sustained in the war, especially for facial wounds, there were those who had severe damage to the eyes and who could not be helped, they were blinded for life, nevertheless they performed in the traditional Greek dances, then the Arab group presented their program, lastly, the Jewish people, when they began to talk politics saying what they had done for Palestine, the Arabs grabbed the microphone shouting their views, determined to have their say, it became quite a hassle. Soon the ship's officers took control and dispersed the crowd. For the rest of the night an ominous silence settled over the ship and we were all thankful when dawn came and no more trouble erupted.

As we approached the harbor of Beirut, a wave of humid air filled with the fragrance of orange blossoms greeted us, after twelve days at sea, the land was indeed a welcome sight. Those of us who had no transit visas had to stay aboard, some of us had not been inoculated for cholera and had to have this done by the ship's doctor before reaching Haifa. Although we could not leave the ship, many unauthorized people came aboard and we had to keep a constant watch of our possessions, the ladies in our dormitory took turns guarding the entrance, much was stolen, not from us, but from unwary passengers who went topside without leaving a guard. Small boats came out from shore and confederates on board threw things down to them, when they had a load they went to shore and unloaded then returned for more.

Our ship had docked early in the morning and was due to leave for Haifa at midnight. The crew had shore leave and when they had left there was almost no supervision. All during the daylight hours, we took turns going up on deck, it was fascinating to watch the trading going on between the passengers and the people on the quay. Ropes were tied to the deck rail to draw up the baskets of merchandise offered by the traders, there was a great deal of haggling over prices, it was noisy, exciting and most entertaining.

I was awakened around midnight by the returning crew, from their singing and their voices it was obvious they had spent most of the time in the waterfront cafes. I put a coat on over my pajamas and found a secluded nook where I could watch their antics. Just before we were to leave, a taxi raced up and the driver had to literally drag his passenger aboard. As I turned to go below, I saw a ship's officer and remarked that I hoped we had a sober pilot! He said not to worry, the ship would be on automatic pilot as soon as we cleared the harbour. Someone neglected to raise the gangplank, as we started to pull away, it began breaking up with much creaking and splintering it fell into the harbor. Thank goodness there was a spare on board!

There was not much sleep for me the rest of the night, I knew we would be in Haifa in the morning. I rushed up on deck at the first light to get a look at Mount Carmel, God's Holy Mountain. My reaction was that it was not as high as I expected. I soon learned to respect it when I walked to the top over the old Crusaders Road, which Bi-sected the Bahá'í Gardens in those days. Rúḥíyyih Khánúm and I often rode to the top of the mountain and then walked back down the mountain, the view of the Bahá'í Gardens and the City of Haifa, with 'Akká across the Bay and the snow-covered top of Mount Hermon in the distance, was superb.

The "Marine Carp" had anchored during the night out at the breakwater. Landing formalities took up most of the morning, it was nearly noon before I left the ship. Mr. Maxwell, Rúḥíyyih Khánúm's father, was there to greet me and to help me through customs. Being very naive regarding ship's travel, I was surprised when I was taken to a small room and examined quite thoroughly to see if I was bringing anything illegal into Palestine. I did have a small sum of British Pounds in my purse, as I had expected at first to fly via London, these were confiscated, later I picked up the equivalent in Palestine Pounds at a bank. The bulk of my luggage was held over until the next day. I was astonished to see all the evidences of war, there were barbed wire barricades and sentry's everywhere, the sky over the oil refinery located in the plains outside the city was filled with oily black smoke, the oil tanks having been set on fire in an act of sabotage. When I went back to the port to clear my luggage through the customs, the rain began to pour down as I approached a sentry box at the first barricade. The soldier on duty invited me to step inside the sentry box until the shower was over. My sense of strangeness soon evaporated when I noted that someone had written on the wall, "Kilroy was here!" The only duty I had to pay was for some neckties I had brought for Mr, Maxwell as a gift from his niece.

After getting off the ship and leaving the Port, Mr, Maxwell escorted me to a taxi nearby and within a few minutes we were alighting at #10 Persian Street, which was to be my Haifa home and where Mr. Maxwell lived. At that time it was known as the Western Pilgrim House, my room was at the upper end of the second floor, very pleasant indeed. Who can describe the joy of a reunion with a greatly loved friend, who had become like a sister, after all the years of separation. Rúḥíyyih Khánúm had placed beautiful gifts on my dresser and chest of drawers, stating that these were all mine to keep! After seeing my room, we went downstairs to the dining room for lunch, Mr. Maxwell joined us there. From then on Rúḥíyyih Khánúm usually came over to lunch but many times Mr, Maxwell and I were alone.

Directly after lunch we went by taxi up to the Shrine Gardens, about half-way up Mount Carmel. I was certainly amazed at the beauty that had been created by the beloved Guardian and carried out under his supervision. We went immediately to the entrance of the Shrine of the Báb, leaving our shoes by the door, we entered and approached the threshold of the inner room wherein lie the precious remains of the Báb, Forerunner of our beloved Faith. As I knelt and buried my face in the fresh, fragrant blossoms on that threshold, Rúhíyyih-Khánúm was softly chanting the Tablet of Visitation in Persian, the tears streamed down my face in gratitude and joy at this wonderful privilege. We then visited the Shrine of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, next door in the same building, here again, the beautiful flowers and the same serene atmosphere. Rúhíyyih Khánúm later said that she never felt ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s presence there, it was if He was always away visiting the friends.

Rúhíyyih Khánúm left me to walk down the mountain by myself as she had duties to perform, she wanted me to absorb as much as I could on this, my first visit to the Holy Shrines. As I strolled through the gardens, the gardeners would put their hands over their hearts and give me the Bahá’í greeting, then they would present me with a lovely bouquet, finally my arms were full to overflowing with many beautiful flowers. When I returned to the Pilgrim House, I was literally floating on air, I arranged so many bouquets that my room was like a flower shop.

Soon one of the persian girls came to tell me that Shoghi Effendi was ready to see me. I was really agitated and wondered if I could measure up to meeting such a distinguished and revered person. Then I decided the only thing I could do was to be myself and let him be the judge.

Shoghi Effendi lived at #7 Persian Street, in the house that had been built for Abdu’l-Bahá, it was located diagonally across the Street from the Western Pilgrim House. At the front gate, a pair of tall Cypress trees reared skyward and a verdant vine flourished over the gate, the pathway to the front door was filled with smooth white pebbles and to the right was a small garden, in the center was a fountain pool.

As Khorshid led me up the steps, I noted lovely gardens surrounding the house. We entered a small hall which opened into a much larger hall, turning left was the door to the drawing room where Shoghi Effendi received his guests. As I approached, he arose and greeted me with a handshake and graciously inquired about my journey. I immediately felt the genial warmth of his vibrant, loving manner. He motioned me to a divan across the room, facing him, Rúhíyyih Khánúm was seated to my left on a separate chair. From then on, whenever the beloved Guardian sent for me, we were always seated in these same places. It was so wonderful to meet this charming and delightful personality, whom all the Bahá’ís knew from a distance, but few there were who knew him from personal contact. One of my first thoughts was a sadness that all the friends couldn’t have this rare privilege. In another chapter I relate more about this first meeting and of Shoghi Effendi.

Here I was, in the presence of the great-grandson of Bahá’u’lláh, the appointed Guardian and the “Sign of God” on earth. He asked me what the Bahá’ís in America thought of him, I replied that I knew there was a great love for him, in fact, one Bahá’í told me that Shoghi Effendi knew all about us, even down to the size of our socks! With this remark, he laughed heartily and said:- “ the friends attribute much to me to which I make no claim.” He said many kind things to me, one being that I had become International without ever being National, another, that my “Star” was rising. By this time was like an intoxicated person, so filled with joy and happiness.

After this, he became serious and explained the reason I had been asked to come to Haifa, he spoke of the frailty of Mr Maxwell and how he had done all the mundane chores, getting and sending the mail, meeting with the authorities, lawyers, government officials and so on. I could hardly believe my ears, to think that he did not have a large and competent staff around him! I soon learned why, the Bahá’í Community that had been in Haifa before the war in the streets started had been dispersed, some for nationality, and the members of his own family had, in most cases deserted him. Ha also explained that life wasn’t easy at the International Center at this time and not everyone fitted into the situation. Even the American Bahá’ís that I knew wondered why I was chosen to help out in Haifa. One reason was that I was a long time friend of Rúḥíyyih Khánum and she believed I was trustworthy. Finally he rose, again shook my hands, wished me well and said he would see me again the next day.

During those first few weeks, Shoghi Effendi asked me to report to him each day, I would tell him what I had done, he would comment and advise me. He briefed me on the local situation, feeding me information as fast as I could absorb it. It didn’t take me long to realize how wonderful it was to have a Guardian, he said he would give me a plan for the work I was to do for him, if I found I could not carry it out, I was to report to him in detail, tell him the truth of the matter, then he would give me a new plan of operation. He placed such emphasis on my telling him the truth, that I received the impression that those who had been around him had told him what they thought he wanted to hear rather than what was factual.

My first day and night in Haifa are etched in luminous ink in my memory, so deeply, that I can call it forth, re-live and enjoy it all over again. When I returned to my room that night after dinner, dew had fallen refreshing the greenery, under my window a bed of stock in bloom was pouring out its fragrance, now, whenever I smell this flower, time turns back for me to that beautiful day in my life.

The morning after my arrival in Haifa started with my introduction to my new duties. Dear Mr, Maxwell, so gentle and kind, escorted me to the lower town where the Post Office, many business establishments and some of the Port facilities were located. I was Introduced to the local currency, met the officers of three banks, mailed what letters were ready, sent cables, learned where the offices of Shoghi Effendi’s lawyers were located and so forth.

Barclay’s Bank was British, and in my experience quite formal, the Anglo-Palestine Bank was Jewish and the third was run by Arabs, this last bank closed during the following year. A Mr. Sitton was president of the Anglo-Palestine Bank, (which became my favorite) we became the best of friends, he had a deep respect for Shoghi Effendi and the Bahá'í Faith. I guess he liked Americans also, because he told me to always come to his desk whenever I had any kind of business in the bank. One day I was standing in line at a teller's window to cash a personal American Express check, he saw me, came over taking me by the arm, scolding me, saying, - "Miss Gladys, haven't I told you to always come to my desk?" He never failed to serve me tea or a cool drink and I can truly say I always enjoyed these visits. He had a deep chuckle and a great sense of humor, one day he told me this story, "the three banks in this area all have their own individuality, in the arab bank, their system is so old fashioned that they write items by hand in huge ledgers, they have to carry them from department to department by bicycles! The british bank has so much formality and red tape, if you go in to make a loan, the first payment is due by the time you leave the front door!" Of course, his bank's methods were right up to date, which was certainly true, he always treated me as a "V.I.P." on behalf of Shoghi Effendi and I have many fond memories of my transactions there.

Because of the warm climate, business hours are from early in the morning to one in the afternoon, then everything closes until four, and continued until early evening. I just couldn't get used to the fact that no rain fell from about March 15th until November 15th! I never knew when the growing season was, it seemed to me that the greenery was dying and growing at the sametime. I must say that I loved the tropical flowers and trees, there was a rose tree in the garden that produced the most gorgeous blooms. they were a delicate pink and one bloom would be as large as a small cabbage. People passing by would stop to look and admire it. March was the best month for the wild flowers. The fields and banks of the road would be filled with red anemones, oleanders grew in moist places, wild iris, double narcissus and so many other varieites, too numerous to mention. Herbs grew plentifully in the spring, you would see arab ladies out gathering greens to add to their food supply.

Ben and I exchanged letters once a week, I had so much to tell him, that it took hours to write him a letter. Meantime, things were happening to him, a piece of property that his grandfather had willed him was sold and he was able to re-invest this money which would bring him a better income. This augered well for our future plans to marry. I still had not said anything about this to Rúhíyyih Khánúm.

There were many fascinating things to see as I took my daily walks to town. At the lower end of Persian Street, there was a rather high curved wall, imagine my surprise to discover that a man lived there, he looked like a bundle of rags, each day found him stretched across the sidewalk, his bare feet hanging over the gutter. One either had to step over him or walk in the street, apparently he slept behind the wall. He would hold out his hand, muttering "baksheesh, baksheesh", if you didn't give him anything, he would spat at you. The shops I passed had merchandise such as I had never seen, grains, dried peas, beans in huge burlap bags out on the sidewalk with the tops open, bread was stacked up without any wrappers, all food stuffs displayed in the open air, certainly wasnot sanitary. After our super-markets the shops seemed like holes in the wall, the largest food stores were operated by a british grocery chain called Spinney's. Even these were crude according to our standards.

Due to constant bombing the Post Office moved frequently. During my first year, March 1947 - 1948, there were many uncertainties and unpleasant incidents, It wasn't long after my arrival that Shoghi Effendi said I was to go to Jerusalem on business for him. He told me to go to Cook's Travel Office in Haifa and they would find me a place to stay in Jerusalem that was considered safe for americans, then to have them reserve a seat in a taxi, saying I would be more comfortable if I reserved ahead and asked for the seat by the driver. Most taxis plying between Haifa and Jerusalem were seven passenger cars made in the United States, the so-called dump seats were uncomfortable for a three hour drive, crowded three abreast in the rear seat wasn't very good either in this humid climate. On the few occasions when I had to take the back seat, my clothes would be wrinkled and damp from such closeness to my fellow passenger.

I made many trips to Jerusalem and was thrilled by them all, however, the first time you see this famous, historical city it is awe-inspiring. As we drove, first on the plains by the sea, then turning inland, passing through Lydda (now called Lod) and Ramleh, we went through valleys and over hills, each time we topped a hill I eagerly looked for my first sight of the "Golden City" , it was sunset as we approached and in the clear, cool air, the late rays of the sun bathed the buildings in a rosy glow. I felt some apprehension, wondering if there would be a language problem, then I remembered that during the British Administration, english had been taught in the public schools. I had no difficulties, Cook's had booked a room for me in the "Jasmin House" located in an enclosed area of buildings, called the British Compound. This small hotel was owned and operated by two brothers who were Armenian. I was to go there many times, always enjoyed my stay and came to know the proprietors quite well. The outer courtyard was set up as a tea-garden, tables under the trees, amid blooming vines and flowers. The dining-room was on the second floor, weather permitting, the diners could be served on the adjacent balcony overlooking the tea -garden.

I did my business in the morning, in most cases, when you entered the office, the man you had come to see would immediately order tea or coffee, then we would settle down to the business at hand.

Shoghi Effendi was always striving to promote the prestige of the Faith, he told me to say I had come on behalf of "His Eminence Shoghi Effendi Rabbání," whenever I conducted business on his instructions.

I had so much to learn, especially about protocol and tactful diplomacy. In addition to this was the dicipline of working under such a knowledgeable man. I will refer to one instance, a letter came to the Guardian requesting a charitable donation, signed by a lawyer, who was the chairman for the fund drive. One morning I was giving an envelope with a cash contribution for this charity. When I went to the lawyer's office and asked for him, I was told he was out of town, so I left the envelope with his secretary. Later in the day when I reported to Shoghi Effendi what I had accomplished that day, he asked me what the lawyer said when I gave him the donation, I replied that he was out of town and I had left the envelope with his secretary. He instructed me to return to the office the next day, ask for the money back and make an appointment with the man who had signed the letter. Naturally I dreaded having to do this but I learned a valuable lesson and I never had to do something like this again. I really admired the Guardian's attention to detail, from then on I gathered all the facts I could before reporting to him. Another thing he advised me to do was to go to the top individual whenever I was doing something for the Faith, the Guardian did not want any glory for himself but he sure wanted the best for the Cause. His protection was marvelous to witness.

On one of my early visits to Jerusalem I completed my errands in the morning, so I hired a Jewish guide to take me on a tour of the Old City. There was only one other person with us as there were so few tourists at this period. Thousands of words have been written about this historical place, therefore I'll only touch on the highlights of this personal experience. Much to my surprise, the guide informed us that the keys to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher were in the custody of the Moslems, and being a Jew he could not even put his foot on the paved terrace in front of the church. He left us to enter and pointed out a small cafe nearby where we could rejoin him. As we entered the church, it seemed unusually dim, one had to purchase a long wax taper, it did make a pretty sight, small points of light flickering here and there, made you think of fireflies. To the right were several chapels cared for by the different religious groups. My impressions were of great age in the adornments, a very dusty odor, flashing diamonds and precious gems on the crucifix over the altar. The rotunda of the church had its own special atmosphere, with the Holy Sepulcher in the center, the area around the Sepulcher was divided among the various religious groups, each having a section like pieces of pie, woe unto anyone who tried to remove or place anything there without authority!

The Holy Sepulcher was always guarded and very small, it seemed full to me with three people in it. As for myself, I felt stunned to be, at long last, in such a revered and holy place, knowing it meant so much to so many. The ornaments enclosed there seemed so exotic and ancient. It was difficult to take it all in, in such a short visit.

As we started to leave the church, the religious dignitary in charge for that day, stepped from his office and asked us if we wished to have a certificate of pilgrimage. We certainly did, he signed and dated it and charged us a small fee. He also gave us a tiny packet of the earth of the Holy Land.

Upon rejoining our guide, we discovered the cafe was actually an antiquity, originally it had been erected as a church by the Crusaders, it was in the form of a cross! In the section where the cross beam would be, there was an open fountain filled with water, on the rim a battered tin cup was attached by a chain, while we were there several patrons dipped in and drank this water which looked unsanitary to me, debris was scattered over the bottom of the pool. The rest of the cafe was filled with small tables with small stools around them. It happened that I was the only woman present and as we sipped our turkish coffee, many amused glances seemed to come my way. The men were all arabs, wearing the kaffyah, held in place by a black cord called the agal, some wearing floor length garment and otherwise wearing western dress.

We visited so many historical sites, synagogues with wells under the floor, others where a trap door was raised showing ruins of a previous building. The Wailing Wall was of particular interest, in spite of the troublous times, there were quite a few there wearing their skull caps and prayer shawls. They would press written petitions in the cracks between the massive building stones. We did not linger here as it had been the scene of so many unhappy incidents and emotions ran high in Jerusalem. My choice recollection is when we arrived at the portion of the Old City Wall at sunset, this section overlooked the Valley of Kidron with a view across the valley to the Garden of Gethsemane. The rosy glow enhanced the scene and I felt that inner exultation that comes only on extraordinary occasions. Another time, during 1947, I was again in Jerusalem with a free afternoon, having completed my errands in the morning. I decided to go to Bethlehem, there was a bus line called the "Egged" at the end of the line was the public square, not far from the Church of the Nativity. ( Later I asked Miriam what "Egged" meant, she pondered a bit and said, "it is like a bandage between two cities! ") There were quite a few loungers around and as a boy on a bicycle passed near me, I asked him where I could find a guide. He beckoned to a handsome young man , calling out "hey, Shikri," who responded eagerly as tourists were few and far between just then. He soon informed me that he had spent some years in Texas, U.S.A., with relatives, but, longing for his old home, returned and planned to live out his life here. We went first to the Church of the Nativity, passing through the low doorway, so constructed as to keep large animals out and I also thought one had to bow in reverence at the same time. I was told that in past times the* "infidels" had sent animals into the church to insult the christians. One has to keep tongue in cheek at many of the stories the guides tell, it is their trade to make the trips interesting even if they embroider the truth. There were seats only in the forward portion of this church, a service was taking place so we talked in whispers and tiptoed about. The ladies attending the meeting wore the modified wimple head-dress that distinguished them as residents of Bethlehem. Instead of the long pointed cone indicative of medieval times, the end of the cone was out short but still draped with fine white cloth, graceful and most becoming. Another place where the crusaders had left an imprint. Quietly lifting a trap-door at the rear, the guide turned on an electric light and about five feet below where we were standing were the remains of a mosaic floor built during the Roman occupation. Next we went down to the lower section to see the creche, the scene of the Nativity of Christ. Here, as in so many other holy places, it seemed very, old, sort of dusty but so fascinating. We then passed through a narrow corridor in the adjacent monastery to a balcony, the one which overlooks the fields where shepherds still kept their flocks, where the shepherds of old saw the “star.” It was here that I experienced that uplifting of the spirit that takes one back to that bygone day where history was made that changed the world.

On our way to other points of interest, we passed a small gift shop, the young proprietor was standing by the door, he motioned us to come in but my guide said we had other things to see first, so he invited us to come in and have coffee with him when we came back by.

In that vicinity were many shops where they were making objects of mother-of-pearl, jewelry, buttons, boxes, even furniture in-laid with the mother-of-pearl. Like so many shops in the Holy Land, there were corrugated shutters that were pulled down over the front when closing time came, then fastened to the metal loops in the threshold with padlocks. Such a clatter when they are raised or lowered, they made me think of old fashioned roll top desks. Soon we were back to the gift shop, while sipping my coffee I browsed around and found some souvenirs I liked. Then we talked so long I had to run to catch the last bus to Jerusalem before curfew. As I wrote to Ben, later on I glanced in the mirror and saw that I had stars of Bethlehem in my eyes after such a carefree, happy afternoon. It was fortunate that I was able to make these two visits, after that it became too dangerous, I would go where I had to go to carry on my work, then stick to the hotel like a burr.

Tel-Aviv was quite another kind of adventure, although I went there frequently, I usually completed my business as quickly as possible and returned to Haifa. Mr. Maxwell advised me to stay at the American House where he was well known. This was a small hotel run by Mrs. Fischer and her daughter from Brooklyn, New York. There was a home-like atmosphere there and they told me I would always have a place to sleep there even if I had no chance to make a reservation. Once I slept on a cot part way under their dining room table in their private quarters. This meant going to the roof in the elevator, stepping outdoors, crossing over to a box-like building, I called it their pent-house. Other times I have slept in the lounge which had little or no privacy.

I would have liked to see more of the city of Jaffa on these visits, from the distance it looked so fascinating, also it had its place in history. The two cities had become like one city due to the growth and expansion of Tel-Aviv. However, there was so much ill-feeling between the inhabitants, one could sense it and was wise to stay out of their affairs.

Going north from Haifa you come to the roads leading to Acre and to Nazareth, when I first saw the signposts indicating these well-known places, I felt I must be dreaming. These two cities have so great a meaning for so many that it almost defies description. Of the two, Acre takes first place with the Bahá'ís as this is the locale of the “Most Great Prison”, it was here that Bahá'u'lláh was banished with members of his family and some faithful followers under most inhuman conditions. In “God Passes By” are the details of the events that took place in that city while Bahá'u'llah was incarcerated there. Note: "God Passes By" is the chronological record of the first hundred years of the Bahá'í Faith, written by Shoghi Effendi.

It was in May 1947 that I had a most exciting and interesting experience. A phone call asking for the secretary, (that was my title) brought one of the girls running over to the Pilgrim House to get me. When I reached the phone, a crisp voice informed me that a very important person wished to visit Bahjí, and they wished to be assured that someone would be there to receive him properly, for security reasons, no name was mentioned. A number was given me to call as soon as arrangements could be made. I reported this to Rúhíyyih Khánum and when Shoghi Effendi sent for me later that day he said he was sure it would be the All High Commissioner of Palestine, Sir Allan Cunningham, he then said I must be the one to be there to meet him! I said, Shoghi Effendi! - how can I do this.

I have had no experience with protocol or meeting titled people, I wouldn't even know how to address him! He replied, you just call him, your excellency, and don't worry I will tell you exactly what to do. I was really frightened at the prospect of this assignment, but when Shoghi Effendi asked you to do something, you got up the courage and did it. How often I wished the beloved Guardian had someone there to help him more worthy of his station and ability, yet I was there and had no choice but to rise to the occasion. A phone call was made to confirm the date for the visit, early in the day I dressed in my best summer suit, added white accessories, all of which had to pass inspection by Rúhíyyih Khánum, and took a taxi over to Bahjí. Shoghi Effendi had briefed me thoroughly as to my part in this affair, and also Salah Jarrah, the keeper of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. It went as follows: - A lovely bouquet was arranged for me to hand to His Excellency upon his arrival, I was to welcome him on behalf of Shoghi Effendi. At the appointed hour I took my place at the main entrance of Bahjí. In those days the roads leading to Bahjí were very sandy, in the dry season great clouds of dust would rise whenever a car approached. Before long, I saw the dust rising in the distance and along came a convoy of jeeps, one stopped by the entrance and out stepped the District Commissioner of Acre who took a place directly behind me, with his aides behind him. Shortly another convoy of military cars appeared, in the midst of the convoy was an english passenger car with British banners attached to the front fenders which drew up smartly in front of us and out stepped Sir Allan Cunningham! As I greeted him on behalf of Shoghi Effendi, I handed him the flowers, he delicately sniffed them and then handed them to one of his aides. He fell into step with me as we walked down the path to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. A rather large group was following us, but as Salah opened the door to the Shrine, only His Excellency and I entered, our shoes having been left at the foot of the steps outside. Quietly I approached the sacred threshold, kneeled, said a short prayer with my face buried in the fragrant blossoms, then backed away to a corner of the inner courtyard garden where I could look through the greenery and seated myself upon the floor. Sir Allen followed my procedure and joined me for a short period of silent meditation. Not a word was spoken until we were again outside, whereupon, he remarked: - "that is as near to heaven on earth as one could possibly get."

We strolled over to the Mansion, as we entered the upper floor we went directly to the room that had been occupied by Bahá'u'lláh where we paid our respects, then I brought to his attention the framed tribute to Bahá'u'lláh by Professor Browne of Cambridge University, which hung just outside the door. We next visited the Press room where I pointed out the progress of the Faith in the world, while opposite, pictures of the tyrannical rulers who had persecuted, and exiled Bahá'u'lláh were hung on the wall to gaze on the proof that they had not stamped out the infant Faith by their actions.

Sir Allan spoke of the Bahá'í Books, noting the various languages, and the colorful arrangement of the books. As the top floor of the Mansion is like a museum, there was much to see, we ended our inside tour in the guest room where he signed the register and retired to the balcony. From here we could see across the bay to Haifa with a good view of the Shrine of the Báb halfway up Mount Carmel. Directly behind the lovely colored glass windscreen were two chairs, for Sir Allan and myself, Salah soon brought tea in delicate glasses, to our right we could see the dome and minaret of the Mosque in Acre. Soon the entire company was on the balcony, having their tea, Salah had taken them into the Shrine and on a tour of the Mansion. After a while, His Excellency rose saying he had other visits to make and regretted that his time had been so short in this peaceful place, he said he hoped to come again. We chatted as we walked back to his car, then they were off in whirls of dust, banners flying. The District Commissioner of 'Akká had remained behind and cordially invited me to have dinner at his home, even setting the day about two weeks hence. He said he would like to have me meet his family and would take me after dinner to visit the Most Great Prison, as I had told him that I hadn't been there since my arrival in the country.

Shoghi Effendi was very pleased with the report of the visit of the High Commissioner, also that the District Commissioner of Acre had invited me to his home, telling me by all means to accept his invitation. A few days after Sir Allan's visit I received the following communication: "Dear Hiss Anderson, Your kindness last Thursday when you received His Excellency, the High Commissioner, at Bahjí was very much appreciated. His Excellency was most sorry that his visit had, of necessity, to be so brief and hopes that on a subsequent visit to Acre he will be able to visit Bahjí again.

Yours sincerely,

M.A. Andrew. Acre, 13 May 1947.

Sir Allan Cunningham was the epitome of dignity and refinement, he was slim and trim in his military uniform with medals and ribbons on it, he had pure white hair and a small neat white mustache. I certainly enjoyed my role as official greeter, it was a special occasion to add to so many new and interesting experiences.

I have had no experience with protocol or meeting titled people, I wouldn't even know how to address him! He replied, you just call him, your excellency, and don't worry I will tell you exactly what to do. I was really frightened at the prospect of this assignment, but when Shoghi Effendi asked you to do something, you got up the courage and did it. How often I wished the beloved Guardian had someone there to help him more worthy of his station and ability, yet I was there and had no choice but to rise to the occasion. A phone call was made to confirm the date for the visit, early in the day I dressed in my best summer suit, added white accessories, all of which had to pass inspection by Rúhíyyih Khánúm, and took a taxi over to Bahjí. Shoghi Effendi had briefed me thoroughly as to my part in this affair, and also Salah Jarrah, the keeper of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. It went as follows: - A lovely bouquet was arranged for me to hand to His Excellency upon his arrival, I was to welcome him on behalf of Shoghi Effendi. At the appointed hour I took my place at the main entrance of Bahjí. In those days the roads leading to Bahjí were very sandy, in the dry season great clouds of dust would rise whenever a car approached. Before long, I saw the dust rising in the distance and along came a convoy of jeeps, one stopped by the entrance and out stepped the District Commissioner of Acre who took a place directly behind me, with his aides behind him. Shortly another convoy of military cars appeared, in the midst of the convoy was an english passenger car with British banners attached to the front fenders which drew up smartly in front of us and out stepped Sir Allan Cunningham! As I greeted him on behalf of Shoghi Effendi, I handed him the flowers, he delicately sniffed them and then handed them to one of his aides. He fell into step with me as we walked down the path to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. A rather large group was following us, but as Salah opened the door to the Shrine, only His Excellency and I entered, our shoes having been left at the foot of the steps outside. Quietly I approached the sacred threshold, kneeled, said a short prayer with my face buried in the fragrant blossoms, then backed away to a corner of the inner courtyard garden where I could look through the greenery and seated myself upon the floor. Sir Allen followed my procedure and joined me for a short period of silent meditation. Not a word was spoken until we were again outside, whereupon, he remarked: - "that is as near to heaven on earth as one could possibly get."

We strolled over to the Mansion, as we entered the upper floor we went directly to the room that had been occupied by Bahá'u'lláh where we paid our respects, then I brought to his attention the framed tribute to Bahá'u'lláh by Professor Browne of Cambridge University, which hung just outside the door. We next visited the Press room where I pointed out the progress of the Faith in the world, while opposite, pictures of the tyrannical rulers who had persecuted, and exiled Bahá'u'lláh were hung on the wall to gaze on the proof that they had not stamped out the infant Faith by their actions.

Sir Allan spoke of the Bahá'í Books, noting the various languages, and the colorful arrangement of the books. As the top floor of the Mansion is like a museum, there was much to see, we ended our inside tour in the guest room where he signed the register and retired to the balcony. From here we could see across the bay to Haifa with a good view of the Shrine of the Báb halfway up Mount Carmel. Directly behind the lovely colored glass windscreen were two chairs, for Sir Allan and myself, Salah soon brought tea in delicate glasses, to our right we could see the dome and minaret of the Mosque in Acre. Soon the entire company was on the balcony, having their tea, Salah had taken them into the Shrine and on a tour of the Mansion. After a while, His Excellency rose saying he had other visits to make and regretted that his time had been so short in this peaceful place, he said he hoped to come again. We chatted as we walked back to his car, then they were off in whirls of dust, banners flying. The District Commissioner of 'Akká had remained behind and cordially invited me to have dinner at his home, even setting the day about two weeks hence. He said he would like to have me meet his family and would take me after dinner to visit the Most Great Prison, as I had told him that I hadn't been there since my arrival in the country.

Shoghi Effendi was very pleased with the report of the visit of the High Commissioner, also that the District Commissioner of Acre had invited me to his home, telling me by all means to accept his invitation. A few days after Sir Allan's visit I received the following communication: "Dear Hiss Anderson, Your kindness last Thursday when you received His Excellency, the High Commissioner, at Bahjí was very much appreciated. His Excellency was most sorry that his visit had, of necessity, to be so brief and hopes that on a subsequent visit to Acre he will be able to visit Bahjí again.

Yours sincerely,

M.A. Andrew. Acre, 13 May 1947.

Sir Allan Cunningham was the epitome of dignity and refinement, he was slim and trim in his military uniform with medals and ribbons on it, he had pure white hair and a small neat white mustache. I certainly enjoyed my role as official greeter, it was a special occasion to add to so many new and interesting experiences.

The day of my visit to the District Commissioner's home in Acre arrived and I was ready and waiting at #7 Persian Street, when two cars stopped at the front gate. The District Commissioner came to the door and explained that terrorists had blown up a portion of the Most Great Prison in order to liberate some of the Jewish prisoners, he said his brother-in-law was in the one of the cars and would take me to Acre, because he, himself had to go and see to the affairs at the prison, he would join us later. My escort took me through the Old City Gate, his car was small, even so we twisted and turned as we made our way through the city, while he pointed out historical landmarks. The disturbance at the prison had made everyone nervous and cautious. The family received me most cordially, their home was located in the newer section of Acre with attractive plantings surrounding it, they had just received an electric refrigerator which was proudly displayed in the dining room. We had a delicious meal and social hour together and my previous escort drove me back to Haifa. He was quite dashing in a dark blue suit, wearing a red fez with a black tassel, he was tall for an arab, had liquid brown eyes , black hair and moustache, like a character in an arabian movie. Our return trip was much less formal as we were better acquainted, he said he would like to show me around, especially to take me out to the desert where no lights interfered with the beauty of the moon and the stars! I explained that I had come to Haifa expressly to assist in the work at the Bahá'í World Center and that my social life would be curtailed for the time being. My dashing friend was unaware that I had a fiance in the United States. After receiving a written invitation from him I had to gently inform him of the facts.

Conditions in the streets worsened as the date drew near for the end of the British Mandate, which was May 15, 1948. So much was to happen before this came about, it was a common thing to hear sporadic shooting and sometimes bombs. By this time I was on a routine schedule, breakfast at 7:30 A.M., then report to Rúhíyyih Khánúm over at #7 Persian Street, waiting in the tea-room for my mornings work. At times there were delays as those two beloved persons worked over knotty problems upstairs in their own private apartment. Then I would hear Rúhíyyih Khánúm coming down the stairs with her arms full of papers, including her writing portfolio, and she would hand me my work for the day. I never knew what to expect, it could be an appointment with the lawyers, the land registry, the Municipality,( the equivalent of our city hall) most anything but always the mail and the cables.

It was the custom of Shoghi Effendi to send handwritten cables over to me which I carefully copied on the proper form for sending out the next day, I always returned his copy along with mine to be certain that they were correct, he had the duplicate for his records. Sometimes in the wording of his messages, he would make changes several times in order to have the exact meaning, I recall one instance when he had inserted at least six different words, crossing out until the final word was way over in the outside margin. He had some special, very expensive stationary, with the Greatest Name embossed at the top of the sheet, on the few occasions when he asked me to type an important letter, he would send over his outlined letter which I transferred to this costly paper being extremely careful as he would send me only the sheets actually required, no mistakes allowed! I would space up the letter on scrap paper before I typed the one that would go out. 1947 Observance of the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh.

As May 28, 1947 drew near, Shoghi Effendi instructed me to obtain passes for the Bahá'ís to go by taxi to Bahjí to observe the passing of Bahá'u'lláh. There was a curfew in Haifa which meant we would have to be out of Haifa by six P.M. and could not return to the city until six A.M., the following morning. Upon inquiry I found that the office that issued passes was in a secret place. I had to contact a special man who would escort me to this place, he left me at a street corner and I did not see which building he entered, and in a short while he returned with the necessary documents.

The Bahá'ís in the general area, some from Trans-Jordan, came for the Holy Day observances whenever possible, this time our party was comprised of six taxis and we passed through all the road-blocks on the way to Acre without incident.

The ladies and children gathered in the Pilgrim House and the men were with Shoghi Effendi in the Mansion. Just before the sunset hour, chairs were placed around the edge of the garden adjacent to Bahá'u'lláh's Shrine. Lights in the garden and around the eaves of building were turned on and shed a luminous glow on the greenery.

Inside the Pilgrim House, Rúhíyyih Khánum was talking to the ladies in Persian, at times she would turn to me and tell me in English that she was sharing news of the Bahá'í World with them. A large Persian rug had been placed in the center of the room for the small children, they sat very straight with their arms folded over their chests, sometimes their little backs would get tired and they would slump down, then they would catch their mother's eye and straighten up quickly. The children chanted prayers as their part in the observance. We could hear the voice of the beloved Guardian from the garden where he was speaking to the men, telling them the latest Bahá'í news and of his plans for the progress of the Faith.

At midnight, word came for the ladies to enter the Shrine, we went around the rear of the building so that we would not disturb Shoghi Effendi and left our shoes outside, as we entered, each lady held out her hands, palm upward, and Rúhíyyih Khánum drew the glass stopper of a vial of Attar of Rose across each palm, then the lady would raise her palms to her forehead anointing herself with this precious fragrance, soon the beautiful aroma permeated the whole interior. Each one knelt in reverence at the Holy Threshold and then retired to a small room to the left of the Holy Tomb. A chair was placed in the doorway of this room for Rúhíyyih Khánum, I was standing directly behind her so I could see the men as they came in and paid their respects, then they stepped back and knelt on the floor around the gem-like garden in the covered courtyard of the Shrine.

When all was quiet, Shoghi Effendi entered, approached the Holy Threshold, knelt in reverence, backed away a few steps and knelt. There was absolute silence, then he raised his beautiful resonant voice and chanted the Tablet of Visitation. It was my impression that his chanting was in two parts, the first I would describe as in the tenor range, the second part in a much deeper voice. Then, he again approached the Threshold, knelt there for a moment, then backed away step by step, leaving the Shrine, each man did the same, the only sound was the whisper of their stockinged feet, then the ladies did the same thing until the Shrine was empty.

Oh, how lovely it was, all the lights were on, the glowing colors of the persian rugs,, the dainty garden, the objectd'art placed here and there, the perfume, but above all the privilege of being there. Outside the night birds were singing, the air was soft and balmy, the moon was shedding its light, truly a taste of paradise.

At this point everyone retired for a rest until called again to enter the Shrine to be there at three o'clock in the morning, the hour of Bahá'u'lláh's Ascension. The earlier scene was repeated.

Had it not been for the curfew, we would have returned to Haifa immediately, as it was, we got what rest we could, then, at dawn, we left Bahjí. It was hard to leave this peaceful place, the sun was rising, the birds were singing and etched on the sky-line was a line of arab women with containers on their heads going to the well for water. As we drove toward Haifa, there was a thick ground fog covering the road which slowed our progress. Suddenly, as we neared the outskirts of the city, our caravan was challenged and halted by a road-block, armed men thrust their guns through the windows of the taxis and we were advised that our passes had been cancelled and that we would not be allowed to enter Haifa. There had been a serious disturbance during the night! A conference was held with Shoghi Effendi, with the result that he sent Mr. Maxwell and myself to the nearby police station where we explained our position and why we were there. Due to the excellent relations that Shoghi Effendi had with the British authorities, some phone calls were made and we were allowed to continue to our homes. The streets of the city were deserted and there was an eerie, foreboding atmosphere as we passed through the silent streets. I sincerely hope and pray that all future observances of this Holy Observance will find this country at peace. We all had a short rest and then took up our usual daily routine.

Mr. William Maxwell, the father of Rúhíyyih Khánum, lived in the opposite end of the Pilgrim House from where my room was, he also had an office in that area where he worked on his architectural designs. He was a precious person and I had come to know him rather well on my visit in his home in Montreal in 1935-36. He was busily engaged on the design and details concerned with the beautification of the Shrine of the Báb. The beloved Guardian had approved the design and a plaster model of it stood on a table in the central hall of the house. He was a great comfort to Shoghi Effendi, they would consult together and come up with ideas for decorative gates, graceful steps, pediments to support large urns to hold flowering plants and many other items. I understand that Shoghi Effendi was always noting architectural details during his travels, also becoming familiar with materials for monumental buildings that would be strong, lasting and beautiful. This knowledge was reflected in his choice of the lovely monuments in the upper Shrine garden on Mount Carmel. He asked Mr. Maxwell to create many things, among them was a suitable plaque to insert into the wall in the room of Bahá'u'lláh in the Bahjí Mansion, near where Bahá'u'lláh always sat. Now visitors may see this plaque which has been executed in several tones of marble with the Greatest Name in gold leaf.

Mr. Maxwell was a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architecture, in his native Canada are many examples of his fine creative efforts. Although he was in his seventies, his hands were as steady as a rock, even his signature was artistic. He was able to go to Italy in 1948, to consult with representatives of the marble industry, to select materials and to see part of his beautiful design for the Shrine of the Báb erected before he returned to his home in Montreal, Canada, where he died in 1952 after two years of illness. This gracious homo on Pine Avenue, West, in Montreal, had been the scene of much Bahá'í activity, the only home in Canada visited by 'Abdu'l-Bahá during His travels in North America. In 1953 this home was presented to the Canadian National Bahá'í Assembly and is now designated a Bahá'í Shrine.

On December 24, 1951, Shoghi Effendi had appointed Mr. Maxwell a Hand of the Cause, upon the death of Mr. Maxwell this mantle fell upon his daughter, Rúhíyyih Khánum.

When the beloved Guardian and Rúhíyyih Khánum went away on their annual rest, it was my pleasant duty to look after Mr. Maxwell, we had our meals together and I had been instructed to see that he would get some exercise and often we would go to the top of Mount Carmel to his favorite tea-garden and take short walks in that vicinity. If I hadn't taken him in hand, he probably would have worked around the clock! Eventually he found an assistant who aided him in the drawing of the plans, relieving him of a lot of the routine work.

Sporadic shooting would break out frequently, one night shots began in our immediate neighborhood, with the windows open, they sounded very near. I quickly found Mr. Maxwell and chose a safe corner in the central hall where we sat down on the floor until the firing subsided, when, at a later date we were subjected to air-raids, our instructions were to take Mr. Maxwell to the lower floor where a small room had been blacked out and where the walls were very thick. He would calmly pick up something to read and I have a mental picture of him sitting in that room quite oblivious of what was going on outside. Indeed, a remarkable personality.

Over the garage at #7 Persian Street was a pleasant apartment which was occupied by Husayn Ikbal. I believe his age was in the early eighties. He wore a persian aba and a red fez, it was a delight to enter the gate and see him seated in all his dignity on the rim of the fountain, amid the flower garden, sunning himself. If I came up the path while he was seated there, he would immediately arise, cross his hands over his chest and say the Bahá'í greeting, "the Glory of God be upon you." He was the Persian secretary for the beloved Guardian who trusted him completely.

Husayn Ikbal did not speak any english, therefore, when he required something from me, he would ask Salah Jarrah, the custodian of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh to write notes to me in english. Below, is a sample of one of these requests:

Dear Bahá'í Sister, Mrs. Weeden,

With great respect and obedience I beg you to type eight envelopes like the attached.

I am sorry to disturb you in this matter and I thank you forever in thousands thanks in advance and in sacks. Please give my obedience to Mr, Weeden, the noble Bahá'í.

10/8/50 (signed) Ḥusayn Ikbāl

This dear person has long since gone to his reward but I still think of him fondly and always enjoyed his notes.

Shoghi Effendi was very kind and gentle with Ḥusayn Ikbāl and sometimes he would invite him to go in the car with him and I would drive them to the top of Mount Carmel to a vantage point where they could look down on the Báb's Shrine and the gardens, and on other Occasions over to Bahjí. Later on, Ḥusayn Ikbāl lived in the so-called Eastern Pilgrim House right at the end of the main entrance road in the garden surrounding the Shrine of the Báb. Frequently, after Shoghi Effendi had been supervising work in the garden, he would join Ḥusayn Ikbāl on the balcony of the Pilgrim House for tea, they would sit there sipping tea and having conversation, as it grew darker, the lights of the city would come on, they sparkled and twinkled in the clear air as if handfuls of jewels had been scattered about. It was possible to see Mount Hermon in the Lebanon, usually snow-covered, from this vantage point. The lighted ships in the harbor and the city of Acre across the bay added their beauty to the scene. As I waited by the front door I could hear the vibrant voice of Shoghi Effendi, as the dusk deepened he would come out to his car and I would drive him down the mountain. Precious moments for me to remember.

I never knew the exact number of Bahá'ís at the International Center, some lived over in the plain of Acre in the Garden of Ridván on the Ma'an River, others on farms nearby where they raised produce which supplied some of the needs of the household in Haifa, then there were the Persian girls who did the housework and some of the cooking, and the gardeners, most of whom lived up in the gardens near the Shrine of the Báb. 'Alí, a Bedouin, was the main cook and lived in his own quarters at the rear of # 7 Persian Street. Food was prepared for everyone by 'Alí and someone always came down from the Eastern Pilgrim House and carried their food up in special containers. There was a long flight of steps in the area of the Shrine gardens which made the trip down fairly easy, but it was a long climb back. When 'Alí cooked a turkey, it was so delicious, he would spend the entire day at the side of a huge kettle on the floor of the back kitchen, he would baste it carefully until it was golden brown and tender.

'Alí also took it upon himself to raise some turkeys and he did very well until there was a grain shortage, we were saddened once when some of his baby turkeys went under the fence into a neighbors yard, the young children playing there broke the legs of every one! I really hate to admit it, but there was a lot of cruelty to animals.

In the spring 'Alí's mother came to see him and one day Rúḥíyyih Khánum sent word to me that 'Alí's mother was going to show us all how to make bedouin bread. I went over on my way to town and found her sitting on the floor of the kitchen, on one side she had a pan of flour, on the other side a container of water, she would start with the flour and pour on a bit of water then working back and forth between the two, she would finally seem satisfied with the result, she then covered the dough with a cloth and I was told to come back in the afternoon when she would show us how to bake it. When I returned after lunch, she had a small fire going on the tile floor of the back kitchen, a round dome-like metal cover was over the fire, supported by stones, under the metal cover, sticks were extending beyond the fire and that was how she controlled the heat, need more heat, push in the sticks, too much heat, she pulled them out. We had such a merry time watching her and finally we were encouraged to try it. She would pinch off a fairly small lump of dough and spin it over her hand, then very gracefully place it on the metal cover, if a tiny hole appeared she would patch it with a piece of dough, after browning to her satisfaction, she would remove it, fold it in quarters and start a stack at her side.

We had a hilarious time trying to spin this dough! It would begin to droop over our hands and then to try and hit the metal cover, well, you can imagine that it was not like hers! The girls had a solution, they produced a small pillow covered with immaculate white sheeting, we would spin the dough until we could no longer handle it, then flop it on the pillow and reach under the dough and pull it until it was the size of a large dinner plate, then to hit the surface of the metal cover correctly took some doing. Freshly baked this bread tasted terrible and had the consistency of rubber, how- ever after it had cooled we found that toasting it made it crisp and delicious.

I was very intrigued with the appearance of 'Alí's mother, she wore the traditional long black flowing garment, also her head was covered with a black head-dress, according to bedouin custom, there were tattoo marks around her mouth in the form of small crosses to show that she was a married woman. These ladies bake bread every single day of their life and preparing it takes a lot of time. I understood that they ate a lot of grains in the form of mush and only had meat on special occasions. Out on the plains between Acre and Haifa, you could see their black goats-hair tents, they would move with the season of growing grass and other greens that the goats would eat. The tiny hooves of the goats would trample the roots of the greenery so these bedouin would be constantly on the move to new pastures, they also had to go farther and farther afield to find food for them.

At #7 Persian Street, a Bahá'í was the keeper of the keys and he was useful in obtaining household and food supplies. He had friends among the Druse, some of whom earned their living by hiring out their trucks, these contacts were invaluable later on when the construction of the Arcade of the Báb's Shrine commenced. Most of the Druse in the area lived in a village on top of Mount Carmel. They dressed like the arabs with one exception, they wore a small multicolored cap that showed under the edge of their kaffyah, this identified them as Druse.

The persian maids kept the house beautifully clean and they felt greatly honored to be serving in the household of the beloved Guardian, on quiet sunny days it was a quaint picture to see them on the pation adjacent to the kitchen working over huge trays of dried foods such as grains, peas and especially rice, all had to be picked over carefully for bits of debris- The only girl who could speak some engllsh was Khorshid so she took care of Mr. Maxwell and me over at the Pilgrim House. She would bring our food over and clean up after each meal. It was very refreshing to me to come home from my morn-ings work and find a nice cool drink waiting for me and every after- noon about four she would bring us tea and quite often Rúhíyyih Kha-num would join us for a short while.

When Shoghi Effendi's work-room needed a thorough cleaning, they would wait until he had left to go to the Shrine Garden, then they would all work together, being very careful to put things back where the Guardian had left them. On one day they needed an extra pair of hands, so I went to help them, of course, Rúhíyyih Khánum was always present when this cleaning was done, she also helped. I noted that this room was most orderly, spartan, a single electric bulb hung from the ceiling, a small bed near his work table, Iwas told that sometimes he took his rest in this bed, but still had his papers spread around him, in fact, he had the capacity to scan reading matter rapidly and he had material from all over the world. I was to discover that he even read regional bulletins!

The superintendant of the Shrine Garden in Haifa was a devoted and loyal Bahá'í, he was half persian and half arab. He was so impetuous by nature that he sometimes created problems that others had to unravel. To him, Shoghi Effendi's word was law and he would disregard the laws of the country. As an example, he knew that Shoghi Effendi needed a car, one day he came to my office and asked me to tell Rúhíyyih Khánum that he had a car for the beloved Guardian and to ask him to please look out the window, across the street from #7 was an empty lot, sure enough there was an american Studebaker parked there. It was from Trans-Jordan and even if we could have accepted it, it would be in Palestine illegally! Of course he had to return it. He spoke some english and would rush into my office and say, "give me a packet, give me a packet" what he wanted was an envelope. He was always writing notes to Shoghi Effendi and asking one of the girls to take them upstairs to Rúhíyyih Khánum who would then give them to the Guardian when he had a break in his work. He really was a help, he went about the city and reported what was happening and at times this information was very useful.

The caretaker of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh at Bahjí was Salah Jarrah, he had been postmaster at Samakh, Palestine before Shoghi Effendi asked him to come to Haifa. He was a fine young man and had been taught english in his school.

Whatever he was asked to do, he did it well and he had some adventures later on which I will tell in the proper sequence of their happening.

There was a Bahá'í man and wife that lived in the next house above the Western Pilgrim House, the husband had a gift shop and I purchased some mother-of-pearl prayer beads from him before he went out of business due to the increase of the warlike atmosphere.

There is a lovely room in the house at # 7 Persian Street which is called the tea-room, the windows at the end of the room overlook the patio at the rear of the house. This was where the ladies of the household received their guests. There are mandars on three sides of the room, these are like settees with seat and back cushions made to fit and usually have a protective covering of white material, kept spotlessly clean. Every few feet there would be a taboret or nested tables that could be put in front of a guest to hold her tea-cup. Often the tea was made in a samovar, which, in my estimation created a festive atmosphere. I was surprised to learn that the maids slept in this room, rolling up their sleeping mats and storing them under the mandars during the day, I had visions of a girls dormitory, while going about their dally chores, they chattered like magpies, so I could imagine how they talked over the events of the day upon retiring. All these girls were very modest, their dresses were fairly long, high at the neck, with long sleeves, dainty white head coverings and wearing white aprons. When there were guests they wore their prettiest aprons, sometimes they were made of white embroidered china silk. It always amazed me to see them washing the tile and marble floors, they would bend from the waist, moving the washing cloth in great sweeps,

On the rare occasions when we had a dinner party, they reminded me of butterflies as they circled the table serving the guests, Khorshid became my favorite and I was so happy to see she was still there when I re-visited Haifa in 1973-74.

One of the girls supervised the preparation of food for Shoghi Effendi and Rúhíyyih Khánum would inspect the tray before it was carried up to him to be sure everything was in order and tempting.

The first few months in Haifa were enlivened for me as I walked about the city I would hear the sounds of many interesting things, the clip-clop of a little girl walking on clogs, the clinking of small cups held in the hand of a turkish coffee vendor which he used like castanets, the tip-tapping of the feet of tiny donkeys and the calls of assorted vendors.

There were horse drawn carts delivering cooking and heating oils to the housewives, the carts had a large sunflower painted on the rear, the driver calling a long-drawn out " gaaaassss", the arab lady who went by each morning calling "leban, leban", we call it yogurt, if you wished to buy you came to the gate with a container, she would lower the can from the top of her head and ladle out the amount you required, A man with a huge tray on his head would sell fresh poppy seed buns which were delicious.

The coffee vendors had beautiful urns, carried on their backs, if they found a customer, they would swing the urn around, very deftly, rinse out the little cup and pour out a fresh coffee for you, they would put cardamon in it which added a delicious aroma and flavor. Due to the fact that they burned charcoal you could smell them before you could see them and this tickled your taste buds! I never purchased street coffee, I wasn't sure how sanitary the cups would be.

The nut vendors were usually Sudanese boys, wearing light blue tunics over their white pantaloons, a red fez on their head and a red sash around their waist, they were most colorful and very fine looking. They would set up their business on a tripod of three sticks, place a wooden tray on it with a small charcoal burner at one side over which they roasted the nuts. They were usually inexpensive varieties including sunflower and watermelon seeds. Someone said if you want to feel like a moron, buy a packet of watermelon seeds, find a tree you could sit under and spend an hour or so shelling them! If you purchased any nuts, the vendor made a small cone of newspaper for you to carry them in. You could also buy lunches on some street corners, the stands made me think of our pop-corn stands, more often than not, they would be selling arab bread which had been out in half, making a pocket, these would be filled with minced meat, vegetables or small balls of grain fried in deep fat. In season, fruits were piled up at the edge of the sidewalk and I have seen push-carts filled with cactus fruit, called sabres, on a bed of cracked ice. In this case, the man selling them had a very sharp knife, hooked at the end, with gloves on his hands, he would slit the fruit skin and you would remove it yourself. I have seen people on their lunch hour buying five or six of these eating them right on the spot.

It was not unusual to see strings of camels on the city streets, most often there would be a donkey and rider, leading a string of three, Camels roped, together. The camels have such a snooty expression and very long eyelashes, when they were shedding their coats they looked like bags of rags. I saw some on the empty lot across from where I was living, with their legs folded under them and chewing their food, the lower jaw swings from side to side.

There were many sidewalk cafes in the lower town, mostly near the arab quarter, small stools were out during the day and usually filled with arab men playing backgammon and sipping coffee. One day I saw a man there who had purchased a live chicken, the poor chickens legs were tied together, and the man had put it on the sidewalk with its head hanging over the gutter and that was a sad sight as the chicken would be right in the hot sun, panting for lack of water! One never got used to this kind of cruelty. I saw a man waiting for a bus with a brown paper bag full of pigeons, it was obvious that they were stacked one over the other and each one had its head out of a hole cut in the bag like a porthole.

Bread was delivered to our house by motorcycle, it was carried in the sidecar with no wrapping. The driver would stack up the loaves on his arm, sometimes he would drop a loaf, it would roll in the gutter, he would calmly pick it up and deliver it with the rest! He kept a weekly tally in pencil on the wall by the gate, at the end of the week he would add it up and after being paid, erase it and start over again the next time he came to deliver. This bread was from a jewish bakery made in round loaves, we also bought bread from the arab bakery, this was made from white flour and was round and flat. I noted that this bread was often used to mop up food by tearing off a small portion, running it around the plate until one had a nice mouthful then popping it in the mouth. Also, I have seen it used as a sort of napkin, they would wipe their fingers on it and eat that portion too! This kind of bread was delicious when toasted.

The milkman would have a neighborhood distribution point where large cans would be left, he then would take small containers around to the different houses, siphoning it off from the larger cans. You just had to stop thinking of sanitary precautions.

There was a man with a tiny monkey who would come and sit by the Gate, he had a drum that was very ingenious, it was made of a Kraft cheese can with sheepskin over each end, he even used the tin curl you get when opening one of these cans, attaching it with a thong so that it would hit the drum head with each turn of the handle. It was more like a rattle than a drum, the monkey would perform all kinds of antics to the beat and after the performance was over the man held out his hand for a contribution. I fbusiness wasn't profitable he just moved on to another location. He had extra drums to sell if you wished to buy.

As the disturbances deepened most of these colorful people disappeared and I missed seeing them, the streets had become so dangerous, you never knew what was going to happen, bombs exploded, there was sniping and once I saw a man kill himself with a hand grenade. These hand grenades were sold in the arab quarter, they were in piles on the sidewalk and the price was about the equal of our fifty cents.

Very few knew how to handle them, in the case of the man who killed himself, he had it in his home and was examining it, came out on his balcony with it then because he didn't know any better, he pulled the pin. You would see men on the streets with grenades hanging from their belts.

The Jewish quarter was half-way up Mount Carmel and in some respects more modern than the lower town. It was people from the european countries that had homes and shops here, mostly german, Rúhíyyih Khánum could easily converse with them and this was most helpful when shopping. There was one store that had beautiful things to sell that people had brought in, linens, silver and fine furniture, this had to be early in their immigration as later on I do not think they were allowed to take anything with them. The top of Mount Carmel was sparsely settled and had a lot of greenery. it was mostly residential. Most buildings were made of blocks of Palestinian limestone. There are amny ravines on Mount Carmel, some with very steep sides. As the crow flies, the distance, across is short, if you wished to visit someone on the opposite ridge, you would have to go back to the center and take the road out on top of the ridge!

Under the British Administration, it was the rule that no building could be more than four stories high, I wish this rule was still in effect, however I guess we must bow to progress. By the time I returned in 1973 I hardly recognized the top of the mountain, the lush greenery had given way to modern streets, quite high buildings and shops of all descriptions, even huge super-markets.

On Mount Carmel there is a Catholic Church built over a cave that they call the "Cave of Elijah", this is located on the sea end of the peninsula, lower down , where the mountain descends toward the sea there is a small square Building which is purportedly built over the "Cave of Elijah". We asked Shoghi Effendi which one was the true cave, he replied, "there are amny caves on Mount Carmel and Elijah probably slept in them all!" The river Kishon flows through the plain between Haifa and Acre and one remembers that this river flowed red with the blood of the priests of Baal slain by Elijah!

On a trip to Nazareth, we visited the usual places of interest, among them a visit to a Church presumably built over the cave that was Joseph's carpenter shop, the guide gave us a long spiel about it, one person in the group went up to him afterward and said, - I don't believe a word of it! The guide replied, - only about ten percent do! It is not possible to visit these famous places and not be affected by it, geographically, the land is the same land, Mount Tabor still Mount Tabor and so on.

Shoghi Effendi lamented the fact that he must depend on public taxis for transportation and how decrepit they were due to the lack of replacement parts and proper care. Consequently I soon found myself on the way to Jerusalem to visit the office of Import and Export licenses to see what could be done about purchasing an american car. The official Italked with inquired why Shoghi Effendi wanted an american car, why not an english car which were easily obtainable. I told him that the size of the american cars were more in keeping with the dignity of the Head of a World Faith, inasmuch as there would always be a chauffeur and many times there would distinguished guests in the rear seat. At this point he advised me that no import license could be granted at this time due to the currency regulations, however, he said if someone should send Shoghi Effendi and american car as a gift, then permission would be granted to bring it into the country. This information soon reached the right ears and it wasn't long before we received a notification that a new Buick Roadmaster would be shipped as soon as the proper papers were in order. After another trip to Jerusalem, the authorities agreed to let the car come in. You can imagine the anticipation experienced when we knew that the beloved Guardian would have a proper car. There was much satisfaction when we were notified that the car had arrived and was actually in the port. When they pulled the car on the weighing platform, they had attached the pull cain to the radiator and th_is damaged it so we were plagued with this problem from the very first.

Before the arrival of the car, Rúhíyyih Khánúm informed me that I would be the driver! Iwas really frightened at this prospect, I am not mechanically minded and the thought of the responsibility of the precious Guardian was enough to floor me, I tried every argument I could think of to convince her that this was not proper, that I had not driven a car for many years, and, being a woman, how would that look in this country where women do not have much standing, and so on. Rúhíyyih Khánúm pointed her finger at me and said, Shoghi Effendi says you have to get your drivers license, so what could I do, that ended the argument. I located a driving school with a dual control practice car and took a refresher course. My instructor was jewish and as our street bordered on the arab section, I suggested he meet me in more neutral territory, he was young and brave and insisted on picking me up where I lived. So many people had been killed by the terrorists just for their cars! The doctor who attended our household came one day and when he left he took the street parallel to Persian Street, a group of arabs stopped him, pulled him from his car and it was only because someone recognized him as saving a member of his family that they let him go but told him not to use that street again! He could have lost his life just because of that car.

My first lesson showed the instructor that I at least had rudimentary driving experience so he took me right through the jewish shopping center right up to the top of Mount Carmel. This drive was complicated by the fact that the easier access road was closed to civilian traffic and the route we had to take had a series of hairpin curves plus barbed wire barricades in staggered positions that we had to zig-zag through. Needless to say I was wringing wet after these expeditions but the day came when my instructor said I was ready for my driving test. The country was still under British Administration so I had a british examiner. I was extremely nervous and made a poor showing at first but in due course he passed me and I found myself the possessor of a Palestinian Driving license.

The garage at # 7 Persian Street was right at the edge of the street and was half-filled already with the large Cunningham car that had belonged to Abdu'l-Bahá, it was covered with a huge canvas. I had to drive in cater-cornered and the inevitable happened, I miscalculated and tore off a small metal trim, I just felt terrible to do this to the Guardian's new car! I lost some sleep over it until I had it repaired. Luckily I never did any more damage while I drove it, when Ben came over he became the chauffeur. I had some interesting experiences as the result of driving this shiny new american car. My favorite was when I had taken the beloved Guardian to the dentist located in the area of the jewish shopping center. After I had parked and opened the door for Shoghi Effendi, I noted an elementary school just across the street. While I was waiting, school let out and about eight children were attracted by the car, they swarmed all over it, commenting in hebrew, the only words I understood was when they patted the mud-guards calling " nylon" and "radio" when they poked their heads in the window. Suddenly, out of the corner of my eye I saw Shoghi Effendi coming down the walk, I hurriedly walked around and opened the rear door when as many children as could climb in! Imagine my embarrassment, Shoghi Effendi slowed his walk and smiled at my predicament. In order to get them out I had to open the rear door on the street side and literally push them out!

One day when I was in the jewish shopping area, a man approached me saying he had noticed me driving an american car and surely it would be better if we hired him as the chauffeur. This individual became rather annoying, it seemed I would meet him everywhere, even in the lower town. He apparently made it his business to find out where I lived, I was working in the garden one day when he spoke to me through the wrought iron fence that enclosed the property.

On another occasion, Mr. Maxwell and I were having tea in the little garden by the side door when this same man entered the gate and came toward us, before I could say or do anything, Mr. Maxwell very graciously offered him tea. Poor man, it was easy to see that he wasn't quite right mentally. It was spooky to find him always in the vicinity wherever I went on my daily errands. Apparently he still had hopes of becoming our chauffeur. Later on, when Ben had come to Haifa, one of the girls said a man was waiting downstairs to see him, it was this same person, he wanted Ben to finance a trip to America for him, claiming he had some sort of an invention that would make a lot of money. So many people think that all Americans are wealthy!

One day I received a phone call from a lady inviting me to a party at her home, she had seen me driving an American car and thought I was a visitor to the country. Knowing how careful I had to be, I politely declined, later on I met her through the American Consulate and she reminded me of her former invitation. We became very good friends, her husband was the head of the 'Iraq Petroleum Company and they lived in one of the most beautiful houses in Haifa.

A short while after we had the new car, I was over at #7 Persian Street having lunch with Rúhíyyih Khánum when the front door-bell rang, the girl who answered the bell came and told us that a man wanted to see Rúhíyyih Khánum, something about the car! We all rushed to the door and he informed us that the car had been taken by five armed men in a Jeep! The war-like conditions in Haifa had caused the Jewish community to form a civilian guard, people were assigned to certain areas to report any unusual happenings. This was the guardian of our street, he said he was down at the end of our street when he saw the jeep drive up and start jimmieing our garage door, he ran towards them to tell them the car belonged to the Head of the Bahá'í Faith, who was highly respected. As he approached they threatened him and told him to go about his business if he knew what was good for him. He thought the best course of action was to phone to his headquarters for help. By the time he got back, the group of men had left, the garage looked normal, as he looked through the key-hole, he saw that the car had really been taken. What consternation, Shoghi Effendi's beautiful new car had been stolen. How we disliked telling this news to the dear Guardian, he had so much on his mind anyway and then to have this. He sent instructions that we must notify the police, the military, and go to the barricades at each street, describe every detail, also we organized a small group of people, including myself and went to different sections of the town looking for the car. We were a weary lot after having tramped around with no results. Later in the afternoon, Rúhíyyih Khánum and I went to Hadar-Ha-Carmel to do some errands, of course we had to walk and on the way home we passed a shop with a display of “English Lavender” in the window. At first we said we should buy some as there might not be another shipment for a long time, then Rúhíyyih Khánum thought she had spent all the money she should, but, after a few steps by, we went back and made a purchase. When we went to leave, the proprietor remarked: - Madame Rabbání, I was so surprised to see that you had sold your fine American car.” We were astonished and so glad to hear news of the car, he told us he saw the car in the lower town with five men in it! We dashed right over to the police station and told our story, when they heard this, they said they thought they knew who had taken it and would call us when they had information regarding it. Early the next morning I received a phone call that they had the car waiting at the Police Station and if I would come right up they would have it running and take me to a place where they could fix the ignition, which had been tampered with. When it was taken it still had the United states number plates on it even though we had the British ones ready to put on, we found that it had only been run fifteen miles, and the American number plates were missing. We found out later that the Jewish underground had taken it thinking that it belonged to an arab. At least this was better than having it stolen by arabs, they would have had it over the border and we would never have seen it again.

Shoghi Effendi rarely used the car for pleasure, he did like to be driven up to the top of Mount Carmel to Panorama Road which overlooked the Shrine and gardens, I’m sure that as he gazed about he was making plans for the future development of the Bahá’í property, he spoke so often of the plan he had for a fitting monument for the Báb at the highest point of the land, also that there would be eighteen terraces from the bottom of the mountain to the top, which bordered on Panorama Road. Viewed from this height, the Monument garden had an outline that resembled a harp lying on its side, outlined with cyprus trees, when the breeze would start the trees moving one could almost hear celestial music.

Shoghi Effendi usually went to the Shrine of the Báb the latter part of each afternoon, returning about dusk which varied in time with the season. He would visit Bahjí or other Bahá’í properties when something needed to be decided or supervised. Quite often when he returned home there would be some Bahá’ís waiting just inside the gate to take up some matter with Shoghi Effendi, to show their respect, some tried to kneel to him or tried to kiss the hem of his garment, he scolded them for doing this, he was always trying to build prestige for the Faith but didn’t want his personality idealized. The persian Bahá’ís are very respectful in their attitude toward the Faith, the americans are a shade too informal, the beloved Guardian said we could learn from each other. However, one of the fine things about our Faith is the diversity in unity!

Shoghi Effendi and Rúhíyyih Khánum usually went away during the extreme heat of the summer, this being ray first year delayed their Departure until they were sure I could handle the situation while they were gone. In the course of one interview, Shoghi Effendi said we must devise a cable address for you, this is most economical as it is registered with the cable office for a small fee and the address is condensed into one word. A few days later he produces a combination of my first and last name, "Gladerson".(Gladys Anderson)

When all travel arrangements had been completed, I drove them to a small hotel not far from the airport, the next day they would go by taxi to the airport for their departure.

It seemed as if the sun had gone behind the clouds when the Guardian was absent from Haifa, yet, he certainly needed this change and to get away from the petty interruptions of daily life in Haifa. His work followed him but he at least had privacy to turn to other facets of his important activities. I was so amazed to learn that he not only wrote "God Passes By" but typed the manuscript himself on the portable typewriter he had worked with over many years. In fact there is a picture of him on page 105 in the "Priceless Pearl" seated at this same typewriter!

I was instructed to make a detailed, weekly report which I forwarded to Rúhíyyih Khánúm and in turn I would receive instructions. At all times matters concerning the Bahá'í Community in Haifa were channelled entirely through Shoghi Effendi's hand, he kept his finger on every pulse, he was extremely concerned with expenditures.

Rúhíyyih Khánúm was his liaison officer, she became his right arm, and it was her chief aim in life to cherish him and to share his responsibilities.

My first summer in Haifa was a lonely one, I had no social life and of course had not made any friends. When I really got the "blues" I would go for long walks to use up some of my latent energy. I wouldn't think of using the car for anything except essentials, for that matter, where would you go in those days without the possibility of danger.

I was so happy when the cable came for me to meet Shoghi Effendi and Rúhíyyih Khánúm at the little hotel, the whole picture lighted up when they were in residence. I had arrived early so I parked down the street a way, then I saw Rúhíyyih Khánúm waving to me to come forward, they were ready for the drive home. While on the road Shoghi Effendi was kind asking how things had gone for me while he had been away and I could see he was already beginning to plan his activities, life was more exciting when he was at home.

While I was adjusting to a new country and a new way of life, I was in weekly correspondence with Ben, I had come to the conclusion that more help was needed here and had sounded Ben out to see if he would come to Haifa if asked to do so by Shoghi Effendi. Ben replied in the affirmative and after Rúhíyyih Khánúm had been back home for a while, I found an opportunity to tell her about Ben and how we had decided to marry and how it all came about. She was certainly surprised and said let's think this over, I'm sure something can be worked out. In due time, Shoghi Effendi was told and at one of our interviews he questioned me closely regarding Ben, also he was interested in his background.

The beloved Guardian was quite pleased when I told him that Ben was a first-rate photographer and had won prizes when his pictures were shown in traveling salons, and, among other things in his life he had worked in a brokerage office. Shortly after this Shoghi Effendi instructed me to send Ben a cable and to say that important news would follow in a letter, then he told me to write Ben a letter stating that he was invited to come to Haifa but to make it very clear that this was to be Ben's own decision, his own free choice. Then Shoghi Effendi looked at me with mischief in his beautiful eyes and said: - I'm not in the marriage business you know!"

You can imagine how happy I was, I could hardly wait to run across the street and get that cable on its way, as it was I spent the whole evening composing the letter to Ben. He told me later that when the cable arrived he thought I must be returning home. He used to tease me saying that in the first paragraph of the letter I said the beloved Guardian said it must be of his own free will, but in the second paragraph I asked him to bring this and to bring that! You can see I was absolutely sure he would come.

I sent off both the cable and the letter the next morning. That evening when I had my usual meeting; with Shoghi Effendi he asked me if I had sent the cable, I replied, Oh yes! Then he said, when you send the letter - then he paused when he saw the look on my face, his eyes got as round as saucers, he said:- have you sent it already? I had to confess that it was on its way how his eyes twinkled, I wonder what went through his mind! Well, he said, I guess we had better start making some plans.

Ben lost no time in replying, he cabled he would come and that he was starting to make arrangements immediately. Each interview with Shoghi Effendi after that included some discussion of the forthcoming marriage. Due to the war and the fact that there was no functioning Local Spiritual Assembly in Haifa, the first plan was to have Ben meet me in Cairo, Egypt, Shoghi Effendi said it would be good for the Egyptian Bahá'ís to officiate at a Bahá'í wedding of two Americans. Then, he said, for our honeymoon we could stay at the famous Sheppard's Hotel and take a trip up the Nile, plans which thrilled me and made me realize how very dear it was of the beloved Guardian to take such an interest in my affairs. I was also surprised to find him so romantic! Relations between Egypt and Palestine were strained due to the Arab-Jewish conflict and I had to make several trips to the Egyptian Consulate in Jerusalem before they would grant me a visitors visa. Then I reserved a seat on a plane to Cairo, so I was all set. Meantime, Ben was in New York wording on his plans. Some Bahá'ís in New York City were trying to help him but progress was slow, in fact, the Egyptian authorities kept him dangling, saying neither yes or no. In the end they refused him a visa to enter their country, We were never sure what the reason was but Ben already had his passport with the Palestinian visa stamped in it and the fact that his name was Benjamin they probably thought he was Jewish and they were not fond of the Jews at this time.

Because our marriage was to be carried out according to the Kitáb-i-Aqdas (Bahá'í Book of Laws) and under the sponsorship of Shoghi Effendi, meant we must be married ninety-five days after public announcement of our intentions. The days were flying by and new arrangements must be made, all this in addition to the exciting events taking place all around us in Haifa. Explosions, street battles, general disorder in all government and business offices, chaos in the port and danger around every corner.

Shoghi Effendi continued his regular schedule, remaining in Haifa all during the fighting, going daily to the Shrine of the Báb, supervising the work of beautifying the area, calmly proceeding as though all was normal around him. One of his lawyers suggested he leave the country until the situation cleared, but this he refused to do. Others were fleeing daily, many homes were closed up, some boarded up. The British administration was falling apart and it was becoming more and more difficult to accomplish anything. The beloved Guardian had the foresight to anticipate this slowing down, he stepped up his plans, culminating in the purchase of land to enlarge and safeguard the area adjacent to the Shrine gardens. Some of this land was obtained under great stress as titles had to be cleared and in some cases with absentee land-owners who had fled the troubles and were glad to get rid of the property. On some of the newly acquired land there were buildings that had to be torn down and Shoghi Effendi was always in the center of the activity, directing the work.

We used to say the Shoghi Effendi always did the impossible and I venture to say that the tensions and trials of this period must have taken years off his life. In retrospect I wonder how he could have accomplished so much with so many obstacles and frustrations! He went ahead with his plans with an iron determination and we must remember that all decisions rested on his shoulders.

The news was seldom good, each day we heard of massacres, retaliations, kidnappings, looting. People were leaving the country in large numbers. A United Nations Commission had arrived in the country to decide what would happen when the British Mandate ended on May 15, 1948. It is now history that an attempt to partition the country was made. This brought a great anxiety to Shoghi Effendi, if this partition took place, Acre, Bahjí, with Bahá'u'lláh's Tomb Shrine, and Mazra'ih would be in Arab country with borders requiring visas and passports, and, it is doubtful if these documents would even be granted especially as there were some fanatical Moslems who publicly avowed to destroy Bahá'í property.

While this was going on, some of the gardeners reported that a machine gun nest had been placed on the bridge over 'Abbás Street, this is Bahá'í property as it supports part of the steps that lead up to the Báb's Shrine from Mount Carmel Avenue. They wanted to know if they should notify the police or the military, Shoghi Effendi said, neither, just go up and tell them that they are trespassing and to remove the guns. This was done and no further attempts were made, it must have required a lot of courage for the gardeners to do this as the fighters were inclined to be "trigger happy" in these troublous times. There was a Jewish man who was expert in applying gold leaf to the various wrought iron ornaments and to the beautiful gates in and around the Shrine Garden. One day he was working on the main gate at the entrance, he usually had the protection of a canvas tent-like structure to keep the gold leaf from blowing away, somehow the gardeners got word that the arabs were coming to get him so he was swiftly whisked away to safety.

It got to the point where I didn't want to expose a jewish taxi driver to danger, there was an arab neighbor on our street who took it upon himself to guard the upper end of Persian Street. So when I had to shop for household supplies in Hadar-Ha-Carmel, I would hire a taxi to take me to the main gate of the Shrine garden and then someone would call an arab taxi to take me home. On one trip, my taxi drew up to the entrance. Mansour started up to help, the driver thought he was an arab, he threw my parcels out of the car, grabbed his fare and drove off furiously. Our arab neighbor had guns, a knife in his belt and a bandolier of bullets draped over his body, if we came down the street in the car, he would stop us, make us open the trunk and examine parcels to see if we were carrying weapons.

The confidence that the beloved Guardian inspired in those around him to proceed with assurance in our daily duties, enabled the work to continue to go forward.

One afternoon, I was driving Rúhíyyih Khánúm home from the Jewish section when a car in back of us kept tooting his horn and tried to crowd us, he pulled in front of us at the barricade and told the guards we were enemies! The guards recognized the car and let us through.

A BAHÁ'Í MARRIAGE.

Eventually the plans for our Bahá'í marriage crystalized, Ben would fly from New York and meet me in Jerusalem at the Jasmin House, the members of the National Spiritual Assembly of Trans-Jordan would be notified to come to the Old City to perform the ceremony. A member of the Amman Assembly would come to Haifa to receive instructions from Shoghi Effendi and with Mansou r Irani, (who spoke some english) they would accompany me to Jerusalem.

Came the day for me to leave, the night before Shoghi Effendi had given me my final instructions. Among other things, he told me to go to the United States Embassy immediately following the ceremony and inquire if we should do anything further to legalize our marriage. As he was telling me these things, Rúhíyyih Khánúm was looking very nervous, suddenly Shoghi Effendi turned to her and said, "whats bothering you/" She replied that she was worried that we might not be able to register our marriage and would we really be legally married with only the Bahá'í ceremony. The beloved Guardian replied, - "of course they will be legally married with only the Bahá'í ceremony!"

Rúhíyyih Khánúm fixed a lovely corsage for me and had put it in a plastic bag to keep fresh until the day of the ceremony. At the appointed time a small car drew up and amid the good wishes of all who were thereto seemme off, we set out on our journey I shared the back seat with Mansour and the Bahá'í from Trans-Jordan sat in front with the driver. As we left the city, Mansour advised me that we would no doubt be stopped many times as we were taking the inland route which went through arab towns. He said if we were stopped for me to keep my head down and say as little as possible. Both he and the gentleman from Trans-Jordan had two hats, a fez for arab territory and berets when passing through jewish areas. If we hadn't been so tense, it would have been comical, as we approached a town or a barrier, they would get out the kind of cigarettes the guards liked and put on the proper hat, the other hat tucked down on the floor of the car at their feet. They changed hats several times on this journey, about midway of the trip we had left all the jewish towns behind but we were stopped over twenty times, when this happened the guards would swarm around the car and sometimes shove their guns right in the windows. At Nablus we were taken into a school-yard and the car and luggage was thoroughly inspected. In most cases the road-blocks were made of wood and barbed wire and they were movable, our papers were examined each time. Nothing serious happened to us but we were all very nervous.

It was arranged that the men would stay at a small hotel called the Swiss Pension in the old city and I would get a taxi and continue on to the Jasmin House. Ben was due to arrive the next day and it was left that I would phone Mansour as soon as Ben had come and he would then alert the Bahá'ís from Trans-Jordan. I didn't sleep much that night!

Needless to say, I was filled with all sorts of emotion as I sat in the lobby of the Jasmin House expecting to see or hear from Ben. I found that all communication with the airport at Lydda was cut off, there was no way to find out if planes were coming in. I tried to read but I couldn't concentrate, it is cold in Jerusalem in March so I hired a portable electric heater, you had to put a coin in every so often, each time the door opened my spirits would lift, only to fall again when no Ben was in sight. About mid-afternoon, one of the porters started bringing in suitcases and they had the initials

"B.D.W." on them! When I saw Ben coming in the door, I almost fainted with joy and relief. It was like a movie scenario, reunited after more than a years separation, the relief after the frustration of making plans only to have them broken, so many obstacles and at last he was really here. I immediately phoned Mansour and he said to come to the Swiss Pension at nine o'clock the next morning, March 20, 1948.

What a rosy glow Ben and I shared, as soon as he was settled in his room, we went for a walk, arm in arm, and caught up on each others news. He told me that Air France only took him to Paris, because the last flight out of Lydda Airport had been fired upon and they refused to send in any more of their planes! At first, he didn't know how long he might have to stay in Paris and was told to stay close to a phone. He was finally notified that they had secured space on another airline. When this plane landed at Lydda, there was no transportation to Jerusalem! Ben pointed out that his ticket said his destination was Jerusalem and it was up to them to see that he got there. After some consultation they found someone who was willing to take him. They were stopped several times, luckily there were no untoward incidents.

After dinner that evening, we sat in the lobby and noted that the hotel was a base for some international newsmen and women, among them Danish, French, English and American. There was also a very chic french lady who had been the owner of a fashion boutique, she had been bombed out and was living in the hotel temporarily. She owned a large black dog and one of the newsmen had a honey colored Labrador Retriever, they were both in the puppy stage and played together like two small children, it was like a floor show!

Ben and I were both glad to retire early, the day had been full of tensions. My room was on the second floor and unluckily for me some of the newsmen were playing poker in the adjacent room! Tired as I was, I couldn't get to sleep and the noise next door didn't help, finally, about three A.M. I tapped on the wall and asked them if they please wouldn't call it a night as I had to get up early the next morning. When I arose I felt as if I had sand in my eyes, some bride I said to myself as I put on my lovely wedding dress. Nevertheless I was radiantly happy to think this was our wedding day.

Promptly at nine we arrived at the Swiss Pension, just inside the wall of the old city, it was like another world. As we entered the lobby, which was mid-eastern in décor, we saw a tiny arab lady sitting cross-legged on one of the divans, two long braids hung around her face, the ends had been dipped in henna, a charcoal brazier in front of her was filled with hot coals which she was casually turning with a pair of tongs. Such a fragrant aroma and an exotic touch to set the scene for a memorable occasion.

As we were led up the stairs to a lobby on the second floor, we saw the quorum of five men from Trans-Jordan seated at the end of a long table. Mansour motioned us to two chairs halfway down the table, explaining that he would translate for us. First, one of the gentlemen annointed us with Attar of Rose, then there was the chanting of suitable prayers and the Marriage Tablet, then the dowry was exchanged, just as we exchanged our vows, a huge explosion went off nearby. In the excitement they found they had not brought the stamp to authenticate our marriage certificate and would have to take all four copies back to Trans-Jordan to have them stamped! Also, the wedding ring that Ben had for me had been off-loaded with some other luggage in Piraeus, Greece! They hustled us out so fast before anything else happened that we didn't even have any wedding refreshments which stood on a small table nearby, they did give us the vial of Attar of Rose that they had used for anointing us which we treasured.

Shoghi Effendi had a calligrapher make four hand-done marriage certificates in Arabic, one for the Trans-Jordan Assembly, one for Haifa records, one for Ben and one for me. Here we were, outside on the street, no ring and no proof of our marriage! However, we were in a pink cloud of happiness and not bothered by any of these problems. We went directly to the narrow steps that led to the Post Office and sent word to Haifa and our relatives that the marriage had taken place. We started to the American Embassy which was within walking distance, as we took the stairs that led to street below the level of the street we were on, we noted an oriental gift shop at the bottom of the stairs. Ben said lets go in and buy you something to celebrate the occasion. While browsing around I saw a tray filled with rings, among them, wedding rings which I brought to Ben's attention, the proprietor heard our discussion and when he realized we had just been married, he got all excited, he dragged two ornate chairs made of carved wood inlaid with mother-of-pearl to the center of the shop, rushed to the door calling for the coffee boy and began inviting passers-by to come in and meet the bride and groom! We had our reception after all! Ben bought me a lovely necklace and a silver wedding ring.

We continued on to the embassy and found the front of the building had been the scene of a bombing and was all boarded up with barbed wire strung along the approach. An arrow directed us to the rear of the building and as we went up the alley, Ben put the ring on my finger and we had our wedding kiss!

A military attache was on duty at the entrance and we stated our business, he informed us that the ambassador was in Tel-Aviv, but a vice-consul was in charge and he would see us. As we explained the reason for our call, the vice-consul stated that he had only arrived in Jerusalem the previous day and hadn't any idea of what would be the proper procedure! This took a load off our minds as we hoped that no other ceremony would be necessary as we wanted our Bahá'í marriage to be legal in itself. As we left, we asked the military attache where we could safely go for a few days honeymoon, he pondered the question, saying that events changed from day to day, sometimes americans were in favor with the jews, sometimes not, and the same was true with the arabs. Finally, he suggested Jericho if we could find someone to take us there, which he rather doubted. We left again by the side alley and just around the corner we found a taxi, it was a fairly new Studebaker, with decorations inside, bluebeads hanging from the rear-view mirror, to keep off the "evil eye" artificial flowers, plus a very garish rug tacked to the back of the front seat. The driver could have qualified for a part in a movie, young, handsome, flashing white teeth and a small black moustache. He wore a white shirt and black trousers, but had the arab kaffiyah on his head, he was most dashing. While on our way back to the Jasmin House, we inquired about the possibility of getting down to Jericho for a few days, he said he would take us and we arranged for him to come for us about two o'clock,

We told our hosts at Jasmin House that we had just been married and they immediately wanted to toast us with champagne! We explained that we were teetotalers so they graciously invited us to be their guests for lunch. We told Mr. Haddad we would be back in three days and set off on our next adventure.

Shoghi Effendi told us to take as long as we wanted but we felt that it would be wiser to return to Haifa as soon as possible, the battle of the streets was getting serious, in fact, it was not too long before Jerusalem was cut off from the rest of the country. The inhabitants went through a period of near starvation!

Even as I write this, I relive the excitement of this wonderful experience, even though some of it was dangerous. As our taxi circled the Old City of Jerusalem, we passed many famous sites, it was as if time had rolled back and visions of past history filled our eyes. Ben had on a hat which the driver asked him to remove, the road wound down between rocky barren hills and the driver pointed out snipers nests in cave-like formations high over the road, he believed we would be shot at if they thought we were americans!

As we came down out of the hills, we rode along the shore of the Dead Sea, the driver pointed out a rocky formation shaped something like a human being and said it was Lot's wife that had been turned into a pillar of salt and it had been moved close to the road so the tourists could see it! The guides in the Holy Land sure embroidered their stories, you never knew just what to believe.

We registered at the Palace Garden Hotel and asked the taxi driver to come back in three days. There were no rooms with private bath, and the wooden structure creaked and groaned with every step, but it was lovely after the cold of Jerusalem to come into warm humid air smelling of orange blossoms. Shortly after we had settled in, someone in a nearby location started playing on a tinny, out of tune piano, and you will never guess what they were playing. "Way Down Upon the Swanee River!" We adopted this for our theme song, we never heard this song without being transported right back to Jericho! We thought it wise to stay close to the hotel, there were only a few guests, mostly british soldiers on leave, every so often a truck-load of guerrillas would speed through the town shooting their guns in the air, everything and everyone got out of their way. One day, at lunch, there was a man and his wife in the dining room, the proprietor had a guest who was an officer in the Syrian army and us, suddenly we heard the roar of a truck speeding through, the men shooting in the air as usual, it sounded as if the bullets were coming right in the windows, I was seated with my back to the window and I felt as if I was going to be hit any minute, the man got down on his knees and crawled from the room leaving his poor wife to fend for herself. The rest of us couldn't help but laugh at this display.

We enjoyed sitting on the small terrace in front of the hotel watching the passers by, small flocks of sheep, goats, some camels and an odd assortment of people. It was so beautiful at sundown, with the sky so clear it took on a lemon color tinged with rose and the hills around us seemed to be cut out of purple cardboard. All present would gather around the radio when it was newstime to hear the latest developments, when the broadcast was over there would be a heated discussion, we wondered if even this would cause trouble. At this juncture it was a three way war between the british, jews and arabs, so there was plenty of room for argument. Lots of little shoe-shine boys were around and few customers, Ben had his shoes shined several times a day, these little urchins were very persuasive!

When our taxi returned the driver had his young son with him and our trip back to the Jasmin House was uneventful. We were limited in what we could do in this war of the streets and the first day after we returned we tried to go to the Thomas Cook office to arrange our trip to Haifa. This proved impossible as so much shooting was taking place in that area. As we strolled along a street above the lower town we approached the jewish shopping center, there was a barbed wire barricade manned by a british soldier, he swung it wide to let us pass. Almost immediately a taxi full of men came hurtling toward us, pulling over directly in our path on the sidewalk, we were certainly startled and a lady nearby said in english, "do not be afraid, they only want to check your documents, we had so many bad incidents here of late." The men motioned us to get in the car and we were driven to a security post in a school yard, our passports were taken from us and were asked to wait in a small cubicle. Ben had a policy which I adopted, say nothing and await developments. Finally our papers were returned and we were taken by taxi back to the barrier and told not to return to that section of the city again! We wondered why the guard didn't inform us that we might be picked if we entered that area.

As we walked along the street to return to our hotel, we heard "thunk-ing" sounds hitting the wooden fences that had been erected in front of the houses, suddenly we realized they were from bullets coming in our direction from the arab quarter below us. We soon hurried our pace to a safer place. We decided that sightseeing was not for us.

It being March and still quite cold and wintry, we again hired a small electric heater and retired to our room with some reading matter. That evening, about dusk, we were sitting by the heater in the center of the room, reading, when all of a sudden there was a tremendous explosion nearby, near enough to blow open our windows and there was Ben looking out the window to see what was happening! He had been an ambulance driver in the first world war and could take this in his stride but I leapt back into the corner of the room instinctively, afterward Ben said he never saw anybody move any faster than I did. I called to him to come to a safer spot and he said. "the danger is all over for the present!" An old truck had been rigged up with explosives and pushed to a point where it could be rolled down an incline toward the King David Hotel which was a center for military personnel and United Nations observers, actually it did not roll far enough to do the damage they thought it might.

Each evening as it neared curfew time we would sit in the lobby and watch the return of the news correspondents, they gave us very little information, when asked what was going on they would say "sporadic shooting"! There was an english girl reporter who saw the ambush on Mount Scopus when the jewish people were on a bus that was set on fire, as they left the burning bus they were shot cold-bloodedly. Naturally she was extremely upset and a feeling of gloom and doom settled over us all. One of the reporters was an american, he had a bright red M.G. each evening he would drive it up on the sidewalk near a huge tree and run a chain from the steering wheel around the trunk of the tree. All of these people were very interesting.

As soon as we were able to get to the Thomas Cook office, we found that the best way to get to Haifa was through arab territory however we would have to get special permits from the Arab Higher League and someone would have to vouch for us. Their headquarters were in the Old City. Cook's was able to make arrangements for someone to escort us who was known to the arabs in charge. The next morning we were ushered into a reception room at headquarters, several of the newsmen from the hotel were there and were surprised to see us there. We were treated respectfully, our passports were taken and soon we were served turkish coffee, we also were asked to supply some passport pictures, they asked no questions of us and soon we received our safe-conduct passes. They were written in arabic so we have no idea what they said.

The next morning a driver from Cook's arrived in an american Stude-baker, a fierce looking man who spoke no english, he had a fez on his head, wore a heavy coat with a large wool muffler wound around his neck, his large moustache was twirled at the ends! He had all our papers which he produced whenever we were stopped. As we left Jerusalem and wound our way down the hills and through the valleys. It began to rain hard, the roads were slippery as the rain had turned the dust on the road to slimy mud, as we approached a long straight stretch of road, a large truck crowded us, the driver swerved to avoid it and we hit the soft shoulder and our car turned completely over, landing on its wheels in the soft dirt in the nearby field! My first thought while hurtling through the air was, my, that was a short marriage! Ben had put his arm out to protect me and had bumped into the rear of the front seat, we found out later he had a broken rib, I hit my head on the roof and cut my ear, otherwise we seemed unharmed. The car suffered a lot of damage, all the glass in the front was broken and all the doors were jammed, the top was crushed like an eggshell. While we were taking stock of ourselves and the damage, a british army lorry pulled up to help us. They pried open the doors and helped us out, as I stepped on the road, one of the soldiers said, - "why, Miss Anderson, what has happened to you!"

He had met me when he was in the escort of the All High Commissioner when they visited Bahjí. They helped us aboard the lorry and drove us to the police station a short distance away, leaving someone to help the driver and to find out if the car was too damaged to continue our journey. They wanted to give us a strong drink, but we settled for a mug of good black tea. In the rest room I got a glimpse of myself in the mirror, my eyes looked like two black coals in a face as white as a sheet. A bit later we were informed that they had brought the car to the station and run it up and down a bit, it seemed mechanically able and the driver was willing to continue on to Haifa. What a wild ride that was, with no glass in the windshield the wind buffeted our faces and we were sort of in shock. Soon we approached some jewish villages, our driver took out a revolver and held it on the ready in his right hand, resting on the steering wheel! As we went down Kingsway, along the waterfront in Haifa, shots were being exchanged up ahead, so the car was pulled over and parked by the curb, it soon became evident that the shooting would continue and the driver turned the car around and parked on the opposite side of the street, he got out and drew a long knife from the glove compartment, at first, we wondered if he was going to finish us off, then he started to clear the soft dirt from the frame of the car with the knife point. After a while I realized we were near the arab bazaar and made motions to the driver saying “souk, souk” he got the idea and as we drove through we could see piles of hand grenades on the sidewalk curbs!

As we arrived at the gate, Rúhíyyih Khánúm was just coming across the street from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, she thought we had been hit by one of those hand grenades! Ben gave the driver extra money because of the damage to the car , even though the price we agreed to through Cook’s was exorbitant.

We had such a nice welcoming lunch with Rúhíyyih Khánúm and Mr. Maxwell who were meeting Ben for the first time. As we described our adventures, it was decided that Ben must see a doctor, we found he did have a broken rib which was well strapped up with adhesive tape. Although he was uncomfortable, we paid our respects at the beautiful Shrine of the Báb and later in the afternoon we were interviewed by the beloved Guardian who gave Ben a warm and loving welcome. Shoghi Effendi spoke of many things but primarily of his hopes and plans for the protection and beautification of the Shrine containing the Sacred Dust of the Báb and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The funds were available to at least start the construction , having been in the bank for some time awaiting a reasonable period of peace.

Ben drove Shoghi Effendi to the Shrine of the Báb each day and he was always invited to accompany the Guardian when he made his visits. On the first occasion Ben said he cried like a baby and couldn’t seem to control himself, he apologized to Shoghi Effendi who comforted him saying that most everyone was affected that way on their first visit. Ben was thrilled with everything, falling in love with the country, what he was able to see of it.

As the date May 15, 1948 came closer, there was chaos in the city around us all through the rest of March and into the month of April. Each day brought news of more kidnappings, more cars being stolen, more shootings, bombings, vandalism and hand grenades being thrown. Most Jewish residents were living half-way up Mount Carmel or on the top of the mountain, the arabs were in the lower town. So much harassment was taking place that tensions were building up in quarters. About this time Shoghi Effendi decided to send Mr. Maxwell and Ben to Italy to start investigation and negotiations for materials relative to starting the construction on the Shrine of the Báb. Another reason for sending them at this time was that several prominent englishmen had been kidnapped, in some cases killed, one of them was killed in an orange grove, his body tied to a tree, when he rescuers found him they were killed also as the body had been booby trapped. Both Mr. Maxwell and Ben were tall, distinguished looking gentlemen, very conspicuous amidst the general population.

Mind you, this decision was made two weeks after Ben and I were married! I used to joke about it, saying that Mr. Maxwell went on my honeymoon. I became very busy making the travel arrangements, air reservations were no problem, the difficulty was to get them safely to the airport, also there wasn't time to get an Italian visa for Ben. It was decided to notify Ugo Giachery in Rome to try to get permission for Ben to land there, otherwise Ben would have to continue on to Switzerland and get a visa at the Italian Consulate there.

The only transport to Tel-Aviv would be by armored taxi, this meant that the only visibility out of the car was a small space for the driver, the plan was for them to stay in a hotel in Tel-Aviv until the local travel office could confirm their plane to Rome. Each day they had to check with the Peltour Travel Office, in turn we could phone the Haifa office and they would pass on messages to their office in Tel-Aviv. You can Imagine how we all felt, Rúḥíyyih Khánúm putting her dear father in what seemed to be like a black box and I feeling the same way about my dear Ben! It was weird seeing only their white faces in the gloom of the back seat of that car.

While the plans for Italy were in the making, Shoghi Effendi said that Ben must go to Bahjí to pay his respects at the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, another problem, how would we get there, the road around the Bay of Haifa was mined and many skirmishes had taken place on certain sections of it. Mansour was asked to inquire a-round to see what the possibilities were. He discovered that a fishing boat was ferrying people across the bay, for a price! Most of the passengers were running away from the bad situation. Ben and I were alerted to be ready to go at a moments notice, before long Mansour told us to be ready the next morning, we went by taxi to a place on the beach on the outskirts of the city, there we found a motley group of people, small rowboats were taking the passengers out to where the boat was anchored, the oarsmen were standing in the water and would pick up a person in their arms and place them in the boat, how I would have liked a picture of Ben being carried by an arab much shorter than he was, his arms and legs were dangling over the water! On board the fishing boat we found a strange assemblage, people of all ages, chickens, goats, parcels of possessions and some bicycles. We had to wait until the boat was filled and it was interesting to see all the water-craft going by, one was a motor boat with two rowboats linked to it and each rowboat had a donkey standing in it. Smaller fishing boats circled around our boat selling fish to the passengers, I venture to say that some of these people didn't know where their next meal was coming from!

After a long time the boat finally got under way, we suddenly realized that we were approaching Acre by way of the sea, just as Bahá'u'lláh and the rest of the exiles did in August 1868. It was a tricky situation and we could never have managed if Mansour hadn't been there to take care of everything.

The fishing boat anchored in the deep water outside of Acre and we were transferred to small boats. The arrangements were such that we had to step out on a narrow ledge, about two feet wide, at the foot of the city wall and all had to pay a fee in order to enter the city. We walked a short distance before we found a taxi to take us to Bahjí, what a rattletrap it was, we felt as if we were sitting on bare springs and wondered if it could even complete the trip. After the turmoil and tension of the journey, what a blessing to enter the serenity and peace of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh with its lovely surroundings.

Shoghi Effendi had told us that we might have to stay overnight, possibly longer depending on conditions. We spent the day amid the historical items on display inside the Mansion and late in the afternoon were seated on the balcony when a taxi from Haifa arrived. Matters had settled down somewhat and a driver had been found who was willing to undertake the trip. One of the Bahá'ís from #7 Persian accompanied him and did all the talking, we were stopped several times at road blocks, later he told us that he told the soldiers guarding the barriers that Ben was an important diplomat from the United States and no harm should come to him or they would be in real trouble. All concerned breathed a sigh of relief when we arrived safely home.

Peltours kept us in touch with what was happening to Mr. Maxwell and Ben in Tel-Aviv, we also learned from them that they had a difficult trip to Tel-Aviv, the taxi was stopped by the British and the passengers had quite a long walk through a rough field, carrying their luggage. A bus finally arrived and took them to the city. The trip usually took an hour and a half, this trip took five hours. The flight reservation that they had was canceled and they had to wait five days before they could leave. Ben's notes stated, "we were notified by Peltours to leave at one P.M., for the airport in an armored bus, all twenty-eight on board were inspected for weapons, a boy with four hand grenades and a tommy gun sat at a rear gunport." They were supposed to have a room at the airport hotel to rest in before a two A.M., departure but two other men claimed the room so Mr. Maxwell and Ben had to try and get some rest in the waiting room, it was a long hard day for them.

It was such a relief to learn that when they arrived at Rome airport, Ugo Giachery was waiting and had an entry visa for Ben. Luckily we had communication with Italy and after many anxious hours, we were informed of their safe arrival.

Ugo had set up appointments with key people and this started a series of meetings with representatives of firms chosen to carry out the plans for protecting and beautifying the Shrine of the Báb. According to Mr. Bufalini, the head of the marble firm, no ornamental buildings were being built in the aftermath of the war, and if this contract hadn't come at just this time, all the expert stone cutters would have dispersed to other countries to enable them to earn a living. We were told later that the purchase of the marble and granite as well as labor for the artisans saved the marble industry of Italy! At one point in the discussions, Mr. Bufalini said he would be willing to carry out this work with little or no profit in order to keep his craftsmen together. In an exchange of messages, Shoghi Effendi conveyed the idea that the laborer was worthy of his hire and a price was agreed upon that satisfied both parties.

Mr. Maxwell and Ben expected to be away for three to four weeks, after changing plans several times, they were able to book passage on the “Argentina”, a medium size ship carrying jews emigrating to Israel, or Palestine as it was still known at this juncture. They ended up spending six weeks in Italy and arrived in Haifa Bay on the evening of the fourteenth of May, 1948 and disembarked the next day. The British Administration ended at midnight, May 14th, 1948, and a ship was in readiness for their departure, this was for key people as many of the soldiers and former residents had already left.

While Mr. Maxwell and Ben were away, the local situation rapidly became worse, authority was breaking down on all levels. Although life went on as usual with the Bahá'ís at the world center, we were greatly affected by the outside conditions. All sort of rumours were being circulated as to what would happen when the mandate ended. What a fateful four weeks lay ahead! It was getting extremely difficult to send or receive mail and cables. Street fighting became constant. We were notified that a large shipment of books had arrived at the post-office branch located on the outskirts of the business section of Haifa and I went down to get them. As I was approaching the area, I noticed an unruly group at the entrance armed with piles of rocks for ammunition, I retreated down Kingsway searching for a taxi, when I found one, the driver was jewish and when I told him where I wanted to go, he refused until I saw a british policeman nearby and he agreed to accompany us, he hooked his arm through one of the window supports, hung on, and we sped up to the post office, neither of the men would help me with the books, I had to make several trips back and forth, carrying the cartons myself, at least there was no rock throwing while we were there.

On my regular route to town, the arabs had closed off an alley with cement blocks, leaving small apertures through which guns protruded!

It did make me rather nervous to pass this place, later, one of the Bahá'ís told me he had been asked to tell me to go another way to town or I would be taken behind this barrier for interrogation, they thought I was a spy and if taken in, it would not be pleasant! I needed no prodding to choose another route.

Each day brought new incidents, fires, looting and things stolen, there was a lovely lead ornament in the garden at # 10 Persian Street that was taken in the dark of one night. Law and order had broken down, I spent many hours at the Customs office in the harbor trying to collect refunds due us from previous deposits. There was very little shipping going on and customs duty cash was just trickling in. I would seat myself on a tall stool behind the collection window and as soon as any cash came in I would present my refund slips, we collected most of what was due us, if I hadn't stayed right there, the money would have disappeared for some other purpose.

Whenever we received a shipment with ornaments for the gardens, we were obliged to pay the duty, then place the article in its permanent position, then we would make an appointment for an inspector to come, he would sign the necessary papers for a refund, because we were a religion we were supposed to be tax exempt. One such shipment came during this troubled time and the time came when the item was ready for inspection, the inspector phoned me and said he was an arab and would prefer to meet me at the head of the steps in front of the Báb's shrine as he would come up from the arab quarter. He didn't want to come by the front gate as he was uneasy in the Jewish neighborhood. I went to pay my respects before the appointed time. As I waited and wandered around waiting for him, the gardeners gave me bouquets of flowers. The inspector was a very refined, dignified looking man and respectfully accompanied me to note the position of the newly positioned ornaments. As we walked back toward the stairs he began to tell me how worried he was about the situation, he had sent his family away for safety, out of Palestine and was wondering if he should follow them or remain through the troubles to safeguard his property. I sympathized with him in his dilemma, impulsively I handed him the flowers I held and said I hoped they would cheer him up then he went on his way.

Later that afternoon I was to report to Shoghi Effendi the results of the inspection, when I entered the drawing room I could see he was upset, his eyes literally flashed fire, he said: - "do you know what happened this afternoon ? - I sent the keeper of the Báb's Shrine back to his home village! " It seems that someone overheard him tell another person that I had met a lover in the garden near the Shrine, Shoghi Effendi said, - "I flew to your defense like a lion!" I was sorry for the man, he was an elderly persian that wore the abba and a fez and looked so picturesque seated on the tiles at the entrance to the Báb's Shrine. A lesson for us to realize the results of Backbiting.

There were many raids on jewish business near us, one was a tire store on the next street, it was set on fire and completely destroyed, the smell of burnt rubber lingered in the air for several days. An iron-monger had a large stockyard at the foot of Persian Street, as he was jewish it became dangerous for him to operate it in that area, we heard he barely escaped with his life through a rear entrance, his place was invaded and for days his goods were hauled off, in many cases by small children, they would lift up iron rods, the type used in re-inforced concrete construction, balance the ends on their shoulders and drag them off, these could well be disposed of on the black market as they were in short supply.

Retaliations took place until the conditions became intolerable. I was all alone at # 10 Persian Street, with the men in Italy and one night I became terrified, I thought I heard foot-steps coming down the hall toward my bedroom door, I had securely locked it before retiring but when a war is going on you never know what to expect. It was decided that I should sleep over at #7, it being too dangerous for me to be in that big house alone at night.

Not long after my move across the street, we were awakened by a heavy bombardment, the battle for Haifa had begun, it raged all night and by daylight the city fell to the jews. They had the advantage because it was easier to lob shells down on the lower city, than for the arabs to lob them up to the heights. All along the infiltrators had advised the arabs to leave the city for two weeks and then when they had pushed the "jews into the sea, they could come back and have all the possessions that had been left behind." They left alright but not as they had expected, they became panic stricken and all during the day following the battle the arab population evacuated the city, they flowed down Persian street like a human river, carrying only a few possessions. We heard that the scenes at the water-front were indescribable, the british were helping them to flee, using boats and ships of all description, I was told by someone who had personally witnessed it that, in their desperation, adults would trample children to get on board, in one case, a large man used the body of a child as a step to get on the boat! Conditions in Acre must have been terrible with all these refugees arriving, it was estimated that about forty thousand took refuge there!

For several weeks prior to the evacuation, the mayor of Haifa had sent trucks through the city which were equipped with loud-speakers, his message to the populace was repeated in three languages, english, arabic and hebrew, he implored them not to leave the city, he said we need you to run the port facility, your knowledge of olive and orange culture and promised that there would not be a massacre if the jews should take over! To no avail, when panic sets in, reason is lost. All government offices and many business establishments were in complete disorder. Of course, no fresh foods were delivered, we lived on stores that we had been acquiring for just such an emergency.

For several days no mail or cables came in or were sent out, soon, public services began to function and we were in communication with the outside world, even though at times it was very irregular. Other battles were taking place in the country, such as the takeover of the town of Lydda and the airport, we were told this battle was fought from house to house. Mind you, this was only mid-April and the mandate was not due to end until May 14th at midnight, it was all so disorganized that the ones in charge looked the other way. It was as if a ball had started rolling and there was no way to stop it.

Now we had to realize that the jews controlled large portions of the country, and that we were surrounded by three arab countries, no way to get out except by air or sea; It was at this time that fate stepped in to change the plans of the United Nations regarding Palestine. Nahariyah, a jewish resort settlement north of Acre, was completely cut off, they were low on supplies and had no electricity. All the attempts to go to their assistance were thwarted, after the city of Haifa fell, the jewish defenders decided to march around the bay regardless of the fact that Acre was crowded with arab refugees and the possibility that they might run into road mines. According to reports, when the fleeing arabs heard that the jews were coming, they again became panic stricken and another river of humanity flowed up the coast over the boundary into Lebanon, and there some of them are to this day!

Consequently, the borders as defined by the United Nations Partition no longer applied, the jews had occupied the area. You can well imagine what a relief this was to the beloved Guardian, had the partition stood as it had been outlined, all the Bahá'í historical places in Acre, Bahjí and Mazra'a would have been in another country which would require visas, passports and probably these documents would not have been obtainable from enemies of the Jewish state. The matter wasn't entirely settled but for the time being, the worry had lessened.

For some time we had been sending messages to a Bahá'í in Istanbul, Turkey to forward to Persia and other countries where there was no direct communication. One day I received a personal letter from him which pleased me so much that I saved it and quote the following:

“ Dear Bahá'í Sister,

Your kind letter of March 8th, 1950 enclosing a letter for our spiritual brother, ‘Abbás Adib Ikbál, came to my hand yesterday. I sent the enclosed envelope immediately by air mail. I am, dear sister, always at your disposal for such services.

I have been wondering for some time past who may be this lady correspondent, this Mrs. Weeden, that enjoys in these exceptional days the privilege of treading so softly the hollowed alleys and streets of our sanctified world center like an ethereal angel, an embodiment of the spirit of devotion?

Then came the illumination. The other day while turning over the leaves of the back numbers of “Bahá'í News”, I came across the story of your marriage. So you are our dear Sister Gladys. The same spirit dedicated to a life of service in the cause of our Lord under any name whatsoever. Hail to thee! “

The balance of the letter referred to other matters but I loved being called an “ethereal angel!” He spoke of the “hollowed alleys” either it was a typographical error or he didn't realize it should be “hallowed.”

There were times when even Turkey was cut off, therefore, Shoghi

Effendi sent Salah Jarrah, the keeper of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh,

Beirut, Lebanon, with some important material to forward to various places. It happened that May 15th came while Salah was absent from Palestine and it became the State of Israel. There was no way that Salah could get a visa for his return. He was very resourceful and went over to the Island of Cyprus to see what could be done there. Eventually we received a cable from him asking Shoghi Effendi's permission to return, which was granted. We had been so worried about him and were relieved to learn that he could return. Then one day we got a call from the harbor police, they said they were holding a member of our community who had entered the country illegally! They asked that someone come down and straighten the matter out, we were glad to comply and to show you the good will toward our community they gave him the proper credentials to enter.

As far as Salah was concerned no living authority was greater than that of the beloved Guardian to whom he was devoted completely! Salah spoke English and Arabic and learned Hebrew after the new state was formed which was most helpful.

It was a constant source of irritation to him that some covenant breakers lived in the house close to the Bahjí Mansion, these people entertained quite a lot and when their windows were open, the noise disturbed the serenity of the Shrine area. One day after Ben had returned from Italy, we drove to Bahjí on an errand, when we knocked on the door of the Pilgrim House, Salah 's mother answered, we enquired for Salah, she spoke only arabic and couldn't understand us and we couldn't understand her. She called one of the gardeners but he wasn't much better, however, he did manage to convey to us that Salah was taken away by the police, motioning toward Acre. We parked by the sea across the street from the police station, I decided Ben could handle the situation and waited in the car, after what seemed a long time, Ben came out with Salah in tow, looking like a black thunder-cloud. Not a word was spoken on the trip back to Bahjí. On our way back to Haifa, Ben told me what had happened. A party was in progress in the house next to Bahjí and Salah lost his patience with the noise and put a ladder up to the windows, closed them and started nailing them so they couldn't be re-opened. Of course the owners heard this banging and came to investigate, not only did they push the ladder away knocking Salah to the ground, but they hit him on the head with a slipper! In the East this is the insult of insults, the worst thing that can happen to you. The police were called and the charge was breaking and entering, when the hearing was held, the man said he would not press charges if there was an apology and a promise that such a thing would not happen again. Shoghi Effendi was very cross with Salah, among other things he told him that he had put Mr, Ben in an embarrassing position, having to apologize and shake hands with a covenant breaker! It shows that devotion carried to extremes can cause serious problems.

A very pleasant incident concerning Salah took place a few months after the new state was born. He had established excellent relations with the authorities in Acre and had invited some of the new officials to Bahjí. The most Great Prison had been empty after the new government had released all of the prisoners, most of whom were there for political reasons. We all wondered what the property would be used for, we had heard rumours that it would be used as a mental institution, there was no doubt that such an institution was needed, so many of the new immigrants had been exposed to terrible experiences.

One would see people on the street who were definately unbalanced, there was one lady who made her home on the sidewalk at the Mt, Carmel Avenue end of Kingsway, she had a cot and during the day, all her possession were stacked on it and covered with a tarpaulin, you would see her in doorways in the business center wrapped in yards and yards of pink cotton material like a cocoon, others walking in the streets muttering to themselves, not to mention the man who was following me around.

Imagine our amazement when a letter addressed to the "Bahá'í Community arrived stating that the authorities wished to turn over the room that Bahá'u'lláh occupied to the care of the Bahá'ís into perpetuity and would we please arrange for someone to come and accept the key! The beloved Guardian could hardly believe his eyes! Usually anything along these lines had to be negotiated, involving many visits to offices, letters and delays, this one fell into our hands like a golden apple.

The date for the ceremony for receiving the key was set up and Ben, Salah and myself were appointed by Shoghi Effendi to carry out this meaningful assignment. With the head of the institution, the three of us met in the prison room, entirely bare on this occasion and prayers were solemnly intoned in three languages. During the British Administration a plaque had been placed over the doorway stating that Bahá'u'lláh had occupied this room, also noting the dates. Shoghi Effendi immediately, took two actions, he sent a generous donation to the director and started plans for refurbishing the room. He had simple articles placed there in memory of the period of Bahá'u'lláh's incarceration. This Holy Place is now visited by Bahá'í pilgrims from all over the world. Later, we were advised by the authorities that the money sent by Shoghi Effendi was used to buy earphones for all the beds of the patients enabling them to tune in to radio broadcasts.

The wing where this room is can be reached by an outside stairway, therefore visitors are not aware of the activities in the rest of the building. The opposite room is dedicated to the memory of a Jewish hero and is set apart in his memory. Another link in the chain of unusual events occurring at this time.

It was very strange to look down at the lighted port, trying to pick out the "Argentina", the ship that had our loved ones aboard, praying that no untoward incident would take place until they were safely ashore and back home. I went down very early the next morning to wait for them to land. The quay was lined with lighters that were waiting to be unloaded, crowds of people were there awaiting relatives. About nine o'clock, lighters carrying passengers appeared, as the lighters approached the people began to sing the Jewish National Anthem, which had been written and widely circulated in anticipation of this day. Many trips between ship and shore were made, there were about five-hundred aboard, there was a lighter filled with bags of grain at the point where they were landing and they were stacked up like stairs, it was some sight to see them coming over these "stairs" and fall down and kiss the ground.

Such jubilation, the first day of the new State of Israel, everything was free, no customs examinations or charges!! I was caught up in the spirit of rejoicing, tears in my eyes to see people embracing and all talking at once. It was almost noon before Mr, Max-well and Ben landed, you can picture my feelings as I greeted them after all they had been through since I had last seen them. There was such confusion in the port that they stamped Ben's passport with their new state stamp, making him a citizen of Israel, this was corrected later on.

How they loved that hurriedly made rubber stamp proclaiming the "State of Israel"! Although it is safe to say that many of the Jewish people rejoiced and celebrated the birth of their own state, some of the population were apprehensive. Of course there were many problems still to be solved but it was remarkable that the turnover in the government was accomplished with a minimum of disturbance, at least as I, an outside observer saw it. I can only say that an administrative framework must have been prepared in advance.

Food and electricity shortages were the order of the day as more and more immigrants began to arrive. I was told of an airlift from Yemen, these jewish people had lived in an arab culture and were afraid of planes, they said the passengers preferred to sit on the floor and how odd it was to look back on empty seats when they knew the plane was full. As offices sprung up to take care of the needs of the people such as housing, rationing, etc., the halls would be full of people sitting on the floor waiting their turns.

When the city of Haifa fell to the jews in April, 1948, and the arabs had fled, we learned that two streets away from us a grocer was selling his entire stock as he wanted to leave the country. We rushed over and supplemented our supplies as best we could, noone knew when new supplies could be obtained. Luckily we had plenty of dried foods but as time went on we ran out of cooking oil, excepting coconut oil (ugh!) then we had no onions, potatoes, cheese or other dairy products.

Not long after Ben returned from Italy, we started proceedings to register our marriage. We called at the American Consulate, met the consul, he said my passport could be changed to my married name upon receipt of a certificate validated by the new state. At the Municipality of Haifa, they were functioning under a provisional government, carrying on as the British had for the time being. We were told that they would recognize our marriage if they had been recorded under the previous administration. This had been done so the proper form was filled out by Rúhíyyih Khánúm and signed by Shoghi Effendi, we then took it to the registry where it was endorsed on the back by the new government in hebrew. With this evidence in hand we returned to the consulate and they issued a new passport to me under my married name. Shoghi Effendi was very pleased with these events as we had now set a precedent to smooth the path of future Bahá'í marriages in the State of Israel. Shoghi Effendi said that this was no doubt the reason why our plans to be married in Egypt didn't work out! (See Bahá'í World 1946-50, page 317 for photostat of the certificate.) I venture to say that not many people have a marriage certificate endorsed with the signature of the beloved Guardian.

Before Ben arrived in the country, we began to prepare his room, we scraped down a wooden bedstead, covered a divan with new material and furnished the small room between the two bedrooms and that became our "home". Now, the rooms we occupied have been turned into offices as this house has been used as headquarters for the Universal House of Justice until their new building is completed, We had our meals with Mr. Maxwell. Now that I look back on it. I think it odd that we never gave it a thought that we might somehow have a home of our own because we did expect to live our lives out at the world center. I guess it was due to the fact that we became engrossed with the plans of Shoghi Effendi and took everything a day at a time, first things first!

An amusing thing happened to me one day, I was going to Jerusalem but planned to stop at the post-office first, it was in a heavily guarded building with a path outlined with barbed wire leading up to the entrance, at a turn in the path was a guard, when I approached with my small overnight bag, he asked me to open it, I had to put it on the ground as it was shaped like two halves, he poked through it to see if I was carrying any weapons, when I went to stand up, the veil on my hat caught on his coat button! As I struggled to get it loose, I noted, out of the corner of my eye, at the next turn in the path, a guard in the sentry box had his gun trained on me. Another time, I was in Tel-Aviv on business in a public building, I was just starting up the staircase, when down the stairwell, a very clipped British voice called down, "my, word, I believe I see a hat, a real hat!" Most people went bareheaded or wore a scarf to cover the hair, I finally gave up hats too, as I seemed so conspicuous, besides there is a jerky wind blowing a lot of the time in this climate.

Some time after May 15, 1948, the new state decided it had to raise cash to run the country and they set up a system of short term Bonds. Shoghi Effendi asked Ben to consult with Mr. Sitton about this. Money had been on deposit in the bank for sometime earmarked for the addition to the Shrine of the Báb, it was gathering interest but the return would be greater from the bonds. Ben found out that this short term loan was guaranteed by United States dollars, so the funds were invested. Another benefit derived from putting money into the loan, especially for business men, was the fact that it gave them purchasing power in the United States for goods that were lacking in Israel. As we were not in business, we found we could sell our "dollar rights" and this brought us added profits. This turned out to be an excellent investment and bolstered the fund toward paying for the construction of the exterior of the Shrine of the Báb. Before Mr. Maxwell and Ben went to Italy, Shoghi Effendi would study the model, the clerestory and dome could be removed, he would walk around it, noting how it would look if only the arcade was completed, then he would ask Ben to put on the clerestory to see how it would appear if construction stopped there, it was clear that he would have liked to place contracts for the entire building. When the men left for Italy, the only contract to be made was for the arcade. It was after they returned that the decision was made to place contracts for the entire structure and that was when Shoghi Effendi asked the Bahá'ís to make contributions to complete the beautiful building. He had often remarked that it would be too bad not to have the entire carving done by the splendid artisans who had worked on the arcade.

When the Bahá'ís responded with their donations, I would spend hours with a clerk in the postoffice, all mail containing funds were held in a certain place until a responsible person came and the letters were opened in their presence, a deposit slip for the bank was made out and the next day the funds would be credited to our account. This was government control of foreign exchange.

As soon as negotiations in Italy were completed, things began to happen at the Báb's Shrine, it seemed a pity, but the beautiful gardens close to the building had to be torn up to make way for the foundation of the arcade. A first class supervising engineer and construction engineer had been found and a fine head mason who was with the project until its completion. A small railroad track was laid from the main road to the site to transport the material. Most everyone's energy and attention was focused on the operation. We learned that before any shipment was made from Italy, a whole wall was erected to be certain that the stones fitted together as there was only the space of a thin piece of cardboard between each stone, each one of the stones were numbered and had its exact position. When it came time to sink the pylons to support the structure, Shoghi Effendi had to be assured and re-assured that the precious remains in the Shrine would not be disturbed. As the work progressed, Shoghi Effendi asked Ben to write progress reports which were published in the Bahá'í News.

The area around the Tomb Shrine became a scene swarming with workers, many, many conferences took place between the Mr, Maxwell, Rúhíyyih Khánum, Ben and the engineers, all this information was relayed to Shoghi Effendi who made the decisions.

Often when Ben was driving Shoghi Effendi up to the Shrine, they would discuss the progress of the work and Ben would be amazed at the information the beloved Guardian would have at his finger-tips, including the financial reports.

The general public was excluded from the work area during the construction, yet, many came as close as possible to watch the progress of this beautiful edifice. All the able bodied Bahá'ís in Haifa were involved in this huge effort as well as many outsiders.

After the completion of the arcade, the head mason disappeared and we heard that he had said he just couldn't work on ordinary construction, putting stone on stone after handling the beautiful material from Italy. When it was announced that the building would continue while the matching marble and granite could still be obtained, the head mason appeared as mysteriously as he had disappeared and asked to be re-hired, he later said his hand had touched each stone in the entire structure.

Mr. Fred Waller became consul in Haifa in 1949, when we had business at the Consulate he apparently took a liking to us for he did many kind things. We were invited to his home to meet his family and he added our names to the social list which meant we were invited to social affairs of other Consulates. A Strong friendship developed and we were often in their home and especially for holidays. Not long after we had met them, Mr. Waller told us that stored in the Consulate were food supplies that had been kept on hand in case the resident Americans had to take refuge there due to the worsening of war conditions. He now felt the emergency was over and he was willing for our community to have first choice to buy as much as we wanted. What a blessing! There was tinned cheese, butter, many kinds of dehydrated foods that had been fortified also some army field rations. These items helped us through a very difficult period. The good will generated by this friendship was deeply appreciated.

Through the Wallers we met many other people whom we liked and soon a social life developed. Once in a while we gave a dinner party, persian style, as some food became available. Rúhíyyih Khánúm had a real knack for making the table look beautiful. One of our new friends was the head of the 'Iráq Petroleum Company and he went by plane once a week to Cyprus, he had enjoyed the persian dinner so much that he offered to bring any supplies we lacked back from Cyprus anytime we wanted to have another dinner party. I must say we never had a refusal to our invitations. These affairs were held in the central hall of #10 Persian Street and usually we had twelve guests. Shoghi Effendi never attended these affairs, but I know that Rúhíyyih Khánúm enjoyed them exceedingly.

There were two wrought iron chinese lanterns by the front door in which we would place candles, flowers in large vases were placed here and there and candles and flowers graced the table. Four of the persian girls served the meal and looked so attractive in their best head scarves and aprons, they seemed to enjoy the party as much as we did even though they did the work. We usually had a delicious concoction of fruit juices to start the dinner off and our more sophisticated friends never seemed to miss the stronger beverages. Shoghi Effendi said we could serve wine to the guests if we explained why we abstained but we never did this because the fruit drink was so well received.

Much later on we had open house each Wednesday from four to seven. I would buy plain coffee buns at the bake shop, cut them in small pieces as there was a sugar shortage preventing home baking. Of course the samovar was the real attraction, the tea tasted like nectar, even now when I smell charcoal burning, the memory of these days comes flooding back. Sometimes as many as thirty people came and we made many new friends.

Several occasions stand out as very special, the "Empire" training ship of New York State came to Haifa with about five-hundred cadets aboard. They were entertained in groups of fifty to one-hundred around the State of Israel. The Haifa Consulate had a lawn party for one of the groups and invited Ben and me to be co-host and hostess. The captain of the training ship was so grateful for the hospitality shown that he invited about five-hundred local people to a buffet aboard the ship. It was a thrilling sight, the visitors had gathered at the quay-side about dusk, the ships in the harbor were lighted and the "Empire State" had a festive appearance, a canopy had been erected and the deck was strung with lights over the buffet table. As lighters came from the ship filled with the cadets, row on row in their white summer uniforms, they filed off and the civilians took their places for the return trip. The captain's "gig" swirled up to the quay to gather up the important guests and swiftly returned to the ship. The band was playing as we boarded and as the guest mingled, delicious food was spread before us. After the strict rationing we were experiencing you can imagine how fast the roast beef, turkey and ham disappeared! There were tempting desserts and they ran out of ice-cream. What a treat for those of us who were fortunate enough to be invited. Later, as the lighters returned with the cadets, we all came back to shore full of good food and happy memories.

It came as a surprise to me to learn that when aship from the United States came in, the captain reported to the consulate immediately with the ship's papers. One of the ship's captains had his wife aboard and the Waller's planned a dinner party for them. It was quite a co-incidence to discover that Captain Findley was the same age as Ben and born a few houses away from Ben's home in Quincy, Massachusetts. They became good friends immediately and the next time the ship came to Haifa, we entertained them and the Wallers, taking them to Bahjí and returning to #10 for dinner. In return, Captain Findley invited us to "roast beef" night on his ship, he knew we had short meat rations and that they were very poor quality. Though the ship was one of the merchant marine, we were as happy as if we were on the Queen Mary! The ship's cook was Chinese and he made two beautiful cakes to serve at the Fourth of July reception at the consulate, decorated with colored frosting American flags! Unfortunately the ships sailing order came for them to depart the evening of the third of July so they could not come to the party. Those sweet cakes were certainly enjoyed by all present.

One day Mr. Waller brought me a letter from the American Ambassador in Jerusalem that had been forwarded to him to take care of. It concerned an inquiry from an American Bahá'í who said he had written several letters to Shoghi Effendi and had not received a reply to any of them, he wondered if Shoghi Effendi was ill or absent from Haifa. Shoghi Effendi had been very patient with this individual who had constantly been writing to him and finally decided to ignore his letters. There were those who liked to show letters from the Guardian around to indicate they were close to him! The beloved Guardian asked me to write a reply, on our best stationery, to the ambassador to the effect that the letters of the man had been received and no replies were necessary.

Mrs. Waller was most gracious to me, taking me with her on jaunts and many times either picking me up in her car when I was on my way to town or offering us the use of the consulate car and chauffeur.

To this day, the Waller family are close friends, now retired and living in California, whenever Fred would introduce either Ben or me to new people, he would say, "have you ever met a Bahá'í?", if they replied that they hadn't, he would say, "well, you are meeting two of them now!" I shall always be grateful for this lasting friendship.

It was evident that Ben was becoming very exhausted from his responsibilities under the trying circumstances, there was no day of rest for the Bahá'ís in Haifa. Friday was the Moslem Holy Day, Saturday the Jewish and Sunday for the Christians, consequently, business went on every day of the week. One felt that every waking moment belonged to the Faith.

In December 1949, Ben and I flew to Cyprus for two weeks vacation. Before we left, Shoghi Effendi asked us to note the lonely, single grave beside the public road of Mírzá Yahyá, one of the half-brothers of Bahá'u'lláh as compared with the glory, honor and beauty of the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh at Bahjí! (Note: see chapter 10 , God Passes By.)

We were so fatigued that we spent the first few days in bed, then did some exploring and enjoyed the rest of the time. This was the first vacation that we had since coming to the Holy Land. Food was plentiful, especially meat, and we ate too much at first, later we used better judgement. We asked a friend in the Travel Office what we could bring back to him, he had been so kind to us over the years, he said he would like some “pink veal” which translated meant canned ham! When we returned to Haifa to resume our responsibilities we remembered him.

Ben made a good friend in the shipping office that cleared our stone when it arrived from Italy. He could see that Ben was losing weight and would give him things from “Care” packages that other people did not want, mainly canned applesauce. We heard him referred to as Abou George, we mispronounced it as “Apple George” thinking it was because of his gifts of applesauce! Of course we found out he had recently become a new father and “abou” means father!

One of Shoghi Effendi's aunts had come from Egypt before the British Mandate ended and she was in Lebanon when the country became Israel. She frantically implored us to help her get back into the country. Due to the fact that Shoghi Effendi was in such good standing with the new government they granted permission for her to return. It became one of my duties to go and get her at the border which happens to be on top of a huge limestone cliff, I'll never forget turning the car around in a narrow space atop this cliff with the sea many feet below, also, how sad it was to see people on the Lebanese side begging to return, some on their knees pleading when the barrier was opened. There were some Bahá'ís in this group who were allowed to return at a later date.

This aunt had an empty flat she wasn't using as she was far from well and was staying at # 7 and finally had to go to the hospital. Somehow, Abou George heard about this flat and asked us to intervene on his behalf as he needed a larger place with a new son added to his family. We got the key to the flat and when we arrived, there was an immigrant family that had taken possession, sitting on the hall floor with their scanty belongings and they refused to leave!

They couldn't speak any language that Abou George knew so an interpreter had to be found, an exchange of money took place and the immigrants left. Due to the influx of so many immigrants there was a housing shortage and people just took over when they saw an empty place, people didn't dare to even leave for any length of time, they might come back and find their places occupied by strangers! We were glad to do Abou George this favor as he had helped us so often with our shipments over a long period of time.

I hunted around as much as I could to find things for Ben to eat, the leban, or yogurt was made of skim milk and had no nourishment. One morning around six o'clock Ben called me to his room, he had been suffering severe pains all through the night! I asked him why he didn't call me before and he said he didn't want to bother anyone. When the doctor came and examined him, he said: "your husband is a hero to stand all that pain, he has had an attack of kidney stones." This seems to be a rather common ailment in this part of the world, probably due to the lime in the drinking water. To try and build Ben up the doctor gave him some liver injections, but, he told me he couldn't live on them, he would just have to have better food.

There were some air-raids that disturbed the nights and when the big gun on the point of Mount Carmel boomed out it sent chills up your spine, I guess it sounded worse than any damage it inflicted. I recall being in the lower town when air-raid sirens blew and people didn't even bother to take shelter. In the Post Office the clerks all wore helmets, they used to ask me why I stayed in Israel when I could go home to a safe America. I did see one plane come over the city and the "bomb" it dropped made a very small hole near the Post Office.

The nearest I came to being hit was in broad daylight, I was passing through a side street when I saw some British soldiers getting behind a shelter with their guns on the ready, some random shots came down from the arab neighborhood, all persons in sight ran to doorways for shelter, including myself. A bullet ricocheted from the curb causing a scar across the calf of my right leg!

Some odd things happened in my search for food to supplement our Table. I noticed a pool in the window of a fish market filled with live fish, when I entered I found that they were large carp, in my estimation a very tasteless fish. However, it was edible, the clerk asked me how large a fish I wanted, I replied enough for two people, he seized a club-like stick, watched his chance, hit the fish, slapped him on the cutting board, cut off his head and skin, wrapped it in a newspaper and handed it to me. I put the package in my string bag, a few doors away from the market I noted a sign saying that air-mail letters could be sent from there. I went in and found it a very tiny place, next to me at the counter was a man who suddenly turned and gave me an odd look, I then realized that the "fish package" was jerking back and forth in a muscular reaction, I explained my predicament and all laughed about it. The package jerked all the way home and it wasn't worth the trouble, it had no flavor at all.

Another time I passed a fruit stand and saw some fresh pears, I thought that will something different and picked out some. The clerk said, "they are russian" at least that is what I thought he said, I replied, "I don't care where they are from, I'll take them", then it dawned on me, he meant that they were rationed. Of course I did-not have any ration tickets so I had to pass them up.

Mr. Sitton told me that he had heard that they were taking fresh fruits out to sea from Beirut and dumping them as they had no market, he said, "oh how I would like some bananas for my grandchild." On one of the trips to Cyprus by Mr. Kaulbach, he brought back a few bananas, I immediately thought of Mr. Sitton and shared them with him, he thanked me with tears in his eyes, he said they were more precious than diamonds.

In the early days of my sojourn in Haifa I was asked by Rúḥíyyih Khánúm to make a cake for Snoghi Effendi. Our stove was a three burner oil stove, the oven was separate, you placed it over two burners and pre-heated it before baking. I was supposed to make a two-layer cake with a custard and jam filling and cover it with chocolate icing. The ingredients were not up to standards in the United States and I was so disappointed to note the rising quality was not as successful as I hoped for, nevertheless, I used the poorest appearing layer for the bottom and completed the cake. With fear and trepidation I sent it over to #7 for Shoghi Effendi. I was so relieved when the verdict came back that he enjoyed it very much and would like me to make another at a future date. I never could do this as the materials became unavailable and the stove became erratic. I endeavoured to make some lemon tarts and for some reason, the soot from the stove came into the oven and spoiled them all, I tell you these things to show you how frustrating life can be under these conditions.

In our personal quarters we had a round "Perfection" oil stove with a handle that made it portable. In fact, I used to worry about Mr. Maxwell when he carried his from his bedroom to his office, as he walked down the hall, flames would be shooting out of it!

During the Fast, Khorshid would bring the makings of our breakfast up the night before and I find it amusing to remember Ben and myself cooking on top of this stove. We had to do each thing separately, first the coffee and set it aside, then scrambled eggs and finally the toast. We used to break our fast at sundown with a hot drink, because dinner was never served until dark, real dark, so it made a long fasting day.

Rúhíyyih Khánúm and I went up to the Jewish shopping center one afternoon on foot as Shoghi Effendi was using the car. There was a guard on duty surrounded by barbed wire barricades near Mountain Road, (now U.N.O. Avenue) at the edge of the area. It was almost curfew time as we headed home, Rúhíyyih Khánúm started down a street that bordered the Arab quarter and I said "don't go down there, they call it dead-man's street" she replied, "nobody will shoot at us, and I'll walk on the exposed side, so don't worry!" We had not gone far when we heard the "thunking" sound of bullets! Rúhíyyih Khánúm sort of jerked and I said what is the matter, she replied, "I don't want to be hit in the widest place!" As we came to the barrier at Mountain Road, the guard said - "you shouldn't cross here, you will be shot at." Rúhíyyih Khánúm said, "God will take care of us!" - then the guard swung the barrier open and replied, - then God go with you! We arrived home safely, God did take care of us.

When rationing went into effect by the new government, the Bahá'í farmers near Ma'an river, adjacent to the Garden of Ridván, did not grasp the meaning of this, for them, the needs of Shoghi Effendi's household were a law. They were accustomed to bringing produce to Haifa, coming by bus. I received a call to come down to the bus depot where they were holding some Bahá'ís and they wanted an explanation. After giving me a summons to appear in person on behalf of the Bahá'í Community to the head of the rationing bureau, the produce was confiscated and the Bahá'ís were allowed to return to their homes.

I reported all this to Shoghi Effendi and he instructed me to take "Some Answered Questions" with me when I kept the appointment and show the man in charge the reference on page 76, in the last paragraph, quote: - "Yon can see that from all parts of the world tribes of Jews are coming to the Holy Land; they live in villages and lands which they make their own, and day by day they are increasing to such an extent, that all Palestine will become their home."

When I presented myself at the Ration Board, I had the book under my arm. As I entered the office, I was greeted rather curtly, then the official in charge reached for his phone - I thought: 'he is going to have me arrested!' Instead, he ordered two turkish coffees! He scolded me at first, saying that he never thought the Bahá'ís would be guilty of breaking the law! He finally softened up and I was able to show him the excerpt in "Some Answered Questions."

However, we had a bit more trouble at the time of the grain harvest, the intentions of the Bahá'ís were to save some for the household, so they didn't declare the full harvest and hid some of the bags of grain! So, I had to return again to the Ration Board and smooth up matters and again the grain was confiscated. These actions did nothing to help the beloved Guardians peace of mind.

Many people came to #7 Persian Street for one reason or another and some were referred to me. One such case was an arab who had worked for the Palestine Railways. He was neatly dressed in a white shirt, shorts, shorts and knee- high white socks, in other words, his appearance impressed me. He confided in me that he had left the country during the troubles and was now in Israel illegally? He and his wife had literally crawled over the border in the dark of night and were presently being sheltered by relatives in Haifa. The problem was due to rationing, there was not enough food for them all and they hardly dared to leave the house as they could be stopped on the street by security people and asked to show their I.D. cards. My advice to him was to go to the authorities, speak of his past record with the railway, confess that he had come back illegally, he might have to serve some time in jail, but, he would either be given citizenship or expelled, either way, it would be better for him to know how he stood, beside that, I knew that the new government needed experienced people to help run the railroad. If he got picked up, it would go harder for him then if he turned himself in voluntarily. I am happy to say that he later called on me and told me he spent one month in custody and because they needed his background experience, he had received full citizenship and his old position with the railway! One happy ending.

Speaking of the railway, when the state was first born, we would hear the train whistles hours on and, the jews were operating it for the first time and treated it like a toy! They eventually took it seriously but they had a good time with it at first!

I had to go to the Security Office very often myself to get I.D. cards for people in the Bahá'í Community, at first they were good for only a short time so I had to make many trips. This was a very unpleasant chore as the waiting room would be full to overflowing, we were packed in so close you could hardly raise your hand above your head. On a rainy day the odor of damp clothing and close packed bodies was offensive. In fact, I think this is what caused me to become ill with some form of typhoid, I had to be hospitalized for about two weeks!

When I had been in Haifa a few months I realized that Rúhíyyih Khánum took no thought of herself for a change of routine. We both loved movies and I had learned there was a theater that showed american movies. When I noticed a film I thought she would enjoy I would phone her from town and ask her if she could be spared from her work that afternoon, she would consult with Shoghi Effendi and if she could spare the time I would get the tickets so we wouldn't have to stand in line at opening time. One movie was "The Sons of the South" and Uncle Remus sings a song entitled, "Everybody Needs a Laughing Place," I convinced her that this was something she needed! The result was that she started a plan for one of the rooms on the main floor, she designed a desk and a chest of drawers among other things. There was a connecting door into another room set in the wall so deeply that she could put the chest of drawers in the space, above it, on the door itself she created a beautiful cover by sewing peacock feathers on a brocade background, framing it like a picture and putting glass over it to protect it, the effect was just lovely. There was a small balcony off this room and sometimes the live peacock would be there sunning himself on the rail of the balustrade.

It is sad to relate that the room didn't get used too often, however, I do remember one tea-party there in order for her to meet some ladies I had met through my contact with Mrs. Waller. When I returned in September, 1973, I found this room totally filled with fascinating items she had collected in her travels which will someday be her own museum.

When I first arrived in Haifa, Rúhíyyih Khánum helped me to acclimate myself, I had so much to learn, among other things she said it depended on how I worked out as an american Bahá'í as to whether Shoghi Effendi would invite other americans to come and help, I took this responsibility very seriously.

In telling of our marriage, I forgot to mention that after our return to Haifa, Mansour came to call on us to say how glad he was that we had safely returned, he added, " Miss Gladys, on that trip to Jerusalem, my knees were full of afraiding!" Another expression he used was - "those jews are full from clever" he touched his forehead to indicate that they were brainy!

Another time when he came to see us, he looked so dejected, he sat in our living room quite a while before he spoke, finally he said, - "when I die, I don't have to sit at the feet of Bahá'u'lláh, a thousand seats away is good enough for me!" It seemed that he had received a scolding from Shoghi Effendi for another of his helpful deeds that often produced more trouble than help. Like the time we had a call from the police that they were holding him at the Police Station, when Ben went up to see what he had done this time, he said Mansour looked absolutely black with rage and refused to answer any questions, only that he wanted to be a martyr!

There was a large depression near the Pilgrim House in the Shrine garden and the garden refuse was not enough to fill it, so Mansour got the idea that he could hire the Druse trucks and get a lot of rubble from the arab quarter that had been destroyed in the battle of Haifa and this would fill the hole to the top! As they were loading the trucks, they were stopped by the police and Mansour was taken into custody. When Ben arrived he got the story of what happened and they not only let Mansour go, but allowed us to take enough rubble to fill this large hole. This is what underlies the beautiful cactus garden, nick-named "Arizona" because of these lovely plants.

It is interesting the way some things work out, an unidentified person brought a letter to #7 Persian Street, an the outside was written, - "to whom it may concern." This was brought to Shoghi Effendi who found it was a letter intended for the Land Registry in Haifa from some covenant breakers who had fled the country at the advice, they said, of some of the jewish officials, "until the disturbances were over." It was a plea to the authorities to safeguard their properties until they could arrange their return. The irony was the fact that they claimed to be Bahá'ís in good standing, thinking this would help their case, the letter was never intended to be read by the beloved Guardian, the person who delivered it made an error. Shoghi Effendi instructed me to take the letter to the Land Registry and advise them that the letter was delivered to us by mistake, that they were no part of the Bahá'í Community and that we could not support their claim.

After the country settled down, many visitors came to visit Bahjí. I had occasion to drive over there one day, in the parking area was a bus so I knew a group was visiting. Imagine my surprise when I walked around the building to see Salah standing at the entrance path with a light chain across, barring the way. He was holding the whole group at bay because they were not suitably dressed to pay their respects at such a Holy Spot! They were told they would be most welcome when they were suitably attired and much to my amazement, they only put up a token argument and quietly left.

There were two houses in Haifa that belonged to the Bahá'í Community, as I understand it, they had been willed to us by Bahá'ís who had lived in them. In the last days of the Mandate, it was reported to us that they stood empty, the unlocked doors swinging back and forth. One of these houses was a double house and had been occupied by two arab families. We learned that the people had just locked up and fled, fully expecting to return. Then the battle of Haifa took place, we checked on this building often and nothing was disturbed, then came May 15th and the end of the Mandate. The influx of the immigrants took place in earnest, you really couldn't blame the people, they were desperate for places to live and the new government had not had time to set up a housing authority, the result was that these people just moved in wherever they could. In our case we learned that trucks had come and removed the possessions of the former tenants and were stored in warehouses. Before we could take any action, seven families moved into the double house and I lost count of the number of people in the other house! Shoghi Effendi asked me to make arrangements with one of our lawyers and see if he wouldn't ask the people to leave until we could renovate the property for proper living for so many, they were adamant in their refusal to leave, in fact, they would only open their door a crack so that we could even talk to them, in addition, many could not speak any language the lawyer knew. At last we were able to convince them we meant them no harm and leases were signed. It is my understanding that Shoghi Effendi could acquire land in or near the Shrine by exchanging some of these properties.

As you can readily see many and varied decisions had to be made during this transition period and much as we would like to spare Shoghi Effendi of any further anxiety, all matters had to be referred to him in their true perspective. He had the faculty to note any weak spot in our reports and would not take any action until he had all the facts, then he would give us our instructions. It was in the fall of 1950 that Shoghi Effendi began to think of asking other Bahá'ís to come and help with the work at the Bahá'í World Center, Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím came from England, the first to arrive, then, in December, Amelia Collins and Charles Mason Remey came from the United States, in January 1951, two sisters, Jessie and Ethel Revell arrived, they were both excellent secretaries.

Shoghi Effendi began to join us for dinner after the arrival of the friends and it was wonderful to have a full table each night when he came over. When the meal was ready we would be called to the dining room which was on the lower floor of #10 and we would keep our eyes on the gate at # 7 to see the beloved Guardian come across the street. He spoke so lovingly to us and called us his family!

Milly Collins sat at what would be called the head of the table and Shoghi Effendi would be at her right, Ben was at the other end of the table, Rúḥíyyih Khánúm was next to Shoghi Effendi and I was placed next to her, the rest of the group sat across from us. I was so happy to look past Rúḥíyyih Khánúm into the beautiful face of Shoghi Effendi when he was talking, also, when he turned toward Rúḥíyyih Khánúm, I could see his love for her in his eyes!

Sometimes the beloved Guardian would push away his dinner plate in his enthusiasm to tell us some important news or explain one of his new plans, then Rúḥíyyih Khánúm would ask him to please eat his food while it was hot, doing her wifely duty. She had already told me how difficult it was to get him to eat properly. She had learned during her travels with him that he liked blue dishes, so she would use blue and white tablecloths and blue and white china to tempt him. especially when he had meals in their own apartment.

In talking of his plans for the Bahá'ís he said he never asked them to do more than they were capable of accomplishing, he said, if they knew what lay ahead for them they would be overwhelmed!

He was so pleased to tell us that the authorities had given permission to turn the floodlights on the Arcade for one hour each evening even though electricity was rationed due to the drain on the utilities by so many newly arrived refugees.

One night he brought over some original letters from important people, pulling them from various pockets in his clothing. He reveled in the ones he had recieved from Queen Maria of Roumania and told of how saddened he was when she came to make her pilgrimage and was prevented almost at the very foot of Mount Carmel. A reference to this is found on pages 107-117 in "The Priceless Pearl."

Another evening when he came over his eyes were full of mischief, he had previously asked England to take responsibility for opening Africa to the Faith and for them to send pioneers. Meanwhile, in Persia, the man who had been secretary to their National Spiritual Assembly for years, had written Shoghi Effendi several times begging him to intervene so that he would not made secretary again as he wanted to go pioneering. Shoghi Effendi wrote him that if he was elected, he would have serve. Finally this man decided to move to England and while he was on the high seas, the African Committee in England had appointed him secretary for this committee. This really caused Shoghi Effendi's eyes to twinkle with amusement to think this man would have a secretarial job again.

For some time some beautiful persian rugs were ready and waiting in Persia, to be shipped to decorate the Shrines and properties at the World Center. After the new state was formed, there came a time when it was considered safe to send them, we received word that they were on their way by plane, There were many bales and we had instructions to open all the bales and pile up the rugs in the upper hall at #10. This was done and after dinner one evening we all went up and as each rug was shown to Shoghi Effendi, he told where it was to be placed. Notes were kept as to their disposal and when they were all accounted for, Shoghi Effendi turned to us and said, -"I did that pretty quick, didn't I!" Some were so lovely that they would be hung on walls, never to be walked on.

The terrace garden in front of the Báb's Shrine was actually created over a huge cistern, water to fill it was pumped up from a well at the rear of # 7 Persian Street. I heard that some said nothing would ever grow there, Shoghi Effendi went ahead with his plan, even placing trees and shrubs there and everything flourished! Nothing seemed impossible to him.

We rarely asked questions at the dinner table because Shoghi Effendi had so much to tell us. One evening he was talking about the unification of our world, then he seemed to become contemplative and said after this had been accomplished, then it would be the other planets, after that the universes and after that, the cosmos! Then he settled back in his chair and said in a rather awestruck voice, "after that there are all the realms of God," All I could think of was a sky rocket taking off and bursting in the heavens into beautiful light patterns.

There were times when he was so full of his plans he would push his dinner plate away and ask for paper and pencil, he was so vehement in drawing out his design on one occasion that he broke two pencils! Ethel, the perfect secretary always had another to hand to him.

When the meal ended, Shoghi Effendi would arise and say, “ I must get back to my work.” We all stood up and when he passed by me, I almost had to hold my arms down, they just wanted to encircle him in loving protection! Our precious “Sign of God on Earth!”

Shoghi Effendi rarely accepted social invitations, though he received many, he usually sent representatives. Over the years he had found that these affairs were time wasting, his chief interest was the safeguarding and promotion of the Bahá’í Faith.

Much more is written about the beloved Guardian in “The Priceless Pearl.” I have only tried to give some personal glimpses that I remember and possibly are not found elsewhere. building, Luṭfu’lláh called some of the men to remove the urns from the trunk of the car. I waited for some time, then Luṭfu’lláh came and said that Shoghi Effendi wanted me to enter the Shrine. After I paid my respects at the Holy Threshold, the beloved Guardian pointed out the new placement he had been supervising and in a low voice told me that they would be wired so that they could be lighted from within and spoke of how beautiful they would be with the soft glow of light coming through the alabaster. I have now, many years later, returned on a visit to Haifa and when I see these urns, my thoughts turn back to the day when they were placed in position.

The last time I saw Shoghi Effendi was at the observance of the Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, November 28, 1951, a few days after that I left for the United States to be with my dear husband, Ben.

Much more is written about our beloved Guardian in “The Priceless Pearl” and other publications, I have only tried to convey how privileged I felt to help him to the best of my ability and to give personal glimpses that I have remembered which possibly may not be found elsewhere.

It was a great relief to all concerned to have more helping hands at the world center. Each one h?d a specific task assigned to them.

Although Ben and I expected to spend the rest of our lives at the Bahá’í World Center, the shortage of good nourishing food, plus the responsibilities and frustrations involved with the construction of the Arcade of the Báb’s Shrine had taken it’s toll and had affected Ben’s health. He was very exhausted and had lost forty-five pounds, he was so thin that he began to break through the reed-work of the dining room chairs! We put some cushions where he sat to protect him and the chairs. This decline in his health caused us both to be very concerned and after consultation and prayers, we decided to ask permission to return to the United States so Ben could see his own family doctor. Shoghi Effendi granted this permission and we then started our plans to go to America.

Jessie was taking over my work most efficiently and the work on the Báb’s Shrine was halted temporarily, it was difficult to leave as Shoghi Effendi had just formed the International Bahá’í Council, which he said was a fore-runner to the Universal House of Justice, a sort of bridge to take care of the growing number of Bahá'ís in the world and to deal with the new State of Israel in a dignified manner. We were privileged to be appointed members of this Council even though it was short-lived as it turned out.

In late February, 1951, we flew to Rome where we remained for a week until Ben felt he could, stand the trip to the United States, it was an arduous flight as this was before jet engines came into use. We expected to land in Boston, as the time drew near, a stewardess came and knelt by our seat, she said there was a heavy snow-storm over Boston and as we were the only passengers getting off there, they were waving us on to New York! Later, we found out that some of the Boston Bahá'í Community were waiting to greet us at the airport, they learned that we would be coming in on a local flight later and many of them were on hand when we finally arrived, after a long delay.

After Ben had been to the doctor and had the usual tests, he was told that he could be built up with rest and nourishing food, but if he had to return to the same severe conditions, he would go downhill again, be of no use to anyone, in fact, the doctor said he would die.

We cabled the gist of this information to the beloved Guardian who replied, saying, "Ben must remain in the United States, but I must return." We received this news on Naw-Rúz, March 20, 1951. The beautiful part of this test was the fact that not for one moment did we question the Guardian's decision. However, it was not easy, we sat in a big chair together in the home of Ben's sister, where we were staying, and wept and prayed for strength to bear this separation. We were to speak to the Brattleboro Bahá'ís that evening and just didn't see how we could do it, somehow we gathered our forces, being with the friends brought us comfort.

There were several good reasons why I should return and we both realized it. I had been in the process of negotiating with the new government of Israel regarding the preservation of the land around Bahjí. in order to protect that Holy Place and to make lonely gardens in a big circle around it. The matter was proceeding smoothly at this point and Shoghi Effendi did not want to upset the delicate balance. Then we had to establish the status of Shoghi Effendi and the Bahá'í Community with the Israeli Department of Religions who wanted to lump us in with other religious groups and with many meetings and consultations we achieved recognition as an independent religion. Then thereother phases of governmental regulations that had to be re-established. In addition to this, the beloved Guardian needed his summer rest and I was used to the routine during his absence from Haifa.

Ben and some Bahá'í friends came to the airport in Boston to see me off, I planned to break my journey with a one night stopover in Rome. Ben wrote later that as my plane became airborne, long streamers of flame were coming out of one of the engines! He was greatly worried until he received a safe- arrival cable from me.

Imagine what a pleasant surprise it was for me to find Millie Collins staying for one night in the same Hotel in Rome that I was staying at! She was on a mission for Shoghi Effendi, after that was completed, she planned to go to the United States to attend to her affairs before returning again to Haifa.

Millie informed me that there would be a meeting that evening at the home of Ugo Giachery and that Madame Dr eyfus Barney would be present. I was emotionally drained but knew I would feel better to be with the friends. At one point Mrs. Giachery told the group that I was returning alone to Haifa, leaving Ben in the United States, I am sorry to report that the tears flowed freely much to my chagrin. After returning to the hotel Millie and I talked and lovingly prayed together to the wee small hours, trusting that each of us would fulfill our obligations.

The next day she went her way and I returned to Haifa. I arrived at the gate of # 10 Persian Street, by taxi, about four o'clock in the morning, I couldn't arouse anyone there even though I called out to Jessie -aid Sthel whose bedroom windows were open. Finally I had to ring the bell at # 7 Persian Street which I disliked to do as I didn't want to risk disturbing Shoghi Effendi. One of the boys answered my ring and let me in to #10 which I found empty, everyone was over at Bahjí!

After sleeping a few hours I started to town to send a cable to Ben. Mrs. Waller came down the street in the American Consulate car and offered to drive me anywhere I needed to go and was willing to loan me the car and driver for the day if I wanted it. She was always so helpful.

I resumed my usual activities but the household was saddened due to the illness of dear Mr. Maxwell. The time came when the decision was made to take Mr. Maxwell to Switzerland to better doctors. Arrangements were made and shortly after plans crystalized, Rúhíyyih Khánum, her father and the nurse left, I was to drive Shoghi Effendi to a small hotel, not far from the airport, where he usually stayed when leaving the country. This took place a few days after Rúhíyyih Khánum and her father had left. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím accompanied Shoghi Effendi and we -ll had rooms near each other on the second floor of the hotel. The beloved Guardian's dinner was ordered sent to his room, then I went down to the dining room, when I returned, Luṭfu'lláh went down for his dinner, while he was there, the electricity went off and he could not make his way upstairs in the darkness. Shoghi Effendi was unaware that the lights were off as he was seated on his private balcony enjoying the afterglow, it was much lighter outside than in. Suddenly I heard Shoghi Effendi calling "Luṭfu'lláh, Luṭfu'lláh," so I tapped on the door and explained what was happening. He then asked me to remove the remains of his meal as the odor of the food bothered him and asked me to come out on the balcony afterward .

It was a very dear and precious moment, when I came out of the door, he looked at me so tenderly and so lovingly, his eyes seemed to be letting me know that he appreciated my returning alone, leaving Ben so ill and so far away. He inquired if I had recent news of Ben and told me that Ben would recover sufficiently to serve the Cause again and asked me to give his love to Ben when I next wrote to him. He then reached in his breast pocket, brought out a small envelope with several of the old-fashioned Bahá'í ring stones in it, oval and amber colored, he asked me to give them to Ben when I returned to the United States.

Soon the lights came on and the next day we all went our respective ways. In Haifa, the usual routine continued and it was much nicer for me, having Jessie and Ethel for company, though we all missed Shoghi Effendi and Rúhíyyih Khánum and were already anticipating their return.

Later on we learned that Mr. Maxwell had improved to the extent that he could return to his lovely home in Montreal, Canada and had some time to enjoy it before he went to his reward. He left a wonderful legacy in his many and varied accomplishments.

The news from Ben was good, he had gone to Phoenix, Arizona, where the climate was suitable to help clear up his lung condition and he was beginning to gain weight. He wrote me long letters, weekly, and of course I wrote to him weekly. His letters were so beautiful that I have kept them to this day. The Bahá'ís in the area watched over him so lovingly and then Millie Collins came to her brother's house where she had an apartment, her home base when she was in Arizona. Ben became much better acquainted with her, and, as all others, came to love her very much.

Ben improved to the extent that he helped the local Bahá'ís with their teaching efforts. He did become ill with shingles that affected the upper part of his face, however, I did not learn about this until he was well on his way to recovery, too late to worry about it.

There were two social events that summer for me that were outstanding, they still linger in my memory, one was a cook-out on the beach not far from the walls of the old city of Acre. An American ship had come into port and Mr. Waller obtained some stores, such as the usual cook-out foods unobtainable in Israel and so reminiscent of happy times back home. A group of about thirty were invited to the party to partake of these delectables. We gathered about sundown and the cars were driven over the sand right down to the edge of the sea. Huge fires were built and as they burned down the meat was toasted over the coals. After living so long with shortages of all kinds you can imagine how good this feast tasted. Later we threw fresh wood on the fires and sat around in a huge circle singing familiar songs. The sun sank into the sea like a red-hot fireball and then the moon rose like a silver disc, such a happy, well fed contented group, it was one of those evenings that you wished could go on indefinitely.

Previously we had received some large canned hams from Holland, sent by some devoted Bahá'ís, I asked Rúhíyyih Khánum if we could get permission from Shoghi Effendi to use one of these to repay the hospitality that had been shown to us. This was arranged and it was decided to hold the affair at Mazra'a, it was again set for the sunset hour and was held on the out-door patio overlooking the cistern, which was open like a beautiful reflecting pool. The citrus groves stretched away in the distance and in the early dusk, the water flowed down the aqueduct, the sluice was opened and along with the gurgling murmur of the water, the frogs rose to the surface of the pool to cling along the sides and started croaking in various tones. Outside the gate of the property was a caravanseri where a shepherd had bedded down his flock for the night, to cap it all, he began to play on his shepherds pipes. I had planned this party to take advantage of the full of the moon, it was perfect in every way, many of the people that attended spoke of it afterward the guests were members of the diplomatic corps and said they would often remember that lovely evening. These same friends included me in many social activities that summer which helped me to accept my separation from Ben.

One afternoon we had to go on an errand to Bahjí, as it was a Feast day and near sunset when we left Bahjí, we drove into Acre and parked the car near the Most Great Prison. We climbed the wall opposite, Jessie, Ethel and Salah Jarrah were with me. We each said prayers, below us the sea was surging back and forth causing spurts of water to come up through holes in the rocks, worn by the constant action of the sea.

There is an old tradition found in the Epistle of the Son of the Wolf, pages 176 - 181, that says that anyone "that looketh upon the sea at eventide, and saith: 'God is Most Great! ' at sunset, God will forgive his sins, though they be heaped as piles of sand.'" "And he that counteth forty waves while repeating: 'God is Most Great! ' - exalted be He - God will forgive his sins, both past and future." One of the benefits of being a Bahá'í and accepting Bahá'u'lláh's Message for this day, is the "oneness" we gradually acquire with all other religions, a spiritual rapport. So, we four shared a delightful sense of Comradeship as we silently called out the Name of God, forty times, in this ancient setting where so much history has been made. A peace settled over us as the glowing sun sank out of sight and we spent some time watching the afterglow before returning home to Haifa.

So, time passed, rather routinely and then the summons came for me to drive to the hotel, not far from the airport, to bring the Beloved Guardian and Rúhíyyih Khánum back to Haifa. I arrived a bit early so I parked the car a short way down the street and was dusting it off when I noticed Rúhíyyih Khánum beckoning me to come forward. Both these precious people looked refreshed and benefited by the change and the rest they had been having but one could almost see the "wheels" of resumed activity begin to turn.

Although I had reported weekly during their summer absence, Shoghi Effendi enquired how everything was in Haifa and it was during this drive home that he advised me that I could make my plans to rejoin Ben after the observance of the Ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá which would take place on November 28th. He suggested that after my return, if I found Ben equal to it, that we visit as many Bahá's as possible and tell them of our life and experiences at the Bahá'í World Center. Knowing human nature, I realized that the friends might ask personal questions so I asked Shoghi Effendi how we should handle this.

He replied that if the matter arose, we should tell the friends that when he had important news, he conveyed it through the proper channels. What a marvelous protection to have the advice of the precious Guardian. This was our standard reply whenever it became necessary; the facts are that we really knew very little about his personal life and always respected his privacy.

The tempo of daily life increased and I again drove Shoghi Effendi wherever he wished to go. Some beautiful alabaster urns had arrived that were to be placed in the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, this was one of the last times I drove him, accompanied by Luṭfu'lláh we went to Bahjí, I parked the car in the usual place at the rear of the teahouse. After Shoghi Effendi had walked around the corner of the Lauions. Her family was reluctant to part with her cheerful presence but realized that it would make her happy to be using her talents for such a good purpose.

When we visited her she would lament the fact that she couldn't be with the Bahá'ís in groups. It was decided to ask the New England Regional Committee if it would be possible to plan to hold a conference at Crotched. This was done and we received permission to use the large hall at the Center. About sixty Bahá'ís attended and Barbara's eyes sparkled with happiness when she saw all these Bahá'ís, her new family.

A prominent Bahá'í named Guy Murchie lived near us in East Sullivan, New Hampshire. Barbara wondered if he would be willing to come and be interviewed, she felt certain that the Globe would accept a profile on such a distinguished and interesting person, also she thought how nice it would be for a Bahá'í to write a featured article about another Bahá'í! It would be excellent publicity for the Faith. Guy readily accepted and the article was published in the Boston Sunday Globe, October 2, 1955 along with a picture of the Bahá'í Temple in Wilmette and a picture of Guy.

In the course of her work Barbara was exposed to the general public and we who loved her, realized the danger if she caught cold or some other respiratory disease. In 1958 she was hospitalized with a severe cold and we lost this dear person whose life had been an example to us all. She was in her early thirties and her funeral was attended by many prominent people from the area of Concord, New Hampshire as well as a large group from the Rehabilitation Center.

It was arranged that Ben would come to New York City to meet me, I planned to return to the United States partly by air and partly by ship. My good friends, Mr. and Mrs. Waller escorted me to the airport where I would take a plane to Cyprus, stay overnight, then fly on to Rome. I had sent the bulk of my luggage by ship to Naples, Italy, to be transferred to the S.S. "Independence". I was very tired and thought the five day voyage on the ship would refresh me and also give me the opportunity to travel on a fine ship after the unpleasant trip to Haifa in 1947 on the unconverted troop ship, the "Marine Carp."

While waiting on the airport lounge, it was a happy surprise to see Mr. Kaulbach come in having just arrived back from Cyprus, he introduced me to one of his colleagues who was leaving on the same plane I was taking to Cyprus. The result was that I was escorted from the airport in Cyprus to my hotel in the company car. All went smoothly and the next day I left for Rome, Dr. and Mrs. Giachery were very kind to me and the following day Dr. Giachery escorted me to Naples, by train, that evening the Bahá'ís in the area gathered at the hotel where we were staying for a meeting. It was very pleasant to meet some of the Italian friends and speak to them of life at the World Center under the direction of our beloved Guardian.

After the meeting was over, the Bahá'ís wanted to take a picture, they had very old style equipment, using flash powder, when this was lighted there was a sharp report like a pistol shot. Because of touchy conditions, the proprietor came rushing in as well as several patrons and all were so relieved to find it was only a picture taking incident. Although Dr. Giachery had to interpret for us, I felt the warm Bahá'í love of this Italian gathering and again realized that the whole world could be like this if only people would follow their religious teachings. The next morning Dr. Giachery took me to the port and placed me in the care of a porter, a Bahá'í, who had been at the meeting the night before. We could not address each other, but I assure you I was cared for as if I was a precious jewel and realized once more the true bond between the Bahá'ís wherever you meet them.

I made many interesting friends on the ship which was due in New York City December 15, 1951 and about the last ship from Europe before the holiday season. There were some celebrities in first class and they used to come down to our festivities in cabin class. Mr. Waller had asked me to convey his greetings to the captain if I had the opportunity. This chance came when the captain came to our lounge for his "cocktail party". I quietly went up to him and spoke of Mr. Waller, they knew each other well because this captain was on the regular run of the SS "LaGuardia" from New York City to Haifa. I was quite embarrassed at this point as the captain invited me to sit beside him, I saw drinks being prepared so I whispered that I was a teetotaler, he promptly whispered back, so am I and we will have orange juice together!

Today the planes fly faster and travelling by ship has almost gone out of existence, this is a pity as it is a fine experience. About mid-ocean we passed the sister ship of the SS "Independence", the SS "Constitution", a nice ceremony was carried out as we approached each other with the ship's horns and whistles saluting in great style.

After the strict rationing in Haifa, I found I could not eat the huge meals served on the ship, such abundance after so little.

My shipboard friends teased me about my longing to be re-united with my husband, who was so precious to me, they said I put on my hat five-hundred miles out! A bit of an exaggeration but I will admit I was very impatient as we neared the shore.

While passing, through the Gulf-stream the ocean was so rough that the propellers came right up out of the water causing the ship to shudder and vibrate, when the ship came down on the water again we were terrified. It didn't help our peace of mind when one of our table companions remarked that he had heard of a ship that had broken in two under conditions such as these!

We came into New York harbor during a late December sunset, the lights of the city were coming on and they twinkled like stars. My heart was filled with joy at the prospect of seeing Ben again after eight months of separation. After disembarking, I had to wait for my luggage to come up from the hold before I could go through customs. My cabin-mates husband had come to meet her and as he was connected with the United States diplomatic corp he didn't have to wait behind the barricade as others did. As I was introduced to him I described Ben and asked him to seek him out and tell him I would be along shortly. Ben told me later that when he saw these people motioning, he turned around to see who they were waving at, when they came right up to him and greeted him, he was astonished, then they gave him my message. We were later entertained by them when we visited Alexandria, Virginia. It was early evening by the time I was cleared through customs and we were settled in our hotel. I found him greatly improved and after a delicious re-union dinner we strolled down Fifth Avenue, it had started to snow, very fine and glittering, the shops were filled with Christmas decorations and the music of carols was softly playing in many places. As we neared Rockefeller Center, throngs of people were viewing the beautiful lighted Christmas tree and the skaters on the ice below were whirling bits of color. All the romance one could ask for after months of separation. Back in our hotel room we stood by our window watching the snow fall on Central Park, while we discussed plans for our future. Ben said we had several choices, we could find a small town, settle down and do what we could for the Bahá'í Faith in that area, or purchase a small car and visit as many Bahá'ís as possible as Shoghi Effendi had suggested. Ben was feeling almost his old self so we decided to contact the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States to see if our plan was acceptable to them. Meanwhile we would make our headquarters at the home of Ben's sister in Brattleboro, Vermont.

The National Spiritual Assembly invited us to come to Wilmette to discuss what we had in mind. With their approval and under the sponsorship of the National Teaching Committee we left early in January 1952 on a journey that was to last nine months, during which we covered thirty-three thousand miles, visited all forty-eight states and slept in over ninety-five motels. Many times we were offered hospitality by the dear friends but we found this difficult as often we found the friends would be giving up their bedroom to us, then too, they would want to talk until the small hours and we found this too tiring. As we were teaching under the auspices of the National Teaching Committee, we had a list of the secretaries of the Local Spiritual Assemblies, after discussion, Ben and I decided that I would plan the itinerary and notify the secretaries of the communities we would visit and Ben would write the reports to the National Teaching Committee.

I shall never forget how forlorn I felt the first night in a motel, it almost seemed as if I had no past and no present or future. Our entire possessions were in suitcases in the car and we had no home base! Very early in the trip we found it best for Ben to do the driving and for me to be the so-called "cruise director". This worked very well and few mistakes were made. We found we were good travelling companions, usually we had our lunch by the side of the road after purchasing our needs at small stores along the way. We stopped early enough to get motel rooms at reasonable rates and have a good dinner each night. Motels were just becoming popular and if we paid seven dollars and fifty cents per night we thought we were very extravagant! We soon became adjusted to this gypsy living and the Bahá'ís along the way were so wonderful to us. Quite often we were able to tell other guests at the motel where we were staying about our beloved Faith.

We visited over seventy -five major Bahá'í communities and many small ones, I cannot express the admiration I hold for the way the friends opened their homes and their hearts to us. Often we would stay two days in a city, holding a meeting the first night for Bahá'ís only and the second evening would be a public meeting. Ben would usually give the talk on the Faith, going back in religious history and background of the Holy Land, then, after a short intermission I would give a talk describing what had happened to the country while we were there, the birth of the new nation of Israel, describe the climate, flowers and the people,

There came a time when we felt we hadn't enough money to complete the tour of the entire United States and we notified the National Teaching Committee. They replied that they would help us financially to complete the trip as they believed we were really helping the friends.

We spent two happy weeks at the Temerity Ranch in Colorado Springs, a beautiful place which later had to be given up as the United States Government wanted this location for the United States Air Academy. Ben and I both gave courses at this school. Later, we were to go to Geyser-ville, California to give courses there. Strange that both these schools had to give way to progress and development. The school at Geyserville had a beautiful huge tree on the grounds where many a happy class was held under its spreading branches as well as outdoor meals. (The new Geyserville is now located in Santa Cruz, California and is called the "Bosch School". It is in the midst of a thickly wooded section that is just beautiful. Many of the Bahá'ís work on the grounds grooving and improving the landscape. The building is very hospitable and overlooking the swimming pool is a large deck so conducive to good fellowship and recreation after the serious study classes. It was off season when I had the opportunity to visit the school in 1976 and found a group of young people busily engaged in working on the grounds and found then instant friends! ( End of footnote,)

Wherever we travelled we made instant friends. Our trip around the United States was a great bounty in all ways, we were able to visit most of the beauty spots as we zig-zagged up, down and across the country and were able to include all forty-eight states and many prominent cities. We experienced no difficulties and it was an education in the background and individuality of our states, yet, a wonderful example of the unity in such diversity. A pattern for the future of the world when the Bahá'í Faith is securely established.

All during our trip, we had good advance publicity and had many newspaper, radio and T-V interviews, also spoke at some colleges. It seems almost impossible to sacrifice for our beloved Cause, you receive so many blessings and bounties in return for your efforts. As Ben often remarked we are so richly blessed with our spiritual wealth.

At the conclusion of this most satisfying experience, we were at loose ends. Ben was extremely tired but had managed the trip better than we had expected. It so happened, that an apartment became available to us in Swampscott, Massachusetts for a period of six months. This enabled us to have a much needed rest to take stock of ourselves and plan for the future. It seemed an answer to our prayers for guidance when the National Teaching Committee asked us to go to Greensboro, North Carolina to help the Bahá'ís there.

We spent five months in this lovely city and its environs, the center there was a small room above a seed store heated by a stove, sometimes the sides of the stove would be so red I expected it to explode. When I would walk by the churches in the city, my heart would turn in gratitude to our little meeting room because all races were welcome there, which was not true in the churches at this juncture. In April 1953 we left Greensboro to attend the Inter-Continental Teaching Conference and Jubilee Celebration in the Chicago area, the commemoration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the Mission of Bahá'u'lláh. After this exciting and eventful occasion we again had to make some decisions. Our thoughts were turning toward pioneering so we felt it was guidance when we received a letter from Dorothy Baker, she wrote of her plan to pioneer with her husband, Frank, on the island of Grenada in the Windward Island Chain, she suggested that we consider someplace in the Leeward Chain. We had some misgivings about going to this part of the world, especially Ben, who had some experience with this type of climate. Nevertheless we contacted the National Teaching Committee and a chain of events was started which ended with our arrival on the Island of Antigua, near the capital city of St. John. On my first visit to St. John I was quite dismayed to discover that most of the food available was tinned, fresh fruit was stolen from the trees before it was ripened! 'Poverty was rampant, the population was mostly black with very large families living under austere conditions. We were told that Christopher Columbus gave this Island its name due to the lack of water. We were living at a small hotel by the sea about six miles from the city of St. John, one of the maids said that due to the lack of rain to fill the cisterns, she had to leave the island on one occasion with her child as there was not enough water to care for the child properly. All water had to be boiled which gave it a very flat taste. We spent quite a lot of time trying to find a suitable place to live, the places we felt we could live in were terribly expensive and the owners wanted to be paid in United States dollars which was against the laws of the country. We became aware that the food situation would be just as bad for Ben as it had been under the war-like conditions in Haifa. After a futile and heart-rending study of the situation, we reluctantly decided that we had to leave. It was a very difficult decision to make and our hearts were very heavy as we made plans to return to New England, sadder but wiser and with a huge dent in our funds.

Pioneers who went to their posts were designated “Knights of Bahá’u’lláh”. We never felt we deserved the title because we only remained in Antigua six weeks before we came to the conclusion that it was not the place for a person in precarious health. (Footnote: During my visit to the World Center in Haifa in 1973-74, I was told that the beloved Guardian had not removed our names from the list of “Knights of Bahá’u’lláh”).

Arriving back in Boston, Massachusetts, we started looking for a place to live. We drove around investigating several small New England towns, finally one of our relatives spoke of a house that was being renovated in the town of Henniker, New Hampshire. Ben knew this town as his family had owned a summer home on a small lake located there. Since we were going back to Brattleboro, Vermont for the time being and had to pass through Henniker, we decided to inquire about this rental. We discovered that the house was located about five minutes walk from the center of the town. The landlord was on the premises and said he had just put the “For rent” sign in the window that day! It filled our needs exactly and we believed we had been guided to this location. We returned in a few days and purchased a few simple requirements and moved into our first home since our marriage. As of this date, December 1953, there were about thirty Bahá’ís in New Hampshire, several of them lived in or near Portsmouth.

The nearest Bahá’í to us lived in East Concord, New Hampshire, it was not long before we made contact, her name was Barbara Hayden. The bond between Bahá’ís is so close that formalities are soon dispensed with and we were “family”. Her story is so unique that I am impelled to note some of the highlights. As a girl in her teens she became afflicted with a severe case of polio, and was in an iron lung for some time. The loving care showered upon her by her devoted parents and brother enabled her to eventually leave the iron lung, however, she must spend the rest of her life in a wheel-chair. She had to be lifted in and out of bed and every breath she drew was a conscious effort on her part. In spite of this grievous handicap we discovered that she had taken courses in free lance journalism and by the time we made her acquaintance she was writing articles and a column for the Globe, a prominent Boston, Massachusetts newspaper. She was well known in the Concord area and had made many friends. Often when we would go to see her she would be having callers and usually found the opportunity to speak of her new found Faith. She would never allow you to dwell on her problem, she would turn the conversation to other subjects.

The family had formerly lived in Massachusetts, where her father ran a shop for making keys, they all longed for a life nearer to nature, after searching for a small farm they finally moved to Concord, N.H.; started raising chickens and tried their hands at farming. Barbara wrote many humorous articles about their varied experiences, both good and bad.

The point I wish to make here is how she became a Bahá'í, shortly after the move to New Hampshire, Barbara became affiliated with a local church.

Then, one day in 1953 she was watching television, a program presented by the Bahá'ís of Boston, Massachusetts, came on. By the time the program was over she informed her parents that she had finally found her religion! They became very distressed but she immediately wrote to the address supplied by the program and in due time some Bahá'ís from Manchester, New Hampshire came to visit her. This was quite a step for her to take, especially as her parents looked askance at the idea. After she became a member of the Bahá'í Faith she tried to interest her family. We usually planned to visit Barbara on Feast Days, we would meet in her bedroom, not quite close the door and read and pray together.

Some time passed, then her brother and his wife accepted the Faith, when we would all get together we used to reserve a time for special prayers that the parents would become Bahá'ís and eventually they did. All these Bahá'ís as a result of that one broadcast! As Bahá'ís, our prime objective is to give the message and often we get discouraged, so take heart from this story and continue your efforts or you might miss a precious opportunity, there really are waiting souls, and what a bounteous feast awaits them.

About twenty-four miles from Henniker is Crotched Mountain Mountain Rehabilitation Center, in Greenfield, New Hampshire. At first it was just for children, then as time went on it was expanded to include adults. They heard about Barbara and visited her at her home to see if she would come over to Crotched Mountain to write up some publicity for them as they had previously been unable to produce results. They thought that with her connections and ability they might have a fresh approach. They offered her good care in exchange for this service. She went over there on a temporary basis and the Globe accepted her articles. Ultimately she was asked to become part of the staff and take charge of public relations. Her family was reluctant to part with her cheerful presence but realized that it would make her happy to be using her talents for such a good purpose.

When we visited her she would lament the fact that she couldn't be with the Bahá'ís in groups. It was decided to ask the New England Regional Committee if it would be possible to plan to hold a conference at Crotched. This was done and we received permission to use the large hall at the Center. About sixty Bahá'ís attended and Barbara's eyes sparkled with happiness when she saw all these Bahá'ís, her new family.

A prominent Bahá'í named Guy Murchie lived near us in East Sullivan, New Hampshire. Barbara wondered if he would be willing to come and be interviewed, she felt certain that the Globe would accept a profile on such a distinguished and interesting person, also she thought how nice it would be for a Bahá'í to write a featured article about another Bahá'í! It would be excellent publicity for the Faith. Guy readily accepted and the article was published in the Boston Sunday Globe, October 2, 1955 along with a picture of the Bahá'í Temple in Wilmette and a picture of Guy.

In the course of her work Barbara was exposed to the general public and we who loved her, realized the danger if she caught cold or some other respiratory disease. In 1958 she was hospitalized with a severe cold and we lost this dear person whose life had been an example to us all. She was in her early thirties and her funeral was attended by many prominent people from the area of Concord, New Hampshire as well as a large group from the Rehabilitation Center.

“When the victory arriveth, every man shall profess himself as believer and shall hasten to the shelter of God’s Faith. Happy are they who in the days of world-encompassing trials have stood fast in the Cause and refused to swerve from its truth.”

“BEN”

From the first moment I saw Ben I realized he was a rare and unique person, not only from his handsome physical appearance but from the strength of character that emanated from him. I never expected to get to really know him, I was content to admire him from afar.

I soon discovered that he had retired from the business world and was living on a small income from the estate of his grandfather. He was an amateur photographer with considerable ability, some of his pictures won prizes in travelling salons sponsored by the local camera club. For several years he had been “Official Photographer” at Ski Jumping Meets under the auspices of the Brattleboro Ousting Club, one of the first such clubs started in the United States, many of the expert foreign skiers attended this competition. He was president of the Kiwanis Club at this period and I learned that he contributed considerable time to voluntary services, in addition, I noticed that people valued his advice and often brought their troubles to him for consultation.

As our friendship grew, we began studying the Bahá'í Faith together, it became apparent that he had been investigating several of the various religions and philosophies. He told me of new spiritual ideas that I had never heard of, such as an “Oaspe Bible” that reputedly was written by the author holding his hands over a typewriter and letting “spirit writing” do the work.

Eventually he made his decision to become a Bahá'í, this was a big step for him to take due to his conservative nature. Naturally this brought joy and happiness to our small group, he became the tenth member and he used to tease us, saying he had nine people working for him, referring to the fact that prior to his acceptance we only had enough Bahá'ís to form the Local Spiritual Assembly comprising nine individuals. The Bahá'í Administration was one of the first books he studied and I later realized what a test it was for him to see how inept we were in the application of the administration. The majority of our members were women who had almost no administrative experience, including myself. At the next annual meeting, he was elected to the Local Spiritual Assembly.

Often when we were walking home after a meeting, he would gently point out some of our inadequacies and I tried to take this in the proper spirit but sometimes the tears would flow, yet I realized this was for my own good to better serve our beloved Faith.

As Ben deepened he did many kind things, I was elected delegate to the National Convention and he gave me a generous sum of money to help on my travel expenses. He took his contributions to the Faith seriously and used to say his money was Bahá'u'lláh's. He told me this story of his only experience with Sunday-school. Some of his young friends told him of the wonderful Christmas party at their church and the fine presents they received. Prior to this his only religious instruction had come from his mother and I must say she gave him an excellent foundation. For the next year he attended Sunday-school giving a small sum from his allowance each week. When the time came for the party he said all he received was an orange and some Christmas candy! That was the end of his attendance at Sunday-school, he said he would rather spend his money for something tangible.

As a youth Ben told me he had a problem with stuttering which he controlled quite well and he worked to overcome this by engaging in physical activity, in High School he played on the basket-ball and foot-ball teams and was an officer in his senior class. While discussing the possibility of going to college, the thought occurred to him that a trip around the world by ship would broaden his outlook and the challenge of new faces and places would undoubtedly help him to overcome his speech, difficulty. Luckily, one of his close friends came from a family with means and he liked Ben's idea of travel as an education. They teamed up and left for an extended period. All went well until they reached Panama where his travelling companion, Godfrey Crosby, contracted malaria. They were delayed for several weeks and then left for San Francisco. Here Godfrey had a relapse and there was another delay. Finally they embarked for Hawaii where they had a fine time and met some famous people, but the illness returned and they had no choice but to return home.

Not long after World War I broke out Ben tried to enter the armed services but was rejected due to a heart murmur. He tried for an office job in Washington, D.C. but this did not work out, then he heard there was a need for volunteers in the Red Cross ambulance service who would pay for their vehicles and expenses. He was accepted and gave a good account of himself. When the United States entered the war it was decided that any Americans serving in France would be inducted into the service. Ben had to sign a statement that the government would not have to take responsibility if he died of a heart attack.

When the war ended he felt at loose ends. His fathers business was concerned with plumbing supplies which certainly did not appeal to him, although his father was very upset when Ben did not choose to follow in his foot-steps. Eventually Ben had a desk in a stockbrokers office, he had the foresight to see the handwriting on the wall and liquidated his assets before the financial crash of 1929. Later he was manager of an automobile finance company, one of the first of its kind. While working in Boston, Massachusetts, he lived at the Boston City Club and led a very active social life, he became an expert bridge player, and was part of a group of friends who attended the first nights of the theatre openings. He was always interested in sports, became very good at handball, played golf and indoor polo. When I met him he was an average skier and learning archery, when I asked him why he had given up the other sports he said that when he felt he had reached his potential in one sport he tried another. Apparently his heart murmur caused no problems in any of these pursuits.

Not long after he became a Bahá'í Ruth Moffett came to Brattleboro on a teaching trip and contact was made for some talks at WKNE, the radio station in Keene, New Hampshire. As Bahá'ís we always try to do what is asked of us to serve the Faith. Both Ben and I were asked to do some broadcasts, I was so nervous that the script shook so hard I could hardly read it. Meanwhile Mrs. Moffett was coaching Ben, he who had always been so conservative and reluctant to speak in public now carried on the rest of the broadcasting series. He had a fine speaking voice, though rather soft. I told him I thought he would be good at singing, he said definitely not! - because his teacher at school asked him not to sing as he put the others off due to his flat notes.

It was wonderful to be in his company, his standards were so high it gave one something to live up to. He had three close friends, all bachelors they used to dine together one night a week, one of them was courting a girl and would go regular as clock-work to spend Sunday evening with her. I begin to see a pattern emerging along this line in my friendship with Ben, coupled with this, I felt that the local Bahá'ís were disturbed and I realized that I would have to take some steps to correct the situation.

Obedience to the Lsws of God must take precedence over all else if a person loves his Faith. He must protect these laws even at the cost of personal feelings and emotions. It may seem difficult at the time but in the long run there are many blessings and not just in chastity and marriage laws but all the spiritual laws. As our -awareness develops, it becomes increasingly clear that the earthly life is fleeting compared to eternity which is the reason for acquiring spiritual attributes.

When guidance comes, usually in unexpected ways, the path opens, especially when a person has done what they can to solve a problem. If I had not had an unexpected gift of money, if I hadnot felt it would be wise to leave Brattleboro, I would not have written Rúhíyyih-Khánúm as I did suggesting that we meet somewhere for a re-union after not seeing each other for ten years.

While awaiting a reply to my letter, I kept my own counsel, not mentioning my plans to anyone. When the cable came in January 1947 inviting me to Haifa, it was a complete surprise to the friends. Even if I had a change of heart, the summons to Haifa took precedence. I had no inkling of how Ben was taking the news that I was to leave, he co-operated in every way, giving me good advice and a farewell gift of a matched set of luggage. I notified the National Spiritual Assembly that I was leaving my pioneer post and they supplied me with travelling credentials. By this time I was alternating between joy and sadness at the thought of leaving. In a previous chapter I have described what happened the night before I left Brattleboro and the events that brought about our marriage and what a very happy marriage it was!

When, after I had been in Haifa a year, the beloved Guardian decided to ask Ben to come and help, he was delighted and made preparations to come. The editor of the local newspaper, The Brattleboro Reformer, was a friend of Ben's and wrote a fine editorial about him praising him for having the courage of his convictions in his new religion and leaving his home to serve at the World Center in Palestine. Many of Ben's past experiences proved helpful in Haifa and it was a great bounty for him to carry out tasks for Shoghi Effendi.

On one occasion when they were in the "little" archives, Ben noticed a sword hangin on the wall. Shoghi Effendi said "that was Mullá Ḥusayn's sword" and suggested that Ben take it down and look it over. As Ben pulled it from its scabbard, he began examining the blade. With a twinkle in his eye, Shoghi Effendi said, "what are you looking for"? Ben was thinking of the story in the "Dawn Breakers" (page 331) where Mullá Ḥusayn pursued the assailant of a fallen companion who had taken refuge behind a tree and with a single stroke cut across the trunk of the tree, the barrel of the musket and the body of his adversary! So, Ben said "shouldn't there be some nicks in the blade?" Shoghi Effendi replied, "Mullá Ḥusayn had many swords!"

In addition to his other duties and responsibilities, Ben took all the pictures of the work concerning the construction and materials of the Arcade. He wrote several progress reports at the request of the beloved Guardian which were published in the American Bahá'í News along with many of the pictures he took of the construction and close-ups of some of the beautiful ornamental sections.

Shoghi Effendi chose Ben's picture of the north facade of the Báb's Shrine for the frontispiece of the Bahá'í World, volume XI, 1946-50. All the beautiful pictures from page 8 through 92 of this same volume are the result of Ben's expertise with his cameras. Some of these pictures were developed and processed by him with materials he had shipped over from Brattleboro as photographic supplies were almost unobtainable in Haifa. One of the basement rooms was fitted out as a dark-room at #10 Persian Street sometimes we worked together developing and printing. When it worked out that Ben's health prevented his return to Haifa, I asked Shoghi Effendi if he wanted me to dispose of the equipment, he said to do so as no one would be using it so I called in the proprietor of a camera shop who was very happy to buy it.

As a token of appreciation Shoghi Effendi had an enlargement made in a beautiful sepia tone of the north facade of the finished Arcade and gave it to Ben. The beloved Guardian also gave us a copy of Volume X of the Bahá'í World, 1944-46 and inscribed the following:

To Gladys and Ben in appreciation of their many services to the Faith at its World Center.

Shoghi (signed)

During our visit to Brattleboro in February, 1951, to check with Ben's doctor, I received an invitation from Mr. Persons, president of the Brattleboro Trust Company, where I had worked before I left for Haifa. He asked me to come and speak to the staff, after banking hours, about my experiences at the Bahá'í World Center. Later, Mr. Persons commented to me that it was strange that he and Ben attended a Bahá'í meeting together and Ben got something out of it that led him into a grand adventure, while Mr. Persons was still a small town banker?

In the course of our travels around the United States, Ben used to analyze the beautiful prayer revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá that begins with: "O God, refresh and gladden my spirit" and even today I meet friends who remember him doing this, saying he made that prayer more meaningful for them. In this prayer we make promises to be a happy and joyful being, to no longer be sorrowful and grieved, also not to dwell on the unpleasant things in life!

As time passed, Ben's illness began to take its toll, he found it difficult to sleep at night and often would awaken me to say his favorite prayers, especially the Tablet of Ahmad. We used to talk of the next world during these night hours and he would say: - "if you didn't take such good care of me I'd be in the Abhá Kingdom by now!" Even as his illness progressed he kept his sweet, loving disposition. He said all the nice things a wife likes to hear and I treasure these memories.

I knew he was very uncomfortable, not eating or sleeping well, so I decided to call the doctor and he sent him to the hospital. During his three weeks stay he showed very little improvement. Then, one day, the doctor phoned me and bluntly told me that Ben was dying and that they were sending him to a nursing home. As I visited him each day, I could see it would not be long before he had his wish to leave this world.

On the fifth morning after he had gone to the nursing home, I felt very strongly that the end was near, I prayed that Bahá'u'lláh would release him that day. In the early afternoon, I went to see him, I took with me his prayer beads, some dried petals from the Holy Shrines and the vial of Attar of Rose with which we had been anointed at the time of our marriage. I kissed his forehead and asked him if he could hear me to squeeze my hand twice. When I was sure he understood, ( I knew he was under medication) I told him what I had brought with me. I annointed his forehead with the Attar of Rose and placed the prayer beads and petals in his left hand and said I was going to pray continously that he would be relieved of his suffering that very day! I held his right hand all through the afternoon, every so often he would squeeze my hand to let me know he was aware of what I was doing.

About five o'clock I noticed a change in his breathing pattern and went to call the floor nurse. She looked at his hands and then told me he was nearing the end. I had been told to expect a struggle for breath at this point, instead he took deeper and deeper breaths and in this manner he gently breathed his sweet life away. Although I was filled with grief and sadness I also felt an exaltation that I had the bounty and privilege of being at his side when he began his journey into the Abhá Kingdom where he so longed to be. He was seventy-eight years old.

When grief overcame me and I realized I had lost my precious dear one, I remembered our beautiful conversations in the night hours and the promises I had made, among them, that I would be a happy and joyful being, that I would rely on God and not be sorrowful and grieved. My greatest concern now was to serve our beloved Faith in any way possible and pray that I would be worthy to be his companion when we are re-united in the next world. I am cetain this will happen if I live out my life in a way that will earn that spiritual reward.

“When the victory arriveth, every man shall profess himself as believer and shall hasten to the shelter of God’s Faith. Happy are they who in the days of world-encompassing trials have stood fast in the Cause and refused to swerve from its truth.”

Gleanings from the Writings of Bahá’u’lláh, however, I usually have found new ammunition and rocketed off in another direction.

Even the grievous blow I received when I lost Ben was easier to bear when I remembered what a beautiful life we shared and the romance of how it all came about.

May many such blessings come into your life by whatever path you may have chosen.

Deepest love,

“A letter to the Friends.”

Dear Friends:

There is no doubt I am a better letter writer than the author of a book, however, because I was the fortunate one to be invited to Haifa during the perilous years in which the State of Israel was born, the experience became a matter of historical record. Due to this I have always felt I had something to live up to and that the facts should be recorded.

The present period in human development is one of permissiveness, courtesy seems to be outmoded and a responsible attitude toward anything is labeled “old-fashioned”! Well, this too shall pass away.

There are, among us, people who wish to contribute something to foster better relations in this sorely troubled world. A recent survey indicated that one major problem is the inability, of humans to get along with each other. The Golden Rule is found in the revealed writings of all the major religions in one form or another. Jesus said: “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all the heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.” St. Matthew, chapter 22: verses 37-40.

This spiritual guidance has always been there to draw upon in one form or another ever since the first known revealed religions. The crux of the situation is to inspire people to investigate independently to find out what is going on in the world that is building up rather than deteriorating. The Bahá’í Faith is the most recent of God’s Plans for an ever advancing society.

Until I was four years old my name was Olive Evelyn Hoyt. My mother died when I was four and my aunt took care of me until she and my uncle decided to adopt me and change my last name to theirs. The children I played with often teased me calling me pickled olives, stuffed olives, so I asked to have my whole name changed. After thinking it over, my aunt decided to name me after two little girls she had lost, Gladys and Christine. This has led me to believe that I am living for three people because so many exciting and wonderful things have happened to me!

Because I was adopted, my other aunts and uncles seemed to have a hand in my upbringing, I found it hard to try and please them all. I learned that my grandparents emigrated from Sweden with their six children and the reason they came to the United States were the usual ones, religious freedom and the hopes for a better life. I was told that they were not allowed to read the Bible for themselves in Sweden, the minister was the only one who had the right to interpret the Bible for them. Be that as it may, ours was a church-going family. In particular, one of my aunts became a deaconess and was constantly admonishing me for not becoming a baptized, full fledged member of the Baptist Church. I did attend Sunday -school and church service regularly but never felt any particular spiritual inspiration.

As I made friends in my early teens, I often attended their various churches and I began to wonder why there were so many denominations, the services all seemed to have the same messages with slight variations. I asked my mother what made them have different names, she couldn’t explain it to me even though she had been a church-goer all her life.

This type of religion puzzled me, there didn’t seem to be any in depth study to find out what it was all about, at least I cannot remember too much about what was said.

The members of the family found work wherever they could, Grandpa was a carpenter, one of my uncles ( my favorite) was a novice plumber and went on through hard work and study to become a master plumber with his own business, others found employment in the local shoe factories.

The neighborhood where I was raised represented many foreign backgrounds, french, polish, italian, irish you name it, they were there. By this time our family had become American citizens. I went to school with the children of all these different families and had many after school snacks in the various homes. I found that they had the same hopes and aspirations that we did, it was a wonderful way to break down the barriers of national origin. There were several well known black families in our city who were accepted as a natural part of the inhabitants. Hence, I am grateful that as I grew older I had no racial or national prejudices to overcome.

In my early twenties, I began to notice reports of a woman in California who Was dramatizing religion, her name was Aimee Semple Mac Pherson. I couldn't accept everything she countenanced at face value but felt she had the right idea, religion needed a new stimulus. If nothing else came of this it started me thinking of my own spiritual future. It was at this juncture that I met Mary Maxwell and formed a friendship that changed my life.

Youth is a period of finding oneself, when the pattern we will follow is emerging. How fortunate indeed to find a direction leading to a goal that satisfies heart, mind and soul and gives a purpose that lasts a lifetime. The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh fills every human need, it explains so many aspects of this earthly experience and as much as we should know at present about life hereafter and all the realms of God. I decided to make a commitment, to stand up and be counted.

Shortly after I became a Bahá'í, I had a most unusual and beautiful dream. I was standing near the edge of a small clear pool of water, peering in I noted that the bottom was smooth, shiny and black, I thought that was strange when suddenly the bottom seemed to be rising! When it broke the surface, it was a small whale and it spouted a crystal clear stream of water. Of course I interpreted this dream to be my search for spiritual enlightenment, especially as water has spiritual significance and it was crystal clear to me that I had found a fountain of knowledge just gushing out.

In this, the latest of the Manifestations of God we learn that this is the time for the coming of age of the human race. Heretofore, humanity has been passing through successive stages of development in preparation for the "Golden Age of Mankind." Now we are asked to find the points on which we can agree rather than emphasize our differences. The essence of all the Teachings of the Prophet is the same, the difference being the time, place and the capacity of the people among whom they lived.

The Faith became very precious to me as I studied, among other things, it was wonderful that all our prayers are addressed directly to God and not through a personality. There is no clergy in the Bahá'í Faith which was a relief to me as I had witnessed problems in the churches due to members who were not pleased with the minister, also the time had come in human progress for us to have charge of our own spiritual destinies.

As I deepened in my studies, I realized that I was partaking of all the essence of the past revealed religions as each age succeeded the other and God in His mercy sent new teachings to guide humanity. Like the colors in the spectrum, I was part of it all and felt I had something in common with the adherents of all Faiths.

When I found the Bahá'í Faith I thought it so wonderful that I expected everyone who came in contact with it would accept it as the solution to the woes of mankind. Alas, I discovered that it is the nature of humanity to cling to what is known, even though prophecy was being fulfilled right before their eyes.

Jesus said: "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth is come; he will guide you unto all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come."

St. John 16: 12-13. How much more explicit can it be!

One could ask, why this interest in the spiritual side of life? There are many answers, instinct, intuition, an inner voice are some of them. Perhaps it comes to some after a real hard test that causes a person to question the purpose of this life. Most of all it comes with the realization that it is the eternal life that counts and each one of us faces the fact that the earthly experience ends.

In a revised edition of "The Hidden Words of Bahá'u'lláh", the introduction is written by George Townshend and contains this wonderful paragraph: "The quelling of this ego, the severance from selfish desires is indeed the essential task that confronts the aspiring soul. The final challenge to the faithful with which Bahá'u'lláh closes this ethical work is: "Let it now be seen what your endeavours in the path of detachment will reveal". The Creator has left this imperfection in man's constitution and given him freedom of will to strive against it in order that man may, through his own endeavor, "become worthy to meet Me(God) and to mirror forth My Beauty". Were not the ego there man could not earn praise and reward; he might be spared test and trial but he would be a mere automaton. This demand for effort, this privilege of free choice, may make this planet a place of torment but it makes earth-life a field of possible victory, an arena where moral attainment is really a man's own deed, won under the beneficent law of justice by his own knowledge, determination, and action. In the "next world" this opportunity of achieving worthiness is not given. Man, for his advancement there depends not only on self-effort and justice but on God's mercy. Therefore Bahá'u'lláh counsels man to seize the opportunity here and now, for it will come to him no more. The fires of hell, it is explained elsewhere, are the sense of priceless opportunities thrown away and now lost forever.”

It is usual for every individual to have ups and downs in this life experience and I had my share before I became a Bahá'í, I floundered a lot but due to the Bahá'í teachings I learned how to handle problems and they didn't seem problems anymore, just learning experiences. Most of all I found real guidance for the first time in my life and my Faith became my education. Adults need guidance as well as youth and like a spiritual well-spring, I will have this to rely on upon as long as I live.

In the course of my development I had the benefit of being on the Local Spiritual Assembly of Worcester, Massachusetts, Brattleboro, Vermont and Greensboro, North Carolina and also many committees. Then came the call to serve at the Bahá'í World Center, in Haifa, Palestine (Israel). It was exciting enough to be traveling to a foreign country but rather scary also to realize that I would soon be in the presence of the Head of our wonderful Faith. How I wondered if I would be tested and found wanting.

My reason for writing of this personal experience is because I wish that everyone who reads it will realize the “bounties of finding the Faith and accepting it. The following quotation from the early history of the Faith, “The Dawn Breakers” is usually pointed out to a new enrollee: “Be thankful to God for having enabled you to recognise His Cause. Whoever has received this blessing must, prior to his acceptance, have performed some deed which, though he himself was unaware of its character, was ordained by God as a means whereby he has been guided to find and embrace the Truth. As to those who have remained deprived of such a blessing, their acts alone have hindered them from recognising the truth of this Revelation. We cherish the hope that you, who have attained to this light, will exert your utmost to banish the darkness of superstition and unbelief from the midst of the people. May your deeds proclaim your faith and enable you to lead the erring into the paths of eternal salvation. The memory of this night will never be forgotten. May it never be effaced by the passage of time, and may its mention linger for ever on the lips of men.” Nabíl's Narrative, p. 586.

There are many ways to serve the Faith, it all starts with putting our individual house in order, then expanding our efforts. In the Bahá'í Administration, built on the spiritual foundation which was revealed by our Founders, we find ordinances governing the important aspects of this earthly “schooling”. We live up to them because we love God and for no other earthly reason.

During one of the early interviews I had with the beloved Guardian he mentioned that I had become international without ever having been national. Recently I received a call to go out to Wilmette, Illinois, our National Center, to help out with a back-log of letters. Although 1981 I wasn't sure I had the ability to carry out this assignment, I realized it would complete my circle! It also gave me another perspective of the importance of the work carried on by our administrative bodies. We are actually living in the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh! There are Bahá'ís in every part of the World and the obligatory prayers circle this planet every hour of the day in many languages, we are a world family dedicated to the unity of mankind. Once it was pointed out to me that in the word "unity" the "you" comes before the "I."

Our greatest joy in life is to share this great message with whoever wishes to hear. Our first duty is to love God and recognize His latest Messenger, Buha'u'llah, and accept His teachings, next in importance is the duty of teaching one's self.

I consider all the bounties I have received to be like a string of valuable pearls, each new Bahá'í experience adds another bead. I live with the expectancy of much more to come before I leave this earthly life and if I am worthy, join my wonderful Ben in the next world which the Bahá'ís know as the Abhá Kingdom.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá, the eldest son of Bahá'u'lláh is our perfect example to guide us in our daily life. We try to live as if He is present in our homes. One of the prerequisites of the Bahá'í Faith is the independent investigation of the truth and the treasures to found in the writings are there for all to partake if they wish. Not to be proffered on a silver platter but as the result of one's own effort.

In my estimation the fruitful part of my life took place after I became a Bahá'í and the high-point was certainly when I left for Haifa in March 1947 and my marriage to Ben which took place in March 1948. Sometimes I feel I went up like a sky-rocket and came down like a stick, however, I usually have found new ammunition and rocketed off in another direction.

Even the grievous blow I received when I lost Ben was easier to bear when I remembered what a beautiful life we shared and the romance of how it all came about.

May many such blessings come into your life by whatever path you may have chosen.

Deepest love,

The Diary of Juliet Thompson

---

At 48 West Tenth

by Marzieh Gail

Whether or not General Tom Thumb (Barnum's midget, and at the start of his career twenty-five inches long, weighing in at fifteen pounds) ever owned the Greenwich Village brownstone where Juliet and Daisy (Marguerite Pumpelly Smyth) lived so many years, we do not know. At the time when we knew the place, Daisy was renting it from Romeyne Benjamin, brother of Dorothy Benjamin who married Enrico Caruso.

Like its fellows in the row, it was narrow and high, with black railings to either side of the front steps, other steps leading down to a long basement room, and a strip of garden in back. Inside, up from the front hall, narrow stairs hugged the wall on your right.

The old house, painted light blue when we last saw it, long after the inmates loved by us were gone, might well have been the wealthy midget's, as Juliet was inclined to believe: it was just such a place.

When Daisy asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá how to live, He said, "Be kind to everyone," and Daisy was. The house was a haven for a motley crowd. Here, Daisy's brother Raphael told me he had once, during the Depression, left his bed briefly in the night, and returned to find a sailor in it, complete with live parrot. Here, at one given time, in an upstairs room Dimitri Marianoff, Einstein's former son-in-law, who had become a Bahá'í, was writing a book on Táhírih, while Juliet was revising her I, Mary Magdalene on a lower floor and I, at ground level, refugeeing from the family apartment uptown, was finishing Persia and the Victorians. Here Daisy, like Juliet a fine artist, sat among their many guests at the firesides. Usually inaccessibly vague, Daisy would from time to time utter a great truth. Once when her cat unsheathed its claws and raked delicate upholstery, Daisy spoke: "Cats are more fun than furniture," she said.

'Abdu'l-Bahá had been all over the house. His living presence had blessed it all. In a dark corner of Juliet's whispering old studio stood a fragile armchair of black oak — it would later be willed by her to Vincent Pleasant — surprisingly small, with a cord across it, none ever to sit in it again, the chair of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He loved her studio room. He said it was eclectic, part oriental, part occidental, and that He would like to build a similar one.

Here, Juliet had read in manuscript the books of her friend and neighbour Kahlil Gibran. Here she had struggled with her love for Percy Grant. Here, by my time, we talked a little about the land in Chiriqui which (such is my memory of it) Lincoln had helped her father, Ambrose White Thompson, his close friend, to acquire. A rich tract of land in northern Panama it was, and Juliet believed that somewhere in Colombia, which then owned the area, a government building had burned down, and all the relevant documents about the property had gone up in flames.

After her father's death, Juliet and her mother were poor. Juliet could, of course, have married money. Many men sought, as they used to say, her hand. Two prominent Bahá'ís who proposed to her were John Bosch and Roy Wilhelm. Come to that, Mason, Admiral Remey's son, whom 'Abdu'l-Bahá wished her to marry, was not a poor man. Juliet told me that in those days Mason had grown a red beard, and as they sat together he would talk of the children they would have, and Juliet would visualize, floating in the air about her, the Remey babies, each with a small red beard.

Mostly, we discussed the progress or lack thereof of our Bahá'í community in New York and the nation at large, and one day we decided that what our Faith most needed in America was the qualities of George Townshend. Immediately, we determined to cable the Guardian and ask him to send us George Townshend — a pre-eminent Bahá'í who was the former Canon of St. Patrick's cathedral in Dublin and Archdeacon of Clonfert — to travel nation-wide and teach. Far from ignoring our doubtless brash suggestion, the Guardian at once replied, with a radiogram received 19 February 1948:

JULIET MARZIA 48 WEST 10TH STREET NEW YORK REGRET TOWNSHEND'S EFFORTS DUBLIN VITALLY NEEDED SIX YEAR PLAN LOVE SHOGHI.

'Abdu'l-Bahá teaches that we must never "belittle the thought of another" (Bahá'í Administration, p. 22), and although Shoghi Effendi was carrying the whole Bahá'í world on his back, he did not belittle ours, and he took the time to answer.

Once, when the powers that be were making life difficult for me in another city, Juliet wrote them a letter in my favour. To this, there was no reply. What status did Juliet have? She was only one, the Master said, that future queens would envy, only one who would be remembered long after the rest of us were gone and forgotten.

She was always a rebel. She did not hesitate to speak well of the Germans during World War I, and to exhibit the Kaiser's picture on her living room table. Something like setting up a statue of Herod in a cathedral, at the time. In later years, she decided to rewrite I, Mary Magdalen and make Judas a certain leading individual who afterward lived on to receive great honours in our Faith.

Juliet was a Celt, from a long line of early bards, and she was kin to Edward Fitzgerald, of the Rubaiyat. Her Irishness did not, apparently, extend to that country's religion. She told me that when her father was dying, he was by chance in the hands of the nuns, and they moved about, seeing to it that Extreme Unction (as it was then called) was duly administered, while her non-Catholic mother wrung her hands. Reassuring, the moribund raised his head and said:

"Never mind, Celeste, it doesn't amount to a damn."

Rebels are valuable, but they are not always right. Once, contrary to everyone's advice, Juliet's strong feelings about an individual led her and Daisy astray. She made us all come to the man's talks, or rather talk, which was always about love. We got so we hated love. "No wonder he advocates love," was Harold Gail's comment, "look what it's done for him." It had certainly given him Juliet and Daisy, and only later on did they see the light — the light being that his main interest seemed to be Daisy's bank account.

As the Guardian once commented, our World Order is founded on justice, not love. Our governing institutions are Houses of justice, not love.

The man did bring many to hear about love at Juliet's, which used to remind me of Romeyne Benjamin's gloomy prophecy, that the ceilings would fall in.

It was the unconventional, rebel quality in Juliet — this, plus her sympathy and true love — that attracted so many to her, particularly the young. All ages, sexes, skin colours, and degrees of wealth and servitude, used to foregather at 48 West Tenth. Her name was, incidentally, in the New York Social Register, along with her brother's — “but I am only there as a junior,” she laughed.

This unconventional quality of hers, frightening to any establishment, appealed to the Guardian, as it had to the Master before him. We remember writing to the Guardian once, about a town where the activity was barely detectable, and he replied that the situation was due to “the lethargy and conservatism of certain elements in the community.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá praised Juliet repeatedly for her absolute truthfulness. On her second pilgrimage, when the Guardian asked her, “Do you like the (Wilmette) Temple?” She answered: “No, it looks like a wedding cake.” She added, relaying the conversation to me: “We used to call it ‘Mrs True’s church.’” (Mrs Corinne True, later a Hand of the Faith, was known as “the Mother of the Temple.”) She said Mason Remey withdrew his design, in favour of Louis Bourgeois’, although each received the same number of votes.

Needless to add, the ethereal, lacy, floating House of Worship at Wilmette does not look like a wedding cake, but Juliet had an opinion and she voiced it. “Let us remember,” the Text says, “that at the very root of the Cause lies the principle of the undoubted right of the individual to self-expression, his freedom to declare his conscience and set forth his views.”

p. 54).

We read in her diary of the Master’s telling Juliet “a thing so wonderful” that she could not repeat it. In after years she confided to Bahá’í pioneer Bill Smits what that thing was. “You are nearer to me than anyone here,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said, “because you have told me the truth.” Asked what He meant by “ here,” she said, “Oh, New York, the United States — I don’t know.”

This diary we have here is not the original, longhand one. She destroyed that. She was essentially a private person and all those secrets have blown away. This diary is the core of the original: she kept whatever she wanted posterity to have, sat up in bed with the portable on her knees and typed it herself. I was one of (necessarily) few to receive a carbon, and mine has some of her own hand-written notes in the margin. Some years afterward I had the carbon professionally typed for the National Spiritual Assembly, but years later it could not be discovered in their files. Also, Philip Sprague mimeographed parts of it, but where that material is, we do not know.

Still more years later, when Harold and I were back from Europe and living in New Hampshire, I became aware that with so few copies in the world it might be lost forever, and consulting with fellow Bahá’ís we had xeroxes made, so it would stay safe. Meanwhile someone — was it Daisy? — had brought out a handsome booklet, printed by the Roycrofters, East Aurora, New York, and titled ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s First Days in America, From the Diary of Juliet Thompson. It bears no date or copyright, is forty pages long and contains only excerpts: a teaser, as it were.

The truth seems to be that during her lifetime the Bahá'ís in charge of publishing did not cotton to the dairy. "Too personal," they said. They probably meant that there was too much love in it. We understand this, but we note that the mass of the believers were always eager for it. Here was a woman blessed as perhaps no other occidental Bahá'í was blessed. Not only was she received by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the Holy Land, in Switzerland and the eastern United States, but she had an artist's eye and a writer's pen, and thus, better perhaps than any, she was able to evoke those so often ir retrievable days and hours.

'Abdu'l-Bahá prophesied of her that: "In the time to come, queens will wish they had been the maid of Juliet." Certainly she received priceless opportunities, and proved adequate to her good fortune.

Love is not blind, it is "quick-eyed," George Herbert said. 'Abdu'l-Bahá likened Juliet to Mary Magdalene because she loved, and saw, so much. She had that same storied love that Mary had — that love which after all is the only thing that holds the Bahá'ís together, or for that matter holds the Lord to His creatures, or keeps the stars in their courses.

She says here that one early morning (on that breathless, ecstatic, tear-drenched pilgrimage) she gave up her will, made over her desires and her life to the Will of God, and saw how, when we are able to do that, "the design takes perfect shape." Then peace comes, she says, and "beauty undreamed of blossoms upon our days."

Again she tells how the Master once gathered the American pilgrims together — they being symbols of all — and said He hoped that a great and ever-growing love would be established among them. He knew that their one main desire was to live in His presence, and He told them how this could be done.

"The more," He said, "you love one another, the nearer you get to me. I go away from this world, but Love stays always."

Juliet's death notice in the New York Times says that she was born in New York, but the jacket to her book, I, Mary Magdalene, undoubtedly more to be trusted, has her a Virginian by birth, and brought up in Washington, D.C.

She was a cult figure. People became possessive about her, regarded her as theirs and only grudgingly doled her out. This was particularly true of Helen James, who came from the Caribbean area and was a long-time companion. I can remember Helen angrily barring the door to me one day, when Juliet was sick. It did not bother me too much — I knew from mythology that dragons guard treasures. Then there was another time when I had prevailed on a man to come over to the Village all the way from Brooklyn, and record Juliet's voice as she read from her diary. (On wire, it was. The business was new then.) And Helen tried, in the midst of it, to break in from the other room and let in even more noise, besides what was already being reproduced from the traffic on West Tenth.

You can say for Helen that she was a true friend to Juliet, and faithful. One mid-day, years after all this, as Juliet lay in her bed, it seems that she looked up at Helen and asked, "Do you want to come with me, and be with 'Abdu'l-Bahá?"

"No," Helen told her, "I am not ready yet."

And then, as she watched, she saw Juliet die. It was 4 December 1956. They had moved by then, the Times said, to 129 East Tenth. I was glad that she did not die at number 48.

The Guardian's cable, received by Daisy Smyth on December 7, said "DEEPLY GRIEVED" and "HER REWARD ASSURED." To the National Spiritual Assembly he cabled, "DEPLORE LOSS," and he directed that a memorial gathering be held for her in the House of Worship. In this cable among other praises he referred to her "IMPERISHABLE MEMORY,” said that she was “FIRED WITH ... CONSUMING DEVOTION” to the Centre of Bahá’u’lláh’s Covenant, and called her “MUCH LOVED, GREATLY ADMIRER ... OUT-STANDING EXEMPLARY HANDMAID [OF] ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.”

48 West Tenth Street was a house dedicated to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Often when you were let in the front door, you heard His voice — the recorded, spontaneous chant made in 1912 — loudly reverberating through the rooms.

One day Juliet took Robert Gulick and me up the street to the corner of Fifth Avenue, and we entered the beautiful Church of the Ascension that had once been Percy Grant’s pride before his ruin, and she showed us exactly where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stood, delivering His first American public address on 14 April 1912.

He came out of the vestry on the right, just as the choir burst into “Jesus lives.” He sat in the Bishop’s chair — which broke the nineteenth canon of the Church, for the unbaptized may not go behind the chancel rail. The red plush chair with its high back was still there, just as it had been that other day, although no flame burned on the altar then. When He spoke as you looked past the low steps to the altar, He was on the right, and He stood on the fifth flagstone.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá had told Juliet she must either break with Percy Grant or marry him. She had broken with him. Percy had arranged this meeting for the Master as a peace offering to Juliet. From this very pulpit, to win Juliet away from her Faith, he had often inveighed against the decadent East, had even denounced “the Bahá’í sect,” but today he had filled the church with lilies and arranged for One from the East, and Head of the Bahá’ís, to speak.

Juliet said that she used, in her story of Mary Magdalene (whom, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá remarked in the diary, she even physically resembled) many things she learned from the Master himself. This book has inclined many a heart toward our Faith, and Stanwood Cobb considered it “one of the most graphic and lofty delineations of Christ ever made in literature.”

She illustrated her story with portraits, three of them: one haloed, of the Master’s face; Mary wears Juliet’s face, they being look-alikes; and the handsome lover, Novatus, wears the face of Percy Grant. She was a serious artist, frequently exhibited, and a member of the National Arts Club. She had studied at the Corcoran Art School, then at Julien’s in Paris, and with Kenneth Hayes Miller in New York.

During the Coolidge era, Juliet’s beauty and social background, along with her artistic gifts, carried her into the White House. (It is interesting to note how many Bahá’ís have been received at the White House, all the way from ‘Alí Qulí Khán and Florence, and Laura Barney, in the early days to moderns like Robert Hayden and Dizzie Gillespie). Juliet was there to make a portrait of Mrs Coolidge, incidentally one of the most popular of First Ladies.

“The President came in to watch,” said Juliet, “chewing on an apple, and I told Mrs Coolidge I could not put up with that.”

The portrait she did of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, described here in the diary, no longer exists, except in a photograph.

Time-damaged, it had to be restored, and Juliet felt the original was gone forever. The Kinneys maintained that He did like it because He said it made Him look old. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá greatly encouraged her art, and told her it was the same as worship, but toward the end she no longer cared to go on with it, nor even cared for her once-loved New York as it had become, and all she wanted to do was teach the Faith.

Sometimes Juliet and Marjorie would recline at the top of Juliet’s large bed, while Daisy and I would sit on chairs at the foot. The sooty warm spring air would blow in from the little back garden, down where Rebecca — a statue picked up by Romeyn Benjamin — stood scanning the horizon, endlessly waiting on her pedestal, left hand to brow. It was one such time when the conversation centred on Percy Grant, that dramatic preacher who, in our view, certainly merits a biographer, not only for his small role in our Faith but because he represents so much of New York history at the century's turn.

"Poor Julie. How long did you love him?" I asked.

"Seventeen years, darn it." (In those days it went without saying that the love was Platonic.)

And that is how, reinforced by Marjorie, Juliet told me how things turned out for Percy Grant. Significantly, his end is relegated in the dairy to a footnote. The story of it goes like this:

Grant was — as 'Abdu'l-Bahá remarked to 'Alí Qulí __Kh__án, comparing the popular society clergyman to his disadvantage with the fine Unitarian minister, Howard Ives — a womanizer. (Here, 'Abdu'l-Bahá used a graphic Persian word.) His remark was prompted by the fact that, as they were leaving the church by a side door, they accidentally encountered the rector with a woman in his embrace. Later the Master, father to daughter, even more graphically but in other words, warned Juliet to the same effect. And in the long run, it is of note that finally a woman toppled Grant down.

She was a Cuban — descended beauty of great wealth, whose luxurious car would be seen outside Grant's rectory by day and night. She had a dead-white face with bright, red-painted lips, and was a given to wearing evening gowns which did not hide the fact one breast had been completely removed, while the other remained without flaw. No intellectual, she was what Marjorie called "eruditized" by her association with famous artists and scholars.

Wherever Percy Grant went, she went, gazing up at him as he towered over her, and calling him "Little Rector." Without his knowledge, she spent $60,000 redoing his house. When she had their engagement announced in the Paris Herald, his only comment for the press was: No comment.

Next, she sensed that Percy was unfaithful — it was his chambermaid this time-put detectives on his trail, and turned over their findings to the vestrymen (the Episcopal administrative body) of his church. On a given Sunday, when Grant was scheduled to preach, they forced him to resign, and took down his name.

He was also required to pay back the $60,000, which wiped him out, and at that time Juliet went about among the parishioners, collecting funds to help. Most of the press, except for the Times, was brutal, she said. No church but one, Guthrie's, St. Mark's in the Bowery, would let him preach. In any case, the words would not come any more.

As to the woman, she lived on, constantly under the surgeon's knife, constantly giving sumptuous dinner parties at which all she herself could eat was a little rice from a silver bowl — meanwhile assuring the guests that this was simply the best way of maintaining her (slim and lovely) shape.

At the very last meeting Percy and Juliet ever had — it was in a drug store, and the conversation languished — she asked herself how she could ever have loved him.

With her final moments in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Juliet brings her diary to a close.

On 5 December 1912, the ship sailed away, taking the Master out of this hemisphere for always. Physically, He would be unobtainable now. That was the last, sad day when He uttered His final spoken words to America, words in time to be read by millions, then heard by only a few. Florence __Kh__ánum remembered only four automobiles coming to the pier, she and 'Alí Qulí ___Kh___án being in the second one. These two believers, as well as Juliet, although they could not know it that day, would never look upon His earthly face again.

Juliet tells how, aboard the Celtic, more and more Bahá'ís crowded into the Master's cabin, and how they all went above to a spacious lounge. There, 'Alí Qulí ___Kh___án translating (as the Star of the West reports, giving his Bahá'í name, Ishti'al), the Master paced up and down as He spoke:

"The earth is ... one home, and all mankind are the children of one father. ... Therefore ... we should live together in ... joy. ... God is loving and kind to all men, and yet they show the utmost enmity and hatred toward one another. ... You have no excuse to bring before God if you fail to live according to His command, for you are informed of ... the good-pleasure of God. ... It is my hope that you may ... stir the body of existence like unto a spirit of life."

Then the visitors slowly left the ship, and Juliet described 'Abdu'l-Bahá's final look "as He bade His immature children farewell." That loving anguish, those weary, prescient eyes gazing from His thin, ravaged face, are clearly seen in a photograph taken by Underwood and Underwood at the last moment — and Life Magazine (11 December 1950) reproduces it, but with less clarity: the Master's look, from the rail of the ship, at the upturned faces of the American Bahá'ís. Somehow, with Juliet, we were able in after years to have three full-sized copies made from the old photographic plate, and only just in time, for it broke then, as a messenger carried it across New York.

They still return to haunt the mind, those vanished days and nights at Juliet's. I know the steps of those long gone still echo there. I know the powerful chant of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Glad tidings! Glad tidings!" rebounds from wall to wall. Surely all is still there as it was before: the spidery old chairs, the creaky, uncertain floor, canvases looming down in the dark, coals in the grate. Juliet in gold brocade and purple velvet: blonded, fluffy hair, smiling blue eyes, a man on either side.

"You are not beautiful," her mother had told her. "You are not handsome. You are lovely."

"There is a magic in Juliet's eyes," Dimitri Marianoff said.

The 'Akká Diary

Naples

19 June 1909

In Naples. In an old palace on the bay — the Via Partenope. Palaces around us, ruined palaces on the hills. Vesuvius to our left, Capri before us. This is the view from our window, Alice Beede's and mine. Yet all the rich beauty of Italy is as fantasy to me. The Reality of the Master<sup>[1]</sup> glows beyond. It is to the Master's heart I would fly! And we are going to fly there! We arrived this noon and sail tomorrow night for Egypt.

26 June 1909

As I write I look out on Mount Carmel, the flat-roofed white houses of the East with their bright blue blinds in immediate view.

What can I say? I am speechless.

Jesus from the ground suspires. This line has been singing and singing in my head all morning. And yet, it is more — oh, far more — than that. The Spirit of the Living Redeemer is breathing its peace into the air. As I sat side by side with Alice this morning in our high whitewashed room, gazing and gazing toward Carmel looming up in its great bare grandeur just before our eyes, suddenly I felt that heart-consuming Spirit and melted into tears.

28 June 1909

(We are still here in the hotel at Haifa, Nassar's hotel. I am sitting in the hall, looking through the wide window at the end, across twelve miles of the bay to the Holy City. 'Akká, dreamed of for nine long years — the Mecca of my prayers — is before my bodily eyes! I am absolutely inarticulate. What I have felt, what I have seen, is too vast to be expressed in human language. I can find no words great enough to convey the impressions of these last three days — or two days, I lose track of time! And as yet, I have not seen 'Akká! In His infinite mercy and wisdom and love the Master is preparing us; in his gentleness. Yet even the preparation has been almost too much for the human heart.

That first sight of Carmel, with its Mystery, the Holy Mountain, "the Mountain of the Lord," broke me down. I am still overpowered when I look at it, and as I grow more sensitized I will surely feel it more and more. Here the Divine Spirit breathes and reveals itself. I know now. Ah, the poor human hearts to whom that Spirit is not revealed, to whom the material is everything, who cannot know of the Spiritual Kingdom surrounding them, who have not rent the veil! Will they believe me when I return to testify? I would "ascend to the cross" for them! To breathe this Truth into the world I would give my own last breath with joy. I can now understand the ecstasy of the martyrs. I pray to be one of them, to be worthy of their destiny. I know now what the Master means by the Holy Fragrances. I have come to the centre of their emanation. The air is laden with the Divine Incense — verily, the Breath of God. It is almost unbearable. I am immersed, lost in it. My prayers used to grope through space. Now I am conscious of a close communion with a heart-consuming Spirit of Love, a Spirit more intensely real than the earth and all the stars put together, than the essence of all human love, even than mother-love.

Later

28 June 1909

I have been sitting close to the window — my window into Heaven! — my eyes fixed on 'Akká. The phenomenal world has faded away. This is indeed, indeed the Reality. That City in the distance, white in the sunlight, has been drawing the very soul out of me. I have been feeling the Power of the Magnet there.

Although we were to go to 'Akká today with the Holy Mother and the Holy Leaves,[2] dear Carrie's[3] illness, which began last night, has prevented it. (It is hard to write; the two little boys, Sandy and Howard Kinney, are playing around me.)

Carrie will surely be well in a few days and in this illness of hers some meaning must be hidden. We are all drawing closer through it. An intensely devoted, united group will enter the Presence of our Lord. Now I shall try — only try — to tell you of what I have seen. These privileged eyes ...

Friday afternoon, the day we came, Amin[4] and 'Ináyatu'lláh[5] took us to the latter's house on Mount Carmel, just below the Tomb of the Bááb. A simple house, flat roofed, square, white, its doorway an arch above rough stone steps; at each side of the arch a cypress tree.

Two women were standing in the arch waiting to greet us. One seemed to be a young girl. She wore a straight white gown, and a white veil half covered her heavy dark hair with its two thick braids hanging forward down her breast. Set in the midst of that frame of hair was a little pale drooping face with eyes too big for it. This was ___Kh___ánum Diya, daughter of martyrs, the wife of 'Ináyatu'lláh. The other was a tiny old lady. Her gown was blue and her veil draped close, like a nun's, around her withered aquiline face, which was the colour of old parchment. I seemed to be back in the days of Jesus. Both received us with real love.

Soon Mírzá Asadu'lláh[6] came in: a frail old man, his eyes so luminous that they lighted his whole face and made him appear like a spirit. His smile was full of humour. Then his wife entered. She approached us with a glowing love and took each one of us into her arms. Her dear little daughter, Farah-Angiz, served us with tea: honey-coloured tea in delicate glasses. Then Mírzá Asadu'lláh, in his turban and his long black 'aba, sitting by a grated window with a stone water jar on its sill, taught us in simple words pearls of wisdom. And I thought of what Percy Grant[7] had said to me: "It is not what the Master will say, not even His life, which will influence you, but His personality." For it was not the words, not the wisdom, but a great sanctity emanating from them all that overwhelmed me — a tangible strong holiness, a heavy perfume of Spirit in the air pressing down upon my senses. I cannot express it.

As well as I can remember, these were the words of Mírzá Asadu'lláh, interpreted by Amin: "Your work is the work of the disciples. You are the educators in America. And you must not be discouraged that you have not yet seen results. It is like the work of the parents who give the best years of their lives to their children and perhaps die before the children are grown.

An ignorant person would say: 'How foolish are these parents to give their best years to their children rather than to themselves and their pleasures.' Likewise an ignorant bystander, watching a farmer sowing in his field — let us say almond seed — might think: 'What a foolish man to take this almond, which he could eat and enjoy, and bury it beneath the ground, where it will only disintegrate.' Yet one who has knowledge of seed sowing would at once see that the farmer is sowing one almond to reap one-hundred-fold.

"The most effective teaching is that which is accomplished by deeds, not the intellectual teaching. Words have their station, but the station of deeds is higher. The effect of good deeds is certain to appear in life. It may not be perceptible at first, but will be so at the appointed time. As a famous poet has said: 'Achieve good deeds and cast them into the River Euphrates. Some day their effects will bloom in the Sahara of Arabia.'"

Then spoke the wife of Mírzá Asadu'lláh, her strong face glowing, her eyes full of tears: "I know from my own case that this is true. Did I not forsake my whole family in Persia, to be richly rewarded now in this kinship with you from the West? For each dear one I gave up in Persia I have found many in America, more precious to me now even than my own kin, since the true relationship is of the Spirit. In Persia my little son was stoned: and see, Mr Kinney, what a father he found in America — in you!"

"Love," she added, 'is the basis of life."

Her intense emotion as she spoke penetrated into the core of our beings. We wept. I rose, bent over her and kissed her and she clasped me in her arms and held me close. Then something within me opened. A fire of love never before experienced in my superficial existence was kindled in my heart from that flame, her heart. By the light of these saints, these torches of God, I see how, even in my deepest moments, my life has been but a shallow stream.

Mr Kinney asked a question: "Although a life of good deeds is certainly pleasing to God, is not a life given to the Cause of greater value?"

Mírzá Asadu'lláh smiled and answered: "These are synonymous."

"The divine qualities," he continued, "should be real and innate. They should well up spontaneously from the heart. One cannot prove brotherhood by intellectual proofs. Is a man your brother because Isaiah or Ezekiel said so? Two brothers do not need to prove that they are brothers. So all you have to do is to truly love one another. That love will accomplish all things."

From this blessed household we went to the Holy Household to visit the Holy Leaves. I shall never forget that little procession as they entered the room with the dignity of queens, led by the Greatest Holy Leaf.[8] She was all in white: the Greatest Holy Leaf, the daughter of the Blessed Perfection.[9] Her face had the look of one who had passed through crucifixion and was resurrected in another world. In it shone great blue eyes, eyes that had looked upon many sorrows and now were ineffably tender. Behind her came Tuba ___Kh___ánum, Munavvar ___Kh___ánum, [10] and Edna Ballora.

[Photograph: The Greatest Holy Leaf with the Ladies of the household. Haifa, early 1900s.]

Ah, what can I say? Nothing but this: As a bud that was little and hard opens in the sunlight, so my heart opened to a wealth of love inconceivable to the human mind.

That night we went again to see the Holy Leaves. They are staying in the house that Madame Jackson[11] built. We sat on the broad marble steps, Mount Carmel looming, a dark mass, above us. Above the mountain hung the moon. Down in the village the little white dice-like houses, each with its pointed black cypress tree, were a pale blue in the moonlight. The bay to our right splashed its waves on the beach.

I whispered to Munavvar ___Kh___ánum: "What is that — it cannot be imagination — what is that breathing from Mount Carmel? It is too strong for me. It is unbearable!"

I covered my face with my hands. Munavvar pressed close to me.

"Ah, you feel it too?" she whispered back.

I have not yet spoken of Rúḥá ___Kh___ánum, the youngest daughter of our Lord: beautiful, like a strong Madonna — with a great outgoing warmth — and so human. Next day we had tea in her house. The high, airy room in which we were received is painted white. A linen-covered divan runs around the walls. There are no decorations — no furniture even — just white simplicity. The Greatest Holy Leaf was there, Tuba and Munavvar ___Kh___ánum, and two little women in blue with blue veils on their heads, relatives of the Báb.

We had already had tea at 'Ináyatu'lláh's with Asadu'lláh and his family. Mr Kinney had asked a question the answer to which I must keep. "Some of the Theosophists claim that Christ was taught by the Sufis. How are we to reply?"

Mírzá Asadu'lláh smiled. "Could the sun be lighted from a lamp? If such knowledge originated with Sufis, why is it that they did not manifest it as Christ did? The churches, the hospitals, the illumined souls that sprang up from the seeds of Christ's teachings, why is it that these effects did not appear from the teachings of the Sufis, if Christ's teachings were born of theirs?"

After these blessed visits, Amin took Alice and me to an olive grove on Mount Carmel where our Lord often walks. Elijah, too, had walked in that same grove and among those very trees, so ancient are they. The sun was setting behind the mountain. The sky was opal. Flocks of sheep and of goats driven by singing shepherds passed us on the road. Men in flowing dress and the circleted kaffiyih approached and passed us. A woman rode by on a donkey, a long blue veil on her head, in her arms a baby.

That evening the ladies of the Holy Household came to see us and we had a heavenly hour with them. Later in the night Carrie developed a serious illness. The doctors (called in the next day), Amin and a doctor from the British Hospital, said that it was typhoid fever. There were unmistakable symptoms.

Carrie had been taken ill on Sunday night. On Monday we were to have driven to 'Akká with the Holy Family. Early Monday morning I hurried to their house to tell them of Carrie's illness and that, of course, we could not go with them now. Immediately Tuba and Munavvar returned to the hotel with me and we all went up into Carrie's room, where she lay tossing on her bed with a terrifically high fever. Munavvar and Tuba, standing by the bed, bent over it with the tenderest love. "We will all pray for you, Carrie," they said. "Our Lord will pray for you. His prayers are always answered."

As Tuba bade me goodbye at the door of Nassar's hotel, she said, "Tonight this will pass."

Munavvar too whispered, "Tonight."

At midnight it "passed". I was with Carrie when she woke up free from fever. Tomorrow we leave for 'Akká.

But I have been very happy just staying here — perhaps too happy. I have been afraid to meet my Lord. I long to see Him but feel unutterably shy. How unworthy I am to stand in His Presence I realize with my whole being. I remember a dream I had once in which I was standing in Percy Grant's house and heard that the Master was coming there soon — and I hid that His holy eyes might not see me. That is the way I feel now. 'Akká

2 July 1909

I know I can only write brokenly, here in this Palace of the King.

We came here (can it be?) day before yesterday only.

My life is overturned by a cataclysm of the soul. Love for the Face of my Lord fills my breast. This is REALITY, all else — a dream!

At sunrise of the day we came I climbed with Amin to the Tomb of the Báb.

When we entered the Tomb the mystery of the Holy Mountain revealed itself to me. Here was an essence, a concentration of holiness diffused from this Secret Spot like rays shining from a veiled sun. Yet, is the sun wholly veiled? I have never been able to look long at the Tomb. It dazzles some inner sense in me.

After I returned: a knock on my door — and the voice of X! She had just arrived, a complete surprise, from Egypt. How often I had prayed that she might be with me in the healing Presence of our Lord — and here she was in answer to my prayers! As she had come without the required permission, we were obliged to leave her in Haifa waiting for word from the Master. But He sent for her almost at once, and now she is in 'Akká.

Never shall I forget that afternoon's journey. I was dazed, numb, unable to realize — yet, afraid. For one thing I did realize — and that was my own unworthiness. But the scenes through which we passed should have helped me to realize, to sense, some of the divine joy toward which we were travelling.

We were in the Holy Land. We were in a bygone age. We drove along a wide white beach, so close to the sea that its little waves curled over our carriage wheels. To our right, a long line of palm trees. Before us, its domes and flat roofs dazzling white beneath the deep blue sky: 'Akká, the Holy City, the New Jerusalem. Camels approached us on the sand, driven by white-cloaked Bedouins, their veils bound by circlets; or sheep, led by shepherds in tunics and carrying crooks, striped head-cloths framing their faces. And once there came a family, the woman riding a donkey, a child in her arms, while a man walked beside her. The woman was wrapped in a dark blue veil.

We forded the river Kishon, then Hebron, and at last reached the walls of the Holy City, the City of Peace. Walls: walls within walls, menacing walls. Tall, prison-like, chalk-white houses, leaning together as they rose toward a rift of sky, slits of barred windows set here and there in their forbidding fronts. Streets so narrow that our carriage wheels grazed the buildings on either side, streets sometimes bridged over by houses that met in an arch at their second stories.

Suddenly a wide expanse before us. A garden. The seawall. The sea. Our carriage stopped. I knew we were at the door of the Master. My heart almost ceased to beat. I felt we had arrived too soon, too suddenly, that I was too unprepared.

The curtains of the carriage were raised. In front of a great stone house, very picturesque and rambling, stood a group of men in turbans, long white robes, and dark 'abas (cloaks) with faces miraculously pure — shining, smiling — whose hearts seemed to welcome us. Then one with a very tender face: Siyyid Asadu'lláh, an old man, led us through an arch to a great inner courtyard open to the sky, where two giant palm trees stood in the midst of flower beds. Two stairways of old worn stone, one on either side of the courtyard and diagonally opposite each other, led directly to the third floor, on which the Holy Household lived. The railing of the stair leading to the Master's room was vine covered.

As I entered the court, a great spasm of feeling convulsed me. My unworthiness overwhelmed me. The light of the inner court was too strong. I sobbed and bowed my head.

The Kinneys and Alice had gone ahead of me. I followed them up the stairs with the vines, across a small open court with low white walls, to a room next to the Master's. This room I was to share with Alice.

Soon Edna Ballora came in. She took me to the window. Outside was a large square of bare ground, four trees in a row at a little distance; beyond these a street of tall houses, and to the right, at the foot of the double sea wall, a long, narrow garden.

[Photograph of Siyyid Asadu'lláh]

“The Master is in the garden,” said Edna.

He was in white, seated at the side of a wall in the centre of the garden, surrounded by guests.

My first thought as I saw that Figure was God Almighty! — such was the majesty and purity. I then thought: King of men!
Lion of the tribe of Judah![12]

Soon He came into our room. He burst into it like the sun, with His joyous greeting, “Marḥabá! Marḥabá!” (Welcome!
Welcome!) And His effulgence struck me blind.

Alice fell at His feet. I could not kneel. I could not do anything. At last, I knelt for a moment. Then He led us to the divan by the window and, speaking formally to me, placed me at a distance from Him; while to Alice, again at His feet, He spoke with smiling tenderness.

Sitting in the corner of the divan, now surer than ever of my unworthiness, I prayed: O God, remove this thing which separated me from my Lord!

Suddenly He changed His seat. “Biya!” (Come!) He called to me lovingly, drawing me close to His side.

He asked me many questions, answered by Alice, for still I could not speak. When the father of John saw the angel, he was struck dumb for days,[13] and I was in the Presence of the Lord of angels — of the long expected One, heralded for ages from the mountain of the Lord.

The great overwhelming Spirit in Him, the Divinity of His Being deprives one of all one’s powers, even the power of sensation, for a time. Yet He makes Himself so simple: in the mercy of His Love, in His great God-tenderness, bends so close to us.

Suddenly my heart burst open to the outpouring from His Heart, like a rose beneath strong sunbeams. A beam seemed to pierce my heart. At that instant He flashed a lightning glance at me. When He left the room, as He did almost at once, my breast dilated as if a bird were spreading wings in it. I went to the window. Just as I did so, Munavvar appeared in the doorway. “The Master is calling you, Juliet,” she said, and she led me to His room.

That dear little room, wood panelled, with its white-canopied bed, its divan, its simple little dressing table, and on the windowsill two stone water jars: nothing more. He was sitting on the divan at the end nearest the door, and when I entered, He beckoned me to His side. As I passed Him to take my seat I wanted to kneel at his knees — my own knees almost drew me down. But, fearing to be insincere, I would not yield. He took my hand in His — His so mysterious Hand — so delicately made, so steely strong, currents of life streaming from it.

“Are you well? Are you happy?”

But my lips seemed to be locked. I was helpless to open them.

“Speak — speak to Me!” He said in English.

A sacred passion had been growing in my heart: my heart was almost breaking with it.

“Is not my heart speaking to Thee, my Lord?”

“Yes, your heart is speaking to Me and your spirit is speaking to Me. I hear, I know.”

Then he inquired for the two believers I cared for least.

Of one I could honestly say when he returned from ‘Akká he was on fire.

“And he remained but a few days,” said our Lord. Then: “Do not think your services are unknown to Me. I have seen. I have been with you. I know them all. Do not think I have not known. I have known all. For these you are accepted in the Kingdom.”

My “services” — and He knew them all! He had “seen”: seen their pitiful smallness and the lack of real love with which I had tried to serve. I bowed my head with shame.

“Forgive my failures.”

“Be sure of this.” After a moment He said again, “Be sure of this.” Then He dismissed me.

As I passed Him the second time, my knees did draw me down; my heart drew me down to His feet.

Later that evening He came to our door, a blue door in the whitewashed wall, leading out into the open court. We knelt in the doorway, Alice and I.

“We are at home, Lord,” I said, “at home, for the first time.”

“Yes. Home, home. It is your home.”

That night at dinner I sat on His left. Ah, the little dining room! It opens on the court, at right angles with the Master’s door. It is simple and small and white and its two windows face the sea.

This is what He said at table, looking again and again toward the window, sometimes raising those wonderful eyes to the sky, sometimes closing them, waiting — communing with One Whom we could not see, then speaking.

Mr Kinney had said to the interpreter: “We have no questions to ask. We wish Him to fill our spiritual needs.”

Then our Lord: “The most important thing is that which comes through the Spirit — the Breath of the Holy Spirit. The soul through the Spirit can realize the Kingdom. The soul can recognize and feel the Love of God. Distance cannot prevent the receiving of spiritual bounties. Hills and mountains cannot check that! Why? Because of the chains and bonds of the Spirit. The sun is very far, in the highest position. There is a great distance between earth and sun, yet remoteness and distance cannot prevent its rays from shining on us.

“Without firmness there will be no result. Trees must be firm in the ground to give fruit. The foundation of a building must be very solid in order to support the building. If there be the slightest doubt in a believer, he will be without result. How often did Christ warn Peter to be steadfast! Therefore, consider how difficult it is to remain firm, especially in the time of trials. If man endure and overcome the trials, the more will he become firm and steadfast. When the tree is firmly rooted, the more the wind blows the more the tree will benefit; the more intense the wind the greater the benefit. But if weak, it will immediately fall.

“As Christ foretold, we will take the real food in the Kingdom with the Father. That is the real meeting. It has no limit, no end, no separation.”

1 July 1909

The next morning at six we were called to early tea.

I wish I could give you a picture of this dear old shabby, beautiful palace, become the most intimate of homes to me.

Opening from the little court, that chalk-white court, so glaring in the sun, a great grey hall with stone walls and a mosaic floor. A bare hall, except for the richness of the floor and two high perches, a macaw on each — splashes of scarlet and emerald and blue against the expanse of grey. Little birds hopping about on the floor like familiar spirits. Opening from the hall, to the right — a wall full of arched windows opposite its entrance — a very high whitewashed room with linen-covered divans lining its walls and a large straw mat on its stone floor. This was the room where every day we had prayers and early tea with our Lord.

That wonderful tea hour in the fresh morning! First there was the Persian chanting. Then tea was served. The Master always sat in the right-hand corner of the divan by one high window, correcting the Tablets dictated to His secretaries, the small, glazed, ivory-coloured leaf of parchment in His left hand. Around Him on the divan we sat with the Holy Family.

Along the divan and on the floor sat the families of martyrs, a number of children among them, whom the Master had taken under His own care. The samovar stood on the floor at the entrance on a Persian tea-cloth, a beautiful happy-faced woman behind it serving the tea. She had deep dimples in her cheeks and her hair hung in thick black braids, a white veil partly covering it.

Her story was this: Years before in Persia, when she was a bride fifteen years old, she was with her mother-in-law in a room of their house on the ground floor when suddenly they heard a howling mob outside. And then a severed head was thrown through the window and rolled to the young bride's feet. It was the head of her husband, a boy of nineteen. The girl fainted, but the mother quietly rose, took the head of her son to the washstand and washed off the blood, then carried it to the window and threw it out to the mob. “What we have given to God,” she said, “we do not ask back.”

As we entered the tea-room the Master asked how we were. Were we happy? Had we slept well? “Here,” He said, “you cannot be very comfortable. In New York it is better and more beautiful than here.” He smiled and added, “There it is beautiful. You have parks and trees. But here the heart is good.”

“You have all received letters from me,” He said, continuing to correct a Tablet. Then, handing one to Munavvar __Kh__ánum, “This is a Tablet to an American believer which I have just corrected.”

In the Tablet He had said, “Thank God you are all helpers.” And I had just been thinking: Never can we hope to help this All-Powerful Being. He had spoken of the Word of God as having created unity among Muslims, Jews, and Christians and said that through the power of the Blessed Perfection we had all been made as one soul in many bodies, one light in many lamps; therefore we should strive to spread and increase this unity and love.

Then He began to speak to us: “Thank God that He has gathered us all together here. Before this Cause was established the East and the West never met. But now, since the Cause is established in Persia and America, the East and West are united, happy, and in perfect love with one another. It is only a great Power that can accomplish this. Formerly in Persia it was impossible for Christians, Muslims, and Jews to be friends and to meet lovingly; but now, in this same Persia, all creeds come together in perfect love. I hope all will make an effort that this love and union may progress.” Then, turning away and gazing out of the window as though He were looking into the future: “That all religions may become one; all people be of one creed; all nations as one; that all differences may be removed. And this is what I hope.”

1 July 1909

At luncheon Our Lord asked for news of Mr MacNutt.[14] Mr Kinney spoke of the unity in New York.

Our Lord said: “You have been the bearers of such good news that I want to make you very happy. Good news indicates good deeds. Unity is the result of good deeds and action. At the present time there are good believers in America — sincere and firm in the Covenant.

“Man first is like a pupil. He becomes learned. Then he becomes a teacher. First he is a patient. He must attain perfect health. Having attained it, he may become a doctor. At first you are children. You become mature. Now you must be like fathers and mothers.” Each time He made a point He smiled His marvellous smile, looking at one or another of us.

“I desire that each of you become so great that each may guide a nation. Now the friends must endeavour to attain such stations so as to teach the people of America. Divine qualities are unlimited. For this reason you must not be satisfied with one quality, but must try to attain all. Each of us must improve himself, that he may attain nothing short of the best.

When one stops, he descends. A bird, when it is flying, soars; but as soon as it stops, it falls. While man is directed upward, he develops. As soon as he stops, he descends. Therefore I wish the beloved of God always to ascend and develop.

“There exist in man two powers. One power uplifts him. This is divine attraction, which causes man’s elevation. In all grades of existence he will develop through this power. This belongs to the spirit. The other power causes man to descend. This is the animal nature. The first attracts man to the Kingdom. The second brings him down to the contingent world. Now we must consider which of these will gain more power. If the heavenly power overcome, man will become heavenly, enlightened, merciful; but if the worldly power overcome, he will be dark, satanic, and like the animal. Therefore he must develop continually. As long as the heavenly power is the great force, man will ascend.

“I have met many of the beloved of God this year. Therefore I am very happy.”

---

(Footnote added in Brumana, Syria, where I was copying my rough notes: I think of Him often as sitting there at the table. I see Him there often. But I cannot write of it. I found it impossible at first to raise my eyes to the Splendour of His Face. But later I had many marvellous glimpses.

Early morning tea

After those first dear fatherly questions — Were we well? Were we happy? Had we slept well? — He said: “Our real happiness is of the Kingdom. Here we seek no happiness, because in this world happiness does not exist. If you consider, you will see that people are all in trouble. The majority of people whom you question have nothing to tell you but of their troubles! Their hearts are not at rest. And they cannot have this rest of heart but through the Love of God.

Therefore we must know that happiness exists in the other world and not in this.”

Still correcting the Tablets, He said: "There are many letters I should write, because I have to communicate with the East and West."

Handing a Tablet to Munavvar ___Kh___ánum: "This is the Tablet in regard to events that have happened in Persia."

He asked me not to take it down. It referred to political conditions in Persia and prophesied that unless these changed and union was effected between the opposing sides, foreign powers would step in and divide the country.[15] After this, He said lovingly: "It is very nice to see you here — that you have at last reached here. Tomorrow I am going to take you, Myself, to the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. I was going to take you today, but as I am busy and have to take the Governor out, I cannot do so."

Later in the morning

He sent for me. My self-consciousness, my shyness had made me feel shut out from Him, but my heart had been continually crying out, with ever-increasing love, to Him. When I entered His little room and knelt at His feet and looked up into eyes of Love which I suddenly found I could meet, He put out His hand and said, "Now; now!"

I laid my head on His knee. The tears came. He lifted my face and wiped them away. "God shall wipe away all tears." [16]

Ah, this blessed Day!

I cannot remember exactly what happened, only that Love immeasurable flowed out from Him and was reflected in my poor heart. One thing I do remember. When He lifted my face, while He was wiping away my tears, He said in a voice of infinite sweetness, like the sighing of the wind which "bloweth where it listeth and we know not whence it cometh or whither it goeth": [17] "Speak. Speak to Me!"

His words in English sink into your very soul. What I lose by not understanding Persian!

"O my Lord, may my life speak to you!" I cried.

Then I presented Him with the petitions:

First I gave Him Lua's [18] and read Him a portion of one of her letters, speaking of her tests and difficulties.

"You love Lua?" He asked in that voice of heart-piercing sweetness, that voice which is indeed the calling of the Spirit, the instrument of Divine Love. "She is dear to you? Your friend?"

"She is my mother. I love her with my whole soul. Thy Love," I said, "has united so many hearts in eternal bonds." I spoke of my love for May Maxwell.

"Your sister?" He asked.

"My sister and my mother too."

"Your mother." He said it was this that made Him happy: to see that the sisters loved one another.

"Help me to love all," I begged. "In this I have failed."

"This is what I wish for you: that you will love all."

"With Thy help."

I gave Him the letter from Mr MacNutt. He smiled at the name. I mentioned Laura Barney's beautiful goodness to me and prayed for blessings for her.

"Khayli khub. Khayli khub," (Very good.) He said.

I gave Him Mother Beecher's[19] message.

Munavvar __Kh__ánum translated: "Our Lord will pray for her that she will attain to all she wishes."

I gave Him Mrs Parsons'[20] message, that she longed to establish a spiritual city on the Potomac, the inhabitants of which would live for the good of the whole rather than the one, and asked that the way might be opened for her to come to see Him; also whether she should come alone or bring her family.

"My lord, you know Mrs Parsons?"

"I know. I know." Then he said, "That city I hope will be a spiritual city and that the people of such a city will be perfectly united. In a physical city, of course, it is impossible to have everyone united. But in a spiritual city it is possible that all be united and in every way cemented. The spiritual city is like the sea, and the inhabitants of this city are like the waves of the sea. In every way they are connected and united. I hope she will be able to build such a city as this. I hope she will be able to do all the services she wishes and that the way will be opened for her to come."

His eyes were half closed as He gave this message. He seemed to be communing with her.

I read Him Bernard Ginzig's message, that "He had heard the voice of the Spirit in the realm of art; that he was a seeker of truth in the world of mysteries."

"Tell him: Give thanks to God that you are a seeker after the mysteries of existence and ask God that He reveal to you the Mystery of the Kingdom. Should you know all the mysteries of the world and know nothing of the Mystery of the Kingdom, it is useless. To know the mysteries of the world is very good when this knowledge is joined with the knowledge of the Mystery of the Kingdom."

He also said it was good for Bernard Ginzig to follow the art of designing.

In my hand, among the supplications with which I had been entrusted, was a letter from Barakatu'llah[21] to me. As he had not known, when he wrote, that I was going to 'Akká and as his letter therefore contained no message, it was just in remembrance of him that I had taken it to our Lord. In it he said he feared I had forgotten him. I did not read it to our Lord, only held it up, saying: "This is my last letter from Mr Barakatu'llah."

"You love Mr Barakatu'llah?"

"Oh yes, my Lord!"

He smiled.

“Write to him and say that you are in ‘Akká and say that you wish very much to have him here too. Tell him you have not forgotten him!” (with a sudden captivating smile, tipping His head to one side, and looking at me very knowingly). “Tell him you have not forgotten him and that you wish he were here with you. Say that you mentioned his name in the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and He gave you this message for him: that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says He loves him very much and He will pray for him that he may be assisted to do some work in Japan. Until now the Word of God has not been raised in Japan. Perhaps he may become the cause of its being proclaimed there. In every country in which a new founder appears who will raise there the words of the Kingdom,[Photograph: A group of New York Bahá’ís (c. 1912)] that man will be greatly helped. Therefore ‘Abdu’l-Bahá hopes that he (Mr Barakatu’llah) will become wonderfully assisted.”

I gave Him Claudia Coles’ message.

“Give My salaams to Claudia Coles and say: I will pray for her that she may obtain all her desires and that everything, including herself, will be exactly as she wishes.”

I read Him Mrs Ives’[22] long message.

“Say that she must continue to do to this man as she has been doing, she and Mother Beecher both. She must not change. She must try to be kind to him.

“First: herself. She must make every effort to enlighten her soul and to attain to such a condition where no sorrow or disappointment will have any effect upon her. The condition of entire and complete submission is the best one, for when one reaches this condition one is perfectly submissive to everything. And when she will be so, she will entirely forget her own will and ask nothing but the Will of God. Whatever is done in this world is the Will of God. And since one, when in this condition, has no will of his own, his will is the Will of God and whatever he does is the Will of God.”

I supplicated that she might come and look upon His face.

“Khayli khub,” He said. (Very good; very well.)

To Mary Little: “I will pray for her and ask help from the Kingdom for her and pray that she may become as she wishes.”

To Bertie Warfield: “Give her my greetings and love. Tell her I have accepted her love.”

“How do you like all these messages?” He said, smiling His smile of enchantment. “I give you such long messages because of the love in your heart. It is for this I love you — because you are so sincere and have a great love in your heart and love many of the believers. I see a great love in your heart. That is why I love you.”

I said: “If I have any love, it is Thy gift to me. I pray for the universal love, that I may love all, my Lord.”

“Insha’llah! That is what I desire for you: that you love each and all; that you love all the people of the world. This is My wish for you.”

Just then X was announced. Our Lord asked Munavvar __Kh__ánum to bring her in.

Then Munavvar returned with X. We two had a sacred meeting with our Lord. She spoke so tenderly of me. He answered tenderly. He then sent for Alice Beede. As she entered the room He said, with His enchanting smile: “Friends? Friends?”

Alice spoke up in her impulsive way. “If people are your friends they are mine.”

"All are My friends. Each; every one." (In English:) "My friends. My friends."

I was moved to take X's hand.

"She is mine?" I asked. "Mine forever?"

He smiled and said, "Yes. Yes."

Next He sent for Carrie. And when we were all at His feet, Munavvar interpreting for us. He said: "I hope a great love may be established among you and that day by day this love will increase. I have gathered you all together here that you may be gathered in the same way in the Kingdom of God, and that you may love one another very, very much. If you love one another as you should, it is just as though you had loved me as you should. The more you love one another, the nearer you get to Me. I go away from this world, but Love stays always. Therefore you should love one another very much. And I hope that you will become the cause of establishing great love among humankind and that, through the help and assistance of God, you will be able to establish in this world the Love of God. Bahá'u'lláh endured all these hardships and difficulties only for the sake of establishing Love in this world."

X said: "I wish I might be like this rose and exhale such fragrances."

Our Lord: "One could be much more beautiful than this rose. For the rose perishes. Its fragrance is just for a time. No winter has any effect upon such a Rose as Man."

"I wish," said Alice, "that when we go home we may be able to diffuse what we have received here."

Our Lord: "As I have said before: Man first is like a pupil. He becomes a learned man; then he becomes a teacher. First he is a patient. He must attain perfect health, and, having attained it, he can become a doctor. What I wish to say is that those who have attained the Kingdom of God will themselves become doctors. All the people of the world are patients, are ill. They are in great need of doctors, so that through the help of the doctors they may be cured of their spiritual diseases.

"The life of man will at last end in this world. We must all take out of this life some fruit. The tree of one's existence must bear fruit. If a tree has not fruit you must cut it down and burn it. It would be useless for other purposes. And what is the fruit of the human tree? It is the Love of God. It is love for humankind. It is to wish good for all the people of the earth. It is service to humanity. It is truthfulness and honesty. It is virtues and good morals. It is devotion to God. It is the education of souls. Such are the fruits of the human tree. Otherwise it is only wood, nothing else."

"Thou hast been so merciful, my Lord, to permit X to come while I am here."

"It is for your sake. You must be sure when you are with her to say only those things that will help her, for should she do anything wrong again it would not be good for the Cause."

"My Lord," I said, weeping, "I am so conscious of my own imperfections I can never feel hers are greater than mine."

"You must never think of your own imperfections, but of the Power of Bahá'u'lláh which can free you from all."

I was kneeling at His feet. Raising my hands I said: "Dear Lord, free me from this terrible self-consciousness." (For the fact, often proved, that he knew every thought in my mind had put me into a dreadful state. Thoughts I could never really have thought would come flying into my head like evil, fantastic birds — and I knew He read them!)

"I will pray for you that you may be freed from it."

Again the tears came to my eyes and again He wiped them away, smiling His divine smile.

"I supplicate for X, dear Lord. I love her with all my soul."

"I hope she may overcome and be exactly the opposite of what she has been in the past. I will pray for her."

Early morning tea<sup>3</sup>

Our Lord: "I want to tell you that most of the nations and the majority of the people are in perfect ignorance.

They are trying night and day to do something to destroy the foundation of man. There are among them political fights and wars. There are conflicts and disturbances. Every day they are inventing new instruments for the destruction of human life. There are among them also religious disputes and conflicts and disputes of patriotism. You hardly find two men between whom there is real harmony and sympathy.

"Now you must do your best, so that you may be able to remove all these conflicts and disputes. You will change this darkness into light; you will change this hatred and menace into love and harmony, because your aim is a glorious one.

"It is sure you will have to endure many difficulties in this Cause and that great obstacles will come before you. You will have many hindrances. But you must confront all and you must endure all these difficulties.

"You must give up all differences among you — differences of opinion — and all work for the same aim. You must be qualified with divine attributes, so that the Word of God may assist you, so that the bounties of God may descend upon you. And know that without the help of the Holy Spirit you will not be able to do this. And the magnetism of the Word of God is sincerity of intention. And until you are entirely severed from yourself and emptied of yourself, you will never be sincere enough.

"You must entirely sacrifice yourself. You must close your eyes to all rest. You must give up even your happiness and your enjoyments so that you may be able to do this.

"It is true that you will be blamed very much and you will have some difficulties and troubles. It is sure that people will show enmity toward you, and it is possible your own relatives even will try to oppose you. But you must be firm. And if you will be firm and steadfast, be sure that you will become victorious. You will be the cause of the union of the world of humanity.

"As Christ said to a rich man: 'Go, and give all you have, and take up your cross and come and be My follower.'<sup>[23]</sup> This saying of Christ's indicates that unless one is free from everything, one cannot be a real follower of Christ."

Luncheon

Our Lord: "Jesus Christ said: 'Freely have ye received; freely must ye give.' [24] That is to say: Man has received the bounty of the Kingdom for nothing, so you must give it to others as you have received it. That is to say, not to wish for any reward or compensation from the people. You should ask your reward of God.

"But in this new Revelation many of the believers have attained the Kingdom of God with great difficulty. They gave much to obtain it.

"The Blessed Báb and Bahá'u'lláh were the Possessors of the Kingdom. They gave the Kingdom to the people. But they had many trials and difficulties. The Báb exposed His breast to thousands of bullets from the enemy. Bahá'u'lláh, too, spent all His life in the prisons. The beloved of God obtained the Kingdom by the sacrifice of their lives, under calamities and oppressions. Their houses were destroyed and their honour lost. All their properties were pillaged. Their families and children were taken as captives, and at last they themselves were martyred. Now consider how difficult it was for these people to obtain the Kingdom. Notwithstanding this, the Kingdom is so great that still they received the Kingdom freely!

"Now the purpose is this: that you also should procure the Kingdom with so many sacrifices. It is possible you may have these calamities and difficulties. The people will accuse you, blame you and injure you, but you must show forth firmness and steadfastness. And should there be no trials, nothing will be accomplished. But when trials appear many will greatly develop. That is to say: those who are sincere believers, firm in the Cause, will develop and advance; but, on the contrary, those who are weak in their faith will escape. But My hope is that you will show forth firmness."

"Tell Miss Juliet Thompson," He said suddenly, laughing, "that I am going to strike her. Others are delicate, but she is strong and can stand it." He laughed again. "I am going to beat her."

"It has seldom happened in any age or cycle that women have been killed as martyrs, but in this great Revelation many women have been martyred. It happened many times that enemies among the women collected together, striking and beating a Bahá'í woman. Still they could not appease their hostility, their rage, by striking. They bit with their teeth. And this was due to their great rage."

The Master laughed all through this, from the time He mentioned my name to the end, a strange laugh. I was sitting by His side at this meal.

Dinner

Our Lord: "All animals and birds sleep early. This is the creative law of God. The birds sleep early. The rule is to sleep very early. This is God's wish. Children wish to go to bed early. Gradually man acquires the habit of sleeping later. To sleep at sunset is the law of God. All children, birds and animals sleep involuntarily.

"His Holiness Christ manifested in these countries, but in the beginning His Cause was spread in Europe and it superseded all other religions, notwithstanding that in Asia there were many religions, such as Zoroastrianism, Judaism, the star-worshippers and idolaters, who are still existing in India. But in Europe and America His Cause overcame all others. Now it is our hope that although this Truth was revealed in this part of the world, it will be spread and promulgated throughout America and Europe.

“His Holiness Christ said: ‘The Children of the Kingdom will go out from it, but from the uttermost parts of the earth many will come and enter into it.’[25]

Now the inhabitants of Syria are bereft, for they have no capacity, but you, who live in remote countries, have caught this Light. The people from around here are deprived, but you from such far countries have attained.

“A blind man, though he sit near the light, cannot see it; but a clear-sighted man can see from afar. A man afflicted with a cold, if he be in a rose garden, cannot inhale the fragrances, but one whose nostrils are pure can inhale from a long distance. The people who are in these cities are deaf and blind, but you, having an open eye and a pure nostril, can see the Light from afar and inhale the fragrances of this Rose Garden.

“Is this clear to you?”

Early morning tea

Munavvar __Kh__ánum chanted a prayer.

Our Lord: “In this prayer which we have just read, Bahá’u’lláh meant ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd, the Turkish Sulṭán who has lately been deposed,[26] and the verses are:

‘I implore Thee, O My God and the King of the nations, and ask Thee by the Greatest Name, to change the throne of tyranny into a centre of justice and the seat of pride and iniquity into the chair of humbleness and justice. Thou art free to do whatsoever Thou wishest and Thou art the All-Knowing, the Wise!’”

“And still,” she whispered back, “and still we ask for miracles.”

---

That day, the fourth of July, He took us Himself to the Holy Tomb[27] in the morning.

I realize now why the Gospels are written so simply. I find I am only able to state bare facts. But these surely are more eloquent than all human comment on them. Let me give them to you, then, simply:

First, with a father’s tender care, He came to the carriage with us and watched us start. At the house in Bahjí He joined us in a cool, whitewashed room, its door and window-trimmings painted blue, the usual linen-covered divan lining its walls, under three wide windows. Outside stood wonderful trees, like still sentinels guarding the Tomb. Sanctity hung in the air, a brooding spirit. Nowhere else in the world is the beauty of nature so impregnated with the soul of Beauty, a reflection from another world. In the air of ‘Akká and Carmel is — Life.

On a table was [a] single photograph, Lua’s. Our Lord called me to sit by His side, then, pointing to the photograph, said: “Your friend!”

I got it and placed it on a little table close to His elbow, between the couch where He sat and my own chair. As I did this His face lit up with a smile of heaven.

Tea was brought in — in the little clear glasses always used in ‘Akká — and He served us with His own hands. Then, seating Himself again on the divan, He called the four children who were with us: two of his own little grandsons (Shoghi Effendi and Rúhí)[28] and the two Kinney boys, and with a lavish tenderness, a super abundance of overflowing love, such as could only have come from the very Centre and Source of Love, He drew all four to His knees, clasped them in His arms, which enclosed them all, gathered and pressed and crushed them to His Heart of hearts. Then He set them down on the floor and, rising, Himself brought their tea to them.

Words absolutely fail me when I try to express the divine picture I saw then. With the Christ-love radiating from Him with the intensest sweetness I have yet witnessed, He stooped to the floor Himself to serve the little children, the children of the East and the children of the West. He sat on the floor in their midst, He put sugar into their tea, stirred it and fed it to them, all the while smiling celestially, an infinite tenderness playing on the great Immortal Face like white light. I cannot express it! In a corner sat an old Persian believer, in a state of complete effacement before his Lord, his head bowed, his eyelids lowered, his hands crossed on his breast. Tears were pouring down his cheeks.

Then our Lord took a chair and, facing the windows, pointed out these beautiful trees to us. In His spread white robes, with His majesty of pose — a sudden overwhelming majesty, after that tender humility (in a way Michaelangelesque, only far transcending that), yet with the divine sweetness that is never absent, no matter how tremendous the Power displayed — He appeared at first glance as the King of kings to me; the next instant once more the Spirit of the Christ, the Son, flashed upon me. Then, the two aspects were one.

He said: “We cannot in this world realize the bounty of God, nor can we appreciate His Love, but in the next world we can do so.

“When man is in the world of the womb, God showers upon him all blessings. He gives him all the organs, eyes, ears, etc. But man cannot put this favour into use there; it is not manifest there. When the child is born from the world of the womb into this world, then all those blessings and gifts which God showered upon him in the world of the womb become manifest and useful. His gifts were not known in the world of the womb, though men did possess them there, but the world of the womb had not the capacity to receive the manifestation of these gifts. Similarly with the gifts and blessings which God showers upon man in this world. This world is not fit and has not the capacity for the manifestation of these gifts and blessings. But when man enters the World of the Kingdom, then those gifts will be manifested.

“For example, one of the gifts of God is to be able to pay a visit to the Holy Tomb, but man cannot fully realize it while in this world. But when he enters the World of the Kingdom, there the blessings and gifts will become evident and clear.

“Is this clear to you?”

Then, giving us each a handful of jasmine, He led us one by one to the jasmine-strewn threshold of the Holy Tomb. As He led me, His hand quickened me. Never can I forget its vital, tingling pressure.

We knelt at the Divine Threshold. Suddenly, He was beside us: luminous, silent. Bending, He anointed our foreheads with attar of rose. Then He lifted each of us to our feet. And then, in a voice which struck across my heart, causing my entire being to quiver, the memory of which even now pierces and wrings my heart, He chanted.

When He had finished He asked Mr Kinney to chant. I could scarcely bear the thought of a human voice following His.
Yet Mr Kinney sang beautifully: "O Lord, make us pure and without desire." My whole being echoed this prayer.

Our Lord then requested us all to sing, and the hymn we chose was "Nearer, My God, to Thee."

While our Lord was chanting I could not look at Him, but during the singing that followed, I kept my face turned toward Him. I still see Him standing by the window, the translucence of that majestic profile, the grandeur of that luminous head, white turbaned against the white wall.

We left the Holy Tomb.

"Come and I will show you My garden," said our Lord. "Come, follow Me."

With the little children — Sandy pressed close to one side, Howard to the other — He led us. In folds indescribably graceful, His white robes blew about His Figure. Divineness breathed from it. That which He manifested then was the tender Love of the Good Shepherd. We followed in His Footsteps over the stony field: His garden?

"Other sheep have I that are not of this fold ... My sheep shall know My voice ... And there shall be one fold, one Shepherd." [29] As I followed, my heart chanted this.

Having gone about a quarter of a mile, He stopped and pointed out over the Mediterranean.

"Look," He said, "the sea, the sea!"

Mr Kinney said, "America lies beyond."

Then our Lord: "America and this land are one. The world is one — is one!" (in His ringing English). "America and this land are one. The five continents of the world are one. All the nations are one, through the Power of Bahá'u'lláh."

By "His garden" did He not mean the united world-to-be?

In the morning we were all sitting in our room (Alice Beede's and mine), Carrie and X with Alice and myself, and were discussing something and not agreeing and getting inharmonious, when there came a tap at the door. And there stood the Master, in white in the sunlight, His hands full of jasmine for us.

Later in the day, after our return from the Tomb, another sort of talk was going on in our room. Someone said something off-colour. It was carried on by someone else. Remembering our sacred morning, my soul rebelled against it. Again came the tap at the door. We were not dressed, not ready to receive our Lord, to open to Him.

That night He called us into His room — His small, dark, wood-panelled room, very dark now with only two candles burning in it, their little flames flickering as a breeze blew through the window. He looked so mysterious, so unearthly in the dim light. We seated ourselves at His feet.

"How are you?" He asked, "Are you happy? You should be happy after your visit to the Blessed Tomb today. Did you think of Lua?"

X and I told Him that we had. Carrie said she had thought of each and all the believers as they sat in the hall during the meetings. His face lit up with that marvellous smile with which He always blesses us when we speak of our love for others.

“Very good. Very good. That is what pleases God.”

Alice said, “It is the Fourth of July, the day we Americans celebrate our independence.”

Our Lord: “Yes, it is a good day in America, the day of your physical freedom. But today you celebrated your spiritual freedom. Physical freedom is a good thing, but spiritual freedom is of greater importance. Really the first thing is to have the soul free. And you must be very happy to have attained spiritual freedom on the same day when you attained physical freedom. I hope that as on this day you attained the physical freedom, in the same way you will be free from all passionate desires and human inclinations.

Then He went on: “The world is in prison and bondage through the leaders of religions who have taken the Spirit captive.

“The Jewish rabbis have always tried to convince the people that their religion is the true one, that they are the chosen nation by being descendants of Abraham, and that they are the only people who can enter the Kingdom.

“Likewise the Catholic priests. What they say to the people is this: that they possess the true religion, they are the accepted people of God and they alone can be saved.

“Likewise the __Sh__ay__kh__s.[30] They speak against the Christians and say: ‘God had a Son and the people crucified this Son of God!’ They say: ‘What a foolish thing these Christians teach — that God could have a Son and He, the Son of God, was crucified by human hands!’

“You see how the heads of each of these religions have captured the souls of man and brought them under this narrow control.

“Now Bahá’u’lláh has come and given freedom to these captive souls and released them from their bondage.”[31]

We talked of our walk behind Him — in His Footsteps — over the stones and thorns. I quoted: “My sheep shall hear My voice and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd.” Then X referred to His serving the little children. “Suffer the children to come unto Me.”[32] I said it was a symbol of His serving us, who are His little children.

“They are My sons. You are My daughters, My descendants by the Spirit, which is the nearest relationship. This day you are spiritually free.” Then He dismissed us, saying, “Go and rest.”

As we were leaving the room I told Him it was my mother’s birthday.

“God will bless her. God will bless her,” He said. “I have a message for your mother. I will give it to you tomorrow.”

Alas for the sin of disobedience! He had said “Go and rest.” But we were so anxious to write down His words while they were fresh in our minds that we stayed in the dining room until late, and — shameful to confess after our day in Heaven! — began to argue about the New York Assembly: as to whether or not it was united! Mr Kinney declared that it was. I said it was not. I even went so far as to mention the breeder of the discord, to condemn her destructive work!

But when X and I crept off to the room we were temporarily occupying — crept through the black, vaulted halls and rooms, over the old stone floors, to the rear wing of the house — a feeling of guilt such as I could hardly bear consumed me.

Next morning when I met our Lord outside the dining room door, in the sunny little court I so love because it is associated with His footsteps, with the benediction of His Presence, looking with eyes that ... forgave? ... no, that understood ... deep, deep into my eyes, He put out His hand and took mine in a clasp of love.

On the night of 3 July, when I was on the housetop with Munavvar ___Kh___ánum: a little miracle! One of countless miracles I experienced while in the Palace of the Divine Magician.

That housetop — roof of the House of the Lord — surely the place for the revelation of mysteries! I find I can scarcely speak of it. Yet I long to make a picture of it. To me it represents the summit of my existence.

When we first came to 'Akká, every night we would all go up to the housetop to walk or sit in the moonlight, Tuba and Munavvar ___Kh___ánum, Edna Ballora, Carrie, Alice, X, Miss Gamblin the governess, and myself. Later this changed and I went up alone with Munavvar. On the stones of the roof was spread a Persian rug and on this we would lie together, Munavvar and I, and under the midnight sky, talk of deep things till our Lord appeared.

And indeed on that roof He was an Apparition. I can see Him now, pacing up and down, up and down, with that swift, free tread which is somehow like floating, His white garments blowing about Him in long, sweeping lines. His background: millions of stars.

On the night of that third of July, Munavvar and I were alone, sitting on a parapet, looking out beyond the strong double sea wall to the sea; to our right, in the moonlight, the dome and minaret of the mosque and a tall palm tree; to the left, the garden of the Master; behind us, the grim, square barracks, first prison in 'Akká of the Blessed Perfection and His Family.

"I have such a funny little message for our Lord from my mother," I said. "I don't know how I shall ever give it to Him!"

"I wonder," Munavvar laughed, "if it is like the message of the mother of Laura Barney!"

"I shouldn't be surprised! It is about my art. She wants me to give up teaching in the Cause — my precious little mother! — and devote all my time to my art."

"Well, isn't that funny!" said Munavvar, "That is just what our Lord was saying to me yesterday. He said He had a message for your mother. That she did not understand your giving up everything for the Cause, neglecting your art to devote yourself to the Cause. Europeans, He said, did not understand these things. He was going to speak to you about it." [33]

Early morning tea

Our Lord to X, who was to leave that morning: "This is the third time you have been here. It has been a great pleasure for you to have been with your friends each time. Now a long trip is before you. If throughout this trip you are always sincere in your intentions you will enjoy it very much. This ought to be a spiritual and not a physical journey. You must always do your best to behave spiritually, not physically, so that everyone who meets you will know that your intention is to do good to mankind and your aim to serve the world of humanity.

Whatever you do, let the people know you are doing it for good, not only to earn you own living. By doing thus you will be able to serve every city to which you go. Now associate with good people. You must try to associate with those who will do you good and who will be the cause of your being more awakened, and not with those who will make you negligent of God. For example, if one goes into a garden and associates with flowers, one will surely inhale the beautiful fragrance, but if one goes to a place where there are bad-scented plants, it is sure he will inhale an unpleasant odour. In short, I mean that you will try to be with those who are purified and sanctified souls. Man must always associate with those from whom he can get light, or be with those to whom he can give light. He must either receive or give instructions. Otherwise, being with people without these two intentions, he is spending his time for nothing, and, by so doing, he is neither gaining nor causing others to gain.

“You must keep these words very well. This is the third time you have come here. Fruits must be the results of these visits. Patients go to a hospital. Some leave but slightly improved. Some leave more ill than when they entered. And some leave entirely cured. I hope you will be of those who are entirely cured. You must be very thankful that you have come.”

In His room fifteen minutes later

To X: “You have made your third visit here. Know that We have been very kind to you and We love you very much here. It is rare that believers come here three times. You must appreciate and be very thankful for this. You must appreciate this great blessing and act as is worthy of a spiritual daughter, so that when I hear news of you I shall be happy.

“May God protect you under all circumstances.”

5 July 1909

He sent for me. Taking off my shoes, I entered the beloved room and sat in my place at His feet, on His left. My place. May I be there forevermore in spirit! It was always to this place He beckoned me. First I would kneel, then sit in the Oriental way. He would draw me close, would gather my hand into His, would sometimes press my head against His knee.

“I am going to give you a message to your mother today,” He said with His smile of love. “Now, give Me her message. Speak. Say. Do not be afraid.”

“She told me to give You her dearest love.”

“Ah!” He smiled.

“And to tell You I was her dear, precious child ...”

“Ah, very good!” He pressed my hand, smiling.

“And to say ...”

“That she did not wish me to be a teacher in the Cause. She wished me to devote my time to my art, which was a gift from heaven. That I was not qualified to teach. That I was too sympathetic to enter into peoples’ lives to the extent I did. That I let people make inroads into my home for the sake of what I thought my duty. That she wanted me to change all this and become devoted to my art.”

“Is there anything else?” He asked.

“No; I think not.”

“Give your mother My best love. Tell her you are her dear child; you are her daughter. But though you are her physical child, you are My spiritual child, and I love you and you are dearer to Me than you are to her, and I am kinder to you than she is and I want your good more than she does and I think of you more than she does.

“As to your art: It is one of the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh that art is identical with an act of worship. And you must go on with your art and improve in it. And through this very Cause you will be able to make great progress in your art, for you shall be helped from Above.

“But as to your being a teacher: In a short time your mother will be proud that you are a teacher. This is an eternal honour upon your family. Lately I have seen that God is looking upon your family with eyes of Providence. Though your mother does not realize it now, in the future she shall know that this is a cause of eternal honour to your family.

“You must do both. You must be a teacher and go on with your art. And give some time to your mother.

“What do you think of these messages to your mother?”

“What do I think of the rays of the Sun that give Life?”

“I am glad to see so much love in your heart.”

“How is it that the Lord of mankind has drawn to Himself such a tiny atom, such a little piece of nothing?”

“My wish for you is that you make spiritual progress, more and more.”

When He spoke of my art, He pressed the palms of my hands. When he spoke of my teaching, He pressed my head and shoulders.

To be so near, so near that great Dynamo of Love, to have been lifted up out of the mass of God’s needy creatures and drawn to the Heart of the Divine Magnet — may my life blood flow in gratitude!

5 July 1909

Luncheon

Our Lord: “There are two kinds of changes and alterations. One causes descent and one ascent. The one which causes descent is not good, but on the contrary. The other change, which causes ascent, is acceptable.

“For example, a child from the time of being in the womb of its mother until it grows to maturity, changes in many stations, and this change is accepted and praiseworthy. For instance, ‘Mr MacNutt’” (smiling toward little Howard Kinney, whom He always called “Mr MacNutt” after his godfather, Howard MacNutt, a very dignified man who looks something like George Washington) “after many years will grow up and pass through many changes and will get moustaches and a beard and will be a man!

“Consider the bread. It changes and changes until it gives power to the body — and then it becomes man. This change is acceptable, because it replaces what has been eliminated from the body. The mineral carbon changes in many stations until diamonds are produced from it.

“But the change which is hated in all cases is, for example, as follows: A man is faithful; he gives up his faith. A just man becomes cruel. A seer, a clear-sighted man, becomes blind. Or: to be alive and then to die; to be steadfast in the Covenant and, for some idea, to become the enemy, like ___Kh___ayru’lláh.[34] At first he was a very firm man and was in the utmost faith. Then he wavered. Such a change is hated.

“Many firm souls had the greatest capacity and were like the wick and fire. As soon as they came in contact with the fire they received light. By a single meeting they were so improved and converted that they were entirely changed. While others were for a long time My companions, yet never changed. You find a man will be awakened by a single call. Another is never quickened even if you discharge a cannon! As soon as the ray of the sun shines through crystal it will burn, but if the same ray fall on a stone, no effect is produced.”

When He spoke of ___Kh___ayru’lláh I looked at my Lord, startled and anxious. Could He mean that I might prove weak? He smiled at me — oh, with such sweetness. My fears vanished before that sun!

He called Mr Kinney’s attention to the rice.

“Rice. Rice,” He said in English, “very good.” Then looking at me and laughing: “She is smiling at My English!”

“I smile because Your voice makes me happier than anything in the world.”

Soon, sensing my wish to speak to Him, only for the sake of speaking to Him: “Speak. Speak.”

But I had really nothing to say! I brought forth this: “Even this physical food is the best in the world.”

“That is because of your intense love. A poison given by a friend is like honey. A Persian poet says: ‘The poison which comes from Thee to me is my antidote. A wound from Thee is remedy.’ Certainly these physical dishes are tasteful to you because you have the greatest love.”

I supplicated that He might give me poison and wound me in His Cause, that I might be found worthy of this.

“I will. When afflictions and bitter conditions taste sweet to man, this shows that he is favoured in the sight of God.”

Mr Kinney said: “I am not eating now, but my Master is feeding me.”

Our Lord: “I, Myself, am the Food.”

As He spoke His head was bowed, His hands upturned, like cups, in His lap. He sat, the embodiment of Divine humility. A great Mystery flooded the room, and a tremendous Power.

“How like Jesus that sounds!” whispered Mr Kinney.

“Jesus,” said our Lord, His head still bowed, “was the Bread that came down from Heaven, but I am the Food prepared by the Blessed Beauty, Bahá'u'lláh.”

After a moment of dazzling silence, little Sandy said, “Why are you crying, mother?”

I could not cry. I seemed to be translated into the Spiritual Kingdom.

In few moments the Master turned to me and smiled. “Eat. Eat, Juliet.”

Because He had told me to eat, I felt that I must. I did so; finished the food on my plate to the last morsel, though I could scarcely swallow it. For the time, I was of the Heavenly Kingdom, made of other elements. The physical food was like dust and ashes in my mouth. Coarse grained, too, it seemed.

Later I understood what He had really meant by “Eat, Juliet.” He had invited me to partake of the Food prepared by the Blessed Beauty.

In the large tea room

5 July 1909, 5 p.m. Afternoon tea.

Our Lord: “We ought to pray for Miss X, that she may become just as God wishes her to be. If she be so, it will be very good, because God always loves those who repent and are sorry for what they have done. Such people are ashamed before God and become very humble.

“Once a Pharisee and a Publican entered the Temple to pray. The Pharisee said: ‘Thank God I am not as other men.’ The other said: ‘God have mercy upon me, a sinner!’ Christ said of these two: ‘The Pharisee is not acceptable in the Kingdom of God, but the other is acceptable, because the Pharisee is trusting in his own action, but the other is depending upon the forgiveness of God.’[35]

“But the only thing is this: One should remain firm in his repentance. I will pray for her.”

In His room

6 July 1909. Morning.

He sent for me, called me into His room this morning. Taking my hands in His Life-giving hands. He asked me those first dear questions: “Are you happy, Juliet?”

“So happy!”

“Are you well?”

“Thou knowest, my Lord.”

He told me He was pleased with me. Then He asked me for the verbal messages. He forgets nothing.

I gave Him dear Sylvia Gannett's message.

"She is such a beautiful spirit," I said. "She is a peacemaker. She never criticizes anyone"

"It is a very good quality that she does not talk about others' faults, for many troubles are caused by speaking against one another. Because to talk badly behind the people is very bad."

I spoke of Herbert Rich and received a wonderful private message for him.

To Miss Colt (who had sent the humblest of supplications): "Give My kindest love to Miss Colt and say: You are worthy of everything. Tell her that if she were not a worthy soul she would not have been blessed with entering this Cause and she could not be able to follow the Word of God. She was not unable to hear the Words of the Kingdom. I will pray for her."

"What do you think of all these messages? I give them to you because of the love in your heart."

I spoke of May Maxwell and Mariam Haney and said they were beautiful.

"You are all beautiful," He replied. "And Mrs True?" He then asked.

"I don't know Mrs True, except through letters."

"I love Mrs True very much."

I spoke of Mr MacNutt and Mr Harris, and also mentioned Mr Hoar. "They have borne so beautifully," I said, "their ordeals of the past winter." [36]

He was silent for a moment, then asked: "Cannot you unite these two factions?"

"O my Lord!" I gasped. "I! I have longed for years to see them united."

"I know. That is why I love you so. You can do it because you have love."

"If it is Thy command, I can do it, for Thou wilt help me. I have not been able in the past because I had not enough love and was not patient enough with those who see less clearly than others." (I meant those who belittled His station, comparing Him with the apostle Peter.)

"You must become more patient. It would be well if some others would help you. For instance, Lua Getsinger, Miss Barney, Mrs Brittingham, Mrs Maxwell, also Mrs Kinney, and anyone else you think would promote harmony. If you could have feasts and meetings in your houses and bring together the chief speakers in the utmost love; and if, when you have the opportunity, you would speak to them on the importance of unity, it would be very well. You will be assisted in this."

"Why is it the Lord of mankind has been so bountiful to this atom?"

"If you all could know how I love you, you would fly away with joy!"

"Think of Me often," He said. "Think of the times you have spent here. I hope you will become the daughter of the Kingdom; that you will become the essence of purity and very heavenly; that you will become enlightened by the light of the Love of God and the cause of the enlightenment of other maidservants. Is there anything else?"

“There are three little things in my heart, my Lord.”

“What are they?”

“I have a little godchild named for me, who was born under very unfortunate circumstances.”

“I will pray for her that she will be blessed both in this world and in the spiritual world.” The love and the understanding beaming from His face set my heart forever at rest for the little Juliet.

“My brother?”

His smile became brilliant. “Your brother!” (in His ringing English). Every one of His words in English burns into your soul. Oh, if I only knew Persian! “Well, what is it for your brother? Speak!”

“My Lord, he is like a beautiful rose bud: not yet opened.”

Looking at me with divine loving kindness, He said: “I hope this bud will become a beautiful full-blown rose and exhale the sweetest fragrance. What else?”

“My Lord,” I said, “I pray that Percy Grant may become a believer.”

He pressed my hand two or three times and laughed, and smiled down at me.

“Do you want this very much?”

“Oh my Lord, yes! So much!”

“I will pray for this. I will pray for this. But,” and He smiled again, indulgently, “you too must make an effort. You must help him. I will pray for him.”

Then He dismissed me. Kissing the hem of His garment, I left Him.

Luncheon

Our Lord: “Afflictions and troubles are due to the state of not being content with what God has ordained for one. If one submits himself to God, he is always happy. A man asked another: ‘In what station are you?’ The other answered: ‘In the utmost happiness.’ ‘Where does this happiness come from?’ ‘Because all existing things move according to my wish. I do not find anything contrary to my desire. Therefore I have no sorrow. There is no doubt that all the beings move by the Will of God, and I have given up my own will, desiring the Will of God. Thus my will became the Will of God, for there is nothing of myself. All are moving by His Will, yet they are moving by my own will. In this case, I am very happy.’

“When man surrenders himself, everything will move according to his wish.”

“Today I have answered the questions of all. Now you are left, Mr Kinney!”

Mr Kinney: “There is only one question in my soul. How can I love you more?”

Our Lord: "I will answer you later."

Mr Kinney: "The Board of Council[37] has met for three years past in my studio and I am very proud of it."

Our Lord: "It is indeed worthy to be proud of. I hope your home may always be the place of the gatherings; that the beloved of God may always come together there, be engaged in commemoration of God, have heavenly talks and speak through the confirmation of the Holy Spirit. Your home will be one of the heavenly constellations, Insha'llah, and the stars will gather there."

Mr Kinney: "What could I ask for more?"

Our Lord: "There is nothing superior to this."

Dinner

Our Lord (through an interpreter): "The spiritual food is the principal food, whereas the physical food is not so important. The effect of the spiritual food is eternal. Through the material food the body exists, but through the spiritual food the spirit will be nourished. The material food, that is, the food for the body, is simply water and bread, but the food for the intellect is knowledge and the food for the spirit is the significances of the Heavenly Words and the bounties of the Holy Spirit."

"If there were no love, nothing would be pleasing. Many come here and eat, but they do not appreciate it."

The Master had written a Tablet to the believers in Tīhrán that they should organize a meeting in which Bahá'í women will teach and train others to teach the Cause. Now they have written the news to the Master that they have arranged this meeting and nineteen girls and women attend. This meeting will advance directly, and will be the cause of developing the girls in every way.

In our Lord's room

7 July 1909. Morning.

While Munavvar ___Kh___ánum, Carrie, Alice, and I were in the room of our Lord this morning, suddenly smiling at me, He said: "Do you think your mother will like My message to her?"

"Her heart is so pure she must love it, Lord." My hand was in His.

"She will like that part about your art," He said, with His witty smile.

"She said you would straighten out my life."

"Say to her: I have two arts: one physical, the other spiritual. The physical one is that I draw the images of men. My spiritual art is that I draw the images of the angels, and I hope that at last I shall be able to draw pictures of the Perfections of God. My physical art will at last end, but my spiritual art is everlasting. My physical art can be done by many, but my spiritual art is not the work of everyone. My physical art makes me dear to men, but my spiritual art makes me dear to God. Therefore I work to perfect both of them."

"Thou hast straightened out my life!"

With his smile of light He said: "I am the Heavenly Artist. Although I am sitting here, my pen is working in every part of the world, over the pages of the hearts."

7 July 1909

At luncheon

At this meal I was sitting beside Him.

Our Lord (through an interpreter): "The Master's love for you is like an ocean and your love is like a drop. The distress and calamities which the Master has endured for your sake for many years, you could not endure for one day. And now, should anyone offer Him the entire existent world in exchange for one of you, He would not accept it. This means that one of you is dearer to Him than the whole world. If a thousand swords be used on the Master's neck, or against Him, He accepts that, but would not be content that one hair of your head should be taken away.

"About two years ago some spies came from Constantinople and it was a terrible day for the Master. He sent all the believers from 'Akká that none should be harmed but Himself. He sent them all away that no one should stay in 'Akká except Himself — that if there were any kind of calamity, it should be for Him alone.[38]

"You must realize by this expression how much He loves the believers."

Every afternoon Tuba and Munavvar __Kh__ánum, Carrie and Alice and I had tea in the room of our Lord. On this seventh of July we had a most heavenly talk. Returning to my room with a yearning heart, breaking under His Love, and with a devastating sense of my own unworthiness, I wrote Him a supplication. I told Him my heart was paralyzed by His bounties and it killed me to think that this heart, receiving so much, realized so little. I begged Him to open it wider and wider to the rays of His sacred Love.

Scarcely had I finished this pitiful little plea when I saw Him standing at my door. That Holy Figure in white in the sunlit court! I gave Him my supplication. He took it and, calling Munavvar __Kh__ánum, beckoned us both to follow Him to His room. Then He asked Munavvar to translate it. When she had done so, He simply said, "Khayli khub," (Very well) and dismissed me.

Later in the afternoon, the Master struck me the first blow! The beginning of the shattering of my earthly hopes. After this, He took from the inside pocket of His long, flowing cloak my supplication. Unfolding the paper and looking at me with grave sweetness, he pointed to the last paragraph, "May my heart open wider and wider to the rays of Thy sacred Love." He then folded it again and put it back in His breast-pocket.

Still later in the afternoon

"My daughter! My dear! My soul! My spirit!"

"Lord, anything You send me I will bear."

"Yes. Yes."

I was on my knees. I looked up to see the Christ-Face yearning over me, His hands raised in blessing above my head. I shall never forget that Face. It was lifted as though in prayer, His eyes closed, His lips apart.

Then He held my head against His heart, and I heard the Heart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá beat.

I went to my room. Standing, facing His room, I reached out my arms and my heart cried: I love You. But I made no sound. Almost instantly He appeared at my door. I knelt in the doorway. "I love You; I love You," I said. He looked at me with unearthly luminous eyes, then turned away. Once more I held out my arms. He looked back.

The night of the seventh of July we all sat on the roof. He was in His little room on the roof. He sent out His cloak to put around Carrie, who felt cold, and she shared it with me. My tears fell on His cloak. I had realized this: "With His stripes are we healed." [39]

7 July 1909, 9 p.m.

At dinner

Our Lord: "Since the day you arrived you have daily progressed and you have almost changed.

"Some souls come here and return unaltered. It is precisely like one who comes to a fountain and, not being thirsty, returns exactly as he came. Or, like a blind man who goes into a rose garden: he perceives not, and, being questioned as to what he has seen in the rose garden, answers, 'Nothing.'

"But some souls who come here are resuscitated. They come dead; they return alive. They come frail or ill in body; they return healed. They come athirst; they return satisfied. They come sorrowing; they return joyous. They come deprived; they return having partaken of a share. They come athirst; they return satisfied!

"These souls have in reality done justice to their visit. Praise be to God, you are of these souls and you must be exceedingly happy.

"If a cow should go to a prosperous town, a city full of bounties and divine blessings, and should be asked as to what it had found in this town, it would say, 'Nothing but cucumber peels and melon rinds.' But if a nightingale should fly to a rose garden, when it returns the reply would be, 'Verily, I have scented delicious fragrances, seen most beautiful flowers, most delightful verdure, drunk most refreshing water from gushing fountains; and I have found new life!' Now the reply of a beetle would be, 'All you have heard concerning the rose garden is false. There is neither a delightful fragrance nor beauty of verdure, nor is it joyous. In fact, when I entered it, I was displeased. All you have heard is false. Had I not escaped, I should have died!'"

8 July 1909

In the morning of 8 July, the Master rushed with tremendous energy into my room and placed me with His two hands on the divan, then, going down to the garden and into a little house below my window, He dictated Tablets all morning, every now and then coming to the window, standing in the sunlight and looking up at me. Never shall I forget the Face of my King at the window. Just before He left the house in the garden, once more He looked up. I was faithful at my post; in fact, I had not dared even to move.

In His room

Afternoon, 7 July 1909

Munavvar, Carrie, Alice, Juliet

“All this trouble and hardship is just for this end: that you may love one another as you should, so that you may be perfectly united.”

To Carrie Kinney: “Let Me give you the good tidings that your family and your children will be greatly helped; and you must be very happy for this. I love your ‘Mr MacNutt’ very much. It is good that you have two Mr MacNutts! Others have one Mr MacNutt, but you have two! Of course you love Mr MacNutt, because he has been the cause of your spiritual life. The physical father is the cause of the material life, but Mr MacNutt was the cause of your spiritual life. Therefore you owe him much.”

8 July 1909

At Luncheon

The Master spoke of the many letters He had answered that morning and of the packages still unopened. Mr Kinney said: “I will write Your letters for You!”

Our Lord: “Very good; very good. Write a letter and answer it yourself. Look into your heart and see the answer. The answer is what is written on the tablet of your heart. That which is written upon paper is subject to corruption and various accidents, such as consumption by fire and moth, but that which is inscribed on the tablet of the heart is imperishable and everlasting. A day will come when all My communications upon paper — all My writing — will be effaced. But that which I have inscribed upon the hearts will not be effaced. There is no end to it. For I write the Word of the Love of God upon the hearts, and the Word of God is eternal.”

The Master said He was exceedingly happy because of Mr Kinney’s presence at the table (after a short illness), “for we are all assembled together.”

“Just consider what the Bounty of Abhá has achieved! Just observe in what a condition we are! Imagine not that if you were to sacrifice all upon earth, you could produce this attitude.”

Little Howard (aged four) from his high chair: “Won’t the Master come to New York?”

Our Lord: “Perhaps you do not know that I am always there with you, for though My body is absent, My heart is there; My Spirit is there.”

Mr Kinney (to the interpreter): "Tell the Master He will always be an honoured Guest."

Our Lord: "I am the Host, not a guest. For to be a guest is to be there temporarily, whereas the Host stays forever."

---

One day at lunch a huge dish of macaroni was put on the table. The Master, laughing, rose from His seat, took the platter in His own hands, brought it to little Howie's high chair and served him a very big helping. Then He told us that "Mr MacNutt" had come to His door that morning, had taken off his shoes and left them on the door step, then had run to Him, the Master, where He was sitting by the window, thrown his arms around the Master's neck and whispered in His ear: "My Lord, can't we have macaroni for lunch?"

"He is never allowed it at home," laughed Carrie.

In the Master's room

8 July 1909

In the early afternoon He called us all into His room. Beckoning me to sit in my accustomed place and taking my hand in His, He began: "You are fortunate that during these few days I have not been very busy, for to some others it happened I had less time to give them.

"The desire of My heart is that each of you, when you return to America, will be just like a torch flaming with the Love of God, and that your speech will be wonderfully loosened, so that when you enter the meetings, you will enter them with full eloquence and with perfect courage. I kiss the mouth of Sandy so that he may have wonderful speech, especially for this purpose."

He then dictated messages to various believers. On our expressing regret at burdening Him with so many, He said: "Everything that is a sign of your love toward one another, though it take my time, yet it makes me happy. And if you will realize how much I love you all, you will know that even were I occupied day and night with your affairs, I would never tire. For My Love is not a physical one to make Me tired. My Love is purely spiritual and divine. Therefore I am never tired."

Through Carrie to Mrs Gibbons:[40] "You must always look forward to My will and desire. My will and desire are that you should honour and respect all humankind, especially the believers. Never try to be the cause of hurting anyone's feelings. On the contrary, make every effort to become the happiness of hearts. There is no greater sin than the breaking of hearts and there is no greater action than to be the cause of the happiness of hearts. If you want My happiness, try to be kind to Dr Fischer,"[41] (as I caught my breath in wonder at His knowledge, He smiled down at me) "and do something that no ill-feeling may exist any more between you."

Carrie asked for a message for Mrs MacNutt, "if it is not too much."

(To us:) "I love you all so much that the more I mention you the happier I become. Say to Mrs MacNutt: Though you stayed in 'Akká a short time, it is as though you had stayed one year, for in that short time the instructions and teachings of God were revealed to you and you have accepted them with a pure heart, for you had the capacity for receiving the divine bounties. Therefore, in a short time you have attained to a new spirit. I ask God that you make progress day by day and that you may have a greater portion of the bounties of Bahá'u'lláh."

Through Alice to Robert Rich: "Give My love to him and say: Mrs Beede mentioned you here and said good things about you. I know you have gone through sufferings in your life, but the sufferings and troubles in this world are the cause of awakening one. Therefore, you must be thankful for what sufferings you have and give thanks to God that you have not been shaken by your tests. For the tests are very great and sometimes will be the cause of one's being quite neglectful. But, thanks be to God, you have faced them firmly. I will pray for you, so you may obtain the desire of your heart."

Through me to Thorton Chase: "Give My greetings to Mr Chase and say: Miss Juliet mentioned you here with love and with a face full of light. And she mentioned your kindness to her. I am pleased with you. And for your endeavour and zeal in serving the Kingdom of God I am very happy. And I hope you will yourself become the embodiment of the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh, so that each one who sees you and knows your actions will know that the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are manifesting through you."

To Mr Windust[42] through me: "Give Mr Windust My kindest love and say: Though physically I have not met you, in reality I have seen you often. Why? Because in Spirit and heart I am always with you. I am inseparable from you. And I know your desire is My good-pleasure. Therefore I am pleased with you."

Through me to Annie Boylan: "Your message was delivered and the good tidings of the union and harmony among the believers of New York caused a happiness in My heart. For each one in this world has a desire. But My desire is the realization of the perfect love in the world of humanity. The mention and thought of all the believers day and night, must be love, union, and brotherhood. This union will be the cause of their progress in all conditions."

Through Alice to Mason Remey: "Give My greatest love to Mr Remey and say: You are very dear to me. You are so dear that I think of you day and night. You are My real son. Therefore I have an idea for you. I hope it may come to pass."

He turned to me and, smiling, said: "Do you love Mr Remey?"

It crucified me, but I answered, "Yes." Again the Master smiled.

Later, while I dwelt in anguish on the significance of His words — while the pencil with which I was taking them down slipped from my hand — He turned to me smiling again and, pointing to my notebook, said: "Write; write!"

Soon He dismissed us.

Near sunset we went to the Holy Tomb.

Just before we went He came to our room — Alice's and mine — and, seating Himself on the couch, while as usual I sat at His feet, He said: "Now I am sending you to the Tomb, and you should ask there all you wish and desire. And I will pray also, here, for what you pray. And there you will pray for everything you wish."

In that unutterably holy place I prayed for unity in New York. I prayed to be strengthened to fulfil His Will. I implored for strength to meet my great tests. I prayed for my father, mother, and brother and for every friend I could think of. Then I took from my heart the love of my life and gave it into the hand of Bahá'u'lláh. I asked but one thing: that this once-beloved of my heart might know His Beauty and might serve His Threshold.

Dinner, 9 p.m.

Our Lord, smiling: "Are you happy owing to your visit to the Tomb? Mrs B. [Beede]?"

Alice, with a face all shadows and tragedy: "You must feel that I never was so happy."

Our Lord: "Although our assembly tonight numbers only ten outwardly, in reality it is representative of all the beloved of God. Why? Because it pictures the Bahá'í community. The seed, no matter how small, in the estimation of the perceptive mind, is a veritable tree. The mind images the tree and the tree is revealed from the seed. Likewise, when I see you it is as though I were seeing all the beloved of God. The Teachings I give to you are the Teachings I would give to all the beloved of God.

"Today when you visited the Holy Tomb, I during that very time directed My attention to the Supreme Concourse of the Kingdom of Abhá and supplicated confirmations in your favour.

"Praise be to God, your hearts are overflowing with the Love of God and you have no great attachment to this world. The thing which is necessary for you now is discourse. It is My hope that you will attain an eloquent discourse, for I have loved you exceedingly. Consequently I anticipate an eloquent, expressive, and excellent discourse on your part after your arrival in America. Rest assured in the fact that the breaths of the Holy Spirit will aid you, provided no doubts obtain in your hearts. Is not this so, Juliet? Is not this so, Mrs B.?"

He helped each of us from His plate. To me He gave His bread. I was sitting beside Him.

"You will remember these nights very often. These nights are rare. They are not obtained always.

"I hope the party that has come, Mr and Mrs Kinney, Mrs B., and Juliet, will be real Bahá'ís and that your deeds and actions will manifest this when you return to New York. I have given you so many blessings. I hope you will be able to speak fluently and with great power in the meetings and share with the rest of the friends what you have received here."

That night (8 July) I went to the housetop alone with Munavvar __Kh__ánum.

"Dear," I said, "do you remember my supplication that Percy Grant might become a believer? I have had only one strong love in my life: for him. We both knew it the moment we met. Then a blow came, and I refused to see him any more. I even left New York for a time because, really providentially, only a day or two after that blow, I was called to Washington to paint a portrait. And in Washington, Munavvar, Aḥmad showed me a Tablet just arrived from the Master to a friend of mine, who had mentioned Percy Grant in one of her supplications — merely mentioned his name in a prayer for him — a Tablet in which was a message to him and to myself:

'Say to Percy Grant and Juliet Thompson: O ye intelligent ones, there is no rest or tranquillity in this world. There is no composure of mind. The world is in need of the Heavenly Glad-Tidings. Therefore, turn ye to the Kingdom of Abhá and seek after spiritual attraction, for life without this is death and this evanescent world like the mirage in the desert.'

"This is as well as I can remember it. And ever since then this spiritual attraction has been growing. But today I took this love out of my heart and returned it to God. And now I am ready to do the Master's Will."

"Why did you do this, dear?"

“Because I believed it to be the Master’s Will.”

“What made you think that?”

“Don’t you know?”

“Yes, dear, I think I do. Something He said this afternoon?”

“Yes, dear.”

“Our Lord has asked me to speak about this to you, Juliet. He seems to wish it very much. He knows this other man too, but He thinks Mr Remey would be better. But He also wishes to know your own feelings.”

“He knows my own feelings, Munavvar darling. There is no flinching in me that He does not know. But I have prayed to make any sacrifice and I could have no greater opportunity. I could make no greater sacrifice than in marrying a man I did not love. But for the Master’s sake I would do it joyfully.”

“But, dear, He would not wish you to go against your inner feelings. Tell me about it.”

“Perhaps I am too much attracted by people of brilliant intellect. And this man I love has such a powerful one! But how can I think of my own preferences when the Master wishes something else for me?”

Suddenly our Lord appeared on the housetop. Walking up and down like a king, He began to talk to us. I listened in breathless wonder. Most of what He said has escaped me. I can only write fragments.

He told me He wished me to have a great power of discourse. He spoke of love. He said I had a great capacity for love, that this was the promising sign in me. “Qurratu’l-‘Ayn,”[43] He said, “had nothing but her love. This was her power.”

I spoke of how deeply I felt my unworthiness.

“Capacity attracts,” He answered. “The greater your capacity, the more you will be filled. When the child is hungry and cries for milk, the milk of the mother begins to flow rapidly.”

I could scarcely speak after all He said. When His bounties are pouring upon me I always feel paralyzed. All my senses are numb, dead. It kills me to be so, beneath the outpourings of His generosity. To be in the Presence of the Lord and not aglow! I am filled with shame and the sense of my utter unworthiness. I murmured to Munavvar __Kh__ánum: “Say to our Lord for me: What matters the physical life now? I can do nothing for Him, for Whom I want to do everything, but follow His commands and wishes to the minutest detail.”

He then came and sat on the rug beside us and began to speak of Mason Remey. Oh, to picture Him as He was then — no longer the Lord, the King, but the tender Father — a something eager (if I may use the word) in His manner and tone.

He told me He loved Mason Remey so much and He loved me so much that He wished us to marry. That was the meaning of His message to Mason. He said it would be a perfect union and good for the Cause. Then He asked me how I felt about it.

I answered: “I will gladly fulfil Thy wish.”

“But what are your inner feelings?”

“Lord, Thou knowest my inner feelings.”

“You love this other man? You love?”

“It is secondary now. My only desire is to fulfil Thy Will. Thou knowest best. My only desire is to give all I have for Thee — to give my dearest. I can do this now. This is my opportunity.”

“But, my daughter, My wish is for your happiness. You must be frank with Me about it. The inner feelings cannot be forced. In speaking with you just now I was giving you spiritual commands. This is different; this is material, and, in regard to it, I am not commanding but suggesting. This union with Mr Remey is merely an idea, a suggestion of Mine.”

“Thy suggestions and ideas come from the Infinite Wisdom.”

“But — understand Me — I wish your happiness.”

“I should rather follow Thy wish. I should be happier following Thy wish than in marrying the man I love.”

“Well, is it possible for you to love Mr Remey as you do this other man?”

“Is it possible, Lord?”

“If it is possible to love Mr Remey equally well, for him to take the place of the other, then I should be glad.” He paused a moment. “But your marrying the other is very good, if you can make him a believer. And you must pray for it. If you see that he has an inclination to become a believer, even before he does so, you can marry him. If you can lead him to the Cause this is very, very good. Am I not a kind Father?” He asked.

I spoke brokenly of His Love.

“I am the Essence of Love.”

I remember His saying later: “Appreciate this night. Many a soul, both now and throughout the ages, would give their lives for five moments of such a night on this roof with Me — and with Munavvar __Kh__ánum.”

During the tender talk that followed, I asked: “May I come here again?”

“Yes; yes!” He replied. “You have permission to come whenever you find you can do so.”

Ah, “many a soul, both now and throughout the ages, would give their lives for five moments of such a night on the roof with Him — and with Munavvar __Kh__ánum.”

9 July 1909

Morning

He called me to His little room. Tuba __Kh__ánum interpreted for me. What He said to me I cannot tell — only a tiny part.

“You have stood a very great test. I love you dearly. Your tests have been very, very great. And when they came you did not flinch” (raising His hand with a strong gesture) “but stood firm and met them bravely. And they were very great.”

"My Lord, I have been grieving for not having met them more perfectly."

Then followed what I cannot tell. Only my Lord, Tuba and myself, and Beings in the Unseen World who live in the Presence of the Master, know what He said to me then. I wept at His feet.

"What I have told you is because of this," He said, "this condition of your heart."

"Be happy," He continued. "Think if you were at the feet of Christ in His time, His hand covering yours."

"I am so unworthy. I am so dead. Quicken me into Life!"

"I will. Be at rest, and I will. I will widen you. I love your love."

"Perhaps I feel so dead in order to realize that everything comes from Thee, that without Thee I am indeed dead. Without Thee I can do nothing."

At the end He said: "Go, and be My light in America."

Kissing the hem of His garment, I left Him.

A little later, still on the housetop, He pointed to the waning moon. "The moon ... the stars ... the East ... no! I am the Sun of the West!" He said.

"For us? Us Christians?"

"Yes. For you."

After an interval: "I am not worthy, Lord, that Thy Glory should be revealed to me yet?"

"No."

"But some day?"

"Yes."

There was a flash from His eyes. For an instant they were like brilliant stars before which the stars in heaven paled. Then He veiled them with His lids. Two more flashes, and they became as usual. Unworthy though He had found me, He, in His mercy and love, gave me three glimpses of His Glory.

"My Spirit loves your spirit. I love your heart." He touched my heart; and it leapt beneath His fingers.

"The strings of my heart vibrate," I said, "beneath the fingers of the Divine Musician."

He touched it again; and again it was strangely stirred. "Ahh!" I breathed.

"Why 'Ahh'?"

"This heart will sing for Thee forever!"

He covered my lips with His hand.

“Love,” He said. For a moment he lifted His hand.

“Love,” I repeated. His hand closed again on my lips.

“Love!” He said, lifting His hand.

“Love,” I repeated. He made me repeat it many times.

He touched my eyes and my forehead.

“I am Thy new creation,” I said. “Keep me unspotted from the world.” I had been kneeling at His feet. I raised my face and looked up. That Face of Grandeur, the long grey hair blown about it, under the stars!

“My Lord!”

“Yes!” with incredible majesty.

“My King!”

“Yes!”

“O Christ!”

There was no answer.

“Word of God!”

“Yes!”

“King of the Seen and the Unseen!”

“Yes!”

“Prince of Peace!”

“Ah. Peace ...” He seemed to sigh the word: from that housetop, across the world. I shall never forget the heartbreak in the sigh.

Then, turning to me: “I am thy Father. Say: Thou art my Father.”

“Thou art my Father.”

“I am thy King. Say: Thou art my King.”

“Thou art my King.”

“I am thy Beloved.”

“Thou art my Beloved!”

Luncheon, 12:30

Our Lord: "How spiritual are our meetings! In the utmost love are we set aglow! The hearts are all attracted to each other. It is just like being one soul, one body. Such a meeting as this is impossible and cannot be organized save through the Love of God. There is no material interest whatsoever. There is no worldly desire at all. In the utmost purity and holiness has the Force of Divinity assembled us. All, with perfect sincerity, are directing our attention to the Kingdom of Abhá, and our greatest desire is His good-pleasure.

"New pilgrims have arrived from Persia. Souls firm in the Covenant have arrived. They have come in the utmost love. The Light of the Love of God is radiant in their countenances.

"Yesterday Mr Kinney asked me concerning music and I promised I would answer him today:

"Music is of the important arts. It has a great effect upon the human spirit. Musical melodies are a certain something which prove an accidental[44] upon ethereal vibrations. For voice is nothing but the expression of vibrations, charged therewith, which affect the nerves of the ear. Musical melodies are therefore those peculiar effects which are produced by vibrations. However, music has the keenest effect upon spirits. Although it is a material affair, its tremendous effect is spiritual and its greatest attachment is to the realm of the spirit.

"If a person desires to deliver a discourse, it would prove more effective after musical melodies. The ancient Greek philosophers, as well as the Persian, were in the habit of delivering their discourses in the following manner: First, there would be musical melodies, and when the audience had been influenced to a certain extent thereby, they would leave their instruments and begin their discourse.

"Among the most ancient musicians of Persia was one named Barbad. When a great question was asked at the court of the king and the ministers failed in persuading the king, the matter would be referred to Barbad. Whereupon Barbad would go with his instrument to the court and would play the most appropriate and touching music: and the end would at once be gained. Because the king would immediately be affected by the musical melodies. Certain feelings of generosity would swell in his heart, and he would give way.

"You may try this. If you have a great desire for something, if you wish earnestly to attain your end, try to attain it in a musical audience. But there are people who are like stones, and music cannot affect a stone.

"Now let us go back to the original subject: Music is an important means for the education and development of humanity. But the main cause for the development of humanity is the Teaching of God.

"Music is like this glass which is perfectly pure and polished. It is precisely like this clear chalice before us. And the Teachings and Utterances of God are like the water. When the chalice is in the utmost state of purity, absolutely clear and polished, and the water is perfectly fresh, then it will confer life. Wherefore, the Teachings of God, whether they be Utterances in the form of homilies, or prayers and communions, when they are melodiously chanted will prove most impressive. It is for this reason that His Holiness David sang the psalms with melody in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem.

"In this Cause the art of music is of paramount importance. The Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, when He first came to the barracks often repeated this statement: If among His immediate followers there were some who could play some musical instrument, for instance the flute or the harp, or who could sing, it would have charmed everyone.

“In short, musical melodies play an important role in the outward and inward qualities of man, for music is the inspirer and motive power of both the material and the spiritual susceptibilities. What a motive power it is in feelings of love! When man is attracted to the Love of God, music will have a great effect upon him.”

The Master turned to the window and pointed to a ship on the sea.

“See: a ship!” He said to Alice, who was sitting beside Him at this meal.

“If we build the Temple quickly,” she asked, “and send a ship for You, will you come to America?”

“I will come of My own volition to America if they build the Ma__sh__riqul’l-A__dh__kár quickly. But,” (sadly and very gently) “they will not build it quickly.”

I was sitting next to Edna Ballora. Taking her hand, I said to our Lord: “May Edna help me with the meetings in my studio when we return to New York?”

“Khayli khub. Khayli khub. You love Edna Ballora?” He asked, His eyes — so holy, so shining — fixed on me.

“Oh yes, my Lord!”

“Very much?”

“Oh so much!” The love already in my heart for Edna was fanned to an intense flame. It burned; it hurt me.

“Very, very much?”

The Master was still gazing at me, and now I could scarcely bear that flame in me, in which my heart itself seemed to be melting away. Tears rained down my cheeks.

“Edna,” cried the Master, “behold your friend! It is possible for fathers and mothers to weep when their children are in trouble, but it is rare that they weep merely for love of their children, as Juliet has wept for love of you.”

Oh, Heavenly Artist! For one brief moment he had created in me the Love of God; He had given me a foretaste of that Love — other-dimensional, superhuman — which with my whole soul I pray I may attain some day. For without this universal love how can we hope to work for the Kingdom of God, the oneness of man on earth?

And, in that mysterious moment, I understood that the universal love is not “impersonal”. I loved not only Edna’s soul, but all of her. I could have died for her.

9 July 1909

Dinner, 9 p.m.

Our Lord: “Tonight Mr Sprague[45] is going to speak to you, because he has been to Persia and has spent a year in Tīhrán. Hence he shall speak.”

Mr Sprague: “It is impossible to speak when our Lord is here.”

On being further pressed by our Lord, he referred to a meeting where a Jew, a Christian, and a Muslim were present and, remaining for the night, shared the same bed.

Our Lord: "Consider what the power of the Covenant has done! It was an impossibility for a Zoroastrian to unite with a Sid and a mulla with a Jew. And for these to assemble with a Christian was an absolute impossibility. But the power of the Covenant has even so gathered them that they are accounted as one spirit. Although the bodies are numerous, the spirit is one.

"About thirty or forty years ago, in the province of ... , the Muslims assaulted the Jewish colony and began a wholesale slaughter, and only those Jews who, narrowly escaping, could get to the mosque to confess were saved. The rest were subjected to wholesale murder. And those who apparently were converted are in reality, up to the present time, Jews. But many became Bahá'ís.

"Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh ___Kh___án whom you met: his father was martyred, and his brother at the age of twelve gave his life for the Cause."

At the table that night was a boy from India, brought to 'Akká by Sydney Sprague, who was taking the child to his own school in Turkey to educate him. The father of the boy had given his life for Mr Sprague. It happened in this way: Mr Sprague was then in India, teaching the Cause and, in his enthusiasm, he remained till too late in the summer in Calcutta. A plague broke out and the people died by hundreds. Every hospital was crowded, the doctors and nurses were all busy. Even the Bahá'ís had their hands too full. Mr Sprague came down with typhoid fever. One of the Bahá'ís wrote to another in a nearby town, to a shopkeeper named Kay-___Kh___usraw, asking his help. Kay-___Kh___usraw immediately closed his shop and made his will. Then he said goodbye to his family — forever in this mortal life — and went to Calcutta to nurse his American brother, whom he had never seen. Under his tender care, Mr Sprague recovered, but scarcely was he convalescent when the plague overtook Kay-___Kh___usraw and within a day or two he died.

Mr Sprague told me the whole story. He knew that he must pay a visit to Kay-___Kh___usraw's family, but he dreaded facing them, more than anything, he told me, that he had ever had to do. But when he entered their house, they greeted him with outstretched arms. "Do not feel sad," they said. "It was right that Kay-___Kh___usraw should give his life for his brother. Besides, Mr Sprague, you are a great teacher and Kay-___Kh___usraw was a humble shopkeeper. He could never have served the Cause as you can."

A sweet picture of the Master: He had sent for us that afternoon to meet Mr Sprague and the Persian believers and, not being ready, I put on a dress I could slip into easily. As I passed the Master standing in His door: "I am afraid I am not dressed well enough," I said.

He touched my arm, smiling with the utmost sweetness.

"The Persian believers do not look at the dress, My child. They look at the heart."

10 July 1909

Morning

Our Lord has just called me into His room with Munavvar.

"I love you very dearly," He said. "That is the reason I am speaking so freely to you. To others I do not speak so freely. This is just for you.

"Do you know Miss _____? She came here and was full of love and aglow. Then she returned and married and her love for the Blessed Perfection grew cold. Now I want to tell you," (and He put His arms around me and held me close, and never shall I forget those protecting arms!) "I want to tell you not to marry this man until you have made him a believer. Because afterward it would be more difficult. First make him a believer. You can. Then he will be a good husband to you and will make you very happy. And he will be a good believer. I speak to you so freely because I love you so much. To others I say: 'Do as you like.' But to you I am more explicit and I say: Do not do this. You only see the beginning. I see the end. But do your best to make him a believer. You can. He will become one out of his love for you. He loves you now. The first love is very strong. After you were married it might not be so easy. Then he might influence you. I will pray for you and assist you and you will do this. But do not yield. Do not marry him, though it take years to make a believer."

Those strong arms of Love gathered me closer — my refuge, my shelter, my eternal protection. I know that whatever may come in the future I shall feel in the moment of test: those arms, those great tender, tender arms. No one knows what such a clasp is save those who have been in the arms of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"It is because I love you so that I say this," He repeated. "When you return," He continued, "say to him: If you will go yourself to 'Akká, you will see that which is beyond conception. If you go you will find all your conceptions useless in comparison with the Reality. If you go you will be given that for which you would not exchange all the kingdoms of the world."

"Shall I tell him this from Thee?"

"It is wiser not to — yet," with that wonderful witty smile. "If you see some softening you may."

"You know him?" I asked.

"I know everyone in the world."

"You love him?"

"Yes, I love him. As you are my daughter, I want him to be my son."

"Is he not the material martyrs are made of?"

"Make him so!" He smiled. "Am I not a kind Father, Juliet?"

"Thou art too kind. I am crushed beneath Thy love and generosity."

"You had a great test about this and you passed it well. Speak; speak," He said. "Tell Me all you wish to tell Me."

I began to speak of Percy Grant and of his lifework, carried on in the face of strong opposition and at the risk of his worldly career.[46] But I stopped very soon, feeling that words were so futile. My Lord knew all.

When I left Him I kissed the hem of His garment.

10 July 1909

How can such a pen as mine write of superhuman things?

O n the morning of 10 July, our Lord Himself took us to the room where are kept the pictures of the Báb and the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh.

The room is very long and bare. At the further end of it stand three easels and on each easel a picture. We approached those Sacred Pictures from afar. To the left, as we approached, was a miniature of the Báb; to the right a miniature of the Blessed Perfection and, in the centre, a photograph of the Blessed Perfection.

The instant I saw that photograph I fell with my face to the ground, trembling and sobbing. It was as though the Picture were alive and Something had rushed from it and struck me a blow between the eyes. I cannot explain it. The power and the majesty were terrific.

Soon the Master touched me on the shoulder. (I had already risen to my knees and was staring at the photograph.) He drew my attention to the miniature of Bahá'u'lláh. "This is a painting. This will interest you, Juliet."

But my eyes were fastened on the photograph. I could not remove them, except for a brief moment, from that omnipotent Face.

Yet — dare I say it? I love the Face of 'Abdu'l-Bahá more. When I ventured to tell Munavvar this, she answered, "But if you could have seen Bahá'u'lláh! That photograph is not good. If you could have seen His eyes!"

- (Footnote. Brumana. Riyad Effendi has just told me a wonderful thing which explains this feeling of mine. He told it to me in answer to my guilty question: "Why do I love the Face of the Master more than the Face of Bahá'u'lláh?" In a hadith,[47] he said, there is a marvellous prophecy: that in the Latter Days God would reveal Himself as God; would come, announcing, "I am God." Then, when this proved too strong for the hearts of the people, He would change His Manifestation and appear once again in the Form of "The Servant", that all men might draw nearer to Him.)[48] *

---

Once I said to our Lord: "In a dream one night I saw Thy Face. And it was really Thy Face. I know now. And in my dream I thought: This is a Beauty to follow, leaving everything behind. It is a Beauty to die for."

He leaned forward and looked at me with great solemnity. "That was a true vision," He said, "and you will see it again."

10 July 1909

Luncheon

Our Lord: "The Bahá'í news from Persia is very good. I cannot tell it to you — it is not permissible; but it could not be better. The news of the country is bad, but that of the Cause is exceedingly good.[49] This is glad-tidings to be given to you.

"Today you had a visit to the Blessed Báb and the Blessed Perfection."

Mr Kinney: "I shall always see the Face of the Blessed Perfection."

Our Lord: "At the time of prayer one must hold in one's mind some object. Then he must turn his face and direct his mind to this picture. But whatever form is produced in the mind is imagination, that is, one's own conception. There is no connection between it and the Reality. Therefore people worship imagination. They think of an imaginary God. That of which they think is not God. God can never be comprehended. That which man thinks is comprehended by man, but God is comprehensive. All that comes under comprehension is outside God. The Reality of Divinity is holy, lofty, sacred beyond comprehension. All nations worship their images of a god and these imaginary gods are superstitious phantoms. Hence they are worshipers of superstitions.

"Therefore the Objective Point of all is the Manifestation of God. And whosoever directs his attention in prayer to that Focal Point has directed his attention, verily, to God.

"At the time of His Holiness Jesus Christ the Jews forsook Him, and would imagine a phantasmal god and would adore that!" (The Master laughed, continuing to laugh heartily.) "On a certain occasion the famous heroine of this Movement, Qurratu'l-'Ayn, chanced to meet a devout Muslim who was praying and questioned him thus: 'To whom art thou praying, may I ask?' 'I am praying to the very Essence of Mercy and the Reality of Divinity.' And she, smiling, said: 'Oh, away with your god! Away with him! Your god is an imagination! Come, and I will show you the God of today! It is the Báb! Your god is a phantom, while this is a certainty. Can the Sea be contained in a little glass?'"

In reply to a question asked by Alice regarding the personality of the Manifestation: "The Blessed Perfection does not mean His body. This body is now interred in the Holy Tomb. When we say the Blessed Perfection we mean the Reality, and the Reality of the Blessed Perfection is living and everlasting.

"Just as in the time of Christ: the disciples were agitated when they saw the body of Jesus crucified. Then Mary Magdalene came to them and said: 'Why are you agitated?' 'Because,' they replied, 'Jesus has been crucified.' 'Oh,' she said, 'that was the body of Jesus, but the Reality of Jesus is living and eternal. It is not subject to corruption.' And now so it is with the Blessed Perfection.

"When I pray I turn My thoughts and My face to the Blessed Perfection."

10 July 1909

Afternoon

He sent for Alice and me to come to His room to have tea.

First He gave us a beautiful talk about devotion and love toward each other. "If you show this love toward one another," He said, "it is just as though you showed it toward Me." He spoke of the time of Christ, how no one paid any attention to Him while He was on earth; how He was even spit upon in the streets, yet now His disciples, and also the women who followed Him, are greatly glorified.

"In the time to come," He said, "queens will wish they had been the maid of Juliet."

Then He sent Alice away to dress for a visit to the Riḍván,[50] where, a little later, we were all going — but detained Munavvar and me.

“Remember, Juliet,” He said, “one hair of Mason Remey’s head, or any other believer’s, is worth all the unbelievers in the world.”

“Dear Lord,” I replied, “I am ready at this moment to do what You spoke of the other night.”

“No, it is not for that I say so; you have passed that. But I want you to remember that it is a fact. If all the kings and queens of the world were to come and stand outside My window and offer Me everything in exchange for you, I would say: ‘I should rather keep Juliet.’ You must be like that. A believer at first is like a lamp, then like a star, then like the moon. And in the Kingdom of God like the sun. An unbeliever is first like a lamp; then he becomes extinct! And that is the difference between them! But you will make the man you love a believer.

“Only,” He added, “wait till you do.”

He went out of the room. Munavvar and I remained, sitting on His bed, talking. Almost at once He returned to us.

“You must read Miss Barney’s book[51] and Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl’s[52] a great deal, Juliet. I want you to progress spiritually and to be a real daughter of the Kingdom. I want you to be entirely severed from the world.”

Later, after our heavenly evening in the Riḍván, He came to the door of my room, while I was talking with Munavvar ___Kh___ánum. She told Him what I had been saying, that I longed to stay forever and ever, but knew that, even if I could, it would be selfish; but I felt like a crying baby when I thought of going away.

“If you should stay forever,” He laughed, “what would you do with the one you left behind?”

“I forget many things in the Light of Thy Face! I am inconstant to the world here!”

“Yes, if you should remain, you would forget many things.”

On the morning of 10 July, a blessed experience which I had forgotten to record. Our Lord called Carrie, Alice, and me separately to His room and gave us the priceless privilege of seeing Him dictate Tablets.

I sat on the divan, my eyes upon His white-robed figure — I could scarcely raise them to His Face — as He paced up and down that small room with His strong tread. Never had the room seemed so small; never had He appeared so mighty! A lion in a cage? Ah no! That room contain Him? Why? As I felt that great dominant Force, that Energy of God, I knew that the earth itself could not contain Him. Nor yet the universe. No! While the body, charged with a Power I have seen in no human being, restless with the Force that so animated it, strode up and down, up and down in that tiny room, pausing sometimes before the window, below which the sea beat against the double seawall, I knew that the Spirit was free as the Essence itself, brooding over regions far distant, looking deep into hearts at the uttermost ends of the earth, consoling their secret sorrows, answering the whispers of far-off minds.

Often in that walk back and forth He would give me a long, grave glance. Once He smiled at me.

At last He called Alice and Carrie back and, taking a seat Himself on the divan while we gathered around Him on the floor — I in my place on His left, at His feet — He said: “Letters shower as rain on me. I write the answers and they are not finished!

“Many come that are difficult to read. Here is one that cannot be read at all. The man could not write. But he wished to supplicate to His Master, so he simply made marks.”

Alice interrupted with: "May I pray to You?"

Our Lord: "To pray is to supplicate to God."

Dear Carrie had just had a cruel experience with her father, which, however, she had not mentioned to the Master. Taking a supplication in His hand, He began to dictate, saying: "This is the answer to the letter of a person whose father drove him out because he was a Bahá'í. But God granted him a high position. His work has become very good. His father does not even speak to him, while the son is very kind to the father.

"This," the Master said to Carrie, "is for you too:

"O thou who art firm in the Covenant!

"Though thy father was not kind to thee, praise be to God thou hast a Heavenly Father. If the earthly father forsook you, it was the cause of your obtaining the mercy and kindness of the Spiritual Father. All that father can do is to be kind to you, but this Father confers upon you eternal life. That father will become angry for the slightest disobedience, but this Father forgives the sins, overlooks the faults and deals with Bounty and Favour. Thank thou God thou hast such a Heavenly Father. And I hope thou mayest attain, through the Divine Mercy, to the greatest Bounty.

"I remember thee; do not be sorrowful. And I am in communion with thee in every world; grieve not.

"I hope thou mayest become, through the Favour and Bounty of the Blessed Perfection, the means of guiding others, and in the community of the world light a candle whose effulgence shall be everlasting."

We all held our breath, for Carrie's father had driven her out because she was a Bahá'í. Carrie's father would "not even speak to her".

Dinner

"It is very good to be able to meet Mr Sprague here, directly from Persia. He has been in Persia one year. He knows about the believers very well there. And he enjoyed it very much, because the believers there are very beautiful. They are in the utmost condition of sincerity. "Last night I did not eat at all. I only took a little bread and cheese. Therefore I could not sleep. So I passed the hours in prayer and communion, walking back and forth."

11 July 1909

Munavvar, Carrie, and I were sitting in the Holy Mother's room. My thoughts had strayed to the Master's promise for Percy Grant. Suddenly the door opened, and His luminous Face appeared in the sunlight against the white wall. He turned upon me His eyes, overflowing with infinite sweetness, overflowing with the Holy Love of God. He kept His eyes fixed on me until I could bear no longer that Divine Love, and, to my shame, I glanced away. But I pray now that always, when my thoughts stray to earthly things, His Face will come to me — like this.

Later He sent for me. I sat close at His feet. Folding my hands in His, looking down with that smile of God, He said: "How many days have you been here?"

I knew what was coming!

“How many days have you been here? Nine is the utmost. How many days have you stayed?”

“Twelve, my Lord.”

“Three more than the utmost!” Then He told me we must go tomorrow.

Struggling to keep back my tears, I said: “I shall never leave Thee!”

“No. I shall always be with you in spirit and in heart. You will always be present with Me. I want you to be happy.”

“I can never be unhappy again.”

“Those who come to ‘Akká in the spirit never can be unhappy again.”

“All I want is to serve Thee. Nothing could make me unhappy but to fail.”

“You must never forget what you have heard here. You must never forget My words to you.”

“Do you think I could, my Lord?”

“No, I know very well that you could not.” (The divinity of His Face was almost more than my eyes could bear.) “I want you to live more and more for the Spirit. I want you to forget everything save God. Make your meetings as beautiful as you can. They are beautiful; they are warm, for you have love; but they must progress in spirit. Read the Tablets first. Read the recent Tablets and the news of ‘Akká. Then speak, yourself, for the strangers who may be there. I want you to give strong, logical proofs. Read Miss Barney’s book. It will help you. Others also can speak.”

11 July 1909

A strange thing had happened that morning. Alice has always insisted on calling our Lord “Jesus Christ”, and gives the Message in this way, which is very bad for the Cause.[53] Some of the Persian believers had heard of this.

How it happened that they gathered in the Kinneys’ room I don’t know. All I know is that suddenly Carrie ran into our room, saying: “Come, girls, hurry, something important is going on.”

We followed her into her room, to see Mírzá Munír and his brother Amin and ‘Ináyatu’lláh, a young Persian whose name I don’t know, and Mr Kinney all sitting around looking very grave. As I took a seat, Mr Kinney whispered to me: “We want to thresh this thing out — about the Master’s Station. These Persian brothers may convince Alice when we cannot.”

“I don’t believe,” I whispered back, “that the Master would want us to do that. He will straighten it out Himself.”

Scarcely had I spoken the words when our Lord sent for Alice. As far as I know He said nothing to her on the subject.

At luncheon He gave this surpassingly wonderful talk. His Power, as He spoke, I shall never forget. It flashed from Him. His translator could hardly keep up with Him. In the midst of His talk, He rose and paced the small room from door to barred window with that caged-lion motion, sometimes pausing at the window with its clear outlook of sea — ah, and its outlook to Him of Heaven and the hosts of Heaven! — then turning, resuming the strong, rapid stride, letting flow again the torrent of His utterance.

He wore a black 'aba that day with His flowing white robes and white turban. The picture is vivid to me still and will ever be: the strong, black-and-white-clad Figure, the luminous, ivory-coloured Face against the white wall.

"In the days of the former Manifestations of God no addresses were given for the kings and no clear warnings were given. If you read the whole of the Gospel you will be unable to find a single warning to a crowned head. No prophetic statements were made. No prophecies of the future were given except in a general way, as, for example, the prophecies you will find in Isaiah concerning the destruction of Babylon and the abomination of desolation in Jerusalem. However, there is not one of the kind addressed to an individual. But the Blessed Perfection addressed all the kings. When 'Abdu'l-'Azíz, the former sultan of Turkey, was at the climax of his sovereignty, He, Bahá'u'lláh, arraigned him severely and clearly foretold the upheaval of his kingdom on account of the oppression he had committed. So this was an address to a distinguished and well-known man. It is not an address to the general nation.

"Today the greatest nations of the world are Great Britain and America. It is easy for a man to prophesy that the British Empire may some day undergo a reverse change, that is to say, become disturbed, revolutionized, and utterly destroyed. This is also applicable to France, to Germany, to America — to any of the nations of the world. For every nation has its day of degradation. Consider how greatly developed was the Roman Empire and what became its final condition. Likewise Greece, how she rose and finally also was degraded.

"The purpose is this: there is no nation exempt from this natural condition. Namely, it shall have its rise and again it shall have its fall. It shall have its climax and again its abyss.

"The purport is this: A man can easily address a nation thus: 'O ye people, verily the day shall come when you shall find yourselves in degradation!' For example, in Isaiah there is a prophetic reference to Tyre, also to Babylon, saying: 'O thou Tyre! O thou Babylon! Boast ye not! The day will come when ye shall find yourselves abased, destroyed, and scattered.' His Holiness, Isaiah, prophesied this inspirationally. But any man can thus prophecy. For instance, a person can easily address Paris and say: 'O thou Paris! Be not proud of thy glory, for verily the day shall come when thou shalt be brought low.'

"These prophecies of Isaiah were fulfilled two thousand years after they were uttered, but the Blessed Perfection addressed the very person of 'Abdu'l-'Azíz when he was in the utmost power. He likewise addressed Napoleon III in person. He said, 'I addressed thee and thou didst not accept. The Lord Almighty will take away thy sovereignty from thee.' And exactly as it was prophesied it happened.

"When the Blessed Perfection was a prisoner of 'Abdu'l-'Azíz, when He was in the dungeon of his majesty, He prophesied his downfall and arraigned him severely.

"The revolution now rampant in Persia was foretold by the Blessed Perfection forty years ago. Read the Book of the Kings. It is also to be found in the Book of Laws. And this prophecy was made when Tīhrán was in the utmost quietude and the government of Náṣiri'd-Dín __Sh__áh was well established. It is clearly stated thus: 'O Tīhrán! There will be a great upheaval in thee. The government will be affected and the disturbance will affect all Persia.' This was prophesied forty years ago. It was printed thirty years ago and is to be found in the Book of Kings, the Suriy-i-Haykal and the Kitáb-i-Aqdas.[54]

"This prophecy, so clearly and evidently stated, printed and published, is well-known among the people. Therefore, when the Constitution was granted in Persia, the mullas who took the Royalist side proclaimed from the pulpit that 'whosoever accepted the Constitution had necessarily accepted the Bahá'í Religion, because the Head of this Religion, His Holiness

Bahá'u'lláh, had prophesied this in His Book, and the Bahá'ís are agitators and promoters of Constitutionalism. They have brought about the Constitution in order to fulfil the prophecy made by their Chief. Therefore, beware, beware lest ye accept it!

“But whatever I write is inspired by the Blessed Perfection, is the confirmation of the Blessed Perfection. Mr Sprague was in Tīhrán and knows; is informed. I have prophesied all these occurrences clearly, without need of interpretation, not in one letter or two, but in numerous letters. When the divines overcame the __Sh__áh, the __Sh__áh commanded the Prime Minister to go to Qum (?) and bring the mullas to Tīhrán. When the divines, with the Prime Minister, arrived in Tīhrán, the people showed them the highest respect and for three nights illuminated the whole city of Tīhrán as a welcome to them. They held the reins of the parliament in their hands. They began to disagree with the __Sh__áh. A member of the parliament threw a bomb at him. The __Sh__áh was brought so low and made so powerless that he was incapable of governing the assembly. However, he summoned the agitators from among the divines. The 'Ulama refused to deliver the perpetrators of the act and said that they did not recognize the __Sh__áh.

“At that time I wrote letters to nearly all the cities of Persia, to Tīhrán, to Ra__sh__t, Tabriz, Qazvín, __Kh__urasán, and many other cities. I clearly prophesied this condition. You may see the letters. Mr Sprague knows about them. He has seen them.

“The Muslim clergy had held the forces at work so completely that the Bahá'ís everywhere were extremely alarmed because of the apparent clerical supremacy. Notably the Bahá'í teachers of Tīhrán, especially Mullá 'Alí-Akbar, sent me a letter which I have now, in which is this statement: 'When the clergy of Persia were dispossessed of any power or political influence they persecuted us unmercifully. Now that they have attained this apparent supremacy what will they do to us? How great will be our persecutions and ordeals!' In response I wrote: 'Know ye of a certainty that this seeming influence and power will vanish.' It was clearly stated in the most perspicuous terms, and Mr Sprague can testify to the validity of this. 'The result of this influence is the greatest degradation and loss. This supremacy will prove the greatest defeat.' In that very letter I played on these words 'stable' and 'ultimate,' which in Persian are the same, with the slight difference of a dot. 'They have held to this stable (stability?) but they have not seen the ultimate of things. They will become so defeated and conquered that their sighs, moans, and lamentations will reach the very heavens.

This is a summary. You may find it in detail in My letters. Even so it was that suddenly the page turned. Their foundation was razed.

“But I did not write this of Myself. Nay, the confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh wrote this! Of Myself I did not write it.

“Therefore the beloved of God must refer to Me only as 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This is My glorious crown! This is My eternal sovereignty! This is My everlasting life! Whosoever questions Me concerning My Name, My answer is: 'ABDU'L-BAHA!

“And thus it ends!”

I was struck dumb at this climax, the miracle of it, the glory and power of it. Forevermore shall I love the Name, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. As He spoke it, it sounded so triumphant. Verily, it is our battle cry!

When our Lord had gone from the room — like lightning — Mr Sprague spoke. He said that when the Tablets came from 'Abdu'l-Bahá it was a great test to some of the believers. They did not see how these Tablets could be fulfilled literally, because the __Sh__áh was so low that everyone laughed when he was mentioned. No one had any respect for him. And the mullas were so powerful and the Constitution so well established it seemed against all reason and absolutely impossible that the situation should be reversed.

11 July 1909

Our Lord sent Tuba ___Kh___ánium for me and together we entered the beloved room. Often as I paused outside to take off my shoes, He would call: "Come, come, Juliet."

Tuba and I sat on the floor at His feet.

"You are going tomorrow?"

Struggling with my tears, conquering them, smiling at Him: "Yes, my Lord."

"This is your last day?"

"Yes, my Lord."

As I threw back my head to look up at His wondrous Face, my veil slipped off.

"I will fix it for you Myself," He said tenderly. "I will fix it nicely My daughter." And with His electrifying fingers He arranged it all around my face, crossed it at the throat and spread it on my shoulders.

My mind flashed back to a dream — I had it in Paris eight years ago. In this dream I stood in the air with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, opposite Him in the air. His eyes were plunging LOVE through my eyes into my heart, the unimaginable Love of God, a new Revelation to my heart. Then He drew from the breast of His robe a white veil, laying it upon my head, arranging it around my face, crossing it on my shoulders with fingers that charged me with his life — just as He was doing now.

Now, sitting in His room in 'Akká, sitting on the floor at His feet, raising my eyes to that incomparable Face, so beautiful in age, I saw behind its lines the exact structure of the young Face — the never-to-be-forgotten Face of my dream, when I had met Him in the air.

"My Lord," I cried. "Once in a dream you put a white veil on my head."

"That I did long ago," He answered.

After a pause He said, so gently: "Tomorrow it will be goodbye."

"Yes, my Lord."

"When can you come again?" Ah, what a sudden sunbeam!

"My Lord, how can I tell? Thou knowest. And I should like to say this: though dear Laura Barney was Thine instrument, it was through Thee that the doors were opened for me to come home to Thee. So, when Thou wishest me to come again, I know that again Thou wilt open the doors for me."

Then happened something of which I must not speak, only — He opened the doors.[55]

"Come in the spring," He said. My King! "What do you want to ask? Speak."

“Only for the strength to serve Thee. I have realized the meaning of this prayer: ‘Except Thy concealing veil cover us and Thy Preservation and Protection favour us, this weak soul has not enough power to employ herself in Thy service and this indigent one not enough wealth to present a rich appearance.’”

“I am glad you see this now.”

“I pray that I may give my life — that I may suffer — and sacrifice everything in Thy Path.”

“You are suffering now.”

“But I pray to sacrifice all in Thy Path.”

“You may.”

“I would sacrifice everything for unity in New York.”

“You will bring about unity in New York.”

“Oh, how can I thank Thee, my Lord! I can do nothing for Thee without Thee!”

Then I begged that I might see His Face in vision.

“You may.”

Once during this interview, as twice before, He had looked for a long, long time deep into my eyes, His face inscrutable.

He had said that I was suffering. I knew it. Never had I been so conscious that my body was a dark prison. My soul yearned toward Him and beat against bars. There He sat, overflowing with Divine Love, tender past all comprehension — past expressing in human language — the Centre, the Focus of that Love which holds all worlds in its mighty grasp. And I, an atom at His feet, the worthless recipient of such Love, not only was utterly impotent to return it (the word “return” is sacrilege!), but could not even realize That for which my poor heart was breaking with gratitude. Oh to be grateful enough! my soul cried.

To be blind in the Presence of the Sun; that is not what I mean. To be a blind beggar, loving my so munificent King to Whom I owed life, love, all — to whom I owed even this burning love for Him — that is nearer. No where could I find a gift for Him, for Whom my heart longed to expand its very lifeblood — nowhere could I find a gift for Him that He had not first given me!

“Think of Me often,” He said. “Think often of what I have said to you. Appreciate these moments. Think! If you were living in the time of Christ, if you were Mary Magdalene at His feet.”

Covered with shame, I made an effort to realize this. All I seemed able to realize was a consuming love for that wondrous Face. What it was my poor mind could not grasp.

“Some day I shall realize?”

“Yes.”

“My Lord, I no longer look forward to life, but to service for a few years and to meeting my Lord in His Eternal Kingdom.”

“This is as it should be. We will be together forever in the Spiritual World. But My Spirit will be with you here always — My daughter.”

Lifting the hem of His garment, I pressed a long kiss upon it.

11 July 1909, 9:30 p.m.

That night our Lord gave a feast for the Persian and the American believers. It was held in the rear wing of this great old house, in a beautiful long hall with many arched windows and many palms.

Seventy Persian believers had come, marching across the stony mountains — a procession of seventy, chanting as they marched. They had come on foot, had walked for three months, because to their reverent spirits there was no other way humble enough to approach the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Among them were Jewish Bahá’ís, Muslim Bahá’ís, Zoroastrian Bahá’ís, all united in the passionate belief that the Promised One of his own Sacred Book had at last appeared on earth.

And when all were seated at the long table, our Lord became our Servant. Passing the platters around the table, course after course, He manifested His Servitude, while the seventy pilgrims from Persia sat with bowed heads, silent in the most profound humility. In that Feast, it seemed to me, I was having a foretaste of the future, when all mankind will be one in devotion to the Greatest Name.

When it was over and all had partaken of the food served by the hand of the Servant of God, the aspect of the Master changed. Now He paced up and down the full length of the table, His tread the tread of a conquering King, His white robe, His white hair, His white turban in the soft candlelight enhancing His ethereally. Ah, like the Christ He was then! In that soft candlelight, His Face was eternally young. Serenity shone on the brow of the Prince of Peace. He was like silver!

“Tonight,” He began, “is a beautiful night because, al-hamdul’illah (Praise be to God!), the believers of America and Persia are joined here at one table. This is one of the great fruits of the Word of God.

“In the future the East and the West shall become one. They shall be united. I have said in My letters that the East and the West will become as two lovers. That each is beloved of the other. That the East and the West will take one another in their arms will give one another their hands, each as the beloved of the other, each embracing the other.

“The unity of mankind will be the beginning of the radiation of this Light. Our gathering tonight around such a table is one of the evidences of the human unity. Generally speaking, such a gathering would have been impossible, that is, that Persian and Americans should sit around the same table. Praise be to God, such things have taken place through the power of the Word of God.

“Verily, since the early days of childhood I have devoted Myself to the Word of the Beauty of Bahá’u’lláh, and have forborne every difficulty and calamity, among these imprisonment for all My life, to lay the foundation of the oneness of mankind.

“All the different sects of the world hate and antagonize one another. Were it possible, they would kill one another. Each of these sects pretends that it is established and is acting according to the law of God. Exactly the opposite is the fact. All the Divine Words lead the people to unity, because they were spoken for life, not for death! And the Divine Teaching is a Power that attracts the hearts, through which all the different sects and nations will be attracted.

“You find that the different sects are in hatred toward one another. But you should be lovers of all sects and nations and all the different parties of people. You should love them and consider them as of your own families. Do not look upon them as separated from you. Bahá'u'lláh has said that all of you are as branches of one tree, leaves of one branch. That is, all the people are of one tree. Therefore, all things that cause opposition should be removed. Consider everyone, of every nation or sect, as one of your own family. Deal with them with love and harmony. Never be the cause of any sorrow to anyone, neither the cause of any embarrassment. Bear all sorrow, for yourselves and to please all hearts, even the hearts of your enemies. Be true to all the different parties or nations and act toward them with faithfulness. Take care of the properties of others more than you do of your own, and never do any harm to those who show animosity. If you do thus, you are a true Bahá'í. Be submissive and try to control self. Follow the ordinances of God — do not follow your own desire — that ye may be ready always to be helped by God.

“Be sure that the different nations will curse you, blame you, bear animosity toward you and harm you.

They will even act in such a way as to shed your blood. Beware not to cause any sorrow to them, not even to injure the feelings of anyone with a word. Do nothing to cause any sorrow within any heart. These are the qualities of the Bahá'í people.”

He left the room. Our Sun set. Oh, how intensely, intensely I love Him! I can scarcely see for my tears at the memory of that silver, shining Figure! May my life be His sacrifice!

After His Words I cannot write the words of others! Dear Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí, “the Angel”, spoke.[56] Then one of the Persian pilgrims recited a stirring chant which he and his companions had sung as they journeyed from Persia to ‘Akká, the refrain of which ran thus:

Praise be to thee, powerful

Hand of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

May my life be a sacrifice to the mighty

Hand of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

Munavvar and I went to the housetop alone that night and, so tired were we, we slept under the stars till our Lord came and woke us.

To me He said: “Your heart is Mine. Your eyes are Mine. Your brow is Mine. Your lips are Mine, for speech. Today you are My new creation. Say: Thank God.”

“Thank God.”

“Say: Thank You.”

“Thank You — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”

“Ah ... ‘Abdu’l-Bahá,” He repeated.

He put a ruby ring on my finger.

12 July 1909

She anguish of parting. Blind with tears, I kissed His door. No one saw me. Blind with tears, I descended the dear stairway, my ladder to God, the irregular steps of it worn by His feet. Each step in the beloved court, as I crossed it for the last time, was unspeakably precious to me.

In the passage leading from that Heavenly Shelter to the outer world, I met Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí.

“I shall await your call from America,” he said.

My voiced was choked. I could scarcely answer. To dear Ḥusayn Rúḥí I could only nod.

My Lord was in His garden, but He left it, came forward, and hurriedly passing our carriage as He turned toward the house, said “Goodbye” — smiling in the sunlight. The pure profile, the grandeur of His head, a sweep of His shining robe — and He was gone!

I am glad I have written to the very end in this book. I am glad that no words will follow His, that no figure will pass through these pages after His Sacred Figure has so passed out.

When Mary had anointed the feet of her Lord with the precious ointment she broke the alabaster box.[57]

Notes

Beirut, Syria

7 August 1909

Permission that has just come from my Beloved, from my Lord and King to return to Haifa! This Tablet is in His own hand. We sail tomorrow!

Miss Juliet Thompson. Upon her be Bahá’u’lláh.

HE IS GOD!

“O thou who art attracted by the fragrances of the Love of God! I pray for thee and seek help and assistance from the favours of God. ... Come to Haifa. Go directly to the Household, or to Mírzá ‘Ináyatu’lláh’s house ...

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás

- (Footnote. 24 February 1922, 4:30 a.m. I remember, with intense yearning for those days of life, the afternoon when that Tablet came. In the morning I had said to Mr Kinney: "I couldn't endure it if I should have to return home without seeing our Lord once again." Then, in the late afternoon, the sudden appearance of 'Ináyatu'lláh. The Kinneys had gone to a party at the Manassehs'. I had lingered behind, longing to be alone that I might finish copying in this book notes I had taken in 'Akká. Just as I was writing those final words: "When Mary had anointed her Lord with the precious ointment she broke the alabaster box" — there was a knock at the door and 'Ináyatu'lláh looked in! "Our Lord has sent for you, Juliet," he said. "I have a carriage at the door.") *

13 August 1909

Oh day of days! This morning I gave up my will; I silenced my heart's last murmur. Three days I had waited on the rack to hear from my Lord at 'Akká hoping — not daring to pray for it — yet longing unutterably to be summoned. But no word came. Then, after I had prayed at dawn, I felt a wonderful peace. When all things are left to His Will, I said to myself, the design takes perfect shape. Beauty undreamed of blossoms upon our days. So, at noon, while Farah-Angiz was reading English with me, suddenly ___Kh___ánum Diya ran into the room crying: "Juliet, our Lord!"

I flew to the door and saw, at the door of Madame Jackson's house, where the Family lives in Haifa, the Master's carriage. With the Great Afán, the only companion of the Báb now living, my Lord was entering the House.

I went to my room and put on fresh clothes. Then I came out and sat on the steps, riveting my eyes on the House that enclosed Him. At least in my love I may be like Mary who sat at the feet of the Christ of her day; and the little house of 'Ináyatu'lláh, so associated with our Lord, might be the house in Bethany: flat-roofed, low, white, with its arched doorway and its two cypress trees. So I sat, looking, longing, loving, till He sent for me.

He was sitting in His cool, airy room, in a large chair. How He smiled as I entered and knelt! Taking my place at His feet, I kissed the hem of His garment. When I looked up, once more, into His magical Face, I received a new revelation. Never had it looked so beautiful, beautiful to me! He gazed down at me with the smile of Divinity.

"How are you?"

"So happy. Oh, so happy! How can I ever thank Thee for Thy Love and Protection? May I pour out my life in servitude to Thee!"

"I have come from 'Akká," He said, "especially to see you." He talked smilingly for a while about my unexpected return. "No pilgrim," He said, "has come back after such a few days. But you have."

But again He said: "How long were you in Brumana?"

"Years, my Lord!"

And He answered: "Yes, that is true!"

"I learned much in Brumana, my Lord."

"And when you return to America you will see greater results of your visit. I knew you would not like it in Brumana." He continued, "I knew you would have some trouble there, but you had to go somewhere for the vacation and I knew that Haifa would not be well."

"Did you hear my heart crying to You, my Lord?"

"Yes, I heard. I knew."

It is impossible to imagine the consolation of those words, so often repeated: "I know; I knew." [58]

"When you go back to America, you must hide all that has happened. You must say nothing about it. Never speak of it to anyone."

"No; oh, no!"

He asked about Carrie Kinney, what she was doing in Brumana; and on my saying, "Many good works," 'Ináyatu'lláh explained, told our Lord of our helping Dr Manasseh with the poor and sick. We had nursed till she died a poor girl who had been fatally, horribly burned and had assisted the doctor at a number of operations performed without anaesthetics.

"Bravo! Bravo!" said our Lord.

He then spoke of X, said He had sent for me for my sake. Not that He did not forgive, for He always forgave. Not that He did not feel sorry for her. He would never have spoken of it but for my sake. He always forgave. But He wanted to save me from an ordeal. Then He told me of things she had done in Cairo, by which she had broken her promise to Him, and mentioned the unpaid bill of Nassar in Haifa.

"My Lord," I said, "there is one thing I want to supplicate for. For the sake of the Cause, may I pay that bill?"

At first He refused to let me, but later consented. Then He looked at me with divine sweetness and said in a voice like a breeze from Heaven: "I love you."

"Oh my Lord," I cried, "make me good; make me good!"

Still looking me at with that sweetness, with that smile of magical charm, He answered: "I will make you good."

Then He sent for Rúḥá __Kh__ánum. She came in and sat on the floor beside me.

"Your sister," He said. "Your sister! Do you love her?"

When He called His own daughter my sister, tears sprang to my eyes.

"Do I love you, Rúḥá __Kh__ánum?" I asked.

He spoke much more about X, said when I saw her I must always be kind to her and give her money if I could, but that I must not travel with her or associate with her as a companion. I must only associate with those who would help me to become spiritual, who would help me to sever myself from everything save God.

"I was trying to run before I could walk!" I smiled. "I thought I could help her, when all the time I needed to be helped myself."

He laughed in that wonderful way, humorous beyond human humour, with a wealth of sweetness in it.

“Even Christ cannot help some people,” He said. “How can you expect to?”

But He said He felt very sorry for X. He forgave her and He would pray for her.

“Did she say she was going to America?” He asked. “She cannot go to America! If it were not for you and for Mrs Maxwell, who got her out of America, she would have been arrested. And you might have gotten into trouble there, too, with the government — ah? — if it had not been for the protection of God. God protected you because your purpose was good. I know many things!”

Just at that moment someone came to the door. He told me to remain in the house and that He would send for me later. So I stayed in the great white hall with its slender columns, looking out toward the blue Bay of Haifa, though no longer did I need to look toward ‘Akká, the casket that had lost its Pearl — its Pearl of great price. And at last He sent for me.

I went into His room to find Him on the divan, having tea with His sister, the Greatest Holy Leaf, His half sister, Furugh ___Kh___ánum, and Rúḥá.

The majestic profile, touched with the Divine sweetness, which, as I sat on the floor at His left, I saw against the light of the window, is graven forever on my memory. The sweep of its line; the compassion in the forehead and lift of the brow; the wonderful pure, strong line of the large aquiline nose; the delicacy of the upper lip and mouth — that strong, strangely sweet mouth with the full, but straight lips; the sensitive modelling of cheek and temple; the perfect ear.[59]

Then began a play of humour.

“How much money did Miss X take from you?”

“Not very much, my Lord.”

“How much? I know she took it, but I just wanted you to confess! How much?”

“Too little to mention. And through her I have received a great blessing — the greatest of all my joys — this day with You.”

He laughed. “And now you are going to pay her debts! If you are as wealthy as that, why don’t you pay My debts? That would be something to do!”

We all laughed at this.

“You cannot,” He continued after a moment, “love May Maxwell enough, or Mrs Brittingham.

“Or,” He added, “Mrs Kinney. For I love them, and to associate with them will cause you to advance spiritually.”

15 August 1909

That was a happy visit to Him — may my soul forever be His sacrifice! In the evening again He sent for me.

He was sitting on Rúḥá’s balcony in the starlight. Rúḥá and I sat behind Him in the room on the window seat. As He spoke to us He turned His profile. Once He turned almost fully around and, with a kingly glance, said: “I love you.”

“My Lord!” I said softly. Then in a moment, gaining courage, leaning through the window: “I love You. I love You, my Lord!”

The royal look changed to divine sweetness. He smiled.

With Rúḥá translating, he began to talk to me:

“As Christ said, the Word is like seed. Some seed falls upon barren ground and withers; some upon stony ground. This springs up, but as the soil is not deep, it too soon dies. Some upon ground full of weeds which choke it. These weeds are like the ideas that fill the minds of some men. They hear the Word, but their own ideas choke it. But some seed falls upon good ground and brings forth a hundred-fold.[60] I hope that the seed of My word will bring forth a hundred-fold in you. Now it is just beginning to sprout. This is just the beginning. Now I am blowing the Breath of Life into you. If you adhere to My Words, if you obey My Commands, you will become entirely illumined. Some visit ‘Akká who have no depth, no capacity. They go back and deny, like ...”

“Thou alone knowest the hearts,” I said, for a moment terribly afraid. “Could I ever be like her?”

“No, I did not mean to compare your heart with hers. Your heart and hers could not be compared. In yours is a great love. From the beginning she had no love. This is the balance: the Love of God. By this balance you may know the people: if they love God.” After a silence, “Look at Queen Victoria. She was the greatest woman in the world — and what do you hear of her now? But the maidservants of God are like stars in the horizon. This you cannot see today, but in the future it will become clear. Consider the disciples of Christ.”

Looking up at the stars, far up into the heavens, He added, “The maidservants of God in the other world are like stars. They shine and radiate.

“Queen Victoria was a great woman, but what do you hear of her now, after these few years! But upon your head God has placed an eternal crown. He has bestowed upon you eternal sovereignty. He has given you eternal life!”

“Dear Lord, if I were to sink into oblivion, if I were to be forgotten like Victoria, still I should want to pour out my life as a sacrifice to Thee for love of Thee.”

“It is not the name I meant. It is not for that. I know you do not want to serve for that. I meant the results. Queen Victoria has no results. But see the results of Christ’s disciples!”

“The Kingdom of God,” He continued, “is like a market. Some go home poor at the end of the day, having lost what they had. Others come and gain great wealth. Now you have come to the marketplace ...”

He was interrupted just then and, after the interruption, began another theme: “From what city are you? From what city are We? You are from the West; We are from the East; yet you are Our intimate friend. You are the sister of Rúḥá ___Kh___ánum. I am kinder to you than your own father. You are dearer to me than a daughter. What greater proof do we need of the power of the Word of God, that the East and the West are united in such a way?

“Now if you want to please Me,” He said suddenly, “you must make Mrs B. happy. That is the next thing you have to do! You must do everything you can to please her. You must make her so pleased with you that she will write Me a letter about you! Try as hard to make her happy as you tried with Miss X,” he laughed. “Your friendships must not be for personal reasons, but you must love the people because they are beloved my Me. But it is easier to please God than to please people! I must go now," He said. "Would you like to come and have supper with Me?"

I followed Him to Madame Jackson's house. There He called me into the reception room and motioned to me to sit beside Him.

Then, one by one, with bowed heads, with hands crossed on their breasts, the Persian believers entered. I was the only woman in the room. He invited each one of them to sit near Him, but their reverence would not allow it. I felt mortally ashamed of myself for my own temerity — and yet it had only been obedience — and I had left one chair between! They sat, their hands still crossed on their breasts and with lowered eyes, while our Lord, the majestic Centre of the Covenant, with His matchless simplicity, talked to them — laughing, smiling, evidently seeking to put them at their ease and make them more natural with Him — yet never for a moment losing His sublime majesty.

Ah, such a King the world has never seen! When He walks it is with the step of the Conqueror of the world. He seems treading earth in triumph, the whole earth under His feet. Yes, "the earth is His footstool" — no more![61] The ring of His step I shall never forget. It will ring through my life!

That afternoon I had watched Him ascend Mount Carmel. As I stood in the arched doorway of the little Palestine house between the two cypress trees, watching His carriage start from His house filled with pilgrims, He, a Monarch, in the centre. He looked long and intently at me. Later, while I still stood gazing up the hillside toward the Tomb of the Báb, I saw Him appear at the door of the Tomb, luminous in His white robes with the sunlight full upon Him: like the resurrected Christ!

"How beautiful upon the Mountain are the feet of Him Who bringeth glad-tidings, Who publisheth Peace."[62]

---

But to return to that blessed night when I had supper with our Lord: Once in the midst of His talk with the pilgrims, He turned to me and, smiling, said: "You know Persian?"

Though the others had not raised their eyes, my love (and my ignorance) had given me courage and I had been feasting mine on Him.

"I see!" was my presumptuous answer. Oh, I know I am crude and an infant in such things, or I too would have kept my eyes lowered.

At the table that night He talked to Miss Gamblin, a young Protestant ex-missionary who is acting as governess now to the children of the Holy Household — a poor girl resisting with all her little strength the great sweetness and wisdom and love of the Lord. It was wonderful to hear Him talk with her. There was something eager in His kindness, a beauty of compassion, which she could not see as compassion.

"Miss Gamblin! Which do you like better: Haifa or 'Akká?"

"Haifa, I think. I like Haifa for some things and 'Akká for others."

"For what reasons do you like Haifa more?"

"Because here we are free to go out. Here we have liberty."[63]

"But in 'Akká there is a beautiful Garden."

"I have never seen a garden in 'Akká."

"And here there is no Garden. In 'Akká the Water is very good."

"And here," said Miss Gamblin jeeringly, "there is no water!"

"In 'Akká," our Lord went on, "there is a Meadow. Here there is none." He spoke of the unbelief of the Jews when Christ came. With His consummate wisdom He made her say that they were veiled by the prophecies because they were waiting to see them literally fulfilled.

"Did not Christ say He would come like a thief in the night?" He asked.[64]

"Ah! But He also said 'every eye should see Him!'"[65]

There was quite a note of triumph in her voice!

"Every eye, yes," smiled the Master. "Those who do not see Him are spiritually blind. You love Christ?" (gently).

I had never before seen that cold little face light up.

"Oh, yes."

"So do I," said the Master gravely and with great tenderness. "No one in this world loves Christ so much as I."

"How do you think Christ will come?" He went on. "Have you studied the science of the skies? You know what clouds are composed of? How do you think Christ will come?"

"Oh, I don't think that Christ will come from a material heaven, but from that place — no one knows what it is — where the imperishable part of us goes."

"Bravo! Bravo!" said our Lord. "I am very much pleased with your answer."

After supper He went to call on the French Consul.

The next day our Lord was to leave us, to return to 'Akká. He had planned to take me with Him, but He changed this. He thought it wiser, Rúḥá explained to me, that I should remain in Haifa till the Kinneys came.

In the morning I rose with a bleeding heart — with a hunger and thirst to see our Lord, to crawl in the dust behind Him all day, kissing His every footprint if I might. Once He passed the house and went up the mountain little way. Ah, "beautiful upon the mountain, His feet"! I crept to the corner of the wall and gazed down the road into which He had turned. That day He was wearing a gold-brown camel's hair coat over His white flowing robe. His coats are the Persian 'aba, sweeping almost to the ground. And no 'aba hangs like the Master's. He was on His way to see a sick boy.

Later He sent for me. I found Him at Rúḥá's house. As He was tired, He said, would I excuse Him if He lay down? And He lay on the linen-covered divan, while Rúḥá and I sat at His feet.

Taking my hand in His, holding it close, pressing it with those vital fingers, He looked at me, smiling divinely. I burst into tears. I could not control them.

“What is it?” He tenderly asked.

“I love You so. I love You so. It kills me to separate from You.”

“I am never separated from you. I am with you always, in every world.”

“I know. But I want to see You. Oh why do You go away today?”

I should have been sent from the room, but instead He answered me with the infinite patience of the Divine Love. “Because I am busy. Because I am busy. I am invited to something this evening. Otherwise I would not go. But I will come to see you again, Insha’llah.”

Again I burst into a flood of tears. “His Love is too great. I cannot bear it,” I said to Rúḥá __Kh__ánum. Quietly He rose and left us, but He told Rúḥá to follow with me.

First, however, she took me into the room of the Holy Mother, who had been ill. But there too I cried. I could not help it, though it distressed me terribly to be so inconsiderate.[66]

“Don’t cry so much. You are not used to it,” said the dear Holy Mother. “If you cry you will become like us, pale.”

“If by crying I could become like you, I would cry till I died!”

Tears came to the Holy Mother’s eyes. “I am weeping,” she said, “at the thought of the great calamities for which I wept once.”

Just then our Lord sent for me. He placed me at His feet and with those exquisite fingers wiped away my tears, looking down with the tenderness of God on me.

“Don’t cry! Don’t cry!” He said in English, in that voice of piercing sweetness, of heart-wringing Love. “If you cry, I cry!”

“Today I lunch with you,” (smiling, trying to comfort me). “Don’t cry! Don’t cry! I love you.”

“Ah, that is it!” I replied. “Your love is too strong for the human heart. My heart breaks under it.”

Still trying to comfort me, He said: “Mariam Haney spoke much of you. She said you were beautiful, but I find you more so.”

Little Maryam, His grandchild, came in. “I give you Maryam!” He smiled.

Oh wealth of Love — as I felt it, again my tears flowed.

“If you cry, I will slap you!” And He did! Then He held out His hand to me.

“Which will you have: slap, or fist?” (In English, laughing). “Which is better?”

“Whichever you give me.”

He took my hand, held it, pressed it. He had risen from His chair and now began walking back and forth. Every moment or so He stopped beside me and with a strange gravity gazed into my upturned face. Never shall I forget the Christ-Face shining above me then, its celestial purity. The sunbeam of His smile had vanished. He was like a vision, like a star! Oh, ever-varying Face, manifesting all God's Beauties!

I lunched with Him, at His side. After lunch once more He called me.

"See how I love you!" He said. "I have sent for you three times today. Three times." He held up three fingers. "Now this is a secret. Go to My sister, __Kh__ánum, and ask her to supplicate that you may come to 'Akká. There is a wisdom in this."

I lifted my eyes to His, speechless, in ecstasy. "I had given it up!" I said at last. "When shall I ask __Kh__ánum?"

"Tomorrow."

Soon __Kh__ánum came in. As she sat on the floor near me, He said: "You love __Kh__ánum?"

To my shame, I began to cry — again!

"See! She cries from love," the Master said. "Of love. From love?" (in His dear English). "You very much love, Juliet. __Kh__ánum too loves you."

Then the others came to have tea with Him. And after this, He left for 'Akká.

When His carriage had gone, I climbed the mountain alone. I climbed very high and sat on a rock facing toward 'Akká, so that I could watch that blessed carriage moving along the crescent beach till it disappeared in the distance. And from my seat on the rock I spoke out loud to my Lord, Who by that time was miles away.

"In all things I submit to Thy Will, my Lord, for Thy Will is the Will of God. Thou art the Lord of Hosts. Thou art the Word of God."

---

The Master denied the supplication of __Kh__ánum. When I heard this I wrote Him a brief line to say that I was content with His Will. I said nothing more, yet when His answer came, written in His own hand, He repeated the very words I had spoken to Him from Mount Carmel — those words of recognition — when His carriage was miles away.

O thou who art attracted to the Kingdom of God!

Thy letter was received. Its contents proved firmness and steadfastness. Thank God that thou hast believed in the Lord of Hosts, were attracted to the Word of God and became the manifestation of Godly Favours. Realize these heavenly gifts and serve the Holy Spirit.

18 August 1909.

It is weary waiting, this waiting to see my Lord.

18 August 1909

Later

Day before yesterday, in the blessed company of __Kh__ánum and the Holy Mother, we climbed Mount Carmel to the Holy Tomb and the Carmelite monastery. We went into the chapel of the monastery. On the altar, surrounded by candles, sat the Madonna, a crudely carved wooden doll, life-size, with a scarlet spot painted on each cheek and draped in jewels and satin. From a rose-window high in the opposite wall — a window that faced 'Akká — rays streamed to a pool of light on the floor. Then, in marched the brown-robed monks and knelt in the pool of light, their backs turned to 'Akká, their bowed heads to the altar. The rays poured on their backs as they prayed to the wooden doll. My thoughts were running on this, condemning the monks, when __Kh__ánum slipped her arm through mine.

"It is good," she whispered, "to be here together in a place built for worship."

Later, in the Cave of Elijah, I saw her standing by the altar there, that wonderful face, second only to the Master's, raised to the crucifix; her eyes lowered once or twice to the image of the Virgin prostrate beneath it. Ah, well could she understand such suffering. My tears flowed as I watched her.

21 August 1909, 6:30 a.m.

The King, with His court, come yesterday to stay in Haifa till we sail, for the Kinneys and Alice also came yesterday.

A king and his court? Faint comparison! What king ever moved with such majesty and glory? What court ever followed with such love and submission?

I am sitting on the steep, rough steps of 'Ináyatu'lláh's house, between the two cypresses, and on the steps of the beautiful House opposite — that white and stately House opposite — sits the King! With Him are Mírzá Asadu'lláh and 'Ináyatu'lláh.

Yesterday He came at sundown. He sent for us all. We found Him in the reception hall, surrounded by those wonderful Persian believers. Yunis __Kh__án, Badi' Effendi, and Mírzá Munír[67] sat by me. He gave us a heavenly talk which I shall have to include in my notes, for in this little book there is just room left for His words of love to myself, those tender and exquisite personal talks of which I would not lose one word.

One of these I had last night. I entered His room and sat at His feet.

"I hope you were not hurt, Juliet," He said, Rúḥá __Kh__ánum translating, "that I did not let you come to 'Akká. You must be happy because I am so unconstrained with you and feel that I can be frank."

"Every command of Yours, since it comes from You, is dear to me."

"That is the sign of true love. I know your heart!"

"I pray that my capacity may be widened so that I may appreciate more and love more."

A wonderful look came into His Face. He bent over mine and wiped my eyes. This is what He always does when I am yearning to love more, when my heart is bleeding because it cannot love enough. Even when my eyes are dry He does this. Is He — when my eyes are dry — wiping future tears away?

“I have been suffering,” I said, “because I can give You nothing.”

“You have given Me your heart.”

“What is this heart to give! It is not pure enough. Dear Lord,” I asked, “would it be good for the Cause if I should marry Mason Remey?”[68]

“It would be very good for the Cause,” the Master answered me, “if you could do it from your heart.”

“I will marry him gladly,” I said — my heart as heavy as lead!

“You ought to want to love him, because he is so beloved by Me.”

“Yes,” I repeated, with a dead voice! “I will marry him gladly.”

“Try to love him little by little. Little by little,” (in English).

Then He dismissed me. As I was leaving, He went to His table and, taking a Persian sweetmeat from a box, put it into my hand.

“I give you sweets,” He said.

He asked me to come back and dine with Him. “But don’t tell Mrs B! Do everything you can,” He said, “to make Mrs B. happy.”

“I will.”

Outside in the road, in the light of the crescent moon shining above Mount Carmel, I ate the sweets from His hand. “All that comes from Thy hand is sweet,” I said aloud. “Lord, help me to love Mason Remey!”

The great figure of Percy Grant, with his strong beauty and magnetism and his distinguished mind, I resolutely put away from me. To give my body to one of His beloved: could I do more than this? I thought. Then I laughed at the thought. After all, what is this body? As He said once: “What does it matter what happens to the body?”

22 August 1909

My heart is breaking. Today I must leave Him. The Kinneys have had some trouble with their money — their cheque from New York has been delayed — and having too little to travel with, they asked permission last night to stay on in Haifa till the cheque came.

At sea (after leaving Cairo for Naples, via Alexandria)

27 August 1909

Just at that moment our Lord sent for me.

My heart is almost too full this morning to write. If I write brokenly, it will be but a truer expression of my heart — my life — as I journey away from my only Beloved into a future of suffering, of utter sacrifice, into the Valley of Death. Yet if I suffer, it is for Him. If I sacrifice all, the sacrifice is for Him. If my goal is the Valley of Death, I die but to live in Him. This morning I have felt those delicate, vital fingers wiping the tears from my eyes.

The thought of marriage with Mason Remey has been a torture to me. When, the other day, my Lord spoke once again of my marrying “His son”, with a new note of significance which woke in me a sharp awareness of all that this implied, I writhed in agony. But in a moment I lifted my face to His and said, “Thy Will be done.”

To give my body to be burned would be easier, when I think of the years and the years ... Yet I glory in the martyrdom. I desire no less. “My body is yearning to ascend the cross.” I pray that it may come quickly. “A wound from Thee, Lord, is remedy and poison from Thy hand is honey.” If only I could suppress these tears, or rather, rise above shedding them. On the death of her youngest son, the Mother of our Lord smiled.[69] She knelt at the feet of Bahá’u’lláh and asked: “Is my sacrifice accepted?” Oh, to sacrifice in such a spirit!

I know now why my Lord called Rúhíá my sister. She was married in the same way. But why am I so weak? I am going forth to serve Him. Why should I think of myself? How can I think of myself at all? In the ages to come, if this pitiful record should remain, how my sisters of the Future will wonder that a thought of self should have entered my mind, that I could have wasted one thought on my human body. And since I am doing this thing to be freer to spread the Faith, for them too I am going through with it. I feel a great surge of love in my heart toward them.

Two Tablets I received last winter come back to me now, two that reached me together, in the same envelope. In the one I read first was this: “I hope that the utmost love may be realized between you and that person (Percy Grant) and that thou mayest be assisted to cause him to enter the Kingdom of God.” And in the second: “I have supplicated and entreated at the Threshold of Oneness that thy utmost desire may become realized. The desire of the sanctified souls is always sacrifice in the Path of God ...”

May God strengthen me to face Percy Grant when I return to New York! May God strengthen me in my future relation with him! And as I recall that second Tablet I know that a fierce ordeal is before me. Surely this “utmost desire” of mine, this burning desire of my heart now — “sacrifice in the Path of God” — must be proven. God help me! Perhaps only through such a sacrifice could Percy Grant be brought to the Kingdom. So let me die for my Lord and His beloved ones.

To return to the sweetest story ever told, the story of those incomparable days in the Presence of my Lord. I shall not begin where I left off but will go back a little.

On the morning of 21 August, I had waited long and hungrily, with a burning heart, for my Lord to send for me. Waited in the little doorway between the two cypress trees, my eyes fixed on the white House opposite, on the stately steps, watching for Him to appear upon them — on the long windows of His room. As the hours went by, the fire in my heart grew unendurable. My heart was scorched, seared: consumed. Suddenly, just at that instant when I felt I could bear it no longer, He came out and stood on the steps. He showed Himself only for a moment, but ___Kh___usraw at the same time ran to call me. I eagerly followed. When I reached the House the Master was in His room with Rúhíá and Munavvar ___Kh___ánum.

“Did you hear my heart crying to You, my Lord?”

"Yes. That was why I sent for you. I should like you to be with Me every moment," He said. "I want you with Me all the time. If it were according to wisdom, I would have you here with Me always. But it is not wise. Otherwise, you should be always with Me. I want you to feel this."

He spoke much of Alice and His desire that I make her happy. He told me He wished me to be His real daughter, not a daughter in name but in very reality, so that if "His daughter in America" were mentioned, all would know that I was that daughter. Then: "In regard to Mr Remey," He said, "you need not do this thing. It is not compulsory. No one has the right to force your feeling. I have not the right. But if you can do it from your heart, if you can love him, I wish it very much."

"I wanted to speak about this, my Lord. I have only loved deeply once and I could never give such a love again. But since I have seen Thy Face, I have learned the reality of Love. I have learned that the human love is unnecessary, that it is only a step to the Divine Love, so that I can put it aside. Now, on the other hand, there is this man I have loved, his feeling for me and my hope to make him a believer ..."

"It would be very difficult to make this man a believer and you know this," said the Master. "I am sorry," He added gently, "but I must say these things to you."

"And if I should marry Mr Remey," I asked, "it would mean a great opportunity to serve the Cause? It would be good for the Cause if I should marry him?"

"Most certainly," answered our Lord, "such a union would be productive of great good in the Cause. We will see," He continued, "how he feels about it, and if you and he both wish it, it is My wish. I love Mr Remey very much."

"I have always loved him," I said. "He did so much to bring me into the Cause."

"He has brought many into the Cause."

He kept me to lunch and all through the afternoon, and His daughters and I had tea with Him. After tea, He went up to the Tomb.

For a while I sat in the big white hall, facing the blue Bay of Haifa, talking with the Holy Mother and Rúḥá, Munavvar, and Diya __Kh__ánum. They mentioned Fu'ad, a nephew of the Holy Mother's who is ill, and who lives near the top of the mountain with his beautiful sister, Riḍváníyyih.

"How is he?" I asked. Rúḥá and I had lately visited him.

"I haven't heard for the last few days," said Rúḥá.

"I believe I will go and see," I said.

"Will you go alone to the mountain?"

"Yes, unless you can come too."

She could not, so I went alone. To be alone with Mount Carmel is always a thrilling experience to me. As I approached Fu'ad's house, Riḍváníyyih ran out of the door to meet me, her veil and her braids flying, her face all aglow. "Our Lord is coming, Juliet!" she cried. I looked up and saw Him, His Persian disciples behind Him, coming through a grove of fig trees. How I had prayed to be with Him on Mount Carmel! With Riḍvāniyyih, I went into Fu'ad's room and it was there the Master found me.

"You here, Juliet!" He exclaimed. Then He called me to sit beside Him. Fu'ad knelt at a little distance. Almost at once our Lord rose and crossed over to Fu'ad. He lifted the bandage from his eye, felt his pulse with a tender touch, looked at him long and lovingly. So I saw the Christ healing the sick.

Later He sat for some time on the broad stone terrace in front of the house: Riḍvāniyyih, the Persians, and I grouped around Him. He sat silent, gazing toward the Bay. Then suddenly, up went His hand — high, His eyes rolling strangely upward with such a breathtaking, seeing look, as though He were greeting Someone in the sky!

At last He left us. Riḍvāniyyih and I, our arms around each other, watched Him descending the mountain. Two or three times He turned and waved to us. In the distance, in the sunset light burnishing His long white robes, He appeared like a "pillar of fire".

I soon followed Him. But before going home, I wanted to say goodbye to Núru'lláh Effendi's wife, who, because she has consumption, lives on the mountain alone, in a little house made of branches. But I lost my way and had to stop an Arab to ask if he could direct me. He was a wild-looking creature, in a short tunic and a long head-cloth, and with a sort of satyr's leer. He seized my hand and began to skip with me! I must say, he frightened me. Still I felt a lovely exhilaration as we skipped lightly along, the satyr and I, till he safely deposited me at the little house made of branches. The wife of Núru'lláh was radiant. Our Lord had just visited her, and the fragrance of His Presence lingered in her hut.

Going home in the dark, I met Mírzá Hádí. "The Master," he told me, "has sent me to find you. He says you should not be alone on the mountain."

When I reached 'Ináyatu'lláh's house, the Master had just left it.

"He was here asking for you," said 'Ináyatu'lláh. "He paced up and down the garden, repeating: 'Juliet should not be alone on the mountain.'"

I went flying to Him to let Him know of my safe return, and of something else. One of the Persian believers had told me that if a group of Americans should stay here too long as guests of the Master, it might make trouble for Him with the still-watchful Turks. So the Kinneys' decision to wait in Haifa till their cheque came had worried me very much and I had thought of a plan which I wanted to speak of to our Lord.

But when I entered the reception room I found Mr Kinney there with Him, Mr Kinney kneeling and in tears, our Lord bending over him lovingly.

"I told you to go tomorrow only because you pressed me for a date, but stay. Stay. I want you to be happy" (with the sweetest glance). Then He dismissed Mr Kinney.

When I was alone with the Master and Shoghi Effendi — that beautiful boy — who was also in the room, translating, I spoke of the Kinneys' financial troubles and of some money I had — treasured up — for the most sacred purpose.[70] If my Lord approved, I said, I would lend this to the Kinneys.

“No,” He replied, “they are waiting for a large sum of money, a very large sum: five thousand francs. You have been troubled about this.” He rose and walked up and down, but soon seated Himself. “The Kinneys,” He said, “may be here for a long time yet — for a month or two. Their money may not come very soon. Could you stay so long? Would you have to return to your affairs?”

“Oh no!” I said. “No, I shouldn’t have to return. But I will do as you think best.”

A month or two in Haifa — near His Presence!

“I want you to be happy,” He said, “to do what makes you happy.”

Just at that moment Munavvar came in and our Lord took us into His room. Again and again He questioned me. What did I want to do? Did I want to stay? Would it make me happy to stay? He wanted me to be happy.

“To do Your will makes me happy. I cannot express a wish. I only wish what You wish, my Lord. I want to leave everything now in Your hands.”

“Then I will tell you what I want you to do, and I want you to do this for Me very much. I want you to take Mrs B. home. Take the boat tomorrow night. Go to Cairo and then straight home. Take to the believers what you have received here.”
He gave me many instructions about Alice.

That night He kept me very late. First I had supper with Him. Afterwards Rúḥá, Munavvar, and I sat in His room.

“I wanted to keep you here all night, your last night. I wanted you to be with us. But there is no unoccupied room in the house.”

“I have heard that once a believer stood all night outside Your door. I wish I might have that privilege,” I said.

“It will be the same,” He answered gently. “You will be watching with Me while you are at ‘Ináyatu’lláh’s house.”

I shall never forget that last night. The candle burned dimly in the room. Rúḥá, Munavvar, and I sat on the floor at His feet. At times He was silent. At times He talked tenderly with us.

Though I should have remembered His words that I was “watching with Him”, all night I tossed and turned, tortured by the thought of the marriage before me — tortured because I must leave my Lord so soon, so soon, must leave the protection and comfort of His Presence — the Heaven of His Presence — and go back into the world to face that marriage.

At six-thirty in the morning He sent for me. He met me with a grave face.

“How are you?” He asked. “Did you sleep well? You should have slept well. It is cooler at ‘Ináyatu’lláh’s than here.” Then He waved His hand toward the House. “Find Munavvar __Kh__ánum.”

When I found her, she said: “Our Lord called you just to see you, just to see how you were.”

He left the House then and went to ‘Ináyatu’lláh’s. Pacing up and down my room, as ‘Ináyatu’lláh told me later, He began to speak of me. He asked how to spell my first name and said it was a beautiful name. He spoke very beautifully of me, ‘Ináyatu’lláh said.

“Is she happy and content in this simple room?” He asked.

I see now that in this room He was gathering up my thoughts of the night: registering my misery.

Soon He returned and invited some of us to tea — the Ladies of the Household and Edna and myself. First He spoke to me, then to Edna.

Oh, if only I had written down those last few talks, taken them down from His lips! The sufferings of the days since have blurred them in my mind. I had been thinking, during that last awful night at 'Ináyatu'lláh's, of my wonderful life in New York, a life of such thrilling interest mentally. I had thought how complete the sacrifice would be in having to return, the wife of Mason Remey, to the city I have always hated: Washington. Yet one ray of truth had dawned on me: Percy Grant, so gifted, so powerfully magnetic, so dominant, might, because of my weakness and humanness and the strength of my attachment to him, veil my heart from my Lord. This, Mason Remey, the angel, could never do. So, that last morning in Haifa, the Master answered these two thoughts. Physical things, He said, interfered with spiritual development. Then:

"When you travel you must shake from your shoes the dust of every city through which you pass." [71]

I shall never forget the surpassing sweetness of His smile that morning. He kept me in the House for hours. Later I went with Rúḥá to her house. While we were talking we heard His voice. "Our Lord!" cried Rúḥá. We sprang up to meet Him at the door and He led us to Rúḥá's living room.

Ah, infinitely tender He was that day, that last day! Brokenly I thanked Him for all His Bounties. "And for all Thou hast done to sever me. I want nothing now but Thy Will."

"Yes. I know," He said, bending over me, looking profoundly into my eyes. Grave, ineffably loving, sorrowful, that look. That He suffered for me, with me, was intolerably clear to me.

Oh, I must stop suffering! When our hearts bleed, the Divine Heart bleeds. It is true. I had one more evidence of this a little later.

While I was with Him at Rúḥá's house, the Master had invited me to lunch, and as soon as He left us, I hurried to 'Ináyatu'lláh's to change my dress. But people were in my bedroom, which is also the living room — a believer was calling on __Kh__ánum Diya — and I couldn't suggest to them to go! When at last they did, __Kh__ánum Diya assured me I had time to dress. But then, the devil got into me: I wanted to make myself as beautiful as I could! And everything went wrong; it was like a nightmare! I chose an elaborate white lace dress, fastened in the back with hooks-and-eyes and my fingers couldn't find the right hooks. I tried to put on my veil, a rose-coloured one with a border, in the most becoming way, and couldn't arrange it becomingly enough! And before I was through adorning myself, __Kh__usraw ran in with an appalling message: the Master and the Holy Household were already at the table!

By the time I reached the House and the dining room, the Master had risen from His seat and was washing His hands in a basin near the window. He asked me to please excuse Him for leaving so soon, He had only taken a little soup.

I sat stricken with an awful shame: speechless with shame, as I realized overwhelmingly the disrespect I had shown to our Lord in keeping Him waiting — and all because of my vanity!

He came back to the table and repeated: "Ask Juliet to excuse Me for leaving her so soon. I only took soup today." And while He spoke He looked at me, such grief in His eyes as I could hardly bear, such grief because He had to punish me.

Then He turned and went out of the room, having had nothing to eat. To inflict that so necessary punishment He had sacrificed His midday meal.

The rest of the meal was, of course, pure agony to me. I could not hold up my head in the presence of the Family. Besides, a great geyser of tears kept rising in me and it was all I could do not to burst out crying. At last I escaped and returned to 'Ináyatu'lláh's.

But no sooner had I taken off my miserable finery than the Master again sent for me. I slipped on a simpler dress and rushed back to the beloved House, where Munavvar met me.

"Our Lord," she said, "just wanted to know where you were and wanted you here."

We had our afternoon rest, Munavvar and I, in the reception room. Suddenly the Master stood in the doorway, beckoning us to His room.

There, He led me to the mirror and standing close to my side, took my face in His hand and pressed my cheek against His, then told me to look in the mirror. So majestic He was, He appeared stern and His Face shone with a white glory beside my flushed, earthly face. Again He reminded me of a Star. So I saw myself in the clasp of the Good Shepherd, and, in that ineffable picture in the mirror, I saw my Lord's promise that He would be always protecting me, always watching over me.

Once, during the morning, while I was alone in the reception room, the Master came from His room into the hall and, standing in the shadow against the white wall, like a Spirit in His white garments, He looked at me long and steadfastly.

Suddenly love welled up in me and I smiled. A smile of intensest sweetness, of heavenly brightness, broke over His Face; He tilted His head to one side with tenderest charm, as though He were playing with a child. Once more He came out, gazed gravely at me, gazed almost longer than I could bear — so frail is the human spirit before the Force of Divine Love — and then, like lightning, vanished.

Early in the afternoon He called me into His room. "How are you, Juliet?"

"Happy," I answered, through tears!

He looked at me with questioning, smiling eyes.

Still, underlying my anguish, there was happiness, that my sacrifice had been accepted.

"I love you," He said gently. "I love you very much."

Then He began to talk to me, His aspect abruptly changing to one of great majesty. If only, only I had written down those last instructions! All I can do now is to quote fragments of them.

"How many days were you in 'Akká?"

"Twelve, my Lord."

"How many days have you been in Haifa?"

"Twelve."

“Twelve. Always twelve. You have received in those twelve days that which was given by Abraham to the twelve tribes of Israel. You have received that which was given by Moses. You have received that which was given by Christ to the twelve apostles; that which was given by Muḥammad to the twelve Imáms. ... You have served me in America. Your house has been the centre for the believers. You have loved them and shown kindness to them. Now I want to give you some instructions.

“The time you devote to your art is your own; you are free to use it as you wish. But when you enter the meetings, I want you to concentrate upon spiritual things. Read the prayers, the Tablets, sing hymns, give the proofs. I want you to give strong, logical proofs. ... Never let anyone speak of another unkindly in your presence. Should anyone do so, stop them. Tell them it is against the commands of Bahá’u’lláh; that He has commanded: ‘Love one another.’ Never speak an unkind word, yourself, against anyone. If you see something wrong, let your silence be your only comment. ... Be firm and steadfast. Do not waste your time with light people.”

There was more: much more. How could my memory serve me so cruelly?

Soon afterward Alice and Carrie arrived at the House. As Alice came in, our Lord continued: “Be firm and steadfast, and if you are firm and steadfast, be sure that no one who really belongs in your life will be lost to you.”

He then told Alice that He wished us to love each other. His words were so heavenly that Rúḥá, as she listened, wept.

Just before we drove to the ship Rúḥá called me, alone, to our Lord. I knelt at His feet.

“Don’t let me cry! Don’t let me cry!” I implored, catching hold of His ‘aba.

He took both my hands, and God’s Love gazed through His eyes into mine. “Remember My words to you, obey My commands,” He said, “and you will marvel at the results.”

I dare not attempt to quote Him; everything else He said has escaped me. All I can bring to my mind now is that Face of divine compassion looking down at me, the strong hands that clasped mine, the grief that consumed my heart.

“I have given you so much, Juliet,” (this comes back to me) “because I have desired your spiritual progress. You can make spiritual progress. Now you need the power of discourse. When you begin to speak in the meetings, never think of your own weakness, but turn to Me.”

“My only desire is to follow Thy Will. But there is one thing I long for, Lord. May I become worthy to always keep the vision of Thy Face?”

He bent over me with a look of profoundest love, and of assent.

“My mother and brother, Lord: protect them — under all circumstances.”

Again that low bending over me, that assent. “I will pray.”

“I am bound to Thee, Lord, with a cord that can never be cut.”

And with this I broke down, and hiding my face on His knee, I wept. After a moment He lifted my face and, for the last time, wiped away my tears with His fingers.

When He dismissed me, I raised to my lips the hem of His robe and pressed a long, long kiss upon it.

He followed me to the door of His room. Taking my hand, He held it against His side. “Give My love to Lua,” He said. “Tell her I am always with her in spirit.”

To me He said: “I want you to return a new creation, so that all will see that you are another Juliet, with another attraction.”

---

That night on the boat, my eyes fixed on Mount Carmel — the lights of the Tomb glowing yellow through the moonlight, the fragrance of the Spirit of the Lord diffused from that Sacred Spot — I wept my heart out.

“Forevermore, my Lord, is my heart linked to Thee by this suffering. Forevermore,” I cried, “am I chained to Thee!”

I remembered His words of a few days before: “I suffer. You must suffer with Me.” And my suffering became my treasure of treasures.

Mary broke the alabaster jar and poured all her precious ointment over the feet of her Lord. And last Sunday I broke my heart over the feet of my Lord — poured out all the love it contained at His feet. No more love have I now to give. It is given — to Him.

He told me that He would strike me, and, as He said it, He laughed. So many I “endure the cross, despising the shame.”

Diary of Juliet Thompson: Chapter 3 Chapter 2 Chapter 4

With ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Thonon, Vevey, and Geneva

23 July to 23 November 1911

48 West Tenth Street, New York

8 April 1936

“Love devastates every country where He plants His banner.”

In ‘Akká I had looked upon the Mystery of Love and of incarnate Sacrifice. I returned, this vision filling my eyes, blinding me to all lesser values. This, and the fact that I was so immature both spiritually and in worldly wisdom, caused me to become, myself, the instrument of the devastation. But I devastated not my country alone, but others. When, this winter, I read my diary of 1910, I was crushed with shame, and remained so for weeks, because of my blind, cruel blundering all through that awful year. Then came a flash of what I believe to be perception, and this has comforted me. My Lord, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Who “saw the end” where I saw “only the beginning” (and in Whose compassionate hands are the lives of all) had, in reality, offered me two choices: first, my own will; then, His Will — or what appeared to be His Will. Though I played my small part so miserably, at least I chose the Master’s Will. When in my extremity I still clung desperately to His

Will, He released me from my engagement to Mason Remey. As for “the other man”: as I review the whole drama of my connection with his life, ending in tragedy, it is clear that at every crisis, something diviner than fate stood between us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, had another plan for me. And this, I believe, was His plan from the beginning.

S. S. Lusitania. Atlantic Ocean!

Sunday, 23 July 1911

Nothing could have been further from my thought than that I should begin this volume somewhere off the coast of Ireland! I had expected to begin it in our new home: a small, very old house on Tenth Street, from the windows of which, if I lean out just a little way, I can see the tower of the Church of the Ascension, and even — the rectory!

But there came a Call ...

Ten days ago, on 13 July, I received a letter from Aḥmad.[72] To my infinite surprise, for I had only just heard from the Master, I found it contained a Tablet. These are the words of the Tablet:

O Thou who art attracted by the Breath of the Holy Spirit!

When thou wert leaving to return to America and this made you sad and unhappy and you wept, I promised I would summon you again to My Presence. Now I fulfil that promise. If there is no hindrance and you can travel in perfect joy and fragrance, you have permission to be present. In this trip there is a consummate wisdom and in it praiseworthy results are hidden.

Upon thee be Bahá’u’l-Abhá.

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás

In Aḥmad’s letter was the amazing news that the Master was on His way to London to attend the Universal Races’ Congress which was to open the following week and last for three days.

“If you can sail in a week,” wrote Aḥmad, “you will find our Lord in London.”

I leapt over every “hindrance” (and three of them were high walls) and within the week, with Silvia Gannett, boarded the Lusitania.

Just before I left I broke the news to Percy Grant. He said something blasphemous — violently — then did something to break my heart.

Well, that is no “hindrance,” I thought, I can leave him to her.

He spent the last evening before I sailed with me.

“Don’t you want to send a message to the Master?” I asked.

A mocking look came into his face.

“He sent you one,” I went on, “from ‘Akká, when I was there. But I have never been able to tell you about it, because whenever I have mentioned the Master to you, Percy, you have answered in a flippant way. But I can’t go back to Him now until I have delivered it.

“I spoke of your work to Him and He called you ‘a great soul’. Then He invited you to visit Him. I can repeat His very words. ‘When you return, say to Dr Grant: If you will go yourself to ‘Akká, you will find that which is beyond imagining. If you go, you will find all you had imagined useless in comparison with the Reality. If you go you will receive that for which you would not exchange all the kingdom of the world.’”

“That was a very whole-souled message,” Percy replied. “Tell Him that if He comes to New York I will welcome Him gladly. Tell Him I think He would find New York a big enough field even for His great work!”

“I don’t think that message will do,” I said.

“Tell Him, judging by His fruits,” (with a meaningful look at me) “His Teaching is the most beautiful spiritual force in the world.”

“I shall certainly not tell Him that!”

“Tell Him I am very happy to have a share in those fruits –”

“No; nor that either.”

“I can’t suit you with a message! Well, tell Him I feel that what He is trying to do in the world is very beautiful and potent.”

Then I gave up!

S. S. Lusitania

I should like to write of a dream I had two days before my Tablet came, for I think it is something that should be kept.

I had been praying at dawn. Afterwards, putting the Master’s brown ‘aba over my bed and hoping for a vision, I fell asleep.

I awoke in a vast, dim crypt, with many aisles branching away into utter darkness. I was standing, alone in the crypt, beside an enormous grey sarcophagus. Then in the far, far distance, I saw two figures in white, in long robes and turbans, walking out of the shadows in my direction, and I recognized the Master and Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí, “the Angel of ‘Akká”. Something is going to happen; I shouldn’t be here, I thought. But I can’t escape now. There is nothing to do but hide. And I crouched behind the sarcophagus. The next picture in my dream is of the Master and Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí bending over the sarcophagus. Then they lifted its lid and dropped into it, drawing down the lid after them. Now I could make my escape! I tried to steal away on tiptoe, but before I had taken a dozen steps, my shoes creaked! At this, the Master rose from the centre of the sarcophagus, His face unsmiling — stern.

“You may stay,” He said, “but keep perfectly still.”

Once more I crouched, holding my breath.

First there was an awful silence; then, from within the sarcophagus, I heard the strains of a solemn chant; then groans, followed by blood-freezing screams. And I thought, What can the Master be doing to Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí?

But somebody else was in that sarcophagus. The end of it suddenly burst open and out of it dashed a figure racing up and down so fast that all I could see were flying garments and a shaven, bluish head with a black fez on it. At last, exhausted, he sank to his knees on the ground, shielding his face with one arm. Then he rose and crept back into his coffin.

Then, down every aisle of the crypt came armies on the march, a standard-bearer with a flag leading each regiment, so that soon all the flags of all the nations drooped above the sarcophagus as the armies gathered around it. And then I saw a lovely woman standing among the flags. She wore a long white tunic, her hair was bright gold, and she radiated light.

While I watched this brilliant and formidable scene, wondering how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá could be concerned with a pageant, the figure with the bluish head and the fez again broke open the end of the sarcophagus. But now I saw: Satan himself! Now he was naked, fully exposed, with a white body and great dark bat’s wings springing out from his shoulders — even with the orthodox tail and hoofs! And now he stole from his hiding place and, like a serpent — sinuously — wound his way in and out between all the standard-bearers, creeping under all the flags, wriggling his way among all the armies, all the national groups!

The dream changed. I was in New York, in the Peoples’ Forum. Percy Grant was sitting on the platform in the Parish Hall and his mother, Sylvia Gannett, and I standing among the empty chairs just vacated, I knew, by a large audience. I bent to kiss Mrs Grant. She looked up, her eyes full of tears.

“I have seen Him,” she said, “the Master. He spoke to me. Oh, there was never such a Face in the world!”

“You have seen Him!” I cried. “Where was He?”

“But — a moment ago He was in the sarcophagus.”

Then Percy rose and went out. London

Friday, 4 August 1911

I am still in London, waiting for the Master to come. He did not attend the Universal Races’ Congress. They had asked Him to speak on philosophy and to make no reference to religion, so He sent a representative, Tamaddunu’l-Mulk. (Tamaddunu’l-Mulk is about four feet high and his name means The Civilization of the Country.)

The three days’ conference opened with an ode written by Alice Buckton. Here is one verse: They come! Who come? Listen! What thunderous tread of viewless feet From citted walls where waters meet, From isles of coral foam; From Western prairies red with corn, From sacred temples of the morn, They come!

True British idealism! The last session ended in a brawl. Annie Besant (“Pa, with Ma’s bonnet on her head,” as Mrs Standard called her) took the platform and hurled the monkey wrench.

“This talk is all very well. But what about India?”

Then — the uproar in crescendo till the very last minute!

When I hear that the Master was not to be at the Congress, I cabled to Him for instructions. The answer came: “Wait.”

London

9 August 1911

I have just had another cable from our Lord. It says: “Remain.”

Here in London a little group is humbly preparing for His coming. Devoted hearts are waiting for Him. Every night we all gather at dear Miss Jack’s and pray.

The English believers have been so kind to me: dear Miss Rosenberg, dear Mrs Knightley (who calls me “cousin”, since we have an ancestor — Lord Edward Fitzgerald — in common), Mrs Stannard — the most fascinating woman, whom I met in Beirut two years ago and immediately loved; Lady Blomfield; the Jennens; Miss Faulkner; Miss Buckton; and others. And our own believers who are here: Maud Yandall, the Chicago friends with their warm hearts, my beloved Isabel Fraser, Miss Pomeroy, Rhoda Nichols, Albert Hall and Mountfort Mills. And, of course, little Tamaddunu’l-Mulk.

22 August 1911

THOMPSON, 5 SINCLAIR ROAD, LONDON.

COME HERE. HOTEL PARC.

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá France

23 August 1911

(We are on the way to the Master, Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and I, and though we are sitting up all night long in a second-class coach with a family of four Swiss peasants — oh, we are so happy!

Oh, tomorrow! But I cannot imagine tomorrow. Tomorrow I shall be with Him in Europe, in the mountains of Switzerland.

The “Sun of the West” moves toward the West, and, in this majestic advance, this thrilling moment in time and in eternity, when, in His actual Presence, He rises and shines on the West, He has blessed and honoured this humble child of His by calling her to His side. All day, as [Photograph: A group of Bahá’ís in London (c. 1912).] I travelled through France, I seemed to be hastening toward Him down a path of white radiance.

How strange! It was 13 July, two years ago, when I tore myself, weeping, from my Lord in 'Akká. It was on 22 August, that I said my heartbroken goodbye to Him in Haifa. This year, on 13 July, came His Tablet, "summoning" me again to Him; and this year on 22 August — yesterday — the summons to Switzerland came.

Tamaddunu'l-Mulk is asleep. I shall spend the night in prayer. Wonderful night! More wonderful: the Daybreak! Hotel du Parc, Thonon, on Lake Geneva

27 August 1911

A great white hotel. At its entrance, two oleander trees in bloom. Inside, high ceilings, white walls, glass doors, rose-coloured carpets, rose-coloured damask furniture. Beyond the green terrace with its marble balustrade, Lake Geneva. Behind the hotel, two mountains overhung with clouds. In the halls and strolling through the grounds: gay, artificial, dull-eyed people. Passing among these silently with His indescribable majesty, His strange Power and His holy sweetness, the Master — 'Abdu'l-Bahá — unrecognized but not unfelt. As He passes, the dull eyes follow Him, lit up for a moment with wonder.

I found my beloved Laura and her dear husband, Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney, already here.

(It was Laura who gave me the Message, bringing to me the greatest of gifts in earth and heaven and changing the whole direction of my life. It happened in this way: I had been almost fatally ill and was slowly recovering in Washington when I said one day to my brother, "Coming so close to death makes you think. And I have been thinking lately that it is time for another Messenger of God." The very next day Laura burst in on me, taking me by complete surprise, for I had not heard of her return from Paris. "Yesterday, Juliet," she said, "I was in Bar Harbor. Tomorrow I sail from New York for Palestine. But I couldn't sail without first seeing you to tell you why I am making this pilgrimage. Juliet, the Christ-Spirit is again on earth, and — as before — He is in Palestine."

During my illness, the night of the crisis — months before Laura came to me — I actually saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In the midst of physical anguish and with darkness closing down on me, I had felt a great pulsation of love from the head of my bed and thought that my mother must be sitting there. I turned and, instead, there sat a Figure built up of light, with a dazzling turban and hair like a flow of light to His shoulders, and with His hands cupped on His knees. Jesus is here, I thought peacefully and glided away into sleep. And when I awoke the crisis was passed. Later my mother said to me: "That night of the crisis while I was praying I saw a great Light shining beside your bed.")

On the morning of 24 August, on my way to the door of my Lord, I met the last person on earth I would have looked for, Percy Grant's friend, Dickinson Miller.[73]

"You here!" I gasped. "I always wanted to tell you about this."

"Why didn't you?" he asked.

I left him in a moment, I could not wait, and flew up the long white hall (blessed hall where His voice and footsteps ring!) till I came to an open door. Tamaddunu'l-Mulk had already entered. I paused at the door. Then I saw ... saw once more after these years of unspeakable longing: my Father, my King, and my Beloved.

He was just moving forward in the room, His white robe, His black 'aba sweeping in lines of strange grace, dominated by that head of immortal majesty. In an instant I was at His feet.

I have no words to tell it. Can words paint Glory? The smiling Face that looked down on me then, as though from high heaven? One thing I know: God always smiles — smiles mysteriously.

“Are you happy, Juliet? Happy to be here? How many years since you were ‘Akká?”

“A lifetime!”

He laughed.

“You had a long wait in London? When did you arrive? You were put to trouble to wait?”

“Oh no! Your Presence was with us in London. The friends were very kind to me. And if I was waiting, it was for You, my Lord.”

“Or course the friends were kind. The believers must all serve one another. I want you to be the first handmaiden of God. I am the believers’ first Servant. You know how I serve them.”

I covered my face with my hands, for I realized our littleness and saw Him as the Word of God.

“How is your mother?” (in English) “Your mother? She is good — very good?”

“She is always good.”

“She is pleased with you?” — looking at me archly, knowing quite well she was not!

“Not very, I’m afraid,” I laughed.

“The day will come when she will be pleased with you, when she will be very proud that you have received such bounty and favour from Bahá’u’lláh.”

“Will it come in her lifetime, Lord?”

“Insha’llah!” Then He nodded His head assuringly.

I had been exhausted when I came, after staying up all night long; I had not been able even to wash. But suddenly from His Presence I felt Life flowing, rushing toward me; I felt an electric current revivifying me, and when I went to my room and looked in the mirror — afraid of what I might see in it I found that I had a bright colour and my lips were brilliantly red.

- (Footnote. When we arrived at Geneva in the early morning a train for Thonon was just about to start. Not even to wash could I wait for the next train! There was no time to telephone or send a wire to the Hotel du Parc, so that, naturally, when we reached Thonon, no one was at the station to meet us. Nor was there a conveyance of any kind. Only a wheelbarrow! “All right, Mulk,” I said, “we’ll take the wheelbarrow. We’ll put our luggage on it and walk behind.” “Oh, we couldn’t do that!” said the elegant little Persian. “I can,” I replied. And we did — and arrived at the Hotel du Parc on foot behind the wheelbarrow!) Vevey, Switzerland *

28 August 1911

I am in Vevey with Edith Sanderson. My heavenly Visit is over. Yet I am not separated from Him.

"We will never be separated." He said to me. "I shall be with you always. You will go back to America and I may return to 'Akká, but we will be together.'" Geneva

31 August 1911

I sailed from Vevey today down the Lake of Geneva. There was a heavy mist and the mountains loomed like phantoms through it. The lake, full of swans and white sails, gleamed. The Swiss shore was veiled to a tender green, its chalets and villages blurred like etchings on blotting paper.

From Lausanne I strained my eyes toward Thonon. Then, suddenly the boat turned and made straight for the French shore. My heart leaped. We were going to Thonon: Thonon, my Paradise!

Ah, there were the fishnets spread out in the sun; there the grove of trees at the landing with that brilliant foliage — such a polished green that it looks wet — and in the dark shade under the trees, the lily-bed; there, there His hotel, white against the mountains. I could even see the window of His room!

Eagerly I searched the faces at the landing. Surely little Mulk would be at the landing, to meet me and take me back to my Lord. It must have been for this that the boat had docked at Thonon. Hippolyte, Laura perhaps ... No. There was not one soul I knew.

With unspeakable desolation, with a sense of utter helplessness, I found myself carried away from Thonon. Heaven was behind me then!

The perspective of the mountains changed. The rowboats rocking on metal waves, the funicular railway, the grey old house with its shaggy brown roof which Laura and I had found so interesting — all the familiar landmarks become in those four full days intensely intimate — receded and were blotted out by the mist. The hotel only remained, a "White Spot", seeming to grow with the distance miraculously whiter, flashing its message to me as long as it could; for, though at last the mist dimmed it, it was not till a physical object intervened, not till a ridge of the shore came between, that it vanished from sight.

Then came a frantic desire to communicate with Thonon. This cannot, must not be the last, I thought. I will telephone Hippolyte as soon as I reach Geneva.

In the Hotel de la Paix I went straight to the phone.

"Ah Juliet!" said Hippolyte's dear voice. "Do you know that the Master will be in Geneva tomorrow? He wished me to get into touch with you to tell you that He was coming. And He wishes Edith and her friend, Miss Hopkins, to join you at your hotel and spend tomorrow night with you. He will arrive with the Persians in the evening."

To go back to that blissful day in His Presence, to that first lunch hour.

Mr Miller had been invited to lunch and the Master placed him, with me, at the head of the table, Himself sitting at the corner, I on His right. Our table was half closed in by big white columns. Mr Miller asked some questions, on work in and with the Christian Church, on the validity of mystical experiences, and, at my suggestion (with Percy Grant in my mind) on the economic problem.

The Master was specially vivid and vital that day, yet these words seem so poor, so human. I can think of Him only in terms foreign to earth: "The Dawning-Point of Light," "The Dayspring" ...

From His radiant height of knowledge He gave us great answers, but to put these into my own language would spoil, would desecrate them. More than one phrase I repeated to Professor Miller out of sheer delight in its perfection. He would nod in response with a happy look.

In reply to the question about the church (most important to Mr Miller as he is considering resigning his chair at Columbia to enter the ministry) the Master said religion was one truth which the sectarians had divided; however, the Light can be found everywhere, and it was good to unite with the people, especially in work for humanity and when one's own motive was pure. He dwelt on the purity of the motive. All that tended to unite was good; whatever resulted in division was harmful. I am sorry to repeat only these broken fragments. His answers were so clear, so brilliant, so simple that you wondered at your own question. But the words themselves were elusive. Mortal lips could not frame such phrases, nor mortal ears register them.

As to mystical experiences: most assuredly the saints and mystics had real experiences. The proof of the experience was its fruit. If the result was spiritual we might know the experience was from God.

"Ask a question for me," I said to Professor Miller. "I know what the Master will say, but I want the answer for Dr Grant. He doesn't see the need for the Bahá'í Teaching. He thinks it a sort of 'Quietism'. He says that to bring about social progress we must first work along practical lines."

Mr Miller put the question beautifully. "There are some who feel this way," he ended, "and one man in particular feels it so strongly that he is making it his lifework."

"Such people," replied the Master, "are doing the work of true religion."

Then He went on to explain that a new order must come, but first a solid foundation must be laid for it, and no foundation was solid enough except religion, which was the Love of God. Such a basis as the Love of God, He said, would inevitably result in the rearing of a great Structure of social justice and individual love and justice.

"These are just the answers," said Professor Miller, "that Dr Grant would like."

The Master then told him of the Divine Plan for a House of Justice and of the Ma__sh__riqu'l-A__dh__kár.

After lunch we sat in the reception room: a large white room, all mirrors and glass doors (and rose-coloured furniture), looking out on the lake, the terrace and the stone balustrade.

In the morning, in the Master's room, I had mentioned my acquaintance with Professor Miller.

"I always wanted," I said, "to give him the Message."

"Now I have given him the Message," laughed the Master.

“Now I see why I did not!”

After lunch Mr Miller spoke of his friendship for me.

“Your love must increase from this day,” said the Master. Whereupon the professor, who is very shy, blushed as red as the chair he was sitting on and looked really frightened. “You must become like brother and sister,” our Lord hastily added, with one more lovely phrase on the future of our spiritual relationship. As Professor Miller took his leave, he seemed to be deeply moved.

“I shall never forget this day,” he said.

The Master put His arms around him, then gave him a good strong slap on the back and bade him goodbye most lovingly.

When he had gone, the Master turned to me: “Now there is something for you to do, Juliet! I put him under your charge. There is a chance for you!”

All that day was heavenly. The Master was either in my room with Laura and Hippolyte, or we were in His, in the most charming informality. He gave us no spiritual teaching — in words — only talked gaily or tenderly with us. I had no private interviews: in fact, He took very little notice of me. But in spite of all this I saw something vaster than I had ever seen before; I felt His unearthly power, His divine sweetness even more than when I was with Him in ‘Akká. Once as He stood on the stairway talking with Mírzá Asadu’lláh, the sweetness of His Love brought the tears to my eyes. It is useless to try to express it. But I said to myself as I looked on that celestial radiance: If He never gave me so much as a word, if he never glanced my way, just to see that sweetness shining before me, I would follow Him on my knees, crawling behind Him in the dust forever!

That night (24 August) at dinner, He turned to me smiling and said: “Did you ever expect, Juliet, to be in Thonon with Me in such a gathering?”

“No indeed I did not! May we all be in just such a gathering with You in New York!”

“I have made a pact with the American friends. If they keep the pact I will come.”

“The believers are much better friends than they were.”

“I shall have to know that! Bahá’u’lláh,” the Master continued, “was bound with a chain no longer than the distance from here to that post.” With a sudden terrific agitation He rose and pointed to a column close to the table. “He could scarcely move. Then He was exiled to Ba__gh__dád, to Adrianople, to Constantinople, to ‘Akká — four times! He bore all these hardships that unity might be established among you. But if, among themselves, the believers cannot unite, how can they hope to unite the world? Christ said to His disciples: ‘Ye are the salt of the earth, but if the salt has lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted?’”[74]

“It is not Juliet’s fault,” said Hippolyte.

“No, it is not Juliet’s fault. If every one of the believers was like Juliet there would have been no trouble,” said the Master — mercifully.

“If I had done my whole duty I might have accomplished more toward unity.”

“I hope you will become perfect. Insha’llah, through the help of Bahá’u’lláh, you will be perfect. When you return to America, Juliet, I want you to do your best to bring about unity.”

“I will do my utmost to carry out every suggestion you make to me, my Lord. I will work, not alone for the sake of the believers, but for the sake of others who would follow You if they could see You.”

“Had it not been for these divisions,” said our Lord, “the Cause would have made great progress by now in America.”

---

The next day, 25 August, was intensely interesting. Early in the morning He called me into His room, with Tamaddunu’l-Mulk as interpreter.

“Are you happy, Juliet?”

“So happy and so at rest. This is the happiness of the Kingdom.”

He asked me about the election of the new Board in New York. I told Him what I could and that I had brought a letter explaining.

“Is Mr Hoar on the Board? Mr MacNutt?”

“I don’t know, my Lord. I sailed before the election.”

Then I spoke of how Mr MacNutt had been forced out of everything.[75] If he were not on this new Board, which had been organized by his friends, it was, I felt sure, by his own choice. He thinks of himself as a stumbling block to harmony and now keeps out of the way.

“I proposed this change Myself,”[76] said the Master, “in order that he might serve on the Board.” Then He laughed, with that wonderful gleam of humour in His face. “All these Boards and committees: of what importance are they? The really important thing is to spread the Cause of God. I am not on any committee. Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and Mr Dreyfus,” (for Hippolyte had just come in) “are not on any committee!”

“Speak to Me, Juliet.”

My heart was too full. I could not. After a moment I said: “May I sit on the floor?”

“But you will be tired.”

“Oh, no!”

I sat on the floor at His feet.

“This is like ‘Akká,” I said, looking up at that matchless Face. Then, to surprise Him, in Persian: “Man Shuma ra khayli, khayli dust daram.” (I love You very, very much.)

Taking my hand and pressing it, smiling down at me, He said something in Persian to Mulk.

“What is He saying?” I asked.

“He is praising you very much. He says that your heart is pure. He Himself bears witness to this. He is your witness. He proves your heart to be pure.” (Mulk had already told me of all the slanderous letters about me received by the Master.)

“If He says this it makes no difference what the people say.”

The Master spoke again to Tamaddunu'l-Mulk.

“He says He sent for you out of pure affection. It was nothing but affection. There was no other motive in His sending for you.” Mulk had told the Master how badly I felt about my broken engagement to Mason Remey. “He had promised to send for you again and He thought that while He was in Europe would be a good opportunity, that you could come to Europe more easily than to ‘Akká.”

“Beg Him to so fill me up with His Love that I may express my gratitude for this affection by true service in America.”

“He says that you are already full of love for Him and when you return to America you will serve Him; that your attraction in this Cause and your devotion to it are in themselves service.”

“I feel that I have failed in all I undertook to do when I last left Him. I have had great lessons in my own weakness.”

“The Master says your weakness will be turned into strength.”

“You will be strong — strong,” said the Master directly to me in English, “and when you go back this time you will have a greater power.”

Letters were brought to Him and He talked of various things. Tamaddunu'l-Mulk handed Him a booklet of Warwick Castle, where, at the invitation of the Countess of Warwick, the members of the Races' Congress had spent a day — we with them, of course. The Master laughed, pushed the book away and gave Mulk a slap.

“What do I care about it?” He asked. “If a good believer lived in it, that would be different! Once, when I lived in Ba__gh__dád,” He went on, “I was invited to the house of a poor thorn-picker. In Ba__gh__dád the heat is greater even than in Syria; and it was a very hot day. But I walked twelve miles to the thorn-picker's hut. Then his wife made a little cake out of some meal for Me and burnt it in cooking it, so that it was a black, hard lump. Still that was the best reception I ever attended.”

I had two more private talks with our Lord that morning. In the second, something I said brought forth this answer: “The child does not realize the parents' love, but when it becomes mature it knows.” He said this looking out of the window and His face was very sad.

“Can the creature,” I asked, “ever know the Love of the Creator?”

“Yes. If not in this world, then in the next, as a sleeper awakens.”

It was during my third visit to Him that I spoke of the Holy Household, spoke of each beloved one with tears in my eyes. His own kindled with the warmest love as He answered: “They too love you, Juliet, and always talk of you — especially Munavvar. It is always ‘Juliet, Juliet.’”

“Oh, may I go and see them again?” I asked.

“Assuredly you will go and see them again.”[77]

---

At noon that day we had royalty to lunch! Bahrám Mírzá of Persia. Prince Bahrám's father is Zillu's-Sulṭán, who, as the eldest son of Náṣiri'd-Dín __Sh__áh, would have succeeded to the throne but that his mother was not of royal blood. It was through the orders of Náṣiri'd-Dín __Sh__áh that the Báb was executed and thousands of Bábís massacred, while through Zillu's-Sulṭán's orders those two great Bahá'ís, “The King of the Martyrs” and “The Beloved of the Martyrs”, and at least a hundred others, met horrifying deaths. Now the whole royal family is in exile, Zillu's-Sulṭán and his sons in Geneva, while ‘Abdu'l-Bahá walks free in Thonon — so near!

The day before I arrived, Zillu's-Sulṭán came over to Thonon for a few hours, and straight to the Hotel du Parc.

Hippolyte Dreyfus, when he was in Persia, had met this Prince, had visited him in his tent while he — the prince — was on a hunting trip. And now he met him again on the terrace of the hotel. The Master too was on the terrace, pacing up and down at a little distance. Hippolyte was standing in the doorway when he saw Zillu's-Sulṭán coming up the steps. The prince approached and greeted him, then turned a startled look toward the Master.

“Who is that Persian nobleman?” he asked.

“That,” answered Hippolyte, “is ‘Abdu'l-Bahá.”

And now Zillu's-Sulṭán spoke very humbly.

“Take me to Him,” he begged.

Hippolyte told me all about it: “If you could have seen the brute, Juliet, mumbling out his miserable excuses! But the Master took him in His arms and said: ‘All those things are in the past. Never think of them again.’ Then He invited Zillu's-Sulṭán two sons to spend a day with Him.”

And so it was that Prince Bahrám came to lunch.

A beautiful boy — Prince Bahrám — like a Persian miniature. His skin is as smooth as ivory, his straight features finely chiselled, his eyebrows meet in a thin, black line across His nose. But being so young he is wholly unawakened spiritually, and he hasn't any manners at all! After lunch, assuming the privileges of a royal prince and Muslim, he stalked out of the room ahead of Laura and me — when the Master, in spite of our protests, had insisted on our preceding Him.

However the Master said later: “Bahrám Mírzá bad nist,” (Prince Bahrám is not bad) so I can afford to be tolerant!

After lunch, returning to the white — and rose-coloured room, the Master placed me on His left and the prince on His right and we all had coffee. The coffee was served first to the prince. To my great surprise he rose and offered his cup to me. Too completely disarmed, I immediately “bent over backward”, figuratively speaking.

“Won't you keep it?” I asked.

“No,” he replied solemnly, “it has two lumps of sugar in it. I don't like two lumps of sugar.”

Neither did I!

---

At three o'clock, after bidding prince Bahrám goodbye, we did the most amazing thing: the Master, Laura, Hippolyte, and I went for an automobile ride!

"Did you ever think, Juliet," said the Master, laughing, as we got into the car with Him, "that you and Laura would be riding in an automobile with Me in Europe?"

We drove to a country inn where a little later, after a walk, we were to have our tea. As the Master stepped down from the car, about fifteen peasant children with bunches of violets to sell closed in on Him, formed a half circle around Him, holding up the little purple bunches, raising their eyes to His Face with grave astonishment. They pressed so close that they hid Him below the waist, and the benediction in the look He bent on them I shall never forget. Of course He bought all the violets, drawing from His pocket handfuls of francs. But when He had given to each child bountifully, they held out their hands for more!

"Don't let them impose!" cried Laura.

"Tell them," said the Master very gently, "that they have taken."

He turned and walked into the forest, followed by Laura, Hippolyte, and me. Hippolyte had told Him of "the Devil's Bridge" deeper down in the forest, a place celebrated for its beauty, and the Master wanted to see it. His excitement over beauty is wonderful to watch and perfectly heartrending when you think of His long, long life in prison. He — our Lord — led us to the Devil's Bridge! I can see Him now, just ahead of us, the white robe, the black 'aba, the white turban, the beautiful sway of His walk among the trees.

"What is it," I said to Laura, "that makes that stride of the Master's so unique? Its absolute freedom?"

Laura found she couldn't walk as far as the Devil's Bridge, so I waited in the woods with her, both of us seated on a rock, while Hippolyte followed our Lord.[78] When they returned, the Master sat down on another rock and beckoned me to His side. So close to Him, the fragrance of His Divinity enveloped me and I realized at least something of the moment's sacredness. Just in this way the disciples of nearly two thousand years ago must have sat with their Lord to rest. The sunlight through the trees made their leaves translucent, but even against that green glassiness, the Master's clear profile shone, like a lighted alabaster lamp.

We walked back to the inn through the woods, He leading us. As soon as He reappeared on the lawn of the inn the children again swarmed around Him, their hands still outstretched. Laura sternly ordered them off, for they were certainly imposing. "He would give away everything He has," she whispered to me. But the Master had discovered a tiny newcomer, a child much younger than the others, with a very sensitive face, who was looking wonderingly at Him.

"But," He said, "to this little one I have not given."

We went into the inn (after the Master had given to the "little one") and had tea on the porch, sitting at a rough pine table on a rough bench — two mountains, with evergreens climbing them, towering above us. The inn was in the cleft between. At another table sat a man who could not keep his eyes off the Master and at last ventured to speak to Him, opening the conversation by saying that he had lived in Persia. Our Lord called him over to sit with us — which he almost leaped to do — then invited him to come to Thonon.

Again, when we left the inn, the children swarmed around the Master and again Laura tried to save Him from their greediness.

“But here,” said our Lord, “is a boy to whom I have not given.”

“You gave to them all,” said Laura.

“Call Hippolyte,” ordered the Master. “I did not give to this boy, did I, Hippolyte?”

“I believe you did not.”

Then the Master gave.

In the years to come they will tell stories along the Lake of Geneva of the visit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Thonon. Then those little children, perhaps old men and women by that time, remembering a Face like a great dream at the dawn of their lives, may ask one another: “Was it He?”

Driving home, we came to the most spectacular waterfall, foaming down a black precipice. The Master peremptorily stopped the car and with a sort of excitement got out of it; then walked to the very edge of the precipice. After standing there for some time, His eyes fixed on that long, shining torrent, which seemed to be shaking off diamonds in a fury, He seated Himself on a rock hanging over the deep abyss. I can still see that Figure of quiet Power perilously poised above the precipice, that still, rapt Face delighting in some secret way in the beauty of the waterfall. Tears came to Laura’s eyes and mine.[79]

During the whole drive He was always discovering lovely things and with vivid animation pointing them out to us: the bright green of the fields and hills, the neat villages, a spire rising from a cluster of Swiss houses, or from some lonely spot on a mountain. A tiny village, high among the peaks, caught His eye.

“How can the people there stand the winter? It must,” He said with the tenderest sympathy, “be too severely cold for them.”

It was just after we left the waterfall that the Master turned, smiling, to me. “If I come to America, Juliet, will you invite Me to see such waterfalls?”

“I will invite You to Niagara if You will come to America! But surely, my Lord, Your coming doesn’t depend on my invitation.”

“My invitation to America will be the unity of the believers.”

“Louise Stapfer asked me to give You her love and beg You to come and unite us. Otherwise, she said, we will never be united.”

“No, you must do that yourselves. See in what perfect harmony we are now! You are not complaining of one another. But if I should go to America they would all be complaining of one another and ...” (He laughed and made a lively gesture with His hands) “I would fly away!”

Once, breaking a silence, He said: “There was no one in the world who loved trees and water and the country so much as Bahá’u’lláh.”

So sad was His voice that it was like a sigh and I seemed to feel what He was thinking. He was free at last to travel about the world and see all the beauties of nature, which He too loved, while the Blessed Beauty had lived for long years walled up in that treeless city, 'Akká, and died still a prisoner.

A little later I spoke: "If only, like the disciples of Christ, we could follow You everywhere, all through our lives."

The Master beamed brightly on me. "We are together now. Be happy in the present," He said.

I mentioned my dream about the crypt and asked if I might tell it to Him, but it sounded so awfully queer as I told it that Laura, Hippolyte, and I began to laugh; and the Master's own face twitched a little, I thought. However He said: "You must not laugh at this dream," and asked me to go on telling it.

But just as I came to the end, our car drew up at the gate of a ruined castle and we all got out and walked over to look at it. After this I was sure I would hear no more of my dream, but as soon as we were settled in the car again the Master reopened the subject.

"You must write down that dream, Juliet," He said.

"I have written it, my Lord."

"Ah, Khayli khub!" (Very good!)

Then He said something to Hippolyte, laughing, and with those vivid gestures of His, continued to talk for some time. What He said I couldn't catch — I know such a tiny bit of Persian — but Hippolyte told me afterward, rather reluctantly! that the Master was speaking about dreams. He had laughed at Hippolyte because he did not believe in them and had explained that there were three kinds of dreams: dreams that come from some bodily disorder, symbolic dreams, and those in which future events are clearly foretold. When the soul is in a state of perfect purity it is able, He said, to receive a direct revelation from God. Otherwise, it sees in symbols.

Then He told us the story of a man, a Christian, who had visited Him in 'Akká and expressed his disbelief in dreams.

"But," said the Master, "your own Sacred Writings mention such things."

Still the man remained sceptical. A few months later, however, he reappeared in 'Akká, sought the presence of the Master, and immediately fell at His feet and attempted to kiss His hand, which the Master will never allow.

"In the Name of Bahá'u'lláh, let me kiss Your hand," pleaded the Christian. He then went on to confess that now he did believe in dreams. He had learned, he said, through a sorrowful experience that the Master had spoken the truth to him.

One night when he was away from home he had had an alarming dream of his little daughter. She had come to him, sat on his knee and complained that her head ached. Rapidly she grew worse. They sent for the doctor. The father knew in his dream that she was hopelessly ill and felt the most acute anguish. Then he saw her die.

The following night he returned to his home and his daughter came and sat on his knee. "Father," she said, "my head aches." Then followed her illness, her death.

"As the mind has the power when awake to think constructively or to dissipate its powers uselessly, so, when the body is asleep, it can either construct or dream meaningless dreams."

"When the body is asleep," I asked, remembering a theory, "can the mind construct at will?"

"No, no," said the Master.

As we drove toward Thonon, the sunset flooded the sky with glory. Behind the immortal head of the Master rose amethyst mountains, their summits hidden in rolling fiery clouds. But that Godlike head surpassed both clouds and mountains in grandeur.

Entering the town we passed a stone wall with an enormous sign painted on it — an advertisement for chocolate — the letters so big that the sign was a block long.

With one of His swift changes, the Master, rippling with amusement, pointed to the advertisement.

"What is that?" He asked.

When Hippolyte explained. He burst out laughing.

"Is chocolate so important in Thonon?"

---

While I sat at His feet that evening He sang a song to me, looking down at me with eyes of glory. "Beloved Juliet! My heart! My soul! My Spirit! My heaven! Your heart for Me, your breast for Me! Always for Me, always for Me! Your eyes for me, your mind for Me, Always for Me! Your soul for Me, your spirit for Me, Always for Me, always for Me! Your blood for Me, your blood for Me, Your blood for Me!"

---

What does He mean by my blood for Him? Am I to die for Him? I hope so!

The Master had made a lovely plan for the next day: we were all to go to Vevey with Him to visit Mrs Sanderson and Edith, [80] but — we missed the boat! Although we were terribly disappointed, this was as nothing compared to the nightmare that followed. Annie Boylan[81] arrived from Lausanne about ten o'clock, completely surprising us, as we had no idea that she was in Europe.

She came into the Dreyfuses' room — where Hippolyte, Laura, and I were sitting — in a state of suppressed fury and almost immediately boiled over with the most revolting slander against Mr MacNutt. This, she said, she intended to lay before the Master to prove that Mr MacNutt was unfit to serve the Cause. She had made the trip to Thonon especially for this purpose!

But the Master did not appear, and I thought of His words the day before: "If I should go to America they would all be complaining of one another and I would fly away." He had flown!

Hours passed and still no word from the Master, till lunchtime. Then Mulk brought a message from Him asking us to excuse Him, He was not well enough to lunch with us but would see us later.

It was not until five o'clock that He came to the Dreyfuses' door. He looked very tired and worn. After greeting Annie Boylan lovingly, He took a seat by the window and told her He had a message for the believers in New York which He wished her to convey to them. I wrote His words down as He spoke them.

"In this Cause," He said, "hundreds of families have sacrificed themselves. There have been more than twenty thousand martyrs. The breast of His Highness the Báb was riddled by dozens of bullets; Bahá'u'lláh suffered years and years in prison; and We have had all these difficulties and borne all these trials that the canopy of Oneness might be uplifted in the world of humanity, that Love and Unity might be established amongst mankind, until all countries become as one country, all religions be merged into one religion, all the continents be connected and between all hearts a perfect understanding and love may appear.

"The people of Bahá must be the cause of uniting all the nations. They must dispel inharmony and dispute. So now we must consider deeply how the Bahá'ís must really be, what characteristics they must have and what actions they must perform.

"And if there is not this love and harmony among Bahá'ís how can they cause it to appear among the inhabitants of the earth? How can an ill man nurse others? How could a pauper give wealth to others? So the first thing the Bahá'ís must do is to feel love and unity in their hearts before they can spread it among others.

"Is it possible to conceive that all the troubles, all the trials of Bahá'u'lláh and the martyrs have been without result? Surely you will not have it so! If you would all act entirely in accordance with the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh no discord would ever appear. Then all disagreements will vanish, and be certain that the pavilion of Unity will be hoisted in the world of man.

"Each nation, each people that has understood and felt the Love of God has progressed and developed, but where discord has sprung up in the midst of a nation, that nation has been dispersed.

"I know you would not have all these trials and difficulties produce nothing. Therefore I am waiting and expecting to hear that love and harmony have blossomed in the hearts of all the Bahá'ís in America.

"Now the Bahá'ís must be occupied in spreading the Cause of God and furthering the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh, and not spend their time in disputing with one another. If they do the first, all will be happy; they will be assisted by the Breath of the Holy Spirit and become the beloved of His Heart."

While the Master was speaking Annie Boylan continued to bristle, jarring the whole room as she seethed with her bottled-up "proof", which now of course she dare not "lay before the Master". She couldn't even mention Mr MacNutt! I saw her as an embodiment of the discord in New York, and those terrific vibrations, blasting into the Master's happy holiday (the first one in all His life), nearly killed me. I listened really in torture.

Suddenly the Master turned to me.

"What is the matter, Juliet? Are you not happy?"

I answered in Persian that I was unhappy.

"You must be happy," He said, "that you are going back to New York to serve Me."

When Annie Boylan had gone, the Master came into my room. Tamaddunu'l-Mulk was with me and we placed a chair for Him by the window, from which He could see the dark sweep of the mountains. I said it had torn me to pieces to hear the jangle of discord in His Presence.

"I know," He answered, "and that was the reason I told you to be happy, for you were returning to serve Me. I meant that you were returning to work for unity."

"Oh my Lord," I said, "wasn't it Abraham who prayed to the Lord to save Sodom and Gomorrah for the sake of five righteous men?[82] Now," I laughed, "I am going to be like Abraham and beg You to come to America for the sake of just a few, for some will never understand."

The Master, too, laughed — such humour in His eyes.

"If it were not so long a trip: if it were a little trip, like Paris, or London, or Vienna, I would come for your sake," he said tenderly. "But when I come it must be for a long visit. I am going to Chicago, to Washington, and even to California, and I have not the time this year. But I will come — Inshallah! — when the moment arrives."

He spoke of Mr MacNutt. "The reason I suggested this new election," He said, "was that Mr MacNutt might serve on the Board again. But do not tell anybody this; it would only stir up a quarrel. However, go directly to Mr MacNutt and tell him I said this. He is not on this Board, but next year something must be done so that he may be elected. I have," He concluded, "a very great affection for Mr MacNutt."

Hippolyte told me that night that if the Master felt well enough we would go to Vevey on Sunday and that after he had waked the Master he would wake me at seven o'clock. But it was the Master who woke us all! At six came a rap at my door and I heard His dear voice.

"I want to go!" He said in English. Then I heard Him down the hall calling "Mademoiselle!" at the door of Tamaddunu'l-Mulk: little "Civilization of the Country", who has taken to corsets lately to improve his figure.

Oh, that day; that day!

We drove to the boat all together — nine of us — in a big station wagon, the Master placing me opposite Him. At the landing is a dense grove of trees — I think I have already mentioned it — with polished-looking leaves and very dark shade under them; in the shade a bank of white lilies and close to the lilies a bench. The Master asked Laura and me to sit on the bench with Him. Soon, however, He rose and went off alone and for a while we lost sight of Him. When we saw Him again He was walking on the bench, behind fishnets hung out to dry.

Laura touched my hand. "See where He is, Juliet," she said.

"Yes: on the shore of a lake — behind fishnets. Oh, Laura!"

He walked slowly on, looking almost transparent in the early-morning sunlight, till He came to the edge of the grove. There He turned inland and walked among the trees. Through their leaves, the sun flecked His bronze 'aba with fiery spots dazzled on His turban and His long silver hair and drew a crystal line, like a halo, down His profile to His feet. A child, light as a fairy, glistening in her white dress, danced up a path to His left. Our Lord stopped for a moment to watch her. Then, mysteriously, He vanished! We saw the boat coming closer, closer, and looked around wildly for the Master.

Where and how had He disappeared so quickly?

On the landing we found Him waiting for us, and followed Him to the gangplank. All the people on the landing stared at Him as He moved quietly forward with that strange power and that holy sweetness. Children raised their eyes to His face.

He put out a tender hand and caressed their heads.

We gathered around Him on the boat, Laura, the Persians, and I, and for a while He sat silent and grave in our midst.

Then suddenly He turned and smiled at me.

“You never dreamed, Juliet,” He said, “that you would be with Me in a boat.”

“I have often dreamed that I was with You in a boat!”

“But you never thought it would be fulfilled in this way!”

“No,” I smiled. “I never did. I couldn’t have imagined this!”

To be with Him in a boat on this lake so like the Sea of Galilee! He sat with His bronze ‘aba around Him, His hands hidden in its full sleeves, so that the sleeves with their straight, massive folds looked like great wings. The mist-veiled Alps were His background and His Majesty so dominated them that they appeared as no more than a filmy drop-curtain. The mist thickened, almost blotting out the mountains, blending them into the lake, and I felt that we had left earth with Him and our boat was sailing through ether. Just as I was thinking this, He said: “Others are passing from an immortal to a mortal kingdom, but the Bahá’ís are journeying, in the Ark of the Covenant, from a mortal to an immortal world. The Jews once turned to the Kingdom, but when they looked backward to mortal things, they became dispersed. Then Christ led men to the Kingdom; their signs have remained. God be praised that now you are on a Ship bearing you to immortal worlds. Day by day your signs will become clearer.”

Later the Persians brought Him tea and when He had finished I begged to “drink from His cup”. Mírzá Rafi’, adding some water to the kettle, poured out a cup for me.

The Master turned and smiled at me; then He laughed. “The tea for Me, the water for Juliet!” He said.

I am sure the future will adore Him also for His humour. The joy of His spirit overflows in the most delicious humour and gives Him a look of unconquerable youth.

“O Son of Delight!” I have just seen this phrase in the Hidden Words. The Master is all delight. Bay of Naples

3 September 1911

On 3 September 1909 after leaving the Holy Presence in Haifa, I sailed from Naples. Here I am again on 3 September 1911. These strangely repetitious dates! Tonight, as I saw that great pile of beauty, Naples, rising, jewelled with lights, against the clear rose of the afterglow — as I heard the voices of singers in the distance — how vivid were my memories of ‘Akká, Haifa; of the Master there! It is midnight now and I am too tired to write, but tomorrow I will tell their story of our day in Vevey.

4 September 1911

We arrived at Vevey. Edith was waiting on the landing and we drove with her to the hotel. There, we went straight to the room reserved by her for the Master. To my joy He called me to sit beside Him.

Mrs Sanderson (Edith’s mother) has never been attracted to the Cause. She has felt like my own dear mother about it, not caring at all for most of the believers! But she could not take her eyes from the Master’s face. “His beautiful face!” she whispered to me. Two of Edith’s friends came in, Miss Hopkins and Miss Norton.

Miss Hopkins is a Catholic, Miss Norton an agnostic. Miss Norton, when she saw the Master, seemed to be strangely overcome. Her face trembled, her eyes widened, as though she were looking at a spirit. I thought that at any moment she would burst our crying.

She and Mrs Sanderson brought up the question of immortality (which Mrs Sanderson feels it is cowardly to believe in) and I wrote down the Master's answer as Mulk translated it. Here it is, though I hate to give it in Mulk's poor English. Edith understands Persian. "You cannot imagine," she said to me, "how ruinous the translation is. The Master puts life into every word. Translated, the words sound flat. Besides, the Persian is so rich and He has a way of saying the same thing over differently, in various poetic forms and with subtle shades of meaning. In the translation it is all alike."

"Christ and all the Prophets have taught in their Holy Books the immortality of the soul.

"Jesus during His life had so many afflictions and no happiness or comfort and in the end He was crucified. If there were no immortality to follow, then nothing could be more useless than such a life.

"Take, for example, the life of Hannibal. In the world we would find none happier than he, for his life was one of pleasure and conquest and he triumphed wherever he desired. But Jesus had many afflictions. Were there no immortality we might say that Jesus was not even rational. But at the hour of His crucifixion, He knew He was leaving the mortal for the immortal life; He knew He was leaving the physical to ascend to the spiritual world. When they put on His head the crown of thorns, He thought of the crown of the Kingdom. While He was hanging on the cross He thought of the eternal throne.

"But now we come to the proofs. Those who do not believe in immortality have some proofs. For example, one is this. They divide existence into two kinds; imaginary existence and that of the senses. They say that since the immortal kingdom is not of the senses there can be no such kingdom. This is their proof! By this proof they deny!

"But Jesus and Bahá'u'lláh answer the people who do not believe thus: Every rational man can see that the world has come out of non-existence into existence. Life progresses from the mineral kingdom to the vegetable kingdom, from the vegetable to the animal, and from thence to the human kingdom. Were there no spiritual kingdom, life would be useless.

"For example: We plant a tree, we water and care for it. From branches we see it advance to leaf and from leaf to fruit. Should the fruit be opened and found to contain nothing, all would be useless. So the people of common sense, studying the universe, see that creation must have a result.

"The people of the world say: 'Where is the immortal world? When we look about us we do not see it. We only see the world of elements.' Therefore the Prophet says: 'Those in the station below cannot see the station above.' We are in this room, we cannot see beyond the ceiling. We are downstairs, we cannot see upstairs.

"For example: The mineral kingdom has no knowledge of the vegetable kingdom. The vegetable kingdom knows nothing of the animal kingdom. Nor is it possible that it should know of the animal, because it — the vegetable — is of a lower grade; the animal is in the higher condition. If the vegetable kingdom deny the existence of the animal kingdom, does this disprove the animal kingdom's existence? No, the animal kingdom exists, but the vegetable kingdom cannot imagine the reality of it. The reason the vegetable kingdom cannot imagine the animal kingdom is because it cannot comprehend it.

But this does not disprove its existence.

“Now we come to the human kingdom. In the human kingdom is an intellectual power not possessed by the animal kingdom. The animal cannot imagine this power. A Spaniard discovered America. The animal could not understand this. The intellectual power is not disproved because it is not understood.

“As to the spiritual kingdom: An unborn child cannot understand this world. It cannot imagine a world beyond the womb. If we could tell an unborn child that there is another world, with mountains, villages, cities — so many beautiful things — could he understand? Never! Therefore Christ said one must be born a second time. As a child, by coming to this world, understands the conditions here, so we should go to the spiritual world to understand its conditions. The Prophets were born in the spiritual condition to understand the immortal world.

“For example: The unborn child would deny the existence of this world for the reason that he knows nothing of it and the best condition to him is the world of the womb, the best food his nourishment there. He could not visualize this world. But when he is born and arrives at understanding, he sees what a beautiful world this is.

“So with the spiritual kingdom. The people of this world cannot comprehend the conditions of that immortal world, but, when they reach it, they see that this, in comparison, is just like the world of the womb. The unborn child says: ‘This is the best world. I am quite satisfied with it. I must not leave it.’”

---

The Master turned suddenly to me. “Do you understand all this, Juliet? I want you to know these things very well when you return to America.”

I had been saying to myself: Oh, Mrs Sanderson, look at the Master and see Immortality!

The next question — Mrs Sanderson’s — was about divorce, if Bahá’u’lláh approved of it.

“Bahá’u’lláh,” — the Master smiled — “says that in this world there is nothing more absurd than divorce. If one has accepted another and is a good Bahá’í he never likes to believe in divorce. But if there be a case of difference between husband and wife, where it is entirely impossible to recreate their love, where it is not possible for them to live any longer with one another, then both should go to the House of Justice and together, in perfect agreement, lay their case before it. And after this they should still wait a year, living apart but not permanently divorced, and their friends should give them good advice meanwhile. If, after one year, there is no possibility of becoming reunited, and no one is able to influence them, then this is the natural divorce.

“But between the real Bahá’ís there is no divorce. No one has ever heard of divorce between real Bahá’ís. The Bahá’í husband and wife will not allow affairs to reach such a condition.”

Luncheon was announced and Miss Hopkins and Miss Norton rose to go. As Miss Hopkins bade the Master goodbye He said: “I will pray for you.”

“And I will pray for you too,” she answered.

This gave me a shock. At the table Mrs Sanderson spoke of it, saying that her own feelings had been “outraged” by it.

“No,” replied the Master, “do not feel that way. It came from the heart; therefore it was beautiful.”

I shall never forget the way He said “beautiful”.

The Master had asked me to sit by Him at lunch. He was on the right of Mrs Sanderson, who sat at the head of the table. He talked with the gentlest love to her. Soon she brought up the name of Lua and then asked me: "Have you heard from Lua lately, Juliet?"

"I love Lua," she added.

"My mother loves Lua too."

"Your mother," the Master turned to me, in His voice that ineffable tenderness with which He always mentions Mamma.

"I wish my mother were here with Edith's mother."

"I shall see your mother."

I tried to speak a little Persian to Him and He helped me to construct the phrases. He had told me a day or two before that I must be sure to study Persian. "You see," He had said, "I can talk with Laura."

---

Lunch over, the Master went to His room to rest, after stopping in the hall for a moment to meet an old French lady, Madame Naber. Everyone scattered then and, finding myself alone, I slipped through a side door into the garden; and there on a stone bench sat Madame Naber and Mrs Sanderson, their white heads close together. They didn't see me at first.

"Il a l'air si bon, si simple," Madame Naber was saying.

"Oui, et les yeux de feu!" said Mrs Sanderson.[83]

Then they looked up and smiled at me and Mrs Sanderson said: "Wouldn't you like to see the view from the terrace, Juliet?"

I took the hint and walked over to the terrace, from which you can get the most marvellous view of the lake and the mountains on the further side.

Imagine my astonishment to find, sitting in the shade of a tree, Mrs Griscomb and Professor Mitchell of the Church of the Ascension!

Mr Griscomb and the Professor have been for some time vestrymen of the Church and have always actively opposed The Peoples' Forum, which is Percy Grant's chief interest. "My capitalists" Percy calls them. They are also Theosophists and have a very select group of their own, never mingling with the big ordinary group! But I was glad to see them just because they were from the church, and flew over to speak to Mrs Griscomb. She is a plump, pretty little woman with at least two professors and a husband at her feet. Professor Mitchell is sort of willowy and has a walrus moustache and, on his thin aloof nose, pince-nez with a wide black string.

"Why!" exclaimed Mrs Griscomb when she caught sight of me. "What are you doing here?"

"I have come from Thonon with 'Abdu'l-Bahá to lunch with the Sandersons. Do you know Mrs Sanderson, Mrs Griscomb? Won't you let me introduce you?"

"I should prefer to talk with you."

A little surprised, afraid I had made some blunder, though I couldn't imagine what, I hastily explained. "I asked on the impulse of the moment because it would be such a joy to present you to 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

"Thanks, I'm not at all crazy to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

The silly, insulting little answer went straight through my heart like a knife.

"I'm glad, however," she added, "if He gives you pleasure."

"Mrs Griscomb," I said, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is creating unity all through the world among all races and religions, which is a far more important thing than giving anyone personal happiness."

"I am one of those who do not decry personal happiness; and really I don't want to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

"You will see Him," I said as I moved away, "and then you may regret refusing."

By that time the Master was up and receiving the friends in His room. I rushed to the refuge of His Holy Presence. I was tingling all over, actually suffering physically from the blow of Mrs Griscomb's flippant blasphemy. As I entered the Master's room He sent me a searching glance but said nothing. And of course I said nothing, till I had a chance to talk to Edith.

A little later in the afternoon, Edith, her mother, Laura, and I sat on the terrace with the Master. Mrs Griscomb and the Professor were no longer there, but, Edith said, they were watching from their windows, Professor Hargrove standing beside them. Professor Hargrove, whom Percy calls "his mystic", is staying with the Griscombs in Vevey. They have a garden apartment in the hotel where they even eat their meals, associating with no one. It is understood they are very busy studying occultism and must not be interrupted in their search for Truth!

The whole thing is extraordinary. It was through Professor Mitchell that Dickinson Miller was brought to Percy Grant's church. Now both professors come to Switzerland and are drawn to the neighbourhood, even to the Presence, of "the Dawning-Point of Divine Knowledge." How different the reactions of the two! In Professor Miller, at least a timid response, a peeping out of the soul. In Professor Mitchell: a back turned superciliously!

Professor Mitchell, Professor Miller, and Percy Grant belonged about four years ago to a sort of club, where, with other professors of Columbia University they met to discuss religion. Professor Mitchell, whose memory is very accurate, wrote reports of those meetings and published them in book form. The book is extremely interesting. All through it the note is sounded that a great new Light is shining upon the world.

It ends something like this: "The Mathematician, left alone after the departure of his guests, goes to the window. In his ears ring the words of the Clergyman: 'The rebirth of the Christ in the whole of humanity is close at hand.' The Mathematician looks up at the stars and the vision of John on Patmos occurs to him. 'Even so,' he whispers, 'come quickly, Lord Jesus.'"

"The Mathematician" is Professor Mitchell and "the Clergyman", Percy Grant. And if this is not tragic, then I don't know what is!

Edith drove down to the landing with us to meet the boat, which was to take us back to Thonon. But, as we were early, the Master proposed our waiting in a nearby garden. There, on a bench under a tree, Laura, Edith, and I sat beside Him, while the Persians stood around us. One of them mentioned Barakatu'llah, whereupon the Master turned to me with such a funny look of accusation! His eyebrows went up and His eyes laughed. In my confusion I dropped my gloves and He stooped to pick them up, which completely humiliated me.

"Oh my Lord, don't!" I gasped.

At last the boat came. The Master stayed on deck for a short time, during which I kept very quiet, not wishing to speak; wishing only to fix in my mind that Godlike head with the Alps for its background. Then he went off to rest.

After He had gone, a man who was sitting close to us spoke to Mírzá Rafi'. "May I ask who that gentleman is?" he said. "I am very much attracted to His face."

"Abdu'l-Bahá a Persian exile," answered Mírzá Rafi' — too reticently, it seemed to me.

"I thought He might be the sultan's brother, who, I hear is living in Geneva."

He evidently meant Zillu's-Sulṭán! As he continued to ask questions, Laura gave the Message very ably. Beside the man sat a boy of about sixteen, with fair, curly hair and the face of a Botticelli angel. He leaned forward and listened eagerly.

Later the Master came out from His cabin, but the man and the boy had left the boat at Eviens.

The Master called me to sit by Him, Mulk sitting on the other side.

"Are you tired?" I asked.

"No, I am never tired. I am very comfortable." He spoke in His sweet English.

Touching the beautiful bronze-coloured 'aba, I said: "The coat You wore when I was in Haifa, which You afterward gave to Edna, was like this in colour, and we shared it, Edna and I. She would be so sweet as to lend it to me; then I would return it to her; then she would lend it to me again. It was such a comfort to me, that coat. At night, or in the early morning, I would bury my face in its hem and pray. Then I would seem to be kneeling again at Your feet, my Lord."

He smiled very tenderly while I was telling Him this.

"Edna has become very dear to me. And she loves You very much."

"Ah, Khayli khub."

"I want to speak of a friend of Edna's and mine — a very dear friend — a girl who is very, very close to me, whom I love with all my heart: M. M.[84] It is difficult for her to serve the Cause on account of her husband."

"She must serve in the Cause. Her husband must not prevent her. Neither the husband nor the wife should hinder the other's work in the Kingdom. She must not pay any attention to that but must serve firmly. Thus she will make great progress. She must try to give her husband the Message."

"She loves You very much. Her life has been one of great trial and sorrow."

“Bravo! Bravo!” said the Master. “It makes no difference that she has sorrows. These have been the cause of her development. Through sorrow the soul always advances. The greater the difficulty, the greater the progress of the soul. Now she must begin to serve firmly in the Cause. So, she will make great progress.”

Soon, all too soon, we reached the shore.

As the crowd on the boat stood still while the gangplank was lowered, two children in front of the Master turned and lifted their eyes to His face, and their eyes seemed to say: Is this God? They were very little children; they came just about to His knees. With a strong, lingering touch, as though He were leaving something with them, He pressed and fondled their heads. Then the crowd surged forward; the children and the Father were separated ... for this life?

After our return, in the early evening, Laura and I were sitting in the Master’s room. He began to speak in Persian, laughing, and I caught the words “Mrs Sanderson.” Then He turned to me and, still laughing, repeated in English: “Mrs Sanderson thinks this world is good enough. Very nice, this life!” And He laughed again.

Later, while Mulk was writing in my room, the Master came in and called us into His. “Now, have you anything secret to say to me?” He asked.

“I have a message for You from Dr Grant.”

“Ah!” He smiled. “Tell me.”

“I told him it wasn’t a good enough message and that I would not give it to You.”

“Give it just the same.”

“He sent You his greetings and said he hoped You would come to New York. That if You came, he would welcome You gladly. That he felt the work You were doing in the world was very beautiful and potent.”

“Convey My greetings to him. Say: ‘I am entirely thinking of you for the sake of Juliet who has mentioned you to me. Say that at a later date I will come to New York.’ Is there anything else you wish to say, Juliet?”

“There is not a desire in my heart, my Lord.”

“This is as it should be. The daughters of the Kingdom should not have a desire.”

“I should, like, however, to tell You a little of what has happened.”

“Speak,” said the Master.

“When I became engaged to Mason Remey,” (The Master looked archly at me; I smiled, but penitently.

“Dr Grant was very unhappy and disturbed, so one day I sent for him. I told him I was marrying Mason because I wished to be freer to serve the Cause.”

“That was a very wise answer. You did well,” said the Master.

"But I gave him another reason. I said that the Cause had spread in the East through sacrifice and I felt if this same spirit could be demonstrated in the West, this spirit of renunciation which was all-powerful, that the Cause might begin to spread there."

"I know!" said the Master, His eyes full of love.

Hiding my face on His coat sleeve, I said, half laughing — laughing, of course, at myself: "I was not strong enough — was I? — to drink the cup of martyrdom. I was a failure as a martyr."

How the Master laughed!

"I know better now than to ask — for that cup myself. I shall wait now for God to give it to me. I shall wait till he finds me ready to drink it."

"Insha'llah. Perhaps in another way God will give you that cup to drink, and the capacity for it."

"I hope so." After a pause I continued. "The following Sunday he preached on 'Renunciation'. This was his text. He said he had just had a new vision of the power of renunciation. He said that 'when a soul did the great thing first it inspired others to follow in the path of sacrifice.' And from that time on his life did change. He flung caution to the winds and with the utmost courage, in the face of the strongest opposition from within his church, championed the cause of the poor, of labour against capital; not in a way to encourage class hatred, but to promote mutual understanding. In the pulpit he says such things as these: 'A great new Light is breaking upon earth. The earth is being enriched and prepared for the birth of a new humanity. And in the face of this light of Democracy, of universal sympathy, of the ever fuller disclosure through science of the Will of God through the Laws of God, what are you to do with your miserable little creeds? While humanity marches rapidly forward to the Great Brotherhood, we find the Church lagging behind sociologically, allying itself through fear with the aristocratic classes. While science is marching on, the Church lags behind intellectually. And what are the certain consequences of this? Death for the Church. Something new, something living is coming. We feel it in the air.'

"One Sunday, my Lord, he even went so far as to mention Thy Name. 'The Bishop,' he said, 'has asked me to preach today on Church unity, but I wish to consider this subject from the point of view of the disintegration of the Church. The Church, which, had it fulfilled the hope of Jesus, would have set the example of brotherhood to the world, has split into fragments, while outside it we see great Movements for the Brotherhood of Man, such as the Bahá'í Movement, centred around the Master in 'Akká. With this, though we may not agree with all it teaches, we must feel sympathy, since it is not trying to unite the souls on the basis of disputable facts, but on the basis of universal sympathy. For supposing the Church did unite, what then would we do with our brothers the Jews, our brothers the Muslims, our brothers the Hindus, and our brothers the atheists? Are these to be considered as outside our body? No! The day has come for the falling of all barriers: social, national, religious.'"

"Good; very good," said the Master, who had been listening with keen attention. Then He closed His eyes, as He always does when He sends a message.

"Convey my greetings to him. Say: Miss Juliet has told me all about your preaching. What you have said lately is very good. It is exactly so.

"In the time of Jesus the Pharisees lit a lamp in opposition to the Light of Jesus. Only darkness resulted. But the Lamp of the Teachings of Jesus afterward became a great flame. Then it became as a sun and brightened the whole world.

“Such teachings as the people of today have in their hands cannot stand against the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Soon the East and the West will be ablaze with these lights.

“In the lifetime of Jesus eleven disciples became illumined. See what happened afterward! The whole world became illumined. But in the lifetime of Bahá'u'lláh half a million souls became illumined. From this you can see what will be the result in the future.

“The Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh no one can deny. If one comes to know the reality of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh it is impossible to deny.

“Up to the present time you have been building an edifice on a weak ground. Now I hope your foundation will be a strong rock, that it may become an eternal foundation.

“In the time of Jesus thousands of priests laid a foundation, but their foundation came to naught. But the foundation laid by Peter, under the Bounty of Jesus, is everlasting — though Peter was but a fisherman. Then do you lay the same foundation Peter laid, that it may last forever!”

Joy flooded my soul as He spoke. When He had ended I knelt at His feet, I kissed the hem of His robe. Divinely He smiled at me.

“I know,” I said “Whose Voice is calling him.”

“Insha'llah, you will make him a believer.”

“Then I have not loved and suffered in vain?”

“Insha'llah, through you,” the Master repeated, “he will become a believer.”

Just before dinner Elizabeth Stewart and Lilian Kappes (on their way to Persia to teach in Dr Moody's school) arrived at the hotel. The Master, of course, took them down to dinner, placing them opposite Him at the table and calling me to sit at His side. Several nations were represented at that table: Persia, America, France and Russia — for a Russian believer had also just arrived. And the Master said: “To the refreshing water of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh come many and various birds from many lands and at these cooling streams slake their thirst. When the lamp is ignited the butterflies flutter around the light.”

“May we,” said Lilian Kappes, “be ready to singe our wings at this Flame.”

“Bravo!” said the Master. “I am very much pleased with your answer.”[85]

In the evening the Master came to my door. Elizabeth and Lilian were in the room. I was off somewhere for a minute or two. He had in His hand three flowers. One spray with three blossoms He left for me. “This is for Juliet,” He had said. Later He came back and brought me a chocolate which He put in my mouth with His own fingers, as a father might feed His little child. He often brought chocolates to me. Here is the spray from His hand. (I pressed it in my diary.)

On Monday, I went away.

- (Footnote. 1924. It all happened so suddenly, so bewilderingly. Looking back now, I see why. I was not mad enough with love in Thonon. I could be separated from Him. *

Knowing that our whole party were His guests at the hotel and being in such a material condition that I worried about His pocketbook, I felt I must make some move to go. In 'Akká the Master Himself had always told us when to go, but being His guest in a very expensive hotel seemed to me a different situation. Edith had asked me to come to Vevey on Monday and stay overnight with her and I thought this might be a sign that my Heavenly Visit in Thonon was over. I was puzzled and didn't know what to do and decided to consult Laura. I met her by chance in the upstairs hall just outside the Master's door and at once plunged into the subject.

"Laura," I said, "the Master is under such heavy expense. Don't you think I ought to suggest leaving?" And Laura had barely finished replying, "Perhaps you should, Juliet," when the Master opened His door and came out.

"Chih miguyad?" (What did she say?) He asked.

Laura explained. And then — His answer fell like a blow, it was so curt and indifferent.

"Khayli khub." (Very well.) That was all.

But He said something later which, by mistake, was never translated to me. Edith was to spend Tuesday in Thonon and He said I must come back with her. Edith herself urged me to do so, but not knowing that the Master had invited me, I felt that I could not thrust myself on Him. I thought of several people who had come, unasked, to see Him at mealtime. I thought of the greedy little children selling violets and His gentle rebuke to them when they held out their hands for more francs: "Tell them that they have taken," and said to myself: I have taken too. So, though it desolated me to see Edith go without me, back to that Presence which was my Life, I wouldn't let myself be persuaded.

I sailed with Edith as far as Lausanne and there, in Lausanne, made another fatal mistake. I bought my ticket for New York on a boat belonging to an independent line, which meant I couldn't change to any other line. I thought I had to do this as my money was running so low and this was the cheapest line and the first boat leaving Genoa.

Edith had asked me to stay with her one more night, so I went back to Vevey to wait for her. When she returned she said to me: "I have something to tell you, Juliet, that will nearly kill you, but you would rather know than not. The Master expected you today."

To return to Monday — when I went away.

He sent for me early in the morning with Mulk to translate for me.

"Now will you give Me the messages, Juliet?"

I had many and I gave them all. When I mentioned Marion deKay He said: "Give her My affectionate greeting. She must be educated for a teacher. She must be taken great care of and treated very well. Taken great care of," He repeated.

I spoke of dear Silvia Gannett: "She asked me to tell You, my Lord, of a dream she had lately in which a voice said to her: 'I want you to serve Me in London.' She felt sure that it was Your voice. But she never mentioned this dream to me till one day she came to see me and found me crying, with Your Tablet in my hand and Aḥmad's letter saying that You would be in London at the Races' Congress. Then, when I explained why I was crying — that Mamma wouldn't let me travel alone — she told me the dream and that now she saw the meaning of it: she must go to London with me. But she could only stay there a very short time, much as she longed to wait till You came. She had to return home to get married."

The Master, at this, smiled so funnily, for Silvia is seventy-two! Then He said: "It," (her dream, of course, and her obedience) "is a sign that she will make progress and that her work in the Cause will be very good. Tell her it is just as though she had seen Me. Her journey is accepted as a visit. It will be just as though she had seen Me, just the same."

In my hand I held a letter from Nancy Sholl with a message in it for Him.

"Here is something interesting," I said. "Years ago I read a book by Miss Sholl. It was called The Law of Life, which she proved in her story to be sacrifice. The book was so spiritual that I longed to give Miss Sholl the Message, but when I tried to find her I heard that she lived in Ithaca. Then one day she walked into my studio with some people who wanted to sublet it — she had moved from Ithaca to New York — and we have been dear friends ever since. In this letter she sends You 'the loving greetings of a sincere seeker.'"

Smiling, the Master seized the letter. "Give her My most affectionate and loving greeting. Tell her I took her letter away from you."

He spoke some tender words to me. "I shall see you again," He concluded. "When the time comes I will write for you."

I realized suddenly that I was going to leave Him. A great wave of sorrow swept over me. I strained my eyes to His Face: and oh the blinding Glory there! His Face was a sun and Divine Love blazed from His eyes. It seemed to me I saw God.

"Always?" He breathed.

"Always, my Lord."

That look was the last. Mulk was called out and this left me alone with the Master for a moment. I sat at His feet in silence, my eyes downcast, feeling throughout my whole being His holy calm and the peace of His Presence.

Then Laura knocked at the door and came in, followed by Hippolyte, and together they talked of my plans, and, while they were talking, the Master rose from His chair by the window and with His swift step left the room.

Still earlier that morning Zillu's-Sulṭán elder son[86] had come to visit the Master. After a long private talk with Him, the prince rushed into Mulk's room threw himself down on the couch and wept bitterly.

"If only I could be born again," he sobbed, "into any other family than mine! When I think that my own father has massacred so many Bahá'ís; that it was through my grandfather's orders that thousands of Bábís were slaughtered and the Báb Himself executed, I cannot endure the blood that flows in my veins. If only I could be born again!"[87]

It was on Wednesday, after those two sweet days with Edith, that I sailed down the lake to Geneva. Oh Lake of Geneva!

To me it is not earthly at all. Hemmed off from the world by mountains, ethereal in mist, hallowed by His Sacred Presence, it is like a vision descended from Heaven. I can scarcely think of it as permanent, but rather as a shining bit of the immortal world revealed for the time as His environment.

I have already told of that sail to Geneva: the docking of the boat at Thonon, which seemed to me a sign that the Master was drawing me back to Him, since we had to cross the lake and go out of our course to dock there; how crushed I was when no one appeared at the landing to meet me; how desperate as the boat moved away from Thonon and I felt I had lost my last chance to be with my Lord again; my frantic desire to at least communicate with him driving me to call Hippolyte the minute I reached my hotel, and Hippolyte's breath-taking news: that the Master was coming the following night to Geneva and wished me to get in touch with Edith and ask her to join me there with Miss Hopkins.

Edith and Miss Hopkins arrived the next day a few hours earlier than the Master. Miss Hopkins is a very interesting girl: nun-like, really medieval. One thing she does beautifully is to illumine parchment cards, like the old missals. We had a happy hour together; then the two girls went off to rest and I to my balcony to pray.

Mount Blanc was rosy in the sunset. A diadem of lights encircled the lake. The mountains on the opposite shore — grizzled, almost barren, striped with whitish rock — made me think of Palestine.

While we were dining — Edith, Miss Hopkins, and I — at a table facing the window, we saw the Master's boat approaching. Edith and I rushed out, but were too late to meet Him on the pier. We met Him on the street, however, and that seemed so strange: to meet and be greeted by Him, on a European street. We walked with, or rather behind Him, to the Hotel de la Paix. His rooms, we found, were on the same floor as ours, the top floor.

The Master would not take the elevator, but walked up those four long flights of stairs; really, He floated up the stairs. That gliding ascent, majestic, of the most astonishing ease, was almost like a spirit soaring. It made me think of what Rúhâ ___Kh___ánum said to me once in Haifa, that even His body was different from ours, "of a different fibre," she said.

The Master went straight to His room and Edith and I stood outside in the hall with the Persians. It is a beautiful hall, square and white with slender columns and an enormous well down the centre where the staircase curves to the ground floor. Almost at once the proprietor came up and there was a little trouble about the rooms, Hippolyte not being there to arrange and Mulk and the others not understanding French very well. Edith and I were just moving forward to translate for them when the Master opened His door and stepped out into the hall. His mere appearance settled the matter.

"Who is that?" the proprietor asked with a startled look, then agreed to everything we asked.

I can see the Master now pacing up and down that hall, His hands behind His back in a way He has, His step firm and royal. I can see the turbaned head, the calm, noble profile luminous against the white wall.

After this, the Master went with us into Edith's room and waited there till His dinner was ready, talking to us tenderly. Suddenly He turned to me. "Could you go to London, Juliet? Miss Rosenberg has written inviting you to stay with her."

My heart leapt! Go to London with Him! Then, after all, this was not the end, this added bounty in Geneva, this merciful bounty granted to me in place of the lost day in Thonon. But, how could I prolong my trip? I had almost no money left.

"My Lord," I said, "I should love above all things to go, but my steamer ticket is bought and I can't exchange [Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Paris] it, as it is on an independent line. And in order to catch the boat I must leave Geneva tomorrow on the early train. But I could stay till nine o'clock and try to make some kind of change."

- (Footnote. 1924. And here I made my third and most fatal mistake — always thinking about pocketbooks, even that of the all-powerful Lord instead of, with perfect trust, leaving everything in His hands.) *

“No,” He answered, “it is not necessary. It was just that Miss Rosenberg wrote. Miss Rosenberg loves you very much. Everybody loves you and Edith,” He added, smiling. Then He asked Edith to call Miss Hopkins in and this left me alone with Him for a moment. Looking at me with questioning eyes, He whispered, “Always?”

“Always!”

Dinner over, He sent first for Edith, then for me, to come to His room. While Edith was with Him I prayed, standing on my balcony. By now it was dusk. The lights around the lake sparkled like strung stars. A purpose formed in my mind. Later I understood the real Source of this impulse.

As I took my place at His feet I said: “Dr Ḥakīm has told me You weren’t served well tonight; that You have eaten almost nothing. You are hungry I know. Let us go out — Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and I — and bring You some fruit with our own hands.”

He is always thinking for others and to see His appreciation of our slightest thought for Him, the warm happy love that beams from His eyes at such times, is unbearably touching. But He would not let us get anything.

“No, no,” He said. “No thank you. I was beautifully served. There was chicken, and many other things to come. I was too tired to eat — that was all.”

“What have you to ask, Juliet?”

“That I may always see Thy Face. To see it will protect me from temptation.”

“You must always see it. There must be no temptation.” Then He, Himself introduced my next subject! “I do not,” He said, “want to make you angry” — at which I looked up at Him laughing — “I do not want to hurt you, Juliet. But I must tell you something.”

I knew what was coming. I pressed His hand.

“Don’t think I am going to ask you to marry Mr Remey. Even if you wished to do so now, I would not wish it. But about Dr Grant ...” Then in a marvellous way He analyzed Percy Grant’s character and the nature, even the history of our attachment, taking my breath away by His perfect knowledge of the whole thing.

“But, my Lord, isn’t it true that he has other qualities — for example, his courage and his force — that would make him a wonderful servant of the Cause?”

“Ah, that is another affair,” said the Master. “I am thinking now of your future.”

“Some men,” He went on, “are like this. They do not wish to marry and they love the love of women, and should you let this continue, it will go on forever in the same way until in the end he leaves you. Besides, meantime you may fall into difficulty. It is often by just such a thing that a black line is drawn across a girl’s character. Now when you return to New York, Juliet, you must end this. Either you must marry him or separate yourself from him, cut yourself entirely from him.

Understand, I do not wish to separate you. I wish you to marry him. But I want the present state of things to end.

“I am speaking to you in this way because I love you so much. I love you very much; therefore I say these things to you.

"If you should marry him it may be good for the Cause — you may give him the Message — or, it may not be good. I do not care about this. I am thinking of your happiness."

"Ask the Master," I said to Tamaddunu'l-Mulk, "to tell me His Will and whatever it is I will do it, for I love His Will. I love following it. I intended to speak of this tonight. I intended to say: I am ready now to put Dr Grant out of my life."

"No, no," answered the Master. "You must understand that I do not want to separate you. I want you to marry him. It is My wish that you marry him. When you go back can you not say to him: 'We must end this in one of two ways. If you love me, marry me. There is no obstacle. If not, I must cut myself from you.'"

"Oh my Lord," I said, hiding my face on His knee, "how could I say that to him? I should be ashamed to."

I had never refused the Master anything before, but I quailed at the thought of proposing to Percy Grant!

- (Footnote. 1947. I hate to copy these idiotic words: "I had never refused the Master anything before." And on top of all my protestations that I loved His Will! Who on earth was I to "refuse the Master?" The awful impudence of it! The unconscious complacency of that comment was much worse than what I did.) *

"Then cannot your mother say it for you?"

"She won't even speak to him."

"Have you no friend who can take this message?"

"No. And besides: oh my Lord, how could I force him?"

"But you are not a child. And you must think of your future. Many men have wished to marry you."

"But, my Lord, I have no desire to marry."

"But I want you to marry, if not Dr Grant, then some other. Otherwise, when you are older you will fall into great misery. You can paint now; you are young, but you must think of your future, my daughter." His fatherly tenderness touched me to the heart.

"But it would be very difficult to marry a man I didn't love."

"That is the way with everyone," He said.

"My Lord," I asked, "mightn't I stay away from him — stop going to his church, refuse his invitations, refuse to see him when he comes?"

"Perhaps," and He made a laughing comment on human nature. "But," returning to His first suggestions, (with anxiety, it seemed to me, for He glanced from side to side as though He, Himself, were looking for a messenger) "is there no one to take him this word: marriage or separation?"

"No, but if You wish, my Lord, I will do it myself."

"I leave that in your hands, only do something to make him realize ... See," He said, "how much I love you! I have come to Geneva to tell you this and have stayed up so late" (it was nearly midnight) "talk to you about it."

---

(Footnote. I wish I could write everything He said that night. At times He was so comic about poor Percy's character that I couldn't help laughing with Him. When you are in His Presence nothing really matters except the eternal things.)

---

He looked very tired, and my heart smote me. How we accept His sacrifices, as if this immortal, universal King belonged just to us!

"Is there anything else you wish to ask, Juliet?"

"Only to say once more that I long to forever fix in my mind Thy Face. This will keep me firm and steadfast, desiring nothing but Thee."

"When your heart is perfectly pure and your love for Me increasing, then you shall see My Face."

"Come and knock at My door in the morning," He said.

"But I must leave so early. I must take the six-fifty train."

"Come whenever you are dressed. I shall be up."

---

Edith woke me at dawn. The horizon was crimson, the lake in its rim of dark mountains, a crystal mirror.

I went to the Master alone. In His exquisite thoughtfulness He had left the door ajar. I knelt at His feet. A great flood of sorrow rose in me.

"Don't cry!" said His tender voice and I felt His delicate, vital fingers wiping the tears from my eyes. I felt my heart suddenly at peace, as though He had laid His Power upon it and checked that uprising storm of wild grief.

"Always?" He asked.

"Always!" After a moment I added in Persian: "I shall be with You always."

In English He replied, and none but the Comforter

Himself could speak in such a tone: "With Me — always." Off the coast of Spain

Here in my cabin alone on this queer little ship I am fortifying myself for what lies before me in New York. I stay all day in my cabin, to avoid the people, and pray and write. To none of these people could I give the Message, nor anything else, in fact.

Always I seek the Master's Face. Sometimes He dawns on me in immortal glory and sometimes He smiles at me. Only through service, only through prayer, only through obedience shall I climb to His Presence and live in it "always".

I went to Thonon, not to find Him there, but to find Him afterwards. I have not yet found Him, except for brief moments. In the anguish before me, in the deprivation, in the "Heaven of Poverty": there shall I find Him.

I have been curiously stripped on this journey. Through the chivalry of an idealist who offered to help me at the customs, I lost my trunk. In Naples I lost my fountain pen; somewhere, my prayer book — even my prayer book! I have just the clothes on my back, nothing else. This diary, with my book of Tablets (the Master's Tablets to me) and the 'Akká diary, I have been carrying in a little bag, and thank God these are safe.

There is the dinner bell. I must go and sit with these funny people, who ply their toothpicks so vigorously (which makes me horribly sick) and accuse me of "seeing angels".

"I no want you see angels," said a fiery musician to me yesterday. "I want you" (pounding his chest) "to see me."

So I fly to my cabin and bolt my door.

8 September 1911

My struggle began today. Peace went. Standing at the bow of the boat just now, the salt wind in my face, the sea rough with whitecaps, I realized many things.

I have been more anxious to lead Percy Grant to the Kingdom than to be led there myself. I have counted more on eternal union with him than on eternal union with God. I have never been able to disentangle my love for the Cause from my love for him, or from my hopes and desires for him and myself — my future with him.

Now I must cut these two loves apart. But how? Nearing New York

15 September 1911. Morning.

A captive, fettered by mine own desire, Yet with a soul that panted to be free, Yet with a heart on fire For Him who freeth all captivity. Suppliant, I knelt before His Prison door. The latch is lifted and wide flung the door! Behold the amazing Glory of His Face! Veils, veils of Light, no more, These mortal eyes discern in His strange grace. I cry: "O Mystery, Grant that I see!"

With tender fingers quickening in their touch, Gently He wiped away mine unshed tears. "O thou," He breathed, "who lovest much, Await the sure unfolding of the years, The vision purified Through hope denied." The years unfolded, while a heavenly rain Of tears washed ever clearer my dim sight. Suppliant I knelt again, Unfettered now, before the Eternal Light. "Accept the heart I bring To Thee, O King!" I lift mine eyes to His Divinity, Eyes streaming now with tears of love alone. God! What is this I see? For veils of night and veils of Light are gone, Melted — torn — burned away In flaming Day. Haloed with rays, encircled as with fire, The clouds of earth rolled back, in ambient space, Eyes as two stars of living fire, Clearly I see the Christ — the Eternal Face — The Father in the Son, The One — the ONE!

Nearer New York

15 September 1911

"Always for Me, always for Me!" Ah, Whose the Voice that stirs the night In a chant sweeping in from Eternity Like the sighing wind o'er a boundless sea, "My heaven, My soul, My light! Thy heart for Me, thy breast for Me, Always for Me, always for Me! Thine eyes for Me, thy brow for Me, Always for Me! Thy soul for Me, thy spirit for Me, Always for Me, always for Me! Thy blood for Me — thy blood for Me, Thy blood for Me!" "Always for Thee, always for Thee," My heart to the Heavenly Wooer sings. "Sever my heart, my mind, mine eye From the mortal vanishing things! Lift me above the earth-desire, Higher and higher, higher and higher To the placeless pyre of undying fire, The love of the King of Kings!

And on Thine earth where Thy footstep rings Pour out my blood in Thy hallowed Way, That mortals, the red sign following, May attain to the Fount of Day. Always for Thee, always for Thee! On through the worlds of Eternity To the endless end no eye can see, The bird of fire to the Burning Tree! On, on to the beat of tireless wings — Always for Thee!"

This last little one I wrote after I left 'Akká, in 1909: O King of Kings, O King of Kings! My heart it is Thy quivering lyre. Thy vital fingers sweep its strings, Sweep its strings, sweep its strings. Its strings are set afire, my Lord, Its strings are set afire! Oh kindled by divine desire, For Thee it sings, for Thee it sings, Forevermore for Thee it sings, This heart that is Thy lyre, my Lord, This heart that is thy lyre!

15 September 1911

I am approaching New York — and my ordeal. But, thank God, I have been gathering strength. This week has been one of such frightful storm that I haven't been able to write a word. But, through the storm, the more brightly shone His Face.

48 West Tenth Street

2 October 1911

I love this dear little house. It is very simple and old-fashioned in an old-fashioned street. It looks like the homes of my childhood, only more simple and therefore more lovely. And yet, how it complicates the problem with which I have returned to live in it, since it is almost opposite the house of Percy Grant. Strange, to be moved so close to him by something outside my own will at this of all moments, when I must separate myself from him. I say "outside my own will," for I didn't choose this house; it came as the result of prayer. We tried for weeks and weeks and couldn't find a house in a neighbourhood to suit Mamma. Then one morning I got on my knees and prayed and, just a little later in the morning, Marjorie and I, on our way to Greenwich Village, saw the sign "For Rent" on 48 West Tenth Street and Mamma approved of this neighbourhood!

23 November 1911

O Handmaiden of God!

The news of your trouble and difficulty on the way caused Us great sorrows. In truth the trouble was very hard to bear. I hope you may receive a great reward for it. The cause of this trouble and difficulty was that for the love of seeing that unkind person you made great haste to go.

Remember My advices. Find a friend whose heart is yours, but not one who has a thousand hearts (affections). Think of God's Will, because God is the most kind.

Upon you be the Glory of God.

(signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás

[P.S.] I send you a small sum of money.

I shall never forget the awful moment when I read this Tablet. "For the love of seeing that unkind person you made great haste to go."(!) Every morning after that I awoke with these words ringing in my ears: "You made great haste to go."

My first thought was: "How can it be true?" So unconscious are we of our own real condition. Then I looked deep into my heart. Yes, it was true. I was always saying to myself in Thonon: "When I return to New York I will tell Percy this, I will tell him that." I looked forward to that return with excitement for it meant beginning a new life in a new home opposite his. I started back happily, to be overtaken at Geneva by the Master and His stern command: "Marry Dr Grant, or leave him. Cut yourself entirely from him."

Oh that pause at Geneva! I can see the Master now, the unexpected Visitor, leading Edith and me up those four flights of stairs to the Upper Chamber. I can see Him floating before us, the Being from worlds above Who has lit upon earth for a brief time.

"You made great haste to go." How blind I have been and how I have lost through my blindness. But for my stubborn attachment I might have spent weeks in Europe with Him, in Paris and London. For the "small sum of money" was the most pointed of signs that I could easily have given up my passage on "the independent line." It was $120: exactly the cost of the ticket.

I had not written to the Master of my "difficulties" on the way. Only to Mulk had I mentioned these trifles — the seven days of storm, the temporary loss of my trunk — for I got it again after nine weeks. Yet in the midst of His great pressure of work He had hastened to write me, to express His tender sympathy for my little inconveniences, to open my eyes to their real cause, my so persistent attachment — and, at this insecure moment, as I begin my "new life" opposite the house of Percy Grant — to repeat His warning at Geneva. How vigilant is God's watchfulness over His least creature!

Diary of Juliet Thompson: Chapter 4

Chapter 3 Notes

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

25 March to 7 December 1912

To the attracted maid-servant of God, Juliet Thompson.

HE IS GOD!

O thou candle of the Love of God!

Thy numerous letters were received. According to the promise, by the Will of God, I shall embark on the boat 25 March and in the latter part reach Naples, where I shall stay a few days and from thence start for New York.

Verily, this is great glad tidings. Upon thee by Bahá'u'l-Abhá.

(signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá Abba. Translated in the Orient.

New York

Twelve o'clock, 25 March 1912

It is just midnight. TODAY the Master sails for America. I feel His Presence strongly.

Received March 25:

The Church of the Ascension. 5 Avenue and 10th Street.

23 March

My dear Juliet:

I understand that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is to arrive in New York 10 April – that is, in Easter week, – so that the 14 April would be his first Sunday in New York.

If his friends in this city would feel any value or assistance in having him speak at the eleven o'clock service in the Church of the Ascension, in place of my sermon, I shall be more than happy to invite him to the Ascension pulpit in my place. I should like to show so important and splendid a person, and those who love him, whatever hospitality and goodwill can be expressed in this town, by such a plan.

If, however, his coming in the middle of the week means that he ought to get more quickly into public contact with the city, which may well be the case if his stay is brief, then I would offer the Church of the Ascension to the committee in charge of his affairs to have any kind of service they please, in the daytime or evening, between his arrival, let us say 10 April – and the following Sunday.

That is to say I make one of two propositions: to offer him my pulpit Sunday, 14 April, at eleven a.m., or to offer the Church, unhampered by any form of service, between the tenth and the fourteenth.

Faithfully,

(signed) Percy S. Grant

---

What will obedience bring forth, if half-obedience brings forth this? I have refused all winter to see Percy Grant.

I wrote thanking him and asking him to get in touch with the committee of arrangements, Mr Mills and Mr MacNutt.

The Church of the Ascension.

5 Avenue and 10th Street.

28 March 1912

My dear Juliet:

I thank you for your nice letter about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Whatever may seem most agreeable to those having the matter in charge will be altogether satisfactory to me.

Whatever I can do I hope you will allow me to do, to honour such a distinguished visitor from the East — one so loved by my friends.

Believe me to be faithfully yours,

8 April 1912

Little did I dream when I began this diary what I would write in its closing pages! This morning I telephoned Percy.

"This is Juliet."

"Ah, Juliet."

"I want to tell you two things. First, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is on the Cedric and will arrive Wednesday morning. And — is your time very full Thursday? For I think He will send for you almost at once."

"Wait. Let me get my card, Juliet. No, I have no engagements for Thursday, except in the evening, and could come any time during the day to see Him. I am very happy. I shall be very glad to see the Master, Juliet."

"As soon as He arrives, someone will let you know."

I then brought up the second thing.

"I'd like to explain something," I said. "Has Dr Guthrie got into touch with you?"

"No."

"Then I hardly need to explain. But it was this: Charles James had heard some rumour that the Master was to speak in your church. He mentioned this to Dr Guthrie, who immediately wanted to offer his church, too. This morning a letter came from Dr Guthrie inviting the Master to speak on the night of the fourteenth. I tell you all this really to say that it was not through me Dr Guthrie heard of your plans."

"I am a very easy person, Juliet, in misunderstandings."

"I know that."

"And I am glad Dr Guthrie has made the same offer that I have."

"No one has made the same offer you have."

It was then he repeated something he had said to Mr MacNutt; I can't remember just what.

"That was beautiful of you," I answered.

"No, it was not. And Juliet: I don't want you to feel that this is a favour. I want you to feel — to understand — that you have a proprietary interest in the church: a proprietary interest; that it is yours to give. The church is yours. The Parish House is yours. The Rectory is yours.[88] We will ask the Master to the Rectory and form little groups to meet Him. I don't want to bore you, Juliet," (oh imagine him boring me!) "but I want you to feel that it is yours, this house. Here it is, just at the end of the street. Ask anyone to the Rectory, anyone you wish. You may eliminate the Rector, if you would rather not have me here ..." This and much more. He contradicted that last statement once. "I want you," he said, with his appealing boyishness, "to come around me again, Juliet." His voice broke. He stammered a little and ended. "I am a tongue-tied person when it comes to strong feeling."

"I should like," I said, "to take you by the hand and lead you to the Master myself."

"I want you to, Juliet. I don't want to do it any other way. I want you to be there. I don't want to do it without you."

"Then we will meet on Thursday. We will see each other on Thursday in His Presence. I think it will be beautiful to meet there."

"It will be the north and the south in His Presence, Juliet."

"The Master has loved you a long time, Percy, for your work."

"Some people say they are loved for their enemies, Juliet. If I am loved, it is for my friends."

10 April 1912. 11:15 p.m.

Tomorrow He comes! Who comes? "Who is this that cometh from Bozrah?"

This is a night of holy expectation. The air is charged with sanctity. I can almost hear the Gloria in Excelsis.

How close He is tonight! Is it His prayers I feel? Why has earth become suddenly divine?

Midnight

The Master comes TODAY!

11 April 1912

Oh day of days!

I was wakened this morning while it was yet dark by something shining into my eyes. It was a ray from the moon, its waning crescent framed low in my windowpane.

Symbol of the Covenant, was my first thought. How perfectly beautiful to be wakened today by it! But at once I remembered another time when I had seen the waning moon hanging, then, above palm trees. I was on the roof of the House in 'Akká with the Master and Munavvar __Kh__ánum. The Master was pointing to the moon. "The East. The moon. No!" He said. "I am the Sun of the West."

At dawn, kneeling at my window, I prayed in the swelling light for all this land, now sleeping, that it would wake to receive its Lord; conscious, as I prayed, of an overshadowing Sacred Presence: a great, glorious, burning Presence — the Sun of Love rising. This fiery dawn was but a pale symbol of such a rising.

Between seven and eight I went to the pier with Marjorie Morten and Rhoda Nichols. The morning was crystal clear, sparkling. I had a sense of its being Easter: of lilies, almost seen, blooming at my feet.

All the believers of New York had gathered at the pier to meet the Master's ship. Marjorie and I had suggested to them that the Master might not want this public demonstration, but their eagerness was too great to be influenced by just two, and so we had gone along with them — only too glad to do so, to tell the truth.

During the morning the harbour misted over. At last, in the mist we saw: a phantom ship! And at that very moment some newsboys ran through the crowd, waving Extras. "The Pope is dead! The Pope is dead!" they shouted. The Pope was not dead. The Extras had been printed only on a rumour; but what a symbol, and how exactly timed!

Closer and closer, ever more substantial, came that historic ship, that epoch-making ship, till at last it swam out solid into the light, one of the Persians sitting in the bow in his long robes, 'aba, and turban. This was Siyyid

Asadu'lláh, a marvellous, witty old man, who had come with the Master to prepare His meals.

He told us later that when the ship was approaching the harbour and the Master saw, as His first view of America, the Wall Street skyscrapers, He had laughed and said: "Those are the minarets of the West." [89] What divine irony!

The ship docked, but the Master did not appear. Suddenly I had a great glimpse. In the dim hall beyond the deck, striding to and fro near the door, was One with a step that shook you! Just that one stride, charged with power, the sweep of a robe, a majestic head, turban crowned — that was all I saw, but my heart stopped.

Marjorie's instinct and mine had been true. Mr Kinney was called for to come on board the ship. He returned with a disappointing message. The Master sent us His love but wanted us to disperse now. He would meet us all at the Kinneys' house at four.

Everyone obeyed at once except Marjorie, Rhoda, and myself! Marjorie, who loves the Teachings but has never wholly accepted them, said: "I can't leave till I've seen Him. I can't. I WON'T!" So, though we followed the crowd to the street, we slipped away there and looked around for some place to hide. Quite a distance below the big entrance to the pier we saw a fairly deep embrasure into which a window was set, with the stone wall jutting out from it. Here we flattened ourselves against the window, Rhoda (who is conspicuously tall) clasping a long white box of lilies which she had brought for the Master. Just in front of the entrance stood Mr. Mills' car, his chauffeur in it. Suddenly it rolled forward and, to our utter dismay, parked directly in front of us. Now we were caught: certain to be discovered. But there was no help for it, for Marjorie still refused to budge till she had seen the Master.

Then, He came — through the entrance with Mr MacNutt and Mr Mills, and turned and walked swiftly toward the car. In a panic we waited.

A few nights ago Marjorie and I had a double dream. In her dream, I was out in space with her. In mine, we were in a room together and the Master had just entered it. He walked straight up to Marjorie, put His two hands on her shoulders and pressed and pressed till she sank to her knees. And while she was sinking, she lifted her face to His and everything in her seemed to be dying except her soul, which looked out through her raised eyes in a sort of agony of recognition.

Today, after one glance at the Master, this was just the way she looked.

“Now,” she said, “I know.”

As the Master was stepping into the car, He turned and — smiled at us.

We met Him in the afternoon at the Kinneys'. When I arrived with Marjorie, He was sitting in the centre of the dining room near a table strewn with flowers. He wore a light pongee 'aba. At His knees stood the Kinney children, Sanford and Howard, and His arms were around them. He was very white and shining. No words could describe His ineffable peace.

The people stood about in rows and circles: several hundred in the big rooms, which all open into each other. In the dining room many sat on the floor, Marjorie and I included. We [Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá holding a child.] made a dark background for His Glory. Only our tears reflected Him, and almost everyone there was weeping just at the sight of Him. For at last we saw divinity incarnate. Divinely He turned His head from one child to the other, one group to another. I wish I could picture that turn of the head — an oh, so tender turn, with that indescribable heavenly grace caught by Leonardo da Vinci in his Christ of the Last Supper (in the study for the head) — but in 'Abdu'l-Bahá irradiated by smiles and a lifting of those eyes filled with glory, which even Leonardo, for all his mystery, could not have painted. The very essence of compassion, the most poignant tenderness is in that turn of the head.

The next morning early the Master telephoned me (that is, Aḥmad[90] telephoned for Him) and nearly every morning after. Can you imagine the sweetness of that — to be wakened every morning by a word from Him? Sometimes He just inquired how I was, but often He called me to Him.

When I first went to see Him He asked me only one question. “How is your mother?”

“Not very well, my Lord.”

“What is the matter?”

“She is grieving.” And I told Him why. My brother is soon to be married to a quite beautiful, brilliant girl who, however, doesn't want to make friends with his family!

“Bring your mother to Me,” He said. “I will comfort her.”

He sent for her that very night. I was terribly afraid she wouldn't go — she has been so opposed to my work in the Cause — and Aḥmad called up in the midst of a thunderstorm! But when I took the message to her — that the Master wished her to come to Him now — she jumped up from her chair and began to scurry around.

“Just wait till I get my rubbers,” she said.

We found Him exhausted, lying on His bed. He had seen hundreds of people that day, literally, at a big reception and in His own rooms. Mamma, who is very shy and undemonstrative, rushed to the bedside and fell on her knees.

“Welcome, welcome!” said the Master. “You are very welcome, Mrs Thompson.

“You must be very thankful for your daughter. Praise be to God, she is a daughter of the Kingdom. If she were an earthly daughter, of what use would she be to you? At best she could do you a little material good. But she is a heavenly daughter, a daughter of the Kingdom. Therefore she is the means of drawing your soul nearer to God. Her value to you is not apparent now. When one possesses a thing its value is not realized. But you will realize later. Mary Magdalene was but a villager; she was even scorned by the people, but now her name moves the whole earth, and in the Kingdom of God she is very near. Your daughter is kind to you. If your son is faithless, she is faithful. She will become dearer and dearer to you. She will take the place of your son. But in the end your son will be very good. This is only temporary.

“I became very grieved today when, upon inquiring for you, I heard of your sorrow. And now I want to comfort you. Trust in God. God is kind. God is faithful. God never forgets you. If others are unkind what difference does it make when God is kind? When God is on your side it does not matter what men do to you. But your son will be good in the end.

“God is kind to you. And I am going to be kind to you. And I am faithful!”

Mamma, still on her knees, bent and kissed His hand. “Tell the Master,” she said to Aḥmad, “I have always loved Him. Lua knows that.” (If Lua knew, I certainly didn’t.)

“I have no need of a witness,” the Master answered, so tenderly. “My heart knows.”

The next day Mamma said to me: “All my bitterness has gone. The Master must be helping me.”[91]

It was on Saturday, 13 April, that Mamma and I visited the Master. On Friday He had called me early, asking me to meet Him at the MacNutts’.

I shall never cease to see Him as He looked speaking from their stairway, standing below a stained glass window in a ray of sunlight, the powerful head, the figure in its flowing robes, outlined in light.

The Master has a strange quality of beautifying His environment, of throwing a glamour over it and blotting out the ugly. The MacNutts’ house is ugly; the one redeeming feature of that stairway, its window. All I saw as the Master stood there was Himself, the window, the ray of light. His words lifted my soul on wings!

In the evening Friday He spoke in Miss Phillips’ studio. The enormous room was packed. At his dear invitation I sat [on] His right (I suppose because I had given Miss Phillips the Message); Marjorie at His left near Him. In the simple setting of that studio, its overhead light filling the deep forms of His face with shadow, He looked ruggedly, powerfully beautiful. His words I will not give. They have been kept.[92]

The very day He arrived, Thursday, the Master sent for Percy Grant, but He appointed Friday to see him, in the afternoon. I was not invited to the interview, so in spite of the happy arrangement Percy and I had made, I knew I should have to stay away. Nor was I told very much about it, only that the Master had planned with Dr Grant to accept his church for Sunday (the fourteenth) for His first address in New York, choosing the Church of the Ascension out of thirteen other — and some of the clergy had even wired to Gibraltar offering their pulpits for that date! And one other very little thing (Mr MacNutt himself gave me this scrap of news): as he was standing with Dr Grant at the elevator after leaving the Master's suite, Dr Grant said to him: "You can't help but love the old gentleman."

To me Percy put it more elegantly: "The Master compels one's love and esteem. What He radiates is peace and love."

Saturday, 13 April, the Master spoke at Marjorie Morten's.[93] Again, because of the crowd, He spoke from the stairway, dominating all the beauty of Marjorie's long drawing room, with its rich colour and carvings and masterly paintings, by His superlative beauty.

His theme that day was the spiritual seasons, and in the midst of His talk a delicious thing happened which, slight though it was, I want to keep. In its very slightness it may draw the people of the future closer to the Master, just as it drew us.

These tender little touches of His humour and simplicity, bridging for the moment the infinite space between us and His pure Perfection, making His Divinity accessible: how precious, how heavenly sweet they are, of what unique value! The disciples of Christ, looking beyond that awful chasm of the crucifixion into the mystery of their days with Him, were, I suppose, awed into silence about the little things — the adorable little things. So the Man of sorrow has been just the Man of sorrow to us. We have never formed any conception of the Man of love and joy, great buoyant joy; a Christ whose Love overflowed into little tendernesses and Whose joy overflowed into fun and wit — a happy, smiling, laughing Christ.

And yet I am sure He was that.

But now to tell of this small thing. With His celestial eloquence the Master had described the spiritual springtime.

"Va tabistan," He began and paused for Aḥmad to translate.

Dead silence. Poor Aḥmad had lost the English word.

But while he stood helpless, the Master supplied it Himself.

"Summer!" He laughed. Whereupon a little ripple of delight ran through the audience. His charm had captured them all.

After the meeting He went up to rest in Mr Morten's room. He had seen a hundred and forty people that morning and was so worn out at the end of His talk that He looked almost ill. His fatigue was apparent to everyone — and yet the people had no pity. When I returned from an errand to the kitchen, literally hundreds were streaming toward His room; a dozen were in the room; in the hall were many peering faces, and climbing up the stairs — a procession!

"Oh can't we shut the door?" I asked Dr Farid. But the Master heard me.

"Let them come now," He said gently.

A mother with a baby stood near the door. The Master took the baby from her and tenderly pressed it to His heart. "Beautiful baby! Little chicken!" He said in His dear English; then explained that "little chicken" was the Turkish pet name for child.

A young single-taxer<sup>[94]</sup> began to question Him. "What message shall I take to my friends?" he ended.

"Tell them," laughed the Master (that wonderful spicy humour in His face) "to come into the Kingdom of God. There they will find plenty of land and there are no taxes on it."

Sunday. Oh, Sunday!

At the Master's own invitation I met Him at the Rectory, a half hour before the service.

As Miss Barry was holding her Sunday school class downstairs, we were invited upstairs, to the back room on the second floor. There, with the Master and the Persians and Edward Getsinger, I waited in supreme happiness. Very soon Percy came in. Approaching the Master, he bent his head reverently.

"In New Testament language," he said, "this would be called an upper chamber."<sup>[95]</sup>

The Master smiled sweetly and took his hand.

After he left, the Master turned to me. "This is a dish you have cooked for Me, Juliet," He laughed.

"I hope it is cooked all the way through!"

"Insha'llah," smiled the Master.

"I have more dishes to serve to You when You are rested," I ventured.

"I hope they are light," He replied, "and will rest easily on My digestion. Most of these dishes are so heavy!"

I inquired for dear Rúḥá __Kh__ánum, who has been very ill.

"I have put her in the hands of the Blessed Perfection," said our Lord, "and now I don't worry at all."

He spoke of my mother very lovingly.

"Tell her to trust in God," He repeated. "Tell her that God is faithful. Read the Hidden Words to her."

The time came to go to the church. The Persians, Edward Getsinger, and I went first: marching in, as Percy had planned it, with the processional, bringing up the rear of the processional! For nearly a year I hadn't once entered the Church of the Ascension; and now, what a very surprising return!

The Master waited in the vestry-room.

When I try to express the perfection of that service — I mean, the arrangement of it — I can find no words. It was the conception of an artist, of a true poet. The altar and the whole chancel were banked with calla lilies. On the back of the Bishop's chair hung a victor's wreath, an exact reproduction of the Greek victor's wreath, classically simple: a small oval of laurel with its leaves free at the top. Its meaning went to my heart.

Dr Grant read first a prophecy from the Old Testament pointing directly to this Day, to Bahá'u'lláh; then the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians. These were not the lessons for the day but specially chosen.

At the end of the Second Lesson, just as the choir began to sing in a great triumphant outburst "Jesus Lives!" 'Abdu'l-Bahá with that step of His, which has been described as the walk of either a shepherd or a king, entered the chancel, "suddenly come to His Temple!" Percy Grant had quietly left his seat and gone into the vestry-room and had returned with the Master, holding His hand. For a moment they stood at the altar beneath that fine mural, The Resurrection by John La Farge; then with beautiful deference Percy led the Master to the Bishop's chair. (This broke the nineteenth canon of the Episcopal Church, which forbids the unbaptized to sit behind the altar rail!)

The prayers over, Dr Grant made a short introductory address, speaking not from the pulpit but the chancel steps. Never shall I forget what I saw then. Percy, strong and erect, with his magnificently set head ("like the head of some Viking" as Howard MacNutt says), giving, with a fire even greater than usual — with a strange, sparkling magnetism — the Bahá'í Message to his congregation; and behind him: a flashing Face, unlike the face of any mortal, haloed by the victor's wreath, visibly inspiring him. For with every flash from those eyes, which were fixed on Dr Grant, would appear a fresh charge of energy in him. There was something wonderfully rhythmic in this transmission of fire to the words and the delivery of the man speaking. Was it the sign of some susceptibility in this hitherto unyielding man to the power of 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ? Or was it just that Power: transcendent, irresistible, quickening whom it chose?

"May the Lord lift the light of His Countenance upon you." Ah, what happens when the Lord does!

How can I tell of that moment when the Master took the place of Percy Grant on the chancel steps? When, standing in His flowing robes there, He turned His unearthly Face to the people and said:[96] "Dr Grant has just read from the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians that the day would come when you would see face to face."

It was too great to put into words; it was almost too great to bear. The pain of intense rapture pierced my heart. Could the people fail to recognize? Oh, had they recognized what would He not have revealed to them? But He could go no further. He swerved to another subject.

"I have come hither," He said, "to find that material civilization has progressed greatly, but the spiritual civilization has been left behind. The material civilization is likened unto the glass of a lamp chimney. The spiritual civilization is like the light in that chimney. The material civilization should go hand-in-hand with the spiritual civilization. Material civilization may be likened unto a beautiful body, while spiritual civilization is the spirit that enters the body and gives to it life. With the propelling power of spiritual civilization the result will be greater.

"His Holiness Jesus Christ came to this world that the people might have through Him the civilization of Heaven, a spirit of oneness with God. He came to breathe the spirit into the body of the world. There must be oneness in the world of man. When this takes place we will have the Most Great Peace.

"Today the body politic needs the oneness of the world and universal peace. But to spread the feeling of peace and firmly implant it in the minds of men a certain propelling Power is required.

"It is self-evident that spiritual civilization cannot be accomplished through material means, for the interests of the various nations differ. It is self-evident that it cannot be accomplished through patriotism, for countries differ in their ideas of patriotism. It is impossible save through spiritual power. Compared with this all other means are too weak to bring about universal peace.

“Man has two wings: his material power and development, and his spiritual understanding and achievements. With one wing alone he cannot fly. Therefore, no matter how far material civilization advances, without the other, great things cannot be accomplished. ... Humanity, generally speaking, is immersed in a sea of materiality ...”

Dr Grant asked the Master to give the benediction. Apparently He gave no blessing but asked for one for us.

Against His high background of lilies He stood, His face uplifted in prayer, His eyes closed, the palms of His hands uplifted. I seemed to feel streams of Life descending, filling those cupped hands. On either side of Him knelt the clergymen, facing the altar. Percy Grant's head was bowed low. It was a breathless moment. Then the Master raised His resonant voice and chanted.

The recessional hymn was “Christ our Lord has risen again.”

How can words tell what I realized, or thought I realized, at that incomparable service?

This church had been my cross for years, from which I had never been able to escape — though twice I had made the attempt, twice wrenching myself away, only to be guided back by what seemed to me in each instance the clear Will of God, expressed through a striking miracle. Guided back to mortal pain. Was I seeing, this morning, divine results of this pain?

And not only had I suffered more vitally here than in any other place, prayed more passionately; not only had it been the scene of my deepest inner conflict, but the cause of all this had been dramatically enacted here. Here in this pulpit, with all his great force, his disturbing magnetism and the fire of his eloquence, Percy Grant had opposed my unshakeable belief, thundering denunciations of “the subtle”, “the Machiavellian Oriental” (God forgive me for quoting this) — of the slumbering and superstitious Orient — the Orient that brought to the West “nothing but disease and death” — determined to conquer this Faith of mine which made me resistant to him. He had even gone so far as to openly name “the Bahá'í sect” in his pulpit and to warn his flock against it.

And now, framing that matchless head of the Master, who sat there so still in His Glory, hung the victor's wreath! Oh for words vivid and sublime enough to make you see Him sitting there, in the very spot where He had been so violently denied!

The Master took me back into the Rectory, into the big, dark front room. Percy rushed in for a moment, still in his surprise, his cheeks flushed, his eyes very bright and blue.

“Juliet,” he called, looking in from the dining room, “ask if the Master wants anything: tea, coffee, water — anything; then tell Thomas” (the butler).

But the Master wanted nothing except to wait to see Dr Grant (who was being detained in the church) and He filled me with indescribable joy by inviting me to wait with Him, sitting beside Him.

I sat there, happier it seemed to me than I had ever been in my life. I was in the Presence of my Lord, and the one I loved best in all this human world had at last recognized Him. For what else had that exquisite service meant, with the Resurrection stressed all through it? Such a bold acknowledgement, such a daring action in the very church itself could not have been insincere. It never occurred to me to doubt it.

But time passed and Percy did not come back. A great crowd arrived before he did. Someone, using the private way from the church, had left the door open and the people began to surge in. And then (while my heart sank with disappointment) the Master made a swift exit.

Too late Mrs Grant, Percy's dear mother, entered the room. It was a dramatic entrance. She ran in, distractedly, glancing from side to side, obviously looking for the Master. Not seeing Him there, she exclaimed: "If only I could have had His blessing! That Figure makes me think of the plains of Judea."

At that very instant Mr Mills, who had gone out with the Master, reappeared. "'Abdu'l-Bahá," he said, "is asking for Mrs Grant."

I stood at the street door and watched. The Master was sitting in Mr Mills' car, just in front of the house. I saw Mrs Grant approach it, kneel in the street and bow her head. I saw Him place His hands on her head.

A year ago I had a dream. I was in the People's Forum, stooping and kissing Mrs Grant. She looked up through tears. "I have seen the Master," she said in my dream. "He spoke to me. Oh there was never such a Face in the world!"

Now, on the steps of the Rectory, as she returned from the car, she looked up through tears.

"I got my blessing, Juliet," she said, "and I didn't have to ask for it."

I went back to the church to thank Percy Grant and found him alone. His last parishioner had just gone. For a moment we stood with clasped hands.

"You made everything so beautiful. I can't find the right words to thank you."

"My darling," he said, "my darling —"

Something in his look — something false — woke me. Sick at heart, I turned away.[97]

That night how I hungered to see the Master. My heart burned to see Him. I went to the telephone. Ah, these days when just by a telephone call we can reach Him! One of the Persians answered my call.

"Is the Master well tonight? Is He resting?" I asked.

"He is in His room, reading Tablets."

---

The next morning, through Aḥmad, the Master telephoned me. He wanted to know how I was.

"Tell Him my heart is burning for Him just as it used to in Haifa."

"The Master says: come at once to Him."

And scarcely was I seated in His room when He began to speak of Percy Grant. He spoke with great love, with great appreciation of the service Percy had rendered, but told me to be very careful in my relations with him.

"You must keep your acquaintance, Juliet, absolutely formal."

Then He gave me this message: "Convey to Dr Grant My greetings. Say: I will not forget the services thou hast rendered yesterday. They are engraved on the book of My heart. I will mention thy name everywhere. And know thou this: This matter of yesterday will become most wonderful in the history of the world. The world of existence will not forget yesterday. Thousands of years hence the mention of yesterday will be heard and it will become history that you were the founder of this work.

"I ask of God for you all those things I have asked for Myself and they are: that thou mayest become a sincere servant of God and serve in the Kingdom of God and become sanctified and holy; that thou mayest find a pure and enlightened heart, an illumined face; become the cause that the lights of spiritual morals may illumine the hearts in this country and that they may be illumined in the world of the Kingdom; become the promoter of Truth and deliver the souls from ignorance and prejudice. I supplicate to the Kingdom of God for you, and I will never forget the love that was manifested yesterday.

"I hope," said the Master, turning to me, "that he will become a believer, but I do not know. The rectorship of that church is in the way. If he could give it up of his own volition, then he might become a believer."

He spoke of my dear mother: "Convey to thy mother the greetings of Abhá. Say to her: Always remember My advices. It is my hope that thou mayest forget everything save God. Nothing in this world is sufficient for man. God alone is sufficient for him. God is the Protector of man. All the world will not protect the soul."

I sent Percy Grant the message and later he telephoned me.

"That was a wonderful, wonderful message," he said, his voice strangely upset.

Early Sunday evening, the fourteenth, the Master spoke at the Carnegie Lyceum for the Union Meeting of Advanced Thought Centres.[98] I can give you no idea of His Glory that night. He was like a pillar of white fire.

I sat in a box with Bolton Hall, one of our fashionable intellectuals, a lean, elegant person with an Emersonian face. Turning to him for a moment, I asked: "What do you see?"

"Nothing, dear child, nothing."

16 April 1912

This morning the Master agreed to speak at the Bowery Mission.

"I want to give them some money," He said to me. "I am in love with the poor. How many poor men go to the Mission?"

"About three hundred, my Lord."

"Take this bill to the bank, Juliet, and change it into quarters," and He drew from His pocket a thousand- franc note.[99] "Have them put the quarters in a bag. Keep the money and meet Me at the Mission with it."

He handed another thousand-franc note, with the same instructions, to Edward Getsinger.

As I left His room, lilies of valley in my hand, a young chambermaid stopped me. "Did He give you those?" she asked. "He gave me some flowers yesterday. Roses. I think He is a great Saint."

---

Later, May Maxwell and I were together in the Master's room. He was lying back on His pillow, May's baby crawling over Him, feeding first the baby, then May and me with chocolates.[100] On the pillow beside Him was the victor's wreath, which He always kept near Him. Suddenly He brought up Percy's name.

"I love Dr Grant," he began. "He has rendered Me a great service. I love him very much, but I want you to be careful."

"My Lord, I believe my heart is severed," I said. "I don't know but I believe so."

He looked at me with arch incredulity: "No? Really?" He said.

May laughed.

"What do you know about it?" the Master asked.

"May knows everything about it."

"Well, has she helped you? How far has her help gone? Has it been sufficient for you?"

"She has helped me, but only God is sufficient when love has gone as deep as that."

"I know. Now, can you transfer this love to God?"

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá walking down Riverside Drive in New York, 1912]

"To God I can. To You."

"No. To God."

"Yes ... I can ... to God."

"That will be enough! I shall try to make no more marriages," laughed the Master. "When you have really given up," He added, "he will come after you." [101]

"I love Dr Grant," He continued, "very, very much, but I want to protect you."

"May I ask a question?" said May. "If Juliet put the thought of Dr Grant forever out of her mind, would this be good?"

But the Master answered evasively: "If he would become a believer and marry Juliet it would please Me very much."

"Don't we tire You?" I asked a little later. "Oughtn't we to leave You now?"

"No, stay. You rest Me. You make Me laugh!" He answered.

18 April 1912

I asked Mrs Wright if she would invite Percy to hear the Master speak at the Bowery Mission. His reply has just come through her. He said: "Give Juliet my love and my excuses. Tell her I prefer to be remembered by Him in the Church of the Ascension. Tell her this and she will understand."

---

Before writing of the Master's visit to the Bowery I must explain how it came about. In February this year Dr Hallimond asked me for the third time to give the Bahá'í Message at the Mission. I had refused twice before because my dear mother wouldn't allow me to go there. But this third invitation I felt I must accept. So, for the first time in my life, I deceived Mamma! Silvia Gannett helped me out. (By the way her marriage has been postponed.) She invited me to dine, then went to the Mission with me. The only thing Mamma knew was that I was dining with Silvia.

The weather that night was terrible: snowing, sleeting, bitterly cold. The Mission was packed with homeless men, some of whom had been driven in by the cold and the storm and were there for no other reason. Among these, I learned afterward, was John Good — may he ever be blessed! Wonderfully named was John Good! He had been released from Sing Sing that very day: an enormous man with a head like a lion and a great shock of white hair. From his boyhood he had spent his life in one prison or another and now, in his old age, had behaved so rebelliously in Sing Sing that they would punish him in the most painful way, hanging him up by his thumbs! Full of hate he had come out of prison, and full of hate and without one grain of belief in anything, he sat among the derelicts in the Mission, forced in by the storm.

And that night (knowing nothing of John Good) I was moved to tell the men how 'Abdu'l-Bahá came out of prison, full of love for the whole world, even His cruellest enemies.

After I had finished speaking, Dr Hallimond said: "We have heard from Juliet Thompson that 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be here in April. How many of you would like to invite Him to speak at the Mission? Will those who wish it please stand?"

The whole three hundred rose to their feet.

"Now," added Dr Hallimond, taking me by surprise, "how many would like to study the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians with Miss Thompson and myself?"

Thirty rose this time, including John Good and a poor alcoholic named Hannegan, a long, lanky, red-haired Irishman.

"Then we will meet every Wednesday at eight p.m. and learn something about this Love of which 'Abdu'l-Bahá is our Great Example."

And every Wednesday evening after that John Good and Hannegan came, with the twenty-eight others.

Of course, in order to help Dr Hallimond on these nights, I had had to confess to Mamma this first visit to the Bowery, and she was so touched by the story that she gladly consented to my keeping up the work, especially as Dr Hallimond always came for me and brought me home.

And now to return to the immediate present. Day before yesterday, 19 April, the Master spoke at the Bowery Mission.

I met Him in the chapel, dragging along with me the huge white bag of quarters. Edward also appeared with a bag of the same size and we sat behind the Master on the platform. Mr MacNutt, Mr Mills, Mr Grundy, and Mr Hutchinson, and of course all the Persians, were seated there too. The long hall was packed to the doors with those poor derelicts who sleep on park benches or doorsteps.

Dr Hallimond called upon me to introduce my Lord, which seemed so presumptuous I could scarcely do it.

Then the Master rose to speak. Here are His heavenly words:[102] "Tonight I am very happy for I have come here to meet My friends. I consider you my relatives, My companions, and I am your comrade.

"You must be thankful to God that you are poor, for His Holiness Jesus Christ has said: 'Blessed are the poor.' He never said: blessed are the rich! He said too that the Kingdom is for the poor and that it is easier for a camel to enter the needle's eye than for a rich man to enter God's Kingdom. Therefore you must be thankful to God that although in this world you are indigent, yet the treasures of God are within your reach, and although in the material realm you are poor, yet in the Kingdom of God you are precious.

"His Holiness Jesus Himself was poor. He did not belong to the rich. He passed His time in the desert travelling among the poor and lived upon the herbs of the field. He had no place to lay His head — no home. He was exposed in the open to heat, cold, and frost. Yet He chose this rather than riches. If riches were considered a glory, the Prophet Moses would have chosen them; Jesus would have been rich.

"When Jesus appeared it was the poor who first accepted Him, not the rich. Therefore, you are His disciples, you are His comrades, for outwardly He was poor, not rich.

"Even this earth's happiness does not depend upon wealth. You will find many of the wealthy exposed to dangers and troubled by difficulties, and in their last moments upon the bed of death, there remains the regret that they must be separated from that to which their hearts are so attached. They come into this world naked and they must go from it naked. All they possess they must leave behind and pass away solitary, alone. Often at the time of death their souls are filled with remorse and, worst of all, their hope in the mercy of God is less than ours.

"Praise be to God, our hope is in the mercy of God; and there is no doubt that the divine Compassion is bestowed upon the poor. His Holiness Jesus Christ said so; His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh said so.

"While Bahá'u'lláh was in Ba__gh__dád, still in possession of great wealth, He left all He had and went alone from the city, living two years among the poor. They were His comrades. He ate with them, slept with them, and gloried in being one of them. He chose for one of His names the title of 'The Poor One' and often in His Writings refers to Himself as 'Darvish,' which in Persian means poor. And of this title he was very proud. He admonished all that we must be the servants of the poor, helpers of the poor, remember the sorrows of the poor, associate with them, for thereby we may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven.

"God has not said that there are mansions prepared for us if we pass our time associating with the rich, but He has said there are many mansions prepared for the servants of the poor, for the poor are very dear to God. The mercies and bounties of God are with them. The rich are mostly negligent, inattentive, steeped in worldliness, depending upon their means, whereas the poor are dependent upon God and their reliance is upon Him, not upon themselves. Therefore the poor are nearer the Threshold of God and His Throne.

"Jesus was a poor man. One night when He was out in the fields the rain began to fall. He had no place to go for shelter, so He lifted His eyes toward Heaven, saying: 'O Father! For the birds of the air Thou hast created nests, for the sheep a fold, for the animals dens, for the fishes places of refuge, but for Me Thou hast provided no shelter; there is no place where I may lay My head. My bed is the cold ground, My lamps at night are the stars and My food is the grass of the field. Yet who upon earth is richer than I? For the greatest blessing Thou hast not given to the rich and mighty, but unto Me Thou hast given the poor. To Me Thou hast granted this blessing. They are Mine. Therefore I am the richest man on earth.'

“So, My comrades, you are following in the footsteps of Jesus Christ. Your lives are similar to His life, your attitude is like unto His, you resemble Him more than the rich resemble Him. Therefore we will thank God that we have been blest with the real riches. And, in conclusion, I ask you to accept ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as your Servant.”

After the service, the Master and we who were with Him walked down the aisle to the door, while the men in the audience kept their seats. At the end of the aisle the Master paused, called to Edward and me and asked us to stand on each side of Him, with our bags. He was wearing His pongee ‘aba and was very shining in white and ivory, His Face like a lighted lamp.

Then down the aisle streamed a sodden and grimy procession: three hundred men in single file. The “breadline”. The failures. Broken forms. Blurred faces. How can I picture such a scene? That forlorn host out of the depths, out of the “mud and scum of things” — where nevertheless “something always, always sings”. And the Eternal Christ, reflected in the Mirror of “The Servant”, receiving them all, like prodigal sons? stray sheep? No! Like His own beloved children, who “resembled Him more than the rich resembled Him.”

Into each palm, as the Master clasped it, He pressed His little gift of silver: just a symbol and the price of a bed. Not a man was shelterless that night. And many, many, I could see, found a shelter in His Heart. I could see it in the faces raised to His and in His Face bent to theirs.

Those interchanged looks — what a bounty to have witnessed them — to have such a picture stamped on my mind forever!

As the men filed toward Him, the Master held out His hand to the first, grasped the man’s hand and left something in it. Perhaps five or six quarters, for John Good told me afterward that the completely destitute ones received the most. The man glanced up surprised. His eyes met the Master’s look, which seemed to be plunging deep into his heart with fathomless understanding. He, this poor derelict, must have known very little of even human love or understanding; and now, too suddenly, he stood face to face with Divine Love. He looked startled, incredulous — as though he couldn’t believe what he saw; then his eyes strained toward the Master, something new burning in them, and the Master’s eyes answered with a great flash, revealing a more mysterious, a profounder love. A drowning man rescued, or — taken up into heaven? I saw this repeated scores of times. Some of the men shuffled past, accepting their gift ungraciously, but most of them responded just as the first did.

Who can tell the effect of those immortal glances on the lives and even, perhaps, at the death of each of these men?
Who knows what the Master gave that night?

- (Footnote. Months later John Good told me about Hannegan. Hannegan was a generous man. If he had a dime and somebody needed a nickel, he would split his dime. But, there was no doubt about it, he was also a Bowery tough and pretty nearly always drunk. He had been counting the days to the nineteenth of April but, unluckily lost count, and when the nineteenth came and with it the Master’s visit to the Bowery, he was in one of his stupors. Waking up from it, he really sorrowed. Still, there was another chance. The Master was to speak in Flatbush the following Sunday and somehow Hannegan heard of this. Flatbush is a long way off and that Sunday he hadn’t even a nickel. So he walked. At midnight John Good went to his room and found him in the usual state. “Why did you do it this time, Hannegan — and you straight from seeing the Master?” asked John. “That’s just it,” said Hannegan earnestly. “I’m straight from seeing Him. Why, John, He’s Perfection. The Light of the world, He is, John. It’s too much for a man, too discouraging.” * John never told me this till after the death of Hanegan, or I would have taken him to the Master. But, after all, he — this Bowery tough — had seen the Reality.)

That night the Master had a supper for all who had been with Him at the Mission. It was held in His suite at the Ansonia and He took me and two of the Persians, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án and Aḥmad, in His own taxi to the hotel.

As we drove up Broadway, glittering with its electric signs, He spoke of them smiling, apparently much amused. Then He told us that Bahá'u'lláh had loved light. "He could never get enough light. He taught us," the Master said, "to economize in everything else but to use light freely."

"It is marvellous," I said, "to be driving through all this light by the side of the Light of lights."

"This is nothing," the Master answered. "This is only the beginning. We will be together in all the worlds of God. You cannot realize here what that means. You cannot imagine it. You can form no conception here in this elemental world of what it is to be with Me in the Eternal Worlds."

"Oh," I cried, "with such a future before me how could my heart cling to any earthly object?"

The Master turned suddenly to me. "Will you do this thing?" He asked. "Will you take your heart from this other and give it wholly to God?"

"Oh, I will try!"

He laughed heartily at this. "First you say you will and then that you will try!"

"That is because I have learned my own weakness. What can I do with my heart?"

And now the Master spoke gravely. "I am very much pleased with that answer, Juliet."

That night I saw, as never before, the Glory of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Nine of us were gathered at His table. He sat at the head, Mr Mills on His left, I on His right. Just above Him hung a big round lamp, so that He sat in a pool of strong light while the rest of us were in shadow. In His ivory-coloured 'aba over the long white robe, His white hair spread out upon His shoulders, He was like some massive statue of a deity carved in alabaster.

For a while He was silent and we surrounded Him, silent. But after He had served the food He began to speak. He told us of the play The Terrible Meek which he had seen that afternoon. It is based on the Crucifixion.

"But such a representation should be complete," He said, and taken from its inception to its consummation. It should be an impersonation of the life of Jesus from the beginning to the end.

"For example: His baptism. The disciples of John the Baptist turning to Him, Jesus. The dawn of Christianity. Then the Christ in the Temple, well portrayed. The meeting of Jesus and Peter on the shore of Tiberias, where Jesus called Peter to follow Him that he might become a fisher of men. The gathering together of the Jews. Their accusations against Jesus.

For they said: 'We are expecting certain conditions at the time of the appearance of the Messiah and unless these conditions are fulfilled it is impossible to believe. It is written that He will come from an unknown place. Thou are from Nazareth. We know Thee and Thy people. According to the explicit text of the Scriptures, the Messiah is to wield a sceptre, a sword. Thou hast not even a staff. The Messiah is to be established on the throne of David. But Thou — a throne! Thou hast not so much as a mat. The Messiah is to fulfil the Law of Moses, which will be spread throughout the world. Thou hast broken the Mosaic Law. The Jews, in the time of the Messiah, are to be the conquerors of the world and all men will become their subjects. In the Cycle of the Messiah justice is to reign. It will be exercised even in the animal kingdom, so that wolf and lamb will quaff water at the same fountain, eagle and quail will dwell in the same nest, lion and deer pasture in the same meadow. But see the oppression and wrong rampant in Thy time! The Jews are the captives of the Romans. Rome has uprooted our foundations, pillaging and killing us. What manner of justice is this?

“But His Holiness Jesus answered: ‘These texts are symbolic. They have an inner meaning. I possess sovereignty, but it is of the eternal type. It is not an earthly empire. Mine is divine, heavenly, everlasting. And I conquer not by the sword. My conquests are by Love. I have a sword, but it is not of iron. My sword is My tongue, which divides Truth from falsehood.’

“Yet they persisted in rejecting Him. ‘These are mere interpretations,’ they said. ‘We will not give up the letter for these.’

“Then they rose against Him, accusing and persecuting Him, inventing libels according to their superstitions.

“‘He is a liar. He is the false Christ. Believe Him not. Beware lest ye listen. He will mislead you, will lure you from the religion of your fathers, and will create a turmoil amongst you.’

“Then the scribes and Pharisees consult together: ‘Let us hold a conclave and conceive a plan. This man is a deceiver. We must do something. What?’” (The Master gaily mimicked their confusion.) “‘Let us expel Him from the country. Let us imprison Him. Ah! Let us refer the matter to the government. Thus the religion of Moses shall be free of Him.’

“After this, the betrayal of Jesus, not by an enemy, not by an outsider, but by one of His own disciples. Dr Farid! (I was startled by the sudden, peremptory call of that name.) “By one of His own disciples. Had you been there, Dr Farid. Had you been there, you would have seen that Mary of Magdala even looked like Juliet.”[103]

“Then,” continued the Master, “the government will summon Jesus, will bring Him before Pontius Pilate, and these scenes should be fully portrayed ...”

Here I ceased to take notes. I was stabbed to the heart. As He flashed each scene to us with His vivid words and gestures I felt that He was reliving it. When He came to that walk to Golgotha: Jesus, the Saviour, stumbling beneath the weight of His Cross while the mob capered about, bowing backward, mocking “the King of the Jews,” I knew He was telling us of remembered anguish.

“And when all this is finished,” He said, “then the Terrible Meek will be expressed.”

The last scene centred around the disciples, united now and ablaze with the Pentecostal fire. The Master described them surrounded by multitudes, teaching with those “tongues of fire” that His Holiness Jesus had verily been a King — the King of spirits, His sword the Word of God and His reign in the hearts of men.

When the Master had ended we sat so silent that the falling of a rose leaf might have been heard. He broke the silence.

“The voice of Mary lamenting at the Cross today made me think of your voice, Juliet — and Lua’s.” And then He smiled at me. “Eat, Juliet,” He said. For the food on my plate was untouched.

In the upper hall, on our way to the Master's suite, we had met the little chambermaid who had told me the day before that she thought Him a great Saint. In my bag were about eighty quarters left over from the Mission. The Master asked the girl to hold up her apron, took the bag from me, and emptied the whole of its contents into the apron. Then He walked quickly toward His suite, we following, all but Mr Grundy whom the maid stopped.

"Oh see what He has given me!" she said. And when Mr Grundy told her about the Mission and the Master's kindness to the men there, "I will do the same with this money. I will give away every cent of it."

Later, when the table was cleared and we were sitting with the Master in another room, talking of the scene at the Mission, someone asked Him if "charity were advisable."

He laughed and, still laughing, said: "Assuredly, give to the poor. If you give them only words, when they put their hands into their pockets after you have gone, they will find themselves none the richer for you!"

And just at that moment we heard a light tap at the door. It opened and there stood the little maid. She came straight towards the Master, seeming not to see anyone else, and her eyes were full of tears.

"I wanted to say goodbye, Sir," she said (for the Master was leaving for Washington early the next morning), "and to thank You for all Your goodness to me — I never expected such goodness — and to ask You ... to pray for me." Her voice broke. She sobbed, hid her face in her apron and rushed from the room.

What an illustration to the Master's words, "assuredly give to the poor," and how wonderfully timed!

22 April 1912

Oh, those mornings at the Ansonia in the Master's white sunny rooms, filled with spring flowers and roses!

People poured in to see Him in droves, sometimes a hundred and fifty in one morning. He would become exhausted and receive the latest arrivals in bed. Sitting in the outer room (though frequently called to Him), I would watch them go into His bedroom and come out changed, as though they had had a bath of Life, or like candles that had been lighted in that inner chamber.

Leonard Abbott came out with flushed cheeks and bright eyes. "That beautiful head against the pillows!" he said.

Charles Rand Kennedy, the playwright (author of The Terrible Meek) said: "I was in the Presence of God."

I, myself, took Nancy Sholl in. When we left, she whispered to me: "I could not have stood the vibrations in there one moment longer. Power encircles that bed!"

---

Alas, New York has now lost the great overhanging aura of the Master. He is in Washington. But I am going there too, tomorrow, to stay with my dear Mrs Elkins.

Washington

7 May 1912

Washington was beautiful, the banners of the spring floating out everywhere. Trees along the street in full leaf. Flowering bushes and tulip beds in the parks and in the grass plots in front of houses. The Japanese cherry [Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in New York with His entourage, 1912] trees behind the White House, a long row of coral-pink clouds.

The day I arrived, 23 April, I met the Master at luncheon at the Persian Embassy, where ___Kh___án is now acting as minister.[104] The table was strewn with rose petals, as the Master's table always is in 'Akká, and Persian dishes were served.

A coloured man, Louis Gregory, was present and the Master gave a wonderful talk on race prejudice which, however, I will not quote here since it has been kept.[105] And besides, I am longing to catch up with these days, when I am feeling with all my capacity for feeling, when the gates of my heart are flung wide open and fire sweeping through, burning up my heart, when I am seeing through tears the Manifest Glory of the Beloved. I really don't want to write about Washington.

This heart was not awakened then.

But He said a lovely thing at ___Kh___án's table which I must keep. Mrs Parsons was at the luncheon. Before she became a Bahá'í she had been a Christian Scientist, and now she brought up the question of mental suggestion as a cure for physical disease. The Master replied that some illnesses, such as consumption and insanity, developed from spiritual causes — grief, for example — and that these could be healed by the spirit. But Mrs Parsons persisted. Could not extreme physical cases, like broken bones, also be healed by the spirit?

A large bowl of salad had been placed before the Master, Who sat at the head of the table, Florence ___Kh___ánum[106] on His right.

"If all the spirits in the air," He laughed, "were to congregate together, they could not create a salad! Nevertheless, the spirit of man is powerful. For the spirit of man can soar in the firmament of knowledge, can discover realities, can confer life, can receive the Divine Glad-Tidings. Is not this greater," and He laughed again, "than making a salad?"

One more lovely thing. The servants were late bringing in the dessert and Florence apologized; whereupon little Raḥím, standing beside her, spoke up.

"Raḥím dear," explained Florence, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is King of the whole world."

"Oh," said Raḥím, very much abashed, "I forgot."

---

After the luncheon, Florence and ___Kh___án held a large reception, to which a number of very distinguished people came, among them Diya Pá___sh___á, the Turkish Minister, and his whole family, Duke Lita and his wife, Admiral Peary, and Alexander Graham Bell.

Between the end of lunch and this reception the Master went upstairs to rest and to give a few private interviews. When He reappeared among us, the two living rooms were already crowded. He walked quickly to the open folding doors and standing there at the centre, with a strikingly free and simple bearing, immediately began to speak. His words too were simple and of a captivating sweetness, a startling clarity.

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the children of 'Alí Quli ___Kh___án]

Diya Pá___sh___á stood next to me, his eyes riveted on the Master. When the Master had finished speaking, the old diplomat (who is a fierce Muslim) turned to me. "This is irrefutable. This is pure logic," he said.

A few months before, at the request of his daughter-in-law, an American girl and a dear friend of mine, I had given Diya Pá__sh__á the Message. I had had to give it in French, as he doesn't understand English, and, my French being rusty by now, I'm afraid I didn't do it very well: he looked so sceptical, almost contemptuous the whole time I was speaking. But when I said that through the Bahá'í Teaching I had become a Muslim, and convinced him of this by the reverent way I spoke of Muḥammad, I really touched Diya Pá__sh__á. He rose from the table, where we were at lunch, left the room, and returned with a precious and very old volume of the Qur'án on illuminated parchment and with a hand-tooled cover.

"No Christian eye but yours," he said, "has ever looked upon this."

---

To return to the Persian Embassy. A delicious thing happened when the Master greeted Peary, who has just succeeded in publicly disgracing Captain Cook and proving himself, and not Captain Cook, the discoverer of the North Pole. At that moment, in the Embassy, he looked like a blown-up balloon.

I was standing beside the Master when __Kh__án brought the Admiral over and introduced him.

The Master spoke charmingly to him and congratulated him on his discovery. Then, with the utmost sweetness, added these surprising words: For a very long time the world had been much concerned about the North Pole, where it was and what was to be found there. Now he, Admiral Peary, had discovered it and that nothing was to be found there; and so, in forever relieving the public mind, he had rendered a great service.

I shall never forget Peary's nonplussed face. The balloon collapsed!

Immediately after the __Kh__án's reception, Mrs Parsons too had a large one for the Master, to which Diya Pá__sh__á came with Him. I saw them, to my great delight, enter the hall together hand in hand.

Mrs Parsons house has real distinction. It is Georgian in style and in it has a very long white ballroom with, at one end, an unusually high mantel — the mantel, as well as the ceiling and panelled walls, delicately carved with garlands. At the windows hang thin silk curtains the colour of jonquil leaves.

Here, after this first reception, the Master spoke daily in the afternoon and the whole fashionable world flocked to hear Him. Scientists too, and even politicians came!

In front of the mantel, a platform had been placed for the Master and every day it was banked with fresh roses, American Beauties.

Into this room of conventional elegance, packed with conventional people, imagine the Master striding with His free step: walking first to one of the many windows and, while He looked out into the light, talking with His matchless ease to the people. Turning from the window, striding back and forth with a step so vibrant it shook you. Piercing our souls with those strange eyes, uplifting them, glory streaming upon them. Talking, talking, moving to and fro incessantly. Pushing back His turban, revealing that Christ-like forehead; pushing it forward again almost down to His eyebrows, which gave Him a peculiar majesty. Charging, filling the room with magnetic currents, with a mysterious energy. Once He burst in, a child on His shoulder. For a moment He held her, caressing her. Then He sat her down among the roses.

On Thursday, 25 April, the Master dined at the Turkish Embassy and I was privileged to be there.

Never have I seen such a beautiful table. Hundreds of roses lay the whole length of it, piled, melting into each other, sweeping up from the head and the foot of the table to a great mound in the centre, where the Master sat, faced by Diya Pá__sh__á. Florence __Kh__ánum and Carey, Madame Diya Bey (Diya Pá__sh__á's daughter-in-law), the American wives of Oriental diplomats, were placed on either side of the Master and I sat next to Carey.

There are times when the Master looks colossal, when His Holiness shines like the sun. That night He wore the usual white, with a honey-coloured 'aba. Diya Pá__sh__á, opposite Him, watched Him with eyes full of tears, his keen old hawk's face strangely softened.

The Master gave a great address on the civilizations built on the basic Teachings of the Prophets; then He spoke of this dinner as "a wonderful occasion". "The East and the West," He said, "are met in perfect love tonight." There was something so poignant in His words, so flame-creating, that for a moment I was overcome.

Later He spoke of the deep significance of the international marriages represented there: Diya Bey's and Carey's, 'Alí-Quli __Kh__án's and Florence's. Carey made me very happy by saying: "Juliet told me long ago of Your Teachings, when I was only fifteen years old." What fruit that seed had borne, sown in a child!

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the Persian Consul-general for New York and his household, Morristown, New Jersey.]

Diya Pá__sh__á made a thrilling speech. Rising and turning a lover's face to the Master, he called Him "the Light of the world, the Unique One of the age, Who had come to spread His glory and perfection amongst us."

"I am not worthy of this," said the Master, very simply. Always a great power is released from the Master's divine humility.

As I bade Diya Pá__sh__á goodnight, looking at me through a mist of tears, he said: "Truly, He is a Saint."

---

One day Mrs Elkins invited the Master to drive with us and we went to the Soldiers' Home. The Elkinses, because of Katharine's engagement to the Duke of the Abruzzi, have been terribly hounded by the newspapers, but this happened before the Master came. He couldn't have known about it through any outward means. Yet no sooner were we seated in the car than He said to Mrs Elkins: "How the newspapers here persecute one!"

It was such a sympathetic subject! At once Mrs Elkins opened her heart.

"Come away!" smiled the Master. "Elude these journalists! Come to Haifa where there is peace. Juliet will tell you there is peace in Haifa."

Then He spoke of how much I loved her and of her philanthropic deeds, which He prayed might increase. He captured her hand and kept it in His, while she hastily hid the sweet gesture under her cape.

"Nothing endures, Mrs Elkins," He said. "Nothing but the Love of God endures. Look at these trees in full blossom now." And in words which I will not try to repeat He described the turning of the seasons: the trees in summer flourishing green leaves; the inevitable autumn with the leaves lying, yellow, on the ground.

"This," He said, "is a symbol of human life."

“Remember Babylon.” He drew a vivid picture of ancient Babylon, its towers, its stupendous art; then of Babylon today: a waste of rubble, “the hyena prowling among its crumbled stones.” No other sign of life but the “voice of the owl by night” or “a lark singing at daybreak.” “Remember Tyre. Here too was beauty and splendour and pomp. Think of Tyre now. I have been there. I have seen.”

He spoke of my mother that day: “Juliet’s mother is very good. Her heart is very pure. As soon as we met, her face became radiant.”

When we reached home, Mrs Elkins said to me: “You can’t hide a thing from Him. He sees everything that is in your heart.”

The day Mrs Elkins first met the Master she mentioned her husband, the senator,[107] who died about a year ago. “I wish he were here now,” she said, “to meet You.”

“Insha’llah,” replied the Master, “for his good deeds I shall meet him in the Kingdom of God.”

One of the senator’s good deeds had been to protect the Bahá’ís in ‘Akká and Haifa while the Master was being tried for His life in 1907.

---

I was so thankful to be in Washington. At those daily meetings in Mrs Parsons’ house I would see many of my old friends, friends of my childhood. Mrs Elkins went with me every day to the meetings: sometimes, when all the chairs were taken, standing the whole afternoon, although she was far from well.

One day, however, she was not with me. That night she was giving a small dinner and an opera party and she had to rest for this. So, being free for an hour or so, I decided to stay at Mrs Parsons’ and have a little visit with Edna.

While Edna and I were talking, the Master suddenly entered the room. “I am going out for a drive,” He said, “but wait till I return, Edna, and you too, Juliet, wait. I will see you in a short time.”

So I waited — waited and waited. Half-past six came. Seven. We were to dine at half-past seven and the Elkinses’ house was a long way off, rather indirect on the car-line.

“Go, Juliet,” urged Edna. “I will explain.”

But how could I? My Lord had told me to stay.

And now I shall have to digress and tell what may seem, just at first, another story: When I was ten years old, (and I remember the time because that year we were living with my grandmother) a very presumptuous idea took possession of me. I began to dream of some day painting the Christ. I even prayed that I might. “O God,” I would pray, “You know Christ didn’t look like a woman, the way all the pictures of Him look. Please let me paint Him when I grow up as the King of Men.” And I never lost hope of this till I saw the Master. Then I knew that no one could paint the Christ. Could the sun with the whole universe full of its radiations, or endless flashes of lightning be captured in paint?

Imagine my surprise and dismay, fear, joy and gratitude all mixed together, at the news given me by Mrs Gibbons when the Master first came to New York. The night before He landed she had received a Tablet in which He said: “On My arrival in America Miss Juliet Thompson shall paint a wonderful portrait of Me.” This was in response to a supplication from Mrs Gibbons asking that her daughter might paint Him, which she never did, though the Master graciously gave her permission, even more graciously adding those words about me.

It was a little after seven when the Master came back from His drive. Entering the room in which He had left me and where of course I was still waiting, He said: "Ah, Juliet! For your sake I returned. Mrs Hemmick[108] wanted to keep Me, but I had asked you to wait; therefore I returned." After a pause He added: "Would you like to come up and paint Me tomorrow?"

So I learned the reward of obedience. Such a reward for so small an act of obedience! Once in Haifa He said to me: "Keep My words, obey My commands and you will marvel at the results."

And, by a miracle, I wasn't late for dinner! The dinner, because of another guest, had been postponed a half hour.

The next morning I went very early to Mrs Parsons' house, taking my box of pastels; but though it was only eight o'clock, quite a crowd had already gathered and I felt that the morning was doomed to be a broken one. Not only that, but the light in the rooms upstairs, where I was supposed to paint, is very weak, and the delicate wallpaper, with tiny bunches of flowers all over it, I couldn't use as a background for His head. For a while I was in despair, for I dared not make the suggestion I had in mind. But in the end I did. Begging Him to forgive me if I were doing something wrong, I asked if He would pose in New York instead. To this he consented so freely and sweetly that I had no more qualms about it.

The following day I went to Mrs Parsons' to meet Lee McClung, the Treasurer of the United States. Lee McClung had been one of the idols of my early adolescence. He had seemed quite old to me then, though now he is only thirty-eight.

When I saw him again last winter for the first time in about ten years, he had made all sorts of fun of me for my "conversion to Bahá'ísm". "It made me laugh out of one eye and cry out of the other," he said. "What does your mother think about it? Have you converted her?"

But at Mrs Parsons' first meeting, to my great surprise, there he was in the audience! I couldn't wait to speak to him or to present him to the Master as Mrs Elkins was in a hurry that day, but in the evening he dined with us.

"How did you feel when you saw the Master?" I asked him.

A shy look came into his face, and Mr McClung is anything but shy. "Well, I felt as though I were in the presence of one of the great old Prophets: Elijah, Isaiah, Moses. No, it was more than that! Christ ... no, now I have it. He seemed to me my Divine Father."

Then he said he must leave us a little early, as he was going to Mr Bell's — Alexander Graham Bell's — to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá there.

Later I was told that the Master had made an address at Mr Bell's; then others were called on to speak. But when Lee McClung was called on he said: "After 'Abdu'l-Bahá has spoken, I cannot."

At Mr McClung's request, I had made an appointment for him with the Master for a private interview and this was the reason I was here to meet him at Mrs Parsons'. I arrived a little ahead of time and while I was waiting for Mr McClung, a door in the hall opened and there stood the Master, beckoning to me. He was alone, so we had to fall back on His English and my scant Persian.

"How is your mother?" He asked first. "How old is she?"

But I couldn't tell Him, Mamma having always concealed her age till I think even she doesn't know it now.

"About fifty?"

"I think so."

"How old are you?"

I confessed my age.

"In My eyes you are fifteen," He replied, so sweetly.

"In our eyes I am an infant?"

"Yes. Baby!"

Then the translator arrived.

"Tell Juliet," the Master began at once, "that she teaches well. I have met many people who have been affected by you, Juliet. You are not eloquent, you are not fluent, but your heart teaches. You speak with a feeling, an emotion which makes people ask: 'What is this she has?' Then they inquire; they seek and find. It is so too with Lua. You never find Lua speaking with dry eyes! You will be confirmed. A great bounty will descend upon you. You will become eloquent. Your tongue will be loosed. Teach, always teach. The confirmations of the Holy Spirit descend upon those who teach constantly. Never feel fear. The Holy Spirit will give you the words to say. Never fear You will grow stronger and stronger."

That erect head, that hand held high in command, the Power that eddied from Him as He spoke those words, how can I ever feel fear again when I have to mount the dreaded platform?

It was later that He said to me: "You have many friends. You have no enemies. Everybody is your friend. Do not think I am ignorant of conditions in New York. Both factions are pleased with you, Juliet, and have nothing but good to say of you, although they complain of others. Miss X is pleased with you! Mrs XX is pleased with you!" (laughing as He mentioned the two chief disturbers of the peace). "And you have accomplished this only through your sincerity. Others may do this through diplomatic action, but you have done it with your heart."

- (Footnote. I am destroying my diary in longhand and I can't bear to lose any of the Master's words to me, those dear words of encouragement. That is why I keep them.) *

Just then Lee McClung arrived and the Master took him upstairs.[109]

New York

11 May 1912

On Saturday, 11 May, just one month from the day of His landing, the Master returned to New York from Washington, Cleveland, and Chicago.

A few of us gathered in His rooms to prepare them for Him and fill them with flowers; then to wait for His arrival: May Maxwell, Lua Getsinger, Carrie Kinney, Kate Ives, Grace Robarts, and I. Mr Mills and Mr Woodcock were waiting too.

The Master has a new home, in the Hudson Apartment House,[110] overlooking the river. His flat is on one of the top stories, so that its windows frame the sky. Now the windows were all open and a fresh breeze blew in.

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá with children and Persian entourage.]

About five o'clock He came. Oh the coming of that Presence! If only I could convey to the future the mighty commotion of it! The hearts almost suffocate with joy, the eyes burn with tears at the stir of that step! It is futile to try to express it. Sometimes when the sun breaks through clouds and spreads a great fiery glow, I get something of that feeling.

After greeting us all the Master took a seat by the window and began to talk to us, with supreme love and gladness, wittily, tenderly, eloquently, carrying us up as if on wings to the apex of sublime feeling, so that we wept; then turning our tears to sudden little ripples of laughter as an unexpected gleam of wit flashed out; then melting our hearts with His yearning affection.

He had been horrified in Washington by the prejudice against the Negroes. "What does it matter," He asked, "if the skin of a man is black, white, yellow, pink, or green? In this respect the animals show more intelligence than man. Black sheep and white sheep, white doves and blue do not quarrel because of difference of colour."

Lua, May, and I, for the first time together in the Glory of His Presence, sat on the floor in a corner, gazing through tears at Him and whenever we could wrench our eyes from the sorrowful beauty of His face, silhouetted against the sky, gazing at one another, still through tears.

Day after day I was with Him there. Lua and I had permission to be always with Him. I would go to His apartment in the early morning and stay through the whole day and again and again He would call me to His Presence.

"My Lord," I said once, "I really shouldn't take Your time. I don't want to take Your time. I am only too thankful to be here, serving at a distance, somewhere in Your atmosphere."

"I know you are content with whatever I do, therefore I send for you, Juliet," He replied.

13 May 1912

On the thirteenth of May (Percy Grant's birthday) a meeting of the Peace Conference took place at the Hotel Astor. It was an enormous meeting with thousands present. The Master was the Guest of Honour and the first speaker, Dr Grant and Rabbi Wise the other speakers.

The Master sat at the centre on the high stage, Dr Grant on His right, Rabbi Wise on His left. Oh, the symbolism of that: the Jewish rabbi, the Christian clergyman, with the Centre of the Covenant between, on the platform of the World Peace Conference.[111]

The Master was really too ill to have gone to this Conference. He had been in bed all morning, suffering from complete exhaustion, and had a high temperature. I was with Him all morning. While I was sitting beside Him I asked: "Must You go to the Hotel Astor when You are so ill?"

"I work by the confirmations of the Holy Spirit," He answered. "I do not work by hygienic laws. If I did," He laughed, "I would get nothing done."

After that meeting, the wonderful record of which has been kept, the Master shook hands with the whole audience, with every one of those thousands of people!

14 May 1912

On Friday, the fourteenth of May, I had quite a distinguished visitor, ___Kh___án Bahadur Alláh-Bakhsh, the Governor of Lahore. Mr Barakatu'llah had sent him to see me. I invited him to my meeting that night and he came and seemed to fall in love with the Teachings. The next morning early he called on the Master at the Hudson Apartment House. Lua, May, and I were there at the time and I told him that May was one of my spiritual mothers and Lua my spiritual grandmother. Whereupon the old gentleman said that in that case I was his mother, May Maxwell his grandmother, and Lua his great-grandmother!

Very soon the Master sent for him and kept him a long time in His room. When the interview was over and ___Kh___án Bahadur Alláh-Bakhsh had left, the Master called me to Him.

"You teach well, Juliet," He said. "You teach with ecstasy. You ignite the souls. A great bounty will descend upon you. I have perfect confidence in you as a teacher. Your heart is pure, absolutely pure."

My heart absolutely pure! I wept.

Then, for the second time, the Master gave me a picture of Himself.

Three days later I had a note from the Governor of Lahore. In it he said: "'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Divine Light of today."

---

One night I took Marjorie to the Master. She had in her hand an offering of tulips, grown in her own garden, and these He distributed among His visitors.

"Juliet's love for you is divine," He said, speaking to Marjorie, "and your love for each other must become so great that no stab will affect it." Then He told us that, in reality, our friendship was an "eternal" one.

Marion deKay went with me to Him.

"Your friend, Juliet? Ancient friend?" and He smiled at the child. "You must become a flame of love." ("Like Juliet," He said. I have to keep all His sweet words to me.) "You must become as steadfast as a rock, firm! strong! so that when the storms break over you, when the thunder roars and the winds rage, you will not be shaken. You must become a teacher, a speaker."

On the fifteenth of May the Master went away for a few days. As soon as He returned Lua telephoned me. "The Master says: come up now if you wish. If not, you have permission to come to Him at any time and to stay as long as you are able. Only, don't displease your mother. He wants her to be happy, He says. This is His message, Julie."

19 May 1912

On Sunday, 19 May, He spoke at the Church of the Divine Paternity.[112] This was unbearably beautiful. The church is Byzantine, making me think of the worship of the early Christians. The interior is of grey stone.

Oh the look of His that day! Then, more vividly than ever, He shone as the Good Shepherd, returned at last to His flocks. I wept through the whole service. At the end of the pew in front of me sat Lua, her eyes fixed on the master, rapt, adoring, her beauty immeasurably heightened by that recognition, that adoration.

Soon I caught a glimpse of another rapt face — a man's — my old friend, Mr Bailey's. Mr Bailey is the last person I could have hoped to see there. A very old gentleman, he had always seemed to me a hopelessly unconvertible atheist. At least he would never listen to a word from me about the Cause. And now, here he sat, and never have I seen a face more touched. His eyes were wistful, like a child's, shyly reverent and as limpid as though there were tears in them.

He met me that afternoon at the Master's apartment, making his entrance with these words: "I have been thinking since this morning that the way to the attainment of greatness is through elimination.

"You felt," I ventured, "'Abdu'l-Bahá's simplicity?

"One would naturally feel," — huffily — "the simplicity of Niagara."

"And the beauty of His Face?"

"The patriarchal grandeur of His face cannot be denied."

Later, how his eyes hung on that Face while the Master talked with him!

21 May 1912

On 21 May, Mrs Tatum[113] had a reception for the Master. The people who were there were of the fashionable world, with a sprinkling of artists and writers. Mrs Sheridan was pouring tea.

Mrs Tatum's house is beautiful. The impression you get is of space and light. A white staircase winds up through a very wide hall, from which, on each side, rooms open — living rooms, dining room, library. All these were soon crowded.

The first friend I caught sight of was Louis Potter.[114] He came running up to me, exclaiming: "Oh august Juliet!" and attached himself at once to Lua and me. Suddenly, there was a stir among the people, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in our midst. He walked over to a yellow couch which curved along the bay half-moon of the bay window and sat down on it.

I think I must tell you how He looked there. His surroundings were all white and yellow. Sunlight streamed in. The shadows on His face were transparent; His profile, against the blue sky through the polished glass of the windowpane, outlined in light.

"Come, Louis," I said to Louis Potter, "let's go to the Master."

Louis had never seen Him before, but he skipped forward like a buoyant faun, his head tipped to one side, his hands outstretched.

"Ah-h-h!" he said. It was a little cry from his soul, as though he were just coming home, and was so glad.

And the Master too said: "Ah-h-h!" His arms wide open, welcoming Louis home.

Percy Grant arrived. As soon as he appeared, big and imposing, in the room, the Master rose almost eagerly, smiling and holding out His hand.

"Ah! Dr Grant!" He said.

They stood for what seemed to me minutes, their hands clasped, Percy, with beautiful deference, bowing his head, a gentle, almost tender look on his face. One of the Persians translated the Master's greeting to him but spoke so low that I could not catch the words. Then Percy sat down on the curving window seat so that he faced the Master.

Soon there was another stir in the room. A small, rather plain middle-aged woman with the most astonishing eyes — very clear, very violet — stood in the doorway, almost timidly, and the Master at once sent Dr Farid to her to ask her to come and sit by Him. This was Sarah Graham Mulhall.

He spoke a few words to her and she rose and went out, returning after some time with a tray and a pot of tea and two cups on it. The tray was placed on a stool between the Master and Miss Mulhall and they drank their tea together.

(Footnote. 1947. Miss Mulhall's father and brother, who were physicians, had come to New York from England to study the effects of drugs on the body and mind. Both died mysteriously. Miss Mulhall's only training had been in music. She was a very gentle, retiring woman and knew nothing of the ways of business or organization or medicine, or anything that would have equipped her for the evidently dangerous work of her father and brother. But something inside her, against which she fought, urged her to continue it. She was in the midst of this inward conflict when Mrs Tatum telephoned her and asked her to come to meet the Master. At first Miss Mulhall declined, saying that she really couldn't go anywhere, she was too absorbed in her own problems, she couldn't face a crowd of people. But later she thought: Perhaps 'Abdu'l-Bahá is a Prophet, as Mrs Tatum believes,[115] and He might help me in making my decision.

The Master, when He called her to Him in Mrs Tatum's house, asked if she would do something for Him. Would she brew some tea for Him with her own hands and drink it with Him? And while they drank tea and talked, He Himself brought up her problem.

He told her she must do the work she had in mind; she would rise very high in it and become "a great Counsellor"; God would always protect her and all the Celestial Beings of the Supreme Concourse would rally to her assistance.

She did become a Great Counsellor. After years of wonderful work, Governor Smith, Al Smith, made her Adviser and First Commissioner of Narcotics for New York State. One night she herself led a raid against one of the chief centres of the drug ring — a ring of very rich, prominent men, some of them "pillars" of St. Patrick's, some "pillars" of St. John's Cathedral. Rounding them up in their centre, an apartment on Park Avenue, she, with the help of her squad of police, locked them in; then telephoned to the governor. He took the next train to New York and upheld Miss Mulhall's determination to bring them all to trial. Then he went to Cardinal Hayes and Bishop Manning. Cardinal Hayes said: "These men are the worst type of criminals. I agree with you that they must be punished." Bishop Manning said: "You can't touch my parishioners. They are the builders of St. John's Cathedral." He threatened Miss Mulhall. "If you ruin them, I will destroy your office." Which he did, ultimately, for of course every one of the men was found guilty and sent to Fort Leavenworth. After Lehman was elected Governor, the Narcotics Commission was abolished. But in the meantime Miss Mulhall had done a tremendous work. Her book, Opium, the Demon Flower, has become world famous.)

---

Then I caught sight of little “Fergie”. His real name I don’t want to mention because of what I am going to tell. He is a noted newspaper man who writes visionary books on economics. Percy Grant calls him “my prophet”. His face is pale and pinched and suffering and he wears a thick chestnut wig. I went up to him and asked: “Wouldn’t you like to meet the Master?” “I think not,” he drawled, “I really have nothing to say to Him.”

And now the Master began to speak to the whole roomful of people.

For years He had been imprisoned in a fortress, His associates criminals. Now He found Himself in spacious homes, “associating,” He said, “with you.”

His talk gradually shaped itself to some definite point, which, however, He kept for the very end. I wondered what could be coming. When it came it was like a thunderclap.

“Think of it,” He said. “Two kings were dethroned in order that I might be freed. This is naught but pure destiny.”

I glanced at Percy Grant and saw that he was deeply stirred. He had been listening, still with that tender deference, his head slightly tipped to one side, but at these last startling words of the Master’s, in a flash the placidity of his face broke up, something burned through and his eyes sparked.

“And now,” ended the Master, suddenly rising to His feet, strong and incredibly majestic, “you here in America must work with Me for the peace of the world and the oneness of mankind.”

And with this He left us, the room seeming strangely empty after He had gone.

The next morning early Howard MacNutt came to see me, looking so radiant that I knew he was bringing good news. Then he told me. He had just had breakfast with Dr Grant, and the Master was to speak again at the Church of the Ascension — at the People’s Forum this time, the night of 2 June. Bishop Burch had severely reprimanded Percy for inviting the Master to speak on 14 April and for seating Him in the Bishop’s chair! But an idiotic thing like that would never stop Percy Grant — only make him more defiant.

He had talked very freely with Mr MacNutt about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and His address of the day before with its great climax. “As I listened,” he said, “I realized profoundly that this was a historic moment; that before me sat One Who, imprisoned for the sake of humankind, had been freed by the Power of God alone, through the dethroning of two kings.”

Return to New York

On 22 May the Master left for Boston, returning the twenty-sixth. After His return He stayed with the Kinneys a day or so (till He moved to His new house), and then came my test! For two days He never even looked at me. My heart bled and burned. I could not endure the withdrawal of His nearness. The third day I went to the new house — 309 West Seventy-Eighth Street — and there, in Lua’s arms, I sobbed my heart out.

“I cry,” I said, “only because I love Him,” (which I fear was not exactly true) “because I have just realized how terrifically I love Him. This love burns my heart. It is beyond endurance.”

Then He sent for me to come to Him.

---

With tears rolling down my cheeks I entered His Presence. He was sitting on a couch writing and did not look up — still didn't look at me! But at last He said, going straight to the point, piercing to the real cause of my trouble: "I have not seen you lately, Juliet, because of the multitude of the affairs. But I have not forgotten My promise to pose for you. Come on Saturday with your materials and I will sit."

I thanked Him; then falling on my knees, begged Him not to banish me from His Presence. I could not endure to be separated from Him. I loved, loved Him.

He rose, stood above me, took my hand and held it a long, long time. I still knelt at His feet, the hem of His garment pressed to my lips.

Lua joined her sweet voice to mine.

"Julie has had so much trouble this year. She wants to stay close to You now so that her heart may be healed."

"I want to stay close because I love You!"

He smiled and said something about another love.

"That is gone. Gone," I cried.

At these words of mine which I thought were true, the strangest thing happened. Always when the Master holds my hand I feel a flow of sparks from His palm to mine. Now this current of Life was suddenly cut off. Could I have lied to my Lord, and so, by unconscious self-deception, disconnected myself from the Fountainhead of pure Truth?

But His answer was merciful, reminding me of past sincerities. "I am pleased with you, Juliet. You are so truthful. You tell me everything. She said:" (He turned, laughing, to Lua) "This is my heart. What can I do with it?"

I laughed too, through my tears. But soon I began to cry again.

He went back to the couch and sat down and Lua and I followed Him and knelt together at His feet there.

"Don't cry!" (I wish the whole world could hear the Master say "don't cry". Tears would soon cease to be.) "Don't cry! Unhappiness and the love of Bahá'u'lláh cannot exist in the same heart, for the love of Bahá'u'lláh is happiness."

"I cry for love of you, my Lord. My tears come from my heart. I can't help it."

"Your eyes and Lua's" — and He laughed again — "are two rivers of tears." "I love Juliet," He added, "for her truthfulness."

"I told Juliet," said Lua, putting her arms around me, as we still knelt together side by side, "of Your words to Mrs Kaufman: that these human loves were like waves of the sea rolling to the shore one behind the other, each wave receding."

"Balih," (yes) said the Master, "this is true. You will not find faithfulness in humanity. All humanity is unfaithful. Only God is faithful. Bahá'u'lláh spent fifty years in prison for the sake of humanity. There was faithfulness!"

“From this moment,” cried Lua, “Juliet and I dedicate our lives to Thee and we beg to at last die in Thy Path — to drink the cup of martyrdom. Oh, it would be so good for the Cause if two Americans could do this! Take hold of His coat, Julie, and beseech.”

I touched the hem of His garment.

“Say yes,” implored Lua. “Oh Julie, beg Him to say yes.”

But in Thonon I had told the Master that I would not ask for that cup again but would wait till God found me ready for it.

“I accept the dedication of your lives now. The rest will be decided later.”

And it was clear what He meant. How we must amuse Him!

---

I must go back a little. On Sunday, 26 May, the night of the Master’s return from Boston, He spoke at Mr Ramsdell’s (Baptist) church.[116]

My friend, Lawrence White, who lives in Utica, had come to New York to met the Master, and he, Silvia Gannett, and I went together to the church.

We entered, to see a breathtaking picture: That church suggests an old Jewish synagogue. Behind the chancel is a sweeping arch from which hangs a dark, massive curtain in folds straight as organ pipes. The chancel was empty that night except for the Master, sitting — almost lying — in a semicircular chair, His head thrown back, His luminous eyes uprolled. The sleeves of His bronze-coloured ‘aba branched out from His shoulders like great spread wings, hiding His hands, so that I was conscious only of His head and those terribly alive eyes. There was an awful mystery about that dominance of the head. It seemed to obliterate the human form and reveal Him as the Face of God. The curtain behind Him might have concealed the Ark of the Covenant, which He, THE COVENANT, was guarding.

Later, when He rose to speak, the Manifestation of the Glory was entirely different. He diffused a softer radiance.

“Look at Him and see the Christ,” whispered Lawrence White.

---

Next, He spoke at the Church of the Open Door. Again the Shepherd. Again I watched Him through blinding tears.

2 June 1912

On the second of June He spoke for Dr Grant’s Forum.[117] And there He was simpler; He manifested less, or perhaps I should say manifested something different: a sort of brotherhood to the masses, still retaining His grandeur. And how He addressed Himself to that meeting and to the heart of Percy Grant!

The subject was: “What can the Orient bring to the Occident?”

That subject in that church!

Lua and I were in a front pew with Valiyu’llah __Kh__án and Mírzá Maḥmúd. Suddenly I was petrified to see Mason Remey coming in, through the door of the vestry-room. When he was last in the Church of the Ascension I was sitting beside him, engaged to him, while Percy thundered at me from the pulpit. The text of the sermon that Sunday was the same as the text today: "What can the Orient bring to the Occident." "Nothing but disease and death," said Percy, his eyes on me, "and God wants us to live; He wants us to live."

But the Speaker this time was the Master. He said: "The Orient brings to the Occident the Manifestations of God."

Then He defined the Church as that Collective Centre which, attracting many diverse elements, united them into one ordered system, adding that the Church was but a reflection of the real Collective Centre, the Shepherd, Who, whenever His sheep became scattered, reappeared to unite them. So the Church, established by God's Manifestation, was the Law of God, and when Christ said to Peter, "On thee will I build My Church," He meant He would build His Law upon Peter.

Upon him Christ built the Law of God by which all peoples and creeds were afterward unified.

The Master had said it again to Percy Grant: "Be thou like Peter," for this was His message sent by me last summer.

When, at the end of the marvellous address, Percy stepped out into the chancel, it was another man I saw: a man touched by the Hand of God, shaken to the very roots of his being. As Marjorie said, he looked ill and strangely upset. He could scarcely articulate.

The questions followed; it is the custom of the Forum to ask questions. In the centre of the chancel sat the Master, Dr Grant on His right in a choir stall, Dr Farid behind Him. How at home the Master looked there! He pushed back His turban and smiled as He answered, often very wittily. Once He raised one finger high. I caught my breath then. He was like Jesus in the synagogue confronting the scribes and Pharisees, except that His audience weren't Pharisees.

5 June 1912

The Master has begun to pose for me. He had said: "Can you paint Me in a half hour?"

"A half hour, my Lord?" I stammered, appalled. I can never finish a head in less than two weeks.

"Well, I will give you three half hours. You mustn't waste My time, Juliet."

He told me to come to Him Saturday morning, 1 June, at seven-thirty.

I went in a panic. He was waiting for me in the entrance hall, a small space in the English basement where the light — not much of it — comes from the south. In fact I found myself faced with every kind of handicap. I always paint standing, but now I was obliged to sit, jammed so close to the window (because of the lack of distance between the Master and me) that I couldn't even lean back. No light. No room. And I had brought a canvas for a life-size head.

The Master was seated in a dark corner, His black 'aba melting into the background; and again I saw Him as the Face of God, and quailed. How could I paint the Face of God?

"I want you," He said, "to paint My Servitude to God."

"Oh my Lord," I cried, "only the Holy Spirit could paint Your Servitude to God. No human hand could do it. Pray for me, or I am lost. I implore You, inspire me."

"I will pray," He answered, "and as you are doing this only for the sake of God, you will be inspired."

And then an amazing thing happened. All fear fell away from me and it was as though Someone Else saw through my eyes, worked through my hand.

All the points, all the planes in that matchless Face were so clear to me that my hand couldn't put them down quickly enough, couldn't keep pace with the clarity of my vision. I painted in ecstasy, free as I had never been before.

At the end of the half hour the foundation of the head was perfect.

On Monday again I went to the Master at seven-thirty. As I got off the bus at Seventy-Eighth Street and Riverside Drive I saw Him at the centre of a little group standing beside that strip of park that drops low to the river — the part we love to call "His garden", a forever hallowed spot to us, for there we sometimes walk with Him in the evenings, there He takes His daily exercise, or escapes from the house to rest and pray.

The people who were with Him this morning were Nancy Sholl and Ruth Berkeley, Mr MacNutt and Mr Mills, and, as I hurried to join them, I saw that the Master was anointing them from a vial of attar of rose.

Oh the heavenly perfume, the pale, early-morning sunshine and the Master, all in white glistening in it (no one else takes the sunlight as He does: He is like a polished mirror to the sun), the ecstatic, intoxicating love with which He rubbed our foreheads with His strong fingers dripping with that essence of a hundred roses!

Soon we saw Miss Buckton crossing the street toward us, bringing with her a tall young man with a remarkable face, very pure and serene, which seemed somehow familiar to me. The Master abruptly left us and met the two in the middle of the Drive. Then I saw Him open His arms wide and clasp the young man to His breast.

We all followed the Master to His house, where the young man was introduced to me, and then I knew why his face had seemed familiar. He was Walter Hempden. I had seen him in the theatre. I was in the audience, he on the stage playing the part of "the Servant" in The Servant in the House: Christ. And he played it so intensely, with such spiritual fervour, that I prayed with all my heart, there in the audience, that he might some day meet the real "Servant!"<sup>118</sup>

12 June 1912

Yesterday morning I went up early to the Master's house, that house whose door is open at seven-thirty and kept wide open till midnight.

He had been away and I had not seen Him for three days. I had brought my pastels, thinking He might sit for me, but I found Him looking utterly spent. He was in the English basement, Ruth Berkeley and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án with Him, lying back against the sofa cushions. But, in spite of His weariness, He looked up with brilliant eyes.

"What do you want of Us, Juliet?" He smiled.

I had hid my pastels. "Only to be near You."

"You must excuse Me from sitting for you today. I am not able today."

"I knew that, my Lord, as soon as I came in."

Then He talked to Ruth and me. He told us we were as babes nursing at the Divine Breast. "But babes," He said, "grow daily through the mother's milk."

I could not help but weep, for His was the Divine Breast.

Soon He went out alone to "the garden", leaving Ruth, Valiyu'llah __Kh__ân, and me together.

"It is wonderful," Ruth said as He went, "to see how the world is quickened today in all directions."

"And to know," I said, "that the Voice that is quickening it is the same tender Voice that spoke to us just now." And I wept again, for something about the Master that morning had utterly melted me.

Later He came back. The English basement was crowded by then and He talked for a long while to the people. But this I could see was pure sacrifice. His vitality seemed gone. At times He could scarcely bring forth the words, yet He gave and gave. When He had finished He hurriedly left the house and went again to "His garden".

On the way to the bus I met Him returning alone. He stopped me, put out His hand and took mine, with indescribable tenderness smiling at me. In the handclasp, the look, even in the tilt of the head was a Love so poignant as to give me pain.

"Come tomorrow and paint, Juliet," He said.

He appeared refreshed — better — but remembering His utter depletion of the morning I couldn't help answering, "If You are well." Then I thought I would speak in Persian to amuse Him, but instead of saying, "If Your health is good," I made a mistake and said, "Agar Shuma khub ast," (If You are good.) whereupon I was covered with confusion. I must have amused Him!

How stupidly we speak to Him! Imagine saying "if" to Him. That was even worse than my break in Persian.

That night there was a meeting at the Kinneys', one of those deadly "Board meetings", but the Master came to it.

Striding up and down like a king, He spoke to us. In these meetings, He said, we should be in connection with the Supreme Concourse. Between the Supreme Concourse and us there should be telegraphic communication, one end of the wire in the breast of each one here and the other in that Concourse on high, so that all we might say or do would be inspired.

Today (12 June) I went up early to His house, but not early enough. As I turned into Seventy-Eighth Street from West End Avenue I saw Him a block away, hastening toward "His garden", His robes floating out as He walked.

Soon He came back to us. Miss Buckton had arrived by that time and a poor little waif of a girl, a Jewess. She was all in black and her small pale face was very careworn.

I had been in the kitchen with Lua. When I heard the voice of the Master I hurried into the hall, and there I saw them sitting at the window, the poor sad little girl at the Master's right, Alice Buckton at His left. Like a God, He dominated the scene. Sunlight streamed through the window, His white robes and turban shining in it, the strong carving of His Face thrown into high relief by masses of shadow.

The little Jewish girl was crying.

"Don't grieve now, don't grieve," He said. He was very, very still and I think He was calming her.

"But my brother has been in prison for three years, and it wasn't just to put him in prison. It wasn't his fault, what he did. He was weak and other people led him. He has to serve four more years. My father and mother are always depressed. My brother-in-law has just died, and he was the one who supported us. Now we haven't even that."

"You must trust in God," said the Master.

"But the more I trust the worse things become!" she sobbed.

"You have never trusted."

"But my mother is all the time reading psalms. She doesn't deserve to have God abandon her. I read the psalms myself, the ninety-first psalm and the twenty-third psalm, every night before I go to bed. I pray too."

"To pray is not to read psalms. To pray is to trust in God and to be submissive in all things to Him. Be submissive; then things will change for you. Put your parents and your brother in God's hands. Love God's Will. Strong ships are not conquered by the sea, they ride the waves! Now be a strong ship, not a battered one."

At noon I took Percy Grant to the Master. The Master had inquired for him and sent him a message by me, and Percy had responded instantly by himself suggesting this visit. But the Master was out when we reached the house and while we were waiting for Him I mentioned a very interesting thing He had said to Gifford Pinchot:[119] that the people were rising wave upon wave, like a great tide, and the capitalists, unless they realized this soon, would be driven out with violence; also, that in the future the labourer would not work on a wage basis but for an interest in the concern.

Just then Lua appeared at the door of the room opposite, went to the stairway and, with her beautiful reverence, leaned across the rail to look down.

"He is coming, Lua?"

"Yes, Julie, He is coming!"

He entered the room with both hands extended and in a voice like a chime from His heart, said: "Oh-h, Dr Grant! Dr Grant!"

Then I slipped out.

When I returned at the Master's call, He was signing a photograph for Percy and writing a prayer on it. "And now," he said, presenting it, "you must give Me your photograph. I want your face. I have given you Mine. Now you must give Me yours."

"I will pray for you," He added as He bade Percy goodbye. "I will mention you daily in My prayers."

The Master detained me for a moment. As I rejoined Percy in the car, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___ân was just going into the house.

“Do you see that handsome, distinguished-looking young man?” I said. “That is Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án, a descendant of two generations of martyrs and the brother of one very young martyr. His grandfather, Sulaymán ___Kh___án, was a disciple of the Báb. He was Governor of Fars and a great prince, but that didn’t save him. He suffered the most ghastly kind of martyrdom and with such ecstasy that he is one of the best beloved of the Bábí martyrs.

“Just a few years ago Valiyu’llah’s father, Varqá ___Kh___án, and his little brother, [Rúḥu’lláh] Varqá, went on a pilgrimage to ‘Akká and had a wonderful visit with the Master. But on their way home they were both arrested and thrown into prison. Then one day some brutal men came into their cell, one with an axe. Varqá ___Kh___án was hacked into pieces alive, and the poor little boy forced to look on at that butchery. When it was over, one of the executioners turned to the child. I think I will tell the rest in Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án’s own language, just as he told it to me.

“The man said to my brother: ‘If you will deny Bahá’u’lláh, we will take you to the court of the ___Sh___áh and honours and riches will be heaped upon you.’ But my brother answered: ‘I do not want such things.’ Then the man said to him: ‘If you refuse to deny, we will kill you worse than your father.’ ‘You may kill me a thousand times worse,’ my brother said. ‘Is my life of more value than my father’s? To die for Bahá’u’lláh is my supreme desire.’ ‘This so angered the executioners that they fell upon Varqá and choked him to death.’ Varqá was only twelve years old.

“A day or two ago,” I went on, “Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án asked me, ‘How is the Master’s portrait progressing?’ and he added that, in a portrait, he thought ‘one must paint the soul.’ ‘But who can paint the soul of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I asked. And I wish you could have seen the fire in his eyes as he drew himself up and said: ‘We can paint it with our blood!’”

13 June 1912

The next day, 13 June, as usual I went very early to the Master’s house — so early that no one was there — I mean, no visitors. Some of the Persians of course were with Him: Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án, Aḥmad and Mírzá ‘Alí-Akbar. I found them in the lower hall, the English basement. The Master was sitting in the big chair by the window. He called me to a seat opposite, then began to speak, smiling.

“Juliet is absolutely truthful. For this I love her very much. She conceals nothing from me.”

“It would be useless, my Lord,” I said, “to try to conceal anything from You. I could hide nothing.”

“That is true,” said the Master, raising one hand. “Nothing; nothing.”

Soon He rose. “Stay here,” He told me, and went out with Aḥmad.

By the time He returned a crowd had gathered. He gave a few private interviews upstairs, then came down and, sitting by the window, talked to all the people. I think the strongest image in my mind is and will always be the holy figure of the Master sitting in the rays of the sun at that window.

The meeting over, a few of us went upstairs to say a healing prayer for Mrs Hinkle-Smith, but just before Lua began to chant, the Master looked in at the door and called: “Juliet,” and I happily deserted Mrs Hinkle-Smith.

“Bring your things in here and paint,” He said, pointing to the library.

Oh, these sittings: so wonderful, yet so humanly difficult! We move from room to room, from one kind of light to another. The Master has given me three half hours, each time in a different room, and each time people come in and watch me.

But the miraculous thing is that nothing makes any difference. The minute I begin to work the same rapture takes possession of me. Someone Else looks through my eyes and sees clearly; Someone Else works through my hand with a sort of furious precision.

On this thirteenth of June, after Lua had chanted the prayer for Mrs Hinkle-Smith, she and May came into the library, crossed over to where I was sitting and stood behind me.

The Master looked up and smiled at May. "You have a kind heart, Mrs Maxwell." Then He turned to Lua. "You, Lua, have a tender heart. And what kind of heart have you, Juliet?" He laughed. "What kind of a heart have you?"

"Oh, what kind of heart have I? You know, my Lord. I don't know."

"An emotional heart." He laughed again and rolled His hands one round the other in a sort of tempestuous gesture. "You will have a boiling heart, Juliet. Now," He continued, "if these three hearts were united into one heart — kind, tender and emotional — what a great heart that would be!"

14 June 1912

The next morning, Thursday, though I went unusually early to the Master, He had already left the house. But Lua, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, and I had a wonderful morning. Valiyu'llah told us so many things.

"My father," he said, "spent much time with the Blessed Beauty. The Blessed Beauty Himself taught him.

"One time when my father was in His room, Bahá'u'lláh rose and strode back and forth till the very walls seemed to shake. And He told my father that once in an age the Mighty God sent a Soul to earth endowed with the power of the Great Ether, and that such a Soul had all power and was able to do anything. 'Even this walk of Mine' said Bahá'u'lláh, 'has an effect in the world.'

"Then He said that His Holiness Jesus Christ had also come with the power of the Great Ether, but the haughty priesthood of His day thought of Him as a poor, unlettered youth and believed that if they should crucify Him, His Teachings would soon be forgotten. Therefore they did crucify Him. But because His Holiness Jesus possessed the power of the Great Ether, He could not remain underground. This ethereal power rose and conquered the whole earth. 'And now,' the Blessed Beauty said, 'look to the Master, for this same Power is His.'

"Bahá'u'lláh," added Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, "taught my father much about Áqá. Áqá (the Master, you know) is one of the titles of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Greatest Branch is another, and the Greatest Mystery of God another. By all these we call Him in Persian. The Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, revealed the Station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to my father. And my father wrote many poems to the Master, though the Master would scold him and say: 'You must not write such things to Me.' But the heart of my father could not keep quiet. This is one poem he wrote:

'O Dawning-Point of the Beauty of God, I know Thee! Though Thou shroudest Thyself in a thousand veils, I know Thee! Though Thou shouldst assume the tatters of a beggar, still would I know Thee!'

---

In the late afternoon I returned with my mother. The Master received us in His own room, which was full of roses and lilies and carnations.

“Ah-h! Mrs Thompson. Marḥabá! Marḥabá!” (Welcome! Welcome!)

The intonation of that “Marḥabá” can never be described. It is a welcome from a heart which is a channel for God’s heart.

He was very playful with Mamma. “Are you pleased with Juliet? Pleased now, Mrs Thompson? The next time you have to complain of her, come and complain to Me and I will beat her!”

15 June 1912

On Friday, 15 June, I was with the Master alone for a while, and I brought up the name of Percy Grant. “He didn’t understand You the other day, my Lord. He thinks that You teach asceticism, that the spirit and the flesh are two separate things.”

“That is not what I said,” the Master replied. “I said that the spiritual man and the materialist were two different beings. The spirit is in the flesh.”

5 July 1912

The Beloved Master’s portrait is finished. He sat for me six times, but I really did it in the three half hours He had promised me; for the sixth time, when He posed in His own room on the top floor, I didn’t put on a single stroke. I was looking at the portrait wondering what I could find to do, when He suddenly rose from his chair and said: “It is finished.” The fifth time He sat, Miss Souley-Campbell came in with a drawing she had done from a photograph to ask if He would sign it for her and if she might add a few touches from life. This meant that He had to change His pose, so of course I couldn’t paint that day. And the fourth time (the nineteenth of June) — who could have painted then?

I had just begun to work, Lua in the room sitting on a couch nearby, when the Master smiled at me; then turning to Lua said in Persian: “This makes me sleepy. What shall I do?”

[Photograph: Portrait of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá painted by Juliet Thompson, 1912.]

“Tell the Master, Lua, that if He would like to take a nap, I can work while He sleeps.”

But I found that I could not. What I saw then was too sacred, too formidable. He sat still as a statue, His eyes closed, infinite peace on that chiselled face, a God-like calm and grandeur in His erect head.

Suddenly, with a great flash like lightning He opened His eyes and the room seemed to rock like a ship in a storm with the Power released. The Master was blazing. “The veils of glory”, “the thousand veils”, had shrivelled away in that Flame and we were exposed to the Glory itself.

Lua and I sat shaking and sobbing.

Then He spoke to Lua. I caught the words, “Munadiy-i ‘Ahd.” (Herald of the Covenant.

Lua started forward, her hand to her breast.

"Man?" (I?) she exclaimed.

"Call one of the Persians. You must understand this."

Never shall I forget that moment, the flashing eyes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá the reverberations of His Voice, the Power that still rocked the room. God of lightning and thunder! I thought.

"I appoint you, Lua, the Herald of the Covenant. And I AM THE COVENANT, appointed by Bahá'u'lláh. And no one can refute His Word. This is the Testament of Bahá'u'lláh. You will find it in the Holy Book of Aqdas. Go forth and proclaim, 'This is THE COVENANT OF GOD in your midst.'"

A great joy had lifted Lua up. Her eyes were full of light. She looked like a winged angel. "Oh recreate me," she cried, "that I may do this work for Thee!"

By now I was sobbing uncontrollably.

"Julie too," said Lua, not even in such a moment forgetful of me, "wants to be recreated."

But the Master had shrouded Himself with His veils again, the "thousand veils". He sat before us now in His dear humanity: very, very human, very simple.

"Don't cry, Juliet," He said. "This is no time for tears. Through tears you cannot see to paint."

I tried hard to hold back my tears and to work, but painting that day was at an end for me.

The Master smiled lovingly.

"Juliet is one of My favourites because she speaks the truth to me. See how I love the truth, Juliet. You spoke one word of truth to Me and see how I have praised it!"

I looked up to smile in answer, and in gratitude, then was overwhelmed again by that awful convulsive sobbing.

At this the Master began to laugh and, as He laughed and laughed, the strangest thing happened. It was as if at each outburst He wrapped Himself in more veils, so that now He looked completely human, without a trace left of His superhuman majesty. Never had I seen Him like this before and I never did afterward.

"I am going to tell you something funny," He said, adding in English, "a joke".

"Oh tell it!" we begged; and now I was in a sort of hysteria, laughing and crying at the same time.

"No. Not now. Paint."

But of course I couldn't paint.

Later, walking up and down, He laughed again.

"I am thinking of My joke," He explained.

"Tell it!" we pleaded.

"No, I cannot, for every time I try to tell it I laugh so I cannot speak."

We got down on our knees, able at last to enter into His play, and begged Him, "Please, please tell us." We were laughing on our knees.

"No. Not now. After lunch."

But, alas, after lunch He went upstairs to His room, and we never heard the Master's joke.

Perhaps, there wasn't any joke. Perhaps He had just found it necessary, after that mighty Declaration, to bring us down to earth again. He had revealed to us "The Apex of Immortality." He had lifted us to a height from which we could see it. Now He, our loving Shepherd, had carried us in His own arms back to our little valley and put us where we belonged.

In the early morning of 19 June, before the Master had called me to paint Him, He had spoken to the people in the English basement. On His way down the stairs from His room He passed Lua and me, where we stood in the third-floor hall. We saw, and felt, as He walked down the upper flight, a peculiar power in His step — as though some terrific Force had possession of Him; a Force too strong to be caged in the body, sparking through, almost escaping His body, able to sunder it. I cannot begin to describe that indomitable step, its fearful majesty, or the strange flashing of His eyes. The sublime language of the Old Testament, words such as these: "Who is this that cometh from Bozrah ... that treadeth the wine-press in His fury?" faintly express what I saw as I watched the Master descending those stairs. Unsmiling, He passes Lua and me. Then He looked back, still unsmiling.

"Juliet is one of My favourites," He said.

In the afternoon of that same day He sent Lua down to the waiting people to "proclaim the Covenant"; then a little later followed her and spoke Himself on the station of the Centre of the Covenant, but not as He had done to Lua and me. The blazing Reality of it He had revealed in His own Person to us. To them He spoke guardedly, even deleting afterwards from our notes some of the things He had said.

Still later that afternoon the Master had promised to sit for a photograph. I had made the appointment myself with Mrs Kasebier, a very wonderful photographer, to bring the Master to her studio, but some people prevented His getting off in time. When they left, He sent for me.

"I am ashamed," He said (while I nearly died at that word "ashamed" from Him), "but I will go tomorrow. I had planned to leave for Montclair tomorrow but I will stay until Friday for your sake."

"I can't bear, my Lord," I said, "to have You delay Your trip to the country for this."

"No, I wish it," He answered.

"I have a confession to make, my Lord," I said. "I have been to Dr Grant's house. It happened in this way: he asked if I would be the bearer of his photograph to You and would I stop at the Rectory for it on my way up to You. Then he invited me to come to breakfast. That invitation I declined, but I could think of no excuse for refusing to stop for the picture. So I did go. But I stayed only five or ten minutes and his mother was with us all the time."

“Good, good,” said the Master. “Going to his house was not good, but since you have confessed it, Juliet, I am very much pleased. When I look into your heart,” He added, smiling, “I find it just like that mirror — it is so pure.”

(Oh, please understand me, when I repeat such things it is only because they are His words to me. I keep them just to remind myself of something potential He sees in me which I must grow up to. I am not reminding myself of His praise, for it really isn't praise but stimulation. If He had been blaming me, I would repeat His blame too.

He then spoke of my teaching. “Your breath is effective,” He said. “You are now in the Kingdom of Abhá with Me, as I wished you to be.”

20 June 1912

The next day, 20 June, we went to Mrs Kasebier's — Lua, Mrs Hinkle-Smith, and I — in the car with the Master.

I shall never forget the Master's beauty in the strange cold light of her studio, a green, underwater sort of light, in which He looked shining and chiselled, like the statue of a god. But the pictures are dark shadows of Him.

21 June 1912

On 21 June, the Master left for Montclair to stay nine days. I was with Him all day till He went. I had lunched with Him nearly every day that week. Lua, Mrs Hinkle-Smith, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, and I bade Him goodbye on the steps of His house. Montclair

23 June 1912

It had nearly killed Lua not to be taken to Montclair with Him. Two days later she said to me: “Let's go to see Him, Julie.”

“How can we, Lua? He didn't invite us,” I answered. “He bade us goodbye for nine days.”

“Oh but you have an excuse, those proofs of Mrs Kasebier's pictures. You really should show them to Him, Julie.”

And she whirled Georgie Ralston and me off to Montclair with her.

We were punished of course, and our first punishment was that lunch was unusually late (so that instead of arriving after, as we had planned, we arrived just in time for it). And this was agonizing, for there weren't enough seats at the table, and the Master wouldn't sit down to eat. One of us had to occupy His chair, while He Himself waited on us, carrying all the courses around and around that table. I couldn't get over my mortification.

At the end He came in with the fruit, a glass bowl full of golden peaches. Without turning His head — His face was set straight before Him — He sent a piercing glance from the corner of His eye toward Lua and me. Such a majestic, stern glance, like a sword-thrust.

After lunch, and this was our second punishment, He banished the three of us — Georgie, Lua, and me — leading us to a small back porch and abandoning us there. But before very long He returned and asked us to take a walk with Him.

We came back from our walk by way of the front porch. Some people were gathered there and Lua, Georgie, and I sat down with them while the Master went upstairs to rest. He joined us, however, very soon and, striding up and down, began to talk to us. As He walked His Power shook us; His intoxicating exhilaration, pouring into me, filled me up with new life.

His eyes — those eyes of light, which seem to be always looking into heaven and when for an instant they glance toward earth, veer away at once, back to heaven — were brilliantly restless. His whole Being was restless with the same strange Force I had felt on that memorable day, the nineteenth of June. It was as though the lightning of His Spirit could scarcely endure to be harnessed to the body. He was almost out of the body. But soon He took a seat and rested quietly.

I showed Him the proofs of the pictures, then spoke of Mrs Kasebier — who had seen Him only once, when she photographed Him. “She said she would like to live near You, my Lord.”

He laughed. “She doesn’t want to live near Me. She only wants a good time!” Then He grew serious. “To live near Me,” He said, “one must have My aims and objects. Do you remember the rich young man who wanted to live near Christ, and when he learned what it cost to live near Him — that it meant to give away all his possessions and take up a cross and follow Christ — then,” the Master laughed, “he fled away!”[120]

“Among the disciples of the Báb,” He continued, “were two: His amanuensis and a firm believer. On the eve of the Báb’s martyrdom the firm believer prayed: ‘Oh let me die with You!’ The amanuensis said: ‘What shall I do?’

“‘What shall I do?’” mocked the Master. “‘What do you want me to do?’ The disciple died with the Báb, his head on the breast of the Báb, and their bodies were mingled in death. The other died in prison anyway, but think of the difference in their stations!

“There was another martyr,” continued the Master after a moment, “Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh of __Sh__íráz.” Then He told us that Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh had been in the Presence of Bahá’u’lláh only once, “but he so loved the Blessed Beauty” that he could not resist following Him to Tíhrán, though Bahá’u’lláh had commanded him to remain in __Sh__íráz with his old parents. “Still,” said the Master, His tone exultant, “he followed!”

Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh reached Tíhrán in the midst of that bloodiest of massacres resulting from the attempt on the __Sh__áh’s life by two fanatical Bábís. Bahá’u’lláh had been cast into a dungeon. There, in that foul cellar He sat, weighted down by “The Devil’s Chain”, eleven disciples sitting with Him, bound by the same chain. In it were set iron collars which were fastened around the neck by iron pins. Every day a disciple was slaughtered and none knew when his turn would come.

The first intimation he had of his immediate death was when the jailer took out the iron pin from his collar

Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh entered Tíhrán and inquired of the guard at the gate “where Bahá’u’lláh resided.” “We will take you to Him,” said the guard. And some men took ‘Abdu’lláh to the dungeon and chained him to Bahá’u’lláh.

“So,” the Master said, “he found his Beloved again!”

One day the jailer came into the dungeon and took out the pin from Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh’s collar.

“Then,” said the Master, “Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh stepped joyfully forward. First, he kissed the feet of the Blessed Beauty, and then ...”

The Master's whole aspect suddenly changed. It was as though the spirit of the martyr had entered into Him. With that God-like head erect, snapping His fingers high in the air, beating out a drum-like rhythm with His foot till we could hardly endure the vibrations set up, He triumphantly sang "The Martyr's Song".

"I have come again, I have come again,

By way of __Sh__íráz I have come again!

With the wine cup in My hand!

Such is the madness of Love!"

"And thus," ended 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "singing and dancing he went to his death, and a hundred executioners fell on him! And later his parents came to Bahá'u'lláh, praising God that their son had given his life in the Path of God."

This was what the Cause meant then. This was what it meant to "live near Him"! Another realm opened to me, the realm of Divine Tragedy.

The Master sank back into His chair. Tears swelled in my eyes, blurring everything. When they cleared I saw a still stranger look on His face. His eyes were unmistakably fixed on the Invisible. They were filled with delight and as brilliant as jewels. A smile of exultation played on His lips. So low that it sounded like an echo He hummed the Martyr's Song.

"See," He exclaimed, "the effect that the death of a martyr has in the world. It has changed My condition." After a moment's silence, He asked: "What is it, Juliet, you are pondering so deeply?"

"I was thinking, my Lord, of the look on Your face when You said Your condition had been changed. And that I had seen a flash of the joy of God when someone dies happily for His Cause."

"There was one name," the Master answered, "that always brought joy to the face of Bahá'u'lláh. His expression would change at the mention of it. That name was Mary of Magdala."

West Englewood

29 June 1912

Almost a week passed before we saw our Lord again. Then, on the twenty-ninth of June, we met Him at West Englewood. He was giving a feast for all the believers in the grounds around Roy Wilhelm's house, the "Feast of Unity" He called it.

I went with dear Silvia Gannett. We walked from the little station, past the grove where the tables were set — a grove of tall pine trees — and on to the house in which He was, He Whose Presence filled our eyes with light and without Whom our days had been very dim and lifeless.

Ah, there He was again! Sitting in a corner of the porch! I sped across the lawn, forgetting Silvia, forgetting everything. He looked down at me with grave eyes, and I saw a fathomless welcome in them.

For a while we sat with Him on the porch. Then He led us down into the grove. There He seated Himself on the ground at the foot of a pine tree and called two believers to His right and left. One was Mrs Krug in her very elegant clothes, the other a poor and shabby old woman. But both faces, the wrinkled one and the smooth, pretty one, were beautiful with the same radiance. I shall never forget that old woman's shining blue eyes.

The great words He spoke to us then have been preserved.[121] I will not repeat them. Besides I remember them too imperfectly. But He said one thing which woke my whole being: "This is a New Day; a New Hour."

By the time He had finished, the feast was ready, but just as it was announced a storm blew up — a strange, sudden storm, without warning. There was a tremendous crash of thunder; through the treetops we could see black clouds boiling up, and big drops of rain splashed on the tables.

The Master rose calmly and, followed by the Persians, walked out to the road, then to the end of it where there is a crossroad. A single chair had been left there and, as I watched from a distance, I saw the Master take it and sit down, while the Persians ranged themselves behind Him. I saw Him lift His face to the sky. He had gone a long way from the house; thunder still crashed and the clouds rolled frighteningly low, but He continued to sit perfectly motionless, that sacred, powerful face upturned to the sky. Then came a strong, rushing wind; the clouds began to race away; blue patches appeared above and the sun shone out. And then the Master rose and walked back into the grove. This I witnessed.

Later, as we sat at the tables, two hundred and fifty of us, He anointed us all with attar of rose. I was not at a table but sitting under a tree with Marjorie Morten and Silvia. The Master swept toward us in His long white robes, forever the Divine Shepherd.

"Friends here?" He smiled, "Friends?"

In His voice was a thrilling joy. With a look that shook my heart, so full was it with the musk of His Love, He rubbed my face hard with the attar of rose

He passed among all the tables with His little vial of perfume (which Grace Robarts swears was almost as full at the end as in the beginning) anointing the forehead of every one there, touching and caressing all our blind faces with His tingling fingers.

Then He disappeared for hours.

Lua, too, went off alone, an exceedingly naughty purpose in her mind. The Master had just told her that she must leave very soon for California. So now she deliberately walked in poison ivy, walked back and forth and back and forth till her feet were thoroughly poisoned. "Now, Julie," she said (when the deed was done) "He can't send me to California."

---

To me the most beautiful scene of all came later, when the Master returned to us after dark. About fifty or sixty people had lingered, unable to tear themselves from Him. The Master sat in a chair on the top step of the porch, some of us surrounding Him — dear guilty Lua with her poisoned feet, May, Silvia, Marjorie, and I and a young coloured man, Neval Thomas. Below us, all over the lawn, on each side of the path, sat the others, the light summer skirts of the women spread out on the grass, tapers in their hands (to keep off mosquitoes). In the dark, in their filmy dresses, they looked like great moths and the burning tips of the tapers they waved like fireflies darting about.

Then the Master spoke again to us. I was standing behind Him, close to Him, and before He began He turned and gave me a long, profound look. His talk of that night has been recorded. It was a resounding Call to us to arise from the tomb of self in this Day of the Great Resurrection and unite around Him to vivify the world.

Before He had finished He rose from His chair and started down the path still talking, passing between the dim figures on the grass with their lighted tapers, talking till He reached the road, where He turned and we could no longer see Him. Even then His words floated back to us — the liquid Persian, 'Alí Qulí __Kh__án's beautiful, quivering translation, like the sound of a violin string.

"Peace be with you," this was the last we heard, "I will pray for you."

Oh that Voice that came back out of His invisibility when He had passed beyond our sight. May I always remember, and hear the Voice. New York

30 June 1912

That night our Beloved Lord returned to New York. The next morning early I flew up to see Him, but He sent me at once to Lua, who was staying with Georgie Ralston in a hotel nearby.

She was in bed, her feet terribly swollen from the poison ivy.

"Look at me, Julie," she said. "Look at my feet. Oh, please go right back to the Master and tell Him about them and say: 'How can Lua travel now?'"

I did it, returned to the Master's house, found Him in His room and put Lua's question to Him. He laughed, then crossed the room to a table on which stood a bowl of fruit, and, selecting an apple and a pomegranate, gave them to me.

"Take these to Lua," He said. "Tell her to eat them and she will be cured. Spend the day with her, Juliet."

Oh precious Lua — strange mixture of disobedience and obedience — and all from love! I shall never forget her, seizing first the apple, then the pomegranate and gravely chewing them all the way through till not even a pomegranate seed was left: thoroughly eating her cure, which was certain to send her to California.

In the late afternoon we were happily surprised by a visit from the Master Himself. He drew back the sheet and looked at Lua's feet, which by that time were beautifully slim. Then He burst out laughing.

"See," He said, "I have cured Lua with an apple and a pomegranate."

But Lua revolted again. There was one more thing she could try, and she tried it. The Master had asked me to paint her portrait and I had already had one sitting. The following day, at the Master's house, she drew me aside.

"Please, Julie, do something else for me. Go to the Master, now, and say: 'If Lua is in California, how can I paint her?'"

I went straight to His room with Valiyu'llah __Kh__án to translate. "My Lord," I said, "You have commanded me to paint Lua. If she is in California and I here, how can I do it? The portrait is begun; how can I finish it?"

Again the Master burst out laughing, for this of course was too transparent.

"In a year," He said, "Lua will join Me in Egypt. She will stay in New York a few days on her way to Me and you can paint her then, Juliet."

So poor Lua had to go to California. There was no way out for her.[122]

4 July 1912

On the fourth of July, yesterday, Mamma had her birthday dinner with the Master. He was so sweet to her. When we first arrived we found Him in the English basement and He led Mamma to the sofa and, with that wonderful freedom of His, drew her down beside Him.

Carrie Kinney, Georgie Ralston, and I were sitting across the room by the window and I'm afraid we did look solemn, for we sat in a row, perfectly silent.

"Look at them!" said Mamma, laughing. "They are jealous of me!"

"Then we will make them more jealous!" and the Master seized Mamma's hand and drew her still closer, at which she looked really scared!

Now I felt compelled to speak. "Three years ago, my Lord, on the fourth of July, Carrie, and I were with You in 'Akká and You took us to the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. I never expected to keep that anniversary with You in New York."

At the table the Master joked with Mamma because she was eating so little. "I perceive that you are an angel, Mrs Thompson. Angels do not eat."

"The Master sees I am not an angel," I laughed, "for I eat every morsel He puts on my plate."

"I perceive that you are a very clever girl. Mrs Thompson," He continued, "is going home to a luscious supper and saving her appetite for that."

Passing me a dish with three very shrivelled dates on it, He said: "Here, Juliet, are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

And I ate them up!

A little later Mamma said, looking at the Master with her sweet shyness: "You are very kind to me."

"God knows the degrees of it," He sighed deeply.

---

While we sat with Him after dinner, He spoke of tests. "Even the sword," He said, "is no test to the Persian believers. They are given a chance to recant; they cry out instead: 'Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!' Then the sword is raised," — He shot up His arm as though brandishing a sword — "they cry out all the more 'Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!' But some of the people here are tested if I don't say 'How do you do?'"

12 July 1912

I have almost no time to write these days, as I spend most of them with the Beloved Master and when I try to write after dinner, my darling little mother stops me too soon. Her room is at right angles with mine and at ten o'clock she calls through her window: "Put out your light, baby." But there are three or four lovely things that I must tell.

On Monday, 9 July, the Master invited me, with the Persians to go to the Natural History Museum. It was a broiling afternoon and I couldn't imagine why He should want to go to that Museum, and in the hottest part of the day. But wherever He went, there I wanted to be.

When we reached the Ninth Avenue corner of the Museum the Master, exhausted by that time, sank to a low stone ledge to rest. Between us and the main door on the Central Park corner stretched a long cross-town block in glaring sun, not a single tree on the sidewalk.

"My Lord," I said, "let me try to find a nearer entrance for You." And I hurried along the grass, keeping close to the building, searching the basement for a door. The employees' entrance was locked. Just beyond stood a sign: "No Thoroughfare." I was rushing past this when a shrill whistle stopped me, and I turned to face the watchman of the grounds. He was a little bent old Jew with a very kind face

"Oh excuse me," I said, "for breaking the rules, but I must find a nearer door than the main one. See Who is sitting on that ledge! I must find it for Him."

The watchman turned and looked at the Master, looked and looked, at that Figure from the East, from the Past — the Days of the Old Testament — and his eyes became very soft. "Is He a Jew?" he asked.

"A descendant of Abraham."

"Come with me," said the watchman. "Ask Him to come with me."

I went over and spoke to the Master and He rose and followed with the Persians, I dropping back to walk with them. There was not a nearer entrance, but the watchman, taking a risk perhaps, led us across the grass, where at least it was cooler and the way shorter.

In the Museum we passed through a room in which a huge whale hung from the ceiling. The Master looked up at it, laughed and said: "He could hold seventy Jonahs!"

Then He took us straight to the Mexican exhibit, and this seemed to interest Him very much. In the great elaborately carved glyphs standing around the room He found traces of Persian art and pointed them out to me. He told us this sculpture resembled very closely the ancient sculpture of Egypt. "Only," He said, "this is better." Then He took me over to the cases where He showed me purely Persian bracelets.

"I have heard a tradition," I said, "that in the very distant past this country and Asia were connected."

"Assuredly," answered the Master, "before a great catastrophe there was such a connection between Asia and America."

After looking at everything in the Mexican rooms, He led us to the front door and out into the grounds again. Then, stepping from the stone walk to the grass, He seated Himself beneath a young birch tree, His back to us, while we stood behind Him on the flags. He sat there a long time, silent. Was He waiting for someone? I wondered.

While He — waited? — the old Jewish watchman stole quietly up to me from the direction of the Museum.

"Is He tired?" he whispered. "Who is He? He looks like such a great man."

"He is 'Abdu'l-Bahá of Persia," I said, "and He has been a great Sufferer because of His work for the real Brotherhood of Man, the uniting of all the races and nations."

"I should like to speak to Him," said the Jew. And I took him over to the tree under which the Master still sat with His back to us.

At the sound of our footsteps He turned and looked up at the watchman, His brilliant eyes full of sweetness. "Come and sit by Me," He said.

"Thank You, Sir, but I am not allowed."

"Is it against the rules for Me to sit on the grass?"

The old man's eyes, softly shining, were fixed on the Master. "No, You may sit there all day!"

But the Master rose and stood beneath the tree.

Such pictures as I see when the Master is in them could never be put upon canvas — not even into words, except by the sublimest poet — but I always want to try at least to leave a trace of their beauty. The Master, luminous in the sunlight, His white robe flowing to the grass, standing beside the white slender trunk of the birch tree, with its leafy canopy over His head. The Jew standing opposite Him — so bent, so old — his eyes, like a lover's, humbly raised to the face of his own Messiah! As yet unrecognized, his Messiah, yet his heart worshiped.

Eagerly he went on, offering all he could think of to this Mysterious One Who had touched him so deeply.

"You didn't see the whole of the Museum. Would You like to go back after You have rested? You didn't go up to the third floor." (Unseen by us he must have been following all the time.) "The fossils and the birds are up there. Wouldn't You like to see the birds?"

The Master answered very gently, smiling.

"I am tired of travelling and looking at the things of this world. I want to go above and travel and see in the spiritual worlds. What do you think about that?" He asked suddenly, beaming on the old watchman.

The watchman looked puzzled and scratched his head.

"Which would you rather possess," continued the Master, "the material or the spiritual world?"

Still the old man pondered. At last he brought forth: "Well, I guess the material. You know you have that, anyway."

"But you do not lose it when you have attained the spiritual world. When you go upstairs in a house, you don't leave the house. The lower floor is under you."

"Oh I see!" cried the watchman, his whole face lighting up, "I see!"

After we parted from the watchman, who walked with us all the way to the Ninth Avenue corner, leading us again across the grass, I began to blame myself for not inviting him to the Master's house, forgetting that the Master Himself had not done so. Every day I meant to return to the Museum to tell the old man where the Master lived, but I put off from day to day.

When, at the end of a week, I did run over to the Museum, I found a young watchman there, who seemed to know nothing of the one he had replaced.

Had our friend "gone upstairs?"

Why had the Master visited a Museum of Natural History in the hottest hour of a blistering July day? Had He instead visited a soul whose need was crying out to Him, to open an old man's eyes so that he might see to climb the stairs, to take away the dread of death?[123]

---

On the tenth of July, I went to the Master in the early morning with something in my heart to say, but already there were people with Him and I saw no chance of talking privately

"Come, Juliet, sit by Me," He called as I entered the room. "Now, speak."

How could I, before those people? I hesitated.

"All your hopes and desires are destined to be fulfilled," He said, "in the Kingdom of God."

This was my cue.

"I came to tell You, my Lord, that now I have only one desire, to offer my heart for Your service."

"This you will also do, but all your desires will be fulfilled."

He kept me to lunch that day. While we were waiting in the English basement for the lunch to be announced, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án and I alone with the Master, He spoke again of my "truthfulness".

"Oh," I prayed, "may I some day have all the virtues so that in every way I can make you happy."

"But he who possesses truthfulness possesses all the virtues," said the Master. Then He went on to tell us a story. "There was once a disciple of Muḥammad who asked of another disciple, 'What shall I do to please God?' And the other disciple replied: 'Do not kill. Do not steal. Do not covet,' etc., etc., etc. A great many 'do not's'. "the Master laughed. "He asked still another, 'What shall I do to become nearer to God?' And this one said: 'You must supplicate and pray. You must be generous. You must be courageous,' etc., etc., etc. Then the disciple went to 'Alí. 'What do you say I should do in order to please God and to become nearer to Him?' 'One thing only: be truthful.'

"For," continued the Master, "if you are truthful, you cannot commit murder. You would have to confess it! Neither can you steal. You would have to confess it. So, if one is truthful, he possesses all the virtues.

"I may tell you this," He said to me, and He told me a thing so wonderful that, even to keep and cherish His words and read them over in the time to come, I cannot repeat it here.

“My Lord,” I said, “if ever I have told You an untruth it was because I deceived myself.”

“There are degrees of truth,” He answered, “but that word of yours which has so pleased Me was absolute, perfect, extraordinary truth.”

---

That night we walked with Him in “His garden” — Georgie Ralston, Mírzá ‘Alí-Akbar, Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án, Aḥmad, and I. Dear Lua, who has not yet left for California, was ill and unable to be with us.

He led us down a path sloping to the river, flanked by tall poplars. Sweeping on ahead in His gleaming white robes, He was like a spirit. The night was very dark, the river and the Jersey Palisades starred and glittering with lights and there were chains of lights close to the water.

With a wave of the hand towards them He said: “If only the souls of men could be thus illumined.”

“It is You, my Lord,” I said, as I followed close with Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án and Aḥmad, “Who put a torch to our souls and light them.”

Suddenly out from behind the bushes rushed a crowd of children, bursting upon us like little demons, capering around us and hooting. Some of them even picked up stones and threw them. Then they all began to sing: “Follow the Lord! The Lord leads on!”

Back to us floated the voice of the Master: “The people of the world are blind. You must have vision. The people of the world are heedless: see how heedless they are!” and He swept His hand toward the children, who immediately melted back into the shadows as if they had never really existed. “You must be aware. The people of the world are steeped in darkness. You must be immersed in a sea of light.”

We went deep down in the park, close to the river; then turned, climbed a path, and came out upon the street. Here there was a stone wall, dividing the park from the sidewalk. The Master leaned wearily on the wall and gazed far below to the river. He seemed to be lost in meditation, His face profoundly sorrowful. I thought of a picture, a poster, which, in the early days of His visit, had been displayed on all the church doors: the Christ mourning over the city.

Soon He continued His walk. I turned to Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án.

“Oh,” I said, “if only I could realize throughout the whole fibre of my being, feel with every nerve, every atom in me, His Divine Reality, if only while in His bodily Presence I could be fully aware of Who He is ...”

He turned and spoke and His face was ineffably gentle and holy and something in His voice pierced me to the heart. He couldn’t have heard me with the outer ear — I had fallen too far behind and was whispering, and in English — but how He answered me!

“They laugh at Me, yet My dress is the dress of Jesus, just the same that He wore.”

The people of the world: children! Had the Master Himself evoked those little demons and made a sort of moving picture of them, to show us what is to come as we “follow the Lord” in the dark night?

---

But the very next day another picture, of very different children, was superimposed upon this.

I had been with the Master all morning. (Later I will write of the morning.) In the afternoon around three o'clock I returned with Rhoda Nichols only to meet Him just going out with the Persians. He smiled, then walked swiftly toward the river, but Aḥmad, dropping behind, called to Rhoda and me: "Come along with us to the Harrises'." We should have known better than to go, for the Master had not invited us, but we couldn't resist the temptation. So we followed up Riverside Drive, then West End Avenue, till we came to Ninety-Fifth Street, where Mr and Mrs Harris live. A tenement house neighbourhood.

As we approached Ninety-Fifth Street, there we saw them: the different children. There must have been nearly a hundred of them, playing in the street with their hoops and balls. But, when the Master drew near, all shining white in His long flowing robes, they immediately stopped playing. It all happened instantaneously. The next moment they had fallen into formation and were marching down the street behind Him (we had turned east toward Central Park), some of them still rolling their hoops. Without one word they followed, their little faces almost solemn. They made me think of a real and beautiful Children's Crusade.

We came to the house where the Harrises live and walked up five steep flights, but when Mrs Harris opened her apartment door and Rhoda and I saw a table inside set only for the Master and the Persians, we backed away terribly embarrassed and lost no time in getting downstairs. After all, we couldn't have foreseen a luncheon at three o'clock!

When we opened the street door, there were the children again, surrounding the house, silently looking up at it. A little yellow-haired girl came running up the stoop to me. She seemed to be the spokesman for the others. Breathlessly she asked: "Please, ma'am, tell us. Is He Christ?"

I sat down on the stoop while the whole crowd of children swarmed and pushed around me. "I will tell you all about Him," I said. Then I whispered to Rhoda: "Go upstairs again, dear, and let the Master know what is happening."

She returned with a wonderful message from the Master, an invitation to all the children to come to a feast to be given specially for them at the Kinneys' house next Sunday.

---

And now just a word about the morning. Georgie Ralston and Mrs Brittingham, Lua, and I were together in the Master's room. As I sat there I felt something of the Mystery of His Divinity. The day was very hot and His sleeves were rolled up and I saw on His arms the scars of chains.

When the others left He kept me.

"I come to Your Presence, my Lord," I said, "to be cured of my spiritual ills."

"Your pure heart," the Master answered, "is a magnet for the Divine feelings."

He spoke of my mother and sent her some fruit. "Your mother," He said, "is very dear to me. You cannot imagine how I love your mother."

Then He laughed and asked: "How is Dr Grant?"

"I don't know, my Lord. I haven't seen him. I'm afraid I hurt him the last time we met."

"What did you do?"

"I refused to go into his house with him."

"How is he with Us?"

"I don't know."

"I want to see him. Is this possible?"

"Yes, I am sure. I will telephone to him."

"Tell him I am longing to see him, longing to see him," repeated the Master smiling.

I knelt and kissed His robe, looking up so happy, so grateful, while He looked down and laughed at me.

That night I telephoned to Percy. "I am the bearer of a message to you," I said, "from the Master. He asked this morning if I had seen you lately and said He wanted to see you. 'Tell Dr Grant I am longing to see him,' He said."

"That was very beautiful of Him. Give Him my cordial greetings. Tell him how happy I am that He thought of me. I can't tell you at this moment, Juliet, when I can go. I hope tomorrow afternoon. I have a wedding at half-past four. After that, perhaps."

"Well, I will give you the Master's telephone number and you can call His house about it, unless you prefer to have me arrange it."

"I should rather do it through you."

Saying he would let me know in the morning, he bade me goodbye; then, "I give you my loving salutations."

The next morning, however, when he called me up, he was in another state of mind. "Tell the Master," he said, "I have so many human engagements just now. I am going up to Greenwich after the wedding. (Greenwich is Alice Flagler's home.)

"But I want to run in to see you this morning, if I may."

I went to my room and prayed. I was on my knees when he came. Not that he found me on them!

"To come straight to the point, Percy," I said, "I hope you will go to see the Master."

"I'm going to see the Master, only I can't today."

"Oh that is all right," I said, brightening. "I didn't understand."

We talked about other things and then Katherine Berwind dropped in. Percy spent the morning with us, leaving us for a little while to return with bottles of ginger ale and grape juice which he mixed into a drink for us. When he finally left about noon I followed him out of the studio.

"What message have you," I asked, "for the Master?"

He swore! It was a very mild swear, but he coupled the Master's name with it, so I can't repeat it.

"I believe you love Him," he said fiercely, "more than anything on earth."

"I do."

"More than your art," he added quickly.

"But of course."

"Well, you shouldn't. With your talent, Juliet, you could do immortal work. Do you never think of that?"

"I am thinking of His immortal work in us."

"He has done it, in you!"

"Not yet."

"Juliet, I have wanted to co-operate with Him. You know that. But I don't believe He can do this thing alone."

"I believe He is perfectly able to do it alone."

"You do?"

"He changes the hearts and nobody else can do that. Well, what message shall I take to Him?"

"Tell Him with my greeting that I will come up some time to see Him, but I am out of town a great deal, most of the time, and —"

"Can't you do any better than that?" I asked.

"I want to do something for His comfort and when Mr Flagler's yacht comes back I want to take Him up the Hudson. I will be in town Friday, Juliet."

"Then come up on Friday to see Him with me. Please come. You know I don't often persist, but this time — forgive me if I do."

"I think it is beautiful of you to persist in this instance, Juliet." With the face of a martyr he kissed my hand. "I will come Friday."

And, looking unspeakably miserable, he left me.

---

On Friday in the afternoon he stopped for me. We were expecting the Master in the evening — He was to bless our house with a visit — and at the moment Percy arrived I was telephoning Marjorie, who had offered to bring some light refreshment. Percy, sitting in the living room, heard. But I couldn't invite him, for I knew it would spoil Mamma's evening with the Master — she mightn't even come into the room.

While I was putting on my gloves Percy produced a large and ornate pocketbook. "Juliet," he said, "here is an empty pocketbook which someone brought me from Italy. Will you accept it? I thought you might have in mind some Oriental person to whom you would like to give it."

When we started out he proposed going up in a cab, but I objected on the grounds that it would be slow and we were already half an hour late.

"I am bringing the Master down here at six and you would have no visit at all if we took a slow cab."

"Well, for the matter of that, Juliet" — and his upper lip grew very stiff — "any visit I might pay would be merely an expression of affection and courtesy. As for all you could get from a visit of this sort, where conversation must be through an interpreter and 'Abdu'l-Bahá will go off into a monologue on some subject that interests Him — well, as I said, it is merely a mark of courtesy."

---

I never saw his mouth so stubborn as when we entered the Master's house. The Master was waiting for us, sitting in the bay window of the English basement.

"Marhabá, Dr Grant! It is a long time since I have seen you, a long time."

But His welcome was more reserved than it had been before.

"Well, Dr Grant," He said, after a moment, "what is the very latest news, the very latest?"

Remembering Percy's remark, that the Master always indulged in monologue, I couldn't help smiling at this.

"The latest news," said Percy with a wicked look, as obstinate, pugnacious and self-confident as I have ever seen, "is in the field of athletics."

"The Olympic games?" asked the Master.

"Yes," said Percy, surprised.

"You know," the Master went on, "that these games originated in ancient Greece and it was a necessity of that time to develop the body to its fullest strength, the nations being constantly at warfare and the men wearing armour and fighting hand to hand. Heavy swords had to be driven through coats of mail; bodies had to be strengthened to endure the mail."

"But explain to the Master," said Percy, very much de haut en bas, "that because of the people all centring in the cities and thus depleting their constitutions, the necessity for physical development is just as great now as it was then, though the basis is different."

The Master answered with the utmost sweetness: "We do not deprecate physical development, for the sound mind should work through a sound body, but We think that the people of the West are too much concerned with mere physical development. They forget the need of spiritual development."

But Percy was bent upon argument. The development of the spirit, he maintained, could not even begin till the body had first been built up; and he looked so absurdly condescending, so pompous, so sure of his power to defeat the Master, that I could scarcely control my mirth. The Master did not control His.

"Man thinks too much of perfecting the body," He smiled delightfully, "but of what use is it to him without the perfecting of the spirit? No matter how much he develops his muscles and sinews he will never become as strong as the ox, as brave as the lion or as big as the elephant! Physically he is an animal, yet inferior to the animals, for animals acquire their sustenance with the greatest ease, whereas man has to toil incessantly, to labour with infinite pain, for a mere livelihood. So, in the physical realm, the beast is nobler than man. But man is distinguished from the beast by his spiritual gifts and these he should develop with the other, both together. There should be the perfect balance, the spiritual and the physical. A man whose ideal side only is developed is also imperfect. We do not deprecate comfort. If I could find a better house than this I would certainly move into it. But man should not think of comfort alone."

I looked at Percy. He was still like a fighting-cock, ready for another bout. He would never give in before me, I knew, so I slipped quietly into the kitchen. When I returned the whole atmosphere had changed. His face had softened, his stiff mouth relaxed. As I entered the room the Master was saying: "When one prays, one sometimes has divine glimpses. So, when one is spiritually developed, a sublimity of nature is obtained, a delicacy of vision such as could not otherwise be found. Not only this, but tranquillity and happiness are secured.

"Do you think if it had not been for spiritual assurance I could have been happy all those years in prison? Think of it, forty years! You have just been telling me, Dr Grant, that forty years is the average American life. I spent My American life in prison. Yet all that time I was on the heights of happiness. Many believers in Persia have been forced to give up everything: their possessions, their families, and, in the end, their lives, but they never lost their happiness.

"Remember Christ, when they placed the crown of thorns on His head. At that very moment, as the thorns wounded His brow, He looked down the vista of the centuries and beheld innumerable kings bowing their jewelled crowns low before that crown of thorns. Do you think He did not know, that He could not foresee?" (Again I stole a glance at Percy. He looked utterly melted now and his eyes shone.) "When they spat in the face of Christ," the Master went on, "when they made a mock procession and carried Him around the streets, He felt no humiliation."

Just then I rose to go, first asking permission, with my eyes, of the Master, Percy was not inclined to go, even when we were on our feet. In spite of that momentary softening — perhaps partly because of it — he still wanted to stay and argue and I could hardly tear him away.

While we were standing, he swung the master's divine subject to a combative one, "the Occident versus the Orient": that was the substance of it. And if ever I saw the Occident embodied, it was at that moment in that man.

The Master leaned close to him and with the utmost gentleness and patience tried to appeal to him. The people of the East, He said, were content with less than the people here, so their hours of work were shorter. He touched too on the absence of suicide in the Orient.

When He spoke of suicide, and also while He described the humiliations heaped on Christ, which could not humiliate Him, I had a strange sense of impending tragedy for Percy Grant, of something dreadful to happen in the future in which he would utterly "lose his happiness" and would feel humiliation, when perhaps these words of the Master would come back to him.[124]

On the way down in the cab the Master talked about economics. "The most important of the questions here," He said, "is the economic question. Until that is first solved nothing can be done. But if it should not be solved there will be riots."

Percy spoke of democracy.

"But your poor man," the Master replied, "cannot even think of economics; he is so overburdened."

I asked Percy to tell about his work and when he had done so, with some hesitation (for he seldom speaks of himself), the Master said sweetly: "May you make peace here. May you unite the classes."

Whereupon Percy's face beamed.

But he steeled himself again and at my door he turned to go, though I did invite him in, and the Master also said: "Are you not coming in?"

"No, no," and he hurried away, with a huffy look.

I can still see the Master on my steps, so in command.

"Au revoir, Dr Grant," He said.

Percy had mentioned the yacht trip to the Master and asked if He could make it the following Monday, but the Master had several appointments Monday and could not accept for that day.

"I will try," said Percy, "to get the yacht for Tuesday."

The Master had planned to spend the whole evening with us and we were all to go for a walk, but the Persians had forgotten to announce at the Seventy-Eighth Street house that He would be absent Friday evening, so He felt He must return early.

---

My Lord came into our house. The door was not locked. He opened it Himself and walked up the stairs. It was His house. Mamma almost ran to meet Him, her face suffused with joy, her eyes shy and tender. The MacNutts and the Goodalls had arrived and Ruth Berkeley and Marjorie, and were waiting in the second-floor living room. The Master went in and greeted them with His wonderful buoyant greeting; then I took Him to my room to rest and, after kneeling and kissing the hem of His garment, left Him lying on my couch.

While He was resting Kahlil Gibran came. He had a private talk with the Master in my room; then joined us upstairs in the studio, to which we had all gone by that time, and in a very few minutes the Master too joined us.

Mamma, with her own loving hands, had prepared the studio for His reception and it was very beautiful, full of laurel, white roses, and lighted white candles.

"What a good room," said the Master as He entered it. "It is like an Oriental room — so high. If I were to build a house here," He laughed, "I would build an eclectic house — partly Oriental, partly Occidental."

Then we passed the refreshments and our Beloved Lord "broke bread" with us.

- (Footnote. Of course I was terribly disappointed that the Master stayed such a short time that night. A few days later I began to see that this was no accident, that the changing of His plan for that evening had not been just a result of the Persians' forgetfulness, but that in it was a deep and subtle lesson for me. A lesson in perception — or intuition — which is truth itself. I had asked the Master whom I should invite to meet Him. "Anyone you think of," He answered. "Whatever name comes into your mind, invite that person." A few names came into my mind as if projected there from outside. Percy Grant. At once I rejected that name, on Mamma's account, as I have explained already. Mrs Krug. Oh no! Mamma wasn't fond of Mrs Krug. Mrs Kaufman. No. Then I selected my personal friends. Mrs Krug and Mrs Kaufman both were extremely hurt because I didn't invite them and what harmony there was between us was broken for the time being. As for Percy Grant ... !) *

16 July 1912

Tuesday, 16 July, the day proposed for the yacht trip up the Hudson, was a day of crushing disappointment. In the morning I awoke thinking: Today great things may happen for Percy; miracles may happen! Still, an instinct made me uneasy.

As soon as I reached the Master's house I asked if Dr Grant had been heard from. No word had come, Dr Farid told me, and really the Master ought to know in order to arrange His day's appointments. "You had better telephone, Juliet."

I went to the corner drugstore and called the Rectory, only to learn that Percy was still in Greenwich. I called him in Greenwich.

"Oh, Juliet." He sounded bored. "I have been meaning to telephone you all morning, but one thing after another has prevented. No, I am sorry, tell 'Abdu'l-Bahá how very sorry I am, but I cannot arrange the trip for today. Mrs Flagler was in town yesterday and it didn't agree with her and she isn't well enough to go today."

"I am very sorry," I murmured, so shocked I could scarcely speak.

"When does the Master leave New York?"

"On the twenty-second."

"On the twenty-second? I hope it can be arranged before then."

"I hope so."

"How did the supper go off the other night?"

"What supper?"

"The supper you had for the Master?"

"There was no supper."

"Why, I heard you talking about 'provisions' over the telephone with Mrs Morten."

"That was only fruit and a cool drink. The Master just paid us a visit. I asked you to come in."

"Well, I didn't feel that I could. I thought you were going to sit around a table and that all those Persians you had asked would fill it up, and that woman you invited at the Master's house. It makes me shudder, Juliet, to think of all the money you spent that day."

"That was nothing."

"Oh, money is nothing, I suppose!"

"Certainly nothing compared with a visit from the Master." And I said goodbye.

I went back to the house so ashamed I could hardly hold up my head: miserably ashamed of Percy Grant, burning up with indignation at his deliberate insult to the Master, to Him Whose “dress was the same as the dress of Jesus”, an insult levelled at the Master, the real intention of which was to hurt me. Just a petty revenge on me.

I gave Percy’s wretched message to Dr Farid without any comment; then stole off alone and wept.

Soon my Lord sent for me. I longed to unburden my heart to Him, but Grace Krug and Louise were with Him and Grace was telling her own troubles, speaking of some unhappiness of the day before, so of course I could say nothing. I sat forcing back my tears, feeling that at any moment I might burst out crying and that I mustn’t do that in His Presence for any other reason than love.

“And now,” said the Master, still talking with Grace, “the sun is out again! The sun is shining. I am glad of that. I do not like clouds!”

Oh, what if I cry now, I thought.

“Winds from all directions: from the north, south, east, and west — great hurricanes — have beaten against My Ark, yet My Ark still floats.” Smiling, He made an adorable gesture with His hands, swinging them like a rocking boat. “One single wave has submerged many a great ship, yet My Ark still floats!”

“Juliet,” He said, turning suddenly to me, “is there anything you want to ask Me privately? Biya! (Come).”

He led me by the hand into the back room.

“Now speak. Your eyes are all speech!”

“I only want to say that I am deeply ashamed for Dr Grant. Deeply sorry. The friend to whose husband the yacht belongs is sick and he could not get it for today.”

“It is better so,” said the Master. “I was wondering how I could do it, for I am not very well today and must be in Brooklyn this evening at eight o’clock. But I would have done it for his sake. It is better; better,” He ended, with a strange sweet intonation, as He returned to the other room.

18 July 1912

Each day I drink deeper of the cup of Love. Yesterday the draught I took was pure ecstasy. I saw Him for three brief moments only, but those three moments were charged.

First, I saw Him with a few others — Mrs Helen Goodall, Miss Wise, Ella Goodall Cooper — and He spoke to us of the kindness of God, holding in His hand my rosary, which He has carried for several days (the one __Kh__ánum gave me in Haifa). When we meet kindness in a human being He said, how happy it makes us. How much happier we will be when we realize the kindness of God.

Later He called to Him alone. I met Him as He came downstairs from His room to the library. He was all in white.

“Ah-h, Juliet,” He said. He began to walk up and down the library. “Your mother sent me these things,” (referring to some flowers and another little present). “These things came from your mother? I became very happy from them, but she should not have taken the trouble.”

"It made her so happy to send that little offering."

"But she should not have taken the trouble." He continued to walk up and down. In a moment He said: "I am very much please with your truthfulness, Juliet."

That matter between us, your truthfulness on that occasion makes Me happy whenever I think of it."

"Everything in my heart is for You to see, my Lord. I only hope the day may come when You will see nothing in it except the Love of God."

He came very close and looked deep into my eyes with His brilliant eyes.

"I see your heart," He said. "I look into your face and your heart is perfectly clear to Me."

Again He paced up and down and it was then I knelt.

"Tell the Master," I said to Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, "I pray that my heart may become entirely detached from this world."

"Your heart," said the Master, pausing before me and gazing at me with a face of glistening light, "will become entirely detached. You are now in the condition I desired for you." He walked to the window and stood, looking out. "I wish you to teach constantly. Therein lies your happiness, and My happiness."

He came back to me. I had risen.

"I wish you to be detached from the entire world of existence; to turn to the Kingdom of Abhá with a pure heart; with a pure breath to teach the people. I desire for you," He continued, resuming His walk, "that which I desire for My own daughters, Tuba and Rúhâ."

With this He dismissed me.

In the evening I returned to a wedding, Grace Roberts' and Harlan Ober's, where the Master, for me, as well as for the bride and bridegroom, turned the water of life into wine.

Grace and Harlan stood together, transfigured; they seemed to be bathed in white light. Mr Ives, standing opposite, married them. Back in the shadow sat the Master. There were times when I, sitting at a little distance from Him, felt His lightning glance on me. At the end of the service He blessed the marriage. After this He went upstairs, to the front room on the third floor.

I soon followed him there, taking with me our coloured maid, Mamie, and her little adopted son, George, a child six years old. Mamie wanted to have the Master bless him.

On the way up in the bus I had (idiotically) asked: "Do you know who the Master is, George?"

"No, ma'am," very positively.

"Well, you will know some day, for by the time you grow up the whole world will know Who the Master is and then you will be so proud and happy to remember that He blessed you."

The blessing the Master gave George was not an obvious one, there was nothing ceremonial about it. He just took the child on His knee and talked playfully with him and caressed him. But how it impressed that little boy!

While we were going downtown in the bus, he rolled his big eyes up at me and out of a dead silence said: “I know now, ma’am.”

And when Mamie’s husband, Cornelius, opened the door for us, George rushed to him, crying out: “The Master blessed me, dearie, and I will show you just how.”

Then he clattered down the basement stairs and I was spared the scene! I never did know how George demonstrated it — he couldn’t have taken Cornelius on his knee! — but the next day Mamie told me of something else.

“Dearie,” George had asked, “is the Master that blessed me this evening the same Master that holds the moon in His hand and makes the sun shine?”

“Go to bed, child,” said Cornelius.

“But,” repeated George, “is the Master that same Lord that makes the sun shine and the rain come down?”

“The Lord that makes the sun shine,” said Mamie, “is in the Master that blessed you this evening, George. It was the Holy Spirit that blessed you.”

- (Footnote. 1947. Thirteen years later a handsome young man came to my door. At first I thought he was Syrian. “Do you remember George?” he asked. Almost at once he spoke of the Master. “I have had a rough life among my own people,” he said, “but the blessing He gave me has lived like a fountain in my heart. It has protected me through all my sufferings. It has inspired me with the resolve to work for better conditions among my people. And,” he went on, “that other time when He spoke at a big meeting on the first floor and you brought me up from the basement and stood me on a chair so that I could see Him plainly, I thought He was God then and was frightened.” Then he described the Master to the minutest detail: the colour of His eyes, His skin, His hair, even the two tones of white in the turban He wore. A few years ago, during the Second World War, I heard of George again from his real mother. He was in England, practising medicine and working with the wounded in the hospitals.) *

19 July 1912

This morning I went as usual to the Master’s house but was stopped at the door by Alice Beede.

“Fly,” she said, “after Mrs Goodall and Ella. They have your rosary. The Master just gave it to them.”

My precious, precious coral rosary — given to me by the Greatest Holy Leaf! Given on a wonderful occasion, when a young carpenter living on Mount Carmel had been healed of typhoid fever. Rúḥá and I had climbed the mountain to see him and we were trying to help his mother when __Kh__ánum and the Holy Mother arrived with a doctor. The doctor went into the hut and the rest of us stayed outside, __Kh__ánum sitting on the ground under a tree, praying on this same rosary. It was dark by then, and very dark in that little garden. __Kh__ánum was all in shadowy white, from her veil to her feet. When she had finished praying, she glided like a spirit toward me and threw the coral chain over my head. A few days ago I took this great treasure to the Master. "This is the dearest thing I possess," I said, "except Your tablets and the ring You gave me. If You will use it, my Lord, it will be infinitely dearer."

I ran up the street after Mrs Goodall and Ella Cooper and when I overtook them said breathlessly: "Alice Beede has just told me that the Master gave you my rosary."

"Oh! Take it back," said Mrs Goodall.

But I had come to my senses.

"No, no," I answered. "If the Master gave it to you it is yours."

In the afternoon I went again to my Lord. He was sitting in the English basement, in His lap a tangled pile of rosaries. I sat between Aḥmad and Edward Getsinger. The Master held up a rosary.

"To whom do I return this?" He inquired of Aḥmad.

Edward leaned over to me and whispered: "That is the way your rosary went.

"Oh no, it isn't," I whispered back.

"What did Juliet say?" asked the Master

"It was nothing, my Lord, nothing," I said

He smiled and the subject was dropped.[125]

25 July 1912

She Master is gone. Gone to Dublin, New Hampshire.

I shall never forget the day He left, day before yesterday. I went up early to His house — but oh, too late! On the street I met Mrs Hutchinson.

"The Master has gone!" she said, her eyes full of tears, her lips quivering.

"When?"

"Twenty minutes ago."

"I will go to the station."

I jumped on a subway train and reached the station in a few minutes. But nowhere did I see the Master and the Persians. I stopped a porter.

"Did a party of foreigners pass through here just now?"

"Egyptians?"

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Dublin, New Hampshire]

"Yes!" There wasn't a minute to explain.

"Yes. Go to track 19."

But track 19 was deserted except for the gateman

"Has a party of foreigners passed this way?" I asked him.

"Turks?"

"Yes.

"They are on the train."

"I supposed I couldn't go through?

"Yes, go through, but come right back."

Smiling my thanks, I dashed down the platform. At one of the windows in the train I saw a white turban.

"Could I get on the car?" I asked the conductor

"Yes, get on. It's all right."

---

"Ah-h, Juliet!"

"Goodbye, my Lord."

"Goodbye." He drew me down beside Him. "You should not have troubled to come here," He said.

"My heart wouldn't let me do otherwise."

"I will see you in a month.[126] Give My greetings to your mother, to all the friends; to Mrs Krug, Miss Boylan."

Closely, closely He pressed my hand, pouring the attar of rose of His Love upon me. Then once more He said goodbye and I left.

It had been too bold, yet even against the rules every door had opened to me.

---

The last time I talked with the Master was the day before He left. Sure that He was to leave that morning, the twenty-second, I went very early to His house, with eight palm-leaf fans in my hands. Mamma had sent them for the Master and the Persians to use on the hot journey.

The master was sitting in the English basement at the window. He called me to a chair opposite Him. "What are all those for?" He asked, laughing, waving His hand toward the fans.

I laughed too, for they did look funny. I explained their purpose and that they were from Mamma.

For a while I sat in silence before Him. Then suddenly I realized that He was about to leave us, that in just a few minutes He would be gone. I began to cry quietly.

“Tell Juliet,” laughed the Master, “that I am not going today.”

At this the sun came out! But soon by tears were flowing again, this time because His love was melting me.

“Why are you crying, Juliet? I am not going today!”

---

In the afternoon He called me to Him and I had twenty minutes alone with Him and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án. I sat with overbrimming eyes, drinking in the Glory of His Presence.

“Oh Valiyu'llah __Kh__án,” I said, “say to the Master for me that I know He is the Sun and I pray He will always encircle me with His rays.”

“You are very near Me,” He answered, “and while you speak the truth you will always be with Me. I pray that you may become the candle of New York, spreading the Light of Love all around you.”

After this we sat silent in His Presence, silent for a long time.

Once again He saw me when Marjorie came. He told her she was my child, my “little chicken” and said we must comfort each other after He has gone. Green Acre, Maine, 1947

If only I had written of Green Acre day by day while we were there with Him! There are unforgettable things, but so many details, precious details, have slipped away.

Mamma and I were in Bass Rocks when the Master's invitation reached us. Bass Rocks, on a cliff above the ocean, was Mamma's paradise and we could never afford more than two weeks of it. So, when Aḥmad's postcard came, with word from the Master that He wished us to spend three days with Him in Green Acre, all she could think of at first was that three days would be lost from her paradise!

“I won't go,” she said.

“Oh, Mamma, an invitation from a king is a command, and this is from the King of kings.”

“Well, I'll go for just one night and no more. And I won't take a suitcase. Just a little Irish bundle, so that we can't stay more than one night.”

So she packed our little Irish bundle: two night-gowns, two toothbrushes, our combs and brushes and a change of underwear.

When we arrived at the Green Acre Inn the Master met us at the door with His loving Marḥabá; then He drew me into the dining room.

“She does not want?” He asked in English.

I couldn't tell the truth then, but of course He knew.

---

Pictures come back to me. Mamma and I following Him down a path to the Eirenion, where He was to speak to the believers. He was all in white in the dark. Mamma whispering to me: "It is like following a Spirit."

A tussle day after day to keep Mamma in Green Acre, in which dear Carrie Kinney helped me.

A night when a horrifying young man came to a meeting at the Kinneys' house. From head to foot he was covered with soot. His blue eyes stared out from a dark grey face. This was Fred Mortenson. He had spent half his boyhood and young manhood in a prison in Minneapolis. Our beloved Albert Hall, who was interested in prison work, had found him and taken him out on parole and given him the Bahá'í Message. But Albert Hall was dead when the Master came to America.

Fred Mortenson, hearing that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in Green Acre, and having no money to make the trip, had ridden the bumpers [on freight trains] to His Presence.

He came into the meeting and sat down and was very unhappy when the Master, pacing back and forth as He talked, took no notice of him. "It must be that He knows I stole a ride," thought Fred (who told me all about it afterward). But no sooner was the meeting over and the Master upstairs in His room than He sent for Fred.

Fred had said nothing to anyone about his trip on the bumpers, but the minute he entered that upstairs room the Master asked smiling and with twinkling eyes: "How did you enjoy your ride?" then He took from Fred's hand his soot-covered cap and kissed it.

Years later, during the First World War, when the American believers sent ten thousand dollars for the relief of the starving Arabs, the messenger they chose to carry the money through the warring countries was: Fred Mortenson. The Master declined the ten thousand dollars, relieving the Arabs Himself by His own hard labour. He went to His estate near Tiberius and Himself ploughed the fields there; then stored all the grain in the Shrine of the Báb.

For this He was knighted by Great Britain when British rule replaced Turkish in Palestine. It was meant as an honour, but to me it was like an insult. It nearly killed me after that to direct my supplications to Sir 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás.

But to return to Green Acre.

One day the Master, speaking from the porch of somebody's cottage, while the believers sat on the grass below, made this fascinating statement: "We are in affinity now because in pre-existence we were in affinity."

"Let's ask Him what He means by that," whispered Carrie to me.

So, in the evening, while the Master was in our room — Mamma's and mine — and Carrie sitting there with us, I put the question to Him.

"I will answer you later," He said.

But He never did, outwardly.

In a minute or so Mamma, with that funny boldness of hers which would sometimes burst through her timidity, said: "Master, I would like to see You without Your turban."

He smiled. "It is not our custom, Mrs Thompson, to take off our turbans before ladies, but for your sake I will do it."

And oh, the beauty we saw then! There was something in the silver hair flowing back from His high forehead, something in the shape of the head, which, in spite of His age, made me think of Christ.

There was another night, when Carrie, Mamma, and I and a few other believers were sitting in the second-floor hall. Suddenly, on the white wall of the floor above, at the head of the staircase, the Master's great shadow loomed. Mamma slipped over to the foot of the stairs and looking up with adoring eyes, called: "Master!"

And still another night. This was our third in Green Acre. Again we were sitting in the second-floor hall, but now the Master was in our midst.

"We must say goodbye tomorrow," Mamma said to Him.

"Oh no, Mrs Thompson," He laughed. "You are not going tomorrow. One more day." and He laughed again. "You see, I am leaving for Boston day after tomorrow and you are of My own family. Therefore you must travel with Me."

And Mamma submitted now with a satisfaction wonderful to see. She was proud as a peacock. "He said I was of His own family," she kept repeating to me.

Once He called Mamma and me into His room and among other things He said was this: "There are correspondences, Mrs Thompson, between heaven and earth and Juliet's correspondence in heaven is Mary of Magdala."

(This diary, owing to the fact that it was written under difficulties, has large areas left out of it. I find that I have not spoken of what seemed then such a crucial thing — Lua's departure for California. But since she was not at our house when the Master visited us on 12 July, and my last account of being with her is dated the morning of 11 July, I'm sure she must have left the night of the eleventh.

I have just one story to tell of Lua, with the Master, in California. I want to tell it for two reasons. First: because of its value and also its humour; then because another version of it is still being told by the believers, less direct and much less like the Master. This is how I had it from Lua herself.

She and Georgie Ralston (who had gone with Lua to California) were driving one day with the Master, when He closed His eyes and apparently fell asleep. Lua and Georgie talked on, I imagine about their own concerns, for suddenly His eyes sprang open and He laughed.

"I, me, my, mine: words of the Devil!" He said.) New York

November 1912

The Master is here again!

I met Him at the boat last Monday, 11 November. I met Him alone. And this is how that happened. At noon on 11 November, Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar arrived from Washington to find living quarters for the Masters and the Persians. I had had a wire from him earlier, asking me to meet him at the station and to house-hunt with him, which I did. The Master was to come at ten that night and we thought we had plenty of time to notify the friends so that they could meet His ferryboat, but later another wire came to our house, relayed to me through Mamma and Mr Mills at Mrs Champney's (and luckily catching me there), saying that the Master would arrive at eight. Through a series of accidents, Mr Mills' chauffeur landed us first somewhere in New Jersey and then at the Liberty Street station, and there was no time to telephone anybody.

"This will be very bad," said Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar, but we couldn't help it.

We had accomplished everything else, had rented again the dear house on Seventy-Eighth Street (Mrs Champney's) and found extra rooms for some of the Persians.

Now, Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar insisted on my taking Mr Mills' car and going at breakneck speed to the Twenty-Third Street station to try to meet the Master there, if He should come that way, while he himself waited at Liberty Street.

I reached Twenty-Third Street just in time. The ferryboat was approaching and very close to the dock. Standing at the end of the pier, I saw it with its chain of lights. I saw Dr Farid. Then the Master rose from a seat on the deck and entered the brightly lit cabin.

Soon He came toward me down the gangplank.

"Ah, Juliet," He said, taking my hand in His and drawing me along with Him, so that I walked beside Him. But He didn't invite me to drive to His house with Him. Instead, He sent me back after Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar — Dr Ba__gh__dádí and Mírzá Maḥmúd going with me. We returned all together to Seventy-Eighth Street.

Oh, to see Him in that house again, sitting in His old corner in the English basement, the corner in the bay window!

I had been very naughty with Mamma that day and had grieved her. My precious mother was brought up in luxury, lived in luxury until Papa died. She cannot get over her sensitiveness about our too-apparent poverty and she simply won't have people to meals. I had begged her to make an exception of Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar, who was arriving at such an awkward hour, and to let me bring him back for lunch. But she wouldn't hear of it.

Whereupon I flew into a temper, told her what I thought of her "false pride", and stamped out of the house.

Now, entering the Master's house with the three Persians, instead of a welcome, I received a blow. The Master didn't even look at me.

"How is your mother?" were His first words. "Is she happy?"

Then He told me to go straight back to her but to return the next day. I went back and comforted her with His rebuke to me.

---

Early as I could on 12 November, I sought His Beloved Presence. Ruth and Lawrence White (who have lately been married) were with Him and Rhoda and Marjorie. It seems impossible sometimes for the physical ear, or the human mind, to retain His Divine Words. They moved me to tears.

"Don't cry! Don't cry!" said the Master, with His infinite tenderness.

The twelfth of November, the Birthday of Bahá'u'lláh, was the day of Mrs Krug's meeting and never, never shall I forget it.

There, at Mrs Krug's, the Master invoked Bahá'u'lláh. And as His cry, "Ya Bahá'u'lláh!" rang out, I hid my eyes, for it was as though He were calling Someone the same plane with Him, Someone Whom He saw, and Who would certainly come.

He came — the Blessed Beauty, the Lord of Hosts. A Power flashed into our midst, a great Sacred Power ... I can find no words. Burning tears poured down my cheeks. My heart shook.

After the meeting, the Master, Who was resting in another room, sent for me. I had supplicated through Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án that He would come to the meeting at our house Friday.

"Tomorrow, Juliet," He said, "I will tell you about your meeting. Now go back to the house and wait till I come."

I did so and He soon came — came and sat in the corner of the window in the English basement just as He used to last summer. Carrie Kinney was there and Mr Hoar.

He had spoken so often in public and in private of an inevitable world war, warning America not to enter it, that I felt moved to mention it now.

"Will the present war in the Balkans," I asked, "terminate in the world war?"

"No, but within two years a spark will rise from the Balkans and set the whole world on fire."

Soon He rose and calling, "Come, Juliet," and beckoning to Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án, took us out to walk in "His garden", that narrow strip of park above the river. As we followed Him, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án said: "How blessed to be walking in His footsteps!"

He led us to a bench and sat down between us, clasping my hand tightly. And then He began to ask me questions: question after question about the believers in New York, as to a certain condition among them, a lack of firmness in the Covenant, which I had never suspected — of which I was really ignorant. Of course, I did know that earlier there had been awful confusion — some teaching that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was like Peter, others that He was Jesus Himself — but I thought that time was past.

"But I don't know, my Lord!" I said. "If I knew, I would tell you."

"I know you don't know," He laughed, "and I do know. There are many things I know that you do not know. I was only testing you. I have loved you for your truthfulness, for the truth you spoke in a matter you remember. I wanted to see if your heart were in the same state of truthfulness." Then He said: "With those who are against the Centre of the Covenant you must not associate at all. When you find that a soul has turned away from the Covenant you must cut yourself off completely from him. You will know these people. You will see it in their faces." (How on earth, I thought, could I trust my judgement of the faces? He answered my unspoken thought at once.) "You will see a dimness on the faces, like the letting down of a veil."

"My Lord," I said, "I feel that I have failed in everything. I have failed You in all my pitiful efforts to bring about unity. And I know my failure has been due to lack of strict obedience."

"Obedience," said the Master, "is firmness in the Covenant. You must associate with the steadfast ones." He mentioned three people who, since His return — since I met His ferryboat alone — have wreaked their displeasure on me, one of whom had even "scandalized my name" (!) for several years; then added to the list — Mason Remey. This was bitter!

"You must be a rock, as they are rocks."

"My Lord," I asked, with a sinking heart, "am I not firm in the Covenant?"

"You could be more firm," He laughed.

"Oh, my Lord!"

He rose and we began to walk.

"I had hoped," I said miserably, "that nobody loved You better than I."

"I know you love Me, Juliet," He answered, "but there are degrees of love." Then He told me He carried a measuring-rod in His hand by which He measured the love of the people and that rod was obedience.

At the corner, at the entrance to the park, He paused. "You must love Me," He said, "for the sake of God."

"You are all I shall ever know of God!"

"I am the Servant of God. You must love Me for His sake and for the sake of Bahá'u'lláh. I am very kind to you Juliet," He added.

"I know, my Lord."

"Now go back to your mother, so that she may be pleased with you!" He laughed, and left me to wait for the bus.

But when He had crossed the street, when I saw Him stop for a moment to speak to Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án, I sank on the chain of the fence utterly broken-hearted.

Oh I am nothing, nothing, I thought. I have done nothing but fail Him. Which was just what He wanted me to see, I suppose.

But, could it be that I was not firm? I examined my character: Yes, it was unstable.

---

On Wednesday, 14 November, I went very early to my Lord's house. He was on the point of going out, but He called me to Him.

"My Lord," I said, as He paced up and down His room, "I want to thank You for Your great mercy last night. I was asleep and You woke me."

"I pray you may ever be awake. There are a few souls in America," He continued, "whom I have chosen to be teachers in this Cause. You are of those, Juliet. I wish you to have all the qualities of a teacher. That is all."

Then He asked me to wait till His return. I waited all day. At five o'clock He came and called me to His room on the upper floor. With that exquisite courtesy of His, the sweetness of which almost breaks the heart, He — I can hardly write it — asked me to excuse Him for keeping me waiting.

"To wait for You, my Lord, is joy. Oh these blessed days when we can wait for You!"

He went on to tell me why He had been detained ...

(The record of this last month must be sketchy. I cannot copy it all, as it concerns other people, and conditions that are past and best forgotten.

28 November 1912

It is Thanksgiving Day, and I am thankful — thankful and happy. Everything that means my personal happiness, even every hope is lost. My Lord has entirely stripped my life. But I pray that He has freed my spirit.

On 15 November, the Master came to our house (48 West Tenth Street) and gave a most wonderful talk in the front room on the first floor to a great crowd of people who filled both the front and back rooms and the hall.[127] I brought George up from the basement and stood him on a chair, so that he could see the Master. He thought the Master was God and was frightened.

Driving down to us with Mrs Champney, our Lord had said: “The time has come for Me to throw bombs!” And He threw them in His talk that night.

“I have spoken,” He said, “in the various Christian churches and in the synagogues, and in no assembly has there been a dissenting voice. All have listened and all have conceded that the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh are superlative in character, acknowledging that they constitute the very essence or spirit of this age and that there is no better pathway to the attainment of its ideals. Not a single voice has been raised in objection. At most there have been some who have refused to acknowledge the Mission of Bahá’u’lláh, although even these have admitted that He was a great teacher, a most powerful soul, a very great man. Some who could find no other pretext have said: ‘These Teachings are not new; they are old and familiar; we have heard them before.’ Therefore, I will speak to you upon the distinctive characteristics of the Manifestation of Bahá’u’lláh and prove that from every standpoint His Cause is distinguished from all others.”

And in this address, which was one of His most powerful, the Master certainly proved it. The address was taken down and will be printed.

---

On 18 November, at the Kinneys’ house, the Master put Howard MacNutt through a severe ordeal, an inevitable ordeal.

Mr MacNutt had been one of the few who, when I first came to New York, had taught that the Master was “like Peter” — just a glorified disciple. But for years he had never mentioned this point of view, and I thought he had gotten over it.

In Chicago there are some so-called Bahá’ís who are still connected with ___Kh___ayru’lláh, the great Covenant-breaker, and last week the Master sent Mr MacNutt to Chicago to see them and try to persuade them to give up ___Kh___ayru’lláh; otherwise he was to cut them off from the faithful believers. He — Mr MacNutt — wrote Diya Ba___gh___dádí that he had found these people “angels”, and did nothing about the situation.

He had just returned to New York and was to meet the Master at the Kinneys’ house that evening, 18 November, for the first time since his unfruitful trip. I was in the second-floor hall with the Master and Carrie Kinney when he arrived. The Master took him to His own room. After some time they came out together into the hall.

An immense crowd had gathered by then on the first floor, which is open the whole length of the house.

I heard the Master say to Mr MacNutt: "Go down and tell the people: 'I was like Saul. Now I am Paul, for I see.'"

"But I don't see," said poor Howard.

"Go down and say: 'I was like Saul.'"

I pulled his coattail. "For God's sake," I said, "go down."

"Let me alone," he replied in his misery.

"GO DOWN," commanded the Master.

Mr MacNutt turned and went down, and his back looked shrunken. The Master leaned over the stair rail, His head thrown far back, His eyes closed, in anguished prayer. I sat with Carrie on the top step, watching Him. This is like Christ in Gethsemane, I thought.

We could hear the voice of Howard MacNutt stumbling through his confession: "I was like Saul." But he seemed to be saying it by rote, dragging through it still unconvinced. Nevertheless when he came upstairs again, the Master deluged him with love.

By that time the Master was back in His room and as Mr MacNutt appeared at the door, He ran forward to meet him. Our Lord was all in white that night and as He ran with His arms wide open He looked like a great flying bird. He enfolded Howard in a close embrace, kissed his face and neck, welcomed with ecstasy this broken man who, even though bewildered, had obeyed Him.

The next night while Mamma, Miss Annie Boylan<sup>[128]</sup> and I were together in the Master's Presence, Miss Annie Boylan brought up Mr MacNutt's name and spoke gloatingly of his chastisement.

The Master sighed. "I immersed Mr MacNutt in the fountain of Job last night," He said.

The next morning, Sunday, 24 November, I hastened to the Master's house. I knew it would be full of people, friends from other towns who had come to attend the banquet and to be with the Master during His last days here. I knew Mason Remey was in New York and that I should have to meet him, perhaps this morning; and to face him before the Master and all the believers would be misery. Our engagement, in the eyes of the believers, had been the most ideal romance: <sup>[129]</sup> I had seen many moved to tears by it, and when the engagement was broken, every one of them had resented it, taking up cudgels for Mason and putting the entire blame on me. As for Mason, he had said: "I am an Indian. I never forgive."

For over a year Mason and I had avoided each other in perfectly absurd ways. When I had to go down to Washington, I had written him: "Please stay away from the meetings while I am there." (!) Then one day, in Washington, when I boarded a moving, rocking street car, I fell backward on somebody's lap and turned to find myself sitting on Mason's knees! I haven't seen him since and now, as I approached the Master's house, knowing he would surely be inside — if not at that moment, very soon — I wanted to turn and run.

Suddenly I saw that all this was nonsense and should be overcome at once, before the Master's departure. An idea occurred to me. I stood on the doorstep a minute or two bracing myself to carry it out, to walk boldly up to Mason and say: "Let's go to the Master now and tell Him we are friends again and want to work together in the old way as a real brother and sister in the Cause." All at once, though still a little shy, I felt eager to do this, to put things right.

I opened the door, and there stood Marie Hopper, evidently waiting to waylay me. She looked very mysterious, important and excited. "Juliet," she said, "I must have a word with you. There is something I have to do."

Then she exhorted me to marry Mason. She told me she knew the Master wished it; she had "private information". The Master had said I would "suffer" until I did marry him

"If I have to suffer," I said, "I prefer a respectable martyrdom! I'd be nothing but a common prostitute if I married him. And I can't believe, Marie, that the Master really said this."

May Maxwell came up at that moment, very earnest and starry-eyed, to reinforce Marie.

"Very well," I said, "I will talk with the Master myself about it. He is just upstairs, thank God, no further away than the top floor of this house, and whatever He wants me to do, I will do."

I went up with Valiyu'llah __Kh__án. But first I stopped on the third floor and had a little private cry with Valiyu'llah. Percy Grant was to come the next day to the Master — this would be his last visit — and who could tell what would happen then; what miracle might not happen; what change might not take place in him? And now, Mason Remey looming up again!

We found the Master on the point of going out, standing in His room, holding a big, white, folded umbrella. I knelt and He pressed my head against His arm and took my hand in a tight clasp. "Speak," He said.

"Tell the Master, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, that I know He will laugh at this, because I want to speak about marrying Mason. I have heard from Marie Hopper that the Master wishes it. If He really does wish it, I am ready."

"Na! Na!" (No! No!) said the Master. His eyes were twinkling and the corners of His mouth quivering as though He were trying not to smile. "It was this way," He said. "I never interfere. Mrs Hopper came and told me that she wanted to unite you and Mr Remey. I said 'Very well, try.' But it is just as I wrote you long ago. Unless there is perfect agreement — perfect harmony — love, these things are not good."

I kissed His tender hand.

Needless to say, after this, I couldn't go near Mason Remey.

---

On 20 November, the Master spent the morning in my little room.[130] Once more His Glory shone in my room; His Life was diffused in it. It is a sanctuary now to me, like a chapel in our house.

He had brought Mrs Champney with Him and Mr MacNutt and, during the morning, Mr MacNutt, who was standing behind the Master very humbly, lifted the hem of His 'aba to his lips.

Mamma brought the Master some soup which she had prepared especially for Him.

"I was just wishing for soup," He said sweetly. "You, Mrs Thompson, have the reality of love."

Mamma then showed Him Papa's picture and He kissed it.

After a while He left us and was absent for some time. When He came back He said: "I have been in every room in your house."

And when He bade us goodbye, as He swung down the stairs with His powerful step, His voice rang out: "This house is blessed."

After He had gone I sat in the chair He had sat in and wrote an appeal to Percy Grant: "I tried to reach you by phone this morning to tell you the Master is soon returning to Haifa and that He wishes to take His portrait with Him." (Percy had been exhibiting it in the chapel of his Parish House.) "And to ask if some time tomorrow I could come for it. I want to thank you too for your hospitality to the Master's picture and for your beautiful reference to it last Sunday, of which I have heard.

"You have given to many an opportunity to see at least a portrayal, if a very weak one, of a dear face which I doubt if most of us will see again. He is going back into dangerous conditions. Dear Percy, will you let Him go without saying goodbye to Him? Only the other day he was speaking of you."

To this I received a very stiff answer, merely asking the date of the Master's sailing and His address.

---

On Saturday, the twenty-third, the Master spent most of the day in Montclair. When I went to His Seventy- Eighth Street house in the late afternoon I was met with joyous news. By staying over in Montclair He had missed reserving His passage on the Mauretania and His sailing was now delayed! Also I heard that Percy had telephoned and asked for permission to call Monday.

That night the Master gave a banquet at the Great Northern Hotel.

May Maxwell, Marie Hopper, Marjorie, Rhoda, Mamma, and I sat at the same table. Just before the food was served the Master rose from his seat, a vial of attar of rose in His hand, and passed among all the tables, anointing every one of His guests. As His wonderful hand, dripping perfume, touched my forehead, as He scattered on my hair the fragrant drops, my whole being seemed to wake and sparkle.

At the end of His talk[131] He said: "Such a banquet and such an assemblage command the sincere devotion of all present and invite the down-pouring of the blessings of God. Therefore be ye assured and confident that the confirmations of God are descending upon you, the assistance of God will be given unto you, the breaths of the Holy Spirit will quicken you with a new life, the Sun of Reality will shine gloriously upon you and the fragrant breeze of the rose gardens of Divine Mercy will waft through the windows of your souls. Be ye confident and steadfast ..."

---

The following morning, 25 November, I spent with the Master. One heavenly thing He said was this: "I have searched throughout the length and breadth of this land for flames, I want the flames! The solid ones are no good." Then He told me I was a flame. And He spoke beautifully of Mamma: "If I had a mother like yours, Juliet, I would never deviate, even by a hair's breadth, from her wishes."

That night Mamma went to see Him with me. He was looking utterly spent, but He insisted on keeping us — wouldn't let us go for at least an hour.

In the meantime, at five o'clock, Percy Grant had come. The Master was out but expected back any minute. He had had to address a Women's Club early in the afternoon and from there was to go to Mrs Cochran's. Through Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án, He had asked me to wait and detain Percy. While I was waiting in the English basement, Carrie and Mrs Champney with me, a taxicab stopped at the door; then in came Dr Grant, very big and rigid, his black clerical broadcloth and his white clerical collar firmly moulded around him.

Soon the Master returned. I can still see that Figure entering the room like a mighty Eastern king, in His long green 'aba, edged with white fur, His white turban; I can see His outstretched arms, His divinely sweet smile; can hear the music of His voice: that long "Oh-h! Oh-h!" of welcome. "Oh-h! Oh-h!, Dr Grant!" as though to meet Dr Grant were the most delectable thing on earth.

Then He took Percy's hand and held it, never letting it go while I saw them together, and began to talk smilingly to him.

"You must excuse me for keeping you waiting, Dr Grant. I am very, very sorry to have kept you waiting, very sorry. But I was captured by three hundred women this afternoon. Is it not a dreadful thing to be captured by so many women? (At this I felt wickedly amused.) "The women in America dominate the men," the Master continued. "Come upstairs with Me." And still holding Percy by the hand, with the lightness of a spirit He led him up the first flight. I shall never cease to see those two figures. The King of the East — and the West — in the garments of an Eastern king, leading the way to an upper chamber; the resistant clergyman, hardened into his clerical clothes, stiffly following, pulled up the stairs by a too strong hand.

But when Percy came down, after a very long time, his whole face was changed. His eyes were like burning stars, his mouth softened, relaxed. He grasped my hand and pressed it. "May I take you home, Juliet?"

"Thanks, Percy, I am staying here for a while."

Soon after he left, Dr Farid rushed down the stairs to me.

"There is hope — great hope," he said. "He was a changed man today. Entirely different from last summer. He seemed deeply touched at the thought of the Master returning into danger and asked if we would cable him if any trouble should arise, so that he might do whatever he could. He asked also if, from time to time, the Master would send him news, 'through one of your humblest followers,' he said.

"When he spoke of danger the Master replied that He had never feared danger and told him the story of the Turkish Investigating Committee sent to 'Akká by 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd. How the verdict of this Committee was that He — 'Abdu'l-Bahá — must die; that He must either be crucified at the gate of 'Akká or sent alone to the desert of Fezan, where He would inevitably starve. How at that time the Italian consul, a friend, had arranged for a ship to be sent to Haifa, ostensibly with cargo, but really to help the Master escape. And how the Master had said: 'My Father, Bahá'u'lláh, never delivered Himself, though He had the opportunity. From this Prison He spread His Teachings. I, therefore, will follow in His footsteps. I will not deliver Myself.'

"Then," Dr Farid went on, "the Master told Dr, Grant of the hastening of the Committee to Turkey to lay its verdict with all possible speed before the Sulṭán, but before they landed on Turkish soil, 'the cannon of God had boomed forth at the gates of the Sulṭán's palace.' 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd was deposed by the rising of the Young Turks and 'Abdu'l-Bahá set free.

"So," ended the Master, 'God delivered Me.'"

The miracle had happened. Percy Grant was "a changed man!"

---

Not long was I allowed to cherish my hope!

The next day, 26 November, while I was waiting in the Master's house, He sent Dr Ba__gh__dádí to bring me to His room. May Maxwell was with Him and Dr Ba__gh__dádí remained. I sat on the floor at my Lord's feet.

Smiling down on me, He said: "Why does Mrs Maxwell love you so, Juliet?"

"Because she is my spiritual mother."

"In Montreal, when I was staying with her, she was always mentioning your name and Lua's. 'Juliet, Lua. Juliet, Lua. Juliet, Lua,'" chanted the Master. "That was her song."

"May and Lua, May and Lua," I smiled, "are the two dearest names to my heart."

"This is well," said the Master.

May turned to Dr Ba__gh__dádí. "Ask the Master," she said, "if I may be allowed to speak of something to Him." And when she had received permission: "My heart is tortured at the thought of all the children who are starving for love in these days. So little is understood of the privileges of motherhood. The children are left to nurses and brought up in blighting environments. I want to ask His prayers for the mothers of America. Juliet," she whispered to me, "join in this supplication."

I put my best foot forward to support her: "I should like to join in May's supplication that the women may soon realize that motherhood is their first function." But, even as I spoke the words I saw how funny they were, coming from me — and that I had spread a snare for my own feet, which I suspect May wanted me to do!

The Master smiled broadly.

"What are you doing advocating this, Juliet? Where are your children? Mrs Maxwell has a child, but where are yours? If you had married, you too could have brought children to me, one to sit on each knee! A sterile woman is like a fruitless tree. Of course," He added, smiling again and quoting my words of last summer, "of course you will say: 'What can I do with my heart.'"

"No, I won't say that any more," I answered. "You can do something with my heart if I cannot. You can make me a new heart. And now, since the Master has spoken of this," I said to Dr Ba__gh__dádí, "there is something I should like to ask Him. Last spring and summer He was indefinite with me about ... Dr Grant; perhaps, as I have been thinking lately, because I wasn't strong enough to bear the truth. But I believe I am stronger now and ready, at a word from Him, to renounce this hope. Is it not to be fulfilled?"

"No," said the Master. "Otherwise, I would have told you."

For a moment we sat in His Presence silent. In the fire of that Presence, in that little moment, my hope of twelve years melted away. As it vanished, a miracle happened. The Being sitting before me, now writing on a bit of parchment held in the palm of His hand, changed from a body to a sun-like Spirit. I saw Him translucent, luminous, and depths of iridescence opened behind Him.

"Oh," I cried, tears coursing down my cheeks, "since that phantom of a hope went, I have entered the Presence of God."

The Master said nothing. He was still writing, writing mysteriously.

"May," I whispered, "do you remember that prayer: 'As the Pen moves over the pages of the Tablet by which the musk of significances in the world of creation is exhaled?'"

After a while the Master looked up. "I wish you to marry, Juliet," He said. "I wish you to bring Me children to hold on My knees. God will send someone to you who will be agreeable to you."

What did it matter?

"May I ask one thing, my Lord? May I supplicate for Percy's soul, that in the end he will see the truth?"

"We must always pray for him," answered the Master.

Mrs Krug and Carrie came in then. I hated to cry before them, but I couldn't stop.

"Don't cry, don't cry," said the Master, as only He can say it.

"Oh, that Voice!" whispered May.

"No, no. Don't cry." This from Grace Krug, with a very disapproving look.

"I seem to be in flames, my Lord — the flames of Thy love, Thy Presence — and to be melting."

But He saw deeper. "Khayr," (no) He said slowly

"NO!" echoed Mrs Krug.

"You must be happy," the Master ended, "because of this thing I have told you."

As I said, this happened in the afternoon of 26 November. The morning had been a tremendous one.

Knowing that my Lord would be at the Kinneys', I went directly there. On the way up in the bus a great wave of tears, like a tidal wave, rose from my heart (I didn't know why) and threatened at any moment to break over me.

I found the Master on the upper floor of the Kinneys' house with the Persians, Carrie and Ned, Nellie Lloyd, and Mr Mills. The Tablet of the Branch[132] was being translated under the supervision of the Master. Dr Ba__gh__dádí and Dr Farid were working on it, submitting it time after time to the Master before He was satisfied with their rendering. I shall never forget His sternness, His terrific majesty as He directed that translation.

The wave of tears did break as I listened and watched. I was shaken beyond all control. Mírzá Maḥmúd and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án tenderly tried to calm me.

7 December 1912

28 November, Thanksgiving Day, was to be a day of rest for our Beloved Lord. It had been given out that no one would be received at the house that day. So, when the telephone rang about noon and Aḥmad, at the other end, asked me to come immediately to the Master, I felt so singled out and privileged! And to be alone with Him and the Persians — that would be something important, something wonderful.

But He met me with a grave, almost stern face. And with a command which at once banished my complacent hope. Swiftly crossing His room to the door where I stood, He said, without even a greeting: "Mrs May Maxwell is sick. I want you to go with some medicine to her and to spend the afternoon taking care of her." He walked back to the window, beckoning me to follow Him. Then He picked up a glass from His table and a bottle of rosewater. "Give her this," He said. "Pour out so much," (He poured about an inch into the glass) "and so much water. Put in some sugar, the sugar of your love. Drink this yourself." He gave me the glass He had been preparing, for my cure, and, looking pointedly at me, began to pray.

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

Feeling strangely numb, I said, as I drank the rosewater: "Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

He turned to the window and looked out.

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá," I echoed.

Again and again He repeated the Greatest Name and I repeated it after Him, praying with Him.

At last He said: "Now go to Mrs May Maxwell. Telephone your mother that I have sent you to her as she is sick, to spend the afternoon with her."

Then He bowed, still grave, and I left Him, the bottle of rosewater in my hand.

- (Footnote. 1947. Years later I was to see the meaning of this and that I had utterly failed in administering the "medicine". Mrs May Maxwell wouldn't drink it; she said I had put too much sugar in it. I loved her with a personal love. It never rose to the heights of an all-forgiving love, and so I couldn't overcome that strange vein of cruelty in the love I think she felt for me. We were still divided when she died. This was one of my great failures. Another significant thing: Nine years after that date, on 28 November 1921, our Beloved Lord ascended. Could this have been the reason, with His pre-vision, that He spent that day in 1912 in solitude?) *

Within the next day or two, Mrs May Maxwell and I were together in His Presence. "Am I spiritually sick, my Lord?" she asked. "For I was not physically sick the day you sent me the rosewater."

“Yes,” He answered gently, “you are spiritually sick. Had you been physically sick I would have sent you a doctor instead of Juliet.”

---

On 29 November, May Maxwell, Dorothea Spinney, and I were with the Master when Esther Foster came in. May, Miss Spinney, and I rose.

“All of you may stay,” said the Master, “on the condition that Juliet doesn’t cry.”

I tried so hard after that to squeeze back the tears, but I couldn’t. I wiped them away furtively as they trickled down one by one.

He kept us with Him an hour. Dorothea Spinney — an Englishwoman and a Theosophist — spoke of a vision she had had while meditating. She has seen a great globe of fire which she seemed to know was “the Centre of Peace”.

“I should like to understand this,” she said. “What, or Who is the Centre of Peace?”

The Master had been writing on a piece of parchment held in the palm of His hand. He continued to write, not looking up, leaving Miss Spinney’s question in the air.

And all the time He glowed more and more, like the sun dispersing clouds, pulsing out with every breath intenser light.

“Look at His Face,” I whispered to Miss Spinney, “and see the Centre of Peace.”

By and by He spoke: “Excuse me for writing,” He said, “it was very important. You asked me concerning visions. Sometimes the thought becomes abstracted, enters the World of Reality, and there makes discoveries.”

Then He rose and began to pace up and down and discovered that I was crying.

“Oh my Lord,” I cried, in a panic, “what are You going to do with me?”

“I am going to find a Mister for you,” He laughed.

Those last meetings in the Kinneys’ house. Those divine talks of the Good Shepherd leaving His flock for a while: too tender, too sad for the heart to bear.[133]

One day, however, He was very stern. Holding the book of the Hidden Words in His hand, walking back and forth with that step which always makes me think of the prophecy, “Who is this that cometh from Bozrah, Who treadeth the wine-press in His fury?” lifting the Hidden Words high, He said: “Whosoever does not live up to these Words is not of Me.”

---

Mr Howard Colby Ives accepted the Cause in those days. Mrs Moore accepted. Touched to the core of their beings they would sit with streaming eyes in the meetings.

[Photograph: ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the Kinney family in their home in New York.]

At last came the day before He sailed.

“May I stay in some corner of this house all day,” I asked, “that I may breathe the same air with You this last day?”

“What does your mother say about it?” — laughing.

“She said I might.”

“Very well.”

In the afternoon He called me. He kept me in the room a long, long time, seeing many others while I sat there. When He had dismissed them all, He came close to me and took my hand.

“There is a matter,” He said, “about which I want to speak to you. The photographs of the portrait you painted of Me, you have offered them for the Ma__sh__riqu’l-A__dh__kár. I know your circumstances, Juliet. You have not complained to Me, you have said nothing, but I know them. I know your affairs are in confusion, that you have debts, that you have that house, that you have to take care of your mother. Now I want you to keep the money” (for the photographs) “for yourself. No, no; do not feel unhappy,” (as I began to cry) “this is best. You must do exactly as I say. I will speak about this Myself to the believers. I will tell them,” He laughed, “that is it My command.”

I thanked Him brokenly.

I can see Him now, pacing up and down the room in front of the line of Persians, who stood with bowed heads and folded arms in the Glory of His Presence, deeply aware of its Divineness.

Then Valiyu’llah spoke: “Juliet wants to know if You are pleased with her, or not?”

(I had spoken out my troubled heart to dear Valiyu’llah.)

“I am very much pleased with the love of Juliet,” answered the Master.

My Lord, I pray that my life may please You.”

“Insha’llah.” And that was all!

“And that my services may become acceptable to You. I know I have not begun to serve You yet.”

The Master said nothing.

But that night He healed my broken heart, healed it by a tone in His voice as He spoke to my mother, which was the essence of God’s tenderness, a tone unimaginable to those who have only heard the human voice.

As Mamma approached Him to bid Him goodbye, He said: “Ah, the mother of Juliet; the mother of Julie!” (Mamma’s pet name for me.)

“I can’t bear to say goodbye,” said Mamma.

“Insha’llah, I shall meet you in ‘Akká, Mrs Thompson, and there I shall greet you with ‘Welcome! Welcome!’”

This was on the night of 4 December.

He asked me to come to the Emerys' (where He had been staying for a few days) the morning of 5 December, the day of His sailing; and I was there at eight o'clock. That last morning. I stood at the door of His room, gazing in, my eyes drinking their fill, if they ever could drink their fill, of the Divine Figure as He sat, or stood, or moved about the room.

He called me in twice. The second time He took my hand. "Remember," He said, "I am with you always. Bahá'u'lláh will be with you always."

Carrie Kinney was there that morning and Ned, and 'Alí Qulí ___Kh___án and Florence, Edna Ballora and her husband, Harriet Magee, Mrs Parsons, and Mrs Hannen. The Master had invited Mamma too, but she had not felt well enough to go.

"Rest assured," He said when I told Him, "that she will be healed." And He filled my arms with fruit for her.

We drove to the boat, then followed Him up to His cabin. Many believers were crowding the cabin. Later we all went upstairs and sat in a large room with Him. Very soon He rose, and, walking up and down, delivered to us His last spoken message.[134]

First He described heartbreakingly the war now raging in the Balkans. Then He said: "As to you: your efforts must be lofty. Exert yourselves with heart and soul that perchance through your efforts the light of Universal Peace may shine and this darkness of estrangement and enmity may be dispelled from amongst men ...

"You have no excuse to bring before God if you fail to live according to His Command, for you are informed of that which constitutes the good-pleasure of God ...

"It is My hope that you may become successful in this high calling, so that like brilliant lamps you may cast light upon the world of humanity and quicken and stir the body of existence like unto a spirit of life.

"This is eternal glory. This is everlasting felicity. This is immortal life. This is heavenly attainment. This is being created in God's image and likeness. And unto this I call you, praying to God to strengthen and bless you."

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá leaving America on the Celtic from New York City.]

He seated Himself again in a corner of the large cabin, all the believers flocked around Him. I sat opposite Him at a little distance, weeping quietly. A great fear had taken possession of me, a question risen in my mind which must be answered or I should have no peace — I should be left in a frantic state. I rose and walked over to Him and stood before Him.

"My Lord," I said, "each time I have parted from You: in Haifa, in Europe, You have said You would call me again to You. Each time You gave me hope that I would see You again. But this time You gave me no hope. Won't I see You again, my Lord?"

"This is My hope," He replied.

"But still You don't tell me, my Lord, and it makes me feel hopeless."

"You must not feel hopeless."

This was all He said to me. It killed me. While I sat, weighed down with despair and grief, He drew from an inside pocket the purse Dr Grant had sent Him last summer, laid it on His knee and looked at me. To me it seemed a promise that He Himself would take care of Percy. And this was the very last.

It was death to leave that ship. I stood on the pier with May Maxwell, tears blurring my sight. Through them I could see the Master in the midst of the group of Persians waving a patient hand to us. It waved and waved, that beautiful patient hand, till the Figure was lost to sight.

(1947. Because of those blurring tears I could not see the look on His face, the look of profound agony, as though He were on the cross, as He bade His immature children farewell, foreseeing for us so many sorrows, so many failures, and a world gone to pieces because of our failures.

This look I have seen ever since in a photograph taken at that last moment.)

Diary of Juliet Thompson: Chapter 4

Chapter 3 Notes

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

25 March to 7 December 1912

To the attracted maid-servant of God, Juliet Thompson.

HE IS GOD!

O thou candle of the Love of God!

Thy numerous letters were received. According to the promise, by the Will of God, I shall embark on the boat 25 March and in the latter part reach Naples, where I shall stay a few days and from thence start for New York.

Verily, this is great glad tidings. Upon thee by Bahá'u'l-Abhá.

(signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá Abba. Translated in the Orient.

New York

Twelve o'clock, 25 March 1912

It is just midnight. TODAY the Master sails for America. I feel His Presence strongly.

Notes

Received March 25:

The Church of the Ascension. 5 Avenue and 10th Street.

23 March

My dear Juliet:

I understand that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is to arrive in New York 10 April – that is, in Easter week, – so that the 14 April would be his first Sunday in New York.

If his friends in this city would feel any value or assistance in having him speak at the eleven o'clock service in the Church of the Ascension, in place of my sermon, I shall be more than happy to invite him to the Ascension pulpit in my place. I should like to show so important and splendid a person, and those who love him, whatever hospitality and goodwill can be expressed in this town, by such a plan.

If, however, his coming in the middle of the week means that he ought to get more quickly into public contact with the city, which may well be the case if his stay is brief, then I would offer the Church of the Ascension to the committee in charge of his affairs to have any kind of service they please, in the daytime or evening, between his arrival, let us say 10 April – and the following Sunday.

That is to say I make one of two propositions: to offer him my pulpit Sunday, 14 April, at eleven a.m., or to offer the Church, unhampered by any form of service, between the tenth and the fourteenth.

Faithfully,

(signed) Percy S. Grant

---

What will obedience bring forth, if half-obedience brings forth this? I have refused all winter to see Percy Grant.

I wrote thanking him and asking him to get in touch with the committee of arrangements, Mr Mills and Mr MacNutt.

28 March 1912

My dear Juliet:

I thank you for your nice letter about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Whatever may seem most agreeable to those having the matter in charge will be altogether satisfactory to me.

Whatever I can do I hope you will allow me to do, to honour such a distinguished visitor from the East — one so loved by my friends.

Believe me to be faithfully yours,

8 April 1912

Little did I dream when I began this diary what I would write in its closing pages! This morning I telephoned Percy.

"This is Juliet."

"Ah, Juliet."

"I want to tell you two things. First, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is on the Cedric and will arrive Wednesday morning. And — is your time very full Thursday? For I think He will send for you almost at once."

"Wait. Let me get my card, Juliet. No, I have no engagements for Thursday, except in the evening, and could come any time during the day to see Him. I am very happy. I shall be very glad to see the Master, Juliet."

"As soon as He arrives, someone will let you know."

I then brought up the second thing.

"I'd like to explain something," I said. "Has Dr Guthrie got into touch with you?"

"No."

“Then I hardly need to explain. But it was this: Charles James had heard some rumour that the Master was to speak in your church. He mentioned this to Dr Guthrie, who immediately wanted to offer his church, too. This morning a letter came from Dr Guthrie inviting the Master to speak on the night of the fourteenth. I tell you all this really to say that it was not through me Dr Guthrie heard of your plans.”

“I am a very easy person, Juliet, in misunderstandings.”

“I know that.”

“And I am glad Dr Guthrie has made the same offer that I have.”

“No one has made the same offer you have.”

It was then he repeated something he had said to Mr MacNutt; I can't remember just what.

“That was beautiful of you,” I answered.

“No, it was not. And Juliet: I don't want you to feel that this is a favour. I want you to feel — to understand — that you have a proprietary interest in the church: a proprietary interest; that it is yours to give. The church is yours. The Parish House is yours. The Rectory is yours.[88] We will ask the Master to the Rectory and form little groups to meet Him. I don't want to bore you, Juliet,” (oh imagine him boring me!) “but I want you to feel that it is yours, this house. Here it is, just at the end of the street. Ask anyone to the Rectory, anyone you wish. You may eliminate the Rector, if you would rather not have me here ...” This and much more. He contradicted that last statement once. “I want you,” he said, with his appealing boyishness, “to come around me again, Juliet.” His voice broke. He stammered a little and ended. “I am a tongue-tied person when it comes to strong feeling.”

“I should like,” I said, “to take you by the hand and lead you to the Master myself.”

“I want you to, Juliet. I don't want to do it any other way. I want you to be there. I don't want to do it without you.”

“Then we will meet on Thursday. We will see each other on Thursday in His Presence. I think it will be beautiful to meet there.”

“It will be the north and the south in His Presence, Juliet.”

“The Master has loved you a long time, Percy, for your work.”

“Some people say they are loved for their enemies, Juliet. If I am loved, it is for my friends.”

10 April 1912. 11:15 p.m.

Tomorrow He comes! Who comes? “Who is this that cometh from Bozrah?”

This is a night of holy expectation. The air is charged with sanctity. I can almost hear the Gloria in Excelsis.

How close He is tonight! Is it His prayers I feel? Why has earth become suddenly divine?

Midnight

The Master comes TODAY!

11 April 1912

Oh day of days!

I was wakened this morning while it was yet dark by something shining into my eyes. It was a ray from the moon, its waning crescent framed low in my windowpane.

Symbol of the Covenant, was my first thought. How perfectly beautiful to be wakened today by it! But at once I remembered another time when I had seen the waning moon hanging, then, above palm trees. I was on the roof of the House in 'Akká with the Master and Munavvar __Kh__ ánum. The Master was pointing to the moon. "The East. The moon. No!" He said. "I am the Sun of the West."

At dawn, kneeling at my window, I prayed in the swelling light for all this land, now sleeping, that it would wake to receive its Lord; conscious, as I prayed, of an overshadowing Sacred Presence: a great, glorious, burning Presence — the Sun of Love rising. This fiery dawn was but a pale symbol of such a rising.

Between seven and eight I went to the pier with Marjorie Morten and Rhoda Nichols. The morning was crystal clear, sparkling. I had a sense of its being Easter: of lilies, almost seen, blooming at my feet.

All the believers of New York had gathered at the pier to meet the Master's ship. Marjorie and I had suggested to them that the Master might not want this public demonstration, but their eagerness was too great to be influenced by just two, and so we had gone along with them — only too glad to do so, to tell the truth.

During the morning the harbour misted over. At last, in the mist we saw: a phantom ship! And at that very moment some newsboys ran through the crowd, waving Extras. "The Pope is dead! The Pope is dead!" they shouted. The Pope was not dead. The Extras had been printed only on a rumour; but what a symbol, and how exactly timed!

Closer and closer, ever more substantial, came that historic ship, that epoch-making ship, till at last it swam out solid into the light, one of the Persians sitting in the bow in his long robes, 'aba, and turban. This was Siyyid Asadu'lláh, a marvellous, witty old man, who had come with the Master to prepare His meals.

He told us later that when the ship was approaching the harbour and the Master saw, as His first view of America, the Wall Street skyscrapers, He had laughed and said: "Those are the minarets of the West." [89] What divine irony!

The ship docked, but the Master did not appear. Suddenly I had a great glimpse. In the dim hall beyond the deck, striding to and fro near the door, was One with a step that shook you! Just that one stride, charged with power, the sweep of a robe, a majestic head, turban crowned — that was all I saw, but my heart stopped.

Marjorie's instinct and mine had been true. Mr Kinney was called for to come on board the ship. He returned with a disappointing message. The Master sent us His love but wanted us to disperse now. He would meet us all at the Kinneys' house at four.

Everyone obeyed at once except Marjorie, Rhoda, and myself! Marjorie, who loves the Teachings but has never wholly accepted them, said: "I can't leave till I've seen Him. I can't. I WON'T!" So, though we followed the crowd to the street, we slipped away there and looked around for some place to hide. Quite a distance below the big entrance to the pier we saw a fairly deep embrasure into which a window was set, with the stone wall jutting out from it. Here we flattened ourselves against the window, Rhoda (who is conspicuously tall) clasping a long white box of lilies which she had brought for the Master. Just in front of the entrance stood Mr. Mills' car, his chauffeur in it. Suddenly it rolled forward and, to our utter dismay, parked directly in front of us. Now we were caught: certain to be discovered. But there was no help for it, for Marjorie still refused to budge till she had seen the Master.

Then, He came — through the entrance with Mr MacNutt and Mr Mills, and turned and walked swiftly toward the car. In a panic we waited.

A few nights ago Marjorie and I had a double dream. In her dream, I was out in space with her. In mine, we were in a room together and the Master had just entered it. He walked straight up to Marjorie, put His two hands on her shoulders and pressed and pressed till she sank to her knees. And while she was sinking, she lifted her face to His and everything in her seemed to be dying except her soul, which looked out through her raised eyes in a sort of agony of recognition.

Today, after one glance at the Master, this was just the way she looked.

"Now," she said, "I know."

As the Master was stepping into the car, He turned and — smiled at us.

---

We met Him in the afternoon at the Kinneys'. When I arrived with Marjorie, He was sitting in the centre of the dining room near a table strewn with flowers. He wore a light pongee 'aba. At His knees stood the Kinney children, Sanford and Howard, and His arms were around them. He was very white and shining. No words could describe His ineffable peace. The people stood about in rows and circles: several hundred in the big rooms, which all open into each other. In the dining room many sat on the floor, Marjorie and I included. We made a dark background for His Glory. Only our tears reflected Him, and almost everyone there was weeping just at the sight of Him. For at last we saw divinity incarnate. Divinely He turned His head from one child to the other, one group to another. I wish I could picture that turn of the head — an oh, so tender turn, with that indescribable heavenly grace caught by Leonardo da Vinci in his Christ of the Last Supper (in the study for the head) — but in 'Abdu'l-Bahá irradiated by smiles and a lifting of those eyes filled with glory, which even Leonardo, for all his mystery, could not have painted.

The very essence of compassion, the most poignant tenderness is in that turn of the head.

The next morning early the Master telephoned me (that is, Ahmad[90] telephoned for Him) and nearly every morning after. Can you imagine the sweetness of that — to be wakened every morning by a word from Him? Sometimes He just inquired how I was, but often He called me to Him.

When I first went to see Him He asked me only one question. "How is your mother?"

"Not very well, my Lord."

"What is the matter?"

"She is grieving." And I told Him why. My brother is soon to be married to a quite beautiful, brilliant girl who, however, doesn't want to make friends with his family!

“Bring your mother to Me,” He said. “I will comfort her.”

He sent for her that very night. I was terribly afraid she wouldn't go — she has been so opposed to my work in the Cause — and Aḥmad called up in the midst of a thunderstorm! But when I took the message to her — that the Master wished her to come to Him now — she jumped up from her chair and began to scurry around.

“Just wait till I get my rubbers,” she said.

We found Him exhausted, lying on His bed. He had seen hundreds of people that day, literally, at a big reception and in His own rooms. Mamma, who is very shy and undemonstrative, rushed to the bedside and fell on her knees.

“Welcome, welcome!” said the Master. “You are very welcome, Mrs Thompson.

“You must be very thankful for your daughter. Praise be to God, she is a daughter of the Kingdom. If she were an earthly daughter, of what use would she be to you? At best she could do you a little material good. But she is a heavenly daughter, a daughter of the Kingdom. Therefore she is the means of drawing your soul nearer to God. Her value to you is not apparent now. When one possesses a thing its value is not realized. But you will realize later. Mary Magdalene was but a villager; she was even scorned by the people, but now her name moves the whole earth, and in the Kingdom of God she is very near. Your daughter is kind to you. If your son is faithless, she is faithful. She will become dearer and dearer to you. She will take the place of your son. But in the end your son will be very good. This is only temporary.

“I became very grieved today when, upon inquiring for you, I heard of your sorrow. And now I want to comfort you. Trust in God. God is kind. God is faithful. God never forgets you. If others are unkind what difference does it make when God is kind? When God is on your side it does not matter what men do to you. But your son will be good in the end.

“God is kind to you. And I am going to be kind to you. And I am faithful!”

Mamma, still on her knees, bent and kissed His hand. “Tell the Master,” she said to Aḥmad, “I have always loved Him. Lua knows that.” (If Lua knew, I certainly didn't.)

“I have no need of a witness,” the Master answered, so tenderly. “My heart knows.”

The next day Mamma said to me: “All my bitterness has gone. The Master must be helping me.”[91]

It was on Saturday, 13 April, that Mamma and I visited the Master. On Friday He had called me early, asking me to meet Him at the MacNutts’.

I shall never cease to see Him as He looked speaking from their stairway, standing below a stained glass window in a ray of sunlight, the powerful head, the figure in its flowing robes, outlined in light.

The Master has a strange quality of beautifying His environment, of throwing a glamour over it and blotting out the ugly. The MacNutts’ house is ugly; the one redeem- ing feature of that stairway, its window. All I saw as the Master stood there was Himself, the window, the ray of light. His words lifted my soul on wings!

In the evening Friday He spoke in Miss Phillips’ studio. The enormous room was packed. At his dear invitation I sat [on] His right (I suppose because I had given Miss Phillips the Message); Marjorie at His left near Him. In the simple setting of that studio, its overhead light filling the deep forms of His face with shadow, He looked ruggedly, powerfully beautiful. His words I will not give. They have been kept.[92]

The very day He arrived, Thursday, the Master sent for Percy Grant, but He appointed Friday to see him, in the afternoon. I was not invited to the interview, so in spite of the happy arrangement Percy and I had made, I knew I should have to stay away. Nor was I told very much about it, only that the Master had planned with Dr Grant to accept his church for Sunday (the fourteenth) for His first address in New York, choosing the Church of the Ascension out of thirteen other — and some of the clergy had even wired to Gibraltar offering their pulpits for that date! And one other very little thing (Mr MacNutt himself gave me this scrap of news): as he was standing with Dr Grant at the elevator after leaving the Master's suite, Dr Grant said to him: "You can't help but love the old gentleman."

To me Percy put it more elegantly: "The Master compels one's love and esteem. What He radiates is peace and love."

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá in New York in the garden of Howard MacNutt, 1912.]

Saturday, 13 April, the Master spoke at Marjorie Morten's.[93] Again, because of the crowd, He spoke from the stairway, dominating all the beauty of Marjorie's long drawing room, with its rich colour and carvings and masterly paintings, by His superlative beauty.

His theme that day was the spiritual seasons, and in the midst of His talk a delicious thing happened which, slight though it was, I want to keep. In its very slightness it may draw the people of the future closer to the Master, just as it drew us.

These tender little touches of His humour and simplicity, bridging for the moment the infinite space between us and His pure Perfection, making His Divinity accessible: how precious, how heavenly sweet they are, of what unique value! The disciples of Christ, looking beyond that awful chasm of the crucifixion into the mystery of their days with Him, were, I suppose, awed into silence about the little things — the adorable little things. So the Man of sorrow has been just the Man of sorrow to us. We have never formed any conception of the Man of love and joy, great buoyant joy; a Christ whose Love overflowed into little tendernesses and Whose joy overflowed into fun and wit — a happy, smiling, laughing Christ. And yet I am sure He was that.

But now to tell of this small thing. With His celestial eloquence the Master had described the spiritual springtime.

"Va tabistan," He began and paused for Aḥmad to translate.

Dead silence. Poor Aḥmad had lost the English word.

But while he stood helpless, the Master supplied it Himself.

"Summer!" He laughed. Whereupon a little ripple of delight ran through the audience. His charm had captured them all.

After the meeting He went up to rest in Mr Morten's room. He had seen a hundred and forty people that morning and was so worn out at the end of His talk that He looked almost ill. His fatigue was apparent to everyone — and yet the people had no pity. When I returned from an errand to the kitchen, literally hundreds were streaming toward His room; a dozen were in the room; in the hall were many peering faces, and climbing up the stairs — a procession!

"Oh can't we shut the door?" I asked Dr Farid. But the Master heard me.

"Let them come now," He said gently.

A mother with a baby stood near the door. The Master took the baby from her and tenderly pressed it to His heart. "Beautiful baby! Little chicken!" He said in His dear English; then explained that "little chicken" was the Turkish pet name for child.

A young single-taxer<sup>[94]</sup> began to question Him. "What message shall I take to my friends?" he ended.

"Tell them," laughed the Master (that wonderful spicy humour in His face) "to come into the Kingdom of God. There they will find plenty of land and there are no taxes on it."

Sunday. Oh, Sunday!

At the Master's own invitation I met Him at the Rectory, a half hour before the service.

As Miss Barry was holding her Sunday school class downstairs, we were invited upstairs, to the back room on the second floor. There, with the Master and the Persians and Edward Getsinger, I waited in supreme happiness. Very soon Percy came in. Approaching the Master, he bent his head reverently.

"In New Testament language," he said, "this would be called an upper chamber."<sup>[95]</sup>

The Master smiled sweetly and took his hand.

After he left, the Master turned to me. "This is a dish you have cooked for Me, Juliet," He laughed.

"I hope it is cooked all the way through!"

"Insha'llah," smiled the Master.

"I have more dishes to serve to You when You are rested," I ventured.

"I hope they are light," He replied, "and will rest easily on My digestion. Most of these dishes are so heavy!"

I inquired for dear Rúḥá __Kh__ánum, who has been very ill.

"I have put her in the hands of the Blessed Perfection," said our Lord, "and now I don't worry at all."

He spoke of my mother very lovingly.

"Tell her to trust in God," He repeated. "Tell her that God is faithful. Read the Hidden Words to her."

The time came to go to the church. The Persians, Edward Getsinger, and I went first: marching in, as Percy had planned it, with the processional, bringing up the rear of the processional! For nearly a year I hadn't once entered the Church of the Ascension; and now, what a very surprising return!

The Master waited in the vestry-room.

When I try to express the perfection of that service — I mean, the arrangement of it — I can find no words. It was the conception of an artist, of a true poet. The altar and the whole chancel were banked with calla lilies. On the back of the Bishop's chair hung a victor's wreath, an exact reproduction of the Greek victor's wreath, classically simple: a small oval of laurel with its leaves free at the top. Its meaning went to my heart.

Dr Grant read first a prophecy from the Old Testament pointing directly to this Day, to Bahá'u'lláh; then the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians. These were not the lessons for the day but specially chosen.

At the end of the Second Lesson, just as the choir began to sing in a great triumphant outburst "Jesus Lives!" 'Abdu'l-Bahá with that step of His, which has been described as the walk of either a shepherd or a king, entered the chancel, "suddenly come to His Temple!" Percy Grant had quietly left his seat and gone into the vestry-room and had returned with the Master, holding His hand. For a moment they stood at the altar beneath that fine mural, The Resurrection by John La Farge; then with beautiful deference Percy led the Master to the Bishop's chair. (This broke the nineteenth canon of the Episcopal Church, which forbids the unbaptized to sit behind the altar rail!)

The prayers over, Dr Grant made a short introductory address, speaking not from the pulpit but the chancel steps. Never shall I forget what I saw then. Percy, strong and erect, with his magnificently set head ("like the head of some Viking" as Howard MacNutt says), giving, with a fire even greater than usual — with a strange, sparkling magnetism — the Bahá'í Message to his congregation; and behind him: a flashing Face, unlike the face of any mortal, haloed by the victor's wreath, visibly inspiring him. For with every flash from those eyes, which were fixed on Dr Grant, would appear a fresh charge of energy in him. There was something wonderfully rhythmic in this transmission of fire to the words and the delivery of the man speaking. Was it the sign of some susceptibility in this hitherto unyielding man to the power of 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ? Or was it just that Power: transcendent, irresistible, quickening whom it chose?

"May the Lord lift the light of His Countenance upon you." Ah, what happens when the Lord does!

How can I tell of that moment when the Master took the place of Percy Grant on the chancel steps? When, standing in His flowing robes there, He turned His unearthly Face to the people and said:[96] "Dr Grant has just read from the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians that the day would come when you would see face to face."

It was too great to put into words; it was almost too great to bear. The pain of intense rapture pierced my heart. Could the people fail to recognize? Oh, had they recognized what would He not have revealed to them? But He could go no further. He swerved to another subject.

"I have come hither," He said, "to find that material civilization has progressed greatly, but the spiritual civilization has been left behind. The material civilization is likened unto the glass of a lamp chimney. The spiritual civilization is like the light in that chimney. The material civilization should go hand-in-hand with the spiritual civilization. Material civilization may be likened unto a beautiful body, while spiritual civilization is the spirit that enters the body and gives to it life. With the propelling power of spiritual civilization the result will be greater.

"His Holiness Jesus Christ came to this world that the people might have through Him the civilization of Heaven, a spirit of oneness with God. He came to breathe the spirit into the body of the world. There must be oneness in the world of man. When this takes place we will have the Most Great Peace.

"Today the body politic needs the oneness of the world and universal peace. But to spread the feeling of peace and firmly implant it in the minds of men a certain propelling Power is required.

"It is self-evident that spiritual civilization cannot be accomplished through material means, for the interests of the various nations differ. It is self-evident that it cannot be accomplished through patriotism, for countries differ in their ideas of patriotism. It is impossible save through spiritual power. Compared with this all other means are too weak to bring about universal peace.

“Man has two wings: his material power and development, and his spiritual understanding and achievements. With one wing alone he cannot fly. Therefore, no matter how far material civilization advances, without the other, great things cannot be accomplished. ... Humanity, generally speaking, is immersed in a sea of materiality ...”

Dr Grant asked the Master to give the benediction. Apparently He gave no blessing but asked for one for us.

Against His high background of lilies He stood, His face uplifted in prayer, His eyes closed, the palms of His hands uplifted. I seemed to feel streams of Life descending, filling those cupped hands. On either side of Him knelt the clergymen, facing the altar. Percy Grant's head was bowed low. It was a breathless moment. Then the Master raised His resonant voice and chanted.

The recessional hymn was “Christ our Lord has risen again.”

How can words tell what I realized, or thought I realized, at that incomparable service?

This church had been my cross for years, from which I had never been able to escape — though twice I had made the attempt, twice wrenching myself away, only to be guided back by what seemed to me in each instance the clear Will of God, expressed through a striking miracle. Guided back to mortal pain. Was I seeing, this morning, divine results of this pain?

And not only had I suffered more vitally here than in any other place, prayed more passionately; not only had it been the scene of my deepest inner conflict, but the cause of all this had been dramatically enacted here. Here in this pulpit, with all his great force, his disturbing magnetism and the fire of his eloquence, Percy Grant had opposed my unshakeable belief, thundering denunciations of “the subtle”, “the Machiavellian Oriental” (God forgive me for quoting this) — of the slumbering and superstitious Orient — the Orient that brought to the West “nothing but disease and death” — determined to conquer this Faith of mine which made me resistant to him. He had even gone so far as to openly name “the Bahá'í sect” in his pulpit and to warn his flock against it.

And now, framing that matchless head of the Master, who sat there so still in His Glory, hung the victor's wreath! Oh for words vivid and sublime enough to make you see Him sitting there, in the very spot where He had been so violently denied!

The Master took me back into the Rectory, into the big, dark front room. Percy rushed in for a moment, still in his surprise, his cheeks flushed, his eyes very bright and blue.

“Juliet,” he called, looking in from the dining room, “ask if the Master wants anything: tea, coffee, water — anything; then tell Thomas” (the butler).

But the Master wanted nothing except to wait to see Dr Grant (who was being detained in the church) and He filled me with indescribable joy by inviting me to wait with Him, sitting beside Him.

I sat there, happier it seemed to me than I had ever been in my life. I was in the Presence of my Lord, and the one I loved best in all this human world had at last recognized Him. For what else had that exquisite service meant, with the Resurrection stressed all through it? Such a bold acknowledgement, such a daring action in the very church itself could not have been insincere. It never occurred to me to doubt it.

But time passed and Percy did not come back. A great crowd arrived before he did. Someone, using the private way from the church, had left the door open and the people began to surge in. And then (while my heart sank with disappointment) the Master made a swift exit.

Too late Mrs Grant, Percy's dear mother, entered the room. It was a dramatic entrance. She ran in, distractedly, glancing from side to side, obviously looking for the Master. Not seeing Him there, she exclaimed: "If only I could have had His blessing! That Figure makes me think of the plains of Judea."

At that very instant Mr Mills, who had gone out with the Master, reappeared. "'Abdu'l-Bahá," he said, "is asking for Mrs Grant."

I stood at the street door and watched. The Master was sitting in Mr Mills' car, just in front of the house. I saw Mrs Grant approach it, kneel in the street and bow her head. I saw Him place His hands on her head.

A year ago I had a dream. I was in the People's Forum, stooping and kissing Mrs Grant. She looked up through tears. "I have seen the Master," she said in my dream. "He spoke to me. Oh there was never such a Face in the world!"

Now, on the steps of the Rectory, as she returned from the car, she looked up through tears.

"I got my blessing, Juliet," she said, "and I didn't have to ask for it."

I went back to the church to thank Percy Grant and found him alone. His last parishioner had just gone. For a moment we stood with clasped hands.

"You made everything so beautiful. I can't find the right words to thank you.

"My darling," he said, "my darling —"

Something in his look — something false — woke me. Sick at heart, I turned away.[97

That night how I hungered to see the Master. My heart burned to see Him. I went to the telephone. Ah, these days when just by a telephone call we can reach Him! One of the Persians answered my call

"Is the Master well tonight? Is He resting?" I asked.

"He is in His room, reading Tablets."

---

The next morning, through Aḥmad, the Master telephoned me. He wanted to know how I was.

"Tell Him my heart is burning for Him just as it used to in Haifa."

"The Master says: come at once to Him."

And scarcely was I seated in His room when He began to speak of Percy Grant. He spoke with great love, with great appreciation of the service Percy had rendered, but told me to be very careful in my relations with him.

"You must keep your acquaintance, Juliet, absolutely formal."

Then He gave me this message: "Convey to Dr Grant My greetings. Say: I will not forget the services thou hast rendered yesterday. They are engraved on the book of My heart. I will mention thy name everywhere. And know thou this: This matter of yesterday will become most wonderful in the history of the world. The world of existence will not forget yesterday. Thousands of years hence the mention of yesterday will be heard and it will become history that you were the founder of this work.

"I ask of God for you all those things I have asked for Myself and they are: that thou mayest become a sincere servant of God and serve in the Kingdom of God and become sanctified and holy; that thou mayest find a pure and enlightened heart, an illumined face; become the cause that the lights of spiritual morals may illumine the hearts in this country and that they may be illumined in the world of the Kingdom; become the promoter of Truth and deliver the souls from ignorance and prejudice. I supplicate to the Kingdom of God for you, and I will never forget the love that was manifested yesterday.

"I hope," said the Master, turning to me, "that he will become a believer, but I do not know. The rectorship of that church is in the way. If he could give it up of his own volition, then he might become a believer."

He spoke of my dear mother: "Convey to thy mother the greetings of Abhá. Say to her: Always remember My advices. It is my hope that thou mayest forget everything save God. Nothing in this world is sufficient for man. God alone is sufficient for him. God is the Protector of man. All the world will not protect the soul."

I sent Percy Grant the message and later he telephoned me.

"That was a wonderful, wonderful message," he said, his voice strangely upset.

---

Early Sunday evening, the fourteenth, the Master spoke at the Carnegie Lyceum for the Union Meeting of Advanced Thought Centres.[98] I can give you no idea of His Glory that night. He was like a pillar of white fire.

I sat in a box with Bolton Hall, one of our fashionable intellectuals, a lean, elegant person with an Emersonian face. Turning to him for a moment, I asked: "What do you see?"

"Nothing, dear child, nothing."

16 April 1912

This morning the Master agreed to speak at the Bowery Mission.

"I want to give them some money," He said to me. "I am in love with the poor. How many poor men go to the Mission?"

"About three hundred, my Lord."

"Take this bill to the bank, Juliet, and change it into quarters," and He drew from His pocket a thousand- franc note.[99] "Have them put the quarters in a bag. Keep the money and meet Me at the Mission with it."

He handed another thousand-franc note, with the same instructions, to Edward Getsinger.

As I left His room, lilies of valley in my hand, a young chambermaid stopped me. "Did He give you those?" she asked. "He gave me some flowers yesterday. Roses. I think He is a great Saint."

---

Later, May Maxwell and I were together in the Master's room. He was lying back on His pillow, May's baby crawling over Him, feeding first the baby, then May and me with chocolates.[100] On the pillow beside Him was the victor's wreath, which He always kept near Him. Suddenly He brought up Percy's name.

"I love Dr Grant," he began. "He has rendered Me a great service. I love him very much, but I want you to be careful."

"My Lord, I believe my heart is severed," I said. "I don't know but I believe so."

He looked at me with arch incredulity: "No? Really?" He said.

May laughed.

"What do you know about it?" the Master asked.

"May knows everything about it."

"Well, has she helped you? How far has her help gone? Has it been sufficient for you?"

"She has helped me, but only God is sufficient when love has gone as deep as that."

"I know. Now, can you transfer this love to God?"

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá walking down Riverside Drive in New York, 1912]

"To God I can. To You."

"No. To God."

"Yes ... I can ... to God."

"That will be enough! I shall try to make no more marriages," laughed the Master. "When you have really given up," He added, "he will come after you." [101]

"I love Dr Grant," He continued, "very, very much, but I want to protect you."

"May I ask a question?" said May. "If Juliet put the thought of Dr Grant forever out of her mind, would this be good?"

But the Master answered evasively: "If he would become a believer and marry Juliet it would please Me very much."

"Don't we tire You?" I asked a little later. "Oughtn't we to leave You now?"

"No, stay. You rest Me. You make Me laugh!" He answered.

18 April 1912

I asked Mrs Wright if she would invite Percy to hear the Master speak at the Bowery Mission. His reply has just come through her. He said: "Give Juliet my love and my excuses. Tell her I prefer to be remembered by Him in the Church of the Ascension. Tell her this and she will understand."

---

Before writing of the Master's visit to the Bowery I must explain how it came about. In February this year

Dr Hallimond asked me for the third time to give the Bahá'í Message at the Mission. I had refused twice before because my dear mother wouldn't allow me to go there. But this third invitation I felt I must accept. So, for the first time in my life, I deceived Mamma! Silvia Gannett helped me out. (By the way her marriage has been postponed.) She invited me to dine, then went to the Mission with me. The only thing Mamma knew was that I was dining with Silvia.

The weather that night was terrible: snowing, sleeting, bitterly cold. The Mission was packed with homeless men, some of whom had been driven in by the cold and the storm and were there for no other reason. Among these, I learned afterward, was John Good — may he ever be blessed! Wonderfully named was John Good! He had been released from Sing Sing that very day: an enormous man with a head like a lion and a great shock of white hair. From his boyhood he had spent his life in one prison or another and now, in his old age, had behaved so rebelliously in Sing Sing that they would punish him in the most painful way, hanging him up by his thumbs! Full of hate he had come out of prison, and full of hate and without one grain of belief in anything, he sat among the derelicts in the Mission, forced in by the storm.

And that night (knowing nothing of John Good) I was moved to tell the men how 'Abdu'l-Bahá came out of prison, full of love for the whole world, even His cruellest enemies.

After I had finished speaking, Dr Hallimond said: "We have heard from Juliet Thompson that 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be here in April. How many of you would like to invite Him to speak at the Mission? Will those who wish it please stand?"

The whole three hundred rose to their feet.

"Now," added Dr Hallimond, taking me by surprise, "how many would like to study the thirteenth Chapter of Corinthians with Miss Thompson and myself?"

Thirty rose this time, including John Good and a poor alcoholic named Hannegan, a long, lanky, red-haired Irishman.

"Then we will meet every Wednesday at eight p.m. and learn something about this Love of which 'Abdu'l-Bahá is our Great Example."

And every Wednesday evening after that John Good and Hannegan came, with the twenty-eight others.

Of course, in order to help Dr Hallimond on these nights, I had had to confess to Mamma this first visit to the Bowery, and she was so touched by the story that she gladly consented to my keeping up the work, especially as Dr Hallimond always came for me and brought me home.

---

And now to return to the immediate present. Day before yesterday, 19 April, the Master spoke at the Bowery Mission.

I met Him in the chapel, dragging along with me the huge white bag of quarters. Edward also appeared with a bag of the same size and we sat behind the Master on the platform. Mr MacNutt, Mr Mills, Mr Grundy, and Mr Hutchinson, and of course all the Persians, were seated there too. The long hall was packed to the doors with those poor derelicts who sleep on park benches or doorsteps.

Dr Hallimond called upon me to introduce my Lord, which seemed so presumptuous I could scarcely do it.

Then the Master rose to speak. Here are His heavenly words:[102] “Tonight I am very happy for I have come here to meet My friends. I consider you my relatives, My companions, and I am your comrade.

“You must be thankful to God that you are poor, for His Holiness Jesus Christ has said: ‘Blessed are the poor.’ He never said: blessed are the rich! He said too that the Kingdom is for the poor and that it is easier for a camel to enter the needle’s eye than for a rich man to enter God’s Kingdom. Therefore you must be thankful to God that although in this world you are indigent, yet the treasures of God are within your reach, and although in the material realm you are poor, yet in the Kingdom of God you are precious.

“His Holiness Jesus Himself was poor. He did not belong to the rich. He passed His time in the desert travelling among the poor and lived upon the herbs of the field. He had no place to lay His head — no home. He was exposed in the open to heat, cold, and frost. Yet He chose this rather than riches. If riches were considered a glory, the Prophet Moses would have chosen them; Jesus would have been rich.

“When Jesus appeared it was the poor who first accepted Him, not the rich. Therefore, you are His disciples, you are His comrades, for outwardly He was poor, not rich.

“Even this earth’s happiness does not depend upon wealth. You will find many of the wealthy exposed to dangers and troubled by difficulties, and in their last moments upon the bed of death, there remains the regret that they must be separated from that to which their hearts are so attached. They come into this world naked and they must go from it naked. All they possess they must leave behind and pass away solitary, alone. Often at the time of death their souls are filled with remorse and, worst of all, their hope in the mercy of God is less than ours.

“Praise be to God, our hope is in the mercy of God; and there is no doubt that the divine Compassion is bestowed upon the poor. His Holiness Jesus Christ said so; His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh said so.

“While Bahá’u’lláh was in Ba__gh__dád, still in possession of great wealth, He left all He had and went alone from the city, living two years among the poor. They were His comrades. He ate with them, slept with them, and gloried in being one of them. He chose for one of His names the title of ‘The Poor One’ and often in His Writings refers to Himself as ‘Darvish,’ which in Persian means poor. And of this title he was very proud. He admonished all that we must be the servants of the poor, helpers of the poor, remember the sorrows of the poor, associate with them, for thereby we may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven.

“God has not said that there are mansions prepared for us if we pass our time associating with the rich, but He has said there are many mansions prepared for the servants of the poor, for the poor are very dear to God. The mercies and bounties of God are with them. The rich are mostly negligent, inattentive, steeped in worldliness, depending upon their means, whereas the poor are dependent upon God and their reliance is upon Him, not upon themselves. Therefore the poor are nearer the Threshold of God and His Throne.

“Jesus was a poor man. One night when He was out in the fields the rain began to fall. He had no place to go for shelter, so He lifted His eyes toward Heaven, saying: ‘O Father! For the birds of the air Thou hast created nests, for the sheep a fold, for the animals dens, for the fishes places of refuge, but for Me Thou hast provided no shelter; there is no place where I may lay My head. My bed is the cold ground, My lamps at night are the stars and My food is the grass of the field. Yet who upon earth is richer than I? For the greatest blessing Thou hast not given to the rich and mighty, but unto Me Thou hast given the poor. To Me Thou hast granted this blessing. They are Mine. Therefore I am the richest man on earth.’

"So, My comrades, you are following in the footsteps of Jesus Christ. Your lives are similar to His life, your attitude is like unto His, you resemble Him more than the rich resemble Him. Therefore we will thank God that we have been blest with the real riches. And, in conclusion, I ask you to accept 'Abdu'l-Bahá as your Servant."

After the service, the Master and we who were with Him walked down the aisle to the door, while the men in the audience kept their seats. At the end of the aisle the Master paused, called to Edward and me and asked us to stand on each side of Him, with our bags. He was wearing His pongee 'aba and was very shining in white and ivory, His Face like a lighted lamp.

Then down the aisle streamed a sodden and grimy procession: three hundred men in single file. The "breadline". The failures. Broken forms. Blurred faces. How can I picture such a scene? That forlorn host out of the depths, out of the "mud and scum of things" — where nevertheless "something always, always sings". And the Eternal Christ, reflected in the Mirror of "The Servant", receiving them all, like prodigal sons? stray sheep? No! Like His own beloved children, who "resembled Him more than the rich resembled Him."

Into each palm, as the Master clasped it, He pressed His little gift of silver: just a symbol and the price of a bed. Not a man was shelterless that night. And many, many, I could see, found a shelter in His Heart. I could see it in the faces raised to His and in His Face bent to theirs.

Those interchanged looks — what a bounty to have witnessed them — to have such a picture stamped on my mind forever!

As the men filed toward Him, the Master held out His hand to the first, grasped the man's hand and left something in it. Perhaps five or six quarters, for John Good told me afterward that the completely destitute ones received the most. The man glanced up surprised. His eyes met the Master's look, which seemed to be plunging deep into his heart with fathomless understanding. He, this poor derelict, must have known very little of even human love or understanding; and now, too suddenly, he stood face to face with Divine Love. He looked startled, incredulous — as though he couldn't believe what he saw; then his eyes strained toward the Master, something new burning in them, and the Master's eyes answered with a great flash, revealing a more mysterious, a profounder love. A drowning man rescued, or — taken up into heaven? I saw this repeated scores of times. Some of the men shuffled past, accepting their gift ungraciously, but most of them responded just as the first did.

Who can tell the effect of those immortal glances on the lives and even, perhaps, at the death of each of these men?
Who knows what the Master gave that night?

(Footnote. Months later John Good told me about Hannegan. Hannegan was a generous man. If he had a dime and somebody needed a nickel, he would split his dime. But, there was no doubt about it, he was also a Bowery tough and pretty nearly always drunk. He had been counting the days to the nineteenth of April but, unluckily lost count, and when the nineteenth came and with it the Master's visit to the Bowery, he was in one of his stupors. Waking up from it, he really sorrowed. Still, there was another chance. The Master was to speak in Flatbush the following Sunday and somehow Hannegan heard of this. Flatbush is a long way off and that Sunday he hadn't even a nickel. So he walked. At midnight John Good went to his room and found him in the usual state. "Why did you do it this time, Hannegan — and you straight from seeing the Master?" asked John. "That's just it," said Hannegan earnestly. "I'm straight from seeing Him. Why, John, He's Perfection. The Light of the world, He is, John. It's too much for a man, too discouraging."

John never told me this till after the death of Hanegan, or I would have taken him to the Master. But, after all, he — this Bowery tough — had seen the Reality.)

---

That night the Master had a supper for all who had been with Him at the Mission. It was held in His suite at the Ansonia and He took me and two of the Persians, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án and Aḥmad, in His own taxi to the hotel.

As we drove up Broadway, glittering with its electric signs, He spoke of them smiling, apparently much amused. Then He told us that Bahá'u'lláh had loved light. "He could never get enough light. He taught us," the Master said, "to economize in everything else but to use light freely."

"It is marvellous," I said, "to be driving through all this light by the side of the Light of lights."

"This is nothing," the Master answered. "This is only the beginning. We will be together in all the worlds of God. You cannot realize here what that means. You cannot imagine it. You can form no conception here in this elemental world of what it is to be with Me in the Eternal Worlds."

"Oh," I cried, "with such a future before me how could my heart cling to any earthly object?"

The Master turned suddenly to me. "Will you do this thing?" He asked. "Will you take your heart from this other and give it wholly to God?"

"Oh, I will try!"

He laughed heartily at this. "First you say you will and then that you will try!"

"That is because I have learned my own weakness. What can I do with my heart?"

And now the Master spoke gravely. "I am very much pleased with that answer, Juliet."

---

That night I saw, as never before, the Glory of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Nine of us were gathered at His table. He sat at the head, Mr Mills on His left, I on His right. Just above Him hung a big round lamp, so that He sat in a pool of strong light while the rest of us were in shadow. In His ivory-coloured 'aba over the long white robe, His white hair spread out upon His shoulders, He was like some massive statue of a deity carved in alabaster.

For a while He was silent and we surrounded Him, silent. But after He had served the food He began to speak. He told us of the play The Terrible Meek which he had seen that afternoon. It is based on the Crucifixion.

"But such a representation should be complete," He said, and taken from its inception to its consummation. It should be an impersonation of the life of Jesus from the beginning to the end.

"For example: His baptism. The disciples of John the Baptist turning to Him, Jesus. The dawn of Christianity. Then the Christ in the Temple, well portrayed. The meeting of Jesus and Peter on the shore of Tiberias, where Jesus called Peter to follow Him that he might become a fisher of men. The gathering together of the Jews. Their accusations against Jesus.

For they said: 'We are expecting certain conditions at the time of the appearance of the Messiah and unless these conditions are fulfilled it is impossible to believe. It is written that He will come from an unknown place. Thou art from Nazareth. We know Thee and Thy people. According to the explicit text of the Scriptures, the Messiah is to wield a sceptre, a sword. Thou hast not even a staff. The Messiah is to be established on the throne of David. But Thou — a throne! Thou hast not so much as a mat. The Messiah is to fulfil the Law of Moses, which will be spread throughout the world. Thou hast broken the Mosaic Law. The Jews, in the time of the Messiah, are to be the conquerors of the world and all men will become their subjects. In the Cycle of the Messiah justice is to reign. It will be exercised even in the animal kingdom, so that wolf and lamb will quaff water at the same fountain, eagle and quail will dwell in the same nest, lion and deer pasture in the same meadow. But see the oppression and wrong rampant in Thy time! The Jews are the captives of the Romans. Rome has uprooted our foundations, pillaging and killing us. What manner of justice is this?

“But His Holiness Jesus answered: ‘These texts are symbolic. They have an inner meaning. I possess sovereignty, but it is of the eternal type. It is not an earthly empire. Mine is divine, heavenly, everlasting. And I conquer not by the sword. My conquests are by Love. I have a sword, but it is not of iron. My sword is My tongue, which divides Truth from falsehood.’

“Yet they persisted in rejecting Him. ‘These are mere interpretations,’ they said. ‘We will not give up the letter for these.’

“Then they rose against Him, accusing and persecuting Him, inventing libels according to their superstitions.

“‘He is a liar. He is the false Christ. Believe Him not. Beware lest ye listen. He will mislead you, will lure you from the religion of your fathers, and will create a turmoil amongst you.’

“Then the scribes and Pharisees consult together: ‘Let us hold a conclave and conceive a plan. This man is a deceiver. We must do something. What?’” (The Master gaily mimicked their confusion.) “‘Let us expel Him from the country. Let us imprison Him. Ah! Let us refer the matter to the government. Thus the religion of Moses shall be free of Him.’

“After this, the betrayal of Jesus, not by an enemy, not by an outsider, but by one of His own disciples. Dr Farid! (I was startled by the sudden, peremptory call of that name.) “By one of His own disciples. Had you been there, Dr Farid. Had you been there, you would have seen that Mary of Magdala even looked like Juliet.”[103]

“Then,” continued the Master, “the government will summon Jesus, will bring Him before Pontius Pilate, and these scenes should be fully portrayed ...”

Here I ceased to take notes. I was stabbed to the heart. As He flashed each scene to us with His vivid words and gestures I felt that He was reliving it. When He came to that walk to Golgotha: Jesus, the Saviour, stumbling beneath the weight of His Cross while the mob capered about, bowing backward, mocking “the King of the Jews,” I knew He was telling us of remembered anguish.

“And when all this is finished,” He said, “then the Terrible Meek will be expressed.”

The last scene centred around the disciples, united now and ablaze with the Pentecostal fire. The Master described them surrounded by multitudes, teaching with those “tongues of fire” that His Holiness Jesus had verily been a King — the King of spirits, His sword the Word of God and His reign in the hearts of men.

When the Master had ended we sat so silent that the falling of a rose leaf might have been heard. He broke the silence.

“The voice of Mary lamenting at the Cross today made me think of your voice, Juliet — and Lua’s.” And then He smiled at me. “Eat, Juliet,” He said. For the food on my plate was untouched.

---

In the upper hall, on our way to the Master's suite, we had met the little chambermaid who had told me the day before that she thought Him a great Saint. In my bag were about eighty quarters left over from the Mission. The Master asked the girl to hold up her apron, took the bag from me, and emptied the whole of its contents into the apron. Then He walked quickly toward His suite, we following, all but Mr Grundy whom the maid stopped.

"Oh see what He has given me!" she said. And when Mr Grundy told her about the Mission and the Master's kindness to the men there, "I will do the same with this money. I will give away every cent of it."

Later, when the table was cleared and we were sitting with the Master in another room, talking of the scene at the Mission, someone asked Him if "charity were advisable."

He laughed and, still laughing, said: "Assuredly, give to the poor. If you give them only words, when they put their hands into their pockets after you have gone, they will find themselves none the richer for you!"

And just at that moment we heard a light tap at the door. It opened and there stood the little maid. She came straight towards the Master, seeming not to see anyone else, and her eyes were full of tears.

"I wanted to say goodbye, Sir," she said (for the Master was leaving for Washington early the next morning), "and to thank You for all Your goodness to me — I never expected such goodness — and to ask You ... to pray for me." Her voice broke. She sobbed, hid her face in her apron and rushed from the room.

What an illustration to the Master's words, "assuredly give to the poor," and how wonderfully timed!

22 April 1912

Oh, those mornings at the Ansonia in the Master's white sunny rooms, filled with spring flowers and roses!

People poured in to see Him in droves, sometimes a hundred and fifty in one morning. He would become exhausted and receive the latest arrivals in bed. Sitting in the outer room (though frequently called to Him), I would watch them go into His bedroom and come out changed, as though they had had a bath of Life, or like candles that had been lighted in that inner chamber.

Leonard Abbott came out with flushed cheeks and bright eyes. "That beautiful head against the pillows!" he said.

Charles Rand Kennedy, the playwright (author of The Terrible Meek) said: "I was in the Presence of God."

I, myself, took Nancy Sholl in. When we left, she whispered to me: "I could not have stood the vibrations in there one moment longer. Power encircles that bed!"

---

Alas, New York has now lost the great overhanging aura of the Master. He is in Washington. But I am going there too, tomorrow, to stay with my dear Mrs Elkins.

Washington

7 May 1912

Washington was beautiful, the banners of the spring floating out everywhere. Trees along the street in full leaf. Flowering bushes and tulip beds in the parks and in the grass plots in front of houses. The Japanese cherry trees behind the White House, a long row of coral-pink clouds.

The day I arrived, 23 April, I met the Master at luncheon at the Persian Embassy, where ___Kh___án is now acting as minister.[104] The table was strewn with rose petals, as the Master's table always is in 'Akká, and Persian dishes were served.

A coloured man, Louis Gregory, was present and the Master gave a wonderful talk on race prejudice which, however, I will not quote here since it has been kept.[105] And besides, I am longing to catch up with these days, when I am feeling with all my capacity for feeling, when the gates of my heart are flung wide open and fire sweeping through, burning up my heart, when I am seeing through tears the Manifest Glory of the Beloved. I really don't want to write about Washington.

This heart was not awakened then.

But He said a lovely thing at ___Kh___án's table which I must keep. Mrs Parsons was at the luncheon. Before she became a Bahá'í she had been a Christian Scientist, and now she brought up the question of mental suggestion as a cure for physical disease. The Master replied that some illnesses, such as consumption and insanity, developed from spiritual causes — grief, for example — and that these could be healed by the spirit. But Mrs Parsons persisted. Could not extreme physical cases, like broken bones, also be healed by the spirit?

A large bowl of salad had been placed before the Master, Who sat at the head of the table, Florence ___Kh___ánum[106] on His right.

"If all the spirits in the air," He laughed, "were to congregate together, they could not create a salad! Nevertheless, the spirit of man is powerful. For the spirit of man can soar in the firmament of knowledge, can discover realities, can confer life, can receive the Divine Glad-Tidings. Is not this greater," and He laughed again, "than making a salad?"

One more lovely thing. The servants were late bringing in the dessert and Florence apologized; whereupon little Raḥím, standing beside her, spoke up.

"Even the King of Persia has to wait, doesn't He, mother?"

"Raḥím dear," explained Florence, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is King of the whole world."

"Oh," said Raḥím, very much abashed, "I forgot."

---

After the luncheon, Florence and ___Kh___án held a large reception, to which a number of very distinguished people came, among them Diya Pá__sh__á, the Turkish Minister, and his whole family, Duke Lita and his wife, Admiral Peary, and Alexander Graham Bell.

Between the end of lunch and this reception the Master went upstairs to rest and to give a few private interviews. When He reappeared among us, the two living rooms were already crowded. He walked quickly to the open folding doors and standing there at the centre, with a strikingly free and simple bearing, immediately began to speak. His words too were simple and of a captivating sweetness, a startling clarity.

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the children of 'Alí Qulí ___Kh___án]

Diya Pá___sh___á stood next to me, his eyes riveted on the Master. When the Master had finished speaking, the old diplomat (who is a fierce Muslim) turned to me. "This is irrefutable. This is pure logic," he said.

A few months before, at the request of his daughter-in-law, an American girl and a dear friend of mine, I had given Diya Pá___sh___á the Message. I had had to give it in French, as he doesn't understand English, and, my French being rusty by now, I'm afraid I didn't do it very well: he looked so sceptical, almost contemptuous the whole time I was speaking. But when I said that through the Bahá'í Teaching I had become a Muslim, and convinced him of this by the reverent way I spoke of Muḥammad, I really touched Diya Pá___sh___á. He rose from the table, where we were at lunch, left the room, and returned with a precious and very old volume of the Qur'án on illuminated parchment and with a hand-tooled cover. "No Christian eye but yours," he said, "has ever looked upon this."

---

To return to the Persian Embassy. A delicious thing happened when the Master greeted Peary, who has just succeeded in publicly disgracing Captain Cook and proving himself, and not Captain Cook, the discoverer of the North Pole. At that moment, in the Embassy, he looked like a blown-up balloon.

I was standing beside the Master when ___Kh___án brought the Admiral over and introduced him.

The Master spoke charmingly to him and congratulated him on his discovery. Then, with the utmost sweetness, added these surprising words: For a very long time the world had been much concerned about the North Pole, where it was and what was to be found there. Now he, Admiral Peary, had discovered it and that nothing was to be found there; and so, in forever relieving the public mind, he had rendered a great service.

I shall never forget Peary's nonplussed face. The balloon collapsed!

Immediately after the ___Kh___án's reception, Mrs Parsons too had a large one for the Master, to which Diya Pá___sh___á came with Him. I saw them, to my great delight, enter the hall together hand in hand.

Mrs Parsons house has real distinction. It is Georgian in style and in it has a very long white ballroom with, at one end, an unusually high mantel — the mantel, as well as the ceiling and panelled walls, delicately carved with garlands. At the windows hang thin silk curtains the colour of jonquil leaves.

Here, after this first reception, the Master spoke daily in the afternoon and the whole fashionable world flocked to hear Him. Scientists too, and even politicians came!

In front of the mantel, a platform had been placed for the Master and every day it was banked with fresh roses, American Beauties.

Into this room of conventional elegance, packed with conventional people, imagine the Master striding with His free step: walking first to one of the many windows and, while He looked out into the light, talking with His matchless ease to the people. Turning from the window, striding back and forth with a step so vibrant it shook you. Piercing our souls with those strange eyes, uplifting them, glory streaming upon them. Talking, talking, moving to and fro incessantly. Pushing back His turban, revealing that Christ-like forehead; pushing it forward again almost down to His eyebrows, which gave Him a peculiar majesty. Charging, filling the room with magnetic currents, with a mysterious energy. Once He burst in, a child on His shoulder. For a moment He held her, caressing her. Then He sat her down among the roses.

On Thursday, 25 April, the Master dined at the Turkish Embassy and I was privileged to be there.

Never have I seen such a beautiful table. Hundreds of roses lay the whole length of it, piled, melting into each other, sweeping up from the head and the foot of the table to a great mound in the centre, where the Master sat, faced by Diya Pá__sh__á. Florence __Kh__ánum and Carey, Madame Diya Bey (Diya Pá__sh__á's daughter-in-law), the American wives of Oriental diplomats, were placed on either side of the Master and I sat next to Carey.

There are times when the Master looks colossal, when His Holiness shines like the sun. That night He wore the usual white, with a honey-coloured 'aba. Diya Pá__sh__á, opposite Him, watched Him with eyes full of tears, his keen old hawk's face strangely softened.

The Master gave a great address on the civilizations built on the basic Teachings of the Prophets; then He spoke of this dinner as "a wonderful occasion". "The East and the West," He said, "are met in perfect love tonight." There was something so poignant in His words, so flame-creating, that for a moment I was overcome.

Later He spoke of the deep significance of the international marriages represented there: Diya Bey's and Carey's, 'Alí-Quli __Kh__án's and Florence's. Carey made me very happy by saying: "Juliet told me long ago of Your Teachings, when I was only fifteen years old." What fruit that seed had borne, sown in a child!

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the Persian Consul-general for New York and his household, Morristown, New Jersey.]

Diya Pá__sh__á made a thrilling speech. Rising and turning a lover's face to the Master, he called Him "the Light of the world, the Unique One of the age, Who had come to spread His glory and perfection amongst us."

"I am not worthy of this," said the Master, very simply. Always a great power is released from the Master's divine humility.

As I bade Diya Pá__sh__á goodnight, looking at me through a mist of tears, he said: "Truly, He is a Saint."

---

One day Mrs Elkins invited the Master to drive with us and we went to the Soldiers' Home. The Elkinses, because of Katharine's engagement to the Duke of the Abruzzi, have been terribly hounded by the newspapers, but this happened before the Master came. He couldn't have known about it through any outward means. Yet no sooner were we seated in the car than He said to Mrs Elkins: "How the newspapers here persecute one!"

It was such a sympathetic subject! At once Mrs Elkins opened her heart.

"Come away!" smiled the Master. "Elude these journalists! Come to Haifa where there is peace. Juliet will tell you there is peace in Haifa."

Then He spoke of how much I loved her and of her philanthropic deeds, which He prayed might increase. He captured her hand and kept it in His, while she hastily hid the sweet gesture under her cape.

"Nothing endures, Mrs Elkins," He said. "Nothing but the Love of God endures. Look at these trees in full blossom now." And in words which I will not try to repeat He described the turning of the seasons: the trees in summer flourishing green leaves; the inevitable autumn with the leaves lying, yellow, on the ground.

"This," He said, "is a symbol of human life."

“Remember Babylon.” He drew a vivid picture of ancient Babylon, its towers, its stupendous art; then of Babylon today: a waste of rubble, “the hyena prowling among its crumbled stones.” No other sign of life but the “voice of the owl by night” or “a lark singing at daybreak.” “Remember Tyre. Here too was beauty and splendour and pomp. Think of Tyre now. I have been there. I have seen.”

He spoke of my mother that day: “Juliet’s mother is very good. Her heart is very pure. As soon as we met, her face became radiant.”

When we reached home, Mrs Elkins said to me: “You can’t hide a thing from Him. He sees everything that is in your heart.”

The day Mrs Elkins first met the Master she mentioned her husband, the senator,[107] who died about a year ago. “I wish he were here now,” she said, “to meet You.”

“Insha’llah,” replied the Master, “for his good deeds I shall meet him in the Kingdom of God.”

One of the senator’s good deeds had been to protect the Bahá’ís in ‘Akká and Haifa while the Master was being tried for His life in 1907.

---

I was so thankful to be in Washington. At those daily meetings in Mrs Parsons’ house I would see many of my old friends, friends of my childhood. Mrs Elkins went with me every day to the meetings: sometimes, when all the chairs were taken, standing the whole afternoon, although she was far from well.

One day, however, she was not with me. That night she was giving a small dinner and an opera party and she had to rest for this. So, being free for an hour or so, I decided to stay at Mrs Parsons’ and have a little visit with Edna.

While Edna and I were talking, the Master suddenly entered the room. “I am going out for a drive,” He said, “but wait till I return, Edna, and you too, Juliet, wait. I will see you in a short time.”

So I waited — waited and waited. Half-past six came. Seven. We were to dine at half-past seven and the Elkinses’ house was a long way off, rather indirect on the car-line.

“Go, Juliet,” urged Edna. “I will explain.”

But how could I? My Lord had told me to stay.

And now I shall have to digress and tell what may seem, just at first, another story: When I was ten years old, (and I remember the time because that year we were living with my grandmother) a very presumptuous idea took possession of me. I began to dream of some day painting the Christ. I even prayed that I might. “O God,” I would pray, “You know Christ didn’t look like a woman, the way all the pictures of Him look. Please let me paint Him when I grow up as the King of Men.” And I never lost hope of this till I saw the Master. Then I knew that no one could paint the Christ. Could the sun with the whole universe full of its radiations, or endless flashes of lightning be captured in paint?

Imagine my surprise and dismay, fear, joy and gratitude all mixed together, at the news given me by Mrs Gibbons when the Master first came to New York. The night before He landed she had received a Tablet in which He said: “On My arrival in America Miss Juliet Thompson shall paint a wonderful portrait of Me.” This was in response to a supplication from Mrs Gibbons asking that her daughter might paint Him, which she never did, though the Master graciously gave her permission, even more graciously adding those words about me.

It was a little after seven when the Master came back from His drive. Entering the room in which He had left me and where of course I was still waiting, He said: "Ah, Juliet! For your sake I returned. Mrs Hemmick[108] wanted to keep Me, but I had asked you to wait; therefore I returned." After a pause He added: "Would you like to come up and paint Me tomorrow?"

So I learned the reward of obedience. Such a reward for so small an act of obedience! Once in Haifa He said to me: "Keep My words, obey My commands and you will marvel at the results."

And, by a miracle, I wasn't late for dinner! The dinner, because of another guest, had been postponed a half hour.

The next morning I went very early to Mrs Parsons' house, taking my box of pastels; but though it was only eight o'clock, quite a crowd had already gathered and I felt that the morning was doomed to be a broken one. Not only that, but the light in the rooms upstairs, where I was supposed to paint, is very weak, and the delicate wallpaper, with tiny bunches of flowers all over it, I couldn't use as a background for His head. For a while I was in despair, for I dared not make the suggestion I had in mind. But in the end I did. Begging Him to forgive me if I were doing something wrong, I asked if He would pose in New York instead. To this he consented so freely and sweetly that I had no more qualms about it.

The following day I went to Mrs Parsons' to meet Lee McClung, the Treasurer of the United States. Lee McClung had been one of the idols of my early adolescence. He had seemed quite old to me then, though now he is only thirty-eight.

When I saw him again last winter for the first time in about ten years, he had made all sorts of fun of me for my "conversion to Bahá'ísm". "It made me laugh out of one eye and cry out of the other," he said. "What does your mother think about it? Have you converted her?"

But at Mrs Parsons' first meeting, to my great surprise, there he was in the audience! I couldn't wait to speak to him or to present him to the Master as Mrs Elkins was in a hurry that day, but in the evening he dined with us.

"How did you feel when you saw the Master?" I asked him.

A shy look came into his face, and Mr McClung is anything but shy. "Well, I felt as though I were in the presence of one of the great old Prophets: Elijah, Isaiah, Moses. No, it was more than that! Christ ... no, now I have it. He seemed to me my Divine Father."

Then he said he must leave us a little early, as he was going to Mr Bell's — Alexander Graham Bell's — to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá there.

Later I was told that the Master had made an address at Mr Bell's; then others were called on to speak. But when Lee McClung was called on he said: "After 'Abdu'l-Bahá has spoken, I cannot."

At Mr McClung's request, I had made an appointment for him with the Master for a private interview and this was the reason I was here to meet him at Mrs Parsons'. I arrived a little ahead of time and while I was waiting for Mr McClung, a door in the hall opened and there stood the Master, beckoning to me. He was alone, so we had to fall back on His English and my scant Persian.

"How is your mother?" He asked first. "How old is she?"

But I couldn't tell Him, Mamma having always concealed her age till I think even she doesn't know it now.

"About fifty?"

"I think so."

"How old are you?"

I confessed my age.

"In My eyes you are fifteen," He replied, so sweetly.

"In our eyes I am an infant?"

"Yes. Baby!"

Then the translator arrived.

"Tell Juliet," the Master began at once, "that she teaches well. I have met many people who have been affected by you, Juliet. You are not eloquent, you are not fluent, but your heart teaches. You speak with a feeling, an emotion which makes people ask: 'What is this she has?' Then they inquire; they seek and find. It is so too with Lua. You never find Lua speaking with dry eyes! You will be confirmed. A great bounty will descend upon you. You will become eloquent. Your tongue will be loosed. Teach, always teach. The confirmations of the Holy Spirit descend upon those who teach constantly. Never feel fear. The Holy Spirit will give you the words to say. Never fear You will grow stronger and stronger."

That erect head, that hand held high in command, the Power that eddied from Him as He spoke those words, how can I ever feel fear again when I have to mount the dreaded platform?

It was later that He said to me: "You have many friends. You have no enemies. Everybody is your friend. Do not think I am ignorant of conditions in New York. Both factions are pleased with you, Juliet, and have nothing but good to say of you, although they complain of others. Miss X is pleased with you! Mrs XX is pleased with you!" (laughing as He mentioned the two chief disturbers of the peace). "And you have accomplished this only through your sincerity. Others may do this through diplomatic action, but you have done it with your heart."

- (Footnote. I am destroying my diary in longhand and I can't bear to lose any of the Master's words to me, those dear words of encouragement. That is why I keep them.) *

Just then Lee McClung arrived and the Master took him upstairs.[109]

New York

11 May 1912

On Saturday, 11 May, just one month from the day of His landing, the Master returned to New York from Washington, Cleveland, and Chicago.

A few of us gathered in His rooms to prepare them for Him and fill them with flowers; then to wait for His arrival: May Maxwell, Lua Getsinger, Carrie Kinney, Kate Ives, Grace Robarts, and I. Mr Mills and Mr Woodcock were waiting too.

The Master has a new home, in the Hudson Apartment House,[110] overlooking the river. His flat is on one of the top stories, so that its windows frame the sky. Now the windows were all open and a fresh breeze blew in.

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá with children and Persian entourage.]

About five o'clock He came. Oh the coming of that Presence! If only I could convey to the future the mighty commotion of it! The hearts almost suffocate with joy, the eyes burn with tears at the stir of that step! It is futile to try to express it. Sometimes when the sun breaks through clouds and spreads a great fiery glow, I get something of that feeling.

After greeting us all the Master took a seat by the window and began to talk to us, with supreme love and gladness, wittily, tenderly, eloquently, carrying us up as if on wings to the apex of sublime feeling, so that we wept; then turning our tears to sudden little ripples of laughter as an unexpected gleam of wit flashed out; then melting our hearts with His yearning affection.

He had been horrified in Washington by the prejudice against the Negroes. "What does it matter," He asked, "if the skin of a man is black, white, yellow, pink, or green? In this respect the animals show more intelligence than man. Black sheep and white sheep, white doves and blue do not quarrel because of difference of colour."

Lua, May, and I, for the first time together in the Glory of His Presence, sat on the floor in a corner, gazing through tears at Him and whenever we could wrench our eyes from the sorrowful beauty of His face, silhouetted against the sky, gazing at one another, still through tears.

Day after day I was with Him there. Lua and I had permission to be always with Him. I would go to His apartment in the early morning and stay through the whole day and again and again He would call me to His Presence.

"My Lord," I said once, "I really shouldn't take Your time. I don't want to take Your time. I am only too thankful to be here, serving at a distance, somewhere in Your atmosphere."

"I know you are content with whatever I do, therefore I send for you, Juliet," He replied.

13 May 1912

On the thirteenth of May (Percy Grant's birthday) a meeting of the Peace Conference took place at the Hotel Astor. It was an enormous meeting with thousands present. The Master was the Guest of Honour and the first speaker, Dr Grant and Rabbi Wise the other speakers.

The Master sat at the centre on the high stage, Dr Grant on His right, Rabbi Wise on His left. Oh, the symbolism of that: the Jewish rabbi, the Christian clergyman, with the Centre of the Covenant between, on the platform of the World Peace Conference.[111]

The Master was really too ill to have gone to this Conference. He had been in bed all morning, suffering from complete exhaustion, and had a high temperature. I was with Him all morning. While I was sitting beside Him I asked: "Must You go to the Hotel Astor when You are so ill?"

"I work by the confirmations of the Holy Spirit," He answered. "I do not work by hygienic laws. If I did," He laughed, "I would get nothing done."

After that meeting, the wonderful record of which has been kept, the Master shook hands with the whole audience, with every one of those thousands of people!

14 May 1912

On Friday, the fourteenth of May, I had quite a distinguished visitor, ___Kh___án Bahadur Alláh-Bakhsh, the Governor of Lahore. Mr Barakatu'llah had sent him to see me. I invited him to my meeting that night and he came and seemed to fall in love with the Teachings. The next morning early he called on the Master at the Hudson Apartment House. Lua, May, and I were there at the time and I told him that May was one of my spiritual mothers and Lua my spiritual grandmother. Whereupon the old gentleman said that in that case I was his mother, May Maxwell his grandmother, and Lua his great-grandmother!

Very soon the Master sent for him and kept him a long time in His room. When the interview was over and ___Kh___án Bahadur Alláh-Bakhsh had left, the Master called me to Him.

"You teach well, Juliet," He said. "You teach with ecstasy. You ignite the souls. A great bounty will descend upon you. I have perfect confidence in you as a teacher. Your heart is pure, absolutely pure."

My heart absolutely pure! I wept.

Then, for the second time, the Master gave me a picture of Himself.

Three days later I had a note from the Governor of Lahore. In it he said: "'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Divine Light of today."

---

One night I took Marjorie to the Master. She had in her hand an offering of tulips, grown in her own garden, and these He distributed among His visitors.

"Juliet's love for you is divine," He said, speaking to Marjorie, "and your love for each other must become so great that no stab will affect it." Then He told us that, in reality, our friendship was an "eternal" one.

Marion deKay went with me to Him.

"Your friend, Juliet? Ancient friend?" and He smiled at the child. "You must become a flame of love." ("Like Juliet," He said. I have to keep all His sweet words to me.) "You must become as steadfast as a rock, firm! strong! so that when the storms break over you, when the thunder roars and the winds rage, you will not be shaken. You must become a teacher, a speaker."

On the fifteenth of May the Master went away for a few days. As soon as He returned Lua telephoned me. "The Master says: come up now if you wish. If not, you have permission to come to Him at any time and to stay as long as you are able. Only, don't displease your mother. He wants her to be happy, He says. This is His message, Julie."

19 May 1912

On Sunday, 19 May, He spoke at the Church of the Divine Paternity.[112] This was unbearably beautiful. The church is Byzantine, making me think of the worship of the early Christians. The interior is of grey stone.

Oh the look of His that day! Then, more vividly than ever, He shone as the Good Shepherd, returned at last to His flocks. I wept through the whole service. At the end of the pew in front of me sat Lua, her eyes fixed on the master, rapt, adoring, her beauty immeasurably heightened by that recognition, that adoration.

Soon I caught a glimpse of another rapt face — a man's — my old friend, Mr Bailey's. Mr Bailey is the last person I could have hoped to see there. A very old gentleman, he had always seemed to me a hopelessly unconvertible atheist. At least he would never listen to a word from me about the Cause. And now, here he sat, and never have I seen a face more touched. His eyes were wistful, like a child's, shyly reverent and as limpid as though there were tears in them.

He met me that afternoon at the Master's apartment, making his entrance with these words: "I have been thinking since this morning that the way to the attainment of greatness is through elimination."

"You felt," I ventured, "'Abdu'l-Bahá's simplicity?"

"One would naturally feel," — huffily — "the simplicity of Niagara."

"And the beauty of His Face?"

"The patriarchal grandeur of His face cannot be denied."

Later, how his eyes hung on that Face while the Master talked with him!

21 May 1912

On 21 May, Mrs Tatum[113] had a reception for the Master. The people who were there were of the fashionable world, with a sprinkling of artists and writers. Mrs Sheridan was pouring tea.

Mrs Tatum's house is beautiful. The impression you get is of space and light. A white staircase winds up through a very wide hall, from which, on each side, rooms open — living rooms, dining room, library. All these were soon crowded.

The first friend I caught sight of was Louis Potter.[114] He came running up to me, exclaiming: "Oh august Juliet!" and attached himself at once to Lua and me. Suddenly, there was a stir among the people, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in our midst. He walked over to a yellow couch which curved along the bay half-moon of the bay window and sat down on it.

I think I must tell you how He looked there. His surroundings were all white and yellow. Sunlight streamed in. The shadows on His face were transparent; His profile, against the blue sky through the polished glass of the windowpane, outlined in light.

"Come, Louis," I said to Louis Potter, "let's go to the Master."

Louis had never seen Him before, but he skipped forward like a buoyant faun, his head tipped to one side, his hands outstretched.

"Ah-h-h!" he said. It was a little cry from his soul, as though he were just coming home, and was so glad.

And the Master too said: “Ah-h-h!” His arms wide open, welcoming Louis home.

ercy Grant arrived. As soon as he appeared, big and imposing, in the room, the Master rose almost eagerly, smiling and holding out His hand.

“Ah! Dr Grant!” He said.

They stood for what seemed to me minutes, their hands clasped, Percy, with beautiful deference, bowing his head, a gentle, almost tender look on his face. One of the Persians translated the Master’s greeting to him but spoke so low that I could not catch the words. Then Percy sat down on the curving window seat so that he faced the Master.

Soon there was another stir in the room. A small, rather plain middle-aged woman with the most astonishing eyes — very clear, very violet — stood in the doorway, almost timidly, and the Master at once sent Dr Farid to her to ask her to come and sit by Him. This was Sarah Graham Mulhall.

He spoke a few words to her and she rose and went out, returning after some time with a tray and a pot of tea and two cups on it. The tray was placed on a stool between the Master and Miss Mulhall and they drank their tea together.

---

(Footnote. 1947. Miss Mulhall’s father and brother, who were physicians, had come to New York from England to study the effects of drugs on the body and mind. Both died mysteriously. Miss Mulhall’s only training had been in music. She was a very gentle, retiring woman and knew nothing of the ways of business or organization or medicine, or anything that would have equipped her for the evidently dangerous work of her father and brother. But something inside her, against which she fought, urged her to continue it. She was in the midst of this inward conflict when Mrs Tatum telephoned her and asked her to come to meet the Master. At first Miss Mulhall declined, saying that she really couldn’t go anywhere, she was too absorbed in her own problems, she couldn’t face a crowd of people. But later she thought: Perhaps ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is a Prophet, as Mrs Tatum believes,[115] and He might help me in making my decision.

The Master, when He called her to Him in Mrs Tatum’s house, asked if she would do something for Him. Would she brew some tea for Him with her own hands and drink it with Him? And while they drank tea and talked, He Himself brought up her problem.

He told her she must do the work she had in mind; she would rise very high in it and become “a great Counsellor”; God would always protect her and all the Celestial Beings of the Supreme Concourse would rally to her assistance.

She did become a Great Counsellor. After years of wonderful work, Governor Smith, Al Smith, made her Adviser and First Commissioner of Narcotics for New York State. One night she herself led a raid against one of the chief centres of the drug ring — a ring of very rich, prominent men, some of them “pillars” of St. Patrick’s, some “pillars” of St. John’s Cathedral. Rounding them up in their centre, an apartment on Park Avenue, she, with the help of her squad of police, locked them in; then telephoned to the governor. He took the next train to New York and upheld Miss Mulhall’s determination to bring them all to trial. Then he went to Cardinal Hayes and Bishop Manning. Cardinal Hayes said: “These men are the worst type of criminals. I agree with you that they must be punished.” Bishop Manning said: “You can’t touch my parishioners. They are the builders of St. John’s Cathedral.” He threatened Miss Mulhall. “If you ruin them, I will destroy your office.” Which he did, ultimately, for of course every one of the men was found guilty and sent to Fort Leavenworth. After Lehman was elected Governor, the Narcotics Commission was abolished. But in the meantime Miss Mulhall had done a tremendous work. Her book, Opium, the Demon Flower, has become world famous.)

---

Then I caught sight of little "Fergie". His real name I don't want to mention because of what I am going to tell. He is a noted newspaper man who writes visionary books on economics. Percy Grant calls him "my prophet". His face is pale and pinched and suffering and he wears a thick chestnut wig. I went up to him and asked: "Wouldn't you like to meet the Master?" "I think not," he drawled, "I really have nothing to say to Him."

And now the Master began to speak to the whole roomful of people.

He was very happy, He said, to be with us. "Think of the contrast!" For years He had been imprisoned in a fortress, His associates criminals. Now He found Himself in spacious homes, "associating," He said, "with you."

His talk gradually shaped itself to some definite point, which, however, He kept for the very end. I wondered what could be coming. When it came it was like a thunderclap.

"Think of it," He said. "Two kings were dethroned in order that I might be freed. This is naught but pure destiny."

I glanced at Percy Grant and saw that he was deeply stirred. He had been listening, still with that tender deference, his head slightly tipped to one side, but at these last startling words of the Master's, in a flash the placidity of his face broke up, something burned through and his eyes sparked.

"And now," ended the Master, suddenly rising to His feet, strong and incredibly majestic, "you here in America must work with Me for the peace of the world and the oneness of mankind."

And with this He left us, the room seeming strangely empty after He had gone.

The next morning early Howard MacNutt came to see me, looking so radiant that I knew he was bringing good news.

Then he told me. He had just had breakfast with Dr Grant, and the Master was to speak again at the Church of the Ascension — at the People's Forum this time, the night of 2 June. Bishop Burch had severely reprimanded Percy for inviting the Master to speak on 14 April and for seating Him in the Bishop's chair! But an idiotic thing like that would never stop Percy Grant — only make him more defiant.

He had talked very freely with Mr MacNutt about 'Abdu'l-Bahá and His address of the day before with its great climax. "As I listened," he said, "I realized profoundly that this was a historic moment; that before me sat One Who, imprisoned for the sake of humankind, had been freed by the Power of God alone, through the dethroning of two kings."

Return to New York

On 22 May the Master left for Boston, returning the twenty-sixth. After His return He stayed with the Kinneys a day or so (till He moved to His new house), and then came my test! For two days He never even looked at me. My heart bled and burned. I could not endure the withdrawal of His nearness. The third day I went to the new house — 309 West Seventy-Eighth Street — and there, in Lua's arms, I sobbed my heart out.

"I cry," I said, "only because I love Him," (which I fear was not exactly true) "because I have just realized how terrifically I love Him. This love burns my heart. It is beyond endurance."

Then He sent for me to come to Him.

---

With tears rolling down my cheeks I entered His Presence. He was sitting on a couch writing and did not look up — still didn't look at me! But at last He said, going straight to the point, piercing to the real cause of my trouble: "I have not seen you lately, Juliet, because of the multitude of the affairs. But I have not forgotten My promise to pose for you. Come on Saturday with your materials and I will sit."

I thanked Him; then falling on my knees, begged Him not to banish me from His Presence. I could not endure to be separated from Him. I loved, loved Him.

He rose, stood above me, took my hand and held it a long, long time. I still knelt at His feet, the hem of His garment pressed to my lips.

Lua joined her sweet voice to mine.

"Julie has had so much trouble this year. She wants to stay close to You now so that her heart may be healed."

"I want to stay close because I love You!"

He smiled and said something about another love.

"That is gone. Gone," I cried.

At these words of mine which I thought were true, the strangest thing happened. Always when the Master holds my hand I feel a flow of sparks from His palm to mine. Now this current of Life was suddenly cut off. Could I have lied to my Lord, and so, by unconscious self-deception, disconnected myself from the Fountainhead of pure Truth?

But His answer was merciful, reminding me of past sincerities. "I am pleased with you, Juliet. You are so truthful. You tell me everything. She said:" (He turned, laughing, to Lua) "This is my heart. What can I do with it?"

I laughed too, through my tears. But soon I began to cry again.

He went back to the couch and sat down and Lua and I followed Him and knelt together at His feet there.

"Don't cry!" (I wish the whole world could hear the Master say "don't cry". Tears would soon cease to be.) "Don't cry! Unhappiness and the love of Bahá'u'lláh cannot exist in the same heart, for the love of Bahá'u'lláh is happiness."

"I cry for love of you, my Lord. My tears come from my heart. I can't help it."

"Your eyes and Lua's" — and He laughed again — "are two rivers of tears." "I love Juliet," He added, "for her truthfulness."

"I told Juliet," said Lua, putting her arms around me, as we still knelt together side by side, "of Your words to Mrs Kaufman: that these human loves were like waves of the sea rolling to the shore one behind the other, each wave receding."

"Balih," (yes) said the Master, "this is true. You will not find faithfulness in humanity. All humanity is unfaithful. Only God is faithful. Bahá'u'lláh spent fifty years in prison for the sake of humanity. There was faithfulness!"

“From this moment,” cried Lua, “Juliet and I dedicate our lives to Thee and we beg to at last die in Thy Path — to drink the cup of martyrdom. Oh, it would be so good for the Cause if two Americans could do this! Take hold of His coat, Julie, and beseech.”

I touched the hem of His garment.

“Say yes,” implored Lua. “Oh Julie, beg Him to say yes.”

But in Thonon I had told the Master that I would not ask for that cup again but would wait till God found me ready for it.

“I accept the dedication of your lives now. The rest will be decided later.”

And it was clear what He meant. How we must amuse Him!

---

I must go back a little. On Sunday, 26 May, the night of the Master’s return from Boston, He spoke at Mr Ramsdell’s (Baptist) church.[116]

My friend, Lawrence White, who lives in Utica, had come to New York to met the Master, and he, Silvia Gannett, and I went together to the church.

We entered, to see a breathtaking picture: That church suggests an old Jewish synagogue. Behind the chancel is a sweeping arch from which hangs a dark, massive curtain in folds straight as organ pipes. The chancel was empty that night except for the Master, sitting — almost lying — in a semicircular chair, His head thrown back, His luminous eyes uprolled. The sleeves of His bronze-coloured ‘aba branched out from His shoulders like great spread wings, hiding His hands, so that I was conscious only of His head and those terribly alive eyes. There was an awful mystery about that dominance of the head. It seemed to obliterate the human form and reveal Him as the Face of God. The curtain behind Him might have concealed the Ark of the Covenant, which He, THE COVENANT, was guarding.

Later, when He rose to speak, the Manifestation of the Glory was entirely different. He diffused a softer radiance.

“Look at Him and see the Christ,” whispered Lawrence White.

---

Next, He spoke at the Church of the Open Door. Again the Shepherd. Again I watched Him through blinding tears.

2 June 1912

On the second of June He spoke for Dr Grant’s Forum.[117] And there He was simpler; He manifested less, or perhaps I should say manifested something different: a sort of brotherhood to the masses, still retaining His grandeur. And how He addressed Himself to that meeting and to the heart of Percy Grant!

The subject was: “What can the Orient bring to the Occident?”

That subject in that church!

Lua and I were in a front pew with Valiyu’llah __Kh__án and Mírzá Maḥmúd. Suddenly I was petrified to see Mason Remey coming in, through the door of the vestry-room. When he was last in the Church of the Ascension I was sitting beside him, engaged to him, while Percy thundered at me from the pulpit. The text of the sermon that Sunday was the same as the text today: "What can the Orient bring to the Occident." "Nothing but disease and death," said Percy, his eyes on me, "and God wants us to live; He wants us to live."

But the Speaker this time was the Master. He said: "The Orient brings to the Occident the Manifestations of God."

Then He defined the Church as that Collective Centre which, attracting many diverse elements, united them into one ordered system, adding that the Church was but a reflection of the real Collective Centre, the Shepherd, Who, whenever His sheep became scattered, reappeared to unite them. So the Church, established by God's Manifestation, was the Law of God, and when Christ said to Peter, "On thee will I build My Church," He meant He would build His Law upon Peter.

Upon him Christ built the Law of God by which all peoples and creeds were afterward unified.

The Master had said it again to Percy Grant: "Be thou like Peter," for this was His message sent by me last summer.

When, at the end of the marvellous address, Percy stepped out into the chancel, it was another man I saw: a man touched by the Hand of God, shaken to the very roots of his being. As Marjorie said, he looked ill and strangely upset. He could scarcely articulate.

The questions followed; it is the custom of the Forum to ask questions. In the centre of the chancel sat the Master, Dr Grant on His right in a choir stall, Dr Farid behind Him. How at home the Master looked there! He pushed back His turban and smiled as He answered, often very wittily. Once He raised one finger high. I caught my breath then. He was like Jesus in the synagogue confronting the scribes and Pharisees, except that His audience weren't Pharisees.

5 June 1912

The Master has begun to pose for me. He had said: "Can you paint Me in a half hour?"

"A half hour, my Lord?" I stammered, appalled. I can never finish a head in less than two weeks.

"Well, I will give you three half hours. You mustn't waste My time, Juliet."

He told me to come to Him Saturday morning, 1 June, at seven-thirty.

I went in a panic. He was waiting for me in the entrance hall, a small space in the English basement where the light — not much of it — comes from the south. In fact I found myself faced with every kind of handicap. I always paint standing, but now I was obliged to sit, jammed so close to the window (because of the lack of distance between the Master and me) that I couldn't even lean back. No light. No room. And I had brought a canvas for a life-size head.

The Master was seated in a dark corner, His black 'aba melting into the background; and again I saw Him as the Face of God, and quailed. How could I paint the Face of God?

"I want you," He said, "to paint My Servitude to God."

"Oh my Lord," I cried, "only the Holy Spirit could paint Your Servitude to God. No human hand could do it. Pray for me, or I am lost. I implore You, inspire me."

"I will pray," He answered, "and as you are doing this only for the sake of God, you will be inspired."

And then an amazing thing happened. All fear fell away from me and it was as though Someone Else saw through my eyes, worked through my hand.

All the points, all the planes in that matchless Face were so clear to me that my hand couldn't put them down quickly enough, couldn't keep pace with the clarity of my vision. I painted in ecstasy, free as I had never been before.

At the end of the half hour the foundation of the head was perfect.

On Monday again I went to the Master at seven-thirty. As I got off the bus at Seventy-Eighth Street and Riverside Drive I saw Him at the centre of a little group standing beside that strip of park that drops low to the river — the part we love to call "His garden", a forever hallowed spot to us, for there we sometimes walk with Him in the evenings, there He takes His daily exercise, or escapes from the house to rest and pray.

The people who were with Him this morning were Nancy Sholl and Ruth Berkeley, Mr MacNutt and Mr Mills, and, as I hurried to join them, I saw that the Master was anointing them from a vial of attar of rose.

Oh the heavenly perfume, the pale, early-morning sunshine and the Master, all in white glistening in it (no one else takes the sunlight as He does: He is like a polished mirror to the sun), the ecstatic, intoxicating love with which He rubbed our foreheads with His strong fingers dripping with that essence of a hundred roses!

Soon we saw Miss Buckton crossing the street toward us, bringing with her a tall young man with a remarkable face, very pure and serene, which seemed somehow familiar to me. The Master abruptly left us and met the two in the middle of the Drive. Then I saw Him open His arms wide and clasp the young man to His breast.

We all followed the Master to His house, where the young man was introduced to me, and then I knew why his face had seemed familiar. He was Walter Hempden. I had seen him in the theatre. I was in the audience, he on the stage playing the part of "the Servant" in The Servant in the House: Christ. And he played it so intensely, with such spiritual fervour, that I prayed with all my heart, there in the audience, that he might some day meet the real "Servant!"<sup>118</sup>

12 June 1912

Yesterday morning I went up early to the Master's house, that house whose door is open at seven-thirty and kept wide open till midnight.

He had been away and I had not seen Him for three days. I had brought my pastels, thinking He might sit for me, but I found Him looking utterly spent. He was in the English basement, Ruth Berkeley and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án with Him, lying back against the sofa cushions. But, in spite of His weariness, He looked up with brilliant eyes.

"What do you want of Us, Juliet?" He smiled.

I had hid my pastels. "Only to be near You."

"You must excuse Me from sitting for you today. I am not able today."

"I knew that, my Lord, as soon as I came in."

Then He talked to Ruth and me. He told us we were as babes nursing at the Divine Breast. "But babes," He said, "grow daily through the mother's milk."

I could not help but weep, for His was the Divine Breast.

Soon He went out alone to "the garden", leaving Ruth, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, and me together.

"It is wonderful," Ruth said as He went, "to see how the world is quickened today in all directions."

"And to know," I said, "that the Voice that is quickening it is the same tender Voice that spoke to us just now." And I wept again, for something about the Master that morning had utterly melted me.

Later He came back. The English basement was crowded by then and He talked for a long while to the people. But this I could see was pure sacrifice. His vitality seemed gone. At times He could scarcely bring forth the words, yet He gave and gave. When He had finished He hurriedly left the house and went again to "His garden".

On the way to the bus I met Him returning alone. He stopped me, put out His hand and took mine, with indescribable tenderness smiling at me. In the handclasp, the look, even in the tilt of the head was a Love so poignant as to give me pain.

"Come tomorrow and paint, Juliet," He said.

He appeared refreshed — better — but remembering His utter depletion of the morning I couldn't help answering, "If You are well." Then I thought I would speak in Persian to amuse Him, but instead of saying, "If Your health is good," I made a mistake and said, "Agar Shuma khub ast," (If You are good.) whereupon I was covered with confusion. I must have amused Him!

How stupidly we speak to Him! Imagine saying "if" to Him. That was even worse than my break in Persian.

That night there was a meeting at the Kinneys', one of those deadly "Board meetings", but the Master came to it.

Striding up and down like a king, He spoke to us. In these meetings, He said, we should be in connection with the Supreme Concourse. Between the Supreme Concourse and us there should be telegraphic communication, one end of the wire in the breast of each one here and the other in that Concourse on high, so that all we might say or do would be inspired.

---

Today (12 June) I went up early to His house, but not early enough. As I turned into Seventy-Eighth Street from West End Avenue I saw Him a block away, hastening toward "His garden", His robes floating out as He walked.

Soon He came back to us. Miss Buckton had arrived by that time and a poor little waif of a girl, a Jewess. She was all in black and her small pale face was very careworn.

I had been in the kitchen with Lua. When I heard the voice of the Master I hurried into the hall, and there I saw them sitting at the window, the poor sad little girl at the Master's right, Alice Buckton at His left. Like a God, He dominated the scene. Sunlight streamed through the window, His white robes and turban shining in it, the strong carving of His Face thrown into high relief by masses of shadow.

The little Jewish girl was crying.

"Don't grieve now, don't grieve," He said. He was very, very still and I think He was calming her.

"But my brother has been in prison for three years, and it wasn't just to put him in prison. It wasn't his fault, what he did. He was weak and other people led him. He has to serve four more years. My father and mother are always depressed. My brother-in-law has just died, and he was the one who supported us. Now we haven't even that."

"You must trust in God," said the Master.

"But the more I trust the worse things become!" she sobbed.

"You have never trusted."

"But my mother is all the time reading psalms. She doesn't deserve to have God abandon her. I read the psalms myself, the ninety-first psalm and the twenty-third psalm, every night before I go to bed. I pray too."

"To pray is not to read psalms. To pray is to trust in God and to be submissive in all things to Him. Be submissive; then things will change for you. Put your parents and your brother in God's hands. Love God's Will. Strong ships are not conquered by the sea, they ride the waves! Now be a strong ship, not a battered one."

At noon I took Percy Grant to the Master. The Master had inquired for him and sent him a message by me, and Percy had responded instantly by himself suggesting this visit. But the Master was out when we reached the house and while we were waiting for Him I mentioned a very interesting thing He had said to Gifford Pinchot:[119] that the people were rising wave upon wave, like a great tide, and the capitalists, unless they realized this soon, would be driven out with violence; also, that in the future the labourer would not work on a wage basis but for an interest in the concern.

Just then Lua appeared at the door of the room opposite, went to the stairway and, with her beautiful reverence, leaned across the rail to look down.

"He is coming, Lua?"

"Yes, Julie, He is coming!"

He entered the room with both hands extended and in a voice like a chime from His heart, said: "Oh-h, Dr Grant! Dr Grant!"

Then I slipped out.

When I returned at the Master's call, He was signing a photograph for Percy and writing a prayer on it. "And now," he said, presenting it, "you must give Me your photograph. I want your face. I have given you Mine. Now you must give Me yours."

"I will pray for you," He added as He bade Percy goodbye. "I will mention you daily in My prayers."

The Master detained me for a moment. As I rejoined Percy in the car, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___ân was just going into the house.

“Do you see that handsome, distinguished-looking young man?” I said. “That is Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án, a descendant of two generations of martyrs and the brother of one very young martyr. His grandfather, Sulaymán ___Kh___án, was a disciple of the Báb. He was Governor of Fars and a great prince, but that didn’t save him. He suffered the most ghastly kind of martyrdom and with such ecstasy that he is one of the best beloved of the Bábí martyrs.

“Just a few years ago Valiyu’llah’s father, Varqá ___Kh___án, and his little brother, [Rúḥu’lláh] Varqá, went on a pilgrimage to ‘Akká and had a wonderful visit with the Master. But on their way home they were both arrested and thrown into prison. Then one day some brutal men came into their cell, one with an axe. Varqá ___Kh___án was hacked into pieces alive, and the poor little boy forced to look on at that butchery. When it was over, one of the executioners turned to the child. I think I will tell the rest in Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án’s own language, just as he told it to me.

“The man said to my brother: ‘If you will deny Bahá’u’lláh, we will take you to the court of the ___Sh___áh and honours and riches will be heaped upon you.’ But my brother answered: ‘I do not want such things.’ Then the man said to him: ‘If you refuse to deny, we will kill you worse than your father.’ ‘You may kill me a thousand times worse,’ my brother said. ‘Is my life of more value than my father’s? To die for Bahá’u’lláh is my supreme desire.’ ‘This so angered the executioners that they fell upon Varqá and choked him to death.’ Varqá was only twelve years old.

“A day or two ago,” I went on, “Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án asked me, ‘How is the Master’s portrait progressing?’ and he added that, in a portrait, he thought ‘one must paint the soul.’ ‘But who can paint the soul of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I asked. And I wish you could have seen the fire in his eyes as he drew himself up and said: ‘We can paint it with our blood!’”

13 June 1912

The next day, 13 June, as usual I went very early to the Master’s house — so early that no one was there — I mean, no visitors. Some of the Persians of course were with Him: Valiyu’llah ___Kh___án, Aḥmad and Mírzá ‘Alí-Akbar. I found them in the lower hall, the English basement. The Master was sitting in the big chair by the window. He called me to a seat opposite, then began to speak, smiling.

“Juliet is absolutely truthful. For this I love her very much. She conceals nothing from me.”

“It would be useless, my Lord,” I said, “to try to conceal anything from You. I could hide nothing.”

“That is true,” said the Master, raising one hand. “Nothing; nothing.”

Soon He rose. “Stay here,” He told me, and went out with Aḥmad.

By the time He returned a crowd had gathered. He gave a few private interviews upstairs, then came down and, sitting by the window, talked to all the people. I think the strongest image in my mind is and will always be the holy figure of the Master sitting in the rays of the sun at that window.

The meeting over, a few of us went upstairs to say a healing prayer for Mrs Hinkle-Smith, but just before Lua began to chant, the Master looked in at the door and called: “Juliet,” and I happily deserted Mrs Hinkle-Smith.

“Bring your things in here and paint,” He said, pointing to the library.

Oh, these sittings: so wonderful, yet so humanly difficult! We move from room to room, from one kind of light to another. The Master has given me three half hours, each time in a different room, and each time people come in and watch me. But the miraculous thing is that nothing makes any difference. The minute I begin to work the same rapture takes possession of me. Someone Else looks through my eyes and sees clearly; Someone Else works through my hand with a sort of furious precision.

On this thirteenth of June, after Lua had chanted the prayer for Mrs Hinkle-Smith, she and May came into the library, crossed over to where I was sitting and stood behind me.

The Master looked up and smiled at May. "You have a kind heart, Mrs Maxwell." Then He turned to Lua. "You, Lua, have a tender heart. And what kind of heart have you, Juliet?" He laughed. "What kind of a heart have you?"

"Oh, what kind of heart have I? You know, my Lord. I don't know."

"An emotional heart." He laughed again and rolled His hands one round the other in a sort of tempestuous gesture. "You will have a boiling heart, Juliet. Now," He continued, "if these three hearts were united into one heart — kind, tender and emotional — what a great heart that would be!"

14 June 1912

The next morning, Thursday, though I went unusually early to the Master, He had already left the house. But Lua, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, and I had a wonderful morning. Valiyu'llah told us so many things.

"My father," he said, "spent much time with the Blessed Beauty. The Blessed Beauty Himself taught him.

"One time when my father was in His room, Bahá'u'lláh rose and strode back and forth till the very walls seemed to shake. And He told my father that once in an age the Mighty God sent a Soul to earth endowed with the power of the Great Ether, and that such a Soul had all power and was able to do anything. 'Even this walk of Mine' said Bahá'u'lláh, 'has an effect in the world.'

"Then He said that His Holiness Jesus Christ had also come with the power of the Great Ether, but the haughty priesthood of His day thought of Him as a poor, unlettered youth and believed that if they should crucify Him, His Teachings would soon be forgotten. Therefore they did crucify Him. But because His Holiness Jesus possessed the power of the Great Ether, He could not remain underground. This ethereal power rose and conquered the whole earth. 'And now,' the Blessed Beauty said, 'look to the Master, for this same Power is His.'

"Bahá'u'lláh," added Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, "taught my father much about Áqá. Áqá (the Master, you know) is one of the titles of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Greatest Branch is another, and the Greatest Mystery of God another. By all these we call Him in Persian. The Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, revealed the Station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to my father. And my father wrote many poems to the Master, though the Master would scold him and say: 'You must not write such things to Me.' But the heart of my father could not keep quiet. This is one poem he wrote:

'O Dawning-Point of the Beauty of God, I know Thee! Though Thou shroudest Thyself in a thousand veils, I know Thee! Though Thou shouldst assume the tatters of a beggar, still would I know Thee!'

---

In the late afternoon I returned with my mother. The Master received us in His own room, which was full of roses and lilies and carnations.

“Ah-h! Mrs Thompson. Marḥabá! Marḥabá!” (Welcome! Welcome!)

The intonation of that “Marḥabá” can never be described. It is a welcome from a heart which is a channel for God’s heart.

He was very playful with Mamma. “Are you pleased with Juliet? Pleased now, Mrs Thompson? The next time you have to complain of her, come and complain to Me and I will beat her!”

15 June 1912

On Friday, 15 June, I was with the Master alone for a while, and I brought up the name of Percy Grant. “He didn’t understand You the other day, my Lord. He thinks that You teach asceticism, that the spirit and the flesh are two separate things.”

“That is not what I said,” the Master replied. “I said that the spiritual man and the materialist were two different beings. The spirit is in the flesh.”

5 July 1912

The Beloved Master’s portrait is finished. He sat for me six times, but I really did it in the three half hours He had promised me; for the sixth time, when He posed in His own room on the top floor, I didn’t put on a single stroke. I was looking at the portrait wondering what I could find to do, when He suddenly rose from his chair and said: “It is finished.” The fifth time He sat, Miss Souley-Campbell came in with a drawing she had done from a photograph to ask if He would sign it for her and if she might add a few touches from life. This meant that He had to change His pose, so of course I couldn’t paint that day. And the fourth time (the nineteenth of June) — who could have painted then?

I had just begun to work, Lua in the room sitting on a couch nearby, when the Master smiled at me; then turning to Lua said in Persian: “This makes me sleepy. What shall I do?”

[Photograph: Portrait of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá painted by Juliet Thompson, 1912.]

“Tell the Master, Lua, that if He would like to take a nap, I can work while He sleeps.”

But I found that I could not. What I saw then was too sacred, too formidable. He sat still as a statue, His eyes closed, infinite peace on that chiselled face, a God-like calm and grandeur in His erect head.

Suddenly, with a great flash like lightning He opened His eyes and the room seemed to rock like a ship in a storm with the Power released. The Master was blazing. “The veils of glory”, “the thousand veils”, had shrivelled away in that Flame and we were exposed to the Glory itself.

Lua and I sat shaking and sobbing.

Then He spoke to Lua. I caught the words, “Munadiy-i ‘Ahd.” (Herald of the Covenant.

Lua started forward, her hand to her breast.

"Man?" (I?) she exclaimed.

"Call one of the Persians. You must understand this."

Never shall I forget that moment, the flashing eyes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá the reverberations of His Voice, the Power that still rocked the room. God of lightning and thunder! I thought.

"I appoint you, Lua, the Herald of the Covenant. And I AM THE COVENANT, appointed by Bahá'u'lláh. And no one can refute His Word. This is the Testament of Bahá'u'lláh. You will find it in the Holy Book of Aqdas. Go forth and proclaim, 'This is THE COVENANT OF GOD in your midst.'"

A great joy had lifted Lua up. Her eyes were full of light. She looked like a winged angel. "Oh recreate me," she cried, "that I may do this work for Thee!"

By now I was sobbing uncontrollably.

"Julie too," said Lua, not even in such a moment forgetful of me, "wants to be recreated."

But the Master had shrouded Himself with His veils again, the "thousand veils". He sat before us now in His dear humanity: very, very human, very simple.

"Don't cry, Juliet," He said. "This is no time for tears. Through tears you cannot see to paint."

I tried hard to hold back my tears and to work, but painting that day was at an end for me.

The Master smiled lovingly.

"Juliet is one of My favourites because she speaks the truth to me. See how I love the truth, Juliet. You spoke one word of truth to Me and see how I have praised it!"

I looked up to smile in answer, and in gratitude, then was overwhelmed again by that awful convulsive sobbing.

At this the Master began to laugh and, as He laughed and laughed, the strangest thing happened. It was as if at each outburst He wrapped Himself in more veils, so that now He looked completely human, without a trace left of His superhuman majesty. Never had I seen Him like this before and I never did afterward.

"I am going to tell you something funny," He said, adding in English, "a joke".

"Oh tell it!" we begged; and now I was in a sort of hysteria, laughing and crying at the same time.

"No. Not now. Paint."

But of course I couldn't paint.

Later, walking up and down, He laughed again.

"I am thinking of My joke," He explained.

"Tell it!" we pleaded.

"No, I cannot, for every time I try to tell it I laugh so I cannot speak."

We got down on our knees, able at last to enter into His play, and begged Him, "Please, please tell us." We were laughing on our knees.

"No. Not now. After lunch."

But, alas, after lunch He went upstairs to His room, and we never heard the Master's joke.

Perhaps, there wasn't any joke. Perhaps He had just found it necessary, after that mighty Declaration, to bring us down to earth again. He had revealed to us "The Apex of Immortality." He had lifted us to a height from which we could see it. Now He, our loving Shepherd, had carried us in His own arms back to our little valley and put us where we belonged.

---

In the early morning of 19 June, before the Master had called me to paint Him, He had spoken to the people in the English basement. On His way down the stairs from His room He passed Lua and me, where we stood in the third-floor hall. We saw, and felt, as He walked down the upper flight, a peculiar power in His step — as though some terrific Force had possession of Him; a Force too strong to be caged in the body, sparking through, almost escaping His body, able to sunder it. I cannot begin to describe that indomitable step, its fearful majesty, or the strange flashing of His eyes. The sublime language of the Old Testament, words such as these: "Who is this that cometh from Bozrah ... that treadeth the wine-press in His fury?" faintly express what I saw as I watched the Master descending those stairs. Unsmiling, He passes Lua and me. Then He looked back, still unsmiling.

"Juliet is one of My favourites," He said.

In the afternoon of that same day He sent Lua down to the waiting people to "proclaim the Covenant"; then a little later followed her and spoke Himself on the station of the Centre of the Covenant, but not as He had done to Lua and me. The blazing Reality of it He had revealed in His own Person to us. To them He spoke guardedly, even deleting afterwards from our notes some of the things He had said.

Still later that afternoon the Master had promised to sit for a photograph. I had made the appointment myself with Mrs Kasebier, a very wonderful photographer, to bring the Master to her studio, but some people prevented His getting off in time. When they left, He sent for me.

"I am ashamed," He said (while I nearly died at that word "ashamed" from Him), "but I will go tomorrow. I had planned to leave for Montclair tomorrow but I will stay until Friday for your sake."

"I can't bear, my Lord," I said, "to have You delay Your trip to the country for this."

"No, I wish it," He answered.

"I have a confession to make, my Lord," I said. "I have been to Dr Grant's house. It happened in this way: he asked if I would be the bearer of his photograph to You and would I stop at the Rectory for it on my way up to You. Then he invited me to come to breakfast. That invitation I declined, but I could think of no excuse for refusing to stop for the picture. So I did go. But I stayed only five or ten minutes and his mother was with us all the time."

“Good, good,” said the Master. “Going to his house was not good, but since you have confessed it, Juliet, I am very much pleased. When I look into your heart,” He added, smiling, “I find it just like that mirror — it is so pure.”

(Oh, please understand me, when I repeat such things it is only because they are His words to me. I keep them just to remind myself of something potential He sees in me which I must grow up to. I am not reminding myself of His praise, for it really isn't praise but stimulation. If He had been blaming me, I would repeat His blame too.

He then spoke of my teaching. “Your breath is effective,” He said. “You are now in the Kingdom of Abhá with Me, as I wished you to be.”

20 June 1912

The next day, 20 June, we went to Mrs Kasebier's — Lua, Mrs Hinkle-Smith, and I — in the car with the Master.

I shall never forget the Master's beauty in the strange cold light of her studio, a green, underwater sort of light, in which He looked shining and chiselled, like the statue of a god. But the pictures are dark shadows of Him.

21 June 1912

On 21 June, the Master left for Montclair to stay nine days. I was with Him all day till He went. I had lunched with Him nearly every day that week. Lua, Mrs Hinkle-Smith, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, and I bade Him goodbye on the steps of His house. Montclair

23 June 1912

It had nearly killed Lua not to be taken to Montclair with Him. Two days later she said to me: “Let's go to see Him, Julie.”

“How can we, Lua? He didn't invite us,” I answered. “He bade us goodbye for nine days.”

“Oh but you have an excuse, those proofs of Mrs Kasebier's pictures. You really should show them to Him, Julie.”

And she whirled Georgie Ralston and me off to Montclair with her.

We were punished of course, and our first punishment was that lunch was unusually late (so that instead of arriving after, as we had planned, we arrived just in time for it). And this was agonizing, for there weren't enough seats at the table, and the Master wouldn't sit down to eat. One of us had to occupy His chair, while He Himself waited on us, carrying all the courses around and around that table. I couldn't get over my mortification.

At the end He came in with the fruit, a glass bowl full of golden peaches. Without turning His head — His face was set straight before Him — He sent a piercing glance from the corner of His eye toward Lua and me. Such a majestic, stern glance, like a sword-thrust.

After lunch, and this was our second punishment, He banished the three of us — Georgie, Lua, and me — leading us to a small back porch and abandoning us there. But before very long He returned and asked us to take a walk with Him.

We came back from our walk by way of the front porch. Some people were gathered there and Lua, Georgie, and I sat down with them while the Master went upstairs to rest. He joined us, however, very soon and, striding up and down, began to talk to us. As He walked His Power shook us; His intoxicating exhilaration, pouring into me, filled me up with new life.

His eyes — those eyes of light, which seem to be always looking into heaven and when for an instant they glance toward earth, veer away at once, back to heaven — were brilliantly restless. His whole Being was restless with the same strange Force I had felt on that memorable day, the nineteenth of June. It was as though the lightning of His Spirit could scarcely endure to be harnessed to the body. He was almost out of the body. But soon He took a seat and rested quietly.

I showed Him the proofs of the pictures, then spoke of Mrs Kasebier — who had seen Him only once, when she photographed Him. “She said she would like to live near You, my Lord.”

He laughed. “She doesn’t want to live near Me. She only wants a good time!” Then He grew serious. “To live near Me,” He said, “one must have My aims and objects. Do you remember the rich young man who wanted to live near Christ, and when he learned what it cost to live near Him — that it meant to give away all his possessions and take up a cross and follow Christ — then,” the Master laughed, “he fled away!”[120]

“Among the disciples of the Báb,” He continued, “were two: His amanuensis and a firm believer. On the eve of the Báb’s martyrdom the firm believer prayed: ‘Oh let me die with You!’ The amanuensis said: ‘What shall I do?’

“‘What shall I do?’” mocked the Master. “‘What do you want me to do?’ The disciple died with the Báb, his head on the breast of the Báb, and their bodies were mingled in death. The other died in prison anyway, but think of the difference in their stations!

“There was another martyr,” continued the Master after a moment, “Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh of __Sh__íráz.” Then He told us that Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh had been in the Presence of Bahá’u’lláh only once, “but he so loved the Blessed Beauty” that he could not resist following Him to Tíhrán, though Bahá’u’lláh had commanded him to remain in __Sh__íráz with his old parents. “Still,” said the Master, His tone exultant, “he followed!”

Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh reached Tíhrán in the midst of that bloodiest of massacres resulting from the attempt on the __Sh__áh’s life by two fanatical Bábís. Bahá’u’lláh had been cast into a dungeon. There, in that foul cellar He sat, weighted down by “The Devil’s Chain”, eleven disciples sitting with Him, bound by the same chain. In it were set iron collars which were fastened around the neck by iron pins. Every day a disciple was slaughtered and none knew when his turn would come. The first intimation he had of his immediate death was when the jailer took out the iron pin from his collar.

Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh entered Tíhrán and inquired of the guard at the gate “where Bahá’u’lláh resided.” “We will take you to Him,” said the guard. And some men took ‘Abdu’lláh to the dungeon and chained him to Bahá’u’lláh.

“So,” the Master said, “he found his Beloved again!”

One day the jailer came into the dungeon and took out the pin from Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh’s collar.

“Then,” said the Master, “Mírzá ‘Abdu’lláh stepped joyfully forward. First, he kissed the feet of the Blessed Beauty, and then ...”

The Master's whole aspect suddenly changed. It was as though the spirit of the martyr had entered into Him. With that God-like head erect, snapping His fingers high in the air, beating out a drum-like rhythm with His foot till we could hardly endure the vibrations set up, He triumphantly sang "The Martyr's Song".

"I have come again, I have come again,

By way of __Sh__íráz I have come again!

With the wine cup in My hand!

Such is the madness of Love!"

"And thus," ended 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "singing and dancing he went to his death, and a hundred executioners fell on him! And later his parents came to Bahá'u'lláh, praising God that their son had given his life in the Path of God."

This was what the Cause meant then. This was what it meant to "live near Him"! Another realm opened to me, the realm of Divine Tragedy.

The Master sank back into His chair. Tears swelled in my eyes, blurring everything. When they cleared I saw a still stranger look on His face. His eyes were unmistakably fixed on the Invisible. They were filled with delight and as brilliant as jewels. A smile of exultation played on His lips. So low that it sounded like an echo He hummed the Martyr's Song.

"See," He exclaimed, "the effect that the death of a martyr has in the world. It has changed My condition." After a moment's silence, He asked: "What is it, Juliet, you are pondering so deeply?"

"I was thinking, my Lord, of the look on Your face when You said Your condition had been changed. And that I had seen a flash of the joy of God when someone dies happily for His Cause."

"There was one name," the Master answered, "that always brought joy to the face of Bahá'u'lláh. His expression would change at the mention of it. That name was Mary of Magdala."

West Englewood

29 June 1912

Almost a week passed before we saw our Lord again. Then, on the twenty-ninth of June, we met Him at West Englewood. He was giving a feast for all the believers in the grounds around Roy Wilhelm's house, the "Feast of Unity" He called it.

I went with dear Silvia Gannett. We walked from the little station, past the grove where the tables were set — a grove of tall pine trees — and on to the house in which He was, He Whose Presence filled our eyes with light and without Whom our days had been very dim and lifeless.

Ah, there He was again! Sitting in a corner of the porch! I sped across the lawn, forgetting Silvia, forgetting everything. He looked down at me with grave eyes, and I saw a fathomless welcome in them.

For a while we sat with Him on the porch. Then He led us down into the grove. There He seated Himself on the ground at the foot of a pine tree and called two believers to His right and left. One was Mrs Krug in her very elegant clothes, the other a poor and shabby old woman. But both faces, the wrinkled one and the smooth, pretty one, were beautiful with the same radiance. I shall never forget that old woman's shining blue eyes.

The great words He spoke to us then have been preserved.[121] I will not repeat them. Besides I remember them too imperfectly. But He said one thing which woke my whole being: "This is a New Day; a New Hour."

By the time He had finished, the feast was ready, but just as it was announced a storm blew up — a strange, sudden storm, without warning. There was a tremendous crash of thunder; through the treetops we could see black clouds boiling up, and big drops of rain splashed on the tables.

The Master rose calmly and, followed by the Persians, walked out to the road, then to the end of it where there is a crossroad. A single chair had been left there and, as I watched from a distance, I saw the Master take it and sit down, while the Persians ranged themselves behind Him. I saw Him lift His face to the sky. He had gone a long way from the house; thunder still crashed and the clouds rolled frighteningly low, but He continued to sit perfectly motionless, that sacred, powerful face upturned to the sky. Then came a strong, rushing wind; the clouds began to race away; blue patches appeared above and the sun shone out. And then the Master rose and walked back into the grove. This I witnessed.

Later, as we sat at the tables, two hundred and fifty of us, He anointed us all with attar of rose. I was not at a table but sitting under a tree with Marjorie Morten and Silvia. The Master swept toward us in His long white robes, forever the Divine Shepherd.

"Friends here?" He smiled, "Friends?"

In His voice was a thrilling joy. With a look that shook my heart, so full was it with the musk of His Love, He rubbed my face hard with the attar of rose.

He passed among all the tables with His little vial of perfume (which Grace Robarts swears was almost as full at the end as in the beginning) anointing the forehead of every one there, touching and caressing all our blind faces with His tingling fingers.

Then He disappeared for hours.

Lua, too, went off alone, an exceedingly naughty purpose in her mind. The Master had just told her that she must leave very soon for California. So now she deliberately walked in poison ivy, walked back and forth and back and forth till her feet were thoroughly poisoned. "Now, Julie," she said (when the deed was done) "He can't send me to California."

---

To me the most beautiful scene of all came later, when the Master returned to us after dark. About fifty or sixty people had lingered, unable to tear themselves from Him. The Master sat in a chair on the top step of the porch, some of us surrounding Him — dear guilty Lua with her poisoned feet, May, Silvia, Marjorie, and I and a young coloured man, Neval Thomas. Below us, all over the lawn, on each side of the path, sat the others, the light summer skirts of the women spread out on the grass, tapers in their hands (to keep off mosquitoes). In the dark, in their filmy dresses, they looked like great moths and the burning tips of the tapers they waved like fireflies darting about.

Then the Master spoke again to us. I was standing behind Him, close to Him, and before He began He turned and gave me a long, profound look. His talk of that night has been recorded. It was a resounding Call to us to arise from the tomb of self in this Day of the Great Resurrection and unite around Him to vivify the world.

Before He had finished He rose from His chair and started down the path still talking, passing between the dim figures on the grass with their lighted tapers, talking till He reached the road, where He turned and we could no longer see Him. Even then His words floated back to us — the liquid Persian, ‘Alí Qulí __Kh__án’s beautiful, quivering translation, like the sound of a violin string.

“Peace be with you,” this was the last we heard, “I will pray for you.”

Oh that Voice that came back out of His invisibility when He had passed beyond our sight. May I always remember, and hear the Voice. New York

30 June 1912

That night our Beloved Lord returned to New York. The next morning early I flew up to see Him, but He sent me at once to Lua, who was staying with Georgie Ralston in a hotel nearby.

She was in bed, her feet terribly swollen from the poison ivy.

“Look at me, Julie,” she said. “Look at my feet. Oh, please go right back to the Master and tell Him about them and say: ‘How can Lua travel now?’”

I did it, returned to the Master’s house, found Him in His room and put Lua’s question to Him. He laughed, then crossed the room to a table on which stood a bowl of fruit, and, selecting an apple and a pomegranate, gave them to me.

“Take these to Lua,” He said. “Tell her to eat them and she will be cured. Spend the day with her, Juliet.”

Oh precious Lua — strange mixture of disobedience and obedience — and all from love! I shall never forget her, seizing first the apple, then the pomegranate and gravely chewing them all the way through till not even a pomegranate seed was left: thoroughly eating her cure, which was certain to send her to California.

In the late afternoon we were happily surprised by a visit from the Master Himself. He drew back the sheet and looked at Lua’s feet, which by that time were beautifully slim. Then He burst out laughing.

“See,” He said, “I have cured Lua with an apple and a pomegranate.”

But Lua revolted again. There was one more thing she could try, and she tried it. The Master had asked me to paint her portrait and I had already had one sitting. The following day, at the Master’s house, she drew me aside.

“Please, Julie, do something else for me. Go to the Master, now, and say: ‘If Lua is in California, how can I paint her?’”

I went straight to His room with Valiyu’llah __Kh__án to translate. “My Lord,” I said, “You have commanded me to paint Lua. If she is in California and I here, how can I do it? The portrait is begun; how can I finish it?”

Again the Master burst out laughing, for this of course was too transparent.

"In a year," He said, "Lua will join Me in Egypt. She will stay in New York a few days on her way to Me and you can paint her then, Juliet."

So poor Lua had to go to California. There was no way out for her.[122]

4 July 1912

On the fourth of July, yesterday, Mamma had her birthday dinner with the Master. He was so sweet to her. When we first arrived we found Him in the English basement and He led Mamma to the sofa and, with that wonderful freedom of His, drew her down beside Him.

Carrie Kinney, Georgie Ralston, and I were sitting across the room by the window and I'm afraid we did look solemn, for we sat in a row, perfectly silent.

"Look at them!" said Mamma, laughing. "They are jealous of me!"

"Then we will make them more jealous!" and the Master seized Mamma's hand and drew her still closer, at which she looked really scared!

Now I felt compelled to speak. "Three years ago, my Lord, on the fourth of July, Carrie, and I were with You in 'Akká and You took us to the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. I never expected to keep that anniversary with You in New York."

At the table the Master joked with Mamma because she was eating so little. "I perceive that you are an angel, Mrs Thompson. Angels do not eat."

"The Master sees I am not an angel," I laughed, "for I eat every morsel He puts on my plate."

"I perceive that you are a very clever girl. Mrs Thompson," He continued, "is going home to a luscious supper and saving her appetite for that."

Passing me a dish with three very shrivelled dates on it, He said: "Here, Juliet, are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

And I ate them up!

A little later Mamma said, looking at the Master with her sweet shyness: "You are very kind to me."

"God knows the degrees of it," He sighed deeply.

---

While we sat with Him after dinner, He spoke of tests. "Even the sword," He said, "is no test to the Persian believers. They are given a chance to recant; they cry out instead: 'Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!' Then the sword is raised," — He shot up His arm as though brandishing a sword — "they cry out all the more 'Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!' But some of the people here are tested if I don't say 'How do you do?'"

12 July 1912

I have almost no time to write these days, as I spend most of them with the Beloved Master and when I try to write after dinner, my darling little mother stops me too soon. Her room is at right angles with mine and at ten o'clock she calls through her window: "Put out your light, baby." But there are three or four lovely things that I must tell.

On Monday, 9 July, the Master invited me, with the Persians to go to the Natural History Museum. It was a broiling afternoon and I couldn't imagine why He should want to go to that Museum, and in the hottest part of the day. But wherever He went, there I wanted to be.

When we reached the Ninth Avenue corner of the Museum the Master, exhausted by that time, sank to a low stone ledge to rest. Between us and the main door on the Central Park corner stretched a long cross-town block in glaring sun, not a single tree on the sidewalk.

"My Lord," I said, "let me try to find a nearer entrance for You." And I hurried along the grass, keeping close to the building, searching the basement for a door. The employees' entrance was locked. Just beyond stood a sign: "No Thoroughfare." I was rushing past this when a shrill whistle stopped me, and I turned to face the watchman of the grounds. He was a little bent old Jew with a very kind face.

"Oh excuse me," I said, "for breaking the rules, but I must find a nearer door than the main one. See Who is sitting on that ledge! I must find it for Him."

The watchman turned and looked at the Master, looked and looked, at that Figure from the East, from the Past — the Days of the Old Testament — and his eyes became very soft. "Is He a Jew?" he asked.

"A descendant of Abraham."

"Come with me," said the watchman. "Ask Him to come with me."

I went over and spoke to the Master and He rose and followed with the Persians, I dropping back to walk with them. There was not a nearer entrance, but the watchman, taking a risk perhaps, led us across the grass, where at least it was cooler and the way shorter.

In the Museum we passed through a room in which a huge whale hung from the ceiling. The Master looked up at it, laughed and said: "He could hold seventy Jonahs!"

Then He took us straight to the Mexican exhibit, and this seemed to interest Him very much. In the great elaborately carved glyphs standing around the room He found traces of Persian art and pointed them out to me. He told us this sculpture resembled very closely the ancient sculpture of Egypt. "Only," He said, "this is better." Then He took me over to the cases where He showed me purely Persian bracelets.

"I have heard a tradition," I said, "that in the very distant past this country and Asia were connected."

"Assuredly," answered the Master, "before a great catastrophe there was such a connection between Asia and America."

After looking at everything in the Mexican rooms, He led us to the front door and out into the grounds again. Then, stepping from the stone walk to the grass, He seated Himself beneath a young birch tree, His back to us, while we stood behind Him on the flags. He sat there a long time, silent. Was He waiting for someone? I wondered.

While He — waited? — the old Jewish watchman stole quietly up to me from the direction of the Museum.

"Is He tired?" he whispered. "Who is He? He looks like such a great man."

"He is 'Abdu'l-Bahá of Persia," I said, "and He has been a great Sufferer because of His work for the real Brotherhood of Man, the uniting of all the races and nations."

"I should like to speak to Him," said the Jew. And I took him over to the tree under which the Master still sat with His back to us.

At the sound of our footsteps He turned and looked up at the watchman, His brilliant eyes full of sweetness. "Come and sit by Me," He said.

"Thank You, Sir, but I am not allowed."

"Is it against the rules for Me to sit on the grass?"

The old man's eyes, softly shining, were fixed on the Master. "No, You may sit there all day!"

But the Master rose and stood beneath the tree.

Such pictures as I see when the Master is in them could never be put upon canvas — not even into words, except by the sublimest poet — but I always want to try at least to leave a trace of their beauty. The Master, luminous in the sunlight, His white robe flowing to the grass, standing beside the white slender trunk of the birch tree, with its leafy canopy over His head. The Jew standing opposite Him — so bent, so old — his eyes, like a lover's, humbly raised to the face of his own Messiah! As yet unrecognized, his Messiah, yet his heart worshiped.

Eagerly he went on, offering all he could think of to this Mysterious One Who had touched him so deeply.

"You didn't see the whole of the Museum. Would You like to go back after You have rested? You didn't go up to the third floor." (Unseen by us he must have been following all the time.) "The fossils and the birds are up there. Wouldn't You like to see the birds?"

The Master answered very gently, smiling.

"I am tired of travelling and looking at the things of this world. I want to go above and travel and see in the spiritual worlds. What do you think about that?" He asked suddenly, beaming on the old watchman.

The watchman looked puzzled and scratched his head.

"Which would you rather possess," continued the Master, "the material or the spiritual world?"

Still the old man pondered. At last he brought forth: "Well, I guess the material. You know you have that, anyway."

"But you do not lose it when you have attained the spiritual world. When you go upstairs in a house, you don't leave the house. The lower floor is under you."

"Oh I see!" cried the watchman, his whole face lighting up, "I see!"

After we parted from the watchman, who walked with us all the way to the Ninth Avenue corner, leading us again across the grass, I began to blame myself for not inviting him to the Master's house, forgetting that the Master Himself had not done so. Every day I meant to return to the Museum to tell the old man where the Master lived, but I put off from day to day.

When, at the end of a week, I did run over to the Museum, I found a young watchman there, who seemed to know nothing of the one he had replaced.

Had our friend "gone upstairs?"

Why had the Master visited a Museum of Natural History in the hottest hour of a blistering July day? Had He instead visited a soul whose need was crying out to Him, to open an old man's eyes so that he might see to climb the stairs, to take away the dread of death?[123]

---

On the tenth of July, I went to the Master in the early morning with something in my heart to say, but already there were people with Him and I saw no chance of talking privately.

"Come, Juliet, sit by Me," He called as I entered the room. "Now, speak."

How could I, before those people? I hesitated.

"All your hopes and desires are destined to be fulfilled," He said, "in the Kingdom of God."

This was my cue.

"I came to tell You, my Lord, that now I have only one desire, to offer my heart for Your service."

"This you will also do, but all your desires will be fulfilled."

He kept me to lunch that day. While we were waiting in the English basement for the lunch to be announced, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án and I alone with the Master, He spoke again of my "truthfulness".

"Oh," I prayed, "may I some day have all the virtues so that in every way I can make you happy."

"But he who possesses truthfulness possesses all the virtues," said the Master. Then He went on to tell us a story. "There was once a disciple of Muḥammad who asked of another disciple, 'What shall I do to please God?' And the other disciple replied: 'Do not kill. Do not steal. Do not covet,' etc., etc., etc. A great many 'do not's'. "the Master laughed. "He asked still another, 'What shall I do to become nearer to God?' And this one said: 'You must supplicate and pray. You must be generous. You must be courageous,' etc., etc., etc. Then the disciple went to 'Alí. 'What do you say I should do in order to please God and to become nearer to Him?' 'One thing only: be truthful.'

"For," continued the Master, "if you are truthful, you cannot commit murder. You would have to confess it! Neither can you steal. You would have to confess it. So, if one is truthful, he possesses all the virtues.

"I may tell you this," He said to me, and He told me a thing so wonderful that, even to keep and cherish His words and read them over in the time to come, I cannot repeat it here.

“My Lord,” I said, “if ever I have told You an untruth it was because I deceived myself.”

“There are degrees of truth,” He answered, “but that word of yours which has so pleased Me was absolute, perfect, extraordinary truth.”

---

That night we walked with Him in “His garden” — Georgie Ralston, Mīrzā ‘Alī-Akbar, Valiyu’llah __Kh__ān, Aḥmad, and I. Dear Lua, who has not yet left for California, was ill and unable to be with us.

He led us down a path sloping to the river, flanked by tall poplars. Sweeping on ahead in His gleaming white robes, He was like a spirit. The night was very dark, the river and the Jersey Palisades starred and glittering with lights and there were chains of lights close to the water.

With a wave of the hand towards them He said: “If only the souls of men could be thus illumined.”

“It is You, my Lord,” I said, as I followed close with Valiyu’llah __Kh__ān and Aḥmad, “Who put a torch to our souls and light them.”

Suddenly out from behind the bushes rushed a crowd of children, bursting upon us like little demons, capering around us and hooting. Some of them even picked up stones and threw them. Then they all began to sing: “Follow the Lord! The Lord leads on!”

Back to us floated the voice of the Master: “The people of the world are blind. You must have vision. The people of the world are heedless: see how heedless they are!” and He swept His hand toward the children, who immediately melted back into the shadows as if they had never really existed. “You must be aware. The people of the world are steeped in darkness. You must be immersed in a sea of light.”

We went deep down in the park, close to the river; then turned, climbed a path, and came out upon the street. Here there was a stone wall, dividing the park from the sidewalk. The Master leaned wearily on the wall and gazed far below to the river. He seemed to be lost in meditation, His face profoundly sorrowful. I thought of a picture, a poster, which, in the early days of His visit, had been displayed on all the church doors: the Christ mourning over the city

Soon He continued His walk. I turned to Valiyu’llah __Kh__ān.

“Oh,” I said, “if only I could realize throughout the whole fibre of my being, feel with every nerve, every atom in me, His Divine Reality, if only while in His bodily Presence I could be fully aware of Who He is ...”

He turned and spoke and His face was ineffably gentle and holy and something in His voice pierced me to the heart. He couldn’t have heard me with the outer ear — I had fallen too far behind and was whispering, and in English — but how He answered me!

“They laugh at Me, yet My dress is the dress of Jesus, just the same that He wore.”

The people of the world: children! Had the Master Himself evoked those little demons and made a sort of moving picture of them, to show us what is to come as we “follow the Lord” in the dark night?

---

But the very next day another picture, of very different children, was superimposed upon this.

I had been with the Master all morning. (Later I will write of the morning.) In the afternoon around three o'clock I returned with Rhoda Nichols only to meet Him just going out with the Persians. He smiled, then walked swiftly toward the river, but Aḥmad, dropping behind, called to Rhoda and me: "Come along with us to the Harrises'." We should have known better than to go, for the Master had not invited us, but we couldn't resist the temptation. So we followed up Riverside Drive, then West End Avenue, till we came to Ninety-Fifth Street, where Mr and Mrs Harris live. A tenement house neighbourhood.

As we approached Ninety-Fifth Street, there we saw them: the different children. There must have been nearly a hundred of them, playing in the street with their hoops and balls. But, when the Master drew near, all shining white in His long flowing robes, they immediately stopped playing. It all happened instantaneously. The next moment they had fallen into formation and were marching down the street behind Him (we had turned east toward Central Park), some of them still rolling their hoops. Without one word they followed, their little faces almost solemn. They made me think of a real and beautiful Children's Crusade.

We came to the house where the Harrises live and walked up five steep flights, but when Mrs Harris opened her apartment door and Rhoda and I saw a table inside set only for the Master and the Persians, we backed away terribly embarrassed and lost no time in getting downstairs. After all, we couldn't have foreseen a luncheon at three o'clock!

When we opened the street door, there were the children again, surrounding the house, silently looking up at it. A little yellow-haired girl came running up the stoop to me. She seemed to be the spokesman for the others. Breathlessly she asked: "Please, ma'am, tell us. Is He Christ?"

I sat down on the stoop while the whole crowd of children swarmed and pushed around me. "I will tell you all about Him," I said. Then I whispered to Rhoda: "Go upstairs again, dear, and let the Master know what is happening."

She returned with a wonderful message from the Master, an invitation to all the children to come to a feast to be given specially for them at the Kinneys' house next Sunday.

---

And now just a word about the morning. Georgie Ralston and Mrs Brittingham, Lua, and I were together in the Master's room. As I sat there I felt something of the Mystery of His Divinity. The day was very hot and His sleeves were rolled up and I saw on His arms the scars of chains.

When the others left He kept me.

"I come to Your Presence, my Lord," I said, "to be cured of my spiritual ills."

"Your pure heart," the Master answered, "is a magnet for the Divine feelings."

He spoke of my mother and sent her some fruit. "Your mother," He said, "is very dear to me. You cannot imagine how I love your mother."

Then He laughed and asked: "How is Dr Grant?"

"I don't know, my Lord. I haven't seen him. I'm afraid I hurt him the last time we met."

"What did you do?"

"I refused to go into his house with him."

"How is he with Us?"

"I don't know."

"I want to see him. Is this possible?"

"Yes, I am sure. I will telephone to him."

"Tell him I am longing to see him, longing to see him," repeated the Master smiling.

I knelt and kissed His robe, looking up so happy, so grateful, while He looked down and laughed at me.

That night I telephoned to Percy. "I am the bearer of a message to you," I said, "from the Master. He asked this morning if I had seen you lately and said He wanted to see you. 'Tell Dr Grant I am longing to see him,' He said."

"That was very beautiful of Him. Give Him my cordial greetings. Tell him how happy I am that He thought of me. I can't tell you at this moment, Juliet, when I can go. I hope tomorrow afternoon. I have a wedding at half-past four. After that, perhaps."

"Well, I will give you the Master's telephone number and you can call His house about it, unless you prefer to have me arrange it."

"I should rather do it through you."

Saying he would let me know in the morning, he bade me goodbye; then, "I give you my loving salutations."

The next morning, however, when he called me up, he was in another state of mind. "Tell the Master," he said, "I have so many human engagements just now. I am going up to Greenwich after the wedding. (Greenwich is Alice Flagler's home.)

"But I want to run in to see you this morning, if I may."

I went to my room and prayed. I was on my knees when he came. Not that he found me on them!

"To come straight to the point, Percy," I said, "I hope you will go to see the Master."

"I'm going to see the Master, only I can't today."

"Oh that is all right," I said, brightening. "I didn't understand."

We talked about other things and then Katherine Berwind dropped in. Percy spent the morning with us, leaving us for a little while to return with bottles of ginger ale and grape juice which he mixed into a drink for us. When he finally left about noon I followed him out of the studio.

"What message have you," I asked, "for the Master?"

He swore! It was a very mild swear, but he coupled the Master's name with it, so I can't repeat it.

"I believe you love Him," he said fiercely, "more than anything on earth."

"I do."

"More than your art," he added quickly.

"But of course."

"Well, you shouldn't. With your talent, Juliet, you could do immortal work. Do you never think of that?"

"I am thinking of His immortal work in us."

"He has done it, in you!"

"Not yet."

"Juliet, I have wanted to co-operate with Him. You know that. But I don't believe He can do this thing alone.

"I believe He is perfectly able to do it alone."

"You do?"

"He changes the hearts and nobody else can do that. Well, what message shall I take to Him?"

"Tell Him with my greeting that I will come up some time to see Him, but I am out of town a great deal, most of the time, and —"

"Can't you do any better than that?" I asked.

"I want to do something for His comfort and when Mr Flagler's yacht comes back I want to take Him up the Hudson. I will be in town Friday, Juliet."

"Then come up on Friday to see Him with me. Please come. You know I don't often persist, but this time — forgive me if I do."

"I think it is beautiful of you to persist in this instance, Juliet." With the face of a martyr he kissed my hand. "I will come Friday."

And, looking unspeakably miserable, he left me.

---

On Friday in the afternoon he stopped for me. We were expecting the Master in the evening — He was to bless our house with a visit — and at the moment Percy arrived I was telephoning Marjorie, who had offered to bring some light refreshment. Percy, sitting in the living room, heard. But I couldn't invite him, for I knew it would spoil Mamma's evening with the Master — she mightn't even come into the room.

While I was putting on my gloves Percy produced a large and ornate pocketbook. "Juliet," he said, "here is an empty pocketbook which someone brought me from Italy. Will you accept it? I thought you might have in mind some Oriental person to whom you would like to give it."

When we started out he proposed going up in a cab, but I objected on the grounds that it would be slow and we were already half an hour late.

"I am bringing the Master down here at six and you would have no visit at all if we took a slow cab."

"Well, for the matter of that, Juliet" — and his upper lip grew very stiff — "any visit I might pay would be merely an expression of affection and courtesy. As for all you could get from a visit of this sort, where conversation must be through an interpreter and 'Abdu'l-Bahá will go off into a monologue on some subject that interests Him — well, as I said, it is merely a mark of courtesy."

---

I never saw his mouth so stubborn as when we entered the Master's house. The Master was waiting for us, sitting in the bay window of the English basement.

"Marhabá, Dr Grant! It is a long time since I have seen you, a long time."

But His welcome was more reserved than it had been before.

"Well, Dr Grant," He said, after a moment, "what is the very latest news, the very latest?"

Remembering Percy's remark, that the Master always indulged in monologue, I couldn't help smiling at this.

"The latest news," said Percy with a wicked look, as obstinate, pugnacious and self-confident as I have ever seen, "is in the field of athletics."

"The Olympic games?" asked the Master.

"Yes," said Percy, surprised.

"You know," the Master went on, "that these games originated in ancient Greece and it was a necessity of that time to develop the body to its fullest strength, the nations being constantly at warfare and the men wearing armour and fighting hand to hand. Heavy swords had to be driven through coats of mail; bodies had to be strengthened to endure the mail."

"But explain to the Master," said Percy, very much de haut en bas, "that because of the people all centring in the cities and thus depleting their constitutions, the necessity for physical development is just as great now as it was then, though the basis is different."

The Master answered with the utmost sweetness: "We do not deprecate physical development, for the sound mind should work through a sound body, but We think that the people of the West are too much concerned with mere physical development. They forget the need of spiritual development."

But Percy was bent upon argument. The development of the spirit, he maintained, could not even begin till the body had first been built up; and he looked so absurdly condescending, so pompous, so sure of his power to defeat the Master, that I could scarcely control my mirth. The Master did not control His.

"Man thinks too much of perfecting the body," He smiled delightfully, "but of what use is it to him without the perfecting of the spirit? No matter how much he develops his muscles and sinews he will never become as strong as the ox, as brave as the lion or as big as the elephant! Physically he is an animal, yet inferior to the animals, for animals acquire their sustenance with the greatest ease, whereas man has to toil incessantly, to labour with infinite pain, for a mere livelihood. So, in the physical realm, the beast is nobler than man. But man is distinguished from the beast by his spiritual gifts and these he should develop with the other, both together. There should be the perfect balance, the spiritual and the physical. A man whose ideal side only is developed is also imperfect. We do not deprecate comfort. If I could find a better house than this I would certainly move into it. But man should not think of comfort alone."

I looked at Percy. He was still like a fighting-cock, ready for another bout. He would never give in before me, I knew, so I slipped quietly into the kitchen. When I returned the whole atmosphere had changed. His face had softened, his stiff mouth relaxed. As I entered the room the Master was saying: "When one prays, one sometimes has divine glimpses. So, when one is spiritually developed, a sublimity of nature is obtained, a delicacy of vision such as could not otherwise be found. Not only this, but tranquillity and happiness are secured.

"Do you think if it had not been for spiritual assurance I could have been happy all those years in prison? Think of it, forty years! You have just been telling me, Dr Grant, that forty years is the average American life. I spent My American life in prison. Yet all that time I was on the heights of happiness. Many believers in Persia have been forced to give up everything: their possessions, their families, and, in the end, their lives, but they never lost their happiness.

"Remember Christ, when they placed the crown of thorns on His head. At that very moment, as the thorns wounded His brow, He looked down the vista of the centuries and beheld innumerable kings bowing their jewelled crowns low before that crown of thorns. Do you think He did not know, that He could not foresee?" (Again I stole a glance at Percy. He looked utterly melted now and his eyes shone.) "When they spat in the face of Christ," the Master went on, "when they made a mock procession and carried Him around the streets, He felt no humiliation."

Just then I rose to go, first asking permission, with my eyes, of the Master, Percy was not inclined to go, even when we were on our feet. In spite of that momentary softening — perhaps partly because of it — he still wanted to stay and argue and I could hardly tear him away.

While we were standing, he swung the master's divine subject to a combative one, "the Occident versus the Orient": that was the substance of it. And if ever I saw the Occident embodied, it was at that moment in that man.

The Master leaned close to him and with the utmost gentleness and patience tried to appeal to him. The people of the East, He said, were content with less than the people here, so their hours of work were shorter. He touched too on the absence of suicide in the Orient.

When He spoke of suicide, and also while He described the humiliations heaped on Christ, which could not humiliate Him, I had a strange sense of impending tragedy for Percy Grant, of something dreadful to happen in the future in which he would utterly "lose his happiness" and would feel humiliation, when perhaps these words of the Master would come back to him.[124]

On the way down in the cab the Master talked about economics. "The most important of the questions here," He said, "is the economic question. Until that is first solved nothing can be done. But if it should not be solved there will be riots."

Percy spoke of democracy.

"But your poor man," the Master replied, "cannot even think of economics; he is so overburdened."

I asked Percy to tell about his work and when he had done so, with some hesitation (for he seldom speaks of himself), the Master said sweetly: "May you make peace here. May you unite the classes."

Whereupon Percy's face beamed.

But he steeled himself again and at my door he turned to go, though I did invite him in, and the Master also said: "Are you not coming in?"

"No, no," and he hurried away, with a huffy look.

I can still see the Master on my steps, so in command.

"Au revoir, Dr Grant," He said.

Percy had mentioned the yacht trip to the Master and asked if He could make it the following Monday, but the Master had several appointments Monday and could not accept for that day.

"I will try," said Percy, "to get the yacht for Tuesday."

The Master had planned to spend the whole evening with us and we were all to go for a walk, but the Persians had forgotten to announce at the Seventy-Eighth Street house that He would be absent Friday evening, so He felt He must return early.

---

My Lord came into our house. The door was not locked. He opened it Himself and walked up the stairs. It was His house. Mamma almost ran to meet Him, her face suffused with joy, her eyes shy and tender. The MacNutts and the Goodalls had arrived and Ruth Berkeley and Marjorie, and were waiting in the second-floor living room. The Master went in and greeted them with His wonderful buoyant greeting; then I took Him to my room to rest and, after kneeling and kissing the hem of His garment, left Him lying on my couch.

While He was resting Kahlil Gibran came. He had a private talk with the Master in my room; then joined us upstairs in the studio, to which we had all gone by that time, and in a very few minutes the Master too joined us.

Mamma, with her own loving hands, had prepared the studio for His reception and it was very beautiful, full of laurel, white roses, and lighted white candles.

"What a good room," said the Master as He entered it. "It is like an Oriental room — so high. If I were to build a house here," He laughed, "I would build an eclectic house — partly Oriental, partly Occidental."

Then we passed the refreshments and our Beloved Lord "broke bread" with us.

- (Footnote. Of course I was terribly disappointed that the Master stayed such a short time that night. A few days later I began to see that this was no accident, that the changing of His plan for that evening had not been just a result of the Persians' forgetfulness, but that in it was a deep and subtle lesson for me. A lesson in perception — or intuition — which is truth itself. I had asked the Master whom I should invite to meet Him. "Anyone you think of," He answered. "Whatever name comes into your mind, invite that person." A few names came into my mind as if projected there from outside. Percy Grant. At once I rejected that name, on Mamma's account, as I have explained already. Mrs Krug. Oh no! Mamma wasn't fond of Mrs Krug. Mrs Kaufman. No. Then I selected my personal friends. Mrs Krug and Mrs Kaufman both were extremely hurt because I didn't invite them and what harmony there was between us was broken for the time being. As for Percy Grant ... !) *

16 July 1912

Tuesday, 16 July, the day proposed for the yacht trip up the Hudson, was a day of crushing disappointment. In the morning I awoke thinking: Today great things may happen for Percy; miracles may happen! Still, an instinct made me uneasy.

As soon as I reached the Master's house I asked if Dr Grant had been heard from. No word had come, Dr Farid told me, and really the Master ought to know in order to arrange His day's appointments. "You had better telephone, Juliet."

I went to the corner drugstore and called the Rectory, only to learn that Percy was still in Greenwich. I called him in Greenwich.

"Oh, Juliet." He sounded bored. "I have been meaning to telephone you all morning, but one thing after another has prevented. No, I am sorry, tell 'Abdu'l-Bahá how very sorry I am, but I cannot arrange the trip for today. Mrs Flagler was in town yesterday and it didn't agree with her and she isn't well enough to go today."

"I am very sorry," I murmured, so shocked I could scarcely speak.

"When does the Master leave New York?"

"On the twenty-second."

"On the twenty-second? I hope it can be arranged before then."

"I hope so."

"How did the supper go off the other night?"

"What supper?"

"The supper you had for the Master?"

"There was no supper."

"Why, I heard you talking about 'provisions' over the telephone with Mrs Morten."

"That was only fruit and a cool drink. The Master just paid us a visit. I asked you to come in."

"Well, I didn't feel that I could. I thought you were going to sit around a table and that all those Persians you had asked would fill it up, and that woman you invited at the Master's house. It makes me shudder, Juliet, to think of all the money you spent that day."

"That was nothing."

"Oh, money is nothing, I suppose!"

"Certainly nothing compared with a visit from the Master." And I said goodbye.

I went back to the house so ashamed I could hardly hold up my head: miserably ashamed of Percy Grant, burning up with indignation at his deliberate insult to the Master, to Him Whose “dress was the same as the dress of Jesus”, an insult levelled at the Master, the real intention of which was to hurt me. Just a petty revenge on me.

I gave Percy’s wretched message to Dr Farid without any comment; then stole off alone and wept.

Soon my Lord sent for me. I longed to unburden my heart to Him, but Grace Krug and Louise were with Him and Grace was telling her own troubles, speaking of some unhappiness of the day before, so of course I could say nothing. I sat forcing back my tears, feeling that at any moment I might burst out crying and that I mustn’t do that in His Presence for any other reason than love.

“And now,” said the Master, still talking with Grace, “the sun is out again! The sun is shining. I am glad of that. I do not like clouds!”

Oh, what if I cry now, I thought.

“Winds from all directions: from the north, south, east, and west — great hurricanes — have beaten against My Ark, yet My Ark still floats.” Smiling, He made an adorable gesture with His hands, swinging them like a rocking boat. “One single wave has submerged many a great ship, yet My Ark still floats!”

“Juliet,” He said, turning suddenly to me, “is there anything you want to ask Me privately? Biya! (Come).”

He led me by the hand into the back room.

“Now speak. Your eyes are all speech!”

“I only want to say that I am deeply ashamed for Dr Grant. Deeply sorry. The friend to whose husband the yacht belongs is sick and he could not get it for today.”

“It is better so,” said the Master. “I was wondering how I could do it, for I am not very well today and must be in Brooklyn this evening at eight o’clock. But I would have done it for his sake. It is better; better,” He ended, with a strange sweet intonation, as He returned to the other room.

18 July 1912

Each day I drink deeper of the cup of Love. Yesterday the draught I took was pure ecstasy. I saw Him for three brief moments only, but those three moments were charged.

First, I saw Him with a few others — Mrs Helen Goodall, Miss Wise, Ella Goodall Cooper — and He spoke to us of the kindness of God, holding in His hand my rosary, which He has carried for several days (the one __Kh__ánum gave me in Haifa). When we meet kindness in a human being He said, how happy it makes us. How much happier we will be when we realize the kindness of God.

Later He called to Him alone. I met Him as He came downstairs from His room to the library. He was all in white.

“Ah-h, Juliet,” He said. He began to walk up and down the library. “Your mother sent me these things,” (referring to some flowers and another little present). “These things came from your mother? I became very happy from them, but she should not have taken the trouble.”

"It made her so happy to send that little offering."

"But she should not have taken the trouble." He continued to walk up and down. In a moment He said: "I am very much please with your truthfulness, Juliet."

That matter between us, your truthfulness on that occasion makes Me happy whenever I think of it."

"Everything in my heart is for You to see, my Lord. I only hope the day may come when You will see nothing in it except the Love of God."

He came very close and looked deep into my eyes with His brilliant eyes.

"I see your heart," He said. "I look into your face and your heart is perfectly clear to Me."

Again He paced up and down and it was then I knelt.

"Tell the Master," I said to Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, "I pray that my heart may become entirely detached from this world."

"Your heart," said the Master, pausing before me and gazing at me with a face of glistening light, "will become entirely detached. You are now in the condition I desired for you." He walked to the window and stood, looking out. "I wish you to teach constantly. Therein lies your happiness, and My happiness."

He came back to me. I had risen.

"I wish you to be detached from the entire world of existence; to turn to the Kingdom of Abhá with a pure heart; with a pure breath to teach the people. I desire for you," He continued, resuming His walk, "that which I desire for My own daughters, Tuba and Rúhâ."

With this He dismissed me.

In the evening I returned to a wedding, Grace Roberts' and Harlan Ober's, where the Master, for me, as well as for the bride and bridegroom, turned the water of life into wine.

Grace and Harlan stood together, transfigured; they seemed to be bathed in white light. Mr Ives, standing opposite, married them. Back in the shadow sat the Master. There were times when I, sitting at a little distance from Him, felt His lightning glance on me. At the end of the service He blessed the marriage. After this He went upstairs, to the front room on the third floor.

I soon followed him there, taking with me our coloured maid, Mamie, and her little adopted son, George, a child six years old. Mamie wanted to have the Master bless him.

On the way up in the bus I had (idiotically) asked: "Do you know who the Master is, George?"

"No, ma'am," very positively.

"Well, you will know some day, for by the time you grow up the whole world will know Who the Master is and then you will be so proud and happy to remember that He blessed you."

The blessing the Master gave George was not an obvious one, there was nothing ceremonial about it. He just took the child on His knee and talked playfully with him and caressed him. But how it impressed that little boy!

While we were going downtown in the bus, he rolled his big eyes up at me and out of a dead silence said: “I know now, ma’am.”

And when Mamie’s husband, Cornelius, opened the door for us, George rushed to him, crying out: “The Master blessed me, dearie, and I will show you just how.”

Then he clattered down the basement stairs and I was spared the scene! I never did know how George demonstrated it — he couldn’t have taken Cornelius on his knee! — but the next day Mamie told me of something else.

“Dearie,” George had asked, “is the Master that blessed me this evening the same Master that holds the moon in His hand and makes the sun shine?”

“Go to bed, child,” said Cornelius.

“But,” repeated George, “is the Master that same Lord that makes the sun shine and the rain come down?”

“The Lord that makes the sun shine,” said Mamie, “is in the Master that blessed you this evening, George. It was the Holy Spirit that blessed you.”

(Footnote. 1947. Thirteen years later a handsome young man came to my door. At first I thought he was Syrian. “Do you remember George?” he asked. Almost at once he spoke of the Master. “I have had a rough life among my own people,” he said, “but the blessing He gave me has lived like a fountain in my heart. It has protected me through all my sufferings. It has inspired me with the resolve to work for better conditions among my people. And,” he went on, “that other time when He spoke at a big meeting on the first floor and you brought me up from the basement and stood me on a chair so that I could see Him plainly, I thought He was God then and was frightened.” Then he described the Master to the minutest detail: the colour of His eyes, His skin, His hair, even the two tones of white in the turban He wore.

A few years ago, during the Second World War, I heard of George again from his real mother. He was in England, practising medicine and working with the wounded in the hospitals.)

19 July 1912

This morning I went as usual to the Master’s house but was stopped at the door by Alice Beede.

“Fly,” she said, “after Mrs Goodall and Ella. They have your rosary. The Master just gave it to them.”

My precious, precious coral rosary — given to me by the Greatest Holy Leaf! Given on a wonderful occasion, when a young carpenter living on Mount Carmel had been healed of typhoid fever. Rúḥá and I had climbed the mountain to see him and we were trying to help his mother when __Kh__ánum and the Holy Mother arrived with a doctor. The doctor went into the hut and the rest of us stayed outside, __Kh__ánum sitting on the ground under a tree, praying on this same rosary. It was dark by then, and very dark in that little garden. __Kh__ánum was all in shadowy white, from her veil to her feet. When she had finished praying, she glided like a spirit toward me and threw the coral chain over my head. A few days ago I took this great treasure to the Master. "This is the dearest thing I possess," I said, "except Your tablets and the ring You gave me. If You will use it, my Lord, it will be infinitely dearer."

I ran up the street after Mrs Goodall and Ella Cooper and when I overtook them said breathlessly: "Alice Beede has just told me that the Master gave you my rosary."

"Oh! Take it back," said Mrs Goodall.

But I had come to my senses.

"No, no," I answered. "If the Master gave it to you it is yours."

In the afternoon I went again to my Lord. He was sitting in the English basement, in His lap a tangled pile of rosaries. I sat between Aḥmad and Edward Getsinger. The Master held up a rosary.

"To whom do I return this?" He inquired of Aḥmad.

Edward leaned over to me and whispered: "That is the way your rosary went."

"Oh no, it isn't," I whispered back.

"What did Juliet say?" asked the Master.

"It was nothing, my Lord, nothing," I said.

He smiled and the subject was dropped.[125]

25 July 1912

She Master is gone. Gone to Dublin, New Hampshire.

I shall never forget the day He left, day before yesterday. I went up early to His house — but oh, too late! On the street I met Mrs Hutchinson.

"The Master has gone!" she said, her eyes full of tears, her lips quivering.

"When?"

"Twenty minutes ago."

"I will go to the station."

I jumped on a subway train and reached the station in a few minutes. But nowhere did I see the Master and the Persians. I stopped a porter.

"Did a party of foreigners pass through here just now?"

"Egyptians?"

[Photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Dublin, New Hampshire]

"Yes!" There wasn't a minute to explain.

"Yes. Go to track 19."

But track 19 was deserted except for the gateman.

"Has a party of foreigners passed this way?" I asked him.

"Turks?"

"Yes."

"They are on the train."

"I supposed I couldn't go through?"

"Yes, go through, but come right back."

Smiling my thanks, I dashed down the platform. At one of the windows in the train I saw a white turban.

"Could I get on the car?" I asked the conductor.

"Yes, get on. It's all right."

---

"Ah-h, Juliet!"

"Goodbye, my Lord."

"Goodbye." He drew me down beside Him. "You should not have troubled to come here," He said.

"My heart wouldn't let me do otherwise."

"I will see you in a month.[126] Give My greetings to your mother, to all the friends; to Mrs Krug, Miss Boylan."

Closely, closely He pressed my hand, pouring the attar of rose of His Love upon me. Then once more He said goodbye and I left.

It had been too bold, yet even against the rules every door had opened to me.

---

The last time I talked with the Master was the day before He left. Sure that He was to leave that morning, the twenty-second, I went very early to His house, with eight palm-leaf fans in my hands. Mamma had sent them for the Master and the Persians to use on the hot journey.

The master was sitting in the English basement at the window. He called me to a chair opposite Him. "What are all those for?" He asked, laughing, waving His hand toward the fans.

I laughed too, for they did look funny. I explained their purpose and that they were from Mamma.

For a while I sat in silence before Him. Then suddenly I realized that He was about to leave us, that in just a few minutes He would be gone. I began to cry quietly.

“Tell Juliet,” laughed the Master, “that I am not going today.”

At this the sun came out! But soon by tears were flowing again, this time because His love was melting me.

“Why are you crying, Juliet? I am not going today!”

---

In the afternoon He called me to Him and I had twenty minutes alone with Him and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án. I sat with overbrimming eyes, drinking in the Glory of His Presence.

“Oh Valiyu'llah __Kh__án,” I said, “say to the Master for me that I know He is the Sun and I pray He will always encircle me with His rays.”

“You are very near Me,” He answered, “and while you speak the truth you will always be with Me. I pray that you may become the candle of New York, spreading the Light of Love all around you.”

After this we sat silent in His Presence, silent for a long time.

Once again He saw me when Marjorie came. He told her she was my child, my “little chicken” and said we must comfort each other after He has gone. Green Acre, Maine, 1947

If only I had written of Green Acre day by day while we were there with Him! There are unforgettable things, but so many details, precious details, have slipped away.

Mamma and I were in Bass Rocks when the Master's invitation reached us. Bass Rocks, on a cliff above the ocean, was Mamma's paradise and we could never afford more than two weeks of it. So, when Aḥmad's postcard came, with word from the Master that He wished us to spend three days with Him in Green Acre, all she could think of at first was that three days would be lost from her paradise!

“I won't go,” she said.

“Oh, Mamma, an invitation from a king is a command, and this is from the King of kings.”

“Well, I'll go for just one night and no more. And I won't take a suitcase. Just a little Irish bundle, so that we can't stay more than one night.”

So she packed our little Irish bundle: two night-gowns, two toothbrushes, our combs and brushes and a change of underwear.

When we arrived at the Green Acre Inn the Master met us at the door with His loving Marḥabá; then He drew me into the dining room.

“She does not want?” He asked in English.

I couldn't tell the truth then, but of course He knew.

---

Pictures come back to me. Mamma and I following Him down a path to the Eirenion, where He was to speak to the believers. He was all in white in the dark. Mamma whispering to me: "It is like following a Spirit."

A tussle day after day to keep Mamma in Green Acre, in which dear Carrie Kinney helped me.

A night when a horrifying young man came to a meeting at the Kinneys' house. From head to foot he was covered with soot. His blue eyes stared out from a dark grey face. This was Fred Mortenson. He had spent half his boyhood and young manhood in a prison in Minneapolis. Our beloved Albert Hall, who was interested in prison work, had found him and taken him out on parole and given him the Bahá'í Message. But Albert Hall was dead when the Master came to America.

Fred Mortenson, hearing that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in Green Acre, and having no money to make the trip, had ridden the bumpers [on freight trains] to His Presence.

He came into the meeting and sat down and was very unhappy when the Master, pacing back and forth as He talked, took no notice of him. "It must be that He knows I stole a ride," thought Fred (who told me all about it afterward). But no sooner was the meeting over and the Master upstairs in His room than He sent for Fred.

Fred had said nothing to anyone about his trip on the bumpers, but the minute he entered that upstairs room the Master asked smiling and with twinkling eyes: "How did you enjoy your ride?" then He took from Fred's hand his soot-covered cap and kissed it.

Years later, during the First World War, when the American believers sent ten thousand dollars for the relief of the starving Arabs, the messenger they chose to carry the money through the warring countries was: Fred Mortenson. The Master declined the ten thousand dollars, relieving the Arabs Himself by His own hard labour. He went to His estate near Tiberius and Himself ploughed the fields there; then stored all the grain in the Shrine of the Báb.

For this He was knighted by Great Britain when British rule replaced Turkish in Palestine. It was meant as an honour, but to me it was like an insult. It nearly killed me after that to direct my supplications to Sir 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás.

---

But to return to Green Acre.

One day the Master, speaking from the porch of somebody's cottage, while the believers sat on the grass below, made this fascinating statement: "We are in affinity now because in pre-existence we were in affinity."

"Let's ask Him what He means by that," whispered Carrie to me.

So, in the evening, while the Master was in our room — Mamma's and mine — and Carrie sitting there with us, I put the question to Him.

"I will answer you later," He said.

But He never did, outwardly.

In a minute or so Mamma, with that funny boldness of hers which would sometimes burst through her timidity, said: "Master, I would like to see You without Your turban."

He smiled. "It is not our custom, Mrs Thompson, to take off our turbans before ladies, but for your sake I will do it."

And oh, the beauty we saw then! There was something in the silver hair flowing back from His high forehead, something in the shape of the head, which, in spite of His age, made me think of Christ.

There was another night, when Carrie, Mamma, and I and a few other believers were sitting in the second-floor hall. Suddenly, on the white wall of the floor above, at the head of the staircase, the Master's great shadow loomed. Mamma slipped over to the foot of the stairs and looking up with adoring eyes, called: "Master!"

And still another night. This was our third in Green Acre. Again we were sitting in the second-floor hall, but now the Master was in our midst.

"We must say goodbye tomorrow," Mamma said to Him.

"Oh no, Mrs Thompson," He laughed. "You are not going tomorrow. One more day." and He laughed again. "You see, I am leaving for Boston day after tomorrow and you are of My own family. Therefore you must travel with Me."

And Mamma submitted now with a satisfaction wonderful to see. She was proud as a peacock. "He said I was of His own family," she kept repeating to me.

Once He called Mamma and me into His room and among other things He said was this: "There are correspondences, Mrs Thompson, between heaven and earth and Juliet's correspondence in heaven is Mary of Magdala."

(This diary, owing to the fact that it was written under difficulties, has large areas left out of it. I find that I have not spoken of what seemed then such a crucial thing — Lua's departure for California. But since she was not at our house when the Master visited us on 12 July, and my last account of being with her is dated the morning of 11 July, I'm sure she must have left the night of the eleventh.

I have just one story to tell of Lua, with the Master, in California. I want to tell it for two reasons. First: because of its value and also its humour; then because another version of it is still being told by the believers, less direct and much less like the Master. This is how I had it from Lua herself.

She and Georgie Ralston (who had gone with Lua to California) were driving one day with the Master, when He closed His eyes and apparently fell asleep. Lua and Georgie talked on, I imagine about their own concerns, for suddenly His eyes sprang open and He laughed.

"I, me, my, mine: words of the Devil!" He said.) New York

November 1912

The Master is here again!

I met Him at the boat last Monday, 11 November. I met Him alone. And this is how that happened. At noon on 11 November, Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar arrived from Washington to find living quarters for the Masters and the Persians. I had had a wire from him earlier, asking me to meet him at the station and to house-hunt with him, which I did. The Master was to come at ten that night and we thought we had plenty of time to notify the friends so that they could meet His ferryboat, but later another wire came to our house, relayed to me through Mamma and Mr Mills at Mrs Champney's (and luckily catching me there), saying that the Master would arrive at eight. Through a series of accidents, Mr Mills' chauffeur landed us first somewhere in New Jersey and then at the Liberty Street station, and there was no time to telephone anybody.

"This will be very bad," said Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar, but we couldn't help it.

We had accomplished everything else, had rented again the dear house on Seventy-Eighth Street (Mrs Champney's) and found extra rooms for some of the Persians.

Now, Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar insisted on my taking Mr Mills' car and going at breakneck speed to the Twenty-Third Street station to try to meet the Master there, if He should come that way, while he himself waited at Liberty Street.

I reached Twenty-Third Street just in time. The ferryboat was approaching and very close to the dock. Standing at the end of the pier, I saw it with its chain of lights. I saw Dr Farid. Then the Master rose from a seat on the deck and entered the brightly lit cabin.

Soon He came toward me down the gangplank.

"Ah, Juliet," He said, taking my hand in His and drawing me along with Him, so that I walked beside Him. But He didn't invite me to drive to His house with Him. Instead, He sent me back after Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar — Dr Ba__gh__dádí and Mírzá Maḥmúd going with me. We returned all together to Seventy-Eighth Street.

Oh, to see Him in that house again, sitting in His old corner in the English basement, the corner in the bay window!

I had been very naughty with Mamma that day and had grieved her. My precious mother was brought up in luxury, lived in luxury until Papa died. She cannot get over her sensitiveness about our too-apparent poverty and she simply won't have people to meals. I had begged her to make an exception of Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar, who was arriving at such an awkward hour, and to let me bring him back for lunch. But she wouldn't hear of it.

Whereupon I flew into a temper, told her what I thought of her "false pride", and stamped out of the house.

Now, entering the Master's house with the three Persians, instead of a welcome, I received a blow. The Master didn't even look at me.

"How is your mother?" were His first words. "Is she happy?"

Then He told me to go straight back to her but to return the next day. I went back and comforted her with His rebuke to me.

---

Early as I could on 12 November, I sought His Beloved Presence. Ruth and Lawrence White (who have lately been married) were with Him and Rhoda and Marjorie. It seems impossible sometimes for the physical ear, or the human mind, to retain His Divine Words. They moved me to tears.

"Don't cry! Don't cry!" said the Master, with His infinite tenderness.

The twelfth of November, the Birthday of Bahá'u'lláh, was the day of Mrs Krug's meeting and never, never shall I forget it.

There, at Mrs Krug's, the Master invoked Bahá'u'lláh. And as His cry, "Ya Bahá'u'lláh!" rang out, I hid my eyes, for it was as though He were calling Someone the same plane with Him, Someone Whom He saw, and Who would certainly come.

He came — the Blessed Beauty, the Lord of Hosts. A Power flashed into our midst, a great Sacred Power ... I can find no words. Burning tears poured down my cheeks. My heart shook.

After the meeting, the Master, Who was resting in another room, sent for me. I had supplicated through Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án that He would come to the meeting at our house Friday.

"Tomorrow, Juliet," He said, "I will tell you about your meeting. Now go back to the house and wait till I come."

I did so and He soon came — came and sat in the corner of the window in the English basement just as He used to last summer. Carrie Kinney was there and Mr Hoar.

He had spoken so often in public and in private of an inevitable world war, warning America not to enter it, that I felt moved to mention it now.

"Will the present war in the Balkans," I asked, "terminate in the world war?"

"No, but within two years a spark will rise from the Balkans and set the whole world on fire."

Soon He rose and calling, "Come, Juliet," and beckoning to Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án, took us out to walk in "His garden", that narrow strip of park above the river. As we followed Him, Valiyu'llah ___Kh___án said: "How blessed to be walking in His footsteps!"

He led us to a bench and sat down between us, clasping my hand tightly. And then He began to ask me questions: question after question about the believers in New York, as to a certain condition among them, a lack of firmness in the Covenant, which I had never suspected — of which I was really ignorant. Of course, I did know that earlier there had been awful confusion — some teaching that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was like Peter, others that He was Jesus Himself — but I thought that time was past.

"But I don't know, my Lord!" I said. "If I knew, I would tell you."

"I know you don't know," He laughed, "and I do know. There are many things I know that you do not know. I was only testing you. I have loved you for your truthfulness, for the truth you spoke in a matter you remember. I wanted to see if your heart were in the same state of truthfulness." Then He said: "With those who are against the Centre of the Covenant you must not associate at all. When you find that a soul has turned away from the Covenant you must cut yourself off completely from him. You will know these people. You will see it in their faces." (How on earth, I thought, could I trust my judgement of the faces? He answered my unspoken thought at once.) "You will see a dimness on the faces, like the letting down of a veil."

"My Lord," I said, "I feel that I have failed in everything. I have failed You in all my pitiful efforts to bring about unity. And I know my failure has been due to lack of strict obedience."

"Obedience," said the Master, "is firmness in the Covenant. You must associate with the steadfast ones." He mentioned three people who, since His return — since I met His ferryboat alone — have wreaked their displeasure on me, one of whom had even "scandalized my name" (!) for several years; then added to the list — Mason Remey. This was bitter!

"You must be a rock, as they are rocks."

"My Lord," I asked, with a sinking heart, "am I not firm in the Covenant?"

"You could be more firm," He laughed.

"Oh, my Lord!"

He rose and we began to walk.

"I had hoped," I said miserably, "that nobody loved You better than I."

"I know you love Me, Juliet," He answered, "but there are degrees of love." Then He told me He carried a measuring-rod in His hand by which He measured the love of the people and that rod was obedience.

At the corner, at the entrance to the park, He paused. "You must love Me," He said, "for the sake of God."

"You are all I shall ever know of God!"

"I am the Servant of God. You must love Me for His sake and for the sake of Bahá'u'lláh. I am very kind to you Juliet," He added.

"I know, my Lord."

"Now go back to your mother, so that she may be pleased with you!" He laughed, and left me to wait for the bus.

But when He had crossed the street, when I saw Him stop for a moment to speak to Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, I sank on the chain of the fence utterly broken-hearted.

Oh I am nothing, nothing, I thought. I have done nothing but fail Him. Which was just what He wanted me to see, I suppose.

But, could it be that I was not firm? I examined my character: Yes, it was unstable.

---

On Wednesday, 14 November, I went very early to my Lord's house. He was on the point of going out, but He called me to Him.

"My Lord," I said, as He paced up and down His room, "I want to thank You for Your great mercy last night. I was asleep and You woke me."

"I pray you may ever be awake. There are a few souls in America," He continued, "whom I have chosen to be teachers in this Cause. You are of those, Juliet. I wish you to have all the qualities of a teacher. That is all."

Then He asked me to wait till His return. I waited all day. At five o'clock He came and called me to His room on the upper floor. With that exquisite courtesy of His, the sweetness of which almost breaks the heart, He — I can hardly write it — asked me to excuse Him for keeping me waiting.

"To wait for You, my Lord, is joy. Oh these blessed days when we can wait for You!"

He went on to tell me why He had been detained ...

(The record of this last month must be sketchy. I cannot copy it all, as it concerns other people, and conditions that are past and best forgotten.

28 November 1912

It is Thanksgiving Day, and I am thankful — thankful and happy. Everything that means my personal happiness, even every hope is lost. My Lord has entirely stripped my life. But I pray that He has freed my spirit.

On 15 November, the Master came to our house (48 West Tenth Street) and gave a most wonderful talk in the front room on the first floor to a great crowd of people who filled both the front and back rooms and the hall.[127] I brought George up from the basement and stood him on a chair, so that he could see the Master. He thought the Master was God and was frightened.

Driving down to us with Mrs Champney, our Lord had said: “The time has come for Me to throw bombs!” And He threw them in His talk that night.

“I have spoken,” He said, “in the various Christian churches and in the synagogues, and in no assembly has there been a dissenting voice. All have listened and all have conceded that the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh are superlative in character, acknowledging that they constitute the very essence or spirit of this age and that there is no better pathway to the attainment of its ideals. Not a single voice has been raised in objection. At most there have been some who have refused to acknowledge the Mission of Bahá’u’lláh, although even these have admitted that He was a great teacher, a most powerful soul, a very great man. Some who could find no other pretext have said: ‘These Teachings are not new; they are old and familiar; we have heard them before.’ Therefore, I will speak to you upon the distinctive characteristics of the Manifestation of Bahá’u’lláh and prove that from every standpoint His Cause is distinguished from all others.”

And in this address, which was one of His most powerful, the Master certainly proved it. The address was taken down and will be printed.

---

On 18 November, at the Kinneys’ house, the Master put Howard MacNutt through a severe ordeal, an inevitable ordeal.

Mr MacNutt had been one of the few who, when I first came to New York, had taught that the Master was “like Peter” — just a glorified disciple. But for years he had never mentioned this point of view, and I thought he had gotten over it.

In Chicago there are some so-called Bahá’ís who are still connected with __Kh__ayru’lláh, the great Covenant-breaker, and last week the Master sent Mr MacNutt to Chicago to see them and try to persuade them to give up __Kh__ayru’lláh; otherwise he was to cut them off from the faithful believers. He — Mr MacNutt — wrote Diya Ba__gh__dádí that he had found these people “angels”, and did nothing about the situation.

He had just returned to New York and was to meet the Master at the Kinneys' house that evening, 18 November, for the first time since his unfruitful trip. I was in the second-floor hall with the Master and Carrie Kinney when he arrived. The Master took him to His own room. After some time they came out together into the hall.

An immense crowd had gathered by then on the first floor, which is open the whole length of the house.

I heard the Master say to Mr MacNutt: "Go down and tell the people: 'I was like Saul. Now I am Paul, for I see.'"

"But I don't see," said poor Howard.

"Go down and say: 'I was like Saul.'"

I pulled his coattail. "For God's sake," I said, "go down."

"Let me alone," he replied in his misery.

"GO DOWN," commanded the Master.

Mr MacNutt turned and went down, and his back looked shrunken. The Master leaned over the stair rail, His head thrown far back, His eyes closed, in anguished prayer. I sat with Carrie on the top step, watching Him. This is like Christ in Gethsemane, I thought.

We could hear the voice of Howard MacNutt stumbling through his confession: "I was like Saul." But he seemed to be saying it by rote, dragging through it still unconvinced. Nevertheless when he came upstairs again, the Master deluged him with love.

By that time the Master was back in His room and as Mr MacNutt appeared at the door, He ran forward to meet him. Our Lord was all in white that night and as He ran with His arms wide open He looked like a great flying bird. He enfolded Howard in a close embrace, kissed his face and neck, welcomed with ecstasy this broken man who, even though bewildered, had obeyed Him.

The next night while Mamma, Miss Annie Boylan<sup>[128]</sup> and I were together in the Master's Presence, Miss Annie Boylan brought up Mr MacNutt's name and spoke gloatingly of his chastisement.

The Master sighed. "I immersed Mr MacNutt in the fountain of Job last night," He said.

The next morning, Sunday, 24 November, I hastened to the Master's house. I knew it would be full of people, friends from other towns who had come to attend the banquet and to be with the Master during His last days here. I knew Mason Remey was in New York and that I should have to meet him, perhaps this morning; and to face him before the Master and all the believers would be misery. Our engagement, in the eyes of the believers, had been the most ideal romance: <sup>[129]</sup> I had seen many moved to tears by it, and when the engagement was broken, every one of them had resented it, taking up cudgels for Mason and putting the entire blame on me. As for Mason, he had said: "I am an Indian. I never forgive."

For over a year Mason and I had avoided each other in perfectly absurd ways. When I had to go down to Washington, I had written him: "Please stay away from the meetings while I am there." (!) Then one day, in Washington, when I boarded a moving, rocking street car, I fell backward on somebody's lap and turned to find myself sitting on Mason's knees! I haven't seen him since and now, as I approached the Master's house, knowing he would surely be inside — if not at that moment, very soon — I wanted to turn and run.

Suddenly I saw that all this was nonsense and should be overcome at once, before the Master's departure. An idea occurred to me. I stood on the doorstep a minute or two bracing myself to carry it out, to walk boldly up to Mason and say: "Let's go to the Master now and tell Him we are friends again and want to work together in the old way as a real brother and sister in the Cause." All at once, though still a little shy, I felt eager to do this, to put things right.

I opened the door, and there stood Marie Hopper, evidently waiting to waylay me. She looked very mysterious, important and excited. "Juliet," she said, "I must have a word with you. There is something I have to do."

Then she exhorted me to marry Mason. She told me she knew the Master wished it; she had "private information". The Master had said I would "suffer" until I did marry him

"If I have to suffer," I said, "I prefer a respectable martyrdom! I'd be nothing but a common prostitute if I married him. And I can't believe, Marie, that the Master really said this."

May Maxwell came up at that moment, very earnest and starry-eyed, to reinforce Marie.

"Very well," I said, "I will talk with the Master myself about it. He is just upstairs, thank God, no further away than the top floor of this house, and whatever He wants me to do, I will do."

I went up with Valiyu'llah __Kh__án. But first I stopped on the third floor and had a little private cry with Valiyu'llah. Percy Grant was to come the next day to the Master — this would be his last visit — and who could tell what would happen then; what miracle might not happen; what change might not take place in him? And now, Mason Remey looming up again!

We found the Master on the point of going out, standing in His room, holding a big, white, folded umbrella. I knelt and He pressed my head against His arm and took my hand in a tight clasp. "Speak," He said.

"Tell the Master, Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, that I know He will laugh at this, because I want to speak about marrying Mason. I have heard from Marie Hopper that the Master wishes it. If He really does wish it, I am ready."

"Na! Na!" (No! No!) said the Master. His eyes were twinkling and the corners of His mouth quivering as though He were trying not to smile. "It was this way," He said. "I never interfere. Mrs Hopper came and told me that she wanted to unite you and Mr Remey. I said 'Very well, try.' But it is just as I wrote you long ago. Unless there is perfect agreement — perfect harmony — love, these things are not good."

I kissed His tender hand.

Needless to say, after this, I couldn't go near Mason Remey.

---

On 20 November, the Master spent the morning in my little room.[130] Once more His Glory shone in my room; His Life was diffused in it. It is a sanctuary now to me, like a chapel in our house.

He had brought Mrs Champney with Him and Mr MacNutt and, during the morning, Mr MacNutt, who was standing behind the Master very humbly, lifted the hem of His 'aba to his lips.

Mamma brought the Master some soup which she had prepared especially for Him.

"I was just wishing for soup," He said sweetly. "You, Mrs Thompson, have the reality of love."

Mamma then showed Him Papa's picture and He kissed it.

After a while He left us and was absent for some time. When He came back He said: "I have been in every room in your house."

And when He bade us goodbye, as He swung down the stairs with His powerful step, His voice rang out: "This house is blessed."

After He had gone I sat in the chair He had sat in and wrote an appeal to Percy Grant: "I tried to reach you by phone this morning to tell you the Master is soon returning to Haifa and that He wishes to take His portrait with Him." (Percy had been exhibiting it in the chapel of his Parish House.) "And to ask if some time tomorrow I could come for it. I want to thank you too for your hospitality to the Master's picture and for your beautiful reference to it last Sunday, of which I have heard.

"You have given to many an opportunity to see at least a portrayal, if a very weak one, of a dear face which I doubt if most of us will see again. He is going back into dangerous conditions. Dear Percy, will you let Him go without saying goodbye to Him? Only the other day he was speaking of you."

To this I received a very stiff answer, merely asking the date of the Master's sailing and His address.

---

On Saturday, the twenty-third, the Master spent most of the day in Montclair. When I went to His Seventy —

Eighth Street house in the late afternoon I was met with joyous news. By staying over in Montclair He had missed reserving His passage on the Mauretania and His sailing was now delayed! Also I heard that Percy had telephoned and asked for permission to call Monday.

That night the Master gave a banquet at the Great Northern Hotel.

May Maxwell, Marie Hopper, Marjorie, Rhoda, Mamma, and I sat at the same table. Just before the food was served the Master rose from his seat, a vial of attar of rose in His hand, and passed among all the tables, anointing every one of His guests. As His wonderful hand, dripping perfume, touched my forehead, as He scattered on my hair the fragrant drops, my whole being seemed to wake and sparkle.

At the end of His talk<sup>[131]</sup> He said: "Such a banquet and such an assemblage command the sincere devotion of all present and invite the down-pouring of the blessings of God. Therefore be ye assured and confident that the confirmations of God are descending upon you, the assistance of God will be given unto you, the breaths of the Holy Spirit will quicken you with a new life, the Sun of Reality will shine gloriously upon you and the fragrant breeze of the rose gardens of Divine Mercy will waft through the windows of your souls. Be ye confident and steadfast ..."

---

The following morning, 25 November, I spent with the Master. One heavenly thing He said was this: "I have searched throughout the length and breadth of this land for flames, I want the flames! The solid ones are no good." Then He told me I was a flame. And He spoke beautifully of Mamma: "If I had a mother like yours, Juliet, I would never deviate, even by a hair's breadth, from her wishes."

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá in banquet at the Great Northern Hotel, 23 November 1912.]

That night Mamma went to see Him with me. He was looking utterly spent, but He insisted on keeping us — wouldn't let us go for at least an hour.

In the meantime, at five o'clock, Percy Grant had come. The Master was out but expected back any minute. He had had to address a Women's Club early in the afternoon and from there was to go to Mrs Cochran's. Through Valiyu'llah __Kh__án, He had asked me to wait and detain Percy. While I was waiting in the English basement, Carrie and Mrs Champney with me, a taxicab stopped at the door; then in came Dr Grant, very big and rigid, his black clerical broadcloth and his white clerical collar firmly moulded around him.

Soon the Master returned. I can still see that Figure entering the room like a mighty Eastern king, in His long green 'aba, edged with white fur, His white turban; I can see His outstretched arms, His divinely sweet smile; can hear the music of His voice: that long "Oh-h! Oh-h!" of welcome. "Oh-h! Oh-h!, Dr Grant!" as though to meet Dr Grant were the most delectable thing on earth.

Then He took Percy's hand and held it, never letting it go while I saw them together, and began to talk smilingly to him.

"You must excuse me for keeping you waiting, Dr Grant. I am very, very sorry to have kept you waiting, very sorry. But I was captured by three hundred women this afternoon. Is it not a dreadful thing to be captured by so many women? (At this I felt wickedly amused.) "The women in America dominate the men," the Master continued. "Come upstairs with Me." And still holding Percy by the hand, with the lightness of a spirit He led him up the first flight. I shall never cease to see those two figures. The King of the East — and the West — in the garments of an Eastern king, leading the way to an upper chamber; the resistant clergyman, hardened into his clerical clothes, stiffly following, pulled up the stairs by a too strong hand.

But when Percy came down, after a very long time, his whole face was changed. His eyes were like burning stars, his mouth softened, relaxed. He grasped my hand and pressed it. "May I take you home, Juliet?"

"Thanks, Percy, I am staying here for a while."

Soon after he left, Dr Farid rushed down the stairs to me.

"There is hope — great hope," he said. "He was a changed man today. Entirely different from last summer. He seemed deeply touched at the thought of the Master returning into danger and asked if we would cable him if any trouble should arise, so that he might do whatever he could. He asked also if, from time to time, the Master would send him news, 'through one of your humblest followers,' he said.

"When he spoke of danger the Master replied that He had never feared danger and told him the story of the Turkish Investigating Committee sent to 'Akká by 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd. How the verdict of this Committee was that He — 'Abdu'l-Bahá — must die; that He must either be crucified at the gate of 'Akká or sent alone to the desert of Fezan, where He would inevitably starve. How at that time the Italian consul, a friend, had arranged for a ship to be sent to Haifa, ostensibly with cargo, but really to help the Master escape. And how the Master had said: 'My Father, Bahá'u'lláh, never delivered Himself, though He had the opportunity. From this Prison He spread His Teachings. I, therefore, will follow in His footsteps. I will not deliver Myself.'

"Then," Dr Farid went on, "the Master told Dr, Grant of the hastening of the Committee to Turkey to lay its verdict with all possible speed before the Sultán, but before they landed on Turkish soil, 'the cannon of God had boomed forth at the gates of the Sultán's palace.' 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd was deposed by the rising of the Young Turks and 'Abdu'l-Bahá set free.

"So,' ended the Master, 'God delivered Me.'"

The miracle had happened. Percy Grant was "a changed man!"

---

Not long was I allowed to cherish my hope!

The next day, 26 November, while I was waiting in the Master's house, He sent Dr Ba__gh__dádí to bring me to His room. May Maxwell was with Him and Dr Ba__gh__dádí remained. I sat on the floor at my Lord's feet.

Smiling down on me, He said: "Why does Mrs Maxwell love you so, Juliet?"

"Because she is my spiritual mother."

"In Montreal, when I was staying with her, she was always mentioning your name and Lua's. 'Juliet, Lua. Juliet, Lua. Juliet, Lua,'" chanted the Master. "That was her song."

"May and Lua, May and Lua," I smiled, "are the two dearest names to my heart."

"This is well," said the Master.

May turned to Dr Ba__gh__dádí. "Ask the Master," she said, "if I may be allowed to speak of something to Him." And when she had received permission: "My heart is tortured at the thought of all the children who are starving for love in these days. So little is understood of the privileges of motherhood. The children are left to nurses and brought up in blighting environments. I want to ask His prayers for the mothers of America. Juliet," she whispered to me, "join in this supplication."

I put my best foot forward to support her: "I should like to join in May's supplication that the women may soon realize that motherhood is their first function." But, even as I spoke the words I saw how funny they were, coming from me — and that I had spread a snare for my own feet, which I suspect May wanted me to do!

The Master smiled broadly.

"What are you doing advocating this, Juliet? Where are your children? Mrs Maxwell has a child, but where are yours? If you had married, you too could have brought children to me, one to sit on each knee! A sterile woman is like a fruitless tree. Of course," He added, smiling again and quoting my words of last summer, "of course you will say: 'What can I do with my heart.'"

“No, I won’t say that any more,” I answered. “You can do something with my heart if I cannot. You can make me a new heart. And now, since the Master has spoken of this,” I said to Dr Ba__gh__dádí, “there is something I should like to ask Him. Last spring and summer He was indefinite with me about ... Dr Grant; perhaps, as I have been thinking lately, because I wasn’t strong enough to bear the truth. But I believe I am stronger now and ready, at a word from Him, to renounce this hope. Is it not to be fulfilled?”

“No,” said the Master. “Otherwise, I would have told you.”

For a moment we sat in His Presence silent. In the fire of that Presence, in that little moment, my hope of twelve years melted away. As it vanished, a miracle happened. The Being sitting before me, now writing on a bit of parchment held in the palm of His hand, changed from a body to a sun-like Spirit. I saw Him translucent, luminous, and depths of iridescence opened behind Him.

“Oh,” I cried, tears coursing down my cheeks, “since that phantom of a hope went, I have entered the Presence of God.”

The Master said nothing. He was still writing, writing mysteriously.

“May,” I whispered, “do you remember that prayer: ‘As the Pen moves over the pages of the Tablet by which the musk of significances in the world of creation is exhaled?’”

After a while the Master looked up. “I wish you to marry, Juliet,” He said. “I wish you to bring Me children to hold on My knees. God will send someone to you who will be agreeable to you.”

What did it matter?

“May I ask one thing, my Lord? May I supplicate for Percy’s soul, that in the end he will see the truth?”

“We must always pray for him,” answered the Master.

Mrs Krug and Carrie came in then. I hated to cry before them, but I couldn’t stop.

“Don’t cry, don’t cry,” said the Master, as only He can say it.

“Oh, that Voice!” whispered May.

“No, no. Don’t cry.” This from Grace Krug, with a very disapproving look.

“I seem to be in flames, my Lord — the flames of Thy love, Thy Presence — and to be melting.”

But He saw deeper. “Khayr,” (no) He said slowly.

“NO!” echoed Mrs Krug.

“You must be happy,” the Master ended, “because of this thing I have told you.”

As I said, this happened in the afternoon of 26 November. The morning had been a tremendous one.

Knowing that my Lord would be at the Kinneys’, I went directly there. On the way up in the bus a great wave of tears, like a tidal wave, rose from my heart (I didn’t know why) and threatened at any moment to break over me.

I found the Master on the upper floor of the Kinneys' house with the Persians, Carrie and Ned, Nellie Lloyd, and Mr Mills. The Tablet of the Branch[132] was being translated under the supervision of the Master. Dr Ba__gh__dádí and Dr Farid were working on it, submitting it time after time to the Master before He was satisfied with their rendering. I shall never forget His sternness, His terrific majesty as He directed that translation.

The wave of tears did break as I listened and watched. I was shaken beyond all control. Mírzá Maḥmúd and Valiyu'llah __Kh__án tenderly tried to calm me.

7 December 1912

28 November, Thanksgiving Day, was to be a day of rest for our Beloved Lord. It had been given out that no one would be received at the house that day. So, when the telephone rang about noon and Aḥmad, at the other end, asked me to come immediately to the Master, I felt so singled out and privileged! And to be alone with Him and the Persians — that would be something important, something wonderful.

But He met me with a grave, almost stern face. And with a command which at once banished my complacent hope. Swiftly crossing His room to the door where I stood, He said, without even a greeting: "Mrs May Maxwell is sick. I want you to go with some medicine to her and to spend the afternoon taking care of her." He walked back to the window, beckoning me to follow Him. Then He picked up a glass from His table and a bottle of rosewater. "Give her this," He said. "Pour out so much," (He poured about an inch into the glass) "and so much water. Put in some sugar, the sugar of your love. Drink this yourself." He gave me the glass He had been preparing, for my cure, and, looking pointedly at me, began to pray.

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

Feeling strangely numb, I said, as I drank the rosewater: "Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

He turned to the window and looked out.

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!"

"Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá," I echoed.

Again and again He repeated the Greatest Name and I repeated it after Him, praying with Him.

At last He said: "Now go to Mrs May Maxwell. Telephone your mother that I have sent you to her as she is sick, to spend the afternoon with her."

Then He bowed, still grave, and I left Him, the bottle of rosewater in my hand.

(Footnote. 1947. Years later I was to see the meaning of this and that I had utterly failed in administering the "medicine". Mrs May Maxwell wouldn't drink it; she said I had put too much sugar in it. I loved her with a personal love. It never rose to the heights of an all-forgiving love, and so I couldn't overcome that strange vein of cruelty in the love I think she felt for me. We were still divided when she died. This was one of my great failures.

Another significant thing: Nine years after that date, on 28 November 1921, our Beloved Lord ascended. Could this have been the reason, with His pre-vision, that He spent that day in 1912 in solitude?)

---

Within the next day or two, Mrs May Maxwell and I were together in His Presence. “Am I spiritually sick, my Lord?” she asked. “For I was not physically sick the day you sent me the rosewater.”

“Yes,” He answered gently, “you are spiritually sick. Had you been physically sick I would have sent you a doctor instead of Juliet.”

---

On 29 November, May Maxwell, Dorothea Spinney, and I were with the Master when Esther Foster came in. May, Miss Spinney, and I rose.

“All of you may stay,” said the Master, “on the condition that Juliet doesn’t cry.”

I tried so hard after that to squeeze back the tears, but I couldn’t. I wiped them away furtively as they trickled down one by one.

He kept us with Him an hour. Dorothea Spinney — an Englishwoman and a Theosophist — spoke of a vision she had had while meditating. She has seen a great globe of fire which she seemed to know was “the Centre of Peace”.

“I should like to understand this,” she said. “What, or Who is the Centre of Peace?”

The Master had been writing on a piece of parchment held in the palm of His hand. He continued to write, not looking up, leaving Miss Spinney’s question in the air.

And all the time He glowed more and more, like the sun dispersing clouds, pulsing out with every breath intenser light.

“Look at His Face,” I whispered to Miss Spinney, “and see the Centre of Peace.”

By and by He spoke: “Excuse me for writing,” He said, “it was very important. You asked me concerning visions. Sometimes the thought becomes abstracted, enters the World of Reality, and there makes discoveries.”

Then He rose and began to pace up and down and discovered that I was crying.

“Oh my Lord,” I cried, in a panic, “what are You going to do with me?”

“I am going to find a Mister for you,” He laughed.

Those last meetings in the Kinneys’ house. Those divine talks of the Good Shepherd leaving His flock for a while: too tender, too sad for the heart to bear.[133]

One day, however, He was very stern. Holding the book of the Hidden Words in His hand, walking back and forth with that step which always makes me think of the prophecy, “Who is this that cometh from Bozrah, Who treadeth the wine-press in His fury?” lifting the Hidden Words high, He said: “Whosoever does not live up to these Words is not of Me.”

---

Mr Howard Colby Ives accepted the Cause in those days. Mrs Moore accepted. Touched to the core of their beings they would sit with streaming eyes in the meetings.

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the Kinney family in their home in New York.]

At last came the day before He sailed.

"May I stay in some corner of this house all day," I asked, "that I may breathe the same air with You this last day?"

"What does your mother say about it?" — laughing.

"She said I might."

"Very well."

In the afternoon He called me. He kept me in the room a long, long time, seeing many others while I sat there. When He had dismissed them all, He came close to me and took my hand.

"There is a matter," He said, "about which I want to speak to you. The photographs of the portrait you painted of Me, you have offered them for the Ma__sh__riqu'l-A__dh__kár. I know your circumstances, Juliet. You have not complained to Me, you have said nothing, but I know them. I know your affairs are in confusion, that you have debts, that you have that house, that you have to take care of your mother. Now I want you to keep the money" (for the photographs) "for yourself. No, no; do not feel unhappy," (as I began to cry) "this is best. You must do exactly as I say. I will speak about this Myself to the believers. I will tell them," He laughed, "that is it My command."

I thanked Him brokenly.

I can see Him now, pacing up and down the room in front of the line of Persians, who stood with bowed heads and folded arms in the Glory of His Presence, deeply aware of its Divineness.

Then Valiyu'llah spoke: "Juliet wants to know if You are pleased with her, or not?"

- (I had spoken out my troubled heart to dear Valiyu'llah.) *

"I am very much pleased with the love of Juliet," answered the Master.

My Lord, I pray that my life may please You."

"Insha'llah." And that was all!

"And that my services may become acceptable to You. I know I have not begun to serve You yet."

The Master said nothing.

But that night He healed my broken heart, healed it by a tone in His voice as He spoke to my mother, which was the essence of God's tenderness, a tone unimaginable to those who have only heard the human voice.

As Mamma approached Him to bid Him goodbye, He said: "Ah, the mother of Juliet; the mother of Julie!" (Mamma's pet name for me.)

"I can't bear to say goodbye," said Mamma.

"Insha'llah, I shall meet you in 'Akká, Mrs Thompson, and there I shall greet you with 'Welcome! Welcome!'"

This was on the night of 4 December.

He asked me to come to the Emerys' (where He had been staying for a few days) the morning of 5 December, the day of His sailing; and I was there at eight o'clock. That last morning. I stood at the door of His room, gazing in, my eyes drinking their fill, if they ever could drink their fill, of the Divine Figure as He sat, or stood, or moved about the room.

He called me in twice. The second time He took my hand. "Remember," He said, "I am with you always. Bahá'u'lláh will be with you always."

Carrie Kinney was there that morning and Ned, and 'Alí Qulí __Kh__án and Florence, Edna Ballora and her husband, Harriet Magee, Mrs Parsons, and Mrs Hannen. The Master had invited Mamma too, but she had not felt well enough to go.

"Rest assured," He said when I told Him, "that she will be healed." And He filled my arms with fruit for her.

We drove to the boat, then followed Him up to His cabin. Many believers were crowding the cabin. Later we all went upstairs and sat in a large room with Him. Very soon He rose, and, walking up and down, delivered to us His last spoken message.[134]

First He described heartbreakingly the war now raging in the Balkans. Then He said: "As to you: your efforts must be lofty. Exert yourselves with heart and soul that perchance through your efforts the light of Universal Peace may shine and this darkness of estrangement and enmity may be dispelled from amongst men ...

"You have no excuse to bring before God if you fail to live according to His Command, for you are informed of that which constitutes the good-pleasure of God ...

"It is My hope that you may become successful in this high calling, so that like brilliant lamps you may cast light upon the world of humanity and quicken and stir the body of existence like unto a spirit of life.

"This is eternal glory. This is everlasting felicity. This is immortal life. This is heavenly attainment. This is being created in God's image and likeness. And unto this I call you, praying to God to strengthen and bless you."

[Photograph: 'Abdu'l-Bahá leaving America on the Celtic from New York City.]

He seated Himself again in a corner of the large cabin, all the believers flocked around Him. I sat opposite Him at a little distance, weeping quietly. A great fear had taken possession of me, a question risen in my mind which must be answered or I should have no peace — I should be left in a frantic state. I rose and walked over to Him and stood before Him.

"My Lord," I said, "each time I have parted from You: in Haifa, in Europe, You have said You would call me again to You. Each time You gave me hope that I would see You again. But this time You gave me no hope. Won't I see You again, my Lord?"

"This is My hope," He replied.

“But still You don’t tell me, my Lord, and it makes me feel hopeless.”

“You must not feel hopeless.”

This was all He said to me. It killed me. While I sat, weighed down with despair and grief, He drew from an inside pocket the purse Dr Grant had sent Him last summer, laid it on His knee and looked at me. To me it seemed a promise that He Himself would take care of Percy. And this was the very last.

It was death to leave that ship. I stood on the pier with May Maxwell, tears blurring my sight. Through them I could see the Master in the midst of the group of Persians waving a patient hand to us. It waved and waved, that beautiful patient hand, till the Figure was lost to sight.

- (1947. Because of those blurring tears I could not see the look on His face, the look of profound agony, as though He were on the cross, as He bade His immature children farewell, foreseeing for us so many sorrows, so many failures, and a world gone to pieces because of our failures. *

This look I have seen ever since in a photograph taken at that last moment.)

[32] Cf. Matt. 19:14, Mark 10:14, and Luke 18:16.

[33] That day (the third of July) we had been to the House of the Blessed Perfection in 'Akká. It is a palace, spacious, stately, but it has not the charm of the Master's House. In the room of the Blessed Perfection was a marvellous atmosphere. I felt intense vibrations, currents of Life. When we left, X leaned her head against the door. — J.T.

[34] Ibrahim George __Kh__ayru'lláh (Kheiralla) — The believer who first brought the Bahá'í Faith to America. He later rebelled against 'Abdu'l-Bahá and broke the Covenant.

[45] Mr Sidney Sprague, a prominent American Bahá'í and travelling teacher.

[46] In 1893 Rev. Grant had become rector of the New York Church of the Ascension, long the stronghold of fashionable, orthodox Episcopalians, but now with a dwindling congregation in a declining neighbourhood. His sweeping innovations were successful, but controversial: pews were no longer private property, but opened to the public; sermons were preached on issues of the day; new afternoon musical services attracted hundreds; Sunday evenings, the People's Forum debated political and economic questions, often until midnight. Grant became the militant leader of the radical wing of the city's clergy.

[47] An oral tradition of the teachings of Muḥammad.

[48] The intent of this tradition is, of course, metaphorical. The Bahá'í Faith rejects the doctrine of Divine incarnation. The Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith states: "God ... can in no wise incarnate His infinite, His unknowable, His incorruptible and all-embracing Reality in the concrete and limited frame of a mortal being. Indeed, the God Who could so incarnate His own reality would, in the light of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, cease immediately to be God." (World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, p. 112)

[49] At this time, large numbers of people were becoming Bahá'ís in Írán.

[50] The Riqvân Garden, a short distance from 'Akká, was one of Bahá'u'lláh's favourite resting places.

[52] The Bahá'í Proofs.

[53] Many of the early American Bahá'ís believed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was the Return of Christ, despite His many denials. In one Tablet 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote: "You have written that there is a difference among the believers concerning the 'Second Coming of Christ'. Gracious God! Time and again this question hath arisen, and its answer hath emanated in a clear and irrefutable statement from the pen of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that what is meant in the prophecies by the 'Lord of Hosts' and the 'Promised Christ' is the Blessed Perfection (Bahá'u'lláh) and His holiness ... (the Báb). My name is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. My qualification is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. My reality is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. My praise is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Thralldom to the Blessed Perfection is my glorious and refulgent diadem, and servitude to all the human race my perpetual religion ... No name, no title, no mention, no commendation have I, nor will ever have, except 'Abdu'l-Bahá." (World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, p. 139)

[54] The passage in the Aqdas reads: "Let nothing grieve thee, O Land of Ta [Tíhrán] ... Ere long will the state of affairs within thee be changed, and the reins of power fall into the hands of the people." (The Kitáb-i-Aqdas, paras 91 and 93, pp. 53, 53)

[68] While I was walking with Rúḥá the day before on Mount Cannel, as we sat on a fallen tree to rest, she had broached the subject of my marrying Mason Remey. Our Lord had told her to ask me about it. "You are treating Juliet like one of Your own daughters who were married in this way," Rúḥá had said. "It is too strong a test for her." "Just ask her and see what she says," our Lord had repeated. "But," added Rúḥá to me, "if the Master should command me now: 'Go, leave your husband and children and jump into the sea,' I would go and jump!" — J.T.

There was another occasion, which I find I haven't mentioned in my diary, when my darling little mother knelt before the Master. This was a public occasion, after He had spoken in a church. The service over, the whole congregation, including a multitude of believers, surged toward the chancel to shake hands with Him. ### Pilgrim Notes

Ethel Revell

1949

My first glimpse of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in a Pennsylvania Railroad train, going from North Philadelphia Station to Broad Street Station, on Saturday afternoon, June 8, 1912.

Shall I ever forget that days I recall that I could scarcely keep myself together – I felt my body would fly to pieces with joy, as I awaited the hour, and especially while walking to the station - a walk of perhaps 5 minutes.

I had dreamed of Him, I had longed for Him, I had spoken of Him to people, and now I was to see Him, — the One who had guttered all His life to show us what a real life should be. I cannot explain how I felt - expectant, eager, yes – and yet I had always felt I was near Him.

We entered the train. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was sitting at a window, and had the shade drawn down quite far. With Him were, I believe, Mrs. Getsinger, Mrs. Boyle and some of the Persian men believers.

I sat in the seat behind Him, after shaking His hand. Such joy! just wished the ride might never end.

When a child, I had attended a Baptist Church – and used to sit in my class and with the Christ would come again; and. I recall yet, as though it were yesterday, that though only a child of about 9 or 10, I then solemnly promised myself that if He should come and I should learn of it during my life, I would give up everything to serve Him.

We arrived at the station all too quickly. We all walked through the waiting room, and sat down – I believe I was about 3 or 4 seats from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He sat there a few minutes and then left for the Rittenhouse Hotel in an automobile. We followed; but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá retired immediately, as he was weary from the day.

On Sunday morning, June 9, 1912, I again saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at a Unitarian Church at 15th and Girard Avenue. It was Children’s Day, and I was so happy to see the children present.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that He had come from the orient to the occident that perchance a bond of unity might be created between the east and the west. (see P.U.P.)

After the service, I saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walk to the street and put His hand on the shoulder of my older brother, who had come to meet Him, although not calling himself a Bahá’í. This made me very, very happy.

I do not recall whether I returned home after the morning church service or not, but I do know that the afternoon found us with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the Rittenhouse Hotel.

As we entered - there being a group of people present, we hesitated, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said we should come in. We quietly walked in and eat, on the floor opposite Him.

He was saying that Bahá’u’lláh had sent Him forth to us as a dove with a message on His wings - and that Message was that He, Bahá’u’lláh had accepted us in His service. Such a precious message!

Then he spoke to the brother of Mr. Charles Mason Remey - telling him of the condition of the people - how they do not recognize the great ones in their day; but afterwards they worship the ground they trod, etc.

Again I have no recollection of what happened until I found myself riding in a street car toward the Baptist Church where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was to speak in the evening.

The minister of the Baptist Temple, Broad and Berks Streets, at that time, the late Dr Russell H. Conwell, had visited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in ‘Akká in prison; and had invited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at that time, to come to his church and speak, if he were ever liberated, and should journey to America; which invitation ‘Abdu’l-Bahá graciously accepted.

Dr. Conwell gave a very wonderful introduction, saying that to his people ‘Abdu’l-Bahá needed no introduction as He was already known; and that the ones who were present who did not belong to his congregation of course knew ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke at length on the principles in a very wonderful talk. (See P.U.P.)

After the service, Dr. Conwell took ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in to his study, where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá shook hands with those wishing to meet Him.

I too stood in line and took His hand, and then stood at a short distance, watching the others, and wishing I had more capacity to understand more fully the importance of those minutes.

Again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was whirled away to the hotel.

These 3 sheets contain experiences of Ethel Revell of Philadelphia, with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Philadelphia. More to follow.

Notes

Notes from Bahíyyih Ford's visit to Madrid after being in Haifa and visiting 14 European countries. November-December 1952.

Conversations with the Guardian

Ford, Bahíyyih

November-December 1952

Says the Guardian is telling the pilgrims all details of the 10-year Plan (1953-1963) but they are not supposed to tell some of the things. As he is preparing these people to be focal points in the world during these years in which there will be global war, and that instructions will be cut off. Certain things, however can be told.

The Guardian has a map with ins etc. with the whole plan laid out on it. Also many notebooks in which the Plan is already thought out, on paper. He says the all-over plan of God for Man's progress on this planet is already fore-ordained and unimpedable — but the Guardian's 10 year Plan is subject to delays and set-backs and conditions. He is telling pilgrims exactly what he wants them to do.

The entire Ford family is asked to move to Johannesburg, Africa. (Now a terrible centre of racial dissention.) He says that in the past pioneers or travellers have asked for instructions from him, and once received they write again and ask "if it is necessary, or if they have to follow these instructions!" He says, well, they don't have to, but this is the Divine Plan, indicated, and they are foolish to overlook the opportunity to OBEY.

He says the CABLES are so important basically — we should STUDY and OBEY.

Says in the October 8 CABLE that America has 29 places to take care of in the next ten years. (Key West he counts as an island — separately: a place.) The instructions for the ten year plan will be revealed little by little.

The Guardian's HEALTH is now excellent. He was very happy and cheerful during the visit of M, Ford and Marion Little, who were the only Pilgrims there at the time. The Guardian was dear to Marion. She made him laugh and laugh hard.

The Temple built by "The Branch" as promised in the Bible, means neither the Master nor a Shrine, not a Temple of mortar and clay, but this star with all the Tablets (to the Kings) within it. Bahá'u'lláh ordered someone to write this, and then, as it hung on the wall in 'Akká, said what it meant: "This is the Temple — I am the Branch — have built it!"

(It was a nine-pointed star in which the Tablets to the Kings were all written)
(Is this truly repeated??NO)

There are THREE CHARTERS:

1. The Will and Testament of 'A-B. (Administ.)
2. the Divine Plan of 'Abdu'l-baha
3. The Tablet of Carmel,

... which is the Charter for the world Center. The Tablet of Mount Carmel is the most important center. Read carefully the allusion on vital CITY OF GOD — ARK OF GOD. The Ark, is of the Laws to be established. The will flow from Mount Carmel. The International House of Justice. The City of God means the spiritual center of Mt. Carmel which is the resting place of the Báb. Near the Carmelite monastery, Bahá'u'lláh (in a tent) revealed it. It is near the cave or Elijah. The Báb is the return of Elijah. The Tablet is unfinished. He was interrupted. The "people of Bahá" mentioned in it are the members of the International House of Justice. Under the City of God, the Guardian said it also means Bahá'u'lláh Himself (which would also include also the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh on Mt. Carmel — in the distant future, as the immediate plans are to be old more suitable Tomb at Bahjí.)

Bahá'u'lláh pointed out the location of the Tomb of the Báb. In 1870 Bahá'u'lláh was in a tent under the cypresses — He faced the East, and 'Abdu'l-baha was facing the West — the believers were apart — they saw Bahá'u'lláh pointing to the spot where the Tomb of the Báb was to be erected.

When Bahá'u'lláh died, the Covenant breakers did everything possible to disturb the proceedings of the Tomb in Bahjí. It seems that 'Abdu'l-baha, in order to take care of it properly had to do so by night — as they jeered and threw things.

‘Abdu’l-baha carried dirt in his clear from the Garden of Ridván to put on the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh — the believers following carrying more dirt in flower pots — and carrying lanterns — at early dawn. The Bahá’ís didn’t own any property on Mt. Carmel at the time, and ‘Abdu’l-baha began to buy all he could.

For ten years after the body of the Báb was in Haifa it was continually hidden. No one knew where it was or that it was in Haifa. It was hidden in various laces — in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s own room — then that of the Greatest Holy Leaf — then when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá began building the vault for the Tomb on Mt. Carmel, the Body was put into the first vault as soon as it was finished, and before the rest of the building was completed. The rest was built up around it. No one knew of this. (Then later, when finished, the Master Himself transferred the blessed remains to the new crystal sarcophagus sent by Indian Bahá’ís — and it was officially interred.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá never spoke of the Tomb as if it were finished, although no one knew that it would ever be different. He constantly referred to the superstructure — “It is unbuilt and no one knew why He said this. He spoke of an arcade which would be around the Tomb — the believers will not go into it in the future (but will circumambulate it.)

“There will be a dome,” He also said.

Marrion Little’s work is just beginning” !! (she must stay on in Italy.)

Gifts are to be given during the Intercalary Days and at Naw RUZ.

We must love the world. Bahá’u’lláh has claimed the insufficiency of patriotism, Jesus taught individual love. Muḥammad taught the love of country which was national love. Bahá’u’lláh taught us to Love the Whole World.

Bahá’u’lláh said that the world is approaching maturity. We must become mature. Potentially it sowed in the “year 60” but it will become a reality only in the Golden Age.

The ADAMIC CYCLE is 5,000 yrs. old. But 500,000 yrs will be the Bahá’í Cycle.

“There will be no Revelation like Mine “ Bahá’u’lláh said, “for 500,000 years. The Master explained this and said: “There will be major Prophets and They will come with a Book — they might even change the AQDAS, but the source of their inspiration is Bahá’u’lláh.

There is a HIERARCHY in the Faith.

1. God.
2. Bahá’u’lláh.
3. The Major and Minor Prophets.
4. ‘Abdu’l-baha.
5. The Guardian and Administration,
6. the Hands, the International House of Justice and its Committees.

The year 9 is the date from which the 1000 years to the next prophet is figured because this marks the intimation of the Revelation of the birth of the Mission. ('Abdu'l-Bahá says this in a Tablet.)

Zoroaster was a contemporary of ISAIAH. Zoroaster went to the Holy Land.

Bahá'u'lláh's mission lasted 39 years.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's mission lasted 29 years. (according to careful reckoning)

Bahá'u'lláh said: "I go to Sulaymáníyyih contemplating no return..." From the human viewpoint He did not intend to return; but from the Prophetic, He had to return.

Mírzá Yahyá has greatly corrupted the Báb's writings. Bahá'u'lláh said that the most pure were "the commentary on the Súrah of Joseph", the Persian Bayán, and the "Seven Proofs."

How could forgeries be done? They licked the ink and it comes off, and then they smooth it with a knife and write over it.

"members of My family" (The Afnán) as quoted in Prayers and Meditations. (words of Bahá'u'lláh — refer to His family before His Declaration, during which time Bahá'u'lláh's family was known as Afnán.

WIVES OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH — The first, was the mother of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Greatest Holy Leaf — The purest Branch. The second — was the mother of Muḥammad-'Alí — the Covenant Breakers (both in Persia.) The third wife was of the Baghdád period.

We must at all times give correct status of the Faith. We must be wise, bold, brave under normal circumstances but we must not be too bold in Israel, Spain, etc.. (The G.)

The Latins are awakening now — Italy, Spain, S. America.

(Do not quote) The Ten Year Plan — It's all very thrilling to read, but not to carry out. It is a very ambitious program. "I (the G.) stretch my neck out from the world Center East, and West, to see if we can do this." We divide everything by ten (??)

Bahá'u'lláh changed terribly and suddenly after His stay in Adrianople — this as after the poisoning of Yahyá.

THERE IS NO TWENTIETH LETTER OF THE LIVING. There are Eighteen. The Báb is the 19th — and Bahá'u'lláh is not included (even though the Tablet to Him is included in the "Dawn Breakers")

The world suffers from excesses.

There have always been grave differences of opinion (in the cause), but it has never lead to Schism. The differences are a process of purification.

The NATIONALITY and Citizenship determine the group of Bahá'ís you belong to, not the country you might be living in.

This epoch — the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, — is executing the Plan of 'Abdu'l-Bahá all over the entire planet. The next distinguishing feature is the rise of the Adm. Center in the World Center — the Holy Land, and the executing of 'Abdu'l-baha's Will in which 12 NSA's will participate. The Seven Year Plan of the Americans — and the ten goal countries in Europe established the participation of the 12 NSA's to be established. The epochs succeeding each other from the time the Master revealed the Tablets before the first World War was 20 years to launch the building of the Adm. Order and this time I have been busy building now the Administration is organized and it is rescuing, fashioning institutions and this has been a means to an end. (?)

Summer Schools

All the SS must be developed as a center of culture. The SS will presently eventually grow into great institutions of learning and culture.

Bahá'u'lláh suffered most in the Most Great Prison ('Akká). He did not call the Siyyih-Chal the Most Great Prison, even with all the suffering He endured there. In 'Akká He had the Turkish enemies form without an the Bahá'í enemies from within. This refers to the followers of Subi — Azal who were sent with Bahá'u'lláh in order to check on Him.

THE ARABS were advised by the English to leave Haifa. One million Arabs went out. They expected to return with a victorious army to set up an ARAB republic, during the First World War. The Turks were the enemies of the Holy Land — then came the threat of the Germans, then the Arabs — Later in the picture will be the Russians.

THE RUSSIAN TEMPLE (Bahá'í Temple in Iskabad) is now a factory. The Guardian communicates under great difficulties with the Russian believers, and it is done by Persians living along the border.

THE AMERICANS must never take sides with Capitalism or Communism — We must be neutral. We do not identify ourselves with any system because all of them have elements that are irreconcilable with our teachings. The Bahá'ís must stand by the principles — Both Communism and Capitalism are sunk in materialism. We cannot uphold either one. We are not attacking the Governments, but the systems.

MRS. TRUE was asked by the Guardian (While she was there) to plan the program for the Temple Dedication. The Guardian made this program for her. Themes: Difference between God and Bahá'u'lláh — and the Unity of Religions.

The GUARDIAN gave MRS. TRUE a surprise gift — He took out a little purse and showed it to her asking her if she had ever seen it before — When she said she had seen “‘Abdu'l-Bahá open it many times to take out money — the Guardian presented it to her. (She was treasurer of the Bahá'í Temple Unity for years when the beginnings of the Temple were under way. In the purse he put a gold coin. dated the year 1912 (?))

In the TEN YEAR PLAN the believers must not be flooded with details all at once. So the friends will be prepared. We will get them in the Conferences. We must study the Cables. The present pilgrims are privileged to be the barriers of this information beforehand.

Harry Randall, one of the earliest believers was Bahíyyih's (Ford) father.

The GUARDIAN'S favorite FLOWER is jasmine. The flowers put on the sacred Thresholds of the Shrines in the different seasons are roses, jasmine and violets.

The building of the WORLD Administrative CENTER will be around the resting place of the Greatest Holy Leaf. That will be the focal Center. The Master said there would be nothing built around the Báb's Shrine. Mason is to be the designer of the International Archives building, and it will probably go up where the Minor Archives are now. This bldg. will be demolished. The Guardian said we must now find the land where we will put the Temple and then purchase it. The floodlights that are on the Shrine were placed by the Master — He gave instructions about this, (to Beatrea Irvin)

The earth that is in the courtyard of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh brought by the Master from the garden of the Ridván at Dawn — We would get the dirt in His cloak and carry it to the Shrine. The believers followed Him in a procession with lanterns and carrying dirt in flower pots.

The FIRST FIVE YEARS after the passing of Bahá'u'lláh were the saddest for 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He lived alone in 'Akká with the Greatest Holy Leaf. All turned against Him — even the Báb's relatives. The secretaries of Bahá'u'lláh and even Bahá'u'lláh's cook. “'Abdu'l-Bahá riding on His white donkey to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh would observe the condition of the Bahjí, and how it was falling to pieces with the Covenant Breakers living there, and He would think how sad this is. Thirty years of the life of “'Abdu'l-Bahá and for ten years after in Bahjí, was in the hands of the enemies.

Ques. (cov. breakers) Why is it that the family of the Manifestations always oppose?

Ans. Being close to the Prophet is the greatest test. This is one of the reasons why they fall away. We see that the sons of Noah, the brothers and sisters of Jesus could not stand the test. 2. Because of the human element of the Prophet.

Bahá'u'lláh went to the Sullimaniyyeh expecting never to return. (When someone said how is this possible when He must have known His destiny) The Guardian said that it was His “Human wish” that spoke.

Mírzá Yahyá had really a good nature but came under but came under the influence of Siyyid Muḥammad who was the living embodiment of wickedness. Actually Bahá'u'lláh wrote to the Báb recommending Mírzá Yahyá's character and the Báb responded with a Tablet appointing him leader until the Promised One would declare Himself. The enemies of the Faith in the past were brothers and Himself. Ex: the half-brother. This is an interesting and important point. Some of the most important papers of Bahá'u'lláh were in the hands of His amanuensis, who turned against 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When this man died, they were left to Siyyid 'Alí, who was a Cov. Breaker — but he repented at that time and gave the papers to "'Abdu'l-Bahá. He became again a Cov. Breaker — but the Master had the papers.

AT the time of the Báb the Faith spread only in two countries — Írán and 'Iráq. AT THE TIME of Bahá'u'lláh it was spread to ten countries. Then the Master even more. Look how many countries it is known in now, under the Guardianship. But this doesn't mean that the Guardian is greater than "'Abdu'l-Bahá, it simply means and shows the cumulative power of the Faith. That Faith is actually more important than the Manifestation — the Prophet is at the root, the Cause of God is the sap. But the Root is the vehicle for the sap to reach the tree. Another example is the Seed, which is the Prophet — He gives Himself for the plant which is to come: the Faith.

We can pray to Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá or the greatest Holy Leaf, but we must understand this correctly. They will intercede for us. On the Divinity of Bahá'u'lláh: We believe that He is not the Incarnation. He is the Reflection. (exactly like the Mirror. ) He is not the emanation. We must use the right word.

The Covenant breakers: Example: The Lamp — the shadows and darkness always are closest to the Lamp. The greater the Cause or Faith, the greater the tests and opposition. Near ones wax very proud and think the Faith can't do without them. And God proves that the Faith is independent of anyone.

BOOK — The Íqán is the most fundamental book in the B. Faith next to the AQDAS — We should memorize passages in order to teach people — and should quote them to non-believers.

Prayers and Meditations should be read not only for devotional purposes, but for study as a text book. It explains the station of the Prophet and that He is a reflection.

TRINITY is true, but misinterpreted by the Christians. It is like this: the Sun is symbol of the God-head, and the Ray of the Sun is the Holy Spirit (explained in the Íqán and in Gleanings and by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in SAQ) the Prophet is the receiver of the rays.

CREATION is not confined to this planet — the universe or the cosmos. God has no beginning and no end, the material Kingdom is not confined to this world.

COVENANT The Institution of the Covenant of the Bahá'í Faith has four elements. In the past there were three elements: God, the Prophet and the Chosen One (One who would be the successor) i.e. God, Jesus, and Peter. IN the Bahá'í Dispensation, we have God, the Manifestation, the Center of the Covenant ('Abdu'l-Bahá) and the Guardian. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Mystery of God, Whose station is unique. The Master was perfect, but not essentially divine. Bahá'u'lláh was Divine. The Master was all-knowing. He said once: I can tell you what is going on in Tíhrán." The Master was perfect and omniscient. He had some of the attributes of Divinity and yet was not Divine. This is almost a contradiction, because if a thing it is human — if it is divine it is divine. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá had both.

Therefore Bahá'u'lláh has called Him the Mystery of god. Every Faith has its mysteries. We must not be afraid to tell this. In the Christian Dispensation it was the Virgin birth. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said this was an act of direct intervention of God. There is a Tablet not translated in which the Master said this, and explained the normal process of conception.

Khayru'lláh taught that the Master was Jesus, and he taught reincarnation. The believers learned this from him, and this was the root of the violations in America. Bahá'u'lláh was the return of Jesus. One of the functions of the trip of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to America was to clarify His station. In New York He gave what His station was, and in Chicago and other places, He gave what it was not.

HERESY is when you go beyond what the Prophet taught. Example: like celebrating the birthday of the Greatest Holy Leaf — or her ascension. We must not even come together on those days. The Holy Days of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh as Prophets are the days we must abstain from work. We celebrate the Master's days, but we need not suspend work. He was not a Prophet. We do nothing on the Days of the Greatest Holy Leaf, not even gather.

In HERESY, we can believe too much or too little.

Bahá'u'lláh said we must not have anything to do with POLITICS. People have thought it was the Master or the Guardian who said this, but it stems from Bahá'u'lláh. The UNITY of the Faith is more important than its propagation.

In an unpublished Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh He says a great change will sweep over the world. First it will be a wave of oppression, which will sweep the entire world — Then will come the Most Great Justice. Third will come the Most Great Peace. The Assemblies must be very strict in establishing JUSTICE. The individual may be kind, loving and merciful, but the Assembly must give only JUSTICE.

Ques: Will the NSA Members be supported financially if necessary?

Ans. Of course. If they are elected, it must be made possible for them to serve.

HUQUQU — Bahá'u'lláh speaks of this in the AQDAS, but he does not say to whom it will be paid. 'Abdu'l-Bahá answers this in His Will and Testament. If a man is Not a Bahá'í, but becomes a believer, he gives 19% of his capital as a purification of one's material possessions, then after that, he gives 1/19th of the interest on his capital, after he has paid his yearly expenses. If a man is a (born) Bahá'í, he will give 19% of any money received, such as gifts or inheritance, as well as the yearly 19% of the interest on one's capital. The reason for this says the Guardian, is that there must be money to carry on the work of the Guardianship and the Hands, such as propagation of the Faith. In the future, teaching will be separate from the NSA activities. The Hands will do this: The teaching. The Master went to America on the Huquq — and the Shrine is being built mostly on Huquq — the NSA's are to keep order. They will deal with the affairs of State.

The INTERNATIONAL HOUSE OF JUSTICE is infallible as a body when it legislates, and it is not infallible just because the Guardian is Chairman. In one sense it is co-equal with the guardianship. The majority vote of the body of the IHJ will carry the decision. All decisions, if they are not unanimous will be carried as a majority vote even if the Guardian is on the minority. This is the point where the Guardian could ask for a reconsideration of the subject. The Guardian will not attend all meetings in person. He will send a deputy (Hand).

But above all things now, we must pioneer — this is more important than anything.

Ques. Is the Guardian infallible in his knowledge in all fields, such as history and science? Ans. The Guardian will not talk about things not in his field. This in itself is a proof of his inspiration. Where it is concerned with his explanations of the Faith, he is infallible.

DAY OF THE COVENANT Arbitrarily 'Abdu'l-Bahá chose the Day of the Covenant to be celebrated six months from that of the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh as a sign of respect to Him, as it is the farthest possible day away from the date of Bahá'u'lláh's ascension.

There are many things we cannot settle yet — such as dates, hours, etc, to celebrate Anniversaries. (This will be decided later by the IHJ).

THE AQDAS — The Guardian was surprised to learn that Leroy Ioas (Hand) had not read it! (The English translation is typed only and supposed to be bad, and we thought it should not be read.) The burning of an arsonist is to repay the human fault. A house doesn't burn another house, so it would do no good to burn the house of the arsonist. But to burn the one who set the fire is the important thing. but Bahá'u'lláh adds that it should be done after much deliberation and understanding of the motives, etc.

FAITH — Belief is not a matter of effort, it is a matter of prayer. Faith is mostly God-given but it can be acquired through prayer.

NOTES OF THE PILGRIMAGE OF EDITH MCLAREN MAY 2 - 10, 1954

My arrival in Haifa just before noon on May second was exactly one year after I made the decision to request permission from the beloved Guardian. To at last have the privilege to come to this blessed spot was the fulfillment of a long cherished dream.

This very first day was filled with unexpected events, for it was the anniversary of the Martyrdom of the Báb according to the Moslem calendar. RúhíyyihKhánúm was entertaining the Bahá'í women from 'Akká, the Persian women pilgrims, the American women on the Internacional Council at a luncheon. Since I was the only western pilgrim for the first two days they seemed as delighted to meet me as I was to meet them. The love shone out of their eyes, from the youngest girl to the elderly niece of Bahá'u'lláh in her simple gray flannel dress.

Later in the afternoon we were all taken to the Shrine of the Báb where we waited in the little portico outside the Eastern Pilgrim house until the beloved Guardian finished his conversation with the men pilgrims from Persia. Just at twilight when the stars were beginning to come out I had my first glimpse of the beloved as he came out of the house, slowly walked up the path to the Shrine followed by the men. The lights went on at the Shrine and the women followed going into the side reserved for them. Therein that matchless room, that sacred spot, I suddenly heard the voice of the Guardian chanting the Tablet of Visitation of Bahá'u'lláh as the fragrance of attar of roses permeated the evening air. Next we entered the room to the left where 'Abdu'l-Bahá is situated and heard the Guardian chant again. To have had this tremendous experience during the first hours of the first day was like being lifted into anothe world. It was nearly nine o'clock when we went in to the dining room for dinner. The overwhelming feeling of unworthiness that comes over one as he walks across the dimly lighted room for the first time and sees Shoghi Effendi rise from the table in the dining room and come forward to greet him is felt to a great degree by every pilgrim. One can scarcely eat seeing his eyes for the first time and hearing him speak. After the first words of greeting and asking about the activity in Rome where I had stopped for a day or two, as compared to the activity of the Faith in the U.S. The Guardian asked about Mrs. Esty in Buffalo, near my town of Hamburg. Mrs. Esty is the believer who presented the large portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the Guardian as well as one to hang in the Temple in Chicago. Then the conversation turned to the World Crusade and the need for dispersal. He told us that if the Bahá'ís do not bring about this dispersal God will do so. . . . that we now have nearly 3000 centers in the world but what we need is more believers. Six hundred of these centers are in Persia. He spoke much about pioneering and remaining at your post. Do not go away after you get there. Remain and teach the natives.

When asked the question if the youth in the Faith should join the army or remain in college if one had already begun his studies he smiled as he answered that one could join the army and give a list of places where one would like to be sent - such as Guam. But each one has to decide for himself. The spirit and desire are the important things.

He spoke of Africa as an example to all, in the way the Faith is growing there. Americans should bring more of the Indians and colored people into the Faith. If we don't teach them the negroes from Africa will have to come to teach. The Bahá'ís like to go to social affairs but they should teach - pioneer. The European Teaching Committee is not doing enough {{p2}} This committee should send more pioneers to France, Malta, etc. The Bahá'í must teach, consolidate and incorporate. Then receive endowments. When asked which Fund is the most important at this time the Guardian answered that the World Center Fund and the National were more important at this time than the local. He said if we support the World Center and National Funds the local will benefit. (He did not mention which should come first of these two.)

More local assemblies should incorporate. But this should be done through the national assembly - that is, not without consulting the national body. They must be sure of holding it before incorporating. The Guardian spoke much about the small increase in believers in the U.S., the loss of local assemblies and the deficit in the National Fund.

The pioneers should go to the difficult places not to the easiest ones. The Americans are too materialistic. They will have to suffer to learn. America will suffer the most. The Guardian seemed tired and very serious this evening and there were many pauses which made one realize the seriousness of the times.

The next evening, Monday, May 3rd we found the Guardian very happy and healthy. His eyes were sparkling and his cheeks were pink. He had many cables and letters which had come that day. They all had good news. He could scarcely eat for he wanted to read so many of them to us. Several new pioneers had arrived at their posts, the NSAs had sent cables - he read some of them - from Canada, Australia, India, Persia, Sweden. He was displeased with Sweden because the NSA has spent $21,500 for land for the Temple, 20 miles from their capital when they had only 3000 in their fund. He was very pleased with Africa especially and Canada and Australia. He spoke of several youth who had gone to pioneer in different places. He also read to us the very cordial and friendly letter which had just come that day from the president Ben Svi of Israel who expressed great pleasure and appreciation of his recent visit with the Guardian and RúhíyyihKhánúm. He spoke warmly of the unity and friendly relations which exist between the Bahá'í Faith and the State of Israel and that both were working for the welding of the nations.....Leroy Ioas was to speak at the Rotary Club in Jerusalem the following day. The Guardian said that he wished to send some Bahá'í books to the president, since he had asked for literature. (I remember so well that he spoke of the books then - Prayers and Meditations, Gleanings, Dawnbreakers and the Appreciations of the Bahá'í Faith. He also said that he would send some plants to Mrs. Ben Svi for her garden. The reason the Guardian was so happy over this visit was because this was the first time a president or high official had called on him. The minister of religions had been invited to come but had refused.....Finally he read to us his cable to the U.S. in which he said that the Honor Roll was now being closed and giving us the latest information on the growth of the Faith. At the end of the dinner time there maps of the property of the SiyahChal prison which the Guardian brought out and talked about with the members of the Council. He mentioned that the individual who brought the property should now work with the NSA of Persia and decide with Bahá'í consultation how the building should be developed and financed.

On another evening The Guardian talked much about the development of the Faith in the East - of the NSAs of Japan, South East Asia, South West Islands and Australia. He was so pleased with the accomplishments of the {{p3}} Australians. They have the good qualities of the British and not the bad, and a few of the good qualities of the Americans. The East, he hope will progress even faster than Africa did. The Fozdar family was mentioned - how they had all been so active and were wonderful pioneers. In speaking of the Covenant Breakers in Persia he said that Mr. Samandarí is the shield of the Cause. He scatters the Covenant- Breakers. He had sent him to Mashhad and also to Tíhrán. He was the only one who could handle the Covenant-Breakers in these places.

Reference was made one evening to the Temple in Isaiah. The Súrah of the Temple is a Tablet written by Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká. It represents the five pointed star as the temple of man. (page 213 God Passes By)

The Guardian pointed out the fact that the Bahá'ís were the only religion in Israel that did not have to pay tax on property used for the Faith because we comply with the rules in contract of land ownership, namely: 1- We will not sell.

2- We do not build. 3. We will not rent. 4. We will not sell produce from the land. We now have property valued at four million dollars. We waited 40 years for the Mansion at Bahjí, 50 years for the land on Mt. Carmel, 60 years for the Shrine and 100 years for the SiyahChal.

In reference to the Americans again the Guardian said that since they have failed to teach the negroes perhaps they will teach the Jews. They should form special committees for this purpose. The Jews character was effected due to enslavement by the Egyptians. That period is now over. Moses was angry and threw down the tablets, and broke them. God also became angry with them. They had persecuted Christ and had to suffer 2000 years persecution. The Jews are the chosen people to support the Bahá'í Institutions in the future - the distant future.

The Shrine of the Báb was in the heart of Mt. Carmel and the Temple will be built at the head.

The Kitáb-i-Aqdas is revealed for future civilization. These laws will not be given out in their entirety at one time. They will be given out a few at a time over a long span of years. Then the beloved Guardian spoke about how this great Cause develops. First came the Revelation, then the Covenant, then Administration. Next will come World Order and finally World Civilization..... Once he mentioned that our enemies have made the right moves and aided the Cause and its development. Bahá'u'lláh would never have come to 'Akká of his own accord. He brought more than a revealed religion. He brought a plan for world civilization.

So often the Guardian spoke about America during the 9 days of my pilgrimage, how it must suffer to be purified, then obtain its destiny and be welded with the other nations. 1. Suffering - to prepare for the welding. 2. Administrative Cradle. These two will prepare America for its destiny to lead all nations spiritually. Not because America is so good but so corrupt was she chosen for this destiny. The early believers thought that the Master was referring to America at that time but he was referring to the destiny of America.

Again and he* again the Guardian spoke about teaching and pioneering. We must teach the Faith with dignity - never peddle it. The Faith is too precious for that. Example - the way it is handled in Israel.

**[this word "he" is apparently a typo. -ed] {{p4}}*

The pioneers should get out, stay at their posts and teach the Faith. They must not forget that they are there to teach the Faith. They must seek out the sincere souls who are prepared....As to the Summer Schools - the primary books to study are Kitáb-i-Íqán and Some Answered Questions. Keep away from the occult and mysticism. Study the writings and know them, then teach. Study, concentrate, then act. There is too much social life at Green Acre and not enough study. There should be study in the evening as well as the daytime. A little play, a little recreation, but not to overdo it. Concentrate on the goals of the Ten Year Crusade and not introduce other things. Be light as the spirit, pure as the air, unrestrained as the wind and blazing like fire.

Some of the things I learned from the beloved Guardian were these: He has great patience. He loves the believers dearly, knows their faults and is always hopeful that they will exert greater and greater effort for the Faith. He has the vision of the Cause as no one else could possibly have. He is focused entirely in the Faith. He works tirelessly, ceaselessly, always keeping his eye on the goal. He goes ahead and makes plans even when there are severe blocks and obstacles not yet overcome as in the case of the property for the Archives Building at that time. The title was not yet clear for the land but the plans were all ready to begin work when they could. Though his station is not the Exemplar as was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s yet he is still the great example to the believers every where.

Memoirs of Frances B. Edelstein 16

Even as a Bahá'í one always has a beginning unless born into a Bahá'í family and they, especially the Iranians, go back into a much older culture. I was not born into a Bahá'í family, but from the time I was a small child I wanted to live in New York City.

In 1912, when I was two years old the Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, arrived on the North American continent in the very month of my birth, April. Evidently the spirit always seemed to pull me toward the great city of New York, the City of the Covenant, which 'Abdu'l-Bahá also called the City of Light.

My forebears were English; founders of the eastern north shore of Long Island, when 20 families crossed Long Island sound in 1640 from New Haven, Connecticut where they had been living since 1624. I was born in one of those small Long Island towns, Mattituck.

My greatest desire always was to read. When I was small and only beginning to talk I would thrust one of my children's books at my mother and say "READ!" I gained many a new book because my mother would finally get tired of the same stories – upon entering school my first day was utter disaster! With disgust, I came home furious. Mother questioned me and I said "I can't even read!"

This great desire to read has been my salvation as I've read almost everything available of the Bahá'í writings over and over again, pondering them in my heart and soul-seeking their inner meanings.

The time came when I moved to New York to live and within a few months the message of this great Bahá'í Era was given to me.

My introduction to the Faith was a rather unusual one – through a friend, I met a spiritualist medium. I'd always had a great curiosity about such phenomena but much to my dismay, I learned nothing of it from her.

My friend went weekly for guidance (on) money and love affairs. The spiritualist continued to ask for me, but I had simply decided it was a waste of time. However, since she constantly requested to see me, I finally went again. She told me there was a message for me which she could not give but would introduce me to someone who could. Hence, a week later, I met Mildred Varnum, a Bahá'í. As soon as we were left alone, Miss Varnum said to me "Christ has returned." It was such a simple way to tell me and it didn't seem strange. I wanted to know when and where but told her I could not take her word for it; I must investigate it first. She said, "That is exactly what we want you to do." I arranged to go to my first meeting in Steinway Hall where the Bahá'ís had a center for years.

Later, when I asked Mrs. Weir (the spiritualist) how she knew I was ready, she said, "When you walked in the first time I saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá just above your head." She knew a great deal about the Faith but she also knew as a medium taking money she had no right to talk about it. But she knew Miss Varnum well and knew her to be the right one for me. Mildred Varnum was elderly and went back to Bangor, Maine, (where she came from) soon after she met me. She turned me over to Mathew Kasat. This was in March 1938. In six months I was signed up. Mathew went to Central America in the first seven-year plan and died a young man. His life is written up in the World books.

My life in New York after was interesting, as I became acquainted with Juliet Thompson – who lived at 48 W. 10th St. – and for a short time I lived there too. Her stories about 'Abdu'l-Bahá were fascinating. She had kept a diary (now printed). People gathered there weekly (or maybe every two weeks) to listen. Her ability for verbal portraiture was unequalled – no one could keep you spellbound as she could.

It was during that time that I also met the Kinneys, the Kelseys, Marjory Morten, Mountfort Mills, the ('Alí Kuli) Khans (Marzieh Gail's parents) and many, many others such as Laura Dreyfus Barney of "Some Answered Questions", Horace Holley and his wife, Doris, Genevieve Coy – who was administrator at Greenacre for some years.

These were all interesting people with vital and amusing information to share.

It was in New York that I first met Marzieh Gale and Mark Tobey who eventually became close friends.

In the last part of the first Seven Year Plan of the Guardian, my life as a pioneer began. First to Birmingham, Alabama, where two very interesting things occurred. Race was a big factor in those days and Mr. Louis Gregory came to Birmingham periodically. He visited both Negro colleges in Alabama and the churches and schools of Birmingham. Another itinerant Negro teacher was Joy Earl. They both stayed at the same place in the Negro section of that huge city.

Upon my arrival, Joy was there and the friends asked if I knew her. I did – and she was ill. They thought it would be nice if I went to see her (none of them (white) had been (to see her)). (So) I phoned, then went to see her. She was despondent over the fact that the other (Bahß' s) had ignored her so to speak. Anyway, she said “Will you stay for dinner if this family says ‘yes’?” And I said, “Why not?”, of course. It seems they had never had whites in their home and felt the same towards them as most whites did of Negroes. They were a highly educated family (I have forgotten their names). He was a principal of a high school, she a church soloist with a beautiful voice who sang also at weddings and funerals. They agreed to have me sit down at the dinner table with them and Joy said, “You are making history! This never happened in this area.”

She (Joy) also said, “Next week, after I leave, Mr. Gregory will be here. Do you think you could meet him at the train?” A very naive Yankee said “Sure.” To meet Louis Gregory was a prospect I'd never thought would happen to me and I was ecstatic over the thought of it.

Another one of the Birmingham ladies with a car had the courage to offer to go also. When I say courage, I had no idea at the moment that it took that. The day of his arrival came and we met the train and Mr. Gregory [at a later period of time I realized that he had hardly ever been met at the train – and two white ladies must have been unbelievable to him.] But he was the most serene person outwardly that one could ever imagine – simply unflappable as if it happened all the time. We took him to the house where he was to stay and when I appeared with him, that lady couldn't believe her eyes, but said nothing.

My next move almost got me shot – and not by the Negroes but the white Bahß' s. As I left Mr. Gregory, I said, “We will see you at the meeting tonight.” (The meeting being the regular open fireside gathering.) His reply was, “Yes, of course – where is it?” I said “In the same place as usual.” He said, “I don't know where it is. I have never been to one.” I told him the address, but having been in Birmingham less than a month, I couldn't tell him how to get there. The lady quietly said to me, “I'll see that Mr. Gregory finds the way.” News travels fast, and by the time I reached my boarding place where I was staying with Martha Fettig and Nina Howard, Gertie (Gwerty) Blum had arrived and FEAR was written all over their faces and I was kindly given the facts of life in (about?) the Deep South.

In the end, I said, “Well, I don't understand any of this – the Oneness of Mankind is one of the principles – if you want to phone Mr. Gregory and tell him not to come, that's fine, but I surely won't.” Nina Howard, a newly arrived pioneer from Los Angeles, spoke up and said, “Frances, I am with you. I don't understand any of this either.”

So, with fear and trembling, I, with the others, went to the meeting. Everything went smoothly. Mr. Gregory spoke to all the Birmingham Bahß' s for the first time. Mrs. Myra Bryant came – a beautiful Negro woman of renown in the state, who knew Mr. Gregory and had accepted the Faith. (Unfortunately, some time later, she resigned because the Bahá'ís did not live up to the teachings – a sad twist for us. She could have been able to spread it (the Faith) all over the state, because she was so well known.)

My stay in Birmingham was short, as the climate was humid and smoky, giving me asthma. So I was encouraged to leave since they had enough for an assembly (Local Spiritual Assembly). Asthma dogged me all my life until I was in my late sixties.

The next post was Sioux Falls, South Dakota. This was one of those vast prairie states where Lutherans were predominant and Sioux Falls was the home of Augustana Lutheran College. It took ]4 [sic; not clear if it is 14 or 4] years to have a native L.S.A. and I was there 7 years – being its first secretary. As I became more acclimated, I realized the impossibility of reaching out into all that vast expanse and pursued the idea of radio. We were one of the first pioneer states to have a radio program.

The radio station was comparatively new and its wave length reached just the state of South Dakota. We wrote our own scripts, picked music to go with it, and paid for it ourselves. It was a half-hour program on Saturday morning. One of our pioneers, Jean Stapleton, whom we lovingly called Stapie, was the best voice to broadcast. We were all tested. Mine (my voice) was good too, but since I was committewe chairman with many other duties I didn't want that one, and was more than happy to have Stapie, especially because she was Negro. All of this was at the end of the first 7-year plan and the beginning of the second (over 40 years ago).

Each year we had a both at the County Fair – and friends from Minneapolis sometime came down to help.

Once we took on a very individual race relations project. I was living with an elderly Augustana College professor and his wife. They were living on a meagre income and needed their living- and dining-room walls painted. Clarence Hughes, a wonderful Negro Bahá'í from Minneapolis, loved to house-paint. He was a chemist (at a time when there were no Negro chemists to speak of) and headed up the Labs of International Printing Inks (later merged with Allied Chemical). Doing inside paint jobs was sort of a hobby with him. He agreed to come paint (the professor's house) and stayed with Mr. and Mrs. Knox. The reason for this was she had expressed to me that she wondered how she would feel about Negroes on a personal level. So I took the opportunity (to demonstrate) and it worked like a charm. She and Professor Knox were so impressed with Clarence. Her summing up was that he was such a gentleman that she immediately forgot his color. Clarence had that quality – color always vanished when you were with him. As we know, everything begins with the individual.

During my years in Sioux Falls we had many special visitors – such as Amelia Collins, Mason Remey, Hilda Yen, Peggy True, who later in the Crusade with her husband, George, established the Faith in the Canary Islands as Knights of Bahá'u'lláh. Harlan Iher (sp. ?) who later married Elizabeth Kidder and went to South Africa in the Crusade, Ruth Moffett and Monroe Ioas (brother of Leroy Ioas) were some of the others.

Life in those days of pioneering was a ploughing of hard soil – but we spent out time not only spiritually trying to make a dent, but also working to earn a living. I was fortunate enough to become a hotel auditor with many ramifications, but I earned more than most Hotel Clerks, etc., as I took on, little by little, more of the night work. It was war time, and help was scarce. The other friends found work in other ways. One, a hotel chambermaid, an elderly lady; another, a housekeeper for a widower; another frail little person who had never worked in her life lived in as a maid with a man and his wife. The work was very hard for her. And one and all never missed meetings – all observances were kept. We were there for one purpose – to establish the Bahá' Faith and its administrative order. Above all, we never missed contributing to the Faith (the NSA Fund).

We finally had about 14 people in Sioux Falls, but only two were locals. However, I decided I could move on if the National Teaching Committee permitted.

The next move was to Louisville, Kentucky, where they were having some difficulties among the believers. I was sent there as something of a “troubleshooter”. There were no Auxiliary Boards in those days. It was an experience which culminated in the troublemakers leaving most quickly and abruptly. The friends that were left, of whom two or three were locals, helped us decide to leave the soil fallow for the ensuing year – but also to burrow in for a siege – later to rebuild.

While there, I served on the District Teaching Committee for Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio I think it was. I also found an excellent job in the Credit Department of Sears, Roebuck. But, like Birmingham, the climate in Louisville was a continuous battle with asthma and the DTC felt I should go to a better climate. Eventually, I went back to Sioux Falls whose numbers had diminished. Insert A.

In Louisville, we were blessed with a visit from Agnes Alexander – not a Hand then, but like Martha Root, her years had been spent teaching and traveling, especially in Hawaii, her home, and Japan and China. She often accompanied Martha.

In 1950, the Guardian reopened the doors to pilgrims – and we in Sioux Falls (a jumping off place in those days) were the recipients of a visit from Gladys Anderson Weeden and her husband, Ben, upon their return after serving the Guardian at the World Centre for a few years. What a bounty! No one can imagine today what that meant in those times. It was at this time I was encouraged to request a pilgrimage but I procrastinated a bit until one of the other pioneers persuaded me and we went together along with her mother who had been urging her to do so.

I shall never forget that Sunday in September when the decision was made to cable the Guardian for permission. His reply was as swift as lightning – it came at 7:00 AM the following Wednesday (three days later). The telephone rang and it said “Welcome December”. My legs turned to water and I sat down on the nearest seat, which were the steps going upstairs.

The first Holy Year started in October 1952. It was December, 1952, that we arrived in Haifa. From October to October 1953 the Guardian inaugurated the 10-year Crusade, 4 intercontinental conferences, and the dedication of the Mother Temple, the Holiest Temple ever to be erected. That year, I made a pilgrimage, attended the Temple dedication, and also the first Teaching Conference in the Western Hemisphere. In 1944, we had commemorated the Declaration of the Bḥb at the Temple in Foundation Hall. It was the culmination of the first Seven-Year Plan and I felt so lucky to attend that as a pioneer from Sioux Falls. In those days and years the Guardian set the pattern and plans for all that has ensued.

The Pilgrimage!! Our first move was to get passports and travel arrangements made. From a place like Sioux Falls, passports were applied for at the Post Office, but no one had applied for one in years – a novelty. The war was over but conditions in Europe still bore the heavy scars of devastation. The very first travel agency in that city had only just opened its doors in July so we were comparatively early customers going to Israel, no less. That took some doing. They could get us to Italy, and finally, through the Italian lines they got the necessary route to Haifa, Israel. We were to land in Naples, cross the boat [sic], and take a Mediterranean Line from Bari to Haifa. Bari had been the point of embarkation for the Crusades many centuries before.

We finally took off by car, drove to Fort Wayne, Indiana; took a bus to New York, and the Saturday after Thanksgiving, we sailed for Italy. In mid-ocean, we lost a propeller, limped into Genoa, were piled onto a boat train for Rome and Naples to Bari – a 24-hour trip with no sleep, nothing to eat and the extra luggage (except personal luggage) went on a “Slow boat to China.” It never arrived in Bari until we had long since sailed for Haifa. I had been asked by friends to take gifts of supplies to the World Centre. When I got back to Naples, I had to wait almost a week in Naples for it to be shipped there so I could take it to Rome, where Mrs. Giachery held it and arranged for future pilgrims to take it on with them, or to arrange to ship it with other materials.

My pilgrimage could fill pages.

The trip to and from was a life-time experience. It was my first trip out of the United States and on my way home I visited Naples, Rome, Basil, Switzerland, to see some old friends pioneering there – then on to Paris and home. Paris didn’t impress me but I stayed a few days to sight-see.

Upon arrival in Haifa, we were met by Jessie and Ethel Revel at the boat, taken to the Western Pilgrim House, where we met Leroy and Sylvia Ioas, Luṭfu’llāh Ḥakīm, and Mason Remey. Later, Rūḥiyyih Khānum came over to welcome us and take us to the Shrine of the Bḥb.

That first evening, as we gathered downstairs awaiting the arrival of our Guardian for dinner, I had butterflies in the pit of my stomach, and my heart was trembling – in short, I felt like dying rather than being ecstatic over this great opportunity. The inner turmoil was overwhelming and not one in the 13 days of my visit did I ever feel different when I was to sit down at the table opposite Shoghi Effendi.

One of the evenings after dinner, Jessie Ravel said to me, “I notice you don’t take notes.” I had made my mind up before going on Pilgrimage I wouldn’t take any notes. The ones I’d heard were most unsatisfactory and, and secondly, I thought it impolite to sit at the table as his guest and write down things on paper – so that is what I told Jessie. She said, “It’s very interesting, because just a few days before you arrived, the Guardian said he was going to stop having the pilgrims take notes.”

I’ve a short diary of things remembered that I jotted down – but I also realize if you had read and studied all he had written in his books and messages, he was going over them (at times). At other times, he talked of the four great Teaching Conferences to be held in 1953. February, Kampala – May, Wilmette – June, Stockholm – and October, New Delhi – and everything was geared to the coming Crusade.

It was obvious his main objective was to enlist an army for that Ten-Year Plan – his last and greatest, and the pattern and forerunner of all the plans to come. In one of his messages a few years before, he had said the Divine Plan of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would be accomplished by a series of plans – and so it is slowly and progressively taking place.

The most interesting things, aside from the greatest event, dinner with the Guardian, were projects done while there. Housekeeping things, such as readying the room in the Master’s house for Millie Collins’ occupancy when she returned; and moving her from the Western Pilgrim House in the dead of night. The bed was a brass bedstead in the room we had gotten ready, one used by Sutherland Maxwell, and I made a valance by putting some old ship’s curtains sewed on an old sheet under the mattress – this covered up everything packed under the bed. Closet and drawer space was meagre, so the space under the bed was utilized.

Then, Rúhíyyih Khánum moved me from the room I was in into the room Millie had occupied for the duration of my pilgrimage.

In those days, we were taken to Bahjí for a day and a night. I shared a room with Ethel Revel who accompanied us. It had a single bulb hanging from the ceiling and when we put that out, it was pitch dark. Ethel had a flash light, thank goodness. I was up before dawn to go into the Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh and stay as long as I wished – never will I forget that lovely place, all alone in the beautiful garden room at the threshold of the King of the World and be able to rest my head on that threshold, carpeted with a beautiful Persian prayer rug with flowers and petals scattered on it.

I went twice to the Shrine of the Báb – the first time with Rúhíyyih Khánúm. There were the two other pilgrims as well, and Rúhíyyih Khánúm chanted a prayer. Then, on Christmas eve, early, Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím took me again; and again I was alone, as he stayed outside. It was a special time as our pilgrimage coincided with Hannukah and the Mayor of Haifa had requested of Shoghi Effendi that the Shrine remain floodlighted for their Holiday. It was a first, also – It was more beautiful – the Shrine, not quite completed. They were waiting for the gold tiles to arrive – otherwise, it was almost finished.

The grounds everywhere were lovely. Shoghi Effendi being his own horticulturist. We saw his small palm trees being nurtured in a corner of his gardens on the grounds of the Shrine of the Báb – perfect little specimens, probably not yet a foot tall – to be transplanted when and where he wanted them.

There was another project I undertook. Rúhíyyih Khánúm showed me her frozen food (deep-freeze) that had been shipped by one of the friends – and in it was a side of beef, 3 lamb carcasses, and three chickens. The beef and lamb had been purchased from the ship's supply house and was frozen on delivery. The purveyor had simply taken an axe, cut it in half between the foreleg and hind leg, and dumped it in. All of this uncut, unwrapped, dehydrating rapidly.

Having been a bookkeeper in a frozen-food locker plant in Sioux Falls, I spontaneously said it should all be cut and wrapped, otherwise it will be tasteless and locker-burned. Rúhíyyih Khánúm said, "Put your thinking cap on and let's come up with something." I knew we needed waxed paper, but Rúhíyyih Khánúm said, "This is Israel. We don't have waxed paper." The new state was destitute of most essentials, bread was unwrapped, carried under your arm from the baker. Anyway, I asked about wax of any kind and R. K. said, "I've plenty of candle stubs we can melt down." Which we did. Then we took the huge brown sheets of wrapping paper that had come in on the various shipments, put them on the ironing board, dipped a paint brush in the wax, spread it on the paper, put another sheet of paper on top, took an iron, and made waxed paper.

Then, the process of prying the frozen meat from the deep-freeze began. A few weeks before, someone had sent a complete set of screwdrivers of all lengths and sizes, so I took the largest one and pried the meat out, defrosted the locker, having heated water in every possible cook pot available, and placed three of these hot ones inside which soon melted all the accumulated ice. I washed it thoroughly, put the electricity on again, and left it while I supervised the cutting and wrapping of that frozen meat.

Having taken lots of cutting instructions, I could say more or less where to cut. We had a hacksaw and a butcher knife. To this day, I'll never know how it was accomplished. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím and Mason Remey wielding first one and then the other (knife or hacksaw); Sylvia Ioas wrapped and marked it; we tied it with string that had been saved for emergencies whenever any came – same as the brown paper. It was all done in an afternoon and put back in the deep freeze without thawing – another miracle!

The chickens I cooked one evening for dinner. I fried them first, but they didn't get cooked well enough so I had to put them in a pressure cooker. LeRoy Ioas was amazed to think I could cook.

In those days of pilgrimage, we could do things and be helpful in general to a degree and it made for interesting times. Afternoon tea was usually served at the Master's house across the street where we joined the Persian ladies on pilgrimage. Their husbands or sons or brothers spent that time at the Eastern Pilgrim House, with the Guardian – then when he returned, he spent about 15 minutes with them (the Persian ladies).

The Guardian spoke nightly of the destructions of the cities and devastation everywhere. When asked what and from whence the calamities would come, he said it could be another great war or some terrestrial upheaval beyond the power of man. As we look around us we have seen the cities devastated by riots – both Newark and New York have large sections gutted by arsonists – and financial bankruptcy plaguing them to say nothing of the environmental pollution!! We have earthquakes, tornadoes, vast floods, landslides, volcanic eruptions all going on almost at once somewhere; along with wars – Central America, Africa, India's Sikhs, Bangladesh, Pakistan – the almost complete demolition of Lebanon and on and on. Yet the vast majority of humanity lulls itself deeper and deeper into a coma-like existence. At the time (1953) that he was talking of the destruction of cities, all we could imagine were bombs and war.

Shoghi Effendi was hoping to recruit an army for his Crusade – which was another main topic. He never made you feel compelled to enlist: it was a matter of being spiritually motivated and oriented – and the Crusade was world-wide, a gargantuan plan to the average Bahá'í at that time.

One evening the Guardian brought over the original map he had made for the 10-Year Crusade. It had not yet been printed. It is now found in the statistical compilation "The Bahá'í Faith – 1844-1952 Including Supplement for the Ten-Year International Bahá'í Teaching and Consolidation Plan 1953-1963." He spread it on the table for us to see and discussed the printing of it and the statistics which had not yet been decided on. It was finally printed in the USA by the Bahá'í Publishing Committee in Wilmette. He vacillated between Britain, US, or possibly India because he felt that our community often dragged its feet about getting things done. It's possible that all three finally printed the maps – I don't know for sure – but in December 1952 it was all up in the air and the first conference, Kampala, was in February.

Anyway, I've always been a map hound, and great on geography, and that MAP intrigued me to the extent that I swallowed my reticence and asked if I could keep it until the next night so as to see it in detail all by myself. I took it back to my room, rolled it out on the floor, got down on my hands and knees, and had a glorious time. I returned it the next night, knowing that eventually I would have my own copy when it was published. I still have it.

How could one eliminate the evening the Guardian asked Mason Remey for his drawings. The Guardian had asked Mason Remey to (draw plans) to enhance the exterior of the Shrine at Bahjí (which to date have never been accomplished). Mason brought them to the table which had been cleared of dishes. Shoghi Effendi swiftly rolled them out and at one glance and with a sweeping gesture of his hands said “They won’t do.” The drawings were swiftly rolled up and Mason was completely crestfallen. He asked Shoghi Effendi what he would suggest for a design, and the Guardian quickly told him he (the Guardian) wasn’t an architect. He said, “Mason, you are the architect. When you produce what I want, I’ll know it.” Mason Remey pressed as to ideas and finally the Guardian said, “I want columns” (which we now see on the Archives Building, Universal House of Justice seat, and the Báb’s Shrine). Later, Rúhíyyih Khánúm said, “Mason, Daddy didn’t produce anything at first for the Shrine and had to make several attempts before he got what Shoghi Effendi wanted.”

After we had been to the Archives, the Guardian looked across the table at me and said, “You have seen the pictures of Bahá’u’lláh today in the Archives. Which one did you like best?” As you know, there are two paintings and one photograph. I had banked on the latter for years, having heard about them from Juliet Thompson and Marjorie Morten. The paintings were, to me, very stylized and the photograph a great disappointment. I swallowed and within my mind I groaned – he had asked me outright, what could I say? He answered for me. “The photograph is a poor one, taken in Adrianople after He had suffered greatly.” (my notes)

After the dedication of the Temple, May 1953, I realized why he had asked. He had sent us a reproduction of the painting of Bahá’u’lláh in a red turban, beautifully framed as a gift which we all reverently walked past in the newly dedicated holiest temple in the Bahá’í world. Rúhíyyih Khánúm brought it with her.

A couple of days for a few hours, Rúhíyyih Khánúm and I spent picking up and stacking stones out of the ground from a plot next to the Western Pilgrim House that the Guardian had recently acquired and wanted to make a garden spot to beautify it. It had begun to be used as a dumping place so he purchased it.

One morning I’d slept late and felt a bit ashamed, but Rúhíyyih Khánúm came over to breakfast and sat with me to eat. She said, “I decided I just didn’t want to eat alone today.” We chatted at great length about her parents and her father’s relationship with Shoghi Effendi (most of which she included in The Priceless Pearl). She also told me of the Guardian’s times of great unhappiness and how it was difficult to get him out of bed in those periods of despair.

But R.K.’s bell-like voice often comes back to me as I hear her in retrospect address him as “Shoghi Effendi” – the tone of her voice caressed that name as no words of endearment ever could. It must have always soothed his burdened soul.

We experienced both the agony and the ecstasy on this journey to the World

Centre – the experience which overwhelmed us came on an evening when the Guardian had been going through his mail and was harassed with papers, papers, papers – too many papers. He said it was so with both Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. On the last days of their lives their papers became too much for them.

In God Passes By, the Guardian has written of it on page 311 – thus we were thrown stricken, and gripped into an inner death-like panic. He then said “ – it is not that way with me, yet.” Rúhíyyih Khánum had left the table in tears. When she returned, he told her he had not meant to frighten her.

For myself, I mechanically sat down with unseeing eyes, ate my food, not conscious of what I was eating, finally I felt compelled to lift my head and look up to discover Shoghi Effendi's eyes boring into my inmost being. Then I drew a breath and began to feel alive.

In 1962, during the first Luxemburg summer school, I asked Mr. Leroy Ioas if the Guardian ever again referred to his passing. He replied, “Never again, before pilgrims.”

Although Pilgrimage is nine days, ours extended to thirteen. We had come by boat and a return boat was on the thirteenth day. Usually, the friends moved to a guest house or hotel but the Guardian kept us at Pilgrim House the entire time. In later years, I understand his generosity. Early pioneers had been hard to recruit.

The time had slipped by. We had lived for a time in another world and dimension. The night before we left, it was time to express our appreciation and farewells. As he took my hand, he said, “I will see you tomorrow before you leave.” Those present, members of the International Council, as well as myself, were a bit dumbfounded – especially ME. I was actually DUMB. It seems it had never occurred before. True to his word, he sent for us the next day as we waited to leave.

His parting words I write from my falling-apart diary: “Please convey to the friends my love and gratitude. The money they send will not go into the ‘gold dome’ crowning the Báb's tomb.

“Now you have been in Paradise and you must take it back to the friends for, to have it and not to share it – Well!!” and he spread his hands, as if to keep it to oneself is to lose it – . (In the passing years, it has troubled me to find few who are really interested in hearing about a visit to Haifa when the Guardian was alive.)

“Tell them of the map soon to be printed, also the statistics – impress upon them the vitalness of the Ten-Year Crusade.

“Tell them of the new gardens at Bahjí.” (At that time only about a month old.) There were other topics also – but those are the one I'll include.

He was so very charming – a handsome man with such a spiritual aura, a dignity of quality, integrity, and purpose. One felt split asunder at parting.

We boarded our ship in mid-afternoon and weighed anchor. It was New Year's Eve, 1952 – and 1953 about to enter – with it our World Crusade. THE PLAN was to become a reality with four great teaching conferences – Kampala, Wilmette, Stockholm, and New Delhi to introduce it.

My pilgrimage started at the outset of the first Holy Year, October 1, 1952 to October 1, 1953 (noted in the “Messages to the Bahá'í World, 1950-1957, page 34), where he clarifies that the vision in that pestilential pit took place in mid-October 1852.

There is really much I could add to my trip over and back. I came home via Europe and embarked on the Cunard Liner Mauretania (sp?) in Cherbourg and was seated at the purser's table. In Cabin Class that's like the Captain's table in 1st Class.

The Purser was most interested that I had been in Israel and asked how I came to visit there, so I was able to give the message to all at the table; a young Spanish-British (?) aristocrat, a layman and wife of some Protestant denomination (one of those hell-fire and brimstone revivalists coming to tour North America?) for some group, and a high-ranking Episcopalian churchman who was coming to a church in Philadelphia in an exchange program. When the layman heard me say the Báb was from Írán (still Persia) he very rudely said, “ – from that terrible civilization? NO, Never, not acceptable!”

I said, “Well – didn't they say of Christ ‘can any good thing come out of Nazareth?’ ” The amused look on the purser's face as well as the gentleman of Episcopalian ranks told me I had scored!

Back in the United States, my father was dying of cancer so I spent 1953 taking care of family matters – trying to decide where best to situate in this country and tentatively planned for Jacksonville, Florida. In the meantime, I worked in New York City, helped to keep the center open in spare time, as pioneers flowed through.

I attended the dedication of the Mother Temple in Wilmette as well as the Conference.

That year our High School Graduating Class celebrated its 25th Anniversary which I attended in Mattituck, N.Y. They had heard I had joined a religious group and it seemed they expected some kind of a zealot, which I didn't turn out to be. At least that put a good foot forward for the Faith in a small town on the East end of Long Island.

There was time spent with Marjory Morten and Juliet Thompson again, as well as Marguerite Pumpelly Smith (Daisy to us). They were all nearing the end of their life span – but still able to enrich us with times of the past.

In 1954 (February) the Guardian made a request at the table in Haifa one evening to which Mr. Leroy Ioas, then sec'y general of the International Council, sent to New York City. It seems that the Guardian expressed the wish for someone from the City of the Covenant (N.Y.) to go to the city of the Covenant-Breaker (Famagusta, Cypress) and one to go to the Fizan in Tripolitania (see page 269, God Passes By).

Thus it was that I went to Famagusta, Cypress in October 1954. In the summer of 1954 I was secretary at the Green Acre School. Those were hectic times.

Green Acre was an unforgettable experience. Genevieve Coy was head of the Green Acre committee and the teaching programs. How did I ever have brains enough to do what I did there? Genevieve was a master-mind at being in charge and no one ever felt it. Everything glided along – good classes, mostly good teachers, one of my duties was to assess every class once during each week. I was also in charge of books and book sales.

It was during 1953 and 1954 that I became well acquainted with Mark Tobey. He used to spend weeks in New York at the National Arts Club. That's where Marjory Moreten lived. Our friendship lasted until he passed away in 1976.

Mildred Mehl went with me to Cyprus. It turned out to be a rather poor choice but then – we learn as we live. We sailed October 4th on the Queen Mary for Southampton. The British NSA and British National Teaching Committee wished to confer with us. Cyprus had been allocated to United Kingdom as a crusade goal. They had already sent their pioneers to Nicosia, the capitol. This goal of Famagusta fell directly under Shoghi Effendi, The International Council, USA (because we were from that Bahá'í community), indirectly to Germany, as Greece was their goal, hence they were really responsible for the language – but we had nothing in Greek available.

We spent 4 or 5 days in London – from there on to Paris where I saw a friend – met Edith Sanderson, attended the Báb's Birthday during those four days, then on to Switzerland to see friends pioneering in Berne and Basil. From there we went to Vienna where we spent 2 weeks resting – seeing Margaret Lenz, a pioneer there, and met the Varguas from Vienna. On to Venice where we embarked on a Mediterranean boat for Cyprus. One of the Adriatic shipping lines, where we again bounced around like a match box on the rough seas going through the Corinthian Canal (as we did on the route to Haifa) skirting the Cyclades Islands, weaving through Dodecanese and finally arriving in Cyprus. Limassal was the port where we disembarked. There was no wharf. We climbed down a ladder into small harbor boats. In the dead of night, some 12 to 14 hours late.

We spent two or three days in Nicosia with the McKinleys – Hugh and his mother, Violet (both Knights of Bahá'u'lláh). They had filled the British goal in the capital city of Cyprus. Two other pioneers were 'Abbás Vakíl and his wife, from Baghdád. I think 'Abbás was originally from Turkey. His family were Iranians, I believe.

Jeanne Kranen at that time was governess to a small boy in the outlying countryside. (She was Dutch). Later she came into Nicosia to live. She brought into the Faith the first Turkish Cypriot, Hasan Shashmaz. 'Abbás Vakíl brought in the first Armenian Cypriot (name forgotten). I eventually brought in the first Greek Cypriot in Famagusta, Nick Charalambous. He was from Larnaca but worked and lived in Famagusta. He worked for Mantovani shipping agents in the office. They also handle shipping for American Export Lines as well as the Italian boats plying the Mediterranean.

First we stayed at the Palace Hotel for quite a while as we took a prefab cottage on the rooftop. Then we separated. I lived in three places after that – all in town. My best teaching work of my entire life was done in Famagusta. One evening, I discovered a tarantula under there dressing table at the second place I moved to. It got the heel of my tough British walking shoes.

Day to day living in the Middle East was much different than we were accustomed to – but having been on pilgrimage I had seen something of what to expect.

The Guardian asked us to be careful and not to divulge our purpose for being there – so we had to think about what to tell the authorities. We needed permits to stay longer than just a visit. They had to be renewed from time to time. Our passports were always submitted with the request and we usually waited for weeks to get them back, which made us very nervous. At a later date when we had to renew, Mildred Mehl didn't have any luck but was ensnared into telling them she was there for the Bahá'í Faith. They came to investigate about 10:30 PM one evening. When they arrived, they saw our books; among them was one of the World volumes. They asked to look at it and we readily agreed. The books seemed to automatically open to "Appreciations". They flipped a page or two, found a letter written by Sir Ronald Storrs about the Faith and also one by Sir Hubert Samuels. Storrs had been governor of Cyprus and Samuels had been first High Commissioner of Palestine under the British mandate. The investigation ended before it started.

I decided after seeing the native craft of needlework and pottery if I could find an outlet to send it to that might be useful, which Government House employers thought an excellent idea. It fizzled, but somehow, the Guardian heard about it and found it amusingly impressive that a female should consider going into "commerce".

Valentinos Charalambous had become a very well-known Mid-Eastern potter; potting having been their family craft for centuries. He had squeezed permission from his father to send him to the Arts and Crafts School in London for three years, so he had become an expert modern potter. (His father was a traditional potter.) While studying, Val had spent a summer in St. Ives at the Bernard Leach Kilns. Leach became a Bahá'í through Mark Tobey, so Val had heard of the Bahá'í Faith from them. He was interested, but never became involved. I became fascinated with the potting craft: where the clay came from, etc; the designs he used. I have two of his plates; my sister has a plate and an ashtray.

My contact with Mr. and Mrs. Panos Panagidi continued for many years after I left Cyprus and they moved to London. Another was Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Anthias who moved to Rhodesia. I still hear from her.

The list of contacts I made and gave the message to was included in my report sent to the International Center at the time of the end of the Crusade. The new Universal House of Justice sent many of us requests to give a report.

My contacts actually consisted of all the key people in Famagusta. One, Mr. Yianmakis, teacher of English and official translator for the Board of Education on the entire island, was among my contacts. He read much that I gave him. He also translated the Tablet of Aḥmad and the pamphlet, Christian, Muḥammadan, and Jews. The article was really ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s talk given in Temple Emmanuel in San Francisco.

Shortly after I came home, he was murdered on the streets of Famagusta by the EOKA guerilla gang which terrorized the island from 1954 to 1960 when Cyprus became independent.

The first June (1955) I was sent a formal invitation to attend the Queen’s Birthday celebration which takes place everywhere that is under the British flag (Union Jack). A hat and glove affair that takes place in the tropics at 9:00 AM before the hot noonday sun. A very impressive ceremony.

Another contact was an Armenian man, Treasurer for the entire county of Famagusta. I saw a great deal of him. He took us driving but couldn’t understand why we remained in Famagusta – so many more opportunities in Nicosia. I told him that some day I would explain specifically why I must remain in Famagusta. Time went on. Finally, he said again, “Why must you stay in Famagusta?” By this time he had read the “New Era,” we had discussed many facets of the Faith, and he was very open to it. (Always, one must remember that of all places, Famagusta and Cyprus were enemy territory to us.) I explained about Mīrzá Yaḥyá; much to my surprise, he understood the situation – but he also knew the family. They were paid every month from the Treasury as they had been by the Turkish regime before World War One. Each month, two very elderly ladies of that family came to collect their meagre stipend. As Treasurer, he did the “paying out” to all who were on the payroll. It had to be signed for.

The most interesting contact was the Barrister Turkish Muslim who represented the Turkish population of that area. Each factor had a representative to the British government. The Greek Cypriots were represented by their Bishop and the Armenians by their churchman. The Turks were not represented, that way they had a Barrister who had been educated in London. This man was married to an Irish Catholic nurse. She was seeking a religion that might have more common ground. The Bahá’ Faith sounded like what she was looking for. It was arranged that I accompany Miss Hamilton, an English lady living there whom I had become acquainted with, to come to tea. It was a day during the Fast of Ramaḍán. The husband was at the Mosque when we arrived, but came in later.

We talked about the Faith, then when he came in, he excused himself for not joining us for tea, as it was the Fast of Ramaḍán. I said, “Yes, I know.” He was so surprised to find an American lady who knew about the Fast of Ramaḍán. At this point, the wife spoke up and wanted to know about monogamy. Her husband kept telling her he was lawfully allowed 4 wives, which she as a Catholic, could not accept. I don’t think he really meant to take 3 others but kept telling her just the same. I said that we as Bahá’ís believed in monogamy and that although the Moslems were allowed 4 wives, Muḥammad had said that He preferred they have only one, but since they had been polygamists so long, he would allow them to have 4. The Barrister was so surprised at my answer and at the same time, his wife asked him if what I said was so. He said, “Yes.” Then he asked, “You have read the Qur’án?” I said, “Yes.” Well! That he could hardly take in! Then he said, “I’m a Barrister and you have to prove to me that your Faith is what you say it is. A Barrister must have proof.” I replied, “In this case, you must find your own proof. This is something you must do for yourself. No one else can prove these things to you.”

I left the island a couple of weeks later. Whatever happened to him I don’t know.

Miss Hamilton eventually became a Bahá’í .

Three other contacts were the Librarian at the Public Library where I placed the “New Era” in English, the Headmaster of the Famagusta Elementary School, who in some way had heard of the Faith, and had written to Wilmette. In return, I got a letter from Mr. Holley – the man was interested in Rosicrucianism. He did read the Íqán while I was there. The other was the Head of Antiquities for Cyprus – Mr. Mugubub. His brother, as it happened, was married to an American lady. They lived in Chamberlin, South Dakota. Mr. Mugubub was Lebanese.

The Azalís weren’t very active, but most had good jobs with either the government or the radio network. Yaḥyá’s tomb was pointed out to me – very ill kept.

I was approached once in Kyrenia by someone who claimed to be from Lebanon – that is a Covenant-Breaker hotbed also – I felt an uneasiness but it went no further.

In Kyrenia, there was a health center of sorts – whom I contacted for herbal medicines. He turned out to be an Aḥmad Sohrab devotee. An Englishman, I think he was. At that time, the New History Society (as the Sohrab group was known) was trying to merge with the Azalís – strangely enough, they refused to be involved with him.

All the while we were living under political terrorism – murders, bombs, and constant curfews. We would scurry out for food, postage, and other errands such as books to read, then back. Curfew was from later afternoon at first to morning, then it got to be longer.

At that time I was living with a young Cypriot who worked for KEO Cyprus wines and alcoholic beverages and his aunt. It was her home – a typical middle-east house, where the water for a bath was heated by a wood fire in the bath room under the tank of water. Clothes were washing in much the same way in a wash house in the back yard where a copper boiler was cemented in so that a fire could be built under it to boil whites.

I had a three-burner oil stove to cook on, and if I baked a cake it was over a primus cooker with a ring around the flame in which you placed a cake pan like an angel-cake pan. On this ring you put lots of wood ashes to protect the cake from burning before placing your cake on it. At times, I also cooked my meals on a primus – a one-pot meal of chicken or meat, vegetables, and water. Seasoned, it was very good.

Living outside of one's homeland is the most educational experience one can have. That, with an in-depth study of the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh, gives you the equivalent of a University education as 'Abdu'l-Bahá always said.

The Cypriots had a delicacy they always treated you with. It was fruit; peach, pear, orange peel, grapefruit peel, put down in heavy sugar syrup. They also prepared green walnuts and almonds the same way except they were put into a shallow well with some kind of preparation to soak for a long period of time before being cooded [sic] in the syrup with spices.

Sent from Haifa to the friends in America

July 9, 1952

Dear Friends,

Many, many times we think of you working so steadfastly to promote the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh and our love goes out to each and every one of you, and at the Holy Shrines our prayers ascend for you. {{p1}}In the spirit of love and service we are always together.

Recently there have been many problems here but these problems always lead us to victory and our beloved Guardian tells us that the Faith raises up enemies as it expands and grows, it triumphs over them, then a new set of problems arises and eventually it triumphs again. There is no end to the evolution of the righteous and there is no end to the activity of the evil one. After sixty years of opposition since the passing of Bahá'u'lláh, the enemies can do nothing and this reveals the Power of the Cause. Crisis always leads to victory and never causes a split. Everything that happens in the Bahá'í World has repercussions here and now the Cause is entering a World stage in its activities.

Our beloved Guardian tells us that with regard to the Intercontinental conferences to be held during the Bahá'í Holy Year, nothing similar has been attempted since the History of the Faith. It is a World Crusade, utilizing the agencies of a World Administrative Order which is Worldwide in character, to carry out the provisions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's World Plan, in the service of a World Faith — a Global Crusade in which all National Spiritual Assemblies will take part. The chief task of these Conferences will be the opening up new territories under their jurisdiction, consolidating the work, on an international scale.

One day at dinner Shoghi Effendi called for a world map and he himself drew circles around the territories under the jurisdiction of the eleven now existing National Spiritual Assemblies, then he drew circles around eleven more territories where new National Spiritual Assemblies are to be made within the next ten years, and he called this THE THEELS [the wheels] OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH'S CHARIOT. This World Crusade will last ten years and will culminate in THE MOST GREAT JUBILEE and will include every sovereign state, every chief dependency, every island of the globe. How very fortunate are we all, to have a part in this great crusade! America is the chief executor of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's World Plan. In ten years the Bahá'ís of the world will double what has been accomplished since 1844 working through the institutions.

Our beloved Guardian said that the rise of this Most Great Order given by Bahá'u'lláh has thrown confusion into the world. The Báb announced this World Order, Bahá'u'lláh revealed its Laws, 'Abdu'l-Bahá is its Architect and has given us the Blueprints — the erection of it was told by the Báb. Bahá'u'lláh revealed laws for its construction, 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave the Plans, Bahá'ís are working to build up a Divine Civilization to go hand in hand with material civilization, not materialistic civilization. One day Shoghi Effendi said that materialistic civilization implies the negation of Divine Civilization. Material Civilization is not harmful but it is insufficient, it has to be linked with Divine Civilization. He said that the Master ('Abdu'l-Bahá) was always attacking materialistic civilization. Matter is not a bad thing but materialistic matter is bad, nationhood is a good thing, but nationalism is a bad thing and politics is the nerve center of materialistic civilization.

Shoghi Effendi said that when he thinks of the Dome of the Shrine of the Báb, he thinks of two things; the International House of Justice and the Institution of the Guardianship and the Hands of the Cause. He says the shrine has a triple crown; one on the parapet of the first unit (the arcade). This crown is of white marble panels with green and red decoration, green being the symbol of the lineage of the Báb, red a symbol of His Martyrdom, and this is adorned with the Greatest Name, one facing 'Akká and one on each of the four corners. A verse from the Holy Writings will be inscribed on each panel. The second crown is on top and a balustrade around it. The third crown will be the Dome on the drum, and this will be entirely golden.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said that there would be nine terraces to the German Colony and nine to the top of the mountain. Shoghi Effendi told us that 'Abdu'l-Bahá visualized ships carrying the kings of the earth, laying anchor at the port of Haifa, disembarking, proceeding bareheaded and barefooted, carrying garlands of flowers and flower baskets with precious stones, approaching the Threshold, laying down their crowns, prostrating themselves and sacrificing their crowns as offerings.

The drum of the Dome is now rising and the Shrine looks very, very beautiful. What a privilege it is to contribute to such an edifice, the like of which can be found nowhere in the whole world. When this precious Shrine is completed, this privilege will be gone. We cannot fully realize the great bounty that is ours to help.

There are many other things I would like to share but will save them for another time. This will just let you know that we think of you all very often and hope someday you will have the opportunity to come and visit the Bahá'í Holy Places.

Our beloved Guardian has made such a beautiful gardens around Bahjí — words would fail to describe their beauty.

With deepest love and best wishes for your teaching work everywhere. We are enjoying all the pilgrims, and wish you, too, could make us a visit

Devotedly, Jessie E. Revell

P.S. We know you remember our beloved Guardian and the Hands of the Cause in your prayers and we hope you will also remember the rest of us who have been called here to serve. (Special None) With love to all.

Jessie Revell

Letter Two: From Ms. Jessie Revell

Sent to Mr. George Gallinkin and friends in the United States

P.O. Box 155 Haifa, Israel October 8, 1954

Dearly loved friends, There are so many interruptions here that it is difficult to concentrate on letter-writing and as a result I have many unanswered letter, today would be my saintly Mother's birthday and I felt it is a very good day to try to answer, in a rather general way, my accumulated correspondence and share a few of the thoughts which the Beloved Guardian gave us at table last fall and winter.

Soon, no doubt, you will be reading the glorious message of the Guardian about the progress of the Faith in Africa and how very happy this has made him. Africa is an example of how we can make our guardian happy. The Cause is alive in Africa and it is an example to all. He has said the true lovers of the Cause must love the negroes; first, because they have suffered much, and the test is the reaction of the negroes, small things touch their hearts. It is the spirit that counts — something between God and the individual.

Shoghi Effendi has said the that story of Noah is reenacted now with Godlessness and materialism. Bahá'ís must be different from others not only in big things but in small things. This is the thing that attracts more than anything else — to find this demonstrated in the actions of the believers. Coupled with God's plan and with our efforts, Bahá'ís must distinguish themselves, because Bahá'ís have no ulterior motives. Sincerity and devotion will eliminate suspicion, distrust and sensitivity. We have a Plan and God has a plan and they are not in conflict. If we love God truly, we will love his children who are more down trodden. The sacrifice the Guardian speaks of is that we will serve the Faith at any cost.

Once he told us that if he has the right tools, then he can work — he said he cannot create, God creates, that in some mysterious way instruments are developed and he instinctively reacts as soon as he finds some tools that he can use. An artisan cannot create the tools but give him the tools and he will do the work. So much depends on personal effort. The spirit of self-sacrifice must permeate the masses not just the few. Bahá'ís must read the Writings and Prayers, acquaint themselves with the teachings then struggle with one's instincts, prejudices, environment. Take the text of the Writings into their own room, thoroughly study them, find out what is required, examine himself before God, digest the text then act. He said "I cannot create the spirit — I am the person who will direct those who arise." He said in some mysterious way the Cause triumphs. In referring to Bahá'u'lláh's words, he said that the Bahá'ís must disencumber themselves, be light as spirit, pure as air, unrestrained as the wind and blazing like fire.

The world Order of Bahá'u'lláh will embrace the whole of mankind — Bahá'u'lláh was sent by God in this age to bring about unity. His message is Divine in origin, God inspired, embracing the whole of mankind. Bahá'ís must have a high standard of conduct coupled with God's power which has come direct from God for this age. Ultimately the purpose of the Bahá'í Faith is a world civilization — the kingdom of god on earth. We must learn how to attract people, then confirm them so that they will arise and teach and serve.

It is wonderful how the army of Bahá'u'lláh is marching forward to conquer the hearts,. We pray for you all at the Holy Shrines.

With warmest Bahá'í love to you and to all from all of us here.

Larry Hautz in Haifa

Larry Hautz

April 1952

Larry had heard that in the Aqdas there was something about superfluous hair. He debated about shaving his own off, but then looked at the passport and saw it had a moustache on and thought it best to leave the moustache on. He had had a letter, months before from the Guardian saying he hoped he could visit Haifa soon. When Larry heard that it was possible to go to Haifa, he phoned Horace who said, “Yes” Larry asked what to do and Horace said he should write to the Guardian. What to wear, etc., was a question. Larry was told the Guardian would send him details. So he cabled the Guardian and back came the reply: ‘Welcome’. “He flew over and When he landed was greeted “Oriental Style” by Dr. Loftfullah. A little later he was told the Guardian would meet him. He saw the Guardian come toward him... a short man with a moustache just like his. And the Guardian greeted him “Oriental Style.” He said, “You are the first pilgrim — this is a great privilege and also a great responsibility.”

There was only Kosher meat in Israel 4t that time and not much of that. It order to eat meat, there must be other arrangements because if they ate the usual meat (Kosher) they would be classed as Jews.

The dining table is rectangular, and the Guardian sits to the right of the head, with Rúhíyyih Khanun on his right. The guest sits at the head for the first time, and the Guardian serves him. As the guest stays, he moves to the left, and the International Council chairman takes the head se-at, ar in his absence. the Vice-chairman.

Larry was at the table when Ugo Giacheryand Fred Schopfloch were made hands of the Cause. Even Rúhíyyih did not know about it beforehand. The Guardian lectured to Mr. Sehopfloch for 2 hours on the greatness of Canada, and the next day, two more hours. Then he said, “I know make you a Hand of the Cause.”

The Guardian has some rugs there that are priceless he referred to the Lost Great Prison as the Most Great Heaven.

Larry asked to which Intercontinental Conference he should go. The Guardian said, 'Delhi'.

Larry was to work with the lawyer about two covenant-breakers who were right there at the lawyer's office. Larry asked about counting, the 40 waves at 'Akká, if it were to be taken literally. The Guardian said it was to give an appreciation of 'Akká and to turn the Moslems from Mecca to 'Akká.

The Aqdas was revealed to the Persians and not us because It was necessary for them to demonstrate the differences between, Bahá'í and Islám such as marriage, time of burial etc.

When asked how many hands there would be the Guardian said, "Nine, nineteen, even ninety-five." Every Hand has a particular qualification.. In the future there 'will be institutional built around the Hands. There will for example, a Bahá'í historian (a. Hand) and all Bahá'ís working on history will Work around this Hand. There will be a Hand for Music.

The Guardian had to spend one day just answering cablegrams. He said he will have to resort to pilgrims to get messages back to the believers right now.

The Guardian said the American community has filed to make the proper impression to attract colored Bahá'ís. It would not be surprising if the Africans came to America to talk to people here.

Bahá'ís everywhere must remember the minority group or organization is the MOST important group. The American Indian is one of the most important minorities.

Needs: Pioneers with independent means

Send information on jobs for pioneers

Make friends of Africans here

Keep up the morale of pioneers — write letters to them.

The Shrine of 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be separate from the Shrine of the Báb in years to come.

Ignoring of the Faith, repression, emancipation, recognition are the stages in its development.

Both Houses of Congress in America have passed a bill listing us as an independent Faith. Diplomatic fair-mindedness is needed. The integrity of each Bahá'í must be known to all.

The peacock (of which the Guardian has four) is the Bird of Paradise.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Were it not for the activities of the Covenant-Breakers, kings would have made the pilgrimage during the lifetime of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

In the Qur'án it refers to the shores of 'Akká, in preparation of the heart of the individual. It is important to turn the people to 'Akká.

Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Make me happy and you will see what I can do."

The gardens are lighted for 3 hours some nights—very beautiful.

The Guardian told Larry to drive the Rabbání car without ever inquiring first of Larry whether or not he knew how to drive a car.

The long prayer and the medium obligatory prayers should be memorized to synchronize the action with the words. They can be said softly or loudly but must be audible. Re: short prayer; we should not be regulated by minimums, we should avail ourselves of this medium with God as often as possible.

It is possible for the pure of heart to make contact with the spiritual world, but they should not share or exploit it by interceding for others. It is an individual blessing.

Bahá'u'lláh didn't send a letter to America when he sent Letters to rulers and leaders. See the Commentary on the Súrah of Joseph: "O people of the West".

Bahá'u'lláh speaks of the American continent in the Aqdas. The "Spiritual Mission of America" 'spoken of in the writings means the mission of the American BAHÁ'Í community.

The purchase of land on Mt. Carmel's slope rose from 100 to 4 million dollars. One of the Covenant-breakers was paralyzed and he lived all these years on Mt. Carmel. The Guardian said that God permitted him to live in that condition so he could witness the growth of the Faith.

People who visit Haifa and 'Akká are transformed.

Reading for inquirers before becoming believers: Íqán, New Era, new copy of Some Answered Questions, Gleanings, Prayers & Meditations, Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh, God Passes By, Dawn breakers, Seven Valleys, Promised Day is come.

In God Passes By, the Báb addressing Sons of the Kings, warns the Sunis and Caliphate. God would chastise those who took up arms against Imám Ḥusayn.

The cypress tree (such as those where Bahá'u'lláh sat on Mt. Carmel) were a sign of immortality to the Greeks and Romans.

The altars in churches are a carry-over from Roman sacrificial altars. We must not use an altar.

The 12th Imám DIED as a child... he was not mysteriously taken away.

Rubiyiyih means spiritual ( 'Abdu'l-baha gave her this name). Rabbání means Divine.

We will have a united world, then interplanetary, then inter-stellar, and then spiritual worlds.

The Aḥmadiyyihs do not abrogate the Qur'án.

The Christians accept progressive revelation because they accept Adam, Noah, Moses, Christ. But they think Christ is the final Prophet.

The Aqdas will not be abrogated in 1,000 years. All divine religions have mysteries. But we should not allow, mystery to become superstition as in Catholicism. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, for instance, is a mystery. The Guardian (not 'Abdu'l-Bahá) is the successor to Bahá'u'lláh). The only news that really cheers the Guardian' is news of new LSA's.

The Lord's Prayer. No use to pray the Lord's prayer because it has already been fulfilled.

The whole world and even the enemies of the Jews will envy them because of their accomplishments in the holy Land.

We must not try to convert the Jews but tell them that every Bahá'í is a good Jew. Give them the prophecies in our writings about Israel. If the Bahá'ís work harder, we will still be able to alleviate much suffering. We must seize every opportunity and try to get it across to as many people as possible.

The Guardian is the least dictatorial, and doesn't use the power he has.

The Guardian was criticized for 20 years because some said he had forgotten the Divine Plan of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Now we have the Administration. In the next year we will do in 10 years what we have not been able to do in 100 years. The secret of success in Europe is the Divine Plan and Administration which has already been completed.

One believer told Bahá'u'lláh about someone who had heard of the Cause and Bahá'u'lláh was elated. When 'Abdu'l-Bahá heard about the spread of the Cause in some farther spot He was elated. The wealth of the Cause is the blessedness of each individual believers.

The doors of the Shrine of the Báb are named for the Hands.

The Hands are independent of Institutions. Eventually the Hands will play the preponderating role in world civilization. The Historian will surround himself with auxiliary institutions and they will write history of the world in a really historical way.

The pebbles from the Sea of Galilee are in the Shrine Gardens. These are from the spot where Christ told His disciples about His Mission.

The Guardian said that Rommel in the Holy Land was not tenable with the prophecies of the Bahá'í Faith.

Every Dispensation abrogates the laws of the former. The Aqdas abrogates the laws of the Qur'án.

Rúhíyyih asked the Guardian where something was. He said, "that is in the Archives, the third drawer, below something else." His memory is remarkable as there were thousands of things there.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that some people make the pilgrimage physically yet never attain it; and some who never go have attained it.

The government surveyor, looking over the Bahá’í Gardens said, “How many architects and landscapers did you have?” Larry said, “None. Just the Guardian.” “Impossible” said the surveyor, “No one man could do this.”

The cab drivers take the tourists to have the Bahá’í gardens because there is no request for money at the gardens as there is also many places in Israel.

They are neither Persian nor Gardens... they are Bahá’í Shrines.

Hertzel (of Zionism) who wanted to be buried on Mt. Carmel, was buried in Jerusalem, instead of Mt. Carmel.

Talk and Margret Ford

Madrid

30 November 1952

I am so honored to be here in Spain — the Spanish are considered heroic. All ask me: Will you go to Spain? This is the 14th country I have visited. I shall first speak of Haifa, then of 'Abdu'l-baha. Have you wondered how it would be to make the pilgrimage? When I heard I was to go, I had a real heart attack! It would be so wonderful to know the Guardian, but I would be honest with myself in considering him.

The Guardian lives at 10, Persian Street, Haifa.

A certain schedule is carried out. The Guardian sees the Oriental women with Rúhíyyih Khánum at 4:40pm. Then he leaves for the Shrine of the Báb, and walks with the Oriental men near the Tomb talking and praying. Then Dinner with the Western believers in the Western Pilgrim House.

The first day, Mason Remey, Leroy and Sylvia Ioas said be ready at 7, as the Guardian comes in promptly and quickly. The Hour arrived, and the maid went up and said that dinner was ready, and that the Guardian had arrived. Marian (Marian Little) and I looked at each other. We were both full of emotion but didn't want to show it. The Guardian met them and made them feel instantly at home. We forgot our nervousness and were happy. I thought: I'm going to look at the Guardian as a man. He is short — has hazel eyes — large, sort of light cafe au lait complexion with pinkish cheeks — long delicate fine nose — wears a black fez — white hair shows at the ears. He wears a long black coat — a white shirt and necktie — his hands are fine and delicate.

He began to speak. I never saw him as a man after that. The Guardian has the most extraordinary personality. He gives the impression of being a person completely normal and competent. He talks concisely and in staccatto. Such power, that one is lost in what he says.

He had only been back in Haifa for about 15 days — and he was more rested. You know how funny Marion is — she could make him laugh. He has a wonderful sense of humor. One is surrounded with his love which, like a mother with many children. One is aware that the Guardian is truly inspired. Only to see him, one knows that he is the Guardian of the Faith — Blessed of God.

Love and obedience (he has) of all the men and persons of Haifa.

It is not just faith, or blind love — it is born of the experience of witnessing his extraordinary capacity and wisdom. He is the most extraordinary person who walks on the earth today. All who see him are overcome by his presence.

Rúhiyyih Khánúm sits at his right (at the diner table). She is very beautiful. She dresses in modern style — lovely simple clothes. Shoghi Effendi... [missing]. She has the same interests as other women — she likes to keep house. She is charming — and then one becomes aware of the extraordinary adjustment she had made in her life. (Margaret knew her before she was married to the Guardian — knows her free and much travelled life, her tastes, etc.)

She said: "I have been married to the Guardian for 16 years. Do you think I know anything about the Station of the Guardian? No, there are such miracles to me that I bow in most profound humility before the man who is my husband." It is so moving to see them together. She is his helper. Very intelligent, but the most humble of his believers. This is a very great thing. This wonderfully beautiful woman who has adapted herself to such a rigorous life.

The Guardian eats with us, and the pilgrims ask questions and write the answers at the table if they wish. Marion and I did not want to ask many questions. He stays 2, or 2 1/2 hours. It is dynamic and wonderful to study the Faith with the Guardian. The first night he put before us the map upon which he has worked out the 10 year Plan. He showed all places where there are Bahá'ís. Where they will be, and what they will be doing! He talks with such positiveness that you know it will happen, and that this is the power of God in the world, while his finger indicates all this on the map...[in] Spain and Portugal there is much to do, and he knows that we shall do this.

We asked him: what is the significance of evil? And he answered: It is the absence of good. We must not allow ourselves to think negatively. WE MUST think only in the positive manner — and BE ACTIVE — then all negative living will be eliminated. We must not let ourselves dwell on the negative.

The Íqán is the most fundamental book after the AQDAS. We should memorize parts of it to teach people and to be able to quote it to non-believers. In it Bahá'u'lláh has given perfect answers. The TRINITY is true, but been misinterpreted by the Christians. Example: The Sun is God. The Ray is the Holy Spirit, and 3, the receiver of the Ray is the Prophet.

We spoke of America. America has great potentialities. It must be purged. The Americans are pure in heart, but this is not enough. We must have discipline. There will be great suffering in America, which will be purging. Then the Americans will lead all nations spiritually, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá said. Christ said: "The cure in heart will inherit the Kingdom." The Guardian said: "You are constructing the Administrative Order and helping the other nations."

It is the fashion not to like the Administration. But we can't blame the Guardian for this, as it is the Will of God. The Adm. Order must grow in the USA and then spread to other places. It is the cradle of materialism, but God raises them up — it is a sort of miracle. This is why the Americans have this work to do. So you will just have to endure us a while longer!

Bahá'u'lláh wrote that there would be great changes.

1. Oppression will sweep the world.
2. The Most Great Justice.
3. The Most Great Peace.

We must not fear the oppression. Whatever happens will lead to peace.

There are 8 periods of development in the Cause:

1. Obscurity.
2. Persecution. (the Persians had no obscurity — always has been persecution.)
3. Emancipation. (Egypt now has it, as the Govt. recognizes the Faith) The Americans will have it soon.)
4. Recognition
5. Establishment (not yet happened)
6. Proclamation (Bahá'í Faith will become the State Religion — as in time of Constantine)
7. Sovereignty
8. When it has become a world COMMONWEALTH — (a certain number of States having entered.)

HANDS

There were two Hands there all the time that Margaret and Marion were there. Mason Remey and Leroy Ioas. At breakfast there were all the Western Pilgrims and the Hands. We discussed the conversations of the Guardian of the day before. He said discipline for the USA — what did he mean?

MATURITY in the Administrative Order.

Personalities who have too much or some frustrations — they inject that personality into the functioning and this brings disunity. All this is a sign of infancy. This happens when we do not understand the Administration. The most important thing: to establish Unity correctly. It doesn't mean that one can't say what one wants to — they should express their opinions-but this should be done at the right time — and not talk about it later over the phone and in groups later. The Hands have great intelligence. It was an honor to hear them discuss discipline.

The duties of the Hands are, 1. Preservation of the Faith. 2. Propagation In the future there will be historians, investigators, saints, authors...they will be the elite of humanity. They must be competent — render actual service and be spiritual. The Germans will have many Hands-writers and investigators. The English — the organizers. America will have the saints and heroes.

Margaret asked: Haven't the Americans any brains?! Everyone laughed.

Each country has its special talent. This body of great people will carry forward the North American work. In the cable it says that in 1954 the Hands will set up auxiliary bodies on the five continents, they will make auxiliaries to help with the work. They will be like deputies of the Hands. They will represent the Hands — make teaching trips. This will be done in conjunction with the Administrative Order, in the future. In the future the administration, will only occupy itself with the affairs of State.

The most important thing today is pioneering.

In the next conference (Stockholm) we will know when and where to pioneer. How and when to go. This is the most important thing for the Bahá'ís ahead. It is the most important thing.

The days on which the Bahá'ís should give gifts etc — are Intercalary Days, and Naw-Rúz.

We should love the world.

When one is in Haifa, and goes to the Tomb of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh, it is permitted to go at any time and stay as long as one wants to. (Margaret told me that it is a too powerful experience — and that it is much better to go alone, and separate times or days, to each one. She saw the Tomb of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the same time — and it was too much for her to stand. Says that some people get hysterical, weep, and all that. It is better to take it a little at a time.) One can see Bahá'u'lláh's prison cell, and his house in 'Akká, where He wrote the Aqdas. Also the 3-4 rooms where He lived. The pilgrims can spend many moments of prayers and meditation in each room. One can also see the Archives — belongings of Bahá'u'lláh, and the Báb, and the Greatest Holy Leaf. A most precious experience is to see the picture of Bahá'u'lláh. (Marg. told me that there are three pictures. One is small and rather allegorical — but the likeness of Bahá'u'lláh is supposed to be good, and it is not so tragic as the photos, which are almost unbearable to look at. He is so agraviado.) Every night the pilgrims have dinner with the Guardian and feel his love and his wisdom.

When we left, a taxi was waiting for us. The Guardian came to say good-bye. He said "Are you sad? You must not be — the object of the pilgrimage is to get filled up spiritually, and then go out and WORK for the Faith.

By the third day in Haifa, there was only one thing that went around in my mind and that was: "The Lord is my Sheperd, I shall not want — etc." The Guardian — (Pastor Angelicus)

The Bahá'ís forget animosities. There is friendship between the Jews and the Arabian Bahá'ís. There are not very many there, but they lose the prejudices. A Bahá'í loses nationalistic loyalties which are not wise. The Nazis became Bahá'ís in Germany — and their prejudices left them —

April 21, 1952

The spirit of the Cause {{p1}} is not enough. We need the institutions. The institutions are the embodiment of the spirit of the Cause, the channel thru which the spirit flows. Any idea, any work .... of education, religion, social life .... will never be effective in the world unless it is translated into an institution: For example, education.... it will never have its influence felt upon society unless the idea of education is incarnated in an institution or college. So with everything else. An ideal must be translated into an institution; and the Bahá'í Faith, which is primarily a powerful spirit in the world, must be embodied in an institution, incorporate itself in an institution ... if it is to exert its power in the world. We must recognize the station of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb, and the Master, and at the same time recognize the necessity of institutions thru which the spirit of these three central figures is flowing .... guiding, preserving and promoting.

These institutions have not been established by us. They have been established by the Founder of the Faith Himself. That is why we are essentially different from the Christian Church. Because we have institutions and they have institutions ... we call it assembly, they call it church. If they say, "you are doing the same thing we are doing,” we say, “yours was man-made, ours is divinely appointed.” Not established by the Master in the Will, nor announced by the Báb; but provided for and established by Bahá’u’lláh in the Most Holy Book.... the Book of Laws. This is the fundamental difference between our institutions and the institutions belonging to all other religions. They are essentially man-made. Ours are divinely appointed. But always remember these are a means to an end. We have to utilize these institutions for a purpose. Our purpose is to carry out the Divine Plan of the Master.

We had to wait ever since the Master revealed these tablets. 1915, 1916, 1917 .... twenty years, until the administrative order was sufficiently established and beginning to function in order to utilize them for this purpose. The Master gave instructions to the American Believers to establish the Cause throughout the world.... the Divine Plan ... a few years before He passed away. In those days we didn’t have the means. A few individuals were working. Martha Root started on her travels, Mr. and Mrs. Dunn went from Calif. to Australia; you and Imogene went to Italy, but all on an individual basis.... not organized, not systematic, not continuous; more or less spasmodic, purely on an individual basis. It was not directed towards an definite plan .. so unlike the present plans the Bahá’ís have formulated throughout the world.... different plans... National Assemblies have each their own plan.

When the Master passed away, the first thing we did was establish the Administrative Order, establish local assemblies, national assemblies. He saw the House of Justice would be established eventually.

Then we started along and laborious task of raising the structure of the Administrative Order. It took us two decades ... twenty years to do that. As the work progressed some of the Bahá’ís began to wonder whether that was going to be the sole concern of the Bahá’ís... to establish these institutions. Some began to doubt, some to criticize. Ahmad Sohrab entirely misunderstood our purpose, for the simple reason that I asked the Bahá’ís to think of nothing else but building these institutions that were to be the means in our hands to achieve a purpose later on. It took us twenty years to establish two stages of this administrative order ....local and national assemblies. When the local and national assemblies were established and were beginning to function, then I directed the attention of the Bahá’ís to the purpose for which these institutions had been created and were being perfected. For two decades ... and then the Divine Plan of the Master. The first part in the plan, the Americas... Latin America, So. America, Canada. The second stage in Europe (then I think he said... both Latin America to achieve what was established, and then in Europe). Now we have started in Africa. That is why the Cause is progressing so rapidly. In Switzerland, as you know, Mrs. Lynch worked, and labored for years.... not on a sound basis, not organized. {{p12}} It could not be, the time was not ripe. The same thing in Denmark (?) Worked fifty years in England, but as soon as local assemblies were formed, National assemblies were formed ... then they began to formulate their own plans. All the attention of the British believers was concentrated on their plan. Then it began to progress. It took 50 years to establish two assemblies.. but in five years they established 19 assemblies... not only in England, but in Scotland, Wales and Ireland.

Representatives from France will attend the Stockholm Conference. At that conference they will consider ways of spreading the Cause in the remaining countries of Europe and the Islands. (then, I think he said.... Germany, Persia and ten goal countries will collaborate in arranging a campaign in Russia.)

Two fundamental reasons why the Cause is progressing: 1. establishment of institutions being used for that purpose. We have fashioned the instrument, we have erected the instrument. 2. We are utilizing these instruments for a definite purpose which is the Divine Plan revealed by the Master. It is the power behind that plan, the potency of that plan and the instrument we are using.

In the early days the Cause did not progress rapidly, because we had no instruments, nor had we any definite plan to carry out the instructions of the Master, Lsa's. Nat'l. Assemblies, schools....Ahmad Sohrab made a great mistake. He saw us fashioning instruments and he thought we considered that a means in itself. He misunderstood our purpose. Now he is beginning to realize our purpose was to perfect the instrument, in order to use it for a definite purpose.

Love of the Master is not enough. We must have deep FAITH. Three things we must remember ...Faith, the Covenant, the Administration. The Covenant is the child of the Faith. The Administrative order is the child of the covenant.

We have to explain the Center of the Faith is a mystery. We must admit the Master is a mystery... Bahá'u'lláh called him "The Mystery of God", we must never hope to unravel that mystery. We admit he is a mystery. The mystery is that he is not a Prophet, we cannot claim for him the station of a Prophet. (Then I think he said, "The Prophet is pre-existent"). The Master has the quality of perfection, but he is not a prophet of God. The Master's station is between Prophet and Guardians. God, Holy Spirit, Prophet and Successor. God (Father), Prophet (Son), Apostles and Holy Spirit. Alláh (Prophet) Messenger of God, Imáms. God, Bahá'u'lláh, Guardians. but in addition we have something which other religions do not possess... Institutions of Center of Covenant. He stands between Prophet and Guardians. Mystery because he shares not in nature of the Manifestation? perfect but not divine... that is why... a MYSTERY... 'Abdu'l-Bahá all knowing, but not a Prophet of God.

What is really new in the Bahá'í Faith is its teachings. These are unique. If they ask us which, we say, "The Unity of Mankind"... Absolutely NEW. Nothing like it in the teachings of previous religions. We must explain the unity of Mankind. There is a passage in the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In previous religions it was not possible to teach such a thing because the world was not ready on a world scale. The Prophets of God in the past stressed amity, concord, but They did not stress the idea of the unity of mankind. They never said the world was ripe to be organized and unified.... but the world has reached that stage now. God has sent, because of the condition of mankind, Bahá'u'lláh, with this particular teaching.

The Pope of Buddhism is in the capitol of Tibet. Daniel speaks of something to happen in 100 years after the Flight of Muḥammad.... he could have based his calculations on the Jewish calendar. Three years difference every century, 112 days every year, between solar and lunar time. 1963 is the year for the spread of the Faith all over the world ... not the Most Great Peace. One hundred years from the Declaration of Bahá'u'lláh in Riḍván. One hundred lunar years will have elapsed, etc. regarding date 1335 mentioned in the Bible.

Excerpts from

Excerpt

from

Nura Mobine

1952

Excerpts from Nura Mobine, just returned from Haifa. This letter was sent to Elinor and Bob Wolff, our pioneers in South America, who are sharing it with us. They sent the excerpt to Iris Fresco, with the hope that the friends would receive inspiration, as they, the Wolffs had done.

“We arrived there 6 in the afternoon, and stayed in eastern pilgrim house, which was very beautiful, and surrounded with oriental love and hospitality. Our host was Dr. Luṭfu’lláh, who is an angel. This man is a being simple of love and devotion toward our Beloved Guardian and the true servant of His Holyness Bahá’u’llah.

Half an hour after we arrived, Manuver, (the gardner) came and said:

The Beloved is here. There was no time to think of anything, Núrí run out to the living room and I followed him. He kissed Núrí and I said “Alláh-u-Abhá. He showed us the chair and then I heard a voice that never before my life I have heard anything like it, as if this melodious voice was coming from another world, world of love, beauty and perfection. He asked how was our trip; then he told us how hard it was during the time of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh Por pilgrims to come from Írán, and just have a look at Him through the windows at the prison from a distance.

By the time I pulled myself together and looked at Him, in order to paint this picture in the inner side of my heart and treasure it there for ever after. He is small, but so handsome, His hands are so beautiful and graceful. His eyes are the source of light, love and life. He told us how important the Shrine of the Báb is. He said this is the only place which is blessed by the two Manifestations. As you remember, it was near this place that His Holiness Bahá’u’llah was sitting and has chosen the very spot for the Shrine of the Báb. And now the Body of the Báb is resting there for ever after.

The Shrine is a place of art, it is white and with a green ribbon around her neck, and a crown of gold, just like a bride when I told to our Beloved Guardian how beautiful that building is, specially with the——? of lighting her at night. He said “Yes, I call her the Queen of Carmel.” You should see Him how happy and proud He is at this shrine.

We were very lucky because during our pilgrimage He was always smiling because of people like you, who have risen and already man this glory and beauty. It is worth to give all we possess for just a smile at Him, because that came from the very being of His inner life, as if His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh is smiling. He said pioneers both save themselves and the Faith, He said never before anything such as this has happened in the world. And He is so delighted with the ones that are in their post. God bless you people who are the cause of His joy.

He said pioneers should be clean and just like the air, and passes by like the breeze. There is a lot in this sentence. The calamity or whatever God we may call it is for sure, but He said believers should not be scared; they should live under Bahá'í administration and be steadfast and detached. He emphasized so much for administration. He said both spirituality and administration should be together. He said it's because of His unique pattern that after passing at the Beloved Master we did not have any deviation.

As you know, He is always many years ahead of us, today he sees the glory of the world of tomorrow, therefore He is happy; He is the only human being that really and truly cares about God's Creation.

He not only loves the Bahá'ís, He just the same loves other people and it is because of them that He wants us scatter and share our precious jewel with the rest of humanity, what a Man and what a love. One day I asked Him when the house of Justice would be established, He said after we establish 50 more NSA plus the 12 that we already have, He said the international house of Justice is like the Dome of a building, it comes at the end.

Now you see why He wants us to scatter. He told us one day that the LSA are called the little houses of justice, not house of mercy or forgiveness but justice. He said these institutions should act upon justice alone; never should look to the rank of importance of the people.

I must tell you that He Himself is a sample of justice, to me His Justice is greatest way of love, a higher degree. His love for His Holiness Bahá'u'llah and the Báb is unbelievable. He lives for them, He wants believers concentrate on them.

This again is so just; never He say a thing that will show he has done something, either it is Bahá'u'llah or the Báb, or the believers have done it. How great a person is He, this again is the degree of His love for the source. He is a living picture of humbleness toward His Beloved.

When He is talking He fills you up with the things that are lack of it you; this you notice later on.

Now a few words about our shrines and Holy places in Haifa and 'Akká. I must tell you that these things make a pilgrimage complete just being at the presence of our Beloved Guardian, then visiting the Shrines and the Holy places; and finally being with the Amatu-1-Bahá, Rúhíyih Khánum.

We have so many lovely places to visit, imagine to be in the same room that the Glory of God has lived, and everything in the room is just as it has been before, one cannot help feeling so sma and nothing. These places are so powerful that it is very hard sometimes to take it.

But most of the time it gives you a real picture of our history, and brings you closer to the reality, and finally to your duty. The sense of responsibility never again leaves you alone; one can not sit quiet after visiting these places. Sometimes you feel as it His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh or the Master have just gone outside and will be back soon.

Among the objects that we saw in our Archives, first was the picture of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, which is the highlights of a pilgrim's time. That picture is realistic; from His eyes you can feel power, glory, love, pity and finally you feel as the world is actually in those eyes, that is a picture that one-never- never one will let it go out of his life, if that happens to me I will be lost. In that picture He has long hair, long beard He is sitting in a chair, His lovely hands are resting in the arm of the chair. Another thing is the bloody shirt or the Báb after they took Him away from the trench. Another thing and the picture of the Báb, so young handsome and yet so innocent, all gives you one resolution and that is to be His servant for ever after.

One day I asked for Beloved Guardian, how would it be if I go to my way back to South America. He said it is fine, and He told to give all them message to the believers down there. Unfortunately on my way back I could not do it. But now I am planning in a few months to there and maybe, be able to do a little in the work of Bahá'u'llah.

P.S. Please write & tell as many people as you can about the importance of the Bahá'í Administration, of Cause to believers. This is a pillar on which the Faith is built upon it. Just to give you good news, for first time, in history of the Faith women in Írán can be elected in the Assemblies, I am waiting for the news. At the convention the hands will appoint the fingers what I mean is the board of nine, I will let you know when they are appointed.

ONE PERSON'S SEARCH FOR A BETTER WORLD.

Ted Cardell

1952

At the age of 74 it seems appropriate to look back on all those years and try to find how it came about that one who was born on a farm in England, has lived in four countries and visited over 50 others, is now married and is living in a small town in the far west of America. We have four children, all happily married to non ♦ English partners. So far there are 3 grandchildren.

When I was young, the British Empire was at its height and thanks to many intrepid Englishmen in past centuries, ~ possessed colonies all over the world. Yet life had changed so much, that few Englishmen had ever been outside the shores of England and we rarely saw the face of a foreigner let alone a black one. The Empire was resting on its laurels, but unknown to anyone then, the Empire had come to an end and the whole planet was on the brink of the biggest and most terrible war ever known.

My brother, sister and I had a very happy, though protected childhood. We grew up on a mixed farm in the middle of England, ~4 t the ages of 24 & 23 Philip and I, in our summer evenings started to learn flying r F~e ~r~ at a nearby airdrome. Quite suddenly, it seemed, world war two was upon us. We were both very excited at the prospect of flying Spitfires in defense of our country. Philip, who had put in more time flying than I, was drawn into a rushed program to train spitfire pilots, while I was left driving a tractor on the farm: a most unjust situation I thought, because he was born to farm while I had a great interest in flying. I pondered deeply on this and found no answer.

Soon Philip was flying in the ♦ Battle of Britain ♦ defending our shores against the hordes of German bombers. When on leave, he would tell us some of his adventures. Unknown to the Germans, we had invented radar and this told us when the enemy was taking off on a raid. Our Spitfires had ~ 10 time to take off and lay in wait high above in large numbers. They would then dive on the bombers out of the sun and destroy them. As a safety measure, they would keep on diving until well out ~ the way. In other engagements many planes were lost on both sides, but the invasion of England by Germany was stopped for good. However, Philip was lost in the battle. With his plane damaged, he bailed out, but fell into the sea before his parachute had time to open. This was a great shock to all of us.

Now I was the sole remaining male to carry on the family name. We did not know of any other males in the Cardell families, though years later we did discover other branches in Cornwall, where my father ♦'s family came from.

We had all been raised as Methodists and went to chapel every Sunday. The Bible had become a great treasure to me, but I could not relate it to modern life except in matters of personal behavior. What, I wondered, is the future of the world? How does nature come into God ♦'s overall plan? Was it just window ♦ dressing for us to enjoy? In philosophising about it ♦ Philip had given his life that all kinds of freedom would remain, a most worthy cause, but this had happened unnumbered times throughout history. I asked myself, ♦ Would there always be wars on earth? ♦ Years later a large stained ♦ glass window was put into Westminster Abbey, London, to commemorate the ♦ Battle of Britain ♦ heroes; all their names were listed, including Philip. Later a school in Rhodesia was named after him. A book ♦ The Last Enemy ♦ by Richard Hilary, also a Spitfire pilot and who later perished, told memories of Philip and others. My parents were deeply appreciative, but it could not bring back their son, and all the other sons who had been sacrificed to the perfidy of mankind through the ages.

The war went on fiercer than ever. There was no shortage of young men volunteering to fly Spitfires, but farming was upgraded in importance, for submarines were sinking food ships from America at the rate of 10 to 20 a week. So I was put on the RAF reserve indefinitely and told to produce food, because it was as vital a necessity as fighting. This reasoning did not satisfy me. After a year I applied for active duty, but was refused.

Back on the farm we were busy digging 80 acres of potatoes and it was my job to supervise 40 German prisoners picking up after the digger.{{p3}}

When we recaptured North Africa there were 40 Italian prisoners in addition to supervise. This might seem a difficult job, but not so, even though the German and the Italians had to be kept separate for fear of friction between them. The Germans were angry at the Italians for losing their battles so easily and the Italians resented the Germans. But neither was keen to go back into the shooting war and most of them showed a strong preference for potato picking! For this reason, few guards were needed. Two English soldiers guarded each batch, but they had no bullets for the rifles on their shoulders. Prisoners who volunteered to work on farms were paid very little, so I asked them what I could do to make it worth their while to put in a good day's work. They suggested a pack of cigarettes and half a loaf of bread each per day. I went off to town to get these. My father, who had put me in charge, came and found no one supervising, but all the prisoners working well. He was very surprised until I returned with a car load of bread and cigarettes and explained. Such incidents encouraged him to put more trust in my sometimes crazy ideas.

The work proceeded well but one day a German bomber appeared low over the farm, with three Spitfires in hot pursuit. The unequal battle ended quickly with the German crew bailing out as their plane dived into the ground. It must have been a humiliating experience for the prisoners, but I carefully refrained from discussing it with them. Later we heard that one wounded German airman was given a blood transfusion while he was unconscious; when he woke up and found that he had been given Jewish blood, he tried to commit suicide. We were amazed at such prejudice. In spite of all this, we became quite friendly with all the prisoners. After the war, six of the Italians stayed with us and worked on the farm for years. They all lived together in a farm cottage, did their own cooking and became happily integrated with the villagers. Some even married local girls.

Another incident was more humorous. On a day of deep English fog the Germans thought it a good idea to raid the power station near us. They actually navigated quite well and came out of the fog just near their target but too suddenly to drop the bomb. Our army gunners who had been camped on the roof of the generator house for many days, for just such an event, had felt that a foggy day was a good time{{p4}} to clean their gun and had it dismantled. Not a shot was fired by either side. The plane never reappeared and everyone had a quiet day and a long chuckle. A more sinister aspect of the war was to wake up in the middle of the night as a German flying bomb passed overhead. If the engine stopped, we knew it was for us. These machines were pilotless and timed to run out of fuel over some town and thus were not accurate, but they held quite a psychological impact. They travelled faster than the spitfires, so they were hard to shoot down, even in day time. However our pilots soon learned to wait for them high above the English channel. This gave them a chance to gain speed by diving. Thus they could catch up and destroy them. But it was very dangerous if they exploded, so the pilots learned to fly alongside the bomb and give its wing a lift with their own wing tip. Since it had no aileron control, it could not compensate for such a move and would spiral into the sea.

Later on the V2 rockets pounded London with impunity. At a descent speed of over 4,000 m.p.h. they exceeded the speed of sound, so the victims never knew what hit them. Again a high psychological impact on everyone. London was only 50 miles away from the farm so we could often see the searchlights weaving the sky looking for raiders. Tiny fireflies of light all over the sky were anti ✦ aircraft shells bursting.

Soon our factories were producing many heavy bombers and the tables were turned. Eventually we were able to send fleets of over 1,000 bombers out in one night to attack the German cities. Many new airdromes were built, one next to our farm. Most evenings lots of these heavy bombers took off low over our village. The ever ✦ present danger of engine failure on take off with a load of bombs was accepted by the villagers as the price to pay for freedom. One night a fully loaded bomber faltered on take off and skidded to a halt in the middle of our bean field. It did not explode, but onlookers said that the crew beat all records getting out and running for cover. Another evening a bomber hit a row of trees on take off and crashed in pieces between the houses. All the crew were killed and floods of burning fuel swept into the chicken houses, but the bombs did not explode, so the village was spared. {{p5}}

A happier side of the war was that the crew members of both the British night ✦ bombers and of the American day ✦ bombers began to accept our open invitation to use the farm house and garden as a place to relax and play tennis. Our family always had strawberries and clotted cream in the summer and my Mother produced an endless supply of these to all the visitors. This was a totally new experience for the Americans and one which delighted them. It also required a lot of sugar which a special American friend was rationed due to the war. One day he brought us a 10 pound bag of sugar taken from the American mess when the cook was not looking. My mother ordered him to take it back, but he maintained it was only justice in view of all the sugar she had given the visitors on their strawberries. When Ben added that he might get caught taking it back, mother gave in. Ben was a special friend; though only a corporal, he mixed naturally with the officers in our garden. One day he turned up with two big black eyes and a rueful grin. He had been out to a dance the night before and was cycling back as fast as he could to beat the closing of the camp gates. The rain, the dark and a few drinks all added up to him running broadside into a cow. He was knocked unconscious and woke up in hospital. He lost his stripes for being late back in camp. Ten years after the war Ben revisited us and brought his son with him. It was a most poignant event.

An intriguing experience for us was to hear how, outside the military environment on our farm, all American ranks treated each other as equals; a custom very different from the English who kept their ranks at all times. We soon came to enjoy it and one day Ben was playing tennis opposite a Colonel and gave him a sizzling drive he could not reach. Ben delightedly shouted: ♦Get on your bicycle Colonel! ♦

Often in the early mornings we would see 50 or more flying fortresses circling in the sky as they gathered into a tight formation before setting out on for Germany. The tight formation gave them a big advantage over the attacking German fighters who had to face the combined firepower of many planes when they attacked. Looking back now, I can of the circling armada of plane still see in my mind the rising sun lighting up the contrails-while the earth below was still in shadow. But it was also a chilling reminder that we were at war and some of them would never come back.{{p6}}

With both our own RAF and the American crews, from time to time, well loved faces would be absent from our garden gatherings when they had crashed or been taken prisoners. Their companions would bring us the news and we would grieve deeply with them. My own sister, Margaret was much in love with a bomber pilot, Ty Nelson, who often visited us. One day he never came back. We were dimly aware that there must be families in Germany who were also grieving much over the loss of loved ones. On one occasion a night bomber was forced to return to base because a flare it was to drop and illuminate the target, had got stuck in the mechanism. As the plane came in to land at its home base~ ~he flare, which was set to go off at a low altitude, ignited and the plane crashed.

At about this time I joined a hockey team with both male and female members. We toured the area and often played mixed teams at airdromes. One day we were playing on the pitch at the end of a runway as a damaged bomber came in to land with only one wheel. We held our breath, spellbound as the plane touched down, lurched over to one side and skidded a long way before coming to a halt. It did not catch fire, and no one was hurt.

On another occasion one of our night ✦ bombers was damaged over Germany but managed to limp to neutral territory in north Africa. They repaired it and flew home a week later. They arrived back at our drome just as a high ranking officer was cracking down hard on all crews because they often celebrated their return by flying low over the buildings ✦ there had been some bad accidents. In the middle of the lecture the whole building shook with a giant vibration as our heroes swooped low over the building. The irate officer suspended the whole crew. The pilot was later transferred to towing air targets for other planes to shoot at.

About this time the Government created the ✦ Home Guard; ✦ an unpaid army composed of civilians. We were issued with uniforms and light arms and learned how to harass a German invasion with road ✦ blocks and tank traps. Hitler had boasted that he would invade England and make it into a satellite state. I well remember Churchill announcing fiercely over the TV, ✦ We will fight on the beaches, we will fight in the streets and in the towns house by house. We will never give in. ✦ {{p7}}

As good as his word, he gave the civilians the means to add their bit to a bitter last stand in defense of their country. We used to train on Sunday mornings and I had to make a conscious choice between going to Methodist church and attending Home guard practice. I chose the latter because I felt it was time for action.

Soon I was commanding officer in charge of 25 men too old, too decrepit or too young to serve in the army. Looking back it is clear that we would have had little chance of stopping an invader equipped with far greater fire ✦ power, but we might just have been able to delay them a little till our own army arrived. It was a tremendous moral builder and we had lots of fun too. One night I sent two patrols out on the same circuit, but unknown to each other, in opposite directions so they would meet in the dark. Fortunately, all ammunition was locked away, but they certainly learned how to act in unforeseen circumstances. Later that evening they retaliated by hiding my motorbike.

Another day the Home Guard of our neighbouring village were having practice grenade throwing from a trench. The first man was told by the instructor, how to pull the pin, throw and duck. He pulled the pin out and reached back, only to knock his hand on the box of live grenades. ♦ His now live one with seven seconds to go, fell into the, ox. ♦ What am I going to do now? ♦ he asked the instructor. ♦ Get the hell out of here! ♦ Shouted the instructor. They both dived out of the trench as the whole box of grenades exploded.

Civilians were not allowed on the airdromes, nor in the planes, but now I had a uniform and it was easy for my RAF friends to take me on unauthorised trips in their planes. I was smuggled aboard a Halifax bomber and we took off on a practice bombing trip. They dropped all their smoke bombs but one, which they left for me. I was told how to direct then the pilot while aiming through the bomb ♦ sight, and press the button. I thought I had done everything just right but no one ever saw where my bomb landed. On another occasion I flew in the latest mosquito bomber. It was so fast on the turns that I lost my breakfast and had to pay the -round crew to clean up the plane afterwards!{{p8a}}.

Ted ♦s biography (insert in middle of page 8.)

World War II must have caused millions of people to think more deeply about the meaning of life on earth and why all this chaos mingled with much joy. What could be the nature of some eternal plan into which all this apparent contradiction would fit? In the relative quiet years after the war, life was pleasant on the farm and Father gave me a lot of freedom to choose what work to do each day during the winter time I had plenty of free time to go for long walks and meditate about the mysteries of life. All the new people I had met because of the war had opened up a lot of new avenues to explore. I tried to examine my own mind and to identify and control my own thoughts. I remember vividly how, one day, as I was wading through the snow on the farm road and meditating on these matters, that I suddenly realised that my own thoughts govern what I do and think. ♦ I am what I think! ♦ I could choose what to think about, and look for new meanings and values.

Soon, however, I found that this very freedom was heavily influenced by conditioning inherited from traditions and experiences from the past. Every new thought had to be expressed by words with old connections and ideas. And with them came all the familiar emotions which seemed to determine~ my actions. There had to be more to it than this. In the days that followed I gradually learned to watch my thinking and tried to break out of the inherited pattern. Soon I discovered that when I became detached and relaxed, new creative ideas would surface, ideas which were not dictated by the past. This often led to a whole different view of any problem and gave me the power to try something quite new. This was particularly so in relation to religion, for this seemed to wield enormous influence on mankind and also to open constant new vistas. I used to study the Bible at times and one day, struck by the glorious vision it gave me, I said to myself ♦ ♦ This book is surely the most important thing in existence! For the rest of my life I will read a verse from it every morning for it will surely make a big change in me.

{{p8}}

During the summer, large groups of city workers came to help on the farm. These people, for the most part, had never worked on a farm and for them it was a novel change from office work. Conversation with them also brought a new dimension to my own life. One introduced me to reading about spiritualism and other ideas. Over the following two years I delved into many cults and religions and collected a library of over 200 books on those subjects. This broadened my outlook far beyond the current Christian beliefs and no doubt drew me closer to a more universal view of life.

In 1945 the war finally ended and everyone tried to get back to a normal sane life again. The Home Guard was disbanded and told to hand in all its equipment. Before complying, I determined to use a few grenades for a useful purpose. I took them down to the river, pulled the pins and threw them in. Masses of stunned fish rose to the surface for me to collect. I left the little ones; they recovered and swam away. A good day ♦ s fishing I thought to myself. I wonder if there is a way to commercialise on the idea?

I continued farming under my father for a few more happy years. My parents were deeply thankful that the war had not taken both their sons, as had happened in some cases. One family had lost all four sons. The response of the parents was to donate ♦ 20,000 for a new bomber to the RAF. They asked only that it be named after their family with the words: ♦ Roberts Reply. ♦ ~yes~ ~

Now the process of my spiritual awakening brought about a big change. Though bored with farming, I was happy at home, but all the big world was out there becoming to me. At the age of 29, just before harvest, I came to my parents, thanked them for all they had done for me -and announced that I was sailing for Canada next week. They were amazed and my father said: ♦But you need to learn farming so that you can take over when I go!♦ I said: ♦Yes, I know you are right, but I have to go.♦ I told them I did not want to become a farmer and gave them my permission to sell the farm when they wished. What would have been my thoughts if I had been told that 25 years later I would come back with a wonderful wife, take over the farm and raise our four children there? My surprise would have been even greater if I were to know that I would soon find{{p9}} the answer to my quest for the meaning of life and also become a professional photographer.

I sold my motor ♦ bike for ♦45, ($200 then) just enough to buy my ticket to Canada on the Queen Mary. Landing in Canada, everything about me was totally strange and exciting ♦ the roll and squeak of the much larger than English trains; the money, the customs, the language and even the birds. I stayed a while in Toronto, the capital, where I applied to the employment department for work of any kind. I was given a cheap ticket to Winnipeg to work on a remote farm in the far north. The owner had only one tractor, but would not let me drive it for fear I might break something. My assurance that my father had 15 tractors & I drove them all had not effect, but I enjoyed the other work.

The first Sunday he invited me to go to his Pentecostal church. Sitting in the front row, I was the main target of the fiery preacher who, every now and then would pause and looking sternly at me saying: ♦All those who want to be save, stand up!♦ This did not move me in the least. Later I asked why such a small village needed two churches and was told people wanted freedom to follow religion their own way. This reminded me of a story I had heard where a stranger came into a small village and found three churches at one cross ♦ roads. On asking why, he was told that there used to be one, and it was called; ♦The Church of God.♦ But they got to arguing about the Bible meanings and so, to be civilised, and to stop the argument, one group built the second church. They called it: ♦The Only Church of God.♦ Some time later there was more argument and by the same process a third church was built. It was named: ♦The One and Only Church of God.♦!

harvest finished and winter approached, I was told that we could expect up to 40 degrees below freezing. I returned to Winnipeg and found a job in a wholesale warehouse. When the snow came it was 12 inches thick and did not melt, like in England. It stayed thick and pure white t at all winter. I had to wear ear muffs and watch,~ my nose did not get frostbitten :In the warehouse, I helped unload big trucks of food. One day, since there were no trucks, I sat down. The foreman said: ♦Don♦t let the owner see you doing that.♦ I replied: ♦But there are no trucks!♦. ♦Never mind, do something.♦ I took a brush and swept the entire{{p10}} warehouse. The foreman was amazed.

At lunch time one day, I was browsing in a bookshop across the snowpacked street. I asked the clerk if she knew of any interesting religious groups in town. She said: ♦Well I used to live in an apartment where there were Bahá♦is; I don♦ t know anything about them except that they believe all religions are one.♦ She gave me a phone number and because it caught my imagination I rang up. The person who answered was Ross Woodman. ♦What is Bahá♦i?♦ I asked. He suggested we meet for lunch next day. There he briefly described a picture I had never thought to hear. A new Prophet had appeared in Írán and He had declared all religions to be really one! I said to Ross: ♦Well then, you think that Muḥammad was the return of Christ?♦ ♦Yes♦ he said: ♦but we must think rather of the return of the Holy Spirit, which speaks through each Prophet.♦ I wanted to know much more, but there was no time. I told him I was looking for a better lodging and he said that there was an empty room in his apartment building.

That whole winter I lived in a room on the same floor as Ross and we had many discussions. My life then was also mixed with the strenuous one of learning to ski. Every Sunday I joined a train ♦ loaded with 300 skiers and spent the day in the hills 100 miles away. The train ~ ould back into a siding and provide a warm resting place when needed and also a hot lunch. I started to learn on the simple slopes, but later found that on a steep slope my body would react automatically in the correct way; this would save me wasting a lot of time learning by the slow method. This was dangerous, of course, and it did not escape my notice that each Sunday about 6 people with broken or sprained limbs were brought back to the train on sledges. However, this was an exciting experience I did not intend to miss. Either the zest of youth or some guardian angel must have protected me. I well remember, one Sunday I decided to ski a slope labelled: ♦ For experts only. ♦ I joined the waiting line and as I came to the head of the queue, found myself looking down what seemed to be nearly a straight drop of 300 ft. What was worse, as I pushed off, one foot caught in the snow. By a super ♦ human effort I forced it back onto the track just as the world began to rush past me at an incredible speed. The guardian angel must have been right alongside as I dropped almost like a stone. As I (we) reached the bottom,{{p11}} the sudden change from the near vertical descent to a horizontal direction collapsed both my lens and I shot out of the ski run. an undignified heap travelling at high 5- 1 much to the astonishment of a crowd of onlookers who had come there to see perfect skill. It was clear to me that for the present, I had identified my level of skiing -b ~ y while. and did not need to do that run again for quite a

Each Sunday evening, after returning from skiing, I would attend a discussion in Ross ♦'s room where a lot of young people regularly gathered to hear him talk each week about a different world religion. Ross was the youngest professor in the university and had a captivating way of teaching the English classes there. Many of his students came eagerly to his firesides. For most of them it must have been the first time they had seen a real connecting thread between all the religions of the world. When the course finished, he invited outside speakers from different religious movements to tell us about their beliefs. None of them seemed to make much impression on the students; and when the Jehovah Witness spoke, the students found him prejudiced and illogical.

I bought some Bahá ♦i books and began to study them seriously. I found a subtle beauty in the language in these; it attracted me greatly, even though there was much I could not understand.

About this time I was introduced to another Bahá ♦i, Henry Provisor; many years ago he had whole ♦ heartedly accepted the Bahá ♦i Prophet, Bahá ♦u ♦llah as the reappearance of the Holy Spirit. This meant That he a Jew, had also accepted Christ I was impressed. Henry was a professional photographer and was about to start giving a 13 week, one night a week, course for beginners. My friend, Ken Mac Laren and I eagerly enlisted. Henry did not confine himself to the technical side but emphasised creativity. He would say to us such things as: ♦ Don♦t copy others, look around you at the world; if you see something interesting, you are a normal human being, take it! ♦ Sometimes he would take us all out in the snow at night, carrying tripods, so that we could learn time ♦ exposures and also see the beauty of the lights on the snow. Many days I used to trudge alone through the snow along the river bank and into the woods, carrying a large {{p12}} camera I had bought. I submitted some snow pictures to the local newspaper in Winnipeg. To my amazement, they bought them all and started putting one on the editorial page each day. Henry ~ ♦ as very pleased but surprised. He said they usually never bought more than one picture from each photographer. Maybe everyone else had given up taking snow pictures! I felt most of the credit for this success was due to Henry♦s insistence that we all continually look around us for new and interesting things; I was learning a spiritual principle, as well as a photographic one.

One day Ross brought me an invitation from the local Bahá♦is to attend their Feast. One of their special meetings. I was to find it very intriguing. I h~li mus~ nav~ ~orl~lcier~d me aimos[ a Bahá♦i, but I did not think of myself in that way. I even said to Ross one day: ♦How did the Bahá♦is get all this spiritual knowledge without going into spiritualism?♦ To which he replied: ♦How did you get it without being a Bahá♦i?♦

My regular reading of Bahá♦i Scripture continued. ( Unknown to me then, it was to continue for the rest of my life.) I felt it was leading me into a whole new way of life, and though often obscure, I could not put it aside. One day I was sitting alone in a cafe, drinking coffee and running over the idea that all the Prophets of God represent a continuing theme of spiritual unfoldment for mankind. It was very logical to me that God would send a series of Prophets through the ages, but that alone did not seem enough to show me that Bahá♦u♦llah is the Voice of God for this age. I went through all I knew once more and again found myself unable to ~o further.

For some years I had felt the world was in a state of great change, such as was prophesied in the Bible, and hence it would be logical for Christ to return; ♦but what form would that take?♦ I asked myself. I went through my logic once again and suddenly felt that I had to use some other part of myself as well as my mind. Then I knew it was true! A ~ happiness filled me as I walked back to the apartment. As I knocked at Ross's door and went in, some rebellious imp made me say: "Ross, at about 3.30 this afternoon, were you praying I would become a Bahá'í?" "Oh, no Ted," he replied. "All right then" I responded. "I'm in!"

{{p13}}

Quite suddenly it seemed, life had taken on a definite meaning. No longer was God a vague, beneficent concept, but a reality Who takes a continuing interest in every little thing and person. I felt impelled to try and get a greater awareness of this discovery. Unconsciously I began taking the steps He Himself has laid down – reading the Writings and using His prayers daily. It was not surprising that I found each day a new thing. As Bahá'u'llah puts it: "Let each morn be better than its eve and each morrow richer than its Yesterday."

I knew I had found astonishing truth, but like the boy who starts reeling in his catch and finds a giant fish on the line, I could not know then that I was following a path which offered to mankind the power to change the world. Just one of these bounties was going to be the end of war forever. Now, forty years later, I am also beginning to understand the mysterious hand which saved me from dying in a fruitless war, and decreed instead that I live to help bring this great vision for mankind into reality.

Soon, two more Bahá'ís came to live in the apartment building. We were to become close friends. Gerda Christophersen and her Native American Indian husband, Noel were both accomplished artists and they helped me understand more about the artistic side of photography. We spent many happy hours discussing the Faith and life in general. Some evenings Noel would teach me how to dance to the Indian drums.

When spring arrived we decided to cycle together to the distant west coast and then go south through California. We each bought bicycles with luggage carriers fore and aft, loaded our camping equipment and took a train over the long featureless prairie to Calgary. There we started our ride to the town of Banff, in the Canadian mountains. We stopped to rest at a cafe housed in small wooden shack. As I leaned my bike against the thin wall, it sagged inwards perceptibly. I knew then that I had too much luggage. The others found the same, and when we arrived at Banff we all decided to camp there and rest up. In fact we got so involved in painting and photography that we stayed there all summer.{{p14}}

In those days, Banff was a small, relaxed little town, surrounded by the Rocky mountains. Its financial potential had not yet been discovered by the business world and the masses of tourists who would follow. It is situated in a district of great beauty. Every day, until my money ran out, I would climb another mountain and try to photograph nature at its best, while Gerda and Noel were trying to put the scenes on canvas. In the evenings we would meet at the camp, cook our flapjacks and sausages and discuss the day over supper. The beauties of nature seemed to symbolise the inspiration I was now receiving from the Writings of Bahá'u-llah which I was still studying daily in the quiet of those enormous peaks all around me.

On one occasion I went climbing with two friends in the camp, who were also nature lovers. When people have a common purpose it inspires them to even greater heights. They carried the tent and cooking utensils so we could stay out several days and I carried my big camera and my own sleeping bag. We spent the first night at Lake Louise camp ground. After erecting the tent, one of my friends decided, to go back by train to Banff and bring more equipment. It was not far, and he expected to get back to us late at night, so we cooked our meal and lay down to sleep.

We had been warned about grizzly bears ransacking camps for bacon or chocolate. I had a bar, so ate it, dropped the wrapping by my An hour later sleeping bag and fell asleep. , I was suddenly brought to full awakening by the entire side of the tent suddenly being split from top to bottom just where I had dropped the chocolate wrapping. It was pitch dark, but I did not need my eyes to tell me that it was a bear. I shouted at the top of my voice, putting as much anger into it as I could. The bear must have been even more surprised and run off, so we never saw him. There was no alternative but to stitch up the tent and go to back to sleep.

An hour later, a noise more sinister awoke me. Something was actually coming in through the tent doorway. It must be the bear again, this time becoming more bold. We would have to fight it off. I aimed a terrific punch at about where I thought the bear's nose should be and received a real howl of human pain.

Our companion had just {{p15}} come in by the late train and had run into the full force of our counter attack! We finally placated him and all settled down to sleep.

The next day we climbed a high mountain then scrambled across a perilous hogs back ridge to the next peak. There was no solid foothold for 40 yards, for it was loose shale all the way, so I knew I must not hesitate or I would slide down a thousand feet, so I quickly followed the others across. That evening we came down into the valley, pitched the tent and made a log fire to cook our supper, some fool hens, a name given to these partridge like birds which had earned that name because of their habit of standing stock still when in danger. We had knocked over a few of them with stones.

We now returned to anff much refreshed by our contact with the wilds. Since I wanted to set up my own photo business soon I needed more experience, so I found a job at a local photo shop in to~ n cl~d worked there happily for some months. a~
~e ~ hc u ~

By the end of summer, we all decided to give up our plan to cycle to California. Noel and Gerda put their bikes on the train and went back to Calgary. I took the train west, to Vancouver where I spent two weeks exploring the idea of logging, a well paid j3b, but finally took the train back east to Toronto. I needed a steady job in my chosen profession and there I thought, was the best place to find it. I was not mistaken, for soon I was working at a large portrait studio, mixing chemical ,, sweeping the floor, drying prints and learning the whole business from the bottom up. It was a very happy time, m~de all the more so because the Bahá'i center was only a block away, enabling me to make a lot of new friends.

At one of the first 19 Day Feasts, the chairman I announced: The Assembly feels we need to give new believers the chance to learn public speaking, so tonight we are going to have a five minute talk by Ted Cardell. I had never given a talk of any kind before and to gain some help I reached for a copy of the Hidden Words and read at random: Ye shall be hindered from loving Me and souls shall be perturbed as they make mention of Me. For minds cannot grasp Me nor hearts contain Me. (H ~.66) I raised my eyes to the ceiling and said to the heavenly concourse: Gee, that was all I needed! . {{p16}}

But maybe t~ne helplessness which that engendered was just right for that moment for, inspite of my stumblings, the talk was well received.

Perhaps the most important event for me in those days was the regular Saturday evening firesides at the large home of Laura and Victor Davis. These two wonderful people spared no effort to make a hospitable atmosphere for the large numbers of people who regularly came to hear a variety of experienced Bahá'í speakers. Refreshments were also there in plenty and many fruitful discussion took place. Ross had been transferred to a new job in Toronto, and was a regular speaker. I began to understand some of the deeper aspects of the Faith.

After about 6 months, the slow season started at the portrait studio. The thought occurred to me that my parents would be grateful for a visit. I asked the owner if he could manage without me while I made the trip readily agreed and offered to keep my position open until I came back. I then wrote my parents and said I was free for a while if they would like me to visit. They were delighted and sent me the money for a return ticket. Unknown to me then, I would not return to Canada for 30 years, and then in very different circumstances. After a few weeks at home on the farm I discovered there was a shortage of photographers in London; I found a job as staff photographer in Fleet Street, the center of the British newspaper industry. The firm made photo journalistic stories for magazines all over Europe. Every day they sent me out to do a story of human interest. I would bring back the photos and the information to the editor who wrote it up. It was thrilling to see my pictures come back to the office in all kinds of magazines. Even big newspapers and top quality magazines in England bought some.

I was now attending all kinds of Bahá'í meetings and one day found that I could help build a new Assembly by living in Brighton, some 50 miles from London. A fast train got me to my job in less than an hour and a half. Several other pioneers came to Brighton also, among them was: Evelyn Baxter, Claire Gung, and Zeah Asgarzadeh. After two years of strenuous effort by all, we had enough new Bahá'ís to make the Assembly. It was a great victory.{{p17}}

For two years I had regularly sent to Shoghi Effendi, in Haifa, photos of many Bahá'í activities in England and he always thanked me through his secretary. His short loving postscript added to these letters had drawn me close to him. I believe this happened to many other people who had written to him. One day, I wrote him offering to make a teaching trip through several countries of Europe on my motorbike. He wrote back thanking me but asked me to wait a bit and help with the homefront in the British Isles was at that time struggling to complete a Five year Plan which he had given them. This was our first plan. It called for an increase of our Assemblies from five to nineteen. After two years we had built none, and in desperation our National Spiritual Assembly wrote asking his advice and prayers. He replied, suggesting we establish one assembly in Scotland, one in W ~ n~l ~nP in Tr ~ n~l ~n ~ t him know when we had done it.

This had been achieved and a bit more when I arrived from Canada but they were struggling with many other goals with only a year to go. An almost impossible task, it would seem. I think it was the suggestion of the Guardian that we invite John Robarts (later appointed a Hand of the Ca~ce) to come and do a teaching trip over the whole country. From memory, that is what I was told on my return to England.

John was chairman of the Canadian National Spiritual Assembly, and I had met him often in Toronto at the regular firesides in his home. In the winter evenings I would frequently make my way through the snow, in fur lined boots, to his house. I could not go into his lounge with the boots, so left them at the door and went in to lay barefooted under the piano listening to the talks. The friends were all far too polite to comment on this til/ years later when I found I had become known as the barefooted seeker who lay under the piano and sometimes even went to sleep during the talk.

To return to the main story, John had been using prayer on a regular basis and even getting up regularly at mid night to pray. Unusual results had followed. He had convinced many other people to use this method. They in turn had found results and came back to tell him. When he spoke at meetings in England, he gave endless accounts of such answers to prayer. In fact, he had so many wonderful stories that at each town he would enthuse about them irresistibly for over 5 hours with only a lunch break. The friends would listen enraptured, and many must have made a giant leap forward in their attitude to prayer.

As the last few months of the Five Year Plan neared there were still gaps in a lot of goal assemblies. This was not through lack of interested enquirers, but they needed something indefinable in order to see the truth. John now added something more (so I was told by those who heard him.) He would talk directly about Bahá'u'llah, the proofs of his message and the appropriateness of His Message for the modern world. The meetings, I was told, would often end up with John holding cards aloft and calling upon those who believed, to come forward and sign. Some Bahá'ís were, I think, a bit shocked at such a direct call, but it seemed to be just what was needed. Many signed and the goals were won! Looking back 40 years it is quite difficult to recall all the wonderful details of those days, but the main features were unforgettable.

The next historic event was that the Guardian gave the triumphant British community a new Two Year Plan. Some of its main features were, consolidation and opening up the continent of Africa to the Faith. Many people must have been astonished at Africa being on the plan, for only about 3 of us had ever been there, and conditions were almost totally unknown. But what an adventure for those who would dare. And what joy it would bring to the heart of the beloved Guardian. If the Guardian felt we could do it, we would accept!

We were now to do something we had never done before, start opening up a vast continent. We knew that only with Divine assistance could we succeed. We also had some very real resources because years ago the Guardian had sent some very mature Persian Bahá'ís to England. Hasan Balyuzi was one of these, and for many years he chaired our National Assembly with great wisdom and loving care. There was also Dr Hakim, who had lived in Haifa when Abdu'l Bahá was alive.

{{p19}}

Let me digress here to recount some interesting anecdotes I heard from these wonderful souls themselves. Hasan told a group of us how a certain over-enthusiastic Bahá'í had been told by the National Assembly not to do a certain thing, but he did it anyway, was subsequently reprimanded by the Assembly and apologised. A few months were to pass and he did it again, was once more reprimanded and apologised. This happened again and the Assembly was consulting whether to take his voting rights away. Hasan said "But you can't do that; he has already apologised!" He was right. They could not, for repentance is the way to get reinstatement of one's lost voting rights.

Dr Hakim knew Abdu'l Bahá well and felt that posterity should have as many good photographs of him as possible. He took many pictures of him with his Box Brownie camera, but became embarrassed, so one day he hid in a bush near to where the Master would pass. As the Master drew level with the bush, he stopped and said loudly. "Hakim, come out!" Sheepishly, Hakim presented himself before the Master, who said ❖Ḥakím, wherever I go, you put me in your little box!❖

We also had Canon George Townshend in the community. I remember attending his class on Islám at Summer School, a most unusual subject for a canon of the church to talk on! His manner was humble but sure. He knew his subject well but did not wish to impose his views. This rare combination of qualities produced a rapt attention in the class. His faith was so certain, it was magnetic. He was highly erudite, as is testified by the fact that Shoghi Effendi sent him the finished script of ❖God Passes By❖ to review before publication. The Guardian also asked him to suggest a title for it, he suggested ❖God Passes By.❖ George Townshend was later appointed a Hand.

To return to the beginning of the Africa campaign, a matter very dear to the beloved Guardian❖s heart; many British Bahá❖is, upon hearing of the plan, immediately started looking for jobs in Africa by searching the newspapers where Government jobs were advertised. I heard that a film featuring Humphrey Bogart was going to be shot in Kenya, and so I made an application for working as an extra, but was not accepted. Claire Gung, then living in Brighton, answered an advertisement for a matron at a boys school, was accepted & went to Africa. The Guardian later named her ❖❖The Mother of Africa.❖ 20.

{{p20}}

It was very clear to all African pioneers that we would be sacrificing most of the things in life which we had become accustomed to. These included even treasured events like Bahá❖i Summer Schools, conventions and all normal Bahá❖i activities. Little did we know that Africa, especially Nairobi was to become the scene of much Bahá❖i activity, of a type never seen before.

The Two Year Plan given to the British called for the establishing of three groups only, in either east or west Africa. This was a last task by Shoghi Effendi for such a small community, but one carefully worked out to enable us all to develop higher capacity for future tasks. Soon pioneers were established in Uganda and Tanganyika, many of them Persians. In Uganda this included Musa Banání, his wife daughter Violette and his son ❖ in ❖ law, 'Alí Nakhjavani. Kenya had some years ago received its first Bahá❖i, Marguerite Preston, who had gone out there to marry a farmer. I

~as keen to go there, so the Africa committee asked the Guardian if he would include it in his Plan. He gladly accepted, so I intensified my efforts to find a job there. I sent Marguerite a parcel of my photographic work to show to possible employers but it was stolen, fortunately after she had showed it to some possible employers. Nothing grew out of all these efforts, so the Africa committee decided to buy me a return ticket so that I could look for work on the spot. I had about £200 cash of my own, and when that ran out, I was to return to England.

It was clear that life would not be easy for me in that far off country and it was not reassuring when my plane, after taxiing out for take off caught fire in one of its engines. The captain calmly came back to the passengers and announced: £I am not satisfied with the performance of the plane, we must go back to the terminal. A masterly understatement, I thought, as I watched the flaming engine through the window. We all unloaded and waited for 2 hours, then were called to board again on the same plane, and took off.

1~C£~, We landed~at Rome where I had planned to spend two days with the very small Bahá£i community there. It was for me a great bounty. Not only was I able to meet this lovely community, but afterwards I was shown round the ancient Roman ruins by Ugo Giachery. I took many photographs, one with Ugo£s feet astride the ruts in the street leading to the coliseum. Roman chariots had made those ruts thousands of years before my visit.{{p21}}

The next leg of the flight took me to Cairo where the Bahá£is had a nice national center building. Here I was honoured to meet with 1~ct~) I the National Spiritual Assembly of Egypt. They were delighted I was going to Kenya and promised their prayers.

I was given a guide to take me sight £ seeing and especially to the pyramids which were one short tram ride to the edge of the city. I gazed in awe at the sphinx and the incredible pyramids while Mustapha gave me pieces of their ~,oto ~ history. The sphinx has no nose because Napoleon smashed it off with a cannon ball! Travelling back into the city our bus ran into a large mob going in the opposite direction and shouting. I hung out of the window taking it all in, only to be hauled back into the bus by usta;~na. ~ £ ndt are ~ney shou~in~ £ ?£ I asked £ T hey ~ £ an~ dependance from Britain and they are shouting £Down with the English, and you had better get your head down and keep it there! ♦

The plane took off for Khartoum the next day. When we landed, it was so hot I could hardly believe it, but there was a warm welcome from the Bahá♦is who were delighted to have an English visiting Bahá♦i. We had a most unusual dinner of goat meat and spices, followed by much discussion. That night we all slept out in the courtyard. It was the first time I had seen lizards running up the walls.

The next day I flew to Nairobi and stepped out of the BOAC plane into a whole new world. On the long ride to the hotel we passed through crowds of cheerful African people and saw their simple wattle and corrugated iron houses massed on all sides, while street hawkers were selling all kinds of things in a strange language. But when we came to the city center I found it much like a town in England.

It even had two super luxury cinemas which I found later, often got the new releases before England did. The climate was much better than in England, for although we were near the equator, yet the altitude was nearly a mile high. This brought the temperature down to comfortable levels most of the time. One very strange thing discovered later was, that all the shops and business were run by Asians, while the menial work was left to the African people. At the top of the ladder were the Europeans who had all the nice houses with big gardens. I was to find that these divisions also carried quite different incomes.

The next two weeks were very busy, for I was visiting every photographic firm and—ne—spz —er in the city; but nowhere was there a sign of a job. It was only a small economy and there was only one English speaking newspaper of note, and it had turned me down because it could not afford a full time photographer. My money was now gone and I was despondent; the only other kind of work I was trained for was farming, and I definitely did not want to do that. I could not even do manual work, for there were plenty of Africans to do that at a salary I could not live on. I went to my hotel room, lay down and weighed up the situation once more. It still looked hopeless, so I prayed for guidance. Soon I realised I was not alone; I represented the Bahá♦is of the whole world and the British ones were my s ♦ ;tainers. Besides, Bahá♦u♦Allah Himself had given the instructions to take the Message to every country, and I had come here to do my best. I fell into a dreamless but happy sleep.

The next morning a thought came to me to go back to the ♦ East African Standard ♦ newspaper. I went to the editor, Mr Kinear; he was a kind hearted and practical man and knew his job well, but somehow it had escaped him that in 3 months time, the newly married Princess Elizabeth, heir to the British throne and Prince Philip were coming to spend a few weeks in Kenya. The country had built a small house in the hills as a gift to them and they were coming out to live there for a while. Suddenly my future editor knew he needed a full time photographer, me.

I was told by Mr Kinear that the following week the whole country was holding a county show. Would I like to go as his photographer, on trial. If the photographs were satisfactory, I would be given the staff job. With a silent prayer for this last minute intervention, I thanked the heavenly concourse.

The Agricultural show was the main social event for the large farming p/~e~ 3 community. I photographed everything there, especially the horse jumping. The film was developed and printed and I went to see them in the editors office. Many of the pictures were good, but the most P~cio I important ones, the horse jumping, were all blurred. Yet all the others were good. This told me that the high speed shutter must be faulty. I had the camera with me and tried it on high speed. It made an unusual noise, which we both heard. The Editor was sympathetic and because the rest of the photographs were good, he appointed me staff photographer at ♦ 80 a month, a sum double what

I had been getting in London. I u ♦ as walking on air. He asked if I was short of cash and offered an advance of ♦ 50, also authority to build a darkroom, in an empty office and buy the equipment for it. Assignments would come each day from the news ♦ editor.. The most important of all was the Arrival of Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip for a two week stay in Kenya.

Most of the big London newspapers were sending their own photographers out to Nairobi to cover the arrival of the royal couple at Nairobi airport. However, Nairobi only had one radio station capable of transmitting photographs to London by a special machine. The first photograph to arrive there would get world importance and have the widest sales. Naturally our editor was keen that we should win both of them.

We found out that the London photographers had all made arrangements with the sophisticated RAF photo laboratory to do rapid development of their pictures. We did not stand much chance against such professionals but on discussing the problem with a friend, he said: ♦ Do you want to try a wild idea? ♦ ♦ What is it? ♦ I said. ♦ Well, I once heard someone claim that you can develop film in a quarter of the time by using paper developing chemicals on the film, instead of conventional film developer. The quality is not good, and you must take it out of the chemicals exactly on time or the film will be ruined. Also you do not need to wash and dry the negative. Just rinse it off and print it wet by removing the glass film holder from the enlarger. ♦ After several experiments, we found the right timing and method. We could now gain about thirty minutes over normal methods. But surely the opposition would surely als- ♦ ♦ s~ch tricks. Only time would tell.

The editor nnw told me to advertise for a laboratory assistant to do all the printing. Soon, a smiling Indian named Rodriguez was working in the darkroom and turning out consistently good work, Still more thing~ needed to be arranged. One of ♦ the reporters had a motorbike which could ~ through the massed traffic expected at the Royal arrival. We laid careful plans for him to take the film from me as ~ho~o as soon as the royal arrival had been photographed and transport it quickly to Rodriguez for developing. He would then rush it to the radio station. When the day came, everything worked perfectly. Our picture arrived first in London. ♦ Everyone was delighted.

Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip visited many places to witness life in the British colony of Kenya, always with a large group of photographers in attendance. On many occasions I was close enough to Her Majesty touch her if I wished, so the photos were good. One Sunday morning they were to attend a very small church ♦ up country ♦ from Nairobi, ~ here there were many large European farms. Unknown to me, all photographers had been asked to give the royal couple privacy on this one occasion. Hence, I was the only one to turn up. Whilst standing waiting with the stewards of the church I was introduced to a well dressed African named Mwangi. A steward explained that this man had built the whole church himself. Labourers had carried all the supplies, but he had personally laid every brick. He was to be presented to Her Majesty. Impressed, and also sensing a story, I photographed both him and the church. Noticing that the latter was packed full with white farmers and their families, I remarked to a steward: ♦ I suppose there is a seat of honour reserved for Mwangi? ♦ ♦ Oh no! ♦ Was the reply: ♦ We don't allow ♦ niggers ♦ in our church! ♦ ♦ But he built the church! ♦ I remonstrated. He shrugged his shoulders. I recorded the Queens arrival and her introduction to Mwangi, then her entering the church. Hurrying back to Nairobi with my ♦ scoop ♦ I told the story to the news ♦ editor. But he declined to print it. It was too inflammatory for this time of celebration.

I was not happy and took the story to the Christian Council of Kenya, an inter ♦ church organisation They were upset and advised me to first talk with the Bishop of Mombassa. I phoned him and explained, but he was angry and told me that if I valued my job I would drop the whole matter. This, of course made me more angry. The following day Musa Banání and his family arrived in Nairobi to take a plane to Haifa for pilgrimage. The beloved Guardian had recently reopened this honour after many years of closure due to covenant breaker activity~ and this was the first group to go from our area. I visited them at the Avenue hotel where they were staying. Over supper, I related to them all the above events and asked for advice from Mr Banání. As 'Alí, his son ♦ in ♦ law translated ~c ~ my request, I wondered how such an unjust situation should be handled, and expected him to suggest a brilliant solution. He did exactly that with the brief words: ♦ You did not come to Africa to save the Christian church. I suggest you forget it. I did! ♦

Part of the royal tour was for the Princess and Prince to follow a trail into the jungle and like any other tourist, spend the night in a giant treehouse over looking a watering hole where all kind of animals came to drink under the protection of night. There were plenty of white hunters with guns present to protect them; also many trees had steps nailed onto them for getting out of the way if attacked. That night, as they were watching the animals under floodlights (which the animals ignored for some reason), a message arrived from England: King George V, her father, had died suddenly. Princess Elizabeth was now Queen of England.

Everyone was shocked at the unexpected passing of the King, but were somewhat awestruck to realise that Kenya was now entertaining the Queen herself. As she made her way back to Nairobi airport and England, the photographers with one accord agreed not to take any photographs of her. This was out of consideration for her personal loss.

The sudden succession to the throne caused considerable interest all over the British Empire. Rightly assessing this, our editor now produced two large booklets of all our pictures of her taken in Kenya. One was published in London and one in Kenya. They were sold widely all over the Empire, for people wanted to know all about their new Queen.

With the departure of the Queen, life returned to normal in Kenya. I began making friends with the Africans I met in the city and also on the trips I made up country, 300 miles to the north and west where life was much more simple. The newspaper had loaned me the money to buy a car because I often had to travel quickly to news making events. On one occasion I was sent by air to Dar es Salam (Arabic for the abode of peace), to Mombassa and to the island of Zanzibar. The purpose was to get a good stock of photographs for future use. A government agent, who was my local guide and translator. {{p26}}

I even arranged for me to take a photograph of the Sultán of Zanzibar with his wife. We met on the palace steps at 10 a.m. Looking at them from close up, I gasped inwardly with surprise. The Sultána, his wife, had taken this occasion to be photographed without a veil; no doubt a praiseworthy effort for women's rights. But she had replaced the veil with a thick layer of white powder, except for the eyes. She looked like a hollow eyed ghost standing smilingly beside the richly apparelled Sultán. I took the picture and, bowing in respect for their distinguished persons, stepped back before leaving. A few years later The Sultán lost his throne as an African government took over the island.

~c 2 Zanzibar was a Moslem country, as was much of the coastal part ~ ho~3 ~ i~en~a. r early the Arab dhows would sail south to Mombassa for their loads of wood which Arabia needed for many purposes. The pk~ 4 radio station broadcast in Arabic and a Moslem mulla gave talks on pk~ J their faith. At the radio station I was introduced to the chief Mullá. ~h~ ~ He was waiting to give his daily live broadcast. Over a cup of tea, we conversed through an interpreter. Since he was reputed to be very influential and popular, I opened a religious discussion with him and introduced the Bahá'i Faith. It seemed too good an opportunity to miss. He listened attentively while I gave a brief account. When I invited questions he smilingly declined. After a while I said ~You cannot possibly be agreeing with everything I have said!~ He courteously replied: ~No, but I am waiting for a later occasion when we have more time and one of us can convert the other. ♦ I then realised I had made little progress and was glad when he excused himself to make his usual daily broadcast. This was my first and only attempt to discuss religion with a Mullá. Later the beloved Guardian told the pioneers to avoid discussions with Moslem authorities because their ideas were so fixed and it might even arouse opposition.

Back in Nairobi, I found life very interesting and wrote regularly to my parents in England about my experiences. They were not Bahá ♦ is they were at that time, but. happy I had found a spiritually motivated path of service. However, they were worried about their only son being in such a strange land. In those days, Africa was looked upon by Europeans as the land of wild animals, dangerous things and mystery. While growing up in England, I had seen a horror film entitled ♦ West ~f 7~n7ih~r♦ I remembered this now and realised ruefully, that here {{p27}}

I was now living in Nairobi, west of Zanzibar! I dismissed the thought with a chuckle. Everything looked fine, I had a good job in a partly modern city in an interesting country. Little did I know that soon I was to become involved in some very real horrors, the photographing of the Mau Mau revolution from a front line position.

The dramatic change from English life where a black face was almost never encountered, to the African scene was greatly stimulating. So many things were different: it is hard to know where to start describing them. Being young, 31, and single, I had few worries about life and was constantly running into totally new situations. First, the sky wa~ always sunny with fluffy white clouds, winter and summer. Nairobi was only 100 miles south of the equator and it should have been unbearable, but located at 5000 feet above sea ♦ level, it was very pleasant.

The early white settlers had chosen the site well. Next, I became aware that white faces were definitely a minority, especially outside the city. The Africans lived in poverty, yet seemed happy in general, though of course they were gradually awakening to the luxuries of the Europeans. Occasionally I ran into a situation of anger against the whites, but mostly there was a happy ~:oo~ raLio11~ witli ~he African~ {loin~ all the menial jobs in the city, and u~ually leLIVilg their wives and families in the reservation to lo~ I; after ~heir S1LII11b;~ l1eSe were small plots of land which grew slllaller ~ucll tilne a u~.u~ died alld his ~hamba was divided b~tweell his ~a,~ ullil~ll~e~. It WLI; I ♦ ~allY an explosive situation because there were very large estates owned (by whites, many of whom never came near them. An obvious one was owned by Lord Delamere, about 20 miles outside Nairobi and its 20,000 acres extended literally over the horizon, with nothing on it but a few grazing cattle and a volcano name Longonot. It extended right down the rift valley for about 50 miles.

I rented a bed-sitter in the home of a nice old Jewish lady, about a mile from the city center. I was advised not to go out at night because People had been attacked and robbed. So I always used my nice new Ford Consul which the newspaper had financed for me. The main street of the city was lined with rows of jacaranda trees, and lovely blue flowers decorated the walls. There were many other brilliant flowers like bougainvillea bushes lining streets and gardens, lending a relaxed and happy atmosphere to the European areas. In the large African suburbs it was quite different, for people lived in mud and tin huts with few facilities. Yet city life was always attracting people in from the reserves.

Kenya only has one port, Mombasa. Since it is at sea level, everything from there is very tropical, and so the early settlers went inland where the altitude made life more comfortable; but this necessitated building a railroad 350 miles long. They brought in large numbers of Indians from India to do this; when it was completed, most of these Asians stayed on and became shop keepers and the like. In fact they completely took over and cities. The shops in the towns when I arrived there were three distinct cultures Whites, Asians and Africans. Their salaries declined dramatically with each step. Outside the towns, the only road which was tarmac led from Nairobi to Nakuru, 100 miles to the north where most of the European farms were located. All the other roads were dirt, but well kept. Nevertheless it was quite an adventure to travel up into the northern part of the country, and people often had their windcreens shattered by a stone shot up by an approaching car.

Although about half of Kenya is desert, yet the rest is very fertile and almost tropical. This meant that the most common vegetation is the banana plant, which grows everywhere. Large areas are suitable for all kinds of wild game and hence it is a favorite tourist center for people from abroad. In fact only 15 miles outside Nairobi is a game park with nearly every kind of animal. And there are no fences. Good dirt roads allow tourists cars to travel all over this park. Frequent notices tell tourists to stay in their cars and keep the windows up. Apparently animals have no fear of cars and do not even associate them with life, so it is a haven for photographers. However one road goes right across the lake. I said to my friends: "I hope the lions can read English."

In the course of my job I mixed with some very friendly staff members and got drawn into some social life. I even joined the local mens hockey team. Only the fit can survive that for, at 5,000 ft the air is too thin to sustain heavy exercise for long. When I first arrived at the time of a critical match it was a real challenge to play the whole game without a drink of water.

Perhaps this is the time to note that, apart from Egypt and Sudan where the Master Himself and some early Bahá'ís had spread the Faith, there existed in all of Africa but three known Bahá'ís; two lived in South Africa, Agnes Carey and Reg Turvey, and Marguerite Preston in Kenya. The first two were elderly and Marguerite, as mentioned earlier, had died in an air crash. Now there were two groups of new pioneers, one in Kampala Uganda, and one in Dar es Salaam in Tanganyika. It was not surprising then that being alone in Kenya, I felt close to Bahá'ullah.

This was a very real and precious experience for me but as the coming Christmas 1952 approached, I realised that I had no real human friends nearer than Kampala, 440 miles away; and I had only met one of these. Although I was now a three year Bahá'í I fully committed to celebrating Bahá'í Holy days instead of the Christian ones, which were obviously the ones to be marked socially. Yet some impulse led me to write to the Banání family in Kampala and invite myself over there for the Xmas holiday period. I did not even know whether I would be an imposition on them. The warmth of their reply galvanised me into action. I put the idea to my editor and he agreed, asking me only to take some stock pictures for the newspaper wherever I went.

If I had known the rigours of such a journey on dirt roads, with few towns, washed out roads and unknown conditions, doubtless I would have spent Xmas in Nairobi. Most fortunately, I did not, for the love and kindness I received from those wonderful people in Kampala were to leave a permanent joy in my life. But let me return to the journey itself.

In my brand new shining Ford Consul car, loaded with all the provisions I could think of, and all my photographic equipment, I set off to Nakuru, 100 miles away. This was the only part of the trip done on tarmac. Twenty miles outside Nairobi it wound down the 2,000 ft escarpment into the rift valley, signs of this gigantic geological fault stretch north thousands of miles, even into Egypt. My journey would take about 12 hours, I calculated, and could be done in one day with luck.

No serious difficulty appeared until nightfall, when a giant of a thunder storm seemed to deposit its entire contents on my road. Even the windscreen wipers and headlights could not give me a clear view, but I soon realized that a few other vehicles were also trying to navigate a dirt.

{{p28b}}

road which had been washed away. I need hardly say ♦ African roads do not have the foundations we are used to in Europe.

To go back would have been as impossible as going forward, so I chose the latter. My new car bumped and groaned as we moved from one hard rocky place to another. Finally we came to a large expanse of water of unknown depth. Logic suggested I stop and take off the fan belt which is usually to blame for lifting water up from deep water and spraying it over the spark plugs ♦ bringing one to a dead halt in the middle of the hazard; but with torrents of rain descending, to open the hood would have drenched the engine anyway ♦ so I cautiously urged the car on, declining the third alternative of trying to get to the side of the road where I could be sure there was enough mud to stall any car. Soon the other side of the water appeared and the car scrambled out aq~ After this episode, nothing ahead seemed to daunt me and soon the town of Kisumu was reached. It was on the border of Uganda and also on the shores of Lake Kisumu itself. Here I found a hotel for the night.

Next day the skies were a clear innocent blue with hardly a cloud to be seen. By midday I had arrived at the home of the Banání family in Kampala and was given a very warm welcome and a large meal. For the next few days there was a lot of lively discussion as I recounted my recent experiences on the road and told them about my life in Nairobi. There was also much talk about the teaching work which was going on steadily and each day some African friends came in to hear about the Faith.

Others living there included Mrs Banání and Violette, the Banání ♦s daughter. Violette was married to 'Alí Nakhjavani, who was doing full time travel teaching, deputised by Mr Banání. (who could not speak either English or any African language.)

There was also 'Alí and Violette ♦s very young baby, Bahíyyih.

This reminds me of an amusing incident. Since there was much poverty in Kampala, there was also considerable crime. The night before my arrival, Bahíyyih had been robbed of all her bed ♦ clothes with out being awakened. The bed, being under the open but barred window, had been an easy target and the thief had slowly pulled all the blankets & sheets through it. Baby Bahíyyih was discovered next morning, still sleeping peacefully on a bare mattress.{{p28c}}

Claire Gung, as mentioned earlier, had been the first Bahá ♦ i pioneer to arrive in Africa. The Banání family were next. To my knowledge, no Bahá ♦ i had any experience at all in teaching the Faith to the dear African people, so we all had to start from scratch. For the Banání ♦ s this meant prayer, more prayer and yet more prayer. The Guardian said later to a pilgrim, that Musa Banání ♦ s prayers were the cause of all the highly successful teaching done in Africa. 'Azíz Yazdí once told me that Musa Banání had always been a fierce business man in Tíhrán, but when the Guardian had appealed for volunteers to open up the African continent, Musa Banání became a changed man and a spiritual giant. Musa Banání, his devoted wife, their daughter Violet her husband, 'Alí Nakhjavani dropped everything and set out for Africa. Arriving in Kampala, they bought a house and settled down. 'Alí obtained a job teaching in a local school, but after six months . Mr Banání appealed to him to become his permanent deputy. 'Alí confided in me that it was a strange feeling to give up his career and accepted this full time service in the Faith; a service which was to be of indefinite length. How were we to know then, that here was a future member of the first Universal House of Justice, which would be elected in 1963.

'Alí started making long teaching trips ♦ up ♦ country ♦ and contacting friends of the African people they knew in Kampala. We will never know the full details, I suspect, but there must have been some remarkable experiences and there were certainly very great results. 'Alí was so devoted to awakening the spirit of the people that he accepted all difficulties with a humorous serenity. For example, when he developed an allergy against curry, an African dish served to special visitors, he continued to eat it and take the tablets later to cure the allergy. He became much loved by the people and it was not surprising that these efforts of 'Alí and the help of later pioneers awakened the hearts of the people. There started at first a trickle and then a flood of declarations. The Guardian was delighted and announced the victory to the Bahá ♦ i world.

But let us return to Christmas 1952. At the time of my arrival in Kampala, the pioneers and Africans had reach nine in number.

Two of these were away teaching, but it was my privilege to photograph seven of the first Local Spiritual Assembly of Kampala and send the picture to the beloved Guardian in Haifa. He hung it over his bed at Bahjí, so dear was this victory to his heart.

{{p29}}

When it was time for me to return to Nairobi, I asked if there was a different route than the one which had been so perilous coming to Kampala, 'Alí told me of a detour further north and I set off full of hope and followed, of course, by Banání prayers for my deliverance from the floods. This road seemed much better, but soon I came to a about 100 yards which was thinly flooded. I charged it at a good speed, but soon became stuck. While wondering what to do next, I became aware that there were people nearby. It was obvious that they would be glad to give me a push through the mud for a small consideration. With signs I asked for this and offered them ten shillings. They were all in high spirits and I secured a fine photo through my windscreen, showing them leaning all over the hood discussing the offer. It was agreed, and soon the car was sliding through the mud to the tune of melodious chanting. In fact the mud was so thick that I did not even have to steer, so I got out, locked the door as we went along and stayed back to take a photo of my new car sliding through the mud. These photographs are now cherished additions to my album. When we reached dry ground I thanked them heartily and added a bonus payment. The rest of the journey was uneventful, thanks to daylight and a bright sun. When I went to the newspaper office next morning and told some of the reporters about this incident, they laughed heartily. Apparently it was a custom for the people living in the reservation to dam up a stream and divert it down a road, in order to catch motorists and earn a little cash. I could not help but chuckle at their simple logic.

A few weeks later I was joined by a most welcome pioneer, 'Azíz Yazdí. When the Guardian had announced the Africa Campaign, 'Azíz, then a businessman living in Tīhrán, had set up a small office to collect information about Africa and encourage people to pioneer there. He had become so interested in such a prospect that he pioneered to Africa himself; leaving his wife and four young children in the new house they had saved up for over many years. He arrived in Nairobi, filled with devotion and eagerness to start teaching; but this would have to wait. First he must set up an import, export business to earn a living. Meanwhile, in order to earn a little cash, he answered an advertisement for actors to work on a movie which was soon to be made. They dressed him up as a fierce Arab and took photos; but he did not get the job.

'Azíz family would join him when he had secured work of some kind. Meanwhile we rented a house together and set out to find interested Africans {{p29a}} with whom we could discuss the higher meaning of life.

Making friends was easy, for they responded gladly when we offered them a lift on the road. As we took them to their destination, we quickly became friends and were able to show how the Message of Bahá'u'lláh could solve all problems. We then went back and picked up others. Soon we were able to invite several to our house. We found that language was no real problem for many spoke English. They were interested in the Faith, especially as our lack of racial prejudice was new to them; but even after two months we were no nearer finding deep interest. Finally, 'Azíz suggested we get up for dawn prayer every morning and implore help from >Bahá'u'lláh. We chose a little summer house in the public park as our meeting place and called it our Bahá'í temple, Dawn was at 5.30 a.m. and after two weeks, my work began to suffer through lack of sleep, so we prayed at home instead.

One day another Bahá'í arrived in Nairobi. Richard St. Barbe Baker, who with two friends, had just driven across the Sahara desert from west to east, planting dates stones in the oasis they came across. He had just parted with his two friends, and I found him by accident, parked on the main street. Of course, here lies a tale, for no normal person would do such a thing without a definite purpose. St.Barbe had one. Forty years before the present widespread concern over the environment, he was saving whole forests of trees all round the world. He had founded a Men of the trees organisation and single handedly had interviewed governors, presidents and the like to suggest saving their precious trees. Being very distinguished looking and powerfully motivated from hidden sources, he would look these world leaders in the eye from a position of equality and they listened carefully to his philosophy. He had been instrumental in saving a redwood forest near San Francisco, and other forests in Africa and Europe. He had spoken with the president of ~htt ~ on the merit of planting trees and it was done. He had spoken earnestly with the President of Israel himself and persuaded him to order the planting of massive amounts of trees for the good of the nation. He had visited Kenya many years before my own arrival there and suggested to the Governor how ~reat a deed it would be if he encouraged the Kikuyu tribe to plant gum trees in their reservation. This very month he had been invited by Chief Njonjo to attend a ceremony in his honour, for those trees were now 50 feet high and were greatly treasured by the Kikuy ~

Before I had left England for Africa, I had met him by chance in Trafalgar Square, London. He and his friends had parked their Landrover next to a handcart whose owner was selling dates in the street. Through his amplifier Baker was encouraging the crowds to buy dates for their lunch, eat them and put the stones in his barrels, so that he could plant them in the Sahara. They had gone to with a will and filled his barrels with date ♦ stones, much to the delight of the astonished salesman. ~ow he had fulfilled his promise to the London lunch crowd and planted the date seeds in oasis after oasis, all the way across the desert. I hardly need to say that Baker was not contented with saving or raising forests in many countries. His real goal was to energise many governments, and especially those on the edge of the Sahara, to reclaim the Sahara desert itself.

This vision may have been before its time, but he was determined mankind should get the idea. He had done research and found there was evidence of underground rivers there. He had spoken with Prime Ministers, Heads of States, and he had cajoled, pleaded and written books about it; now he had demonstrated its feasibility. If an old man of 68 could diagonally cross that desert and plant ~eeds, so could others, if thev wis.led.

It fell on me to be the news photographer who recorded his arrival in Nairobi and brought him to the news editor. For a day, he was front page news; then he was off again on another project. He did not slacken his efforts to improve the planet until he died in his early nineties. The beloved Guardian had greatly encouraged him and had become the first life member of ♦The Men of the Trees♦ an international organisation which St.Barbe Baker had founded many years before.

Here I should also mention Marguerite Preston who had moved to Kenya some years earlier when marrying a Kenya farmer. They now had two fine boys about 5 and 7 years of age. Marguerite was a Bahá♦i of some experience but had found it difficult to teach the Faith in Kenya while living ♦Up ♦ country♦ and with a non ♦ Bahá♦i husband. However; she was very eager to help us in whatever way possible. I remember having lunch with her as she was preparing to visit her relatives in England. Her main worry was that she was flying the next day and had not made a will directing that her two boys be raised with a good knowledge{{p31}} of the Faith, if she should die on the flight. Next day, the radio gave the news of her plane flying into a mountain in Sicily, on its way to England. There were no survivors. We grieved with her family in their sore loss. I told them of Marguerite's last wish, expressed to me verbally and asked if they would like us to help the children know about the Faith, but they wished to raise them in their church. We could do nothing.

Life went on as usual, but one day our milkman, who delivered on a bicycle with a large carrier, ran into a tree with an awful crash. We rushed outside to help. He was unharmed but surrounded by smashed bottles and spilt milk. Figuring that he would have to pay for it, we each gave him some money and he went off singing cheerfully. We looked at each other in surprise. Did he do it deliberately? 'Azíz asked me. We never found out.

Meanwhile, a few weeks later, the Banání family returned from their pilgrimage. They again passed through Nairobi on their way back to Kampala and I was greatly privileged to listen to their experiences and drink in the divine fragrances of those holy places. I had sent a message by the Banánís to Rúhíyyih Khánum, saying that I was saving up to go on pilgrimage. They now gave me her reply: You have enough money, come now! At first I was dumbfounded, for my bank account was about empty. Also I had only been in my new job a few months; how could I ask for annual leave? Yet, emboldened by Rúhíyyih Khánum's reply, I felt motivated to give it a try. After all, the editor was very pleased with my work, and I did have a pay check due.

Sure enough, he was glad to give me a reward for good work well done. I had 9 days for pilgrimage and sent a cable asking the Guardian for permission. He gladly accepted. I began trying to understand the spiritual significance of a pilgrimage. Additionally it occurred to me that no professional photographer had, to my knowledge, yet recorded those holy places. All the Bahá'í world had were the amateur photos taken by Effie Baker; I had seen these printed in the Dawnbreakers. But how could I do justice to such an historic project in only nine days, and also make a pilgrimage?.

It seemed to me that the only solution was to ask the Guardian for an extension of 10 days. Before asking his permission I went down to the travel office and booked the extended reservation to make sure of it. I thought this could be changed if the extension was not granted. Then I wrote to the Guardian himself, asking for the extension. I was hard for me to believe that my editor would grant a further ten days, but when I explained my problem he willingly agreed. A few days later came the Guardian's reply: Do not advise more than 9 days.

I went back to the travel office and tried, unsuccessfully, to change the booking back to the original 9 days. I could only hope that it would come before the day of take-off, but it did not. What was far worse, I now received a further cable from Haifa: ♦Postpone pilgrimage ♦ Shoghi. ♦ Five days later, on April 13th 1952 came yet another: ♦Obstacle removed welcome ♦ Shoghi. The reason for recording all this detail will be seen later, in the light of what happened in Haifa. All these cable originals are still among my treasured possessions. The cause of the temporary postponement, I learned later, had been some serious trouble with the covenant breakers who lived in the house next to the Guardian.

When the day of my departure arrived, I presented myself at Nairobi airport with three cameras, more equipment and a large suitcase containing tinned food and a fresh African paw ♦ paw; for I had heard there were food shortages in Haifa. Knowing that I was far over weight, I carried in my pocket ♦50 in cash to pay for it. As my baggage was weighed, I prepared to pay, but the sympathetic lady in charge smilingly ignore the weighing machine and waved me through. I gasped in relief, but then realise that I would be breaking the law by taking ~50 cash out of the country. I reached into my bag and, taking out a plain envelop, pushed the surplus notes into it, addressed it to myself, put a stamp on it and, leaning over the barrier, mailed it in a providential mail box. Another miracle! When I finally returned to Nairobi, I found that money waitin~ for me at mv address!

Landing at Lydia airport in Israel, I was passing through customs {{p33}} wondering if I had any forbidden things. The official asked me for the purpose of my visit: ♦Bahá ♦i pilgrimage. ♦ I replied. ♦ Without inspection, he passed me through with the cheery word: ♦Please give my regards to Shoghi Effendi! ♦ Even then, when there had been few Bahá ♦i pilgrims, all government officers had learned to trust and honour Bahá ♦is. This was due, no doubt, to the exemplary lives of both Abdu ♦I Bahá and Shoghi Effendi and their frequently expressed coricern in word and deed for the state of Israel. We read how Abdu ♦I Bahá was knighted for his real contributions to alleviate the sufferings of the people when they were in desperate need. Shoghi Effendi continued this relationship by such acts as sending greetings to the Prime Minister on the State anniversaries and by sending a check to help alleviate suffering when disasters occured.

Following the instructions of the Banánís, I took a bus to Tel Aviv, ten miles away, and spent the night at a hotel. Enquiring in the morning about transport to Haifa, 100 miles to the north, it appeared that the cheapest way was a sharing taxi called a sheroot. After a cramped two hour journey with many locals, we rounded the spur of Mt. Carmel and caught the first glimpse of the Báb's Shrine. At that time there was no golden dome~ but I had the feeling that great spiritual bounty awaited here for those who could accept it. Though pictures of this holy mountain and its sacred Shrine were not often seen in those days, yet the regular letters from Shoghi Effendi to believers and Assemblies around the world had built in us a deep awareness of its spiritual significance for mankind. I was to find that life there was redolent with the loving kindness which we had read about in accounts of the days when Abdu'l Bahá had lived there.

I was dropped off at number 10 Harparsim Street at a building then known as the Western Pilgrim House, later to become the first seat of the Universal House of Justice. Ugo Giachery, whom I had last met in Rome on my way to Kenya, hosted my initial tour of the building and explained the custom that each evening, all the friends gathered in the main lounge awaiting the arrival of Shoghi Effendi from his house across the road.

{{p34}}

That same evening, there were about ten of us waiting to refresh our eyes with the sight of his blessed face, the Sign of God on earth. Most of the members of the International [Bahá'i] Council were present (a body which the Guardian had appointed the previous year to precede the election of the Universal House of Justice) also Ethyl and Jessie Revel who had been doing secretarial work here for some years, and Ugo Giachery ~ who was supervising the erection of the crown and dome on the Báb's Shrine in accordance with Sutherland Maxwell's designs. Mr Maxwell, the Guardian's father in law, had been invited by him to spend the remaining years of his life living in the Guardian's home, and to help him with the design and construction of the Shrine. The stone cutters in the Italian quarries were, it was said, astonished at the perfection of Mr Maxwell's designs, and it was unnecessary to make working drawings before cutting the stones.

At 7 p.m. a maid ♦ servant came up the circular stairs from below and announced: ♦ Shoghi Effendi is waiting for you. ♦ Naturally, I hung back to ~all these esteemed people to go down the stairs first, OUT ~or some r~aCGn they were all waiting for me. ♦ The beloved Guardian is waiting to hear about Africa, Ted! ♦ Said Ugo. In some confusion, I headed for the stairs and descended. At the bottom stood a@@ Shoghi Effendi: ♦ Welcome, Welcome ♦ he said: ♦ We have been expecting you for a long time. ♦ He embraced me and it seemed that ♦ Abdu ♦ I ♦ Bahá Himself had spoken. ♦ Marhabá! Marhabá! ♦ he would have said. The Guardian was short in stature, but an air of calm, loving and strong purpose emanated from him. He was wearing a black taj and long black jacket. I remember noting that there was a small threadbare place on it just where the coat would brush against the desk through many long hours of writing to friends everywhere and also in translating the holy Texts. We went into the dining room and he seated me just across the table from himself, with Rúhíyyih Khánúm at his right. The others took their chairs without saying anything, but taking in every word. The very great respect and their instant obedience to his every request, spoke volumes to this very new Bahá ♦ i. I was instantly impelled to conform my own attitude to their own.

The Guardian asked me about the journey, Nairobi, my job and how in Kenya was the Faith progressing? ♦ So far there are no declarations Shoghi{{p35}}

Effendi. ♦ I said. ♦ But we are persevering in prayer and in finding ways to talk with the African people. It is a beautiful country and they are all friendly. ♦ He smiled and said: ♦ You will soon have an Assembly in ~airobi. ♦ His words were full of assurance. Silently, I wondered ho~v it would come about. He was not put off by the lack of visible results. I felt that, since his prayers must have been regularly surrounding our every effort, matters were falling into place with certainty, the chosen ones were being steadily consummated; and so it turned out.

As dinner proceeded, I remained silent, content to wait for the Guardian to sp~ak. He did not eat for some time, but questioned me further about Africa, to which he was giving high priority at that time. He carefully considered my replies, then said: ♦ It is very important to get the Faith established in Africa before materialism and politics get a hold on the masses. ♦ I said: ♦ It has already got a hold on the people in the city ♦ He replied:

◆ Yes, I understand, but you will find the people in the villages much more receptive to the Faith. ◆ The way he discussed matters gave me increased confidence because it was spoken as between equals and I felt no pressure from him, just consultation on what was to be accomplished. This kind of caring, helpful attitude typified all his words during the time I was at his table.

Later, he talked about the British believers, how they were ingenious in rerouting many Iranians to goal areas as they arrived in our country. He mentioned also that the British probably had the highest percentage in the Bahá'í world, for believers pioneering on the home front to fill the goals, each year. From memory, it was about 48%. He mentioned what a big loss it had been to us when the Hofmans had been forced to reduce their Bahá'í activities to devote more time to their own publishing business, I had been present at convention in England last year when, just before election, David Hofman had spoken to the delegates in words such as these: ◆ ◆ Dear friends, I am not allowed to try to influence your vote, but I feel I must read to you from a letter we have just received from Shoghi Effendi.

Quote: ◆ I feel you should consider withdrawing from the considerable services you have been giving to the administration, in order to allow you to devote much more time to your business, until it is stronger. David and Marion Hofman had both been on the National Spiritual Assembly of England for some years and this took much of their time from the business which was in difficulties. In this example, the common sense approach of Shoghi Effendi is seen balancing worldly duties with service to the Faith. The Hofmans were not elected to the National Assembly that year and for several years thereafter. Their business improved. ◆ What we did not know then was that in 1963 David Hofman would be one of nine to be elected to the first Universal House of Justice.

Bahá'í temples were next discussed and the Guardian listed the possible sites for the possible sites for the next one: Cairo, Haifa, Tíhrán or Kampala were all mentioned. As we now know, Kampala was built soon after that time. It became a magnet and an inspiration for over 20,000 Bahá'ís who would soon come into the Faith in Uganda alone! When that tremendous growth took place, we heard that India had enrolled over 100,000 believers.

Some cre said: ◆ They are far ahead of us! ◆ ◆ Not so! ◆ exclaimed Hasan Sabri. ◆ We only took five years to do this and India took 100 years to get their 100,000! ♦ We read that the Faith ♦ va s taken to India during the lifetime of Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah.

To return to Haifa in 1952, Shoghi Effendi explained that pilgrimage is not for the purpose of seeing ~he GtIardian, nor for obtaining information about the Faith, but to experience the spirit Of the holy Shrines and the holy places associated with the Revelation. Here ~ should mention that all pilgrins were gently told not to take notes at the Guardian ♦ s dinner table. He wanted their full attention to be centered on the spiritual experience of the pilgrimage.

However, each night after supper, when the Guardian had returned to his home across the road, we would gather in the lounge to compare notes and write down what we agreed had been said. I filled a notebook and am now trying to relate those memories as clearly as possible. Of course these pilgrim notes have no authority, but the Guardian encouraged al~ pilgrims to share their experiences and notes, as long as it was made clear thatAYare just personal impressions and nothing more. Re ♦ reading them now 38 years, later I can still clearly visualise those surroundings and the Guardian as he talked with all of us in that blessed Spot.{{p37}}

I asked if the Africans had ever had a Prophet. He said: ♦ Yes, but not in Africa. ♦ ♦ Could it have been the Sabeian Prophet? ♦ ♦ Possibly ♦

♦ In each Revelation there is one mystery which is not explained; in Christianity it is the virgin birth, and in the Bahá ♦ i revelation it is the station of the Master.

He spoke of the 9 stages of the evolution of the Faith. 1.) Ignored. 2.) Persecution. 3.) Recognition. ♦ In most countries we are still in 1 & 2, but the Egyptian court had already declared Bahá ♦ i a seperate religion from Islám. This is a victory! ♦ Regarding the other six steps, the Guardian asked us not to talk about them to the public, lest it aroused unnecessary opposition. Stage 2 is not likely to be completed in this century, but all nine would be achieved before the Golden Age.

♦ America will be Pured in the crucible of war to prepare her for her mission.

One evening Rúhíyyih Kahnúm asked the Guardian why no women would serve on the Universal House of Justice. Perhaps she was asking this for my sake, for she must have been fully conversant with the Guardian's thoughts on this matter. The Guardian's reply contained some things which I had heard before, such as, ♦ it is a difference of function, not of women's rights, and the wisdom of it will appear in the future. ♦ He went on: ♦ It is not women's function to run armies or be a Prophet. The greatest work in the Cause today is teaching, and in this the women will excel more than men; they are more courageous, bolder and have more talent in this than men. Men and women are complimentary in their functions. ♦

♦ God's way is not men's way. What price glory? The white race in Africa learned great lessons ♦ to be free from prejudice, establish equal opportunity and give precedence to minorities. ♦

The East has given inspiration to the West and the East must now learn practical lessons from the West. ♦. {{p38}}

One evening, after Shoghi Effendi had left us and returned to his house, we all sat consulting together in the upper lounge and writing down what we could remember. The discussion turned to a court case involving the Guardian and the Covenant ♦ breakers.

It concerned the demolition of a small house close to the Shrine at Bahjí, owned partly by the Covenant Breakers and partly by the Guardian. It was of great importance to Shoghi Effendi to beautify a large area around the most Holy Shrine. This inferior building stood in the way. No one knew what the court would decide. Ugo Giachery commented: ♦ How much Shoghi Effendi was suffering tonight. ♦ From this remark, it was clear to me that although Shoghi Effendi was the ♦ Sign of God on earth ♦ with all the protection and guidance that implied, yet continual watchfulness and a great deal of mental and ethical effort, as well as much prayer, was required of him at all times.

The unrelenting opposition by the Covenant ♦ breakers to every project the Guardian embarked upon in the Holy Land must have taken a great toll of his strength and constantly delayed progress. It is illuminating to look back on the steps by which he steadily eliminated them from the Bahá ♦ í properties and reduced them to impotence, even while working on many other projects for the Faith. This can especially be seen in the stages by which he removed them from Bahjí and its surroundings. It was my bounty to hear the details from others in these late night discussions.

It may come as a shock to many Bahá'ís to hear that Bahjí Mansion, where Bahá'u'llah passed away in 1892, continued to be occupied by the Covenant breakers for 40 years, until 1932. Even after that time they were still occupying the outbuildings until 1957, the year of Shoghi Effendi's passing. To return to 1927, they had allowed the Mansion to fall into a terrible state of delapidation. They asked Shoghi Effendi to repair the roof for them. He replied that he would not start until they evacuated the building, which they did. Before we were finished, he persuaded the British High Commissioner (Israel was then a British Protectorate) to declare the Mansion a Holy Place. This excluded it from all private occupation permanently. The Covenant breakers were thus excluded from reoccupying it ever again. When we look back on the exemplary life of Abdu'l Bahá, we can see that he had won the admiration of the authorities. He was eventually knighted by the British Government for services to the people and the British army. This was obviously of great help to Shoghi Effendi in his communication with all the authorities in Palestine.

Shoghi Effendi now started refurnishing the Mansion after the style of Bahá'u'llah's time and added display and archival material. He had a simple bed in one of the bedrooms for himself, so that he could stay over night on this task of great love. When I eventually sent him a photograph of the first Assembly in East Africa, the one elected in Kampala, he put it over his head in that room.

Another evening Shoghi Effendi spoke long and in detail about the attempts made by the Covenant breakers to cause trouble for the Master when he was buying the land surrounding the Shrine of the Báb. When he had erected the first simple building, they reported to the Sultan of Turkey that it was a fortress for starting a revolutionary movement, but Abdu'l Bahá was able to prove their accusations false. After the 1950 war, when many thousands of Arabs fled and the State of Israel was founded, we were able to acquire several properties which had belonged to the Covenant Breakers. In the more recent times, Shoghi Effendi pointed out that Hitler was an enemy of the Bahá'ís and if he had captured all of north Africa, he would have gone into Egypt and Palestine and he would have exterminated the Bahá'ís as had happened in Germany and Russia. But he was preordained to fail. The Mufti of Jerusalem would also have been a big danger to the Bahá'ís in these circumstances.

Another topic touched on by the Guardian was prayer. He said very clearly that it is not enough to pray about a problem; one needs also to think about it and then to act.{{p40}}

The next evening started with a severe test for me. As we entered the dining room, I was directed to the far end of the table and two newly arrived pilgrims took my place opposite Shoghi Effendi. I had become so magnetised by his presence that it had never occurred to me such a thing could happen. As the Guardian talked to the new arrivals, I began remonstrating with myself for being unhappy; the Guardian was still there, but I found myself perforce, relegated to listening only, as did the members of the International Council. My mind had wandered from the Guardian's words. As at a great distance I heard him say:

“Tomorrow a delegation from the Bahá'í International Council will present a letter of felicitation to the Governor of Haifa on the occasion of the 15th annual celebration of the founding of the State of Israel. I want you to go with the delegation. I looked up, and the whole table were looking at me, as was the Guardian. Yes Shoghi Effendi I managed to say. It will help them to realise how widespread the Faith is, because you are from Africa. I was uplifted and joyful to be given a task like this, but nothing could replace being able to look across the table into his warm, steady eyes. Ugc Giachery, Jason Remey and I performed this mission the next day; we were received with much warmth.

Jessie Revel reported that locusts were devastating trees in Tel Aviv, only 100 miles away. “What shall we do if they start destroying our shrine gardens? We shall replant them” Was the Guardian's reply. He then turned to me and said: “Your next job is helping to found the institutions of the Cause in Kenya. Such was his caring nature, that he had sensed my mood and reached out to me.

Two days later, the Guardian's Buick, with his chauffer, Carlo driving, took Rúḥíyyih Khánúm, Nellie French (another new pilgrim) and myself 20 miles around the bay to 'Akká to visit the Most great prison where the Blessed Beauty and many of His followers and family had spent over two years under the most terrible conditions. As we entered this massive, bleak building, we tried to imagine the arrival of the Holy family. We ascended by an open stairs to the third floor and entered a large area surrounded by a number of cells. To our left, the first cell had a brass plate above the door stating Bahá'í Holy Place. It was explained to us that the Israeli Government had made a law that all the Holy places of every religion in the country should become the property of that religion and be marked in this way. Through the iron bars we could see a cell with three windows and a raised portion of the floor where Bahá'u'llah usually laid out His mat to sleep. Bars covered the windows also. We entered and sat on the rush mats to pray and visualise those incredible times, less than 100 years ago. Afterwards we saw the skylight high up in the ceiling of the central hall where the Purest Branch had fallen to his death. We recalled his request to His father that his life be a sacrifice for the world and especially that pilgrims should be allowed to visit the Blessed Beauty.

Leaving the prison we went along the road behind the battlements for about 200 yards to the House Aboud. For seven years the Holy family had lived here, after the prison. Yet the whole city was a prison for them and Bahá'u'llah Himself was confined to a few rooms. His own bedroom has a verandah on three sides, and we were told that pacing this narrow path, looking out to sea, was His only permitted exercise. On the end of a long divan rested a taj which He had worn. It was reverently covered by a delicate embroidered cloth. Again we and His Presence prayed and tried to visualise those days. Another room had been Abdu'l Bahá's and in this room Bahá'u'llah had written much of the Aqdas, as well as letters to the Kings of Europe.

Then, leaving the city, our car took us two miles into the country north-east of 'Akká. The whole valley was very fertile and luxuriant. Our dirt road led us to an imposing stone archway, the entrance to an oasis. We entered and crossed a wooden bridge over a stream and were greeted by a gardener. He had set out a table very old and chairs under the shade of some mulberry trees to welcome us. An ornamental garden seat had been built under these trees on one side of this small retreat. On this seat, Bahá'u'lláh had often rested and talked to His followers in the later years of His life. The gardener, who was also the custodian and lived nearby, brought a horse and invited us to watch while he harnessed it to a beam, centered on some ancient machinery atop a well. As the horse circled the well, water was drawn up by a chain of cups and spilled into a pipe which carried it to a fountain in the center of the garden. The peaceful clank of the harness, the songs of birds and the splash of the fountain as it rose from a pedestal produced an air of magic in that fragrant spot. The water overflowed and ran down a channel past Bahá'u'lláh's seat at the back of the garden and into what used to be another stream. This stream bed was some years ago now dried up because the British army had blocked it to reduce the incidence of mosquito and malaria. We saw in imagination the Blessed Beauty sitting talking with His followers and wondered what He had said to them there. Rúhíyyih Khánum had brought a picnic lunch which she now laid out. We sat eating and listening to the fountain and the birds, each occupied with his own thoughts.

Afterwards we were shown a small dwelling where Bahá'u'lláh had sometimes slept. Some of His blankets and personal possessions had been arranged in this bedroom, no doubt by the beloved Guardian or Rúhíyyih Khánum. Bahá'u'lláh had named this small island "The Ridván Garden" in memory of that other Ridván garden in Baghdad. After this, we went further north a few miles to visit the house of Masrahi where Bahá'u'lláh had lived for two years after leaving the prison. There were orchards and fields surrounding the with blossoms house and the air was fragrant.

We came upon the ruins of an ancient aqueduct which Bahá'u'lláh had been instrumental in getting repaired. Now with mains water everywhere, it was once more silent. We entered the mansion and ascended the stone stairs which had known the feet of the Blessed Beauty. His bedroom looked out over the beautiful scenery. It was as, we read, a deep joy to Him, after 9 years in 'Akká, without the sight of a blade of grass. At dinner that evening the Guardian talked about the forms of Government. He said that the British triple stage elections were nearest to Bahá'í and is a government "If the poorest, the best of the people. America should learn this method. Assemblies in the future, Local Assemblies in large towns may have double stage elections. Back to Africa,

Shoghi Effendi praised the teaching ~ ork of 'Alí Nakhjavani. ♦ I am very proud of what they have done so far. ♦ 'Alí and his brother were raised in Haifa by the Guardian when their parents had died. one of my fellow pilgrims{{p44}}

Shoghi Effendi said that Nellie French, one of my fellow pilgrims, had, in a way, done the did same work as Martha Root (who did it at an earlier time, when there were few institutions.) The blessings of the Master had enabled her to give the Message far and wide, especially in Italy. The thought occurs to me that, at this present time, years later, many isolated Bahá♦is are still doing this in places far from the cities.

In those days, all pilgrims were the guests of Shoghi Efendi. Western pilgrims lived in the house across the street from the Master♦s house and the Oriental pilgrims lived at the house near the Shrine of the Báb, much higher up the mountain. It was the beloved Guardian♦s custom to have dinner each night with the Western pilgrims, so that they could talk informally with him. In the afternoons, he would walk round the Shrine gardens with the Oriental pilgrims and talk as they went. Of course, each group felt it had a priceless privilege in this arrangement and felt sorry for the other group, so everyone was happy! The next day, being the 9th of Ridván, we were~invited to the Oriental pilgrim house where the Guardian gave a talk on the meaning of this Holy Day. He spoke entirely in Persian, because I was the only Westerner present. However, much to my embarrassment, he stopped in the middle and gave me a shortened account of what he had been saying. I felt touched by his consideration. Looking back, it was clear that he was making sure a minority did not feel left out. Afterwards, we all went to the Shrine of the E~ab. Surprisingly the ladies entered a door on the north side of the shrine and the men into a door on the south side with the Guardian.

I should explain, there are 9 rooms inside the shrine of the Báb, ♦ ♦ 71~ all about equal in size and arranged in three rows. The center room of the middle group is the holy spot where the Báb♦s remain are enshrined; each side there is a room for the pilgrims who approach a low step and offer their prayers, the men on one side and the ladies on the other. Each can see into the center chamber from opposite sides, through a wide mesh curtain

Later, Rúhiyyih Khánum explained to us that in future, it would be changed, but now it was too much of a break with tradition for Oriental men and ladies to pray together. She herself, of course, properly led the ladies. But to return to the 9th Day of Ridván; Shoghi Effendi stood just inside the door as the men entered, and anointed them with attar of roses as each stepped in. The first two Persians tried to kiss his feet, but he raised them up and moved them along. When we were all gathered, Shoghi Effendi came to the threshold and recited the prayer of Visitation. In Persian; It hangs, framed, on the wall just to one side. He then th-knealt at the threshold for a few moments and backed out to the door, keeping his face to the threshold. We all followed his example. The Guardian led us next into the front section of the building where lies our beloved Master. Similar devotions were followed there.

Both center rooms were covered with masses of flowers, arranged with great care. All present must have been much uplifted in spirit as we spent some time walking round the beautiful gardens afterwards.{{p46}}

A few days earlier, Shoghi Effendi had requested me to take photographs of the inside of the Shrine of the Báb, now that it was specially decorated for Ridván. He said he would advise me when this should be done.

While we were waiting in the Pilgrim House one evening for the Guardian to arrive for dinner, Rúhiyyih Khánum suddenly appeared alone and said ♦ Ted, the Guardian says that now is the time to photograph the Shrine of the Báb. Dr Hákím will come with you and the Guardian ♦s car is waiting to take you up to the Shrine. If you hurry, you will be back in time for at least the last half of the Guardian ♦s dinner.

Shoghi Effendi had told me I was to feel free to take the photographs in any manner I wished. He had then remarked, ♦ Have you noticed that with colour photos, if you slightly underexpose, the colors will be more brilliant? ♦ It was the early days of color photography and I was amazed that he was so knowledgeable about it. ♦ He continued, ♦ If you place the camera centrally, the picture will be perfectly symmetrical, as you look through to the inner shrine. ♦ This I took careful note of and made sure of taking before anything else. However I also took one slightly off center, for I felt this gave more depth. With three cameras, I took many pictures and we finally arrived back at the Pilgrim House about 11 p.m. The Guardian had long finished his dinner and gone back to his home across the street. Rúhiyyih Khánum was waiting for us with a plate of sandwiches and must have noticed my exhaustion and disappointment at missing dinner with the Guardian. We said good night and everyone retired.

Next morning, Rúḥíyyih Khánúm came across to the house after breakfast and said, Ted, the Guardian says that, if you feel it wise, you may cable your editor in Nairobi to ask for a ten day extension of pilgrimage. As mentioned earlier, due to my own fumbling and miscalculations I had plagued my editor with a number of different schedules and felt most embarrassed, about it. Now I was considering upsetting my editor's affairs even more, and by a simple cable which would not allow me to explain or apologise. It is too late Rúḥíyyih Khánúm, I said

{{p47}}

I dare not take the risk of upsetting my editor. Well, think about it Ted, and whatever you decide is alright with the Guardian. He feels there will be a lot to photograph, more than you can do in nine days. After much thought, I discussed the matter with Ugo Giachery and decided to send a cable. Anything was worth an extra ten days. Together we walked down to the main post office in town, a half hour's walk; and since it was then nearly midnight, we went round to the rear entrance and found a way in, sent off the cable and came back to the pilgrim house. We said goodnight and went to our rooms. As I was getting into bed I suddenly remembered I had put the wrong return date on the cable. There was no option but to get dressed, go down town and send off a corrected cable. Once more I was getting into bed and realised that again I had made a mistake. I dressed and returned to the post office. And yes, a third time I saw a mistake and had to send off a third cable. Now my editor would surely lose his patience, but curiously I did not in the least worry about it. Sufficient that the Guardian had given me a chance to spend ten more days in the Holy Land, taking photographs for him. It did not occur to me that there was very much more in this matter than I was aware of, but subsequent events amply repaid all my worries. For two years I felt too ashamed to tell anyone about it, but one day 'Azíz and I were chatting about the Will of God and many things, so I recounted my bungling experience. Hmm! he remarked maybe God was trying to tell you something? ~ What could that be? I enquired. Perhaps that if an event is the Will of God, then whatever mistakes we make, it is still going to happen. That is curious, I said The last thing the Guardian said to me as I departed was, We are very glad you were able to stay the extra ten days, it was evidently the Wirl of God. ♦ As you will have guessed, two days after sending off the three conflicting cables I received a reply ♦ Extension permitted. ♦ {{p48}}

On another occasion, the Guardian discussed the rescue of the Báb ♦'s body which was thrown outside the moat of the city after the execution. There is a tradition that the remains of the Imám would be preserved. The Mullás thought that wild dogs would devour the remains and thus prove to the public that the Báb was not the promised Imám. However, some of the believers bribed the soldiers to turn their backs while the Holy remains were spirited away and hidden in a silk factory. The son of this factory owner had just arrived on pilgrimage and the Guardian welcomed him warmly.

The Guardian spoke of the great significance of this Day, saying, ♦ ~dam and all the other 7i c?he~s were preparing the world for Bah ♦ u ♦ llah Who w ♦ ould cast His shaddow over the next 500,000 centuries. Six thousand years of preparation to be followed by 500 centuries of fulfillment. There will be other Manifestations Who will repeal the Aqdas (if They wish) and there will even be minor Prophets after the Thousand or more years. We must distinguish between the Bahá ♦ i cycle and the Spiritual cycle of 5u( ~,0( ♦ J centuries. ♦ ♦ ~o ♦ he replied in answer to a question, ♦ The Guardians are not minor Prophets. ♦

There had been 200 pioneers from Persian to Arabia. No other such efflux had occurred except to Africa.

One morning Rúhíyyih Khánum arrived as Ugo and I were having breakfast in the pilgrim house. The Guardian wanted photographs taken of many of the holy relics in the archives room. These were at present kept in the back section of the Shrine. She would come with me and bring them out into the sun to be photographed. So, on Thursday, May 1st 1952, the Guardian ♦'s car took us up to the Shrine where began the difficult task of finding a suitable background for laying out these precious relics. Here, in the brilliant sunshine we photographed many of these personal possessions of the Holy Ones ♦ the Báb ♦'s copy of the Qur'án and His own Bayán and ring. As I was arranging these to photograph Rúhíyyih Khánum came out of the Shrine saying: ♦ Hold out your arms Ted. ♦ I did so, and she laid the Báb ♦'s green robe upon them. I stood speechless. [Include story of ♦ The Robe ♦ .]

Later we photographed the personal effects of Bahá'u'llah, His seals, His pens and pen case, His rings and taj.
{{p49}}

The following day, I was sent to Bahjí in the Guardian's car. Here Salah, the custodian, took charge of me. He was an Arab who had great devotion for the Guardian. To him, looking after the holiest place on earth was a most great responsibility, one to which he devoted body and soul without restraint. He lived very simply. He showed me into Abdu'l Bahá's tea room, as it is known. Here, while the sparrows flew in and out of the door, busily building their nests in the big rafters, we ate from a picnic basket which Rúhíyyih Khánum had thoughtfully provided. He told me stories of the early believers and of the history of Bahjí. As we talked, the chirping of the sparrows gave the place an air of peace and upliftment. After a prayer, he led me to the Shrine and opening the door, showed me the threshold of the room where Bahá'u'lláh's earthly remains rest. I stood as one in a trance, hardly daring to believe that I had at last arrived at this most sacred spot. What does one do in such circumstances?

Sala must have been a bit shocked that I just stood there; he said in a quiet voice "We generally kneel and pray here. His remark was meant with the best intentions, but it struck me as an intrusion between Bahá'u'llah and me. I knelt at the raised threshold and prayed a while and meditated some more and then looked around me. I was in a kind of conservatory garden with tall plants filling the center, and in one corner the door to a room where the holy casket lay under a large embossed brass plate in the floor. Beautiful flower filled vases stood at each corner and on the threshold were sprinkled rose petals, some of which I guiltily swept into my prayer book, not realising that they had been put there for just this purpose. No. Ornamental lamps glowed in many places, giving a warm feeling. They were antiques, made of pewter. The heat of the plain of 'Akká had made them droop under their own weight. Another prayer, and we both backed out, to reclaim shoes and cameras outside the door.

Next we visited the mansion itself. The ground floor was all service areas, and we mounted to the main living part, up a long flight of stone stairs. It did not escape me that my feet were literally following in the footsteps of the Blessed Beauty. Upstairs, I entered a large central hall with various rooms opening from it. They were partly furnished according to those custom of those times and partly used to display Bahá'í books and documents from many countries.
{{p50}}

A curtain covered the door of a large corner room. Sala pulled it aside and motioned me in. Leaving shoes ~ camera outside, I entered Bahá'u'lláh's bedroom. His bed and slippers lay on a lovely Persian carpet which covered the whole floor. His taj, covered by lace, rested on one end of a long divan which graced the far wall; mute but powerful reminders of the holy Presence Who had lived here for twelve years. I imagined Professor Brown coming in as I had done and hearing a mild, dignified voice saying ~ ing ~; .hou h_st at~.ined.

The next day Salah and I walked the two miles to 'Akká and as we wandered through its ancient byways he told me that all the streets of 'Akká had touched the feet of Bahá'u'lláh or the Master. I tried to imagine Them also sitting in a cafe in one of those streets, drinking coffee and talking with the people there. The Master, Salah told me, had made many secret visits of charity in 'Akká, usually while the city slept.

I had asked Rúhíyyih Khánum, when I arrived, how was it possible for me to make a pilgrimage and also take photographs? TheA did not seem compatible. She sympathised and suggested that one idea would be to leave the cameras in my bedroom on alternate days. Sometimes I did this, for every day was a king of days; how could I be concerned with photography.? And how could I not have a camera with me at all times to record those holy places and the inspiring momentC spent there? Now, as we followed the winding alleys carrying my large camera bag between us, I was able to get many pictures which will in future enable those who will never manage to make the pilgrimage, at least to glean some of the atmosphere of that holy city and its august Prisoner.

Back at Bahjí for one more night and day, I was forced once again to unite pilgrimage and photography. The beloved Guardian had asked me to photograph all of the inside of the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. Sala left me quite alone during this and the deep silence and fragrant atmosphere {{p51}} kept me as in a spell while I went about considering composition and exposures. That night, as on the two previous nights, I slept in the mansion of Bahjí. My room was the nearest one to the Shrine and for a long time I paced the verandah which circles three sides of the Mansion. It was a clear night and I could see Mt.Carmel and the floodlit shrine of the Báb across the bay, about 15 miles away. The wind blew softly through the gum streets surrounding Bahjí while I prayed for spiritual guidance. I could look down on the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh only 50 feet away and meditate on the inconceivable significance of this Revelation and its import for mankind.

The next day was spent visiting the prison in 'Akká and later, the house of Aboud where Bahá'u'lláh had been incarcerated for over seven years. While there, He had, I believe, written again to the Kings of Europe. He had also composed much of the Aqdas.

Abdu'l Bahá had been married there. I wandered along the battlements of the sea wall and pondered on the Muslim tradition ❖Ble~sed is he that counts 40 waves in 'Akká.

My stay in 'Akká had come to an end; I had missed about four dinner times with the Guardian and hurried back to Haifa by public bus. The friends there were busy preparing a special dinner to entertain some of their Jewish friends from the city.

R~hiyyih Khánum said ~ ❖I am determined to have friends that I like and have a good time with them. The International Council members and the Hands present were all joining in with the festivities, but I could only think that I would be missing another dinner with Shoghi Effendi, a steep price to pay for such a party.

The next night at dinner, the Guardian asked me about my experiences at Bahjí ~nd I tried, stumblingly to put some of them into words. Although none of the extensive gardens at Bahjí one sees today had even been created then, yet the whole area had seemed most holy and far beyond mortal understanding. Coming back to the inner Shrine itself, the Guardian asked my impression. I felt it was a most fitting and unusual Shrine whose items had been assembled with great care and devotion. I mentioned the lights held up by sagging light brackets and wondered if they could be straightened? He said ❖They are antiques and would probably crack off if we tried it. This reminded me of his other remarks on my second day of pilgrimage. He had sent Millie Collins with me to the Shrine of the Báb. Over all the great beauty there, I had noticed a marble pillar on which stood meth Idtulips, painted gold. When he had asked for my impressions, naturally I,~praised the most wonderful Shrine and the extensive gardens, so expertly laid out; but I also expressed surprise at the metal flowers. The answer was very simple. ❖In the hot summer, no other flowers survive! ❖

The Guardian went on to emphasise the great need for developing the World Center in Haifa, together with the administration all over the world. It will be the world nervous system. He spoke with great love of those who had done so much towards this ♦ Martha Root, May Maxwell, Keith Ranson Keller, Dr. Susan Moody and the Dunns in Australia. ♦ They are now buried all over the world according to the Master ♦'s instructions. ♦ Go ye into all the world. ♦ ♦ We must always think in terms of ♦ World Crusade, World Order, World Plan and World concepts in everything. ♦

He spoke of the coming World Plan 1953 ♦ 1963 which would take the Faith to every part of the Globe. He will send instructions to each of the coming Inter ♦ continental Conferences.

Here I must pay tribute to the efforts of all the friends who sat at the Guardian ♦'s dinner table and afterwards, as we sat in the upstairs lounge, helped each other record all the remarks the beloved Guardian had made that evening. As I have mentioned, the Guardian did not wish any notes to be taken at the table.

♦ Pilgrims come to experience the Spirit of the Holy Shrines, not receive information. ♦ He is reported to have said. It goes without saying that all these records I have are just pilgrim notes and nothing more. There is no authenticity in them. They are notes of wonderful hours spent with the Guardian; I pass them on with the hope that they may help the reader to glean just some of the spiritual food that was offered to us during those soul stirring days.

He touched on the subject of the coming world calamity mentioned by Bah ♦ u ♦ llah in Gleanings: (p.1 19;1) ♦ . . . there shall suddenly appear that which will cause the limbs of mankind to quake. Then, and only then, will the Divine Standard be unfurled . . . ♦ He emphasised that this refers to a literal catastrophe, world ♦ wide. There would be no escape for anyone, the Bahá ♦ is would suffer with the rest of mankind. All we can do is to get on with the teaching and help to alleviate it. This disaster would affect every part of the world systems and would awaken {{p53}} mankind. There would be mass conversion after it. In Africa, this mass conversion may come before the calamity. It depends on the qualities of the Bahá ♦ is!

At that time, the Covenant ♦ breakers were still active and the Guardian mentioned that their machinations had prevented him for three months from considering the coming Inter-continental Conferences. He said that the covenant breakers are now few and des-erate.

He went on to talk about the materialistic civilisation so rampant in the world and reminded us of Bahá'u'llah's statement that in excess it leads to turmoil and burning of cities.

◆ Divorced from the spiritual it will lead to a breakdown. It should be complimentary. Moral stimulus comes from the Prophets. ◆ He affirmed.

The Guardian went on to say: ◆ The impulse of the colonial people for independence is good. We should encourage it but guard against its extremes. ◆ Little did I know that I was soon to be involved in the British Government's handing over of Kenya to independence. When that happened in 1963 I was a Government servant and had to help train the local people to do my job. All ◆ whites ◆ were to be replaced by Kenyans. We all wondered if they would be able to do the work, but for many years they made a very good job of it under President Jomo Kenyatta.

The Guardian described the misuse of the Press media in U.S.A. They influence the masses and this is not democracy. On the confrontation between the U.S.A. and Russia he said that we should side with neither for both are wrong, one is extremely materialistic and the other atheistic. The Bahá'í administration is not democratic but embodies the best parts of all systems, with much more besides.

◆ Palestine has acquired spiritual potency due to the Prophets. It is also the junction of the three continents. The Holy Land is now becoming the world spiritual center as well as the world administrative center under Bahá'u'llah's dispensation. They will never be separated again, as in past dispensations. ◆ We now own 50 acres on Mt. Carmel and all of it is exempted from taxes. Five acres are for the coming temple. To buy land here now is strategic, spiritually. ◆ {{p54}}

Continuing the matters touched upon by the Guardian, he said that Turkey now has three Local Spiritual Assemblies and wanted a National Assembly, but it was premature. He followed with : ◆ It has taken twenty years to build the institutions so that the Holy Spirit can function through them. ◆ He had just received a postcard from the Pacific, telling of the declaration of the first among the brown races. ♦ Now we have all the races. He said.

♦ The Báb ♦'s relatives took the Faith to China. ♦

At this time the Guardian was gathering the members of the newly appointed International Council, which was to precede the election of the Universal House of Justice. Rihlyih Khánúm asked him if Ted should take a photograph of them, but he said that it was too early.

Shoghi Effendi asked Mason Remy if he had modified part of the drawing for the Haifa temple, as requested. Mason went out and brought in the design for the cupolas which will cap the pillars and laid it before the Guardian. He considered it for a while and then said: ♦ Yes that is better. ♦ From this I inferred, that although Mason was designing the temple, yet the Guardian was supervising every little detail and Mason was merely his pen.

How could we have known that on the Guardian ♦'s passing, only six years hence, Mason Remy would become a Covenant ♦ breaker by claiming to be the next Guardian, against all the conditions laid down by Abdu ♦ I Bahá.

The Guardian was asked the meaning of ♦ Gog and Magog ♦ as mentioned in the Bible. He said that perhaps they symbolise good and evil, but as long as the teachings throw no light on the matter, we must be liberal and follow the scholars or those who are expert in these matters. Other interesting remarks were that each Prophet in the past had appointed a successor, but none of them had written it down on paper as an explicit authority. Paul usurped Peter and started the first schism in Christianity. The Califs usurped 'Alí. But in this Faith it was explicit.

Someone asked what are the things we should emphasise in teaching today. His reply was that we should tell of the existence of God; the immortality of the soul; the necessity for religion; the oneness of humanity; the coming of age of humanity. We should concentrate on the main teachings of the Master, not on tradition or prophecies. Appeal to the reason of the individual, not to his feelings. Teach the necessity for true religion, as separate from creeds. {{p55}}

The Guardian continued: ♦ What is the purpose of God ♦'s creation?

It is the purpose of all the Prophets ♦ to prepare mankind for the recognition of the station of Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah. ♦ Some Answered Questions ♦ and the ♦ Íqán ♦ are the most important for teachers.

We must both spread the seed and try to make converts. . .

Later, ♦ The Guardian will be above all the leaders of mankind.

The Hands will each be the center of a Istar ~ st~r ♦

There was an interesting sequel years later to my question to the Guardian, about the antiques lamp holders in the outer court of the shrine of Bahá♦u♦Allah. Earlier I have reported that he had said they might break if we tried to straighten them. In 1973 I was again visiting the Shrine. After prayers I once more looked at the drooping lamps in the outer court and wondered what would be the penalty in eternity for breaking one of them. I took hold of the nearest one and straightened it up. It did not break! I did the next and still no disaster. I resolved to stop if any broke, but I was able to straighten all the rest without a break and was overjoyed at the improvement. The Guardian had long since passed to the Abhá Kingdom of course (in 1957). The Universal House of Justice was now in charge. I told Amos Gibson what I had done and he looked pleased. Five years later I was again on pilgrimage as a delegate. When I entered the shrine I saw that every one of the lamps had sagged back to its original position! The summer heat on the plain of 'Akká had been too much for the soft metal.

To return to the beloved Guardian♦s dinner table in 1952, one evening he was in a light hearted mood. He looked at me with a loving twinkle in his eye: ♦ The English teaching effort is like its weather, a steady drizzle. Oh but a much appreciated drizzle! Now the American teaching effort is also like its weather. When they receive a letter from me they rush off and do thing with great energy, like their stormy weather. After a few weeks it dries up and I have to send them another letter! ♦ I saw him really laugh for the first time. It was clear that he had great love for both communities and was trying to urge them on.

♦ The world is now like the Roman empire was, prior to its collapse. There are few leaders left in England and the U.S.A. There is poverty in art and finance. General Eisenhower president ♦ what a pity!{{p56}}

♦ Christianity did not have the institutions that we have at this stage Now the question is, do we have the courage and the spirit? The Popes were the true citadel and had great courage.

The Guardian said: ♦ Recently, Musa Bahá♦i, 8 Covenant ♦ breaker, had Invited the British Consul to a party to spread lies about the Faith. We took counter measures to inform the authorities of the difference between ourselves and the Covenant breakers.

We should not observe uniformity in prayer and worship at the Shrines. But we all stand for the Prayers of Visitation.

The soul is much more important than the body, and the body is more important than a member. The soul uses the body to progress higher. The soul is the revelation of Bahá'u'llah. Each part of the body must play its part. It is the same in the Faith. Some Persian Bahá'is feel the Cause is to advance Persia, but they must sacrifice everything to the purpose of Bahá'u'llah and then have loyalty to their country.

Bahá'u'llah said: If the Cause had appeared first in Europe, it would have attained ascendancy over the thought of mankind because of the freedom of intelligence in the background culture. The culture of Europe was due to Socrates who studied with the Jews, a result of Moses efforts with a decadent, thieving race in Egypt.

America is desperately in need of material help against Communism. America is the citadel of the Faith, but their materialism is based on the negation of justice. The Outer citadel will crumble but the inner will survive. There is a fear creeping over the Americans, greater than the fear of any other nation ever. (This was in 1952)

On the last day of my pilgrimage, I was privileged to meet the beloved Guardian in his reception room with only Rúhíyyih Khánum present in addition. The notes I made afterwards while waiting for my plane at the airport were as follows: Please tell the British believers how much I admire their organising ability, their devotion and their many services to the Faith.
{{p57}}

Please send me the proofs of all the photographs you have taken and I will indicate which I would appreciate having enlargements of and how many of each. When you send them, I will send you a check.

I was much disturbed at the idea of accepting any money for this and hastened to assure Shoghi Effendi: O, no, Guardian, this is my contribution. I do not wish to charge you anything. I said.

He looked at me very directly and said quite firmly: ♦ You must allow me to have an interest in this. ♦ ♦ Yes Shoghi Effendi. ♦ I said obediently.

He then said: ♦ All the photographs you took inside the Shrines of the Báb and Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah, please send to me; but all of the others, you must feel free to sell to the friends. David Hofman sells his books to the friends, and you can sell the photographs. ♦

Inwardly, at this moment, my deepest concern was that I was now leaving Haifa where the very air seemed heavenly, and where the human relationships must surely be a foretaste of the Kingdom of Heaven Itself. Some of this must have shown itself in my face for the Guardian said ♦ Do not be sad; you will come back, you will come back! ♦ I wondered how this could ever be, since I now had nothing left in the bank at all and an uncertain job. (Later note in 199 . I have now been back 8 times.)

The Guardian went on: ♦ We hope you will have a Local Spiritual Assembly in Nairobi by the time of the Africa Conference in Kampala next year. (1953) We live for the day when the first African believers will arrive in Haifa. Perhaps you will bring them. ♦ We did achieve our Assembly within a year. What is more, in 1963, only eleven years later, the entire National Spiritual Assembly of Central and East Africa came to Haifa as delegates to elect the first Universal House of Justice. There were five African members and four pioneers in that Assembly, including myself. But the beloved Guardian was no longer there to receive them.

Shoghi Effendi ♦ s last words to me in this world were: ♦ We are glad you were able to stay the extra ten days. God meant it to be. Now that you have been here, you can come any time you want in spirit. ♦ He embraced me firmly on each shoulder, and left. {{p58}}

Back in Nairobi, 'Azíz and I continued our efforts to make friends with the African people and of course our prayers were much inspired by Shoghi Effendi ♦ s encouraging remarks. One Saturday afternoon some friends turned up at our house for a fireside. I shall never forget the rapt attention with which they listened to 'Azíz talking about Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah. One of these was an old woman from the Kikuyu tribe; she seemed especially interested. She had suffered much but still had faith in her Creator. She urged us to go and introduce ourselves to some adult students at the medical school. I remember two of their names, Jacob Kisombe and Joseph. When the friends had gone home, 'Aziz was still uplifted by the apparent deep nature of the proceedings. ♦ You know Ted, ♦ he said ♦ their enthusiasm was so heart warming, that if I were not already a Bahá ♦ i, I would have declared myself!

How mysterious and unaccountable are the ways of God! We pray and then go out and do what seems the right thing, then God turns it in the direction he desires. We never saw any of those lovely people again, but this day was the key to the opening of the Faith in Kenya. The six medical students received us warmly, almost as if they had been expecting us. They started coming regularly to public meetings which we began holding in the United Kenya Club building; soon, all of them declared their faith in Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah. We learned later how deep was their conviction, for Jacob went home to Mombasa for the holidays and while there he told his father and other leaders of the community about his new discovery. They sat up all night trying to get him to give it up and go back to the church. Their arguments and pleading had no effect at all on Jacob who staunchly held to his conviction. As the dawn came up, his father put his arm around Jacob and said ♦ My son, if it means that much to you, you stick to it! ♦

More declarations followed and I remember Francis Jumba and others who became alight with the Faith and took it back to the reservation in Maragoli district, near the Uganda border. Soon 'Aziz and I were invited to go with him on trips to Maragoli district and spend weekends teaching the people in their own villages. At last we were able to meet the people in their own homes, to eat with them sing songs together and sleep in their huts. Meanwhile, {{p59}} several new pioneers began to arrive in Kenya. Claire Gung moved up from Rhodesia and found a job in the hospital, Tahereh Vatamparast arrived from Iran and found a nursing job, and Ursula Samandarí arrived from England. Ursula tried hard to get a job in Nairobi, but was unsuccessful. In desperation she accepted a job at an isolated farm. She became the ♦ nanny ♦, looking after the farmers children.

Ursula had recently married Mehdi Samandarí, son of the Hand of the Cause and now set about trying to get her new husband accepted by the Kenya immigration. Since she was English, they agreed, but when they found out that Mehdi was Asiatic, they refused, because the Government was not allowing any further Asians into the country.

The Mau mau rebellion was just starting up and demanding independence for Kenya. To make their point, they had started murdering isolated farmers out in the country and Ursula knew this but had no option but to accept the nanny's job if she wanted to stay in the country. One night, Ursula was alone with the children at the farm and hearing sounds of forced entry in the back of the house she assumed she was to be the next victim.

She put on her burial ring and started praying the noise stopped. She continued praying all night. She and her husband eventually found a job in West Africa and spent many devoted years building the Faith up to National Assembly status there.

Next to arrive in Kenya were Tahereh and Ainee Alai, a very devoted couple of Persian pioneers. I remember going up country on a teaching trip with them. We were entertained most hospitably by the African villagers, who felt much honoured by the visit of two foreigners who were obviously used to very much higher living conditions and now fitted in naturally with this very simple life. We shared their food and slept in a room of their house. This became a frequent practice for all the pioneers, for the teaching work was 300 miles from Nairobi over dirt roads.

Not long after this three pioneers from the U.S.A. arrived. Fred and Beth Laws and Fred Schechter. They described how their ship had called at a port called Walvis Bay, on the west coast of Africa. It was the only port for the large British territory of S.W. Africa, a most desolate place 600 miles inland. A single railway line and a dirt road led inland to the isolated town of Windhoek. In that desolate country they raised sheep for the karakul pelts of the unborn lambs. There was also a diamond mine, and a uranium mine. In the far north there was some jungles and wild animals but not enough to attract tourists. There were no Bahfists living there, so the three pioneers joked with each other about, who would be the lucky person to one day bring the Faith to this territory. More about this later.

Let us turn back to Kenya. In 1952 the whiteman still ruled everything. Although there was very friendly relations between black and white, the old servile customs still held-Each whiteman had a modern house. He employed three native servants at the tiny wage of 30/- (about $3) a month plus primitive native quarters. These three men each had their clearly defined duties which they kept to as rigidly as any trade union. One was cook, under madam's supervision, another was house boy and the third looked after the garden. In the country it was worse; when the whiteman travelled over the long dirt roads, his wheels raised clouds of dust a mile long. If any African was walking along that road he would stand and doff his hat while the car went by, thus being completely enveloped in the dust cloud for about 15 minutes.

Another strange situation existed. Between the white man and the African worlds there was an Asian culture. A hundred years ago, large numbers of Indians (from India) had been brought in to build the railway which started at Mombasa, on the coast, and would its way inland 400 miles to the city of Nairobi which, since it was at 5,000 feet, was quite pleasant to live in, although only 100 miles from the equator. Later, the rail was extended another 440 mile to the inland city of Kampala, the capitol of Uganda. When it had all been built, the Indians did not return to India but settled down as shop keepers and artisans at a wage intermediate between the white and black populations. They did so well at it that by 1952 they had a complete monopoly of these occupations and would not allow Africans to enter them. They even built their own Hindu temple and founded an elaborate culture of their own. It was a tidy arrangement in many ways, at least for those on top of others, but it must have been a major factor in driving the African population, (by far the majority), to raise in later years a fierce call for becoming an independent African nation.{{p61}}

Although the teaching work in Kenya was still in its infancy, yet in Uganda it was forging ahead into large numbers of declarations. The beloved Guardian had told us that we should not insist on full knowledge of the Faith before accepting a declaration. "The African people, he said, are more attuned to feelings of the heart and if you feel that the heart of a person has been touched by the Faith, then you may accept his declaration and everything else would come in time.

When Musa Banání had arrived in Kampala with his family, 'Alí Nakhjavani his son in law had at first taken a job as school teacher, but this did not allow him much time for travelling two or three hundred miles upcountry where the Message of Bahá'u'llah was now taking root. Mr Bancroft could only speak Persian and therefore appeared to be unable to help physically. He appealed to 'Alí therefore, to become his full time deputy and accept his financial support for doing so. 'Alí gladly agreed and soon the numbers of declarations increased dramatically. The Guardian was, of course, greatly delighted and must have been backing up the pioneers efforts closely with prayers at the holy shrines. He soon felt that it was time to call for a major Bahá'í conference in Kampala and announcing this to the Bahá'í world, asked the Local Spiritual Assembly of Kampala to arrange the details. Donations from many countries had already provided the funds to purchase a special house in Kampala which became the Bahá'í Center, and the large garden was to be the scene of that gathering.

Shoghi Effendi was determined to make it a real success and was well aware that the main bulk of the new declarations came from people living far from Kampala and that it was doubtful if they would make that long trip unaided. He therefore sent a message to the Kampala Assembly that all these new wonderful Bahá'ís were to be his guests at the conference. He sent funds to hire a whole fleet of buses to bring them to town and also ordered the renting of living quarters for them in Kampala for the four days. He provided food also.

Pha~ When the time came, the conference was a great success and well attended. At the Guardian's request, all eleven Hands of the Cause attended. At his urging, many Bahá'ís from all over the world attended. I asked my editor for a few days holiday and he gladly agreed, suggesting that{{p62}} I take the opportunity to photograph the city and its people for later use in the newspaper.

The overseas visitors filled all the hotels in town and the few cars owned by the pioneers were kept busy ferrying the people between them and the conference site. I well remember one occasion when I had three Hands of the Cause and Mildred Motahedeh in my car. She was crammed on the back seat with a Hand on either side and delightedly announced that this was the first time she had been squeezed between two hands.

Matthew Bullock representing the N.S.A. of America and gave a stirring talk about the African people being able to hold their heads up with pl I any other country. Dorothy Baker continued on the same theme of helping them to be proud of their race. Unfortunately this was still a British Colony where whitemen were superior. A government secret service man who had been invited to attend was very upset at these remarks. It took a lot of explanation of Bahá'í principles to explain to him that there was no revolutionary intent in these remarks.

I had been to large Bahá'í conferences in England and Europe, but this one seemed to have unusual power and inspiration. Everyone knew that something historical was happening during those few days in the middle of Africa. The Guardian had sent the portrait of Bahá'u'llah to be shown and it made a big impression on us all as we queued up to see that wonderful face and look into His eyes where the whole universe seemed to rest in perfect serenity. When the four days were over, we could hardly believe it was time to get back into the old world again.

Soon after my return to Nairobi my newspaper, the East African Standard informed me that they had to make economical moves and that my photographic department was to be closed down. This was a big shock for me. But on discussing it with a friend who owned a pharmacy nearby, he offered to open up a small commercial photo department for me and split the profits between us. The result was that I was then able to offer my services as before to the newspaper and also start building a commercial business with Robby, my friend.{{p63}}

Life went on as before and now we would soon be able to elect the first Local Spiritual Assembly of Nairobi. My photo business began to expand and I was able to continue radioing photographs of the Mau Mau rebellion to London newspapers as I had done in my previous job. Next I was able to secure a government contract to make identity photos of the entire Kikuyu tribe, one by one for identity cards. A rival photographer photographed me doing this and got it published on the front page of the Daily Telegraph newspaper. My parents sent me a cutting.

One day I was working in my darkroom I was told that a lady wanted to see me. I went out into the shop and met Irene Benette, just arrived from England. Her relatives had told her about the Faith and to contact me if she wanted to know more. We had some discussion, but she suddenly remembered her bicycle.

Going outside, we found it had been stolen, so we toured the town looking for the thief, but to no avail. But the Bahá'í discussion went on unabated. I took her to meet the other pioneers and she became a regular attendee to all our meetings.

Soon she recognised Bahá'u'llah and progressed speedily in knowledge of the Faith. We were now able to elect the L.S.A. of Nairobi. Irene eventually pioneered to central Africa and was appointed a Board Member.

Loving Persian Bahá'is gave us the money to build our own Bahá'í Center in Nairobi. Land was secured and the entire Bahá'í community enthusiastically rolled up their sleeves and cleared the site. Providentially Rúhíyyih Khánum herself came and turned the first sod. When the building was finished it became an ideal training {{p64}} center for groups of 20 travel teachers to live there and complete a deepening course before going out all over Kenya.

♦♦iG~t The Faith grew steadily in Uganda Kenya and Tanganyika.

The Guardian ♦qshowed his joy by announcing the election of an Area National Spiritual ~ ♦ tr~4 Assembly to administer these territories. In Kenya the N.S.A. ~ ♦~ 5 appointed five District Teaching Committees to supervise all the teaching work and make sure new declarations were real. This was in accordance with the Guardian♦s advice that we should train the most reliable African Bahá♦is to carry the Faith to their people, for they would know better than we how to do it. The pioneers were now released to concentrate more on deepening the friends, but such were the numbers of new Bahá♦is and so great the distance of their homes f ♦ om Nairobi that it was an almost impossible task.

To further these aims, Hand of the Cause Millie Collins donated $40 to buy each roof for any village up country which first built O ~ the walls~w,~ wood and mud. Eight of these Centers were soon in operation and became a big attraction. There was only one small snag, since the roofs were of corrugated tin , it was almost impossible to hear any speaking inside them when there was a tropical down pour hammering on the roof.

One day 'Azíz and I arrived up ♦ country on a Feast Day and called a large gathering to celebrate it. We had previously distributed many simple prayer books in Swahili, but none could be found on this day. However Wilfred Masinde came to the rescue. He said he had memorised a prayer. He recited it with much fervour, but in the middle we heard our own names. Afterwards, 'Azíz turned to me and said ♦That♦s funny, I dont remember being mentioned in any of Bahá♦u♦llah♦s prayers! ♦ We rounded off{{p64a}}

One day, 'Azíz had a brilliant idea. On one of his teaching trips up country he bought about 100 eggs from the African friends to give them some income. He had brought a lot of cardboard separators an~,~piled the eggs safely between them on the back seat. On the long ride home ~11 went well until he was about to pass a cyclist who at that moment t~obbed across the road in front of the car. 'Azíz stamped hard on the brakes and received the ~hole batch of eggs in the back of his neck. He had to stop and clean the car out ~ilst the cyclist went on wobbling down the road quite unaware of the catastrophe he had caused. 'Azíz was a highly devoted pioneer and yet he seemed to run into more trouble than most. On a following trip his windscreen was smashed by a stone thrown up by an approaching car. There was a three hundred mile journey to do, so he and his friends wrapped themselves up well and drove home. ♦ How was the journey ♦?

♦ I asked him. ♦ Well it was fine until we ran into a big cloud of gnats at 60 m.p.h. Can you imagine it? Gnats in your eyes, hair ears and nose at high speed! ♦ We wanted to do some social service for the African people, so one weekend some of the lady pioneers from Kampala and some from Nairobi met in the reservation and gave cooking classes to a whole village. It was a great success and they were really appreciated. We had heard that there was a taboo against women eating eggs. Men however were immune from harm. Trying to overcome this traditional tradition the ladies gave lessons on cooking omelettes. The aroma was so attractive that several women were persuaded to eat them. However Violette recalls the memory of one native woman holding a baby on one arm and an omelette in the other hand and trying to choose between them. She was determined to eat the omelette but wailed sorrowfully: ♦ But who is going to look after my baby when I die! ♦ Wilfred Masinde was one of our best teachers. He had been a teacher for the Christian missionaries. As an experienced Baháí {p64b} he knew the Guardian's instructions that however many wives a person has on becoming a Baháí, justice dictates that he keep them, but no more were allowed. Wilfred knew that now he was a believer he could only have the wife he already married; but one day he told 'Azíz that African custom now required that he take a second wife and he wanted to do so. We were all very surprised by this and told him definitely ♦ No. ♦ There was silence for some weeks, then we received a letter from Wilfred saying he was no longer a Baháí. He also enclosed a new declaration card dated two weeks ahead, asking us to use it on that date. We all had a good chuckle at his ingenuity but told him ♦ No dice ♦. Which brings me to the time when I was entertained by Crispin Simba, a rich man with eight wives. I asked him how he became a Baháí.

He replied: ♦ Well I used to be a Jehovah's Witness and they told me I was wicked to have eight wives, I should give up seven of them now I'm a Christian. ♦ ♦ What did you say? ♦ ♦ I said that the Bible tells how Solomon had 95 wives, so why could I not have eight? They could not answer me, so I became a Bahá'í. Although there were quite a number of declarants who did not understand the Faith, yet great numbers truly had their hearts touched by it. And this, the Guardian said, was acceptable. On one trip 'Azíz and I made to Malava a rather bizarre event happened. We arrived at Festo Mukalama's house one evening and slept comfortably. In the morning 'Azíz visited the little house in the garden. It was built over a very deep pit and was quite servicable. When he came back he discovered that his wallet was missing from his hip pocket! It had in it about $300 for the travelling teachers expenses. (There were a lot of travel teachers and we paid them bus fare and food). I knew what had happened, so took a flashlight and shone it down the deep pit there was the wallet floating on the mud! How to get it up? I called for a bamboo stalk and lashed a coat hanger to one end, hook down and lowered it down. I had to lash two more bamboos to reach the wallet. I got it at first swing and hauled it up in triumph!. The budget was saved!{p65A}}

This seems an appropriate time to tell more about Claire Gung. When Shoghi Effendi announced the Ten year Crusade 1953-63, Claire immediately started answering job adverts in the national newspapers. One was for a Matron's post in a boys school in Rhodesia. Claire was amazed to find herself accepted and due to fly there shortly. She had been pioneering for many years on the home front, always with her sewing machine. That morning when we sat in a cafe together before she left England she was quite at a loss to visualise herself setting out for unknown Africa in a few days time. To make it worse, she had just received the necessary injections and was aching all over. Soon, I was photographing her boarding a train to the airport as wave- goodbye to about twelve loving but jealous, unsuccessful wouldbe African pioneers and friends. I sent the picture to Shoghi Effendi and it must have warmed his heart to see such prompt and unquestioning obedience to his call for pioneers.

About 38 years later she passed on to the Abhá Kingdom with great glory, having made Africa her permanent home. When on pilgrimage the Guardian delightedly told her she was the Mother of Africa. At that time she had only her long devoted service to show and had not been able to do much teaching because of the restricted nature of her work in the school. Her response to his statement was: "But Guardian, I have never converted a single Bahá'í!"

"Never mind" he said: "You went and the others stayed at home." From this we learned how the beloved Guardian valued those who immediately responded to his call with action.

Later, she moved to Nairobi and became a member of its first Assembly. Following this period she moved to Kampala where she fulfilled her destiny, Claire built the first inter-racial nursery and kindergarten school for the African children she loved so dearly. Uganda had achieved national independence while she was there. Government officials all wanted their children to learn English as well as get an education. They discovered that Auntie Claire's school was the door to these goals. Soon she had over 100 pupils and a waiting list to get in. She made enrollment conditional upon school fees being paid in advance. After a while, she had enough money to build a whole school premises to her own design, instead of using a rented house. For many years she taught there, and you can be sure that a full knowledge of the Bahá'í Faith and God's plan for mankind was in the curriculum. The children were all—(became fully conversant with its teachings and must have taken much of it home. Claire was to survive two violent revolutions in Uganda. The first time the fighting broke out around her house, since it was just outside the Kabaka's palace. The second time Amin brought a real blood bath; so bad were the conditions that the Universal House of Justice had to disband the National Assembly of Uganda and all the European pioneers had to leave the country except Claire. Even the temple on Kilolo Hill was left without anyone to look after it. Fortunately Claire's school was only half a mile away, at the foot of the hill.

All businesses were nationalised and when Claire received a notice that her school would be taken over. She went to the ministry office concerned and, waving the paper angrily at the official asked him if he knew what he was doing. Suddenly she recognised him as one of her former pupils. "Hello Auntie Claire—" he said. She greeted him joyfully and then said; "Don't you know you cannot Africanise my school? A controlling interest already belongs to Africans." Some years ago she had legally given 51% of it to three African National Assembly members. The school was saved, not only then but for when Claire passed on.

But dear Claire was not to escape completely from the horror of revolution. One day, Hand of the Cause Enoch Olinga his wife and several of his children, then living in Kampala, were brutally murdered in their home by terrorists. The perpetrators then took the bodies 7 miles to Claire's school and left them outside her door. One can hardly imagine the great shock Claire underwent the next morning when she found them. She tried to ignore the Universal House of Justice and the National Spiritual Assembly in London, but could not get through to either; in desperation she phoned our house where she related everything to Alicia. Alicia then passed on the information to the National Assembly.

No one knows really what the motive was, for this terrible crime. The most likely thing is that the revolutionaries wanted to show that the government was not able to control the country, so they chose to martyr the Olinga family because they were widely respected. Taking them to Claire's school was also bound to make their point abroad. Great was the loss to the world and deep the anguish we all went through, but we had to realise that all things have a place somewhere in God's eternal plan. Perhaps this martyrdom spurred on the lovers of Bahá'u'lláh everywhere to make yet more strenuous efforts to compensate for such a grievous loss.{{p67}}

To return to Kenya, the Mau Mau rebellion now began to become serious business and the army was called out to protect lives and to hunt down the revolutionaries in the jungle areas. When that failed to control the situation, all white males of service age were conscripted to swell the army. My conscription papers came in with the rest. Here I was, coming to Kenya to bring the healing message to the African people and now was going to find myself killing some of them. I wrote to the Africa committee in England to see if I could apply for exemption from military service on Bahá'í grounds and they asked the Guardian. He indicated that Mau Mau was an internal revolution and not war, so it was more like a police action which would not come under Bahá'í exemption.

On talking this over with my friend Robby, he became angry at the sweeping powers of the army and submitted to them that Mr Cardell is a one man business and if he was conscripted, the business would fail. To our amazement, it succeeded and I was excused military service.

About this time, Irene Bennett returned from pilgrimage and brought with her a world map from Shoghi Effendi. It was inscribed with all the goals of the Ten Year Crusade, which was to start shortly. I remember well how we 9 pioneers spread the map on the floor and started discussing it. The beloved Guardian had told Irene that there weren't too many pioneers in Nairobi and surely some of them could fill goals on the map. There were only 12 M.S.A's in the world then and the Guardian had divided the unconquered countries between them in proportion to their resources and Bahá'í population. England had only been given 6 territories and when 'Azíz saw this he traced each blue line from England to goal countries and specially drew my attention to the one line leading to S.W.Africa. ♦Look Ted♦{{p68}}

S.W. Africa has one port, Walvis Bay. This was the country which the three new pioneers from U.S.A. to Kenya had joked about that some pioneer would one day come to bring the Message of Bahá'u'llah. It was mostly desert or scrub. ♦I am noticing!♦ I announced very firmly indeed. Everyone laughed, but I knew then that I was going to pioneer to S.W. Africa. I remembered that Shoghi Effendi had told me that one goes on pilgrimage 5~ to get ones~batteries charged, so that he could do great things for the Faith. I felt confident I could do it, and what was more, I was probably the only single English Bahá'í with Africa experience. I wrote to Leroy Loas of my intention and wondered whether I should first visit my non ♦Bahá'í parents in England. ~he beloved Guardian had specially appealed for pioneers to go immediately, and definitely before the birthday of Eaha'u'llah. I told Leroy not to worry the Guardian about the matter, but I would go first to England. Would he let me know himself if it was the right course of action.

I did not have the funds for all the journey ~ut wrote my parents and they paid my passage back to England. I was their only son. and they were longing to see me. I had not been back in England a week when a cable came from the Guardian ♦Approve visit England prior pioneer new post.♦ This even begins to show the personal caring nature of the Guardian, and how he closely considered all aspects of a person's pioneering and his family life, and with rG delay. I felt very close to him because of this. With much enthusiasm I took a ship to Capetown and then the three day rail journey north to the small capital city of S.W. Africa, Windhoek, arriving just before Bahá'u'llah's birthday went off a cable to the beloved Guardian saying I had arrived during the centenary of the Holy year.(1953){{p69}}

The Guardian considered the arrival of a pioneer at his post to be of historical significance and a great victory. Later pilgrims tell of how he had the world map on the wall in his dining room and at dinner, he joyfully marked on it each victory of the Ten Year crusade as it occurred. Yet it is obvious that the teaching now had to start in that territory. For South Africa and its League of Nations Trust territory, South West Africa there was an added problem, the apartheid regime. The Guardian had warned all pioneers who went there to be extremely careful to avoid being thrown out of the country for showing friendship to the local Africans. He mentioned that this would not hurt the pioneer, but it would set back the Faith there for many years. As I write this in 1991, the South African government has at last been forced to repeal the apartheid laws. Thus any confrontation with the authorities would set back the Faith 38 years. Yet because all pioneers followed the Guardian's advice, there is today a National Spiritual Assembly in both South Africa and S.W. Africa. In fact the N.S.A. of South Africa was able to offer the government a series of recommendations to help them adjust to joint black and white government. The government greatly appreciated it and stated that the Bahá'ís were the only ones to offer them a spiritual solution.

But let us get back to the arrival of this lone pioneer in the city of Windhoek in 1953. Finding a job was clearly the first order of business and since the two main languages were Afrikaans and German, though many spoke English, it was not going to be easy. Further it was only a small city with little industry. After two weeks of effort had turned out fruitless I was offered a low paid job at a local photography shop if I would start to learn German.

After a few months, I was informed that business was bad and the job ended. This seemed at the time to be quite a disaster, but it may have been an answer to my prayers, for the job did not offer any chances of meeting the Africans of Windhoek. I soon found another job, working in a wholesale warehouse where there were five African workers, but this did not last long for after one month the manager called me into his office and told me he had to let me go. I asked him why and he said "I cannot tell you that." I replied, "Well may I tell you the reason why?" The police have told you I am a communist. He was taken aback and said "You are correct, and since you have been frank with me I will tell you what happened. From your very first day, the police have been watching you from my office window and they saw you speak in a friendly way to an African worker. They told me to sack you. I can help you get a job in the post office if you like, for there you will not meet any Africans." This man was not an Afrikaner but a Jew. As such he had no opinion about the apartheid policy, but obviously had to conform.

I thanked him for the information and the offer but said I would try selling life insurance, for a Dutch friend had been suggesting this to me. For the next year I had a lot of freedom as my own master as an insurance agent and one day invited one of my African workers from the wholesale shop for a ride in the country. Whitemen often had African servants with them on a journey, so it was not too dangerous. We came to a crossroads and an old African was in need of a lift, so we picked him up and chatted along the way. As I left him at his home, he said

◆Thankyou boss.◆ I replied ◆I am not your boss, I am your brother.◆

Next day my landlord, a friendly person came to me and said ◆The police came to enquire from me today, ◆Do you think Mr Cardell is a communist?◆ I said ◆What did you tell them?◆ ◆I told them you may be a bit crazy but not a communist. By the way I advise you not to use the word brother.◆ This was a real shock to me for the only occasion I had used that word was the previous day to the old man. This meant that the other African whom I had befriended had reported our conversation to the police. Fortunately my landlord◆s good words had been effective and I heard no more of the matter, but I resolved to learn a lesson from this event.

{{p71}}

My insurance business was making enough money to live from, but it I had been in Windhoek nearly two years and made no progress at all in teaching the Faith, only a few blunders. What was more, the Guardian◆s plan called for the translation of a Bahá◆i pamphlet into the Kuyama language. I had not even found a Kuyama yet and no one seemed to know about them. Most of the Africans in Windhoek were from the Ovambo tribe. I wrote to the British Africa committee and suggested they write the Guardian and recommend he change the language to Ovambo. They declined.

Every day I would walk along the hill top near my house and recite the Tablet of Ahmad for guidance. One morning after the prayer, my eyes rested on a church in the town below. I wondered if they had a Kuyama Bible. I descended the hill and entered the church. On enquiring about Kuyama the priest replied, ◆Yes, the language has just been put into writing for the first time and we have now been able to publish the New Testament in Kuyama. I bought a copy and also a simple grammar booklet which they offered. I had the idea that I could compare it with the English Bible and perhaps draw out a vocabulary. So it turned out. I composed a single page pamphlet about the Faith and began to translate. Obviously it would be a very bad translation, but I could think of no other way ahead.

Next came another piece of luck. My landlord took on a new garden boy who was from a neighbouring tribe to the Kunyama. Each day he also had to sweep my room, so when he came in, I got him to read a few sentences of the new pamphlet and make corrections. Bit by bit it was finished and I was elated.

I tried many ways to get talking with the African people but it was slow going and I was extra careful now. One day I was visiting the Methodist minister and his wife. As we alked round their garden we came to an African garden boy. The ministers wife introduced me, ♦ This is Joseph, he is a Kunyama. ♦ My heart leapt a beat and I tried to keep the enthusiasm out of my greeting. ♦ Hello Joseph. ♦ He smiled and responded and we walked on. That evening af ter dark I wandered past the garden and got talking with Joseph. He spoke quite a lot of English, so I told him about my pamphlet and asked him to look it over. The following night we met again and he told me the pamphlet was confused, but that he had a friend who was an official translator for the police, he would show it to him. I firmly declined.

{{p71a}}

I had now been working for the Old Mutual, a South African insurance company, for a year and had completed the amount of business required. It would be good to take two weeks leave and tour Southern Africa, visiting the Bahá♦is in each country. I wrote them all and received warm invitations. Claire, who was now in Nyasaland added, ♦ Shorten your visits and spend extra time at Bill Sears farm near Johanesburg, there is a wonderful spirt there, just like Haifa. ♦ My company agreed and I was off. First I visited Eric Manton and his son in Souther Rhodesia. They really loved Africa and the son invited me to spend a night in a tent in the bush near the house. I was doubtful of the safety angle but not willing to show it. I slept fitfully and every russel in the undergrowth woke me up. In the morning we were back in the house having breakfast listening to the radio news. Item. Only ten miles from us lions had broken into a shamba and killed a man! I thanked God we had been overlooked. The friends were able to teach the Faith openly there & I joined in with enthusiasm.

Next stop was Clair Gung in Nyasaland. It was a warm reunion of the times we had pioneered together in Brighton, England. She was full of enthusiasm as usual. Then on to Durban and East London. In each place it was a great uplift for me to be amongst devoted Bahá♦i pioneers for a few days, after being isolated for so long. Finally arriving in Johanesburg where Marguerite and Bill Sears picked me up and drove to their small holding 15 miles out of town. The warmth of their hospitality was indescribable.

Bill and Marguerite had recently been on pilgrimage. At dinner, the Guardian had told them to pioneer. Where, beloved Guardian? Africa. Which part of Africa, beloved? South Africa. What part? Johannesburg! And so here they were.

Bill was at that time one of the most well known radio and TV sports commentators in the U.S.A. and I think his salary was over $50,000 a year. Near the top level in those days. (1952). He was now working in the same occupation in Johannesburg for about $3,000 a year and really struggling to make ends meet financially. But they were greatly thankful to be able to help bring the Faith to Africa, and also to please the beloved Guardian.

The teaching work had already begun in much secrecy, in deference to the apartheid laws which strictly limited any such friendliness to the local natives. However several enthusiastic seekers came regularly to the farm and listened with much interest to the teachings of Bahá'u'llah.{{p71b}}

Next stop was Mafeking, where John and Audrey Robarts from Canada had moved in to pioneer Bechuannaland. I had known them from my Canadian days and attended their firesides in Toronto regularly. It was good to see how effective they were in teaching the Faith in Africa.. They had already brought a few into the Faith even though the apartheid policy was in force. Much prayer had been their constant practice. John often rose at midnight to say his daily prayer because it was easier to concentrate then. They were also very long time Bahá'is. I should mention here that both Bill Sears and John Robarts were later named Hands of the Cause by Shoghi Effendi. John was now working in life insurance like me, but for an English company, the Prudential. I was able to learn a lot from him about this business since he had been a company manager in Toronto. Now, living in Mafeking they were my nearest Bahá'i neighbours, about 600 miles from Windhoek. John later visited me there for a few days and left me feeling much uplifted by his inspiration.

On to Capetown where I stayed with Lowell Johnson and his wife; Lowell was also in radio announcing. The teaching there was spreading successfully among both Africans and coloureds and so interesting was it that I over stayed my two weeks leave to join in.

Arriving back at Windhoek I was amazed to find my company angry at my overstayed leave; they gave me the sack. I was amazed, since I had served them well. I wrote to John Robarts about this and he recommended me as an agent for his company. The general manager came up from Capetown to interview me. He asked my old manager why he had sacked me. On hearing that it was because of my over stayed leave he said: ♦ You are crazy to lose this agent, I will be delighted to offer him a job. Now I became the first full time representative for the Prudential in S.W. Africa!

One morning, soon after my arrival back in Windhoek I received a phone message from the police. ♦ Mr Cardell, we understand you are a Bahá♦i. We would like to know more about it. Could you come in for an interview tomorrow? ♦ Although the tone of his voice was mild I realised this was very serious. What had I done now to break the tight secrecy I had been keeping about the Faith? The next morning the officer in a friendly way {{p71c}} asked me to tell about Bahá♦i. I did this briefly, being careful to avoid anything which might upset him. Then, to my surprise he pulled out a Bahá♦i pamphlet and read from it the twelve principles. He asked if this was correct and I agreed with it. Wondering if I should elaborate I realised that the less I said the better. Remembering that I had a printed statement on ♦ Relations of Bahá♦is to government prepared by the National Spiritual Assembly of the U.S.A. I told him about it and offered to bring him a copy the next day. He was pleased. I asked him how he had heard that I was a Bahá♦i and to my astonishment he replied: ♦ The Rhodesian police told us about it. ♦ After I delivered the statement the police never worried me again. It was obviously clear to them that Bahá♦i was no real threat at present and that since there was some international anger about apartheid at that time, it was probably best not to go into it further unless the Bahá♦is started doing something more obvious. Little did they know that the spiritual springtime had arrived and that within 20 years they would have to grant independence to the country and apartheid would be abolished for ever in both S.W. Africa and South Africa itself{{p72}} told him not to do so, lest it get to the police, but the following evening he introduced me to Hilifa, the police translator. Hilifa and I drove out into the country each night and by flashlight started going over the script. I took it home and retyped the new part and met him the next night for more.

This went on for many nights, for he kept improving his own translation. Finally we had a good edition. I was elated, and Hilifa felt very pleased to help. In my mind I can still see the wonderful smile on his face. He was also learning a lot about Bahá'í.

I had made friends with two young Dutchmen named Harry and Bill and told them about the Faith in confidence. They suggested we all go for a holiday together at Swapukmund on the coast and arrange to have Hilifa visit his friends down there at the same period. And so it happened, we rented a small holiday cottage and moved in. Each night we covered the windows with blankets and Hilifa came in and sat talking with us. I told him a lot about Shoghi Effendi and said he would be delighted to receive a letter from the first Kuniyama. He immediately started writing with enthusiasm. We could not mail the letter as censors often opened it. I was going on leave to England soon and would mail the letter from there. The next day Hilifa and I drove along the desert coast, far from civilization, laid out a rug and sitting near the ocean began studying the book Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era. We had been doing this for some time when, on looking up I saw two whitemen had driven up, stopped their car and were gazing in astonishment at a black and white man relaxing on the rug reading and talking together as equals. They got out their fishing tackle as a cover and started walking towards us. I made a plan, I would walk along the coast and draw them away so that Hilifa could make for the car. It worked well, they followed me. Hilifa headed for the car and I then turned back quickly, jumped in the car and we drove off. The two men were left gazing helplessly after us without even having taken the number of the car. We laughed long and loud.

The next day Hilifa brought his friend David to meet us and this time we drove inland into the desert. We sat talking about the Faith and since it was a feast day we actually celebrated it together. I stood my camera on the tripod and took a historic photo of the three of us. David later became a Bahá'í.

Back in Windhoek, in order to keep in touch with Hilifa I started teaching him to drive my car. He showed good skill and we enjoyed each others company.{{p72a}}

The time for me to go on leave to England arrived and Hilifa was still not ready to become a Bahá'í. I gave him a copy of Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, embraced him and promised to return. Flying first to Johannesburg I attended the election on the Sears farm, of the first National Spiritual Assembly of South and West Africa. The previous year when they had elected the L.S.A. of Johannesburg, the Guardian had instructed the Bahá'ís to obey the law in S.Africa forbidding committees of mixed races and it had been and all black Assembly. Now he told us that the National Spiritual Assembly must be of mixed races, also that he was looking forward eagerly to see what the proportions would be. The event proceeded without a hitch. The membership of the new N.S.A. was found to be about equally black and white. Paul Haney was the Guardian's representative and a big inspiration.

Reg Turvey, an old time white resident and a Bahá'í of many years, was assigned to watch at the gate to the farm in case the police came to investigate. He had a telephone on a long line to warn us. Reg actually fell asleep on the job!

Back in England I often thought about Hilifa and S.W.Africa. One day a letter arrived from Hilifa. He was so glad I had left him the book. He had been reading the chapter about how to distinguish between a true Prophet and a false one. Now he knew that Bahá'u'llah was a true Prophet. There was much more and with great joy I sent this letter, together with the one he had written to Shoghi Effendi, off to the Guardian. Within a week a reply came. Rúhíyyih Khánum's phrase put it clearly. We are so glad that your chick has at last come through the shell! Please give Hilifa our love and the enclosed letter when you return. At the bottom was a prayerful encouragement from Shoghi Effendi.

After some time I returned to Africa, stopping first in Kenya for a few days teaching in the Maragoli district. On arriving back at the Sears farm near Johannesburg I became very ill. Dr Alice Kidder, a Bahá'í friend tried to treat me by wholistic massage. It failed completely. As I lost consciousness I pleaded with Marguerite to take me to hospital. I woke up three days later having been through a severe bout of malaria, probably caught while in Kenya. Soon I was back at the farm recuperating. During this time I became friends with the Sears two sons, Mike and Billy, a connection which was to have interesting results. Finally, back in good health I bought a good second hand car and drove the long trip to Windhoek.{{p73}}

One day I received a letter from Mike Sears who was living with his parents near Johannesburg. Mike wanted to come and work in Windhoek. He had been offered an apprentice position with an architect there. I was joyful. At last another Bahá'í to talk with and celebrate feasts. He arrived and settled in. Hilifa introduced us both to his friend Nicodemus who then joined us often in our clandestine meetings. Soon he became the second Kunyama to recognise his Lord. We were now four!

I was now forty ♦ two years old and still single. Looking in the mirror one day I decided I had better think seriously about finding a wife. I was also the only male member of the Cardells to carry on the family name. My non ♦ Bahá ♦ i parents had been very patient and supportive of my move to Africa, but longed to see me. I wrote saying I would visit them if they bought me a return ticket and they accepted gladly.

It was now October 1957. Early one morning I received a cable.

♦ Shoghi Effendi seriously ill, need everyone's ♦ prayers.

Rúhíyyih. ♦ Next day a second telegram came ♦ ♦ Grieve inform Bahá ♦ i world Shoghi Effendi passed away, London. Earnest prayers entreated Guardian and security Faith Rúhíyyih. Mike and I were shocked and stunned. Slowly the situation regarding a future Guardian came to our attention. Had he left a will? Did he have any children? If not, had he appointed another? I arrived in England to find the whole Bahá ♦ i world asking the same questions. The funeral had taken place before I got there and I could only kneel at his graveside and pray for understanding.

I spent some unsettled weeks with my parents and then decided to go to the U.S.A. and see what they thought about the matter. Maybe I might even find a wife over there. It also occurred to me that since I was from Africa, the National Teaching committee might like me to spend a few weeks travel teaching and talking about Africa. I received an enthusiastic reply to my enquiry and sailed for America aboard the Queen Mary. Arriving in New York, the local Bahá ♦ is gave me a warm welcome and then I started on a journey visiting the cities the N.T.C. had suggested and funded. So, by bus and train I covered a lot of the U.S.A., arriving in Chicago in time for convention. {{p74}}

Convention was a big uplift after being away from Bahá ♦ i event-like this for some years. In the middle of it I was introduced to Alicia Ward and her mother. Alicia told me later, that she knew right away we would be married. My analytical mind was still open on that subject but we shared the whole convention together in a spirit of ever growing oneness. I took her to the plane for Phoenix making sure I had an invitation to visit her soon. However the N.T.C. secretary wanted me to do another tour of cities, talking about Africa. I turned it down, saying I had a date in Tempe, near Phoenix. She suggested a tour through various places and ending up at Tempe. I accepted.

Arriving at Tempe by Trailways bus some weeks later I stepped out into heat greater than I had ever experienced, even in Africa. I thought I must be standing in the exhaust of the bus, so moved away. To my astonishment, the heat was still there and the truth dawned on me. This was normal Arizona weather ♦ When Alicia came to fetch me from the bus station I knew for sure this was my future wife, for here was a lady I could love and trust. She had arrived at the age of thirty unmarried because she had not been satisfied with any of the young men so far. Her spiritual character showed in her actions and speech and her family were long time Bahá ♦ is. Unseen forces drew us ever closer together in a joy inexplicable. She was delighted to go back to Africa with me. After about three months living with her family we were married. On Aug 9th 1958 we had a Bahá ♦ i wedding. After a honeymoon we drove Alicia ♦ s Volkswagon across the U.S.A to New York, sold it, and sailed to England on the Queen Elizabeth. Since we were short of funds, we asked for their cheapest cabin and found ourselves in the bow of the ship. We could hear the swish of the water rushing past and the occasional clank of the anchor chain against the side of the ship as we went to sleep.

In England, my family were delighted to meet Alicia and all the relatives gathered for a second wedding celebration. We had brought the top layer of the wedding cake with us, but the ocean journey had been too much for it; inside, it was green with mould, but the spirit of the occasion was not dampened. After a few weeks we found a cheap charter plane back to Windhoek via Nigeria. Alicia explained to the company that she was a one time stewardess on United airlines; she wondered if they could give her a cheap fare. They gave her the navigator ♦ s spare seat just behind the pilot at half price. We rejoiced at the economy, but soon found that the chair was a simple stool, not even bolted to the floor! We worried about {{p75}} it for obvious reasons, but soon a teenager pleaded to be allowed to exchange seats with her so that he could watch the pilot. We were happy to oblige.

The flight was uneventful until we reached Kano in Nigeria where we were allowed time to go into the city. Here, for the first time we found ourselves in a majority Moslem country and were much attracted to the way people lived there. The next leg of our flight took us to Windhoek in S.W.Africa. Mike Sears had already spent his one year there and had now gone back to his parents home near Johannesburg. He had left the car I had lent him, with friends and the key was hidden in a prearranged place. We found a place and were now able to search for a small apartment in the town. Then I went back to work for a British company, the Prudential Insurance company selling life insurance to Africaaners who were often prejudiced against ~ ~ to them, ~ foreign company. It was hard work, but I managed to make a living this way and got a lot of freedom to meet with Hilifa, Nicodemus and their friends. They were delighted to see us of course.

Now be~J~ 2 ~.~Vh~ new chapter in our lives, living no longer as single people but as a happily married couple, far from our native homes in the service of Bahá'u'llah. Life was peaceful and ordered and we even had time to play card games and see the latest movies, which for some reason often came here from America before going to England.

We were most excited with the arrival of a letter from a Bahá'í family in Germany, and here lies a wonderful story, true in every part. Their names were Gerda and Martin Aiff; they owned a small duplicating business and had five small children. By some miracle they had managed to get their relatives to look after the children while they went on pilgrimage. Dinner with the Guardian was to them an unexpressible joy. One evening the Guardian said

◆ Martin, I want you and Gerda to lead the German youth to Africa. ◆ Martin, in a logical frame of mind replied ◆ But beloved Guardian, I have no money, no job in Africa and five children.! ◆

It speaks volumes for the Guardian's reliance at all times (and for all people) on the unfailing assistance of the unseen world when I record that the Guardian did not even deign to answer this problem at all. To him it was the will of God that this family would go to Africa so he answered with a disdainful humph! and then moved on to the next topic. The affect on Martin and Gerda was dramatic. They got the message loud and clear and from that moment {{p76}} on the~ began planning their move to Africa. They felt that the best country for them would be S.W. Africa where Alicia and I lived. It used to be a German territory before the first world war and was given to England as ~I~de ~ ~ue ~ ha~7~ reparations~and England asked South Africa to look after it for them. Hence the main business language there was German, and there was a good German school for their children. It took them two years to get everything in order and they finally arrived by ship at Walvis Bay. Alicia and I met them at ~ho~ the dock and I have a lovely picture of Gerda and Martin leading six children off the boat. Alicia and I had rented a large old house which could be divided in two, so that they had at least a home to come to. We started having firesides there for Hilifa, Nicodemus and their friends. We were now started in earnest on the teaching work. But Martin scoured the town for a job and got nowhere. We all prayed frequently for all their small capital was gone. They started unpacking but found that nearly all of their precious crockery had been smashed due to insufficient packing in the crate. Finally a business offered him work at half the salary he would need to live on; he could start at the end of the month. All relaxed but at the end of the month the job was cancelled. The next few weeks were tense, but finally he was offered a job as a travelling salesman selling goods in the distant villages all over the vast territory. This meant that he would be away from his family for many weeks at a time. He accepted and Gerda was left, with our help, to look after the family.

This was difficult enough but one day one son got hit by a car. Amazingly, it was Hilifa who got to the scene first, picked up the injured boy and got him to hospital. Martin continued his travelling and employed a Herera man to go with him. Long drives and much discussion resulted in this man being ready to recognise Bahá'u'lláh. One day they stopped near the sea and went in for a bathe. The Herera man was carried out to sea and drowned. Poor Martin was desolate, but to the police it was just a statistic.

Later on, with another Herera he was travelling between settlements and his truck with its clothing samples caught fire. Everything was lost. One more adventure for Martin must be told. This time it was a victory. He heard one day that the police were suspecting him of friendship with the Africans and that he was a Bahá'í. He decided it was the time for all or nothing. He went straight to the police headquarters and asked for an interview with the chief officer. He asked him "Why are you following me?" The reply was "Because we hear you are a Bahá'í and are being too friendly to the Africans." "Is there a law against this?" Martin queried. The officer had to say there was no such law. (in practice it was an unwritten part of the apartheid policy.) "Then may I have your permission to hold weekly Bahá'í meetings in the African township?" Strangely, they accepted. From then on the teaching was open and progressed. Perhaps it was an advantage for the police to hear for themselves whether Bahá'í is subversive or not, for they could send their own representative to the meetings to watch. Further, they had my own written document stating the non-political nature of Bahá'í.

About a year after the Aiff family arrived, we discovered that we were to become parents. This caused us to think in more real terms about our future income. My insurance business was failing because I could not keep up the hard sell technique which was required and in any case it was not my chosen career. We decided to move back to Kenya where I would be able to restart my profession as a photographer.

Most of the above adventures of the Aiff family occurred after we had boarded a small steamer and travelled round the Cape of Good Hope to Kenya. On the way we stopped for a few days at Capetown and stayed with the Bahá'ís. Then we caught another ship to Durban and stayed with the friends there arriving finally at Mombasa, the main port of Kenya. We were met by a lovely Italian family, the Rapps, who were friends of 'Aziz. They helped us get our things from the ship to the station and with a warm goodbye from our new friends, we began our long winding journey inland and climbing up to 5,000 feet in 400 miles (~ \I~Y06~.

We had written to the Yazdí family before hand and they had arranged for us to live in the guest house in their garden. It was a real warm home coming and a welcome haven for Alicia especially, for the Yazdís acted like true parents towards us, helping wherever they could. But our plans were all to be changed. The British Government had announced they were going to give independence to Kenya in 4 years. It would be impossible for us to set up a viable photo business, for most of the white people would be leaving Kenya, and there would not even be good schools for our expected children. We began searching for jobs once again, realising that our time in Africa was now very limited, for I was not trained for anything but farming (English style) and photography. It made more sense to go back to England soon and train to be a school teacher or secretary then we could pioneer again to many places in the world. But for now we needed an income. My job search in Nairobi produced no results and at last 'Aziz offered me a position as travelling salesman for the medicines he was importing.

A few weeks later 'Aziz took me on an extended sales trip into northern Uganda, to open up new customers. All went well until I phoned home from Uganda and Alicia told me our firstborn would soon be arriving. We headed back immediately. Baby Catherine was born soon after and I shall never forget the excitement we experienced at realising that we now had our very own family. Our firstborn, Catherine, was born on October 18, 1959.

I now felt impelled to look for a job more to my liking, for I was not a salesman type. On answering an advertisement for a Cotton Officer in the Department of Agriculture, I found myself accepted with almost indecent haste, even though I told them I had no idea what a cotton plant looked like. Maybe it was my previous farming experience in England, but after all the hard job searching we had done we saw it as a great bounty. They planned to send us down to the coast where the climate was suitable for cotton growing. We would live in a small settlement named Malindi where the climate was tropical and the living conditions primitive. We gladly accepted, though we did not realise just how primitive it would be.

It was just at this time that my parents, who had only once before left the shores of England, now decided to come and visit us in Africa. They were able to spend a few days with us in Nairobi before my new job started and this enabled them to get to know the new baby and also Alicia whom they had only met briefly in England when we were on our way back to Africa. They were also very pleased to see that at last their son was settling down to a reliable government job. Little did we know how short that would be.

It may be of interest to parents now raising children and anxiously trying to get them to take up some reliable profession, if there is such a thing these days, to hear that at the age of 18 I had no idea what career to follow. I stayed on the farm another eleven years and then immigrated to Canada in search of a profession and a meaning to life. Over the next 23 years I held 17 different jobs. True, many of these happened in Africa where I had to take almost any kind of a work that came along. After leaving Africa in 1963 we finally settled down running the family farm for 20 years. That is where our four wonderful children grew up.{{p79}}

But to return to Africa and my parents arrival there in 1959. We first introduced them to the wild animal park just ten miles outside Nairobi. There are no fences to keep the animals in, but they stay in the natural habitat which has been left for them.

As one enters and buys tickets there is a large notice ♦STAY IN YOUR CAR AND CLOSE ALL WINDOWS.♦ Strangely enough, the animals do not associate motor vehicles with humans. Perhaps it is the smell of gasoline, but they continue in their normal ♦ behavior I shall never forget the intense surprise on my mother♦s face when a male lion walked up to our car, cocked his leg up and weed on our bumper. After driving for an hour we came to a clearing in the bush to find a notice which said you may get out of your car here, it is safe. ♦ My father to stretch our legs said apprehensively as we got out to stretch our legs: ♦ I hope the lions can read! ♦

Their next adventure was to drive with us down to Malindi through simla wild animal country. It was a happy though dusty journey and at one point we stopped to change the baby ♦s nappies. We threw the dirty one into the bush much to the delight of a troupe of baboons who came out enmass to receive their gift and carry it off in triumph into the jungle. We did not stop laughing for a long time!

We arrived at Mombassa port which beins at sea level was much hotter than Nairobi. Also, for the first time we noted a lar~ proportion of the population was Arabs, especially at the docks where pictureque Arab dowhs were loading cargoes of trees to take back to Arabia. After a night at a hotel pervaded by all kin~ of unaccustomed noises we set off, next day on the journey north {{p80}}

50 miles along the coast to Malindi which consisted of a hotel, block of flats surrounded by many native huts and a cotton ginning mill. I found the office of the local senior cotton officer and was given the occupancy of one of the flats. Our windows looked out on probably the most perfect and enormous sandy beach I had ever seen. It stretched perhaps for 20 miles in each direction and we had it all to ourselves. Happily a strong wind blew in from the Indian ocean. We later found that it never seemed to cease blowing; what is more, it was heavily moisture laden and within two weeks, all our precious books would develop a strong mould.

My parents put up at the hotel and found it comfortable. The next day I was shown my job. It was to walk to all the small shambas (plots of ground) and talk with their owners, describing to them the big advantages of growing pure stand cotton instecd of interplanting it with maize. This would increase their income and also make the owner of the ginning mill more happy. The mill had machinery for teasing the cotton buds into bales for shipping.

There were no roads and few paths between the shambas and I was forced to walk through the long grass. This was not too bad, except that it was said to be the most snake infested part of Africa; a claim which I was soon to substantiate when on the first day I came upon a clearing on the bank of a creek where a most bizare fight was going on. Some natives had come upon a very large snake (18 feet long) which was in the act of swallowing a smaller one some men had therefore decided to kill both snakes while they were struggling. The large snake, still with its victim half swallowed had sought an escape in the water. An African with a large two foot knife called a panga, had followed it in. As I watched, he cut off its head to loud cheers and ribald shouts from his friends. Back at the office, I sought advice on {{p81}} avoiding snakes during my tours. I was advised to carry a snakebite kit and then hope for the best. For my whole term I did this and found years later that the kit would have been not only useless but dangerous if I had used it. Meanwhile I walked happily through the long grass daily to talk with the native women about cotton raising.

One day I was helping a woman plant the new cotton seeds in rows, the best way to get them to follow my advice, when the woman beside me gave a strangled exclamation. I looked up to see advancing towards us about ten yards away, a snake even bigger than the one I had previously encountered. Its head was raised two feet above the ground while its tongue tasted the air around.

Grasping the addage that `snakes are more scared than humans' I threw a lump of dirt at it, but to no avail it still kept coming towards us! Desperately I threw more dirt and it suddenly made off. I recalled that snakes have -ery poor eye sight. so probably it had not meant to attack at all, but we both had a real scare, wondering how we would have fought the thing off.

The season had now arrived for plantinQthe new crop and I was on duty at the seed store, handing out free seed to all commers. A long line of Africans waited patiently as I filled each shopping bag presented to me. Suddenly I became aware that the young girl next in line was staring at me with wide eyes. Obviously she had never seen a whiteman before, a not uncommon thing in that wild area. I looked at her and, before she could ask the question on her lips I said 'How did you get so black?' To which she replied 'How did you get so white?' Then everyone collapsed in laughter. {{p82}}

That evening Alicia, baby Cathy and I went shopping for the weekend supplies. We were directed to the meat market whlch consisted of a butcher working behind a high wooden wall in which there was a foot square hole serving as a counter top. When we gave our order, it arrived through this hole partly wrapped in newspaper and grasped in a bloody hand. Such was the hygiene! For some reason we accepted the meat and suffered no ills, but a gradual accumulation of such incidents made us think of other employment nearer to civilvation.

Since we were living on the equator at sea level and in primitive conditions, it may come as no surprise to hear that all the women went topless the whole time; Alicia often joked about her husband being fully educated on the matter of women's breasts of all ages.

We had been six months on this job and learning to understand the native life and devise the best ways to teach the Faith. We had made a number of friends and got on well with the people, but we began to see that conditions were too primitive for the health of the new baby, so soon after my parents went back to England I answered an advertisement for an executive officer in the Department of Trade and supplies. I was successful and we went back to live and work in Nairobi. Much as I loved the country, it was a relief to be back in the city, working at a desk job.

I was now put in charge of making cash loans to small businesses to help them expand and develop. It was my task to sort out the applicants which could be trusted to make their monthly repayments. The U.S.A. had kindly donated half a million pounds to this worthy project.

The original nine pioneers who had lived in Kenya when the Ten Year Plan started had now been reduced considerably. Fred Schecter had pioneered to Somalia, Claire had gone to Uganda and started her infant classes. Others went elsewhere and there was only 'Aziz, Claudio Rupp, 'Aziz and myself able to travel up country in the teaching work. Our wives sometimes were able to come, but mostly were raising their children. Ainee and Teheren 'Ali, devoted Persian pioneers helped where they could and I shall never forget one trip I made with them upcountry when this highly cultured couple lived for a few days in the African's huts, eating with them and clearly revelling in their company. Alicia and I also made such a trip.

Susy, our second baby soon joined us and life became more complicated but challenging. However, on one occasion Alicia was able to come with me on an upcountry teaching trip and I treasure ... my photo of her sitting in the shade of a hut teaching a large class about the life of Bahá'u'llah. We even managed to buy a small slide projector which, powered by long leads from our car battery, projected pictures onto the white washed wall of a hut. By this method we were able to show the lives of Bahá'is round the world and also some of themselves taken on previous trips. One man kept requesting a repeated viewing of a certain slide. When asked why, he proudly revealed that this picture was of himself addressing the meeting. In another picture, someone is rooster had got into the picture and this made it a favorite slide for everyone.

On another occasion we were able to borrow the use of a backroom of a beer ♦ hall in a small village. The highly spiritual discussion was frequently interrupted by the din of customers in the beerhall, but the Message was clearly and convincingly explained.{{p84}}

Christianity had come to this country over 100 years ago. Infact by ~ ~ eO~ that we were told that it had arrived in 1844 and this fulfilled the Biblical prophecy ♦ . . . and this Gospel shall be preached unto all the world, and then shall the end come. ♦ Kenya may have been the last country to receive the Christian Message. By 1951 there were many missionaries in Kenya, and from different groups, but their disunity over interpretation had confused the Africans. When the Bahá ♦ is had applied to the District Comissioner for permission to build a Bahá ♦ i Center at the village of Kabras, it was refused. I visited the Comissioner to discover why and was told~that there were various fanatical Christian sects there already and their arguments had caused unrest in the area; he didnot want any more to make the situation worse. When I explained the unifying and peaceful teachings of Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah he happily gave ~ er~iscion. ~evcted Persian contributions had already provided the funds and we soon had a new and very adequate meeting hall which the local Bahá ♦ i began to use regularly. I have photos of Hand of the Cause Olinga addressing a large meeting there.

One of the earliest believers in that area was Festo Mukalama. He spoke good English and ~as also quite musical in the African way. Soon he had composed many songs tel~ing the story of Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah and also His teachings. These became a great favourite among the people and a most excellent wa~ ofsp the Faith. At this time Bob and ~eith Quigley from America visited us and donated a portable battery tape recorder on which I captured these songs and sent copies to the U.S.A. and to South American Bahá ♦ is. In later years Festo was appointed a Board Member and to this day continues to serve Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah in an exemplary manner, simply bubbling over with ioY and devotio~ time pioneers visit his area.{{p85}}

When Alicia and I had returned to Kenya, we found that the temple in Kampala had been compleated while we were in Windhoek. Soon after our return Rúhíyyih Khánum came to perform the dedication of this beautiful building which had drawn interest over a very wide area. Bearing in mind the Guardian's guidance, the National Spiritual Assembly spared no efforts to make this a big occasion. Full publicity in the press and liaison with the Government of Uganda was only the start. The news was carried all over Uganda, Kenya and Tanganyika and also to overseas news syndicates. The ruler of Uganda, the Kabaka, sent his son to attend the ceremony and the Governor's representative sat in a place of honour between Rúhíyyih Khánum and our Chairman, 'Alí Nakhjavani. Many Bahá'is from overseas were present, including five from South Africa.

That evening there was a big public meeting at Makerere college in the city. Here David Hofman who had flown specially from England to represent that National Spiritual Assembly, made a presentation of one of the Guardian's letters to our N.S.A. Rúhíyyih Kahnum was presented with a native spear to take back to Haifa. Once again, as in 1953, the streets and hotels of Uganda rang with the comings and goings of a multitude of Bahá'is of many races and countries.

Some time later Nairobi received a rather special guest, Dr Niederreiter from Abyssinia. He was on his way to the Belgian Congo to investigate reports of extraordinary Bahá'í developments there. Some months previously Rex and Mary Collison had pioneered from Kampala to the territory of Ruand Urundi. They had taken with them a devoted Ugandan believer. The Faith had been established strongly and the Collisons had returned to Kampala, leaving their companion to carry on the work. Some of the new believers had then taken the Faith to a neighboring territory, the Belgian Congo; there it had spread rapidly until whole villages had entered the Faith so the rumours indicated. The good doctor was on his way to investigate and help. About two months later he returned to Nairobi highly elated. The rumours were not only true but in some places the local Bahá'is had built Bahá'í Centers for their activities and also built their own houses around the Center, as was the custom of the Christians who often made their churches their village center.

Dr Niederreiter had mostly travelled between villages on foot, accompanied by a group of Bahá'is. This was done without preplanning and they arrived unannounced in one village to find the Nineteen Day Feast in full swing. They were able to join in.

An interesting situation occurred during the early days of the Faith in Kenya when I reported to the Local Spiritual Assembly of Nairobi that in my country ~ourneys covering the Mau Mau revolution for the Newspapers, I had often been exposed to the risk of being attacked. As a pioneer I obviously did not want to get involved in the fighting but I asked the advice of the Assembly whether I should carry a gun for self protection. The Assembly decided that I should be free to do so, but I never did feel inclined to do so ~ ; rather I chose to retire away from the biggest dangers even if it meant missing important news photos. The result was that I missed covering one very important development when an entire village was massacred by the Mau Mau for collaborating with the Europeans. My London newspaper sent an urgent message for pictures of the gruesome event. I was unable to supply these, so they cut off my picture privileges at the radio station. (They had been paying the costs of transmitting photos by radio to London.) I had, in the words of the trade, "Let them down", but I had also probably saved my own life and the life of some African.

There was such a demand from all the London newspapers that I had little difficulty in getting picture privileges from a competitor. I continued sending them pictures at their expense and both sides agency were satisfied. One day my old newspaper wrote reinstating my privileges and sending a cutting of the trial of Jomo Kenyatta, the leader of the Mau Mau as an example of the kind of pictures they would like! I recognised my own picture sent to the new firm!

The reason why I record so much detail is that an interesting sequel transpired when Rúhíyyih Khánum next visited us and I told her the decision of the Assembly allowing me to carry a gun. She spontaneously replied "I don't know about you Ted, but if I had come out to Africa to teach the Message of Bahá'u'llah to the African people, I would rather die than kill one."

I had recently been appointed secretary of the Kenya teaching committee under the N.S.A. of Central and East Africa. (Kenya did not yet have its own N.S.A.) and as such was in correspondence with a lot of the friends. My office was in the newly built Bahá'i Center in Nairobi and Charles Mungonye, a very devoted Bahá'i was my full time assistant and typist. We got various projects going, such as a song sheet in two languages, so that everyone could join in.{{p88}}

We also encouraged people from different language areas of Kenya to translate a basic pamphlet, even though they were all rather similar to Swahili, the official language.

My job at the Department of Trade was now developing and one day I found myself at the desk which ordered shiploads of sugar from abroad to supplement production from our own two sugar factories. I had no experience of this work but there was a very efficient clerks staff of Hindus who did all the calculations and brought me the papers to sign. One morning in discussing their religion with them I found they had received permission to be absent on their religious holidays. Since we now had Bahá'í working in various government departments I made an official application for them also to have their Holy days recognised and this was granted. This was one more step on the way towards official recognition of the Faith.

The following April, much to my surprise I found myself elected to the N.S.A. of Central and East Africa and had to make monthly journeys to Kampala, a ten hour night trip by bus or a one hour plane trip. The first time, since there was only limited time free from my office, I took the plane. The National Treasurer, Hasan Sabri gently suggested that in future it would save the fund a lot of money if I took bus, even though it was very primitive. It was quite an experience be crammed tightly into such a bus overnight with all kinds of tribesmen, but I certainly found myself more able to appreciate their kind of life and although the driving was quite macho, we never had any accidents. Later I found that both Clair Gung and Hasan Sabri much more exciting rides, one bus had its fuel tank drop off and the other ran off the road and they had to wait all night to be towed out in the morning.

As mentioned earlier, the Mau Mau terrorists sometimes attacked isolated Europeans. One day I was driving the 300 miles to meet the Bahá'í up country when I rounded a bend in the road and found a row of 8 inch boulders strung across the road. The idea was obvious, I would stop to remove them and be open to attack. It is amazing how fast one thinks in such situations and without slowing, I aimed one front wheel at a small gap and prayed hard that the other wheels would find a way. By some miracle all wheels passed through and I continued without incident.

Another weekend, four pioneers drove up country and found some of the main roads had been rerouted. We got thoroughly lost and as darkness fell it began to pour with rain. We were unable to find the Bahá'ís houses and had nowhere to spend the night. Happily, after wandering around we came upon a European mission. We knocked and were received warmly by the missionaries. They gave us real hospitality, a hot meal and beer. In the morning they fed us again and set us on the right road. We were most grateful. No religious discussion took place, surprisingly. Before Africa the Guardian had indicated that we should concentrate completely on teaching the African people and not the white people.

Perhaps this is an appropriate place to try to give some idea of the beloved Guardian's relationship with the friends everywhere. Almost no one had met him, as pilgrimages had been closed for many years, due to the machinations of the Covenant Breakers. {{p90}}

All we had were his steady flow of letters and cables, yet this alone produced a magical effect upon the hearts of the believers. In England we were luckier than most countries, for the Guardian had sent Hasan Baluzi and Dr. Hakim to live in our country. Both had met the Master frequently and his spirit seemed to come to us through them. In later years Hasan was named Hand of the Cause and Dr Hakim became a member of the first Universal House of Justice. Since we also had quite a number of the Writings of Bahá'u'llah in English it served to galvanise us to move towards a spiritual awakening. At Summer School, Conventions and other occasions there was a spirit quite different from our normal working lives. It was not surprising that when in 1951 the Guardian gave us a Two Year Plan to establish three groups in East and West Africa, there was a concerted move to fulfill his wishes, even though only one couple had ever been there and the British community was probably no more than 600 souls.

Many years later, in 1982, Alicia and I met Helen Bishop in Portland, Oregon, U.S.A. Helen was quite old but had a very clear memory of her meetings with Abdu'l Bahá and with Shoghi Effendi. She told us how she had once visited Oxford in England and found herself invited to a banquet and was sitting next to the Principal of Balliol College where Shoghi Effendi had studied. She asked him his impression of the young Shoghi Effendi. His reply was "He was an excellent student, hard working and full of enthusiasm, but what a pity, in the end they made him the head of some queer religion." Helen in her next letter to Shoghi Effendi described the conversation, but omitted the last sentence, only to receive a letter in return saying ♦ Now tell me the rest. ♦ We all had a good laugh.{{p91}}

Another most unusual event took place one Sunday in the village of Givogi. I had arrived one ♦ -eekend in Givogi where Mr Asalache had extended warm hospitality for a deepening course. It was Sunday afternoon and I was preparing to finish up and start the 5 hour journey back to Nairobi before dark when a young lad came puffing into the circle from the ne.Yt village. ♦ Please Bwana ♦ he said ♦ Come to our village and tell us about this new religion. ♦ ♦ Bless you ♦ I said, ♦ but it is not possible, I have just enough time to drive back to Nairobi. ♦ ♦ Well then just come and spend 15 minutes with us. I will wait and take you there. ♦ How could I refuse! He waited while we finished the course and then he took me over the hill. There I found a group of about a dozen people and a headman waiting under the trees. They welcomed me warmly and I gave them a brief account of Bahá ♦ u ♦ llah ♦ s Mission. Then the head man rose and thanked me also saying that now the 15 minutes was up and I should start my journey. I left with much joy. The sequel came in a year later when I had left Kenya and was on a teaching trip in Ireland where I met Francis Beard. She had pioneered to Kenya long after I had ♦ I left and become very energetic in serving the African people. She had become much loved. Many other pioneers had also gone to Kenya and the work had expanded greatly too; I think, over 300 Assemblies. Francis asked me ♦ Do you remember that village near Givogi? ♦ I said ♦ Yes ♦. ♦ -Vell the people there still remember the fair ♦ haired young man who first brought the Faith to them in a few minutes before he had to rush off to Nairobi. And now the whole valley is inhabited with Bahá ♦ is. ♦

About ten years later Alicia and I returned to Kenya just for a visit and attend the Nairobi Bahá ♦ i Conference. Francis was not forgotten by them. One man enquired very eagerly after her. She must have been a wonderful person.

It is sometimes difficult to remember the exact time ♦ order of event, but about two years after the passing of the Guardian Rúhíyyih Khánum having somewhat recovered from the great shock, began making long teaching trips all over the world. This besides giving the friends everywhere much consolation, gave a fine example for travel teachers to follow. She first made a trip through the mass declaration parts of Uganda and then came to Kenya where a group of Bahá'ís took her on a trip to our most useful areas. I tried to join them but could not get permission from my job. About 2 months later she returned to Kenya again for more teaching and this time I was privileged to accompany her for three whole days as her driver. Another car followed behind with 'Azíz and Sue Yazdí and one or two Kenya Bahá'ís.

{{p92}}

Of course I had met Rúhíyyih Khánum while on pilgrimage but just imagine, I now had her to talk with for the most part of three whole days as we drove across the plains of Kenya. Looking back on it, it seems that we talked the whole time with little respite. She told me that it had been 25 years since she had been on a teaching trip of any kind, because the Guardian could not spare her from the work in Haifa where she was almost his sole helper in the massive correspondence he kept up with thousands of Bahá'ís all over the world. He was also writing to all National Assemblies regularly and I believe received all of the minutes of their meetings which he read carefully and suggested new ideas for them to consider. Also he wrote - and I assess by and many other works. How he ever managed to do all of this and still meet with pilgrims is surely more than one can understand. However talking with Rúhíyyih Khánum I was able to glean some idea. I had already asked her why the Guardian did not ask for volunteers from overseas to help, because I was sure very many would willingly come. I even asked her to tell the Guardian I would do so at any moment he wished. She replied that "It is no small matter to ask someone to serve so close to the light. It is a spiritual experience which might be too intense and perhaps dangerous. I heard but have kept hoping someday I could attain such a bounty, regardless of the risk. Also the Covenant breakers who lived just next door to the Guardian had caused him all manner of deep troubles by trying to detain the Faith and himself and would be waiting to trick any unsuspecting Bahá'í who came there to work. I understand that since those days they have been greatly reduced in power and numbers.

To return to what must have been about the most wonderful three days I ever had in Kenya our little group visited many Bahá'í communities in Maragoli. At each place the friends gathered eagerly while she talked to them for hours in a manner they well understood, using simple analogies from their daily life to illustrate the spiritual wisdom she was giving them. One evening we stayed at a government rest camp and on another when we had driven up into the Nancili hills, a district not yet reached by the Faith. We stayed talking long after sunset talking round a wood fire before she retired to one of the local huts which had been readied for her arrival. She and the ladies slept in the one room and 'Aziz and I in the back of his car. It was a clear cloudless night, which was just as well, since we discovered in the morning a large hole in the roof over the bed and she found it a huge joke. We all had breakfast round a {{p93}} small table set up outside the hut. On another occasion we bought some fish at the market in Kisumu and drove up into the Maragoli hills. Here we found a stream where we relaxed, built a fire and cooked the fish for lunch. Our guest greatly enjoyed the experience and we were much uplifted to see her recovering from the passing of Shoghi Effendi.

On our three day trip Rumiyyih Khanum showed much interest in how the planning teaching work was going. I told her we had a great many declarations but because the area was so far from Nairobi city where all the pioneers lived and because there were only about 5 of us, it was impossible to do any real deepening; obviously they all needed repeated visits to really understand the wonder of the Message. It looked as though we were forced to choose between expansion or deepening. We discussed the matter at great length but could find no answer. Looking back it now seems that it would have been impossible to separate the two activities for at each meeting there was always a lot of new faces. I heard months later that when she was in India on a similar trip, Rumiyyih Khanum found the simple answer. ♦ Nowhere in the Writings does it give you permission to cease from teaching. ♦

I can hardly believe that for much of those three days I was alone in the car, talking with Rumiyyih Khanum. Her enthusiasm was uplifting and this was also because as she said, ♦ I have been living in Haifa for 25 years helping the Guardian and this is the first teaching trip I have done in all that time. There was usually a large group of African children sitting up front at all her meetings and she was amazed to see how quiet and obedient they ♦ were. They seemed to sense that this was perhaps the greatest moment of their lives. {{p94}}

After the departure of Rumiyyih Khanum from Africa, the Faith grew more rapidly than ever before, but my own job once more came to an end. The British Government had decided that the time had come for Kenya to be given independence and govern herself. My official task now was to train an African clerk to do my job and leave. There would be no other jobs open to Europeans, for everything was given to Africans, no matter how untrained they were. Alicia and I and the two children began preparing to leave Africa and go back to England where I hoped to go to college and train as a school teacher. As such there should be many openings in under ♦ developed countries, which though of short duration, would enable us to pioneer again somewhere on the planet. Also the schools would not be developed enough for our children and they could get better schooling in England.

It was just at this fortuitious time that the Ten Year Crusade was coming to a victorious conclusion and what is more, the Hands of the Cause, as ♦ Custodians of the Faith ♦, appointed by Shoghi Effendi in his last letter to the Bahá ♦i world, had called for the election of the very first Universal House of Justice. As a member of the National Spiritual Assembly of Central and East Africa, I was one of the delegates called to Haifa to take part in the election. The Hands had also written and asked me to be the official photographer at that very great ceremony and also at the first World Bahá ♦i Congress in London which was to follow in May 1963.

One of the arresting statements made to me by Shoghi Effendi when I was on pilgrimage in 1952 (and there were no African Bahá ♦is in Kenya then) was that perhaps one day I would accompany a member of the African race to Haifa. I was astonished to find myself only 11 years later, accompanying no less than five African believers to Haifa, not only on pilgrimage but as full members of the National Spiritual Assembly of Central and East Africa, come there as delegates to elect the first Universal House of Justice! All nine of us arrived by plane and gathered with about 125 de-egates from many countries of the world, some of them dressed in their national costumes. It was a breath ♦ taking experience to be gathered all together in the Master ♦s house on Harparsim Street in Haifa to cast our votes.

At the back of the room were seated all the Hands of the Cause as witnesses. They had asked that they should not be voted for because their function a~ Hands made it inappropriate. My own thoughts on this are that as the twin pillars of the Faith are the Guardianship together with the Hands who served him were one pillar, and the entire Administration, including the Universal House of Justice, comprised the other, one could not expect a person to serve on both institutions.

As the House of Justice stated later in one of its letters to the world, it was an absolutely unique event in the world ♦s religious history for those who were the appointed custodians of the Faith after the passing of the Prophet, to ask not to be elected to the governing body of His followers.

Like all the other delegates, I had been giving a lot of prayerful thought on which nine names to put on the ballot paper but I could not think of any Bahá'í who I knew, who could possibly have the esteemed qualities for such a divine body. After further thought I realised that the beloved Guardian had given us some help in this matter. For he had himself appointed the International Council two years previously and they had aided him in an exemplary manner.{{p96}}

I happily entered the names of the male members of the International council but then realised that the other four were women and therefore ineligible. There was a temptation to leave four blank spaces, but that would make the ballot disqualified. I reasoned that the Hands could be voted for, even though they had asked for us not to do so. Therefore I completed the ballot with the names of four Hands.

It should be mentioned that before the election took place all the delegates were sent by bus to visit the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and all the other holy places one visits on pilgrimage, and this was added bounty. It also reminded me of the Guardian's last words to me on leaving Haifa, "Do not be sad, you will come back."

For three days after the election, the delegates attended consultative in a large hall about half a mile away from the shrine on Mt. Carmel. Each day was to me equal to a thousand ordinary ones, so fragrant was that experience. There was also the task of photographing every aspect of this occasion, so spiritually significant for all mankind.

As history records, the following week, all of these delegates, together with about 6,000 other Bahá'ís from all over the world, gathered for a week-long congress at the Albert Hall in London. Alicia, who had flown directly to England with our first two children, Cathy and Susy, was able to be at this congress and join in spiritual inspiration. On one morning Rúhíyyih Khánum talked to us about the beloved Guardian and his passing. In the middle she was overcome by the memory of that heart rending event and could not go on. After a while the African Bahá'ís started singing softly and continuously "Alláh-u-Abhá" "Alláh-u-Abhá" "Alláh-u-Abhá" and all the audience {{p97}} joined in and swelled that holy refrain till the very rafters vibrated with power. How high must all the heavenly concourse have raised that acclamation to the very gates of heaven surely.

Another notable happening was the address by Hand of the Cause Samandari, who as a boy had actually been in the presence of the Blessed Beauty and served Him. His Persian words rang clearly through the giant hall as he recounted that place and those surroundings. His words were most beautifully translated by Marzia Sale and at one point she added extra words of explanation, at which Samandari raised a wave of delighted laughter from the audience by commenting "Did I say all that?" which Marzia also translated for us all.

A leading London newspaper produced a special edition filled with four pages of photographs and comments. Vendors outside the hall did a brisk business, selling to the delegates an historical record of that great day. And as the Bahá'í emerged from the building in a flood of joy I noted that even the famous double decker London buses unwittingly proclaimed this great occasion by sending their route number 9 to bus stops outside the hall. Which tribute I did not fail to photograph for posterity.

This congress was clearly the first time many of the friends had met 211 of the Hands of the Cause and their presence added special uplift. Which reminds me of a delightful happening regarding Hand Samandari. For many years after this he travelled all over the world filling hearts with memories of the Blessed Beauty. In these travels he came again to England and since he was now 95 years old and very precious to all of us, we persuaded him to go to a doctor for an overall health check up. He came out with flying colors. This amazed the doctor, in view of his age.

He asked Samandari for his secret. I cannot tell you. "Was the reply. "Why not?" enquired the doctor. Because it is rude.

"Come on, I'm your doctor, you can tell me anything. "Well, if you must know, my secret is that I stay away from doctors!"

To return to the Albert Hall Conference in London, the first "World Congress of the Faith. I had a privileged position. As the official photographer I could go anywhere in the hall and get right close up to the speakers and any other event. Taking photos did not prevent me from listening to all the very excellent talks which were given during those six days. On the final day about 60 Bahá'ís attended in their national costumes and sat together, a most impressive sight! The Universal House of Justice members, were of course, the main focus at all sessions.

It was a breath taking experience for everyone present to see before our very eyes, day after day, the supreme Bahá'í institution, just created, at last.

Between session the 6,000 Bahá'ís milled around inside and outside the giant hall. The police had been expecting problems and were amazed to find the most obedient and well behaved crowd they had ever seen. After the conference, many visitors spent time visiting friends in England. We were specially blessed and were able to invite to our farm two American Indian believers Annie and Chester Khán. We were able to get them to record some of their inner experiences and views on life on our tape machine. They in turn were fascinated by such a close up view of life on the farm. My parents were specially impressed at meeting real Indians at last, after all the wild west stories they had read about and seen on the movies. When it came time for them to return to the U.S.A. we drove them to London and they asked to be allowed to spend a few hours wandering alone in that vast city. We were afraid they might get hopelessly lost but Chester smiled at our doubts and promised to meet us at a predetermined spot in four hours. They did just that.

I set about trying to get into college and be trained for school teaching. Thus we would be able after about four years, to return to the pioneering field; but this was not to be.

Financial problems intervened and prevented it. The only other career I was trained for properly was farming. Now I recalled the time when 26 years ago, after living the first 29 years of my life on the farm, I had told my parents I loved them but I was going out into the world to find a career different from farming and also a philosophy for life. I had sold my motor bicycle for £50 and bought a ticket on the Queen Mary liner to Canada and sailed westwards. Now like the prodigal son in the parable, I came back to my father and offered to return to the farm if he would have us, family and all. My parents were delighted to accept us, though as jokingly said: 'We don't really need you on the farm. (He employed 22 workers and all was working very smoothly). The 16 intervening years had been very fruitful, I had found my Faith, my wife, a family and also my profession, photography.

After two years Father retired to Bedford city, fifteen miles away and gave us the farm. Now, far from being bored with farming, I began to enjoy it greatly. Must have been something to do with being my own boss at last! Soon babies James and Julia were added to our family, inspite of some peoples view that no family should have more than 14 children because there would not be enough food on the planet for more than that! During the next 17 years our four children grew up on the farm and attended the local government school. Each Sunday Alicia would talk to them about God and His Manifestations while they practised calligraphy round the kitchen table.

We also had youth weekends~n the house was literally full of Bahá'ís. We found ~hat the very large farm house could easily accomodate about 60 youth if they slept on the floors in all the rooms. The girls had the top two floors and the boys the ground floor. Everything went very smoothly and for the youth it was like going to camp in the country. There were plenty of fields to roam in between sessions. One weekend I noticed a long line of girls quing up outside the bathroom. Ten minutes later it had not moved. I took a chance; I knocked on the door and went in. There was our five year old J ames sailing his boats ~n ~e ba while the que waited patiently outside! We often chuckle about that.

Every summer we had Sunday picnics lasting all day in our big garden. It became quite an institution and people came from far and wide to enjoy the country scenery and the relaxed atmosphere.

Usually 100 ♦ 200 people brought their own food, pets, friends and relatives. We supplied gallons of tea and coffee all day. My father had always been very careful to prevent people walking in the standing wheat crop, because they would knock down the grain. However I found that few of these visitors had ever been on a farm so at one picnic, just as the grain {{p100}} was ripening for harvest, I led a line of about 50 lpeople on a walk through the standing grain. They love~ the experience and there was lit~le damage to the crop. In memory I can s~e today the long winding straggly line of people as they followed me through the fields, marvelling at the profundity of nature and how man is able to control it for his own purposes. The ne~ct year, picnic was held during harvest and grain was pouring into the store near our house. I was able to take about 20 kids up onto the overhead walk where they could jump into a literal sea of loose grain and romp around in the 500 ton heap.

Another popular feature of the farm picnics was tractor rides round the farm. I prepared a four wheeled trailer with saftey rails and straw bales to seat about thirty kids and adults and towed them around the farm, stopping at times to show them things. At one point I drove through a low tunnel under the railway line and sometimes explained that Abdu ♦I Bahfi must have travelled this line on his way to Edinburgh in Scotland. The line ran through the middle of our farm. Many a trailer load demanded to go on this trip and I did not have time to organise the tea making which was needing constant attention. Alicia was busy hosting. Finally the visitors took over the whole process. As the children grew, they entered the local elementary school, and I recall the time when Susan, at the age of about seven, had her first day there. Unlike the U.S.A, where it is forbidden to teach religion in government schools, in England it is the law that religion must be taught. On Susan's first day, the headmaster was addressing the entire school and ended up with the Lord's prayer. As they all went out to their various classes, Susan headed to the Principle's office and knocked on the door.

Yes Susan? he enquired. Please sir, you should not say that.

What Susan? The Lord's prayer. Why not? Because He has already come!

Oh, come in and tell me about it. For half an hour he sat listening to Susan's account of Bahá'u'lláh and His Mission. Thanking her, he sent her to class. Then he telephoned me on the farm. Mr Cardell, you will never guess what I have been doing for the last half hour!

He was a kind and well adjusted man and very devoted to Christ. This was the beginning of a real friendship and later, at his invitation I addressed the entire school, including all the staff, on the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. He once said to me that although it is the law that Christianity must be taught in his school, yet none of his staff wanted to do it. He had found that the staff did not feel sure enough on the subject. They always wandered off into social problems and the like. The young people in this age are taught to search for information and the teachers were unable to answer their queries where metaphorical stories like Adam and Eve appeared to contradict what they were learning in their science classes.

Cambridge city was only about 20 miles from our farm and we often joined in their Bahá'í activities. Soon Bahá'ís and their friends from surrounding towns began to go there also for Bahá'í Sunday Children's classes. Eventually the classes were transferred to our farm where there was more room and also recreation facilities. Alicia was a member of the national Child Education Committee and was full of enthusiasm and ideas. For two years we had classes for five age groups and one for adults, studying there every Sunday.

Alicia did a lot of research on the Master's visits to the British Isles and we made several trips to the London area to track down the sites where he had spoken and took slides for the archives. I did the same in Edinburgh when on a visit. This came to its climax when the Sunday classes hired an 80 seater bus and took all the kids and families on a trip to London, only 60 miles away. We toured a lot of the sights associated with the Master's visits and told stories about him over the bus's amplifier. These sites included the City Temple church where the Master gave his first talk in the west and Westminster Abbey where, in the deanery Abdu'l Bahá had dined with Arch Deacon Willberforce. Here the wife of the present Dean took us to the nearby church of St. John where the Master spoken. She had never met him, but was his fervent admirer and referred to him as Abdu'l. In the church she gathered us all for a long account of his visit. During her talk a crying child interrupted her visit, She took it into her arms and comforted it. Nor would she go on until it was happy again. We received the impression that she was spontaneously reacting the way the Master would have done in that situation.

At the school we made official application for our children to be absent on Bahá'i holy days. Soon their fellow students began to ask why they were absent and were told about the Faith. Because of the general atmosphere of religious scepticism so common in those days, it was not long before class mates began to ridicule this religion with a strange sounding name, but our children learned a useful lesson in patience while explaining it to them.

One day a child said to Cathy: "I wish I had a religion like yours!"

On two summers we had Youth camps at the farm. Every one lived in tents. {{p102}}

The tractor house was emptied of machinery and straw bales set up in rows for seating. Meals were provided by a whole army of cooks. It was called "Action Camp." On another occasion fifty of us hired a coach and went to a Teaching Conference in Switzerland. In 1979 Alicia and I attended a large Bahá'i conference in London and at this even met the now grown up children of Martin and Gerda Aiff, the family who had pioneered with us in Windhoek in S.W.A. 21 years ago.

A most historical series of events which happened to our whole family was appointment of Alicia's parents as custodians to the most holy shrine of Bahá'u'llah near 'Akká, Israel. For ten years they fulfilled this blessed service and on three separate summers they invited our whole family to stay with them at Bahjí. They put beds for us all in Abdu'l Bahá's tea room and we stayed in those holy precincts for two month each year. I well remember Janet, my mother in law, showing me where the key to the Shrine hung. You can take this key any time of day or night and go in by yourself. She said. It seemed far too great a bounty. Several times I went into the Shrine, once in the middle of the night, and prayed with no sound to break the magical silence. During the day time our four children, then aged about 8 to 11, walked round the gardens and absorbed a spirit which will stay with them for eternity.

In those days we also visited many historical places of ancient Palestine.{{p103}}

Much more bounty was to follow. In 1970 Janet and Forsyth took a three week holiday from their job at nahji and came to stay with U8 on the farm. They offered to look after the four children and the farm while we went to Írán to visit all the holy places connected with the Faith. We were dumbfounded and further it's ~ impossible to arrange all the details for such a trip in that short time. However we set about it and everything worked out well. Then we happened to mention our plans to Marion Hofman who said: Well, why don't you arrange to visit Bahá'u'llah's house in Edirne, Turkey, on your way there and then ask for permission from the house of Justice to make a three day visit to Haifa, on the way back. Amazingly, everything fell into place without a flaw. We took this as a sign that it was the wish of God.

Soon we were in Constantinople where the local ~ahá's were delighted to look after us. They showed us where ~ahá'u'llah had lived in that city and also the site which had been purchased for the temple ground; a beautiful spot on a high hill overlooking the Bosphorus ~ the strait of Sda joining the Caspian sea with the mediterranean with the city in the background.

Next we were put on a bus for Edirne (Adrianople) This 150 mile journey had been made by the holy family {{p104}} under great hardship in heavy snow and on horseback. We felt embarrassed to have done it by modern bus in just a few hours.

The house of Bahá u llah is kept in good repair, and as we walked through it and round the garden, we tried to visualise the holy family living there. They had lived in several other house before this one, but from here the letters to the Kings had gone out. At an earlier house Bahá u llah had been poisoned by Mírzá Yahyá. The doctor who attended Him pronounced the case hopeless. He had offered his own life in exchange. It was accepted, for soon he died and Bahá u llah recovered. But for the rest of His life, Bahá u llah suffered serious after effects.

We also visited a second garden nearby. This had been used often by Bahá u llah and even today it is well kept. There was a big mulberry tree, full of delicious ripe fruit. The custodians spread a blanket underneath and then gave the tree a good shake, this produced a heavy shower of white mulberries. We all carried the blanket back to a large table in triumph and had a feast.

Returning to Constantinople, now renamed Adrianople, we flew on to Tíhrán. At this time the Sháh was still in power and persecution of the Bahá is had abated, but there was a feeling that it would take little to cause its recurrence.

As our plane landed at Tíhrán airport we found ourselves in quite another world. We were overwhelmed at our good fortune in visiting the land where Bahá u llah had lived. Some Bahá i friends had been alerted to watch for us and we soon located their waving arms. They took us and our bags out to a waiting limousine which, we found out later, belonged to a Bahá i army general (national service is obligatory) and were whisked away into the craziest traffic I have ever seen. It seemed to have one major principle, Do what you can while you can! Ordinary policemen do not have authority to ticket cars, and drivers take all the liberties they wish. It is regarded as normal there!

We registered at our hotel and then went to the National Bahá i Office to request permission to visit the holy Bahá i places. We were greeted warmly by the National Secretary who asked us which of the holy places we wished to see. I held out my copy of the Dawnbreakers and said All of these! He was quite at a loss for words because there are so many and time was short, but also fanatics were always ready to abuse Bahá is, especially visiting ones.{{p105}}

The Universal House of Justice had instructed the National Spiritual Assembly to severely limit all such visits, They had already put all of these places off limits to Bahá'ís living in Írán and wanted to restrict visiting Bahá'ís considerably.

He said that the committee responsible would have to guide us. .
Could we come back in two days time. He introduced us to Atto, another visiting pilgrim from America, who spoke good Iranian and was looking for companions to share the pilgrimage with. This was evidently another intervention of Providence. How could we have possibly found our way round Írán without an interpreter? The next two days we spent investigating the very modern city center and often came upon unusual sights. Imagine a mother and three teenaged daughters shopping in a store, she wore the ancient traditional dress complete with yachmack veil over the lower half of her face ♦ the daughters all wore modern, western clothes and no veils. To us this showed clearly that the ancient and the modern cultures exist here side by side. In fact we found out later that the Sháh was trying to encourage western ideas and the Mullás were trying to retain the ancient Moslem ways. At this time the Sháh was winning easily, but some years later he lost his throne and Ayatollah Khomeini led the country.

When we returned to the National office, the National Secretary suggested we start off by visiting the House of the Báb in Shiráz, 600 miles to the south. He must have felt that would keep us busy much of our allotted time. Of course we accepted gladly. It was a most logical place to start our pilgrimage.

Soon we were aboard long distance bus for the first time; Our Out ♦ Journey)–Isfahan, 300 miles away As we wound our way through the massed rows of traffic in the City, Atto told us of a recent American visitor who had brought his own car over here and in seven days he had six accidents. Feeling he had too much to learn about driving in Tíhrán, he took a taxi which immediately shot forward at speed into the chaos. He went through no less than three red lights, but coming to a green, stopped. His passenger enquired why he stopped and was told that certainly some cars would be coming through from the other direction!

Looking around at the occupants of the bus we saw people of every class and occupation, all talking animatedly in Iranian. We prevailed upon Atto to translate some of it and began to relate to life around us. At the back of the bus sat an attendant with large jug of water and two glasses to refresh any passenger who called him.{{p106}}

They all used the same glasses with a bare rinse. Since there had been a warning about cholera epidemic on the radio, we decided to contain our thirst until a rest stop.

Soon we were speeding over rough tarmac into the countryside. On our map we saw that the road skirted an enormous desert which stretched over most of the center of Irán. Atto recalled that Irán, the old Persia, had for several thousand years been the site of great battles between competing tyrants. It had been the custom of whoever won, to burn and destroy the whole countryside. Thus this desert had all been beautiful country at one time.

We covered many featureless miles and passed through a few hamlets until, five hours later the bus drew up at an eating place. We wondered whether it was safe for tourists to go in and if the food was clean. Atto assured us and we entered barren room, full of crude tables and chairs where true peasants sat smokin- their hubble ♦ bubble pipes and eagerly watched TV screen show in- the Olympic games straight from Moscow ♦ W-2 found P-pslco!- to drink and the food was simple but adequate and reboarded our bus refreshed. But the next hours of bumpy, dusty travel brought only one real change in the scenery. We came to a place where an underground river surfaced and the people were drawing, pure water from it. Our bus stopped while we all filled our containers.

On 11 this journey we were mindful the the blessed Bab had traversed this same road on horse back over a hundred years ago, under much different conditions. It had ♦ a-;en Him man-, days. not 10 hours sitting in a comfortable bus. By evening we came to the famous and beautiful city of Isfahan. the mid ♦ point of our Journey. To say that the whole city is a treasure ♦ house of entrancing architecture only part, describes this jewel of a city. Everywhere there was evidence of thoughtfully created beauty in the buildings, the streets and the people. It was a sudden change from the desert. We were in the heart of ♦ a rich -s mor- like an art museum.

The next morning some local Bahá'ís came and took us to the house of the Beloved of martyrs and the Kin- of Martyrs, where they had been killed by the mob, all the contents of this house had been ransacked and the families were destitute. A maid, however. ♦ U-IR found a few coins in the wreckage and brought them to the wife. With great disdain she threw the coins into the mob with the words: 'What God has taken. I will not take back.!' {{p107}}

The present custodians of the house told us this story and also reminded us that when the Báb on his Journey north, had visited this home, these two martyrs were then only about ten and twelve years old. They were helping to serve the visitors and became so uplifted by the words of the Báb that they asked Him for Martyrdom. The Báb accepted. It was years later when they were grown up and had devoted their lives to Bahá'u'lláh, that they attained martyrdom.

Our guides next took us to see their extensive archive building which had somehow survived the years of persecution. Many historical Bahá'í relics were on display, but perhaps the most breathtaking were two full front pages of an ancient Russian newspaper, yellow with age but still clearly depicting dramatic and earth shaking events. The first was a drawing of the execution of the Báb, showing the firing squad, the smoke from their guns and the two Victims fixed to the wall. The other was a life like drawing of God's most great Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh on a white horse, entering Bahjí with His servants and family. The detail was so good that we could see the expression on the face of Bahá'u'lláh as he looked with power and authority towards the artist. So real was the drawing that we stood gazing at it with awe for some time. Naturally, I photographed both exhibits and later sent copies to the Universal House of Justice, asking if we may keep them. The reply was that the House did not know of their authenticity, but that we may keep them. However, we should not show them to the friends. Now, as I look at them, those photographs seem to speak of worlds beyond this world.

The next morning we boarded another bus and set off, only to come to a halt at the city boundary. The driver parked the bus and disappeared for a while. Then we were told that by law driver is not allowed to drive more than eight hours. He had driven all night to arrive at Isfahán and now had to be replaced. Two or three hours later another driver arrived and we continued our journey.

There was little of significance during the next days journey, just as dusk began to fall on that desolate landscape we saw in the distance our road winding across valley and entering a giant stone gate. As we came up to it, we saw that it was covered in Arabic lettering, took Ted and Alicia, the Koran Gate. Exclaimed Atto. We passed through and entered the city of Shiráz, the birthplace of the Báb. {{p108}}

We found a hotel, got a hot bath and a real night's sleep. Next morning we phoned the number of a local Bahá'í which the National Secretary had supplied and he came to guide us around the City and to the Báb's house. We went first to see the very impressive and beautiful shrine to the famous poet Saadi. Walking round the ornamental pools and into the cool shrine we were told of Saadi's prophesying the arrival of the Báb. Next we saw the equally beautiful monument to another poet who had prophesied this great Day, Hafiz. Our guide then had to return to his business and suggested that the following day we might like to visit the ancient ruins of Persepolis about 50 miles to the north. He would then return to us. We wandered for a while in the street and were suddenly hailed joyfully by a young man. We recognized him as one of the Persian Bahá'ís who live in England now and had actually visited us on our farm last year. His name was Baghrām. "What on earth are you doing here?" We exclaimed in astonishment. "I live here, this is my home town which I have come to visit." We told him of our own visit and shared many memories together.

Early next morning we took a taxi to the ruins of Persepolis, the ancient seat of King Darius. The road from Shiraz was through more cultivated part of Iran and varied crops could be seen on all sides. Once more we were struck by the strange contrasts in this land. We saw a farmer harvesting wheat as they had done in Biblical times, spreading wheat sheaves on the ground and driving oxen over them to trample out the grain; another man was throwing the grain and chaff up in the wind to separate them. Arriving at Persepolis we wandered thoughtfully among the ruins. After the reign of Darius his kingdom had been conquered and then the whole city and palace destroyed. Only few giant pillars and some carved statues remained. All was kept in excellent order for the tourists. Later we retired to a lovely tea house and in the cool of the evening sat eating a large watermelon before returning to Shiraz.

The next morning our guide took us first to the gate in the south of the city where on that historic day, May 23rd 1884, the Báb greeted Mullá Husayn. The gate had been demolished, but we were shown two large trees at the entrance to a market where it had stood. I descended from the taxi and set up my tripod and large camera, determined to do this in a professional way, only to have a heavy hand take me by the shoulder. Looking up I found myself confronted by a policeman giving a stern message in Iranian Persian. "It is forbidden to take pictures here, in a primitive fashion. It is forbidden because these people are very backward and hate all foreigners. You are likely to cause a riot. Hastily packing up, we departed without a picture, but vowing to come back the next morning and shoot through the taxi window. Those pictures turned out well.

Next came our actual visit to the House of the Báb. Our guide again impressed on us the importance of protecting the House. He explained that once before the mob had ransacked the House and smashed the precious windows. Fortunately the Bahá'ís had anticipated the attack and replaced the original windows with duplicates before the attack. Iranian clothes were loaned to my wife, complete with a yashmack to cover the lower part of her face. My European clothes were common to the Iranians and required no disguise. How great had been the need for such precautions we can now appreciate, twenty years later; today there is no trace of this sacred house. The mob and the government have razed it to the ground. But to return to our visit.

We proceeded on foot, along various pathways between the houses, but as we passed a small boy sitting in a doorway, he looked up and smilingly greeted us in English. "Hello!" to much for our disguise! We had no alternative but to pass on with a chuckle. Soon we came to a heavy wooden door on which our guide knocked. It was opened and we passed into a small garden. Here we were led to the opening of an underground tunnel which connected with the garden next door. As we emerged from the tunnel, I remember nothing of the garden, for in front of us was an archway through a tall brick wall. Through this archway could see into the courtyard of the Báb's house. In the center was a small clear pool of water and beside it an orange tree, a descendant of one the Báb had planted there over a hundred years ago. We advanced into the courtyard and looked around us. To the left was the well from which must have been drawn the water which was brought to wash the feet of Imuila Husayn. Looking up, we saw upon a large ornate window on the next floor. It had five vertical sections featuring designs in colored glass. To our right was the main entrance from the street. Through this door the Báb had led Mullá Husayn with the words: "Enter in peace secure." But now it was permanently secured and never used. Near it was the foot of a red carpeted stairs leading to that upper room. Reverently we ascended the stairs and found ourselves on a small landing with an open doorway on our left. We stood looking through that door over a high step which also functioned as a threshold for prayer. As we knelt at that threshold we gazed upon a scene we will long remember.

Rich Persian carpets covered the whole floor; in the far corner, next to the large window stood an old fashioned oil lamp; perhaps the spot where the blessed Báb had been seated when He spoke with Mullá Husayn... Let the reader pause here and take up his copy of the Dawnbreakers. On page 65 are shown photographs of the main street entrance and also the stairs up which we had just climbed. Then let him turn to page 59 which gives three views of the room at the top of the stairs.

As we gazed across to that corner by the window, the words from the Dawnbreakers came to our minds ♦ Now is the time to reveal the Súrah of Joseph. ♦ We seemed to hear Mullá Husayn describe his state: ♦ I sat spellbound by His utterance, oblivious of time and those who awaited me. ♦ And again: ~The entire chamber seemed to have been vitalised by that celestial potency which emanated from His inspired utterance. Everything in that room seemed to be vibrating with this testimony ♦ Verily, verily, the dawn of the new Day has broken. The Promised One is enthroned in the hearts of men . . . ♦

All the colors in that room were harmonious. They seemed to speak to his of on inff-bl ~lor~ The lower panels, on which were light green with white trims. Above this there were alcoves along each wall, recessing about 6 inches into the walls. Patterns in brown picked out in white covered these alcoves: ~nd everything up to the ceiling The morning sun was streaming through the delicate window panes, causing patterns of colored light to fall upon walls and carpet. The ceiling was a delightful sight, a continuous pattern of crosses inside circles, colored light brown and on a cream background.

Across the room were the pairs of double doors. ~d ~ perhaps to other parts of the house ~ knelt there ♦ ~ls-1 ~ .r.-p ~t our own doorway and prayed each in his own way. After ~om~ time we arose and took photographs. I did not have a wide ~ng lense. so took 13 overlapping pictures to cover the entire room.

Downstairs we moved from room to room trying, to visualise its occupants going about their daily tasks. Finally we went out into the courtyard ♦ ~rd ~nd ~thered a few of the ~r-nages which had fallen from the tree. These we treasure today in our own small families. Atto then called us into the small garden where we had entered and there tea was served by an elderly lady dressed in clothes of a century ago. She was one of the custodians. Atto talked with her for awhile in Persian; suddenly he burst into delighted laughter. We pressed him to explain; here is his account. ♦ You see this old lady, dressed in the fashion of the old days? Recently, on a Holy Day, she had bathed and put on her best clothes. She was passing along the street near by when a teenaged youth from next door, spat upon her as she passed by. With one sweep of the back of her hand she knocked him to the ground. A man saw this and shouted ♦ Hey, old woman, why did you do that? ♦ ♦ He spat upon me! ♦ She replied. ♦ So he should, you are a B-bi!- He said. She drew herself up and looked him in the eye with a power which belied her age and forcefully replied ♦ I am ready, you do it too! ♦ The man retreated, abashed at such faith.

As we retraced our steps to the main streets? our hearts and minds were trying to adjust to all these inspiring events. But there was one more to come. We were taken next to the Masjid ♦ I ♦ Vakili mosque to see the pulpit from which the Báb had addressed the

We read how the Sháh summoned the Báb to Tíhrán for a full investigation, but after the Báb had left Isfahán. the chief Va-ir had persuaded the Sháh it might be dangerous for him to meet the B-b, who seemed to have a magical power to change people. The Sháh had then ordered the Báb to turn away from Tíhrán and go to the prison of M-hku to await his pleasure. On the way, the Báb had spent some time in Tabriz, being imprisoned in the fort named ♦ The Citadel ♦ I. It seems that we were now destined to follow the same route, for the next day we flew back to Tíhrán and once again consulted with the National Secretary and he suggested we go to Tabriz. We spent that night in a hotel in Tíhrán and were amazed to see on the hotel register the names of Hand or the Cause Bill Sears 2nd and his wife Marguerite. From our room, ♦ we remained there and pretended to be phoning from England, but when we disclosed that we were in the same building they invited us over, and we were able to have a long talk with them about their own travels round Iran, performed at the request of the Universal House of Justice. They had just returned from Mahku, where we were hoping to go but since they had been surrounded by a mob and forced to leave town, they advised us not to go there. However they felt it would be in order to go to Tabriz. That afternoon we attended a giant Bahá-i meeting for women in Tíhrán. It was addressed by the Hand of the Cause.

The next morning we flew to Tabriz. Looking at a map, we saw that our plane would pass over Zanjan, where many Báb is had been besieged in .~ fort and later martyred. When my father retired and left me the farm in England he often came over to help with advice. We had several very good years, but Father warned me that until I had been farming for ten years I could not call myself successful. It was a time when farmers were being forced to be economical and I gradually changed the farm from mixed cropping and raising animals, into a wheat only farm. I was able to reduce the labour force from 22 to one and use big machinery to handle the wheat crop much more efficiently. Fortunately all of the men turned off were able to get good jobs elsewhere and Bertie Vout, who had been with the farm for 20 years, was able to do all the ploughing and harvesting with odd help in harvest time.

Of course there was danger in going into one crop continuously and people reminded us of the American dust bowl which had destroyed thousands of acres by that method. However we had heavy clay land which was more stable. Also we had plenty of good advice from the local Ministry of Agriculture and crop yields did not fall, but even increased.

Soon another farming revolution arrived. We found that we no longer needed the plough! By using heavy tyres behind a big tractor it was possible to create a much finer tilt. The traditional plough left us with slabs of clay which became hard and were very difficult to break down into a fine tilth for planting next year's seeds.

Further revolution came with crop fertilisation. We had always kept many animals to the land. The reason why I now gave up keeping animals was that the 2,000 bacon pigs we produced each year had only given us enough manure for 10% of our 400 acre farm. Now I had the land analysed and found that it was in good heart and further, it did not need all the regular dressing of Nitrogen, phosphate and potash which tradition said it should have. In fact the autumn wheat needed nothing until spring. Further, the land only needed potash every third year. All this meant a great saving in costs. Results from harvest after these new innovations proved that yield was not falling. In fact, together with the new types of wheat being developed every year our average yield increased over 10 years from about 24 cwt per acre to 40 cwt.

Father had left me one bagging combine machine and one bulk machine. The first left 30 tons of grain in bags, scattered all over the field each day. This had to be loaded onto trailers by hard work. We therefore sold it and did the harvest quicker by the bulk machine which poured the grain into a holding tank. From there it was transferred by truck to the barn, where newly installed machinery transported it to a bulk heap 7 feet deep all over a giant floor. Underground air ducts then dried the grain down to 14% moisture.

We finally broke all of the traditional rules of farming by giving up the plough altogether and forcing the new seed into the ground with an extra heavy drill. From all of this it is clear that great savings were made and also it was possible to run the farm on a part time basis. Now there was much more free time to help spread the healing Message of Bahá'u'llah.

In 1972 Alicia and I found time to fly back to Nairobi for a big Bahá'í conference there. Then we hired a car and spent some days upcountry visiting Bahá'ís in different villages.

As mentioned, from 1971 I served on the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United Kingdom. Life was much more interesting serving on a body directly under in the Universal House of Justice. In 1973 and, ~1978 N.S.A. members from all over the world gathered in Haifa to elect a new Universal House of Justice. It was a great bounty for us all and it was my 7th and 8th time of visiting the Holy Shrines, I remembered that when in 1952, Shoghi Efendi was sending me back to Africa after a 19 day pilgrimage {{p116}} he said to me: "Do not be sad, you will come back." At that moment I was almost penniless and had wondered how this could ever come about. In 1978 I had become a prosperous farmer, the Faith itself had expanded to cover the whole earth and my comprehension of it had considerably developed.

The Haifa convention of 1978 also marked a giant step forward, for the building of the House of Justice now stood in its skeletal form on the slopes of Mt. Carmel, awaiting the dedication ceremony. In front of over 500 delegates prayers were read. Then Lland of the Cause Rúhíyyih Khánum spoke to us about how the beloved Guardian had prayed so earnestly for this great day, had laboured for it over a lifetime and how, from the Abhá Kingdom, he must be witnessing this occasion with great joy. Next she mounted a temporary staircase which had been erected at the front of the main entrance, which faced Bahjí. She placed a box containing soil from the resting places of the Báb and 'aha'u'llah in a specially prepared niche. (Later this was sealed forever). Afterwards Lland of the Cause Faizy speaking to us about the significance of this solemn occasion said: "A Ḥadīth in Islām tells that when, thousands of years ago, the Prophet Noah had completed the building of the Ark, he placed in it soil from the graves of Adam and Eve. Now ♦ He said, ♦ We are performing a similar ceremony with the Arc of the Cause of God on Mt. Carmel, {{p117}} from which the Law of God will go out to all the world, as prophesied in the Bible.

Back at the pilgrim house, many rows of chairs had been arranged in the open for Ruiyyih Kahanum to address the delegates further. I was filming the faces of the audience when suddenly the proceedings were halted for a special announcement. Rúhíyyih Khánúm read it out and my movie camera recorded a wave of joy as it swept across the faces of the delegates. Some wept openly:

♦ His royal Highness the King of Samoa had just declared his belief in Bahá ♦ u ♦ Ilah. ♦ This was first King to declare his acceptance of the Faith. ♦ Much rejoicing followed.

A few years later the N.S.A. of the United Kingdom received a message from the Universal House of Justice: ♦ His royal highness Talifi Xumalita of the Samoan Islands will be arriving in London to visit the resting place of Shoghi Effendi, please announce to the friends and appoint photographers. ♦ I was both a member of the N.S.A. and one of the photographers. There was a large crowd of Bahá ♦ is waiting when the King arrived at the Gt. Northern Cemetery. We all went with him to the gravesite and prayed together. The House of Justice had asked that the King be {{p118}} given due respect by photographers when praying. However, when his Majesty stood at the graveside with three Hands of the Cause I felt impelled to take a picture from a distance and leave it for Haifa to decide whether it was inappropriate. Out of all the pictures, sent to Haifa, this was the one they chose.

There were other useful experiences in those days. As mentioned earlier, from 1971 to 1980 I was a member of the National Spiritual Assembly of the United Kingdom and spent frequent long weekends in London at their meetings. It was a most refreshing experience seeing the affairs of the Cause from a national point of view. I was to discover a lot more about the art of ~aha ♦ i consultation. I remember on one occasion I had expressed my view on a matter under consideration by the Assembly; the next speaker showed I had not given due consideration to the whole picture and I said aloud ♦ Oh dear, I did put my foot into it, didn ♦ t !! ♦ A voice from the other end of the table replied: ♦ Confucius said

◆ He who does not open mouth cannot put in big foot. ◆◆ The laughter did a lot to relax us all.

On another occasion we were all getting too tense in the discussion, each impatient to speak. George Bowers, who could usually be relied upon to get us back to normal, also leaned forward and said in a quiet voice: ◆ Kiss me! ◆ {{p119}}

Not all situations had a satisfactory outcome, however, at one meeting I felt that some members were doing too much talking and the rest were not being allowed to speak much; finding it difficult to make a contribution myself I got more and more upset. Realising that this was not the way ahead I relaxed somewhat. Soon I heard myself saying: ◆ Mr Chairman, may we have a round of opinion please. ◆ This we did and I was happy to see that no one had been hurt by my interjection. But soon we seemed to have returned to the old situation. Once more I raised my hand and asked for a round of opinion. This happened several times and the situation eventually became more normal. In fact, it began to go the other way. Now everyone, finding they could easily claim their right to speak, began to do so at great length. The chairman's efforts to get members to shorten their contributions failed and we were unable to get through the agenda in the days available to us.

While on N.S.A. matters, it may be appropriate to record an interesting situation which Hand of the Cause Hasan Balyuzi told me once. A certain believer in his enthusiasm, had over ◆ stepped the orders of the N.S.A. and had said publicly some things which though true, were not wise. He was interviewed by the Assembly ◆, he humbly apologised and the incident was dismissed. Later however, he did it again and {{p120}} was once more reprimanded. This happened more times and the Assembly was discussing taking away his voting rights. One member suddenly realised something: ◆ He has again apologised, -e cannot take away his rights! ◆ No doubt he was however advised that if he did it again he would lose his rights.

My parents were good Methodists and took their three children to Sunday school frequently. I therefore grew up with a great love of the Bible. At the age of 29, as mentioned, I set off for Canada to find a new career and also a philosophy. I eventually became a Bahá'í and on returning to England two years later I had tried to explain the Faith to my parents, but the time for their recognition of it had not arrived. However we often discussed it and such items as the state of the world. One evening my father had been to a Bahá'í public meeting in a hired hall. He was feeling very happy about it and reached for his check book saying "I want to pay for the cost of the hall, how much was it?" I replied: "You know you cannot do that, only ~aha is can contribute." "I am a Bahá'í!" he responded. I was breathless. "Do you accept Bahá'u'llah as the Manifestation of Gbd for this age?" "Of oourse I do he announced. I was delighted and brought out a declARATION card for him to sign. These were the last few days of his life and he always listened intently as, on some evenings I read to him from the holy Writings. Not long after that he passed to the next world. I missed his lovely person deeply but did not grieve, he was far happier now.

My mother outlived Father by many years and we often discussed the needs of mankind and the Bahá'í teachings. Her favourite comment was: that is in Bahá'í that is not in the Bible? I explained the fullfillment of the Covenant of God, the Adnistrative Order and new principles like equality of men and women, but she somehow felt that these were all implied in the message of Christ. I agreed, but tried to show her that tody we have all the divine guidance and instructions to unite all races and nations and set up world government. One day, as I came into the house she greeted me with. "I have been trying to find out where Christ said {{p121}} we are only allowed one wife and I cannot find it." "Got you I replied. "Does Bahá'u'llah?" she enquired. "He sure does." I responded. On another occasion we were in the middle of comparing ideas ~hen she exclaimed; "Yes I know Bahá'u'llah is a Prophet of Gbd, but why did he say . . ." "Mother, what did you just say?" I exclaimed! "Qh you know whatI mean." She replied. I did not feel I should follow this up at that time, but am convinced that she had recognised her Lord.

One day we ~ere visited by Mr & Mrs Ghandi, fram India. They came to thank us deeply for helping their four children to settle dawn in England and oomplete their schooling. They extended an invitation for us to visit India and stay with them. They owned 5 large girls schools in India and these were run on Bahá'í lines, though they accepted students of all religions. Cathy, our eldest was about 18, studying teaching and keen to go to other countries. By same miracle it became possible for Alicia and Cathy to visit India. Though I could not get away from the farm, I felt the Ghandis and the other Bahá'ís would look after them and sent them off.

They arrived at the Ghandis in time for student graduation. It was the custom there to honour the parents as well as the graduating children and they did this by weighing the mother in flowers, a beautiful ceremony indeed. Cathy was asked to address a school of 500 students about the Faith and afterwards they surrounded her and asked all kinds of questions. She also felt it an honour to be visited by people from overseas.

Alicia and Cathy did some travel teaching and travelled by bus with a male Bahá'í escort. On one such journey they were surrounded by people of all kinds and the air was filled with much excited chatter. One man was talking excitedly with the driver, and the Bahá'í escort turned pale. He translated for Alicia and Cathy. He demands that the driver stop the bus so that he can rape the white women. They were wondering frantically what to do when suddenly the bus ran into a tractor on the road {{p122}}

The ensuing chaos had saved the day!

They had many wonderful experiences in India, certainly a great step forward in their spiritual education. What is more, they were highly appreciated and must have caused many people to take new heart in the spiritual meaning of life. Of course, a lot of it came through difficulties and even tribulation, such as there being no safe water to drink and also discovering at first hand the great poverty in that land. When I asked Alicia to sum up their month in India she said: It is more terrible and more wonderful than you can imagine! Although several young Bahá'í ladies went from Europe to teach in India unaccompanied, yet it does seem that travelling in small groups is best.

We had now been back on the farm 17 years since leaving Africa in 1963. The children were all in their teens and attended a variety of private and government schools and Cathy was in college but James had some learning difficulties. We had always planned to retire early and go back into overseas pioneering. In consultation we decided that we should leave the farm for good and go to the U.S.A. to complete the children's schooling and then perhaps pioneer in South America or wherever was most suitable.

Since Alicia was born in California we would be able to use the newest methods of education there, so we moved to Portland, Oregon, bought a house near the community college and put the children into high school. Soon James had caught up well in his education and even appeared on the Principle's commendation list.

It was a great joy to us, for the English education system had classified his problem as being more serious.

I found a useful way of spreading the Faith. Each morning I usually walked over to the nearby college and sat in the giant cafeteria, choosing to study things like quantum mechanics and the Faith and getting into conversation with the students. There were many from overseas and life was very interesting. I was able to get 20 signatures asking the college to set up a Bahá'í Club to discuss the Faith and its relation to current world problems. Unfortunately most students, though much interested in this kind of discussion, possessed limited finances and had to restrict their college time to their main studies. However I continued getting to know people and developing an interest in their affairs; in this way I could help them to find solutions for their problems and get a higher view of their objectives in life. Thus they felt that I cared about them and we became friends. When I then introduced the Faith they were much more appreciative and often asked for literature. I had been developing this kind of approach with strangers in cafes in England and continued it in the U.S.A.

I felt that if I was consciously trying to get a declaration, it would seem insincere in their eyes, and they would rightly resist; so I put effort into getting to know them as real friends and helping them along their own chosen way. I did not worry if I was not always able to introduce them to the Faith but I hoped that our conversation had perhaps helped them along their chosen path. I knew that path would eventually connect with the Faith somewhere. In this way I was free from an intellectual urge to make new Bahá'ís.

Since spiritual progress cannot be imposed on people, but must come from their own hearts, it seemed illogical to try and convert them. It is however our duty to offer them information and encourage them to work out its implications. I discussed it with some of the Portland Bahá'ís and most appreciated it, but one Board member felt that this method would not bring in lots of declarations. However, I still try to follow Abdu'l Bahá's advice to make friends with new people first, so that they would trust me, even if it takes a long time. Never the less I always tried to raise their interest in the Faith so that they would want a pamphlet. In this way I gave out many pamphlets, very often at the rate of one per day. This amounted to giving out about 260 per year and I felt that this was seed corn well worth sowing, even though actual declarations were few. There is no doubt that a few spiritually awake people can recognise Bahá'u'lláh immediately but that the masses like me wish to take their time over it. {{p124}}

Like all good parents, Alicia and I were concerned about helping our now grown children find spiritually orientated marriage partners. Alicia was looking through a Bahá'í news sheet and suddenly came up with a bright idea. Look, there is a Bahá'í youth conference in Alaska next month, let's go. There are plenty of such conferences much closer I observed. It is a very long way to go for a 3 day event! But our children need to be on their own. She replied. Now on earth will they do that up there. It will take us all a day to recover from the journey and the conference time will fill up all the rest.

My logic was flawless, but I allowed it to be over ruled by a mother who, I suspected, was more open to higher guidance; Also I had been invited to be one of the speakers at the conference. So, off to Alaska we went, all six of us. It goes without saying that the scenery and the warm hospitality were outstanding; however, the unexpected happened. Cathy stayed a week longer and went travel teaching with a young man. One of that group was Ramin Yavrom, a young man from a distinguished Persian family. A few months later they were married and pioneered to Carjamaca, a small city high up in the Andes. Their two daughters Camilia and Claudette were born there.

Susy now went to college to study apparel design and also took an apartment with a friend, Julia entered training as a hairdresser and went to live with friends near her college. James was in art college and this all added up to our being free to do full time travel teaching. We gave up our house and bought a big recreation vehicle. This was to be our home for several months. We wrote to the National Teaching committee in Wilmette offering to spend several weeks visiting Bahá'í communities all over the U.S.A. They arranged an excellent 10,000 mile tour for us and in 83 days we gave firesides in 51 towns. During this trip too we arrived in S.Carolina to take part in the official opening of the Bahá'í radio station WLGI. It was rather fascinating because we were late arriving and were following the ceremony on our own radio. When we finally arrived, we were able to take part in the event we were listening to. This trip also enabled us to spend seven days at the temple in Wilmette where we attended a course for overseas pioneers. We were able to talk to and study with these 30 dedicated and enthusiastic pioneers. Also it was useful, for us because we were soon to pioneer to Peru.

Following this big trip we made another one through western Canada where we gave 52 firesides in 73 days. This took us up north to Lake Louise and into Indian country. At one small village we stayed with a couple who had become much loved by the Indians. They told us a typical true story of how they never locked up their house and after a trip came home to find a whole family of Indians had come to visit. Finding them away, they had felt enough at home to sleep and eat there till their hosts came back. One Indian had not been there before and felt uncomfortable about taking over the house while its owners were away, but his friends told him: "Oh, don't worry, these people are real Bahá'ís!"

On this trip we travelled to communities all the way up Vancouver Is. and also attended a big Indian Pow Wow at Neah Bay. On the Trail of Light, was a group of 7 tribal Indian Bahá'ís who had come from South America and were touring the U.S.A. This Pow Wow was held in an Indian community center and over 200 of the local Indians joined in. Everyone was much impressed by Kevin Lock's display of hoop dancing. I was able to get some excellent photographs of all these people, black, red and white, dancing together to the drums.

The action was inspiring and I went outside and brought in a tall step ladder to get a high view point of the action. As I was about to ascend, a video cameraman pushed me aside and went up to take his pictures from the top. I decided to be a good Bahá'í and not complain and we both got good pictures. Two years later I discovered the man to be Charles Nolley, the audio-visual manager at the Temple and we became great friends. Over the previous 10 years I had been making slide shows on the Faith and Charles ordered 12 sets of these for use at the temple.

The time had come for us to investigate pioneering in Peru on the spot. Alicia and I flew to Lima, the capital and then took a bus 300 miles inland up into the Andes. Our destination was Carjamarca, a busy little town at 9,000 ft where our eldest daughter Catherine and her family had been living for two years with Ramin's elder sister, Shafligeh. They had received very few visitors from the U.S.A. and were delighted to see us but had recently suffered a major loss. All their Bahá'í books had been stored in a disused shower bath. (don't ask me why!) Unknown to anyone a back pressure on the water system had flood all the books. They were trying desperately to dry them out before mould appeared, it was almost hopeless. Fortunately they were in the process of moving into their new house nearby and we went with them and help spread the sodden books on the floor.

Since they were starting up a small fast food cafe in town, they had to be economical in all things. This house was cheap - just mud walls, unfinished. A primitive bathroom out in the yard and a water and electric supply which often disappeared altogether, but it was home and they were pioneering in a very needy place.

In town there was a plentiful supply of hot water from underground sources. For 5 cents each the whole family were able to bathe together in a bricked hole in the ground. We were told that these baths - Los banyos - were using the same water supply that the Inca kings used thousands of years ago. It was most refreshing. The water came to each bath through long open air channels. It was too hot and we mixed it to our liking by moving a brick and letting in some cold water.

The teaching work was going on steadily and everyone except us could speak fluent Spanish. Ramin's favorite activity was sitting in the park and chatting with the local people.

There were large numbers of Campasinos (country folk) doing their shopping in town and their attire was very picturesque; the women wore voluminous colored skirts and black round hats. All were in town to do shopping or seeing relatives. One morning I awoke to the sound of chanting and the tone of a wierd horn. Grabbing my camera, I went outside and tracked it down to a group of workers planting potatoes in a field. An old man had a horn about ten feet long. When he blew, the workers responded with a chant and then planted more potatoes until the next blast came. They greeted me cheerfully and did not mind being photographed.

I then went on to a neighbours hut to collect our daily jug of rather dubious looking milk; this we always boiled. After breakfast I set about putting several sodden books out in the sun to dry. In each case I had to gently open every page. Some of the books, like Dawnbreakers took a long time but the sun was strong and soon I was making real progress. After several days I had dried them all out and then had to glue some of them back to their bindings. Eventually nearly all were brought back to a usable condition.

Shafligeh's son Moojan was married and he found a living, here in a unique way. He painted coloured designs on glass and sold them in varying sizes. Some of his big ones were put up in churches (with appropriate designs) and they looked much like real leaded glass windows. Although most of the population was very poor indeed, there were still a lot of rich people who gave high prices for Moojan's work. For some years he has been making a good living out of it. He was also excellent at teaching the Faith because he had a sunny disposition and many people in town knew him because he used to work in the tax office.

Ramin and Cathy now decided to move down to the coast where there was more business and he could earn his living better. He visited Trujillo and rented an apartment. Returning to Carjmarca he noticed big trucks regularly brought food up from the coast and returned empty. We walked around town until he found one and offered the man money to take all his furniture to Trujillo a big town down on the coast. Alicia, Cathy and her baby took a plane and Ramin and I went with the truck. There was no room in the cab for me so I crawled in under the kitchen table and lay down on a mat. We set off as it grew dark. Soon we were stopped by a patrol who asked about our business. We were apparently breaking the law in some way but suddenly the policeman recognised us as the relatives of Moojan's little girl and waved us through. The truck then churned its way up another thousand feet to go over a mountain pass. Here we stopped at a very primitive hut at 11,000 which was an eating house for travellers. I woke up and scrambled out from under the kitchen table. We entered a dingy room lit by candles and an oil lamp. Ramin ordered a dish of rice and meat which was eventually produced. I had noticed a giant dog in the corner as we came in, and he had given us a friendly wag of his tail. On biting into the meat in the semi darkness, I realised why; the meat was uneatable; the dog received it with enthusiasm as I flung it into his corner. Back on the dirt road again, all night long we wound our way down to sealevel and along the coast. Much of this coastal road crept along a sheer precipice with little passing room. Illogically I was glad to be under the kitchen table where I could not see it. Strangely I must have slept for the whole eight hour journey. Perhaps it was because I realised things were out of my control and I was entirely in the hand of God.

In Trujillo, Ramin began setting up a soft drink and snack shop near the market and this was to sustain them for some years until giant inflation of 3,000 per cent gripped the country. ~e stayed with the family for a few weeks and then went to Lima city to look into educational and job facilities for our now grown children. Then we flew back to the U.S.A. to pack up all our portable belongings for a real move to Peru. I had the big job of selling our recreation vehical and crating up all our things into six giant packing cases. Alicia and Julia flew back to Lima, stayed with some Bahá'is and started looking for accomodation.

It was lonley being without family, but there was much for me to do but one day I received a phone call from Alicia. She had contracted serious asthma in the very dusty city of Lima, where it never did rain. Her case was so dangerous that I told them both to ccme back to the U.S.A. immediately for treatement. {{p129}}

Alicia and Julia had made good friends with a lot of people in Lima. They had both spent much time helping run the Bahá'í center there and Julia had become quite friendly with a fine young Peruvian named Ramiro who ~as a bit older than herself. She asked permission to remain in Lima. m e family of her friend offered to look after her while Alicia came back to the U.S.A. so she stayed on and gradually fell in love with Ramiro. He was a very active Bahá'í. Among his services was the giving out of the Promise of World Peace booklet. He and another lady had visited 63 foreign embassies in Lima (after applying for an interview each time) and sucessfully delivered a booklet to each. They were treated with real respect.

On one of these missions, the Ambassador of a Moslem state ~as the recipient. After receiving the Message he asked the Bahá'is a question: Why are they persecuting the Bahá'is in Írán? Since they had decided beforehand that they should not speak to the Ambassador about the Faith, Ramiro replied: May I have your honour's permission to reply with a question? Certainly. Does your honour accept Muḥammad as the Prophet of God? Of course. Do you accept Muḥammad as the Seal of the Prophets? Certainly. The questions continued on all the basic Moslem beliefs until Ramiro offered. Your honour, this is what Bahá'is believe! m e ambassador was deeply impressed.

I have included these details not only to suggest that Ramiro is a good Bahá'í actively serving the Faith, but also to show that we had very good reason to consider him a trustworthy son in law, for within a few weeks he had proposed to Julia and been accepted. We could not afford to go to Peru for the wedding and we gave our parental permission on what we knew about him. They were married in the home of his parents and a few months later they immigrated to the U.S.A. Although neither of them could speak the other's language at first, yet now they were both fluent in both. Soon each had a good job in the U.S.A. and a year later Bobby was born. Ramiro's parents write to us very warmly from time to time, through an interpreter, showing their love and great respect for Julia and her parents. Now, some years later it has turned out to be a very good marriage. We hope that one day we will all be able to meet these lovely relatives of Ramiro and rejoice together in this link between our two nations.

To return to our own plans, for the next three years we tried every kind of treatment for dear Alicia. Sometimes we thought we had found something useful for her ailment, but nothing offered a lasting cure. However, with care she was able to lead a normal life. She decided to get trained as a travel agent, so we went to live at San Carlos, California, where there was a suitable college. However, the prospects of her making a useful career in this way did not turn out well, so we moved to Capitola by the sea because we had been told that the ozone released by the ocean was beneficial for asthma.

It was about this time that Susan, our second eldest found the right young man. Although not a Bahá'í he was much inclined to its teachings. Within a few months he became an active Bahá'í and soon they were married. Susan's health was not always good and George turned out to be a most understanding and helpful husband.

Cathy and Ranin now visited from Peru and then went on to a pilgrimage in the Holy Land. They returned to their pioneer post in Peru much uplifted. Another big influence in our lives was the fact that Posch Bahá'í Summer School was quite near by and each year we were able to spend some days there. The peaceful serenity coupled with meeting so many dedicated people from far and wide seemed to bring a blessing which was accentuated by the beautiful forests all around.

Finding that the ocean air had not improved Alicia's health after a year, we moved to the dry desert conditions of Las Cruces in New Mexico. Here we found a happy, lively Bahá'í community and soon Alicia was setting up a weekly Bahá'í class for the children of the whole area. She had developed such schools twice before, at the farm in England and in Portland, Oregon. She first gathered together about 12 concerned mothers and formed them into a School Board. The Board then worked out all the practical details of the proposed school, including the choice of venue and curriculum. When all was ready the School Board submitted themselves to the Local Spiritual Assembly of Las Cruces as their parent authority who were delighted with the project. They started training the teachers several months before starting the classes.

When the classes began, parents and children from other assembly areas, even El Paso, 50 miles away joined in. Difficulties came up of course, but everyone was determined the school should thrive and give their children the steady spiritual sustenance that Bahá'u'lláh has stipulated. Three years later (1992) it is still flourishing and growing.

In 1990 our son James married a lovely Chinese lady from Taiwan. They had met at the California College of Art in Oakland, where they were both students together. Michele Tu had been educated in the Bay area but she was not a Bahá'í when they were courting. James used a lot of gentleness in showing her the Faith and after a long time she recognised Bahá'u'lláh. Now, after two years of marriage they are both keen active Bahá'ís and both serving on the Local Spiritual Assembly as well as on the School Board.

To return to Alicia and myself. After one year in the dry conditions of Las Cruces, we had to leave, because the electric storms seemed to adversely affect Alicia's asthma. We packed up and drove our rented U-Haul van with all our furniture in it, westwards to look for a small town without polluted air and where we could buy a cheap house on mortgage. After investigating several towns we found our ideal home in Red Bluff Judicial district. Well it was nearly ideal, it did have short spells of high temperature in summer, but we had a good air conditioner and our house looked out onto green country.

Here we settled in very happily with warm encouragement from the local Bahá'í group. Soon there were two new declarations, Lisa and Kurt Harms. Then two other Bahá'ís, Jan Marina and Sheila Granger moved into Red Bluff town group. Our good fortune continued, for a few months later Jacqueline and Gene Wild from San Jose moved up to our area and we now have a strong community.

Alicia had for many years been working on a curriculum for Bahá'í schools as she continued to research this project steadily. I started working on the fruit trees and building a green house. I also dug the ground and Alicia did all the planning and planting. We began building what is called Square foot gardening. Six foot square boxes filled with correct soil mixture and planted with vegetables.{{p132}}

We felt that we needed income to serve the Faith more fully, Alicia tried continually to find an occupation. Her main effort, spending two years learning to be a travel agent had not matured. She tried many other avenues without success. Sometimes she found part time work and threw herself whole heartedly into it, but thereby making new friends to whom she gave the Faith. But one day she was feeling frustrated at her inability to find a job, she said to me I wonder if the world really needs me and whether my life has been a success. I replied Oh really! Well then can you show me any Bahá'í family in the whole world which has raised four active, devoted Bahá'í children, who have married four active Bahá'í partners of four different races, Iranian, Peruvian, American and Chinese? You their mother did most of this by your unselfish, hard working efforts in raising those children while I, their father, was usually out working on the farm. On top of that, you have been the driving force and inspiration which has started Bahá'í Sunday classes for children first on our farm, for the whole area and then in the U.S.A at Portland Oregon, Las Cruces and now Red Bluff.

Truly this is a devoted, loving, persevering servant of Bahá'u'llah who in spite of being restricted by her ailments, persevered in the way of loving service to mankind. Even today occasionally a grown up Bahá'í would greet her with Hullo Auntie Alicia, do you remember me? In our 18 years in England she had for years been secretary of the Child Education Committee; one of her duties was to send out birthday greetings every year to each of the 800 odd Bahá'í children on her rolls. She became well known by the new generation in many countries. How many souls did she save for the new race of men, like those who many years later, as active Bahá'í is greeted her with 'Hullo Auntie Alicia!'

We did not know it when we came to Red Bluff, but Alicia's duties in the physical world were slowly drawing to a close. Her asthma and other problems increased, but she kept working hard as secretary of the Assembly and organiser of the childrens classes and a hundred other things to make those around her happy. We kept closely in touch with our four children and occasionally had big family gatherings at our home. These gatherings included three grand children, Camilia, Claudette and Tommy and great were the celebrations at those times we had together.

One day her heart just stopped and her immortal soul took its flight to the real world beyond our earthly vision. There she is continuing her journey through all the worlds of God. On her worldly resting place are engraved these words:

'The light which these souls radiate is responsible for the progress of the world and the advancement of its peoples.'

'Bahá'u'llah, Gleanings from the Writings of Bahá'u'llah, p. 157{{p133}}

All four children and their families came to the funeral and then stayed a week longer; we shared our deep grief together and started planning for the future. During that week Alicia appeared to several individuals in various ways. Typical was Julia who, sleeping in her mother's bed, woke up in the middle of the night and rushed into my room. 'Dad, Mum has just told me to go and comfort you and say 'I did not have much spare energy while I had a sick body, but now I have all the energy I want!'
Julia went on 'Dad, you must not think of that room as a sad place, it is filled with power!'

When the families had all gone I went up to Bosch Summer School and worked for my keep the whole summer. In that time I was surrounded with many people who know Alicia and myself and their support was greatly warming. I got a lot of work done in the gardens and attended all the session I chose. After the summer I spent two or three weeks living with each of my children. They all wanted me to stay permanently of course, but I had heard of the great progress of the Faith in Romania and began planning to go there. It just happened that recently the N.S.A. of the United Kingdom had received a suggestion from the Universal House of Justice, that it could be useful if they invited overseas

British Bahá'í to come back for a teaching trip in England; they sent me an invitation. I also received an invitation from the new N.S.A. of Romania to help with the teaching there. And above all an invitation came from Haifa to be present there for the 100th year celebrations of Bahá'u'llah's passing and placing the scroll containing the names of the Knights of Bahá'u'llah at His the threshold of His shrine. I am therefore embarking on a five month trip, visiting the three countries and returning to California. It seems to me that if I find the needs of the Faith in Romania as urgent as I have heard, that it will be hard to resist going back there for a long time.

I have just been told that seven Persian Bahá'í families are wanting to buy a building for a Bahá'í Center in Romania and are looking for a caretaker. Who knows what will happen! ~Verily we are all from God, and to Him shall we return.

THE END FOR NOW

REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL TEACHING TEAM TO THE FAR EAST

November 15 to December 1 1987

O that I could travel, even though on foot and in the utmost poverty, to these regions, and, raising the call of 'Ya Bahá'u'l 'Abhá in cities, villages, mountains, deserts and oceans, promote the Divine teachings! This, alas, I cannot do. How intensely I deplore it! Please God, ye may achieve it. 'Abdu'l Bahá, Tablets of the Divine Plan, p. 39.

In response to the summons of 'Abdu'l Bahá (quoted above) 36

Bahá'ís left the U.S.A. on November 15th 1987 and travelled to 5 countries in the far East to show by their actions the depth of their love for Bahá'u'llah and for all mankind.

It also seemed that we were seeking to unite our intellectual Western approach with the spiritual one of the Orient. Some of the Eastern blessings soon became apparent in the relaxed, patient and friendly reception we all received in our first 5 days which were spent in Taiwan. From the airport we went into Taipei, the capital, by special tour bus and first visited the Lung Shan Buddhist temple, the largest and most famous in Taiwan. Here crowds of workers and housewives carrying incense sticks bowed to various shrines then knelt to pray with great earnestness. Astonishingly we were told that photography was an accepted as natural. We walked amongst them and found that the close contact with the people was a warm experience, in spite of our embarrassment at mixing cameras with worshippers. It seemed that it was an indication that if motives were for the good of all, then such a mixture can be harmonious. Our Interest was for spiritual treasure, not material ones.{{p134}}

Our breakfast at the hotel each day was in our own dining room where we also had prayers, readings and consultations for two hrs. The second day five National Spiritual Assembly members joined us. Mr. Said Kadivian, their chairman, very warmly welcomed us and told how desperately we are needed. He jovially appointed us all to the ♦Extension Travel Teaching Committee♦. They have had nearly 900 new believers recently and 70% of these were educated youth. He told us how when the House of Justice had announced new persecutions, they had replied with ♦♦~e have just had 300 new believers!♦ The ♦Thl~ was no card ♦ slshlns e~ercise, he said but true acceptance. The Fund also Increased 70%

Jean Bellows, a pioneer, gave a fine slide show on the teaching that is going on in Taiwan. She told us of a dream she had of the whole west coast of Taiwan opening up and its people flooding onto the mainland of China. Said Kadivian appealed to us to return here again and help teach the masses. They need at least 17 more travelling teachers. Also. Please teach the Chinese everywhere in the U.S.A.

He told us of the ambitious goals of their Publishing Trust, especially the creation of their own kind of pamphlets, not just translations of the American ones. Emphasis is to be placed on pamphlets which use the creative Words of God. ♦Intone, O My servants, the Words of God...!♦

Part of our sightseeing took us to the Memorial of Chiang Kai Shek and Dr. Sun Yat Sen. Martha Root had spoken with him.{{p135}}

It was interesting to find that the basis of the new Chinese Republic, founded by Dr. Sun Yat Sen, is the Three People ♦s Principles; ♦of the people, by the people and for the people.♦

Next morning, after our breakfast session, we headed in our special bus to the town of Tsao Tung, about three hours distance. The entire way was spent in discussions and entertainment over the amplifier as Tony Lease, our tour director, drew from each of us some of our Bahá ♦i experiences. Sugar, a vivacious Chinese Bahá'í, taught us a Bahá'í songs, in Chinese, one of which went like this: (my own alliteration): Wa I nee (I love you) La nee I wa (and you love me) Dai chee chow see see (I am Bahá'í).

At Tsao Tun we all had lunch with some of the local pioneers and others at a very modern cafe. They told us that most new Bahá'ís had been attracted by the Spirit of the Faith, even though they know little about the administration.

Clothing here is very cheap but no use for Americans unless it is especially tailored) because they do not make clothes in the larger sizes we need.

We were frequently reminded not to start pushing the Faith here, for it is a bit enough happening for the local people to suddenly see 36 Americans appear together. We should just be natural, friendly and caring. We visited the modest Bahá'í center here in this village, said prayers and had a group picture taken with an elderly Chinese gentleman who had been a Bahá'í only a very short time.

One evening we went to a fireside at the Taipei Center and the place was filled to overflowing. After some prayers talks were given by two or three persons. Our group nearly depleted the supply of special books, calendars and other materials printed in Taiwan. Every one felt the warmth and unity during the fellowship and refreshment time. We all felt it a great bounty to share our prayers and experiences. A young lady at our hotel had become interested in the Faith through contact with some of us. 3 She attended a fireside and declared that evening.

In our consultations we learned that the Chinese are not familiar with the Christian Idea of Prophets, so we should RATHER MANIFEST THE SPIRIT. At no time should we do anything to upset the local teaching work but synch-onl-e at all times with the local and the National. Just our travelling here in such a large group has a big teaching effect.

Breakfast at the hotel, Asla World, the next morning was a spiritual as well as material feast. One pioneer joined us after rising at 5 AM to get here from the next town. He was Mansour Kheraamandam from Chung Li. The rest of the day was spent going out to the markets and shops and mingling joyfully with the people.

Our last evening in Taipei was a celebration dinner with the local Bahá'í guests. Victor Tom, known to many of us was there and gave a short talk.{{p137}}

Another inspiring talk was given by Jack Davis who with Kenton Dunbar and other pioneers started the teaching here, which has accelerated now into mass conversion. We were reminded of the letter of the Universal House of Justice which has given great importance to the teaching work in Taiwan. In view of this we should remind the American community of how much their help is needed by sending teachers and also teaching the Chinese in the U.S.A.

We sent joyful cables to the Universal House of Justice and to the Hand of the Cause Bill Sears.

The next day we flew to Hong Kong, changed planes and arrived in Bangkok late evening. What a wonderful surprise awaited us. We were greeted by about 30 Bahá'ís carrying a large banner.

Bangkok gave us a true Bahá'í welcome.

SUNDAY. Nov. 22nd

We all visited the Royal Museum and then the chief Buddhist shrine in all the world. His Holiness the Buddha-then resided here, in an all golden building known the world over for its magnificence. We removed our shoes and entered to pray with crowds of others. Then we toured the enormous building complex, perhaps the most ornate in the world, at every step a new wonder of beauty greeted us. Every inch is decorated for here resides the Emerald Buddha, now in winter dress.

That evening we attended the local Bahá'í Feast. Maybe the saying is East is East and West is West and never the twain shall meet.. but at that Feast this was no longer so. It was here that the warmth and unity of Spirit melded the twain! During the consultation period four of the Americans gave a 10 minute talk, each on a different aspect of the Faith. The social part of the Feast filled with joyous song and wonderful fruits and sweets. The place was crowded to overflowing.

MONDAY NOV. 23RD

We arose at 5:30 AM for breakfast, prayers and discussions. At 8:30 we boarded a long narrow fast boat for a trip on the Chao Phraya River, sometimes called the River of the King. How can I describe that experience? Imagine a very broad river flowing past the hotel and swarming with boats, ocean going vessels, great barges and boats of every size for the tourist. Many of the tour boats were long and narrow with a truck engine mounted on a swivel at the rear, from this extended a 12 foot propeller shaft. At full throttle the boat almost leaps out of the water and the passengers hang on for dear life while an ever nonchalant boatman skillfully steers them through the traffic. We had a larger, slower version and were constantly passed by these while we leisurely enjoyed every inch of this strange, wonderful trip along the river and (klongs, canals) of this incredible city.

Our guide, Sam is the local representative of Tony Lease Tours and was a constant source of information and joy. He referred affectionately to the speeding boats as our "Local Kamakazis". It was along these canals, or klongs, we saw how the poor, and not so poor, people lived. Some of the very poorest looking buildings were the river residence and business site of persons who had homes elsewhere. We saw the daily routine of many of the river people from bathing and washing their teeth while standing waist deep in the river, washing clothes, loading boats, and cooking the family meal. This was a timely experience for us, tourists from the luxury Shangri-La Hotel.

Along the way we saw well kept patches of water plants grown for food and other uses. Tropical fruits, orchids and other brilliant flowers flourished. Through these narrow canals the kamakazis kept roaring past us making high tidal waves which everyone took good naturedly. Soon we reached our destination, the floating market of Bangkok, the tourist haven. So many boats were tied up to the pier while their passengers ransacked the multitude of stalls for bargains, that some of the passengers had to walk across two or three boats to get to their own. We were among the bargain hunters but so well was it all organized, however, by our great leader, Sam referred to Tony Lease, that we lost not a single person and all were present when we gathered back at the boat an hour later. We returned to the main river with its scurrying boats, enormous grain barges going down to the sea and ferries crisscrossing between them all. Often we passed beautiful well kept temples but none could compare with the Temple of Dawn, a massive complex of incredible shrines, temples, and market stalls. Everything was in living technicolor. As the cameras came out, so did the sun from the early morning overcast and we were able to get pictures to our hearts content.

Every morning breakfast was a joyful event with prayers and plans for the day's teaching and shopping. In spite of having to choose from over 25 dishes, the mood was spiritual and this was taken up by the hotel staff who must have been amazed to find such an atmosphere in their luxury hotel. I asked one waiter if he understood English and he nodded. I said, 'Do you understand what is happening?' He nodded. I gave him a brief explanation and a pamphlet. Several times in the next days he came back to me and expressed warm friendship, reminding me that I had spoken to him.

One day two travelling Bahá'í teachers miraculously found us and joined in. They were Myrlam Marrero, pioneer to Surinam and Hillegonda Van der Zee from Holland. Another day a member of the 11th National Spiritual Assembly of Malaysia, Mr. Kurama Das spoke to us. They now have 100,000 believers, 150,000 if you count the children.

Other guidance given to us was that we should speak to these people in their own manner. They do not use the word 'God' but the 'Great Spirit'. They are not familiar with the Bible Prophets or with progressive revelation. Tell them rather that Bahá'u'lláh is the Great Teacher for today.

One third of all Chinese live outside China, befriend them wherever you find them. In Thailand education has been compulsory since 1921 and now only 8% of its adults are illiterate. Already they have been following this teaching of Bahá'u'lláh for many years! But more than this, from the poorest to the richest they are always turning a bright, shining and friendly face to everyone, as He has commanded. They truly made us feel at home.

Our last evening in Bangkok was spent in a massive restaurant eating Thai food and watching Thai dancers in traditional dress to the sound of throbbing instruments we had never seen before. And finally as we leave this hot, humid, enchanted city with its warm and loving people, it seems we hardly notice the humidity. This was especially true when groups of us were taken off by local Bahá'ís to visit their friends and meet informally with the people. On one such venture six of us taxied across the city to meet with the head of an International School. We found the school displaying many examples of the multi-national aspects of the world. They were doing this because it was the obvious way ahead and the head was surprised when we told him he was obeying the Will of God. Several others went off to see something of an agricultural nature.

At our last breakfast in Bangkok Sammy Smith, the Secretary of the Local Assembly, told us that they are sending two books, ~The New Garden ♦ and ♦The Peace Statement♦ to 2,000 schools. We offered to help address these but she said, ♦Only If you can type in Thal.♦ She had brought some examples of the products of cottage Industries the Bahá♦Is of Northern Thailand had producea to help them earn a living. They were very fine set~ of placemats and nap♦kins made from the raw cotton grown in the area. One teacher told how In a bus a man had overheard her telling about the Falth and pulled her aside demanding to know ♦what is Bahá♦i♦ {{p142}}because it is just what he belleves.

NOV. 28 ♦ 31 HONG KONG TO CANTON (in Guangdong Province)

Our first evening in Hong Kong we split into two groups with one going to a fireside at the Bahá~I Center and the rest took an hour bus journey to the town of Tai Po. In ~oth firesides the same warm spirit of love and unity was shown. We met pioneers, local te~chers ana local non ♦ Bahá♦is. e met a Malaysian who haa come with eleven others to do teaching work here. One of them had presented the Peace Message to thlrteen ~chool heads and plans to do twenty more. She did it without appointments and had a fine reception.

Late that evening we gathered at the hotel to observe the passing of ♦Abdu♦I ♦ Bahá. Some local believers were there also. The program W2~ planned by Mr. Kurama Das. and lasted till about 1:30

Chester Lee, National Spiritual Chairman, reminded us that the Bahá♦i News had reported that after Beijing Book Fair, the Government of China asked for a translation of three more Bahá♦i books. He said they use such books for research and for reports to their people. They have already mentioned Bahá♦u♦Allah in reports.

Early next morning we arose for breakfast at AM. The train trip to Canton ~Guang~zhou) China was a three hours long. It was raining as we passed through partially harvested rice fields. There were other crops but we could not distinguish what they were. Going through customs at Canton was very easy and a Bus from the Garden Hotel was waiting for us. Our guide, Johnny, an adopted {{p143}} English name that sounds much like his own, that back in the days when he graduated, alt young people were sent to the countryside for two or three years. (This is no longer done) ~e has a wife and one spn. His wife works in the hospital as a lab tech and the child stays at his kindergarten which is at the hospital at cost of food only. All big work places ~o ehis. Women In China have more freedom than the ones in America because they can become train divers (engineers~ ana heavy equi?ment workers, etc.

Francis, a beautiful lady guide supplied ~y the Tony Lease office In Hong Kong spoke very good English t.avelled to China wth us and was a great help not only with our entry to the hotel but when Johnny got stuck. One of these times was when he tried to exp l a l n how when the ♦ Gang of Four u was over thrown, the l and that had been communes was given back to the people. We had to stop by the Dlstrict Office to get s~il l another guiae (a local one~ before we could visit a typclal farm family who ralsed ducks ana geese . The elderly couple welcomea al l J6 visi tors who only just managed to squeeze into their main room. This was in the town of Dall. They had five chlldren and were lucky that was before the ruling of only one chlld per famlly or severe penaltles for each extra chlld. We returned the local guide to her district office.

We also visited a ceramic factory, a silk factory, a jade factory and a Museum School that had formerly been a Taoist Temple. The temple used to ~e used for famlly worship and contalned mlnlature figures deplcting all aspects of family life plus many large statues representing warrlors as well as Gods.{{p144}}

With much persuaslon we were allowed to visit a local hosptal f at the town of Po Shan. Health care ls free. The hosptal was very primitive by our standards but the people there seemed to get good care. There were two dispenserles or pharmacies, one of Western type medicines and the other Chinese Herbals. Everything in China would have been enjoyed much more if we had not been so cold. We had been told that the temperature would be much llke that of Hong Kong (and it was), but a cold front had come down from the north and with the wind and rain we were most uncomfortable. All the heavy luggage had been left at the Park Lane Hotel in Hong Kong. We brought wth us only the barest neccessities in an overnighiter or carry on bag for such a short stay. Even though we shivered in spite of wearing two or three shirts, we found great frlendliness everywhere in Canton. We had plenty of meetings with the local people, mostly when shopping and in the hotel. There was llittle conversation , of course, but we ald share wonderfully warm, frlenaly greetings In our own way.

They ~ldn♦t object to having thelr picture taken in fact they wanted u~ to do so. We saw no pollce of any klnd an~ Just a very few soldlers seemingly off duty.

It was generally felt by us that the Chinese are a gentle, wonderful, sensitive people with an unusual sense of beauty which is shown in their surroundings and their great works. Of course, as tourists we saw mostly tourist places, but we did see much of the common people and their homes while driving through the small country towns and villages of all kinds{{p145}} was with great reluctance that he had to return home later only one more brief day in Hong Kong. It was very hard to say goodbye to Chester and the others. Two persons in our group stayed, one in Hong Kong and one went back to Taiwan. Others are planning to return soon.{{p146}}

Highly Significant Celebrations at the World Center

The entire last week of May 1992 saw some most significant events occurring in the Holy Land. In ascending order they were: ♦

1. The placing of the scroll, listing the names of the Knights of Bahá'u'llah, under the floor at the entrance to the shrine of Bahá'u'llah.
2. The commemoration of the Centenary of the ascension of Bahá'u'llah on May 29th 1821-2. 3.
 The procession of 3,400 Bahá'is from all over the world up the Avenue of the Kings on Mt. Carmel, circumambulating the shrine of the Báb and then climbing up to the seat of the Universal House of Justice to view a near life sized portrait of the Blessed Beauty. the beloved Guardian once said to a pilgrim "... the bounty of making a pilgrimage is that you may become spiritually strong to go out and do great service for the Faith. Thus this mass pilgrimage will doubtless become the cause of great new capacity amongst the friends. towards the end of May planes began delivering pilgrims from all over the world to the Holy Land. National Spiritual Assemblies from 175 countries had each been asked to send nineteen Bahá'is to take part in this celebration. As they arrived {{p147}} at the World Center, 3 whole days were given to registration and for meeting long parted friends. Many were the joyful greetings between Bahá'is who had long been serving the Faith in faraway places. Try to imagine the pilgrim house near the shrine of the Báb, accustomed to accommodating a group of 100 pilgrims, now being used to welcome 3,400 on this day. So packed was it with old friends that one could hardly walk a yard without being hailed and embraced. We had been previously asked not to telephone to the hotels in town to find special friends, for if everyone did this it would jam the telephone system. It was pointed out to us that the social side of this celebration must take strictly second place to the main events themselves and the spiritual significance. Further, television crews from Europe would be recording everything so we were asked not to run around taking pictures ourselves. The World Center staff would cover everything.

On May 27th, the second day, a reception was held by the Universal House of Justice for those Knights of Bahá'u'lláh who were still alive. (about 109 out of 257). Fortunately our group arrived at the House of Justice building about an hour early and so we were able to walk around the beautiful gardens. We were told that at this time of the year the grass would normally have been dead through summer heat and lack of rain, but that fortuitously there had been a massive downpour. Grass and flowers were at their peak condition as a result. However, it was not all progress for the rain had washed great numbers of the famous geraniums out of the ground and the storm had blown down some of the tall ornamental trees. The hard pressed ground staff had been forced to go out into the town and buy more plants and to remove downed trees. On this day there was no sign of the damage anywhere.

The gathering took place in the main hall. Short addresses were given by the Chairman of the House of Justice and by Hand of the Cause Ruhíyyih Khánum. The latter gave a very warm welcome to the Knights. Then she drew our attention to the great importance of taking advantage of world conditions to use the spiritual power now at our disposal to make real progress in awakening mankind to the Divine outpouring. She said, from memory, that she hoped we would not go back to our countries and just say things like "Oh we had a wonderful time and everyone was uplifted and Rúhíyyih Khánum WAS looking younger than we expected." (laughter). But that we should go back and advertise the friends everywhere to the tremendous spiritual opportunities now open for teaching the Faith in this Holy Year.

There followed refreshments and the opportunity for the Knights, many of whom had not seen each other for very many years, to greet each other, discuss old times and see the scroll, which was laid out on a long table. Later it would be rolled up and inserted into a metal cylinder, vacuumed and helium gas inserted before sealing. Each name on the scroll had its own ornamented place, and was coupled with the name of the territory opened and the date it was opened.

At 10 a.m. the next morning, buses collected all 3,400 attendees from their hotels and brought us, in carefully organised sequence, to Bahá'í where a large hayfield had been rented to park the 60 buses with great precision. Everyone would be able to relocate their own bus after the ceremony of placing the cylinder at the entrance to the Shrine.

Rows of chairs accommodated all the pilgrims around the outer perimeter and on the mound. Prayers were read and explanations given; then the House members, Hands, Counselors and all the Knights went forward to the shrine entrance and watched while Rúhíyyih Kahnúm, with help, laid the cylinder in an open trench just inside the Shrine door, filled around it with sand and replaced the flagstone and carpet. Television cameras recorded the whole operation and it will no doubt soon be transmitted to Bahá'í communities all over the world, and probably to public channels also.

The following day, May 29th 1992 we celebrated the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh which had taken place exactly 100 years earlier.

All pilgrims were picked up at their hotels at staggered times, starting at 1.30 a.m., and taken to Bahjí where, in the dark of the night an astounding sight met our eyes, setting a deeply moving atmosphere. As we left our buses and walked down the road in a steady stream towards the Shrine, we saw that from the Collins gate right up to the entrance of the holiest Shrine, there were twin rows of flame in the night, one on each side of the path. On closer approach we found that they were formed by twin rows of candles sheltered in glass. Later we were to discover that all paths in these holy precincts had been treated in the same manner. In the darkness of the night, six thousand candle lights, together with all the brilliant electric lamp standards produced an atmosphere of great beauty in those perfectly arranged gardens surrounding the most holy shrine. It was strongly reminiscent of Nabíl's narrative where he described the arrival of the Blessed Beauty at Bahjí in 1880 to the accompaniment of banners of light from the Abhá Kingdom.

As the two hour session might grow cool, blankets had been issued at the hotel. I much appreciated this, for as we took our seats there was a night fog and all the seats were wet with dew. The organisers had thoughtfully left a paper towel on each seat. As the crowd of pilgrims slowly filed into their seats I managed to make my way up onto the large elevated terrace which Shoghi Effendi had created on the left of the entrance; from here there was a wide view of the entire illuminated gardens, while at my feet ran a line of candles joyously flickering in the night.

We watched, as the members of the Universal House of Justice and the Hands of the Cause went into the mansion itself and mounted to the bedroom where the Blessed Beauty had passed on. Here they said prayers and then returned to the gardens for the devotional program relayed through many speakers. It was a precious experience to listen to those heavenly words in this Illuminated haven, surrounded on all sides by impenetrable night.

At the end of the readings we all filed back onto the circular path and began our circumambulation of the Shrine. When laying out the gardens, occasional trees had been left to grow in the middle of the path, and each of these had its overhanging branches which were lit by a flashlight held by an attendant, lest we bump into them in the dark.

It was 6 a.m. when we arrived back at our hotel and we were all looking forward to a healthy breakfast, but the dining room was not open, so most people went to bed and slept soundly. Two hours later I awoke and had a good breakfast before returning to bed till noon.

At 1 p.m. we were once more loaded into our bus. We were transported to the foot of Mt. Carmel where we were to climb the avenue of the Kings. A number of people were too old or in wheel chairs and could not make it up the mountain, so the buses took them by road up to the Shrine. Most of us climbed upwards, passing through large areas of bulldozed terrain where construction of the nine new terraces was being laid out. At the top we walked around the shrine of the Báb and went on to the House of Justice building. Since we had to cross a major trunk road, the police held up traffic periodically and let us cross in batches of fifty, to continue on up the Arc.

We were now to view a specially prepared portrait of Bahá'u'lláh. Ahead of on the path we could see several other groups waiting for their turn to enter the building. By viewing the portrait in small groups, all would have a close view.

When our turn came, we saw that the entire end of the hall had been blocked off with elaborate paneling, while in the center of this and at about seven feet from the floor was a backlit projection screen. As we gathered, the lights gradually went out and we stood silent in the total darkness for a few moments; then slowly there appeared before us a life-size picture of the Blessed Beauty. He seemed to be looking directly into our eyes with all the wisdom of the ages, and to be including us and all creation in a deep and understanding love.

We hardly dared to breathe or move. After about a minute only, the portrait slowly disappeared to leave us once more in darkness. The lights came gently on again and we passed silently out of a side door and down the mountain side to our waiting bus, each occupied with his own thoughts and deeply aware of the in~inite bounty bestowed upon us.

The next morning was departure day, and most people left, but due to a mistake in booking, I had one more day before my flight back to U.S.A. I joyfully went down town and found a bus back to Bahjí for uninterrupted prayers, and meditation. Then also, I was able to get some new photographs of those holy precincts.

I recalled wistfully how in 1952 I had made my first pilgrimage and each evening was able to bask in the uplifting presence of Shoghi Effendi. When it had come to departure time he saw how downcast I was. ♦Don♦t be sad~ he had said, ♦You will come back! ♦ I accepted this but wondered how I would ever again find the funds. So blind are we to the workings of destiny ♦ this present visit in 1992, 40 years later was infact my ninth visit to these holy Shrines! I meditated on the vast developments {{p154}} the Faith during those years. In 1963 there were 135 delegates in Haifa to elect the first Universal House of Justice. In 1968 there were about 500 delrgatrs preseny. On this Celebrstion there were 3,400 Bahá♦is gathered on the mountain of God!

The World Order of Bahá♦u♦llah is in fact appearing before our very eyes daily. For example, in Africa, giant strides have been made. In 1953, there were only three Bahá♦is in all of that vast continent, (If one did not count Egypt and the Sudan which was conquered in the days of Abdu♦I Bahá). Now there are now nearly 100,000 Bahá♦is in Kenya alone. The same kind of picture must exist all over Africa today!

Tears filled my eyes, for Shoghi Effendi had longed to see this day . Soon however I realised that he must be joining in with the great rejoicings in the Abhá Kingdom. This 100 th anniversary of the ascension of the Blessed Beauty celebrates this enormous development of God♦s Kingdom on earth. It also marks the centenary of the acceptance by the followers of Bahá♦u♦llah, of His appointment of Abdu♦I Bahá as the infallible interpreter of His Revelation. Thus man has fulfilled at long last, the Eternal Covenant of God with man. The above develprnents are surely just a part of the Divine response promised to mankind when we should finally fulfill that Covenant.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE HOLY YEAR 1~

Since the Univ~?r~l H~u,e of Jus~i ~ h~s ~ske~l US, in their letter of Rldvan 1~3~31? tO 11. . . pay befitting re~rd to the ~entenary of the Ascension of B~h~u~llah and of the in~u~ur~tion of His world ~ unifying Covenant, ,t will be of v~lue for e~ch of u~ to ~o thi~. The followin~, are a~few thou~hts of onl~J one per~on ~nd should be regarded as such.

With the passing of the Bless~d Beauty to th~ h~venly world one hundred years a~,o we were deprived of His phys~cal ternple, but not of His reality. ~aha~u~llah is still wth us today.

~We are with you at all times, ~nd shall ~tr~n~th~n yGu through the power of Tr ~uth.~GL.137:16.

For ~ome reason no Manifestation of God h~s ~vet ~ rem~ined physically on earth for more than a normal sp~n of hum~n lif~. Perhaps this was, among other reasons, to demonstrate that no earthly combination or elements was ever Intended to b,e permanent. It would also be a deliberate reminder to us, about the dual nature of the ManifestatIons and to demonstrate that their divine station must not be confused with their e~rthl~station.

Their first st~tiorl; ~Through their appear~nce the RevelatiGn of God is made manifest, and by Their counten~nce the Beauty of God is revealed. ~GL. 53 .

Their second station: ~. . . Viewed in the li~ht of Their second station . . They manliest absolute servltude . . .Even as He hath sald: ~I am but a man like unto you.~ GL.53.

The occaslon of Bahá~u~llah~s physlcal passing from thiS world was, to the belivers, a tremendous depriv~tion, but seen in the eternal plan of God it might seem to be the moment of our being turned loose to pro~ress by our own decisons, but aided by Hi~Writinss and by His ever ~ present splrltual reallty. In other words, not being ~ 7 dependant upon the physical form.

Bahá~u~llah unlike any pre ~icus Manifestation, left not only a record of .H teachings in His own handwriting but also gave us three Institutions endowed with the gift of infallible ~,uidance. Those institutions are ~ A~dull E~ha, the Guardian and the Universal House Of Justice.

The focus of our celebration during this holy year is therefore twofold, the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh in triumph to His true habitation in the realms above and secondly the long-awaited inauguration of the Covenant which has already brought great spiritual development to mankind.

Regarding . . . the inauguration of His world unifying Covenant, this was long promised in the Bible. Let us therefore ask ourselves what exactly happened to inaugurate the Covenant a hundred years ago.

By inauguration one understands that both parties have kept their own side of the agreement. For thousands of years Prophets have offered this Covenant and mankind has failed to keep it; but now, at last we have fulfilled it by being absolutely faithful to Bahá'u'lláh's appointment of Abdu'l Bahá as the sole infallible Interpreter of the Word of God after His passing.

We can clearly see that by this act the followers have remained totally united. They were able to avoid breaking up into sects over a multitude of conflicting interpretations of Scripture, as all other religions had done in the past. Such total unity among them, the followers of Bahá'u'lláh may be the secret key not just to an infinitely higher form of consciousness for mankind, but even for a higher form of life. This is, of course dependent on the real unity of its parts, an essential condition for the next step in our evolution the spiritual birth of humanity.

God's Eternal Covenant is, surely, the Instrument designed to achieve the transformation

But unity alone is not enough, it must be according to the divine plan. Abdu'l Bahá spoke about two forms of creation, accidental and divine. He said that the former is temporary but that the latter, because it is done according to the divine plan, is eternal. Also that when the constituent parts are assembled in the divine way it, attracts a higher order of spirit. The purpose of God is evidently that mankind should now take a giant new step forward, therefore mankind must first learn to keep the Covenant; this will assure that we will build according to the divine plan. The purpose of this plan has been stated clearly by Bahá'u'lláh Himself:

◆ He Who is your Lord, the All ◆ Merciful, cherisheth in His the heart the desire of beholding the entire human race as one soul and one body. ◆ Gl.~13.

Abdu ◆ I Bahá described how this can take place and the result.

◆ . . . when the e~istin~ elements are ~athered to~ether according~ to the natural order, and with perfect strength, they become a magnet for the spirit, and the spirit will become manifest in them with all its perfections. ◆ SAQ.201.

The Covenant must surely h~ve be~n m~de when the hum~ spirit first emanated from ~od. The Hidden Word P.1~. ~eems t~ refer to this: ◆

◆ O MY FRIENDS! Have ye forgotten that true zind radi~nt morn, when in those hallowed ~nd blessed surroundings ye were all gathered in My presence beneath the shad~ of th~ tree of life, which is planted in the ~lorious paradise? Aw~ ◆ truck ye listened as I gave utter~nce to these three most holy wor~; O friends! Prefer not your will to Mine, ne~er desire that which I have not desired for you, and approach ~le not with lifeless hearts~ defiled with worldly desires and cravin~s. Would ye but sanctify your souls, ye would at this present hour recall that place and those surroundings, and the truth of My utterance should be made evident unto all of you.

The ◆ three most holy words ◆ would seem to be the conditions which God laid down for us so that we m~y return to Him after passing through earthly life. This is called the Covenant. At the same time God created the ◆ I Tree of Life~, the train of Prophets, to help us compl ◆ y. Typical of this would be the Covenant God made through ~Aoses:

◆ Now therefore, If you will obey my voice Indeed,,2.nd keep my Covenant then you shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine

And Moses came and called ~or the elders of the people and laid before their faces these words which the Lord commanded him. And all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned th

Another thought is ,th~t when all mankind will h~ve accepted Bahá ◆ u ◆ llah ◆ s teaching of pro~ressive revelation, they will in fact have accepted all the previous Prophets. Thus mankind will have realised the oneness of all religions, the oneness of mankind and the oneness of God; again a result of our acceptance of the Covenant and a necessary condition for the next stage of our evolution.

Since mankind, has now kept the eternal Covenant, God will now keep His part of the agreement in full, as far as mankind as a whole is concerned. The ability of humanity to rise to the next higher form of life is now assured. But for us as individuals however, there is still the responsibility to keep, the Covenant in our daily lives, by obeying the laws Baha'u'llah has given us.

For example, Baha'u'llah said in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas

♦ Recite ye the verses of God every morning and evenings. Whoso reciteth them not hath truly failed to fulfill his pledge to the Covenant of God and His Testament and whoso in this day turneth away therefrom, hath indeed turned away from God - Ince time immemorial. . . ♦ Aqdas and, Compilation on Prayers - M.p.I.

This may seem a rather drastic statement, but let us agree, that if one accepts a Manifestation as the voice of God, then it is illogical of us not to obey His teachings. If we do not follow them, then we can hardly say we have complete faith.

However, all is not lost if we fail in this, for God well knows that we are created to progress by steady growth. God is the forgiving, so it would seem acceptable if, when we fail in our duty we do not look back but forward, and try to do better in the future. Then, to the extent that we manage to keep the Covenant in our daily lives, will we continue to progress towards God.

The Important thing for us is that in past dispensations they did not have access to infallibility after the Prophet left; today, through our efforts, we have all the necessary and authentic creative Words of God together with the institutions for infallibly interpreting them until the next Manifestation comes..

Clearly, for us as individuals, there is still no free admittance into the Heavenly Kingdom for we still have free will and can turn away from God. Every soul must learn to use its free will correctly; in this way it will continue to move towards the station when it will remember its Creator all the times. However, if any soul becomes immersed in worldly affairs his spiritual senses will have become atrophied, and he will be powerless to benefit from the great bounty of recognising the Manifestation and thus cut himself off from God.

◆ He indeed is a captive who hath not recognised the supreme Redeemer, but hath suffered his soul to become bound, distressed and helpless, in the fetters of his desires ◆ GI 16

God has decreed that the Kingdom of God shall now be made manifest on earth for mankind as a whole. But all individuals must continue to use their freewill in order to become attuned to the will of God. Thus freewill is our most precious gift from God, for only by its use in trial and error will we learn to distinguish between the spiritual world and the material one and consciously choose the former..just for the love of it.

To return to the celebration of the centenary of the Covenant, its vital importance becomes clear ◆ when we realize that, had the followers of Bahá'u'llah failed to accept Abdu'l Bahá as the Center of his Father's Covenant, we would have been deprived of all the institutions required for Infallible Interpretation of the holy Words. Further, there would not have been ◆ a Center of the Covenant and a Guardian ◆ , or a ◆ Administrative Order. We would have been thrown onto our own fallible powers to interpret the Words of God and would have ended up arguing and fighting about it as in past dispensations.

Let us consider another implication of the Inauguration of the Covenant. By accepting the appointment of Abdu'l Bahá, perhaps we accepted the first totally perfect human being ◆ Manifestations (part) This is of course only ◆ a surmise. Abdu'l Bahá is the Mystery of God and his true reality has not been explained in the Writings.

To continue with this thought about the perfect human being, because in the spiritual world there is no such thing as time, the beginning and the end are the same. As Christ said ◆ I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. ◆ Bahá'u'llah said:
rather consider the beginning, at the end itself . . ◆ TAB.183

It is reported that when Abdu'l Bahá had laid the foundation stone of the temple he said:

◆ The temple is now built! ◆

With the arrival of the first perfect human being and our acceptance of him, and because the beginning is the same as the end, perhaps we could say that all humanity has now become like him, in the spiritual world.

This is surely proof that we each have the potential to be perfect. We always had this potential, but now the arch type has appeared on earth in Abdu'l Bahá. And did he not say

Look at me! I am a perfect man!

Since the Holy Scriptures included honouring the Knights of Bahá'u'llah, let us apply this principle of the non-existence of time in the world of reality, to the Ten Year Crusade. The Guardian, when speaking, about the Crusade (53-63), regarded the arrival of a pioneer in a virgin territory (the beginning) as having conquered that whole territory (the end). It seems once more that the beginning is the same as the end in the spiritual world. This may help us to understand the enormous importance the Guardian gave to the success of the Ten Year Crusade and perhaps some suggestion as to why he honoured the Knights.

Again, by conquering every territory on the planet in this manner, we have assembled the constituent parts of a divine creation and brought into being the World Order of Bahá'u'llah. This Spirit is endowed with attributes and powers far exceeding those of individuals, races and countries.

No doubt the incredible new concepts and advances which mankind is now making in the world, (if we look at the positive side of things) are some of the results of these new powers. How much more so are we, the builders of the New World Order now endowed with very great powers in everything we do, if we are keeping to the Covenant in our daily lives. Perhaps this is the personal transformation which Bahá'u'llah speaks of and to which the Universal House of Justice has turned towards immediately. Perhaps further this is one reason why the Universal House of Justice has now brought into action the Aqdas.

To sum up it seems that in this Holy Year we are celebrating both the triumphal return of Bahá'u'llah to His heavenly home and also, through our obedience to His world unifying Covenant, the arrival of Spirit on a planetary level.

Eventually Haifa appeared before us, an intense (an adjective to be applied in nearly every meaning) a great gathering of modern flat-roofed cement buildings, of dazzling creamy whiteness. On our left was the Mediterranean, on our right and about 1500 feet above us ran a continuous escarpment about 15 miles long, completely dominating the city. This is the famous Mount Carmel. At about its central point and halfway up its slope, directly above the city proper, was instantly recognizable the Shrine of the Báb; but now it was different. The second stage was now completed and rested in the form of a very beautiful eight-pointed crown upon the main structure. This I later realized, has for the first time made the edifice stand out significantly to people looking up from the city.

Soon I was the only passenger left in the car and the driver asked me where I wanted to go. It was not till now I realized I had no idea where Shoghi Effendi lived and I must have looked very stupid. The driver took me into his office where, seeing a telephone directory I grasped it much as a drowning man does a life belt, but this life belt was written in Jewish. Despairingly, I considered climbing up to the Shrine and waiting to be claimed like some lost property. Fortunately the clerk knew a very pleasant English and soon found the number of the house where to go. No. 7 Persian Street. This is Shoghi Effendi's house and has engraved on the gateway "‘Abdu'l-Bahá ‘Abbás", being where the Master lived after His release from ‘Akká. I was taken across the street and a little up the hill to No. 10, by the Persian maid who met me at the gate. No. 10 is the Western Pilgrim house and the quarters of the International Council. Two rooms only are available for pilgrims at present. Here greeted me Mason Remey and Leroy Ioas and then I allowed myself to believe I had arrived in very fact.

I think perhaps all Bahá'ís have allowed themselves to dream at times of living, working, playing among a society of people who were all exemplars of the practical Bahá'í life. Imagine then one such dreamer becoming a temporary member of a large household which first of all included no less than four Hands of the Cause, other members of the International Council, was visited for lunch each day by Rúhíyyih Khánum and by the Guardian and his wife for dinner and a long discussion each evening.

The day of my arrival some critical local troubles had been brought a stage nearer successful conclusion and everyone was in an exceptionally light and happy frame of mind. Leroy however was feeling out of sorts and was in fact under the doctor the whole three weeks. Ugo Giachery was his self-appointed nurse, one of the many jobs he had assumed since his recent arrival to temporarily help the Guardian on a special matter. Ugo's continuous humour was an entertainment in itself; Rúhíyyih Khánum often ran him a close second. As time went on I came to know that this was a safety valve and protection against the great strain of the business affairs of the Cause at the World Centre. I found Rúhíyyih Khánum a lot younger than I expected, and while full of energy, one came to realize how well directed it was; even in an ordinary conversation one could sense a mind trained to do without trivialities, or side emotions; this gave great power and directness to anything she said and resulted also in a great sincerity and ability to watch the essentials of all affairs with wisdom and understanding. This is in fact Rúhíyyih Khánum's task here at the World Centre of the Faith. You'd have to see her in action to understand. Everything from buying food to arranging details of pilgrims' visits to the Holy places (including food and sleeping facilities) and being advisor to each of the International Council in their respective jobs. On top of all this, one must remember she is the liaison between the Guardian and just about everything, taking as much off his shoulders as possible and organizing all things so they may require as little of the Guardian's attention as possible. Now I wonder if you begin to understand? Yes, it's just like the position of the Master in relation to Bahá'u'lláh.

Another thing brought home to me — the last 15 years the Guardian has been almost alone here with Rúhíyyih Khánum, sometimes two or three Bahá'ís (such as Ben Weedons) were there to help. Atop this I believe we will eventually learn how the members of the Guardian's family gradually all fell away, some becoming active in their opposition, till now I believe all the Guardians family have left the Cause. Imagine also Rúhíyyih Khánum almost isolated for 15 years in a foreign land and with hardly a familiar face; during this time she has had to learn to give up almost everything and simply live for the Cause. So you can see how the International Council being at last created, this is the first time that the Guardian has ever been surrounded by willing souls he can trust and talk to. Each evening he usually comes across the street here for his one meal of the day, dinner (or lunch) and around the table are discussed the local matters pertaining to the Shrine, labour problems, customs, relations with the State and officials of various kinds. I say discuss advisedly for it is only the minor details which are discussed, mostly the Guardian already knows what to do. It is indeed amazing to see the way people like Mason Remey, Leroy Ioas, Millie Collins and Ugo act before the Guardian, people who in themselves are Kings amongst humanity in spiritual qualities and before the Guardian they sit and wait, their eyes never leaving his beloved face, frequently taking a second place to the pilgrims eating at the same table. One thing that never ceased to embarrass me that was because I was a guest I was searved before Mason Remey, who sat next. Fortunately my pleas to alter this were heard. Imagine my embarrassment when at the first lunch of all with the Council Rúhíyyih installed me at the head of the table!

It is the custom in the evening for everyone of the Council and western pilgrims to put on dark suits and dresses and await the call to dinner in the main lounge. This call may come any time between 7 and 9.30 according to how busy the Guardian is. When descending to the dining room on the ground floor, we find the Guardian awaiting us. He shakes hands cordially all round with a light but deliberate grip and a slight, quiet smile on his lips. This night I was pushed ahead of all the others and so was greeted first, this time by a momentary embrace on each cheek on the oriental fashion. The Guardian is definitely shorter than I, which was a surprise. He wore nearly always when I saw him a black fez and black long coat a bit threadbare at the front button where I imagine he is always touching the desk. I must admit that when seated facing the Guardian across the table, realising at last that this was no fairy dream such as I had so often had, I was utterly tongue-tied and spell bound. The Guardian with charming informality soon produced a little life from his visitor but I was at once acutely aware (never really forgot) that he is the Sign of God on earth today. Humility and submissiveness and absolute trust cause on to become silent and immensely happy at once. Here in the Guardian one realises is a person who is the epitome of single pointedness; the qualities I had found in Rúhíyyih Khánúm were magnified out of all previous experience. Not only does one not even think of saying anything trivial but even one's own deepest thoughts and questions are given a severe dusting over before presenting to him. This night was evidently a special privilege for me and the others kept silent while the Guardian expounded on many matters for my benefit and at the pauses I offered another of my questions on either his speech or my own problems, wondering each time at my temerity.

I'm not going to elaborate or edit the replies to my questions or the notes on many matters which I took, but shall set them down in as near the jottings as possible so as not to embellish. The first few nights these notes were made just before bed, after leaving the Guardian, but later two American pilgrims, Mr. and Mrs. Harris of Illinois, arrived and enabled me to move further down the table where I could keep a notebook on my knee. This way enabled the saving of many jewelled utterances. I was amused to see that the Revell sisters and even Leroy often did likewise. However when talking directly to the Guardian or listening to one of crystal clear expositions on some aspect of the Cause or Teachings, I never did other than watch his face closely, trying to make indelible in my memory its lines, expressions, mannerisms and above all just drinking in the spirit of divine confidence radiant awareness and utter single-pointedness which must surely leave its influence on a person to his dying day.

The British believers were first extolled with many adjectives; their Poise, Balance, Good Judgment, Perseverance, Persistence, Thoroughness were just some. I was left gasping; the friends said later that he had often commented on these British qualities recently Nor was I ever free from this imminent persistent deluge of compliments till I finally left. Frequently, when on any topic pertaining to the lack of these qualities, the Guardian would, with a gleam in his eyes, say “not like the British now! They have — - !”

The approaching cataclysm was mentioned by me. The Guardian said we do not know the nature of it but quite possible that the prophecy of one-third of world’s population being missing may, amongst other things, be literally fulfilled. It may be war and also the aftermath such as famine, pestilence, etc. etc. He quoted “and there shall suddenly appear...” and “Know verily that an unforeseen calamity...” May be sudden, quite literally.

The Hofmans’ forced retirement due to business necessities a sad blow to the Faith. Hope they will soon be able to return.

The British great administrators. Slow to accept, but very staunch after. Spoke with acclaim of their ingenuity at filling the last two gaps in the Assemblies by importuning two awaiting African pioneers. Believe he was much amused by their resourcefulness.

Spoke of Covenant-breakers. Guardian said there will always be opposition in some form. Then as each surmounted, a greater obstacle will present itself.

The Anglican Church in England will oppose the Faith soon; also Rome.

The next and third Bahá’í Temple: either Haifa, Cairo or Persia. Kampala the heart of Africa spiritually.

The Jews are liquidating communities everywhere. Great things will happen in Israel. Everywhere in great danger from the future most especially Haifa, Europe, England. If the Arabs had now been in power in Haifa, the fate of the Bahá’ís would be vastly different. Jews therefore being a protection.

The Báb and Bahá’u’lláh are the return of the 12th and 3rd (Imám Ḥusayn) Imáms.

I wish again to point out that these are disjointed notes and personal impressions. They should of course not be regarded in any way as official or even as a true record of events and remarks; merely pilgrim notes and all that implies. After which warning I will continue.

Shí'ah Islám survived because they are the true ones. The Báb descended from them.

I asked if the Africans had ever had a Prophet of their own. The Guardian said "Yes — Sabeian, but they had it in another country — before they came to Africa", i.e. some of them brought it to Africa.

I asked "Surely the mystery of the Virgin Birth makes Christianity unique and above all others?" Guardian: "Not necessarily, there is a mystery in each religion and this is the Christian one". I: "Is 'Abdu'l-Bahá the mystery of the Bahá'í Faith?" Guardian: "Of course". I remembered that the Master had said: "Adam had neither Father nor Mother, and was he therefore greater than Christ?"

The Guardian then warned against revealing too much to the dignitaries of the Churches, especially Islám. "They do not love us."

The Africa project going immensely well, L.S.A. in place of groups and a year ahead of schedule. Important we have mixture of races in our groups, but concentrate on the Africans. Guardian inquired location (in or out of town) of Kampala Ḥazíra. "It is the forerunner of national Ḥazíra which will be another building, perhaps specially built and with hall to seat 300." This paragraph was occasioned by my deliberating to the Guardian the photos of the Ḥazíra. He gave some to Nellie French, an American pilgrim just leaving; told her to show all the friends. Perhaps L.S.A. in Nairobi in a year now he has advised British concentration there. Even as Kampala did not expect L.S.A. We all had African pineapple and pawpaw for dessert tonight.

The Guardian spoke of the simplicity of the western tastes and the ornamental tastes of the East. Shrine decorations effort to please both.

Breakfast next morning was a help-onself affair in small room near kitchen. All ate well because lunch is often not till 2p.m. Today Millie Collins took me on my first visit to the Shrine of the Báb. We have a good view of it from the house, which is about 400 yards down the mountainside, but difficult to reach, so we took a taxi. The approach gardens are very extensive and in them is the oriental pilgrim house, later we are to meet many Persians here. The Shrine itself is more beautiful than I expected. The materials themselves are real high grade finely cut stone from Italy. The design itself pleases me greatly in its balanced simplicity and beautiful architecture. The old building inside, so obviously of another age, was profoundly thought-provoking. Millie stood silent nearby, only speaking when I asked a question. I was glad of such understanding (Millie herself is a dynamic presence in spite of her 80 odd years). At the entrance to the centre section (by the side entrance — the men's side) we took off our shoes and pushing open the unlocked massive steel door entered reverently the silent beautiful shrine. After some time of silent prayer and reciting aloud the Tablet of Visitation, we backed out of the room, which was entirely covered with fine Persian carpets. We repeated this next in the Shrine of 'Abdu'l-Bahá which occupies the front section of the building. After this we wandered for a long time round the gardens, each minute coming upon a new delight. The summer had well started, so the grass was already becoming a bit scorched, but the flowers were in their prime. Geraniums especially bordered the paths in brilliant profusion, cypress trees stately and reverent were a dominating feature of all. No work was going on with the Shrine itself because the second stage is now complete and arrangements are under way for the next. Several gardeners were introduced to me and they straightened up momentarily though they speak English but little. At dusk that evening (as is the custom) the Shrine was flood-lit for a while and the chain of lamps on the steps leading up from the city also. How the city must wonder and wonder what all this means. Though I think they see nothing yet out the blood and sweat and tears of their own efforts to forge against all the forces of nature, a land of milk and honey out of this desert region; and the bedlam of the coming together of Jews from infinitely varied civilizations all over the world. Can you imagine the cultural, governing and other problems this sets up? Add to this the fact that the Jews are now by nature traders and dealers, in fact parasitic. Now they have only each other to live off unless they quickly learn all other trades, especially farming. Woe betide a tourist who wanders in, he will be quickly parted from his money, in an ultra polite manner of course!

Ugo spoke of labour problems connected with the Shrine. They are at a premium, yet people are now beginning to refuse to pay the 8 to 10 pounds a day a mason or carpenter demand (Israel pound is half a sterling pound). This is one of the least of the problems here.

Rúhíyyih Khánúm spoke of the great frankness of the Guardian in all matters (except those few really confidential ones). How this reduces effort, worry, etc. "How much", she said, "could the world benefit from this lesson!"

A new extension wall to extend the main terrace on the north is growing Oh so slowly and with so many problems, yet tackled in a superb way by the Guardian and Council members.

Tonight the Guardian explained to us a map he had made. It is an ordinary world map but on it were 22 circles of varying size. All were in black ink, these are the National Assemblies already established in the world. All were in red ink, these are those to come. The first being East Africa (and to include Belgian Congo and I believe Zanzibar) I cannot be certain but I feel the Guardian indicated the next 10 years to see these 22 National Assemblies established.

Again Kenya discussed, Nairobi's material significance, Kampala's spiritual. I asked "In view of the complete illiteracy of vast numbers of Africans, are we to insist on complete intellectual understanding before accepting declarations?" The Guardian replied "Not necessarily." I must admit I was surprised and said:

“Then insistence on understanding the Master’s Will may have to be waived?” The Guardian indicated that it would probably be so for Africa.

The Guardian went on to an entirely new subject. “There are nine stages in the evolution of a Faith, most countries are still in the first stage (for the Bahá’í Faith)” He mentioned and described most logically the 9 steps which must eventually culminate in the Golden age, but only the first four of these must be spoken of yet for reasons you would immediately recognize. However, here are the first four: (1) Ignored, e.g. Europe. (2) Persecuted, e.g. Persia. (3) Emancipation, e.g. Egypt. (4) Recognition by federal authority, e.g. America in some ways. In this matter of relations with the authorities of all kinds (church or state) Egypt is the most advanced now, for they have been officially ejected from the recognized religion and have not yet however been recognized autonomous or existing in own right, e.g. Bahá’ís are now unable to be officially married by orthodox church, there is no state registry office, and the Bahá’í ceremony is not yet legal. They are therefore all illegal marriages and this takes great courage from the Bahá’ís, the Guardian said. It may be that Persia will be the first to achieve stage (6). The first stage has taken 100 years so stage (2) unlikely to be consummated worldwide in this century,. Note: This is a confused statement and I’m not clear what it really meant, especially as the Guardian has often mentioned the wonderful progress the Faith will make in the next few years., a loose end, I’m sorry.

The Guardian now read cable from American Convention outlining one-year plan of such colossal goals that we all felt nonplussed. The Guardian pointed out that the plan first is vague, second is ambitious, “The Americans love experimenting, meanwhile the Cause suffers. Not like the British now, they are deliberate, consider carefully first, then they persevere.” Then once more I had to cover my confusion while the great qualities of the British were again extolled; to all the previous list others were added: Good executive ability, good administration, do not compromise with the Teachings, discreet in administrative study and digest the Cause, their Convention quiet and solid.” Ethel Revell made a list of these qualities and next evening gave them to the Guardian. He promptly passed the list across the table to me saying “You had better keep this”. Well, British Bahá’ís, what do you think?

“Bahá’u’lláh made provision for spread of the Faith to Arctic, i.e. pray and fast by the clock not the sun.”

Significance of the Shrines discussed and connection with the development of the Bahá’í World Order. International Council forerunner of International House of Justice (embryonic). “The friends do not realize that I have laid the first stone of the Universal House of Justice, i.e. the International Council. Steps in its growth will be (1) Appointment, (2) Enlargement, (3) Transformation into a court, (4) Will be elected, (5) The Universal House of Justice will be established.

America will be purged in the crucible of war, it is greatly corrupt and there is a great fear there; she must be prepared for her great leading part in the World

Plan of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Only in this way can it be done. Immediate future for America very black and for the world. The Bahá’ís will suffer along with the rest, the only difference being that the Bahá’ís will suffer hopefully and with knowledge. “God’s way is not men’s way.” The white race in Africa to learn great lesson, freedom from prejudice, equal opportunity, giving precedence to minorities.

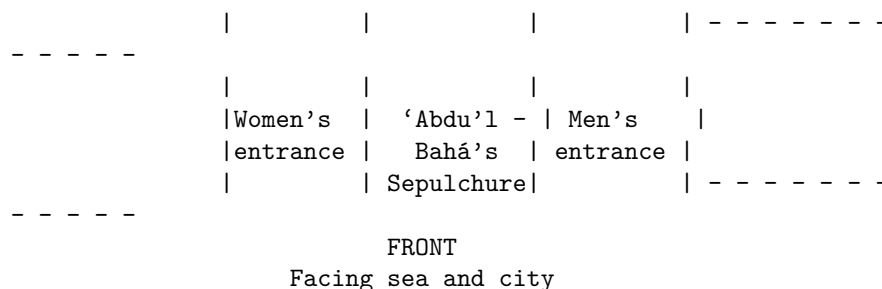

We are now treated to a special treat. We are discussing the Universal House of Justice and its all male composition. Rúhíyyih Khánum now really pressed the Guardian about the wisdom of this and implying its injustice. I was hugely amused, all the more so because I realised that all present, including Rúhíyyih Khánum, accepted this instruction of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as Divine Wisdom. Looking back I now believe Rúhíyyih Khánum deliberately forced this issue to show us an example of the divine wisdom manifested by the Guardian on such matters. As I said, we were all on Rúhíyyih Khánum’s side. The Guardian first said, “The Master said the wisdom of it will appear in the future.” “Men and women have different functions; women do not lead an army, nor are the Prophets ever women. Government is a specialized function. “Equality is right, but not in function. The Master has often said, ‘The greatest work in the Cause is teaching and in this women will surpass the men.’ The Universal House of Justice is administrative in function, intellectual, far less important than teaching, The two are complementary.”

The Guardian next mentioned that the inspiration of Revelation has once again arisen in the East and it has spread to the West. The East in its turn must now learn the practical lesson from the West.

The next morning Dr. Hákím took Nellie French and myself up to the Shrine to show and explain to us the archives. The Shrine has nine rooms, the front six being built by the Master. The outer walls are 6-7 feet thick and the inner ones 2-3 feet. How can I describe my feelings for now we were shown many things which belonged to the Blessed Beauty Himself; also to the Báb and the Master. It seemed incredible to touch or even see such Holy relics as Bahá’u’lláh’s coat, comb, gloves, fan, Qur’án, bowl, slippers, fez and fragments of soap used by Him; the Master’s seaks, watch, purse, fez, bed cover, rosary; the Báb’s coat, socks, shirts, His Qur’án, and the original Bayán. These are only a tiny portion of the holy relics here assembled for posterity.

Second Part

On that day the 7th of Ridván (I had arrived on the 5th of Ridván) after visiting the Archives, we went to the Oriental Pilgrim House. There were about 10 Persians recently arrived, among them I was happy to meet 'Abbás Afnán and one of the Persian Hands of the Cause (Alai).

At dinner that evening, the talk turning to the activities of the Covenant breakers, Shoghi Effendi spoke much about their past machinations, causing trouble to the Master concerning buying land for the Shrine. On five occasions they had been thwarted though it had caused much worry. Now they were nearly all gone, The recent fleeing of the Arabs from Israel had been a great help to us for we had then been able to purchase sites badly needed from the Government (who took over the Arab land).

The Cause progresses through a series of crises which, when overcome produce yet great opposition. The covenant breakers are extremely close family relations to Bahá'u'lláh, so have a strong weapon, though they have no legal relationship and rights to the Cause.

To pray is not enough; one must also think about the problem.

The Guardian spoke about the next job being the founding of the institutions of the Cause in Africa, especially Kenya.

It seems it is the Guardian's custom to postpone a pilgrim's visit to Bahjí and 'Akká till the latter part of the nine days. That afternoon Nellie French was to visit 'Akká and I was asked if I'd like to go also. We had about 3 hours of daylight left so Carlo (the Guardian's chauffeur) drove us quickly the 15 odd miles round the bay. Passing through the new part of the town, we paused awhile at the prison entrance to see the window of the cell and then visited the cell itself high up at one corner of the massive fortress, which is now used as an insane asylum. However, as you heard, the cell is given over to the Bahá'ís and kept as a holy place. It is one of a circular cluster of about six. In these I believe the whole 80 prisoners were kept, Bahá'u'lláh having one to Himself. Today it is completely bare and whitewashed. A simple brass plate over the door records "Bahá'u'lláh imprisoned here from 1868 to 1870". Rush mats were spread on the floor and we knelt and prayed. It is a corner cell with 3 double barred windows. Bahá'u'lláh used to spread his mat on a slightly raised shelf (which has now disappeared, otherwise there are no alterations). We next visited, about a quarter mile away, outside the fortress proper, the “House of ‘Akká”. After brief stays in 2 or 3 houses on His release from the cell, Bahá'u'lláh spent nine years in this house. It is of very great importance for here the Master was married, here was written the Aqdas, here much work and teaching were performed. The house is very large, the important part being upstairs. The lower part is servants quarters, stores, courtyard, etc. The house is now in very good repair and the ceiling of Bahá'u'lláh's bedroom still has the original decorations. Several of the rooms have simple comfortable beds, for pilgrims usually spend a night here. All the rooms are filled, tastefully, with relics, pictures, old and new, telling the Bahá'í story. We read and chanted prayers in Bahá'u'lláh's bedroom and saw the actual mattress and bedclothes used by Him. We visited the wood lined room where the Aqdas was revealed and which later became the Master's bedroom. We saw the oriental type wash room He used. Awaiting us was an extremely ancient old woman, who smiled happily and said “Alláh'u'Abhá!” while pressing our hands in turn. She met Bahá'u'lláh. I forgot to say, round Bahá'u'lláh's bedroom, outside, on three sides runs a verandah, this was almost the only exercise He had during the close confinement in this house.

Next we paid a hurried visit to the Riḍván garden. This was made by the Bahá'ís and the Master and named after the original near Baghdád and during the later years of His life Bahá'u'lláh spent much time sitting here in the beautiful verdant garden, talking to His friends. Later I was to pay a second visit and even have a picnic there. Some excellent photos both black and white and coloured were also secured of this one of three gardens which are the main source of the constant supply of flowers used in the Shrines and the Guardian's house. A large bunch accompanied us on our way back, destined for Rúḥíyyih Khánum, sent by the devoted gardener.

That evening I put my problem before Millie Collins. How is it possible to both work at the Shrine (taking photos) and to worship? How was it possible to get into the proper state of devotion necessary during a pilgrimage, while there was much work to do also. My mind seemed quite incapable of operating to such vast extremes. It was even more confused due to a very bad cold I had just collected. Millie suggested that it was probably a great bounty that I was confronted with this problem, for one of life's greatest problems is just this, i.e. How to live a practical life and a prayerful one at the same time. I found that it could be done, but one had to be very clear from moment to moment just what was the present objective. Rúḥíyyih Khánum had earlier suggested that when I visited the Shrine I should decide first whether it was for work or prayer and if the latter, then leave the camera at home. She also told me a most amusing story of how years ago she had accompanied two elderly but very “spiritual” pilgrims to Haifa, how they had become quite impractical in the matter of passports etc. eventually because of their “spiritual raptures”. She laughingly told us how she took possession of all their documents and eventually delivered them safely at Haifa. I have gone at length into this problem because it was one of the big surprises at Haifa to find everyone so intensely practical in their service to the Cause. There was almost none of the dreamy spiritual type of thing. In fact Millie Collins said she had never in her life had so little time for praying and reading as now in Haifa. I recall once again how the Guardian had said "It is not enough to pray, one must also think" and then of course act. Life is extremely busy there.

At dinner that evening the Guardian talked of types of government. The American, the Fascist, the British. The last was the nearest to the Bahá'í way. It is a double stage of election and is not "Government of the people, for the people, by the people" in a literal sense. This would not be good, for the masses are morally and spiritually undeveloped compared to their leaders and the educated classes; they should not therefore have a direct vote on parliamentary questions, rather should they elect someone whom they consider morally and educationally fit to do it for them. If I remember the Guardian correctly, he said that the Bahá'í procedure is triple stage election, i.e. L.S.A.'s elect representatives to Convention, these elect the N.S.A. in their turn. See the wisdom of this triple type of election over the direct election by the masses. The latter would be far more unstable and less mature. The former would be "Government of the people, for the people, by the best of the people." America, he said, must learn the lesson of government from the British.

When a Bahá'í community was too unwieldy through size, in the future, an L.S.A. election may be a two stage affair.

Getting to other issues, he said "opposition from the governments of the world will come. This will be a very serious matter. For example, if Hitler had captured Palestine (as he planned to) he would have exterminated the Shrines and the Bahá'ís there." I said, "Then he was preordained to fail?" He said, "Of course, of course."

It was one of the many charming and characteristic expressions which the Guardian used; by it he intimated "think it out clearly, is this not obviously so?" Encouraged by this, one would clearly follow the chain of reasoning and find it was so. How much better than if he had made a blunt, take it and leave it statement. Many times during my visit I noticed this method when delineating something new and almost out of our grasp; when he sensed our difficulty, his manner was always one of "think now, surely this is the natural conclusion". His quiet "of course, of course" at these moments is a precious memory, to be heard and remembered.

To continue: — The Mufti would also have been a big enemy to Bahá'ís if he had succeeded. He had made some deliberate threats much as Jamál Páshá when in the 1914-18 war said he would hang the Master. (You remember how Lord Allenby made his attack miraculously a day earlier and prevented this...) The Mufti would have been easily influenced by the defamations of the covenant breakers and the Arabs.

A back note on the previous subject of elections: The Bahá'í Faith (in its method of election) has an aristocratic tinge, though of course it was not aristocratic because of its divine origin.

The Guardian mentioned he had received a letter openly mentioning the Faith from Persia (most unusual and dangerous due to censors). He said it indicated perhaps and improvement in the situation. It might be that secularisation will soon emancipate the Bahá'ís there as already in Egypt where the Bahá'ís are excluded from Islám (but not yet recognised). Perhaps secularization in Italy and elsewhere soon also (good for the Bahá'ís). I heard through Nellie that there is still vicious persecution of the Bahá'ís in Persia but this is not to be talked about; I'm not clear why but can imagine several reasons.

Of the Nakhjavani brothers the Guardian said "I am very pleased with what they have done so far". Of Philip Hainsworth, when I delivered a message on his behalf to the Guardian he said so many words of praise I sat there amazed. He mentioned also the forced retirements of the Hofmans for the present and said that it would be a big handicap to the Cause. He mentioned particularly Philip's great energy and devotion to the Cause.

I want to tell you now a few more anecdotes about the Guardian's wife, for though her position is of immense importance and she is treated by the friends with great reverence, she is nevertheless immensely human and full of humour and light-heartedness. The great weight of the affairs of the Cause, which she manages to take off the Guardian's shoulders, would be insupportable unless she retained a superb sense of humour. Only, and I repeat, only those who have visited Haifa will know fully what I mean, for all the intricate social details and many matters of great importance are handled by her, often in consultation with the International Council members. Two little stories she told me I noted down. One day a most important date in connection with local Israel affairs could not be remembered by any of the Council. He combined in his comments a mild rebuke with one of his all too rare touches of humour, threatened "to dissolve the International Bahá'í Council till they found out".

Another day some Persian pilgrims arrived and were ushered into the Guardian's presence. I must explain first that the Persians have an immense reverence for him, more than we Westerners can ever understand, I feel. This naturally sometimes gets out of hand and they confuse him with the station of the Manifestations in their attitude. I will continue in Rúhíyyih Khánum's words "as the pilgrims approached the Guardian saw what was going to happen and said 'Welcome, welcome, but it is forbidden, the laws of the Aqdas, the instructions of the Master, forbid it'. All this had no effect whatever for the Persian woman in an ecstasy of worship and devotion approached the Guardian, knelt down and kissed the ground at his feet."

The next day, being the 9th of Ridván, we all assembled in the Oriental pilgrim house for the feast. According to Oriental and Islámic custom, which is still observed in many respects here, the women assembled in a separate room; to them went Rúhíyyih Khánum and to the men came the Guardian. First he gave about 30 minutes talk in Persian on the significance of the Bahá'í Holy days, breaking off occasionally to direct a remark in English to the Westerners, once explaining to me that he was telling them of my success in having the Holy Days recognised by my employers. Several prayers followed, read by others, and then the food (mostly very sweet) was passed round and the Persian tea with no milk and much sugar was drunk. Now all arose and followed as the Guardian made his way to the Shrine about 100 yards away. The ladies following, entered the room on one side of the Shrine and the men, each receiving attar of roses on their hand from the Guardian who stood at the door, entered the room on the other side. The Guardian then chanted in a clear melodious voice the Tablet of Visitation. The other Shrine, that of the Master, was then visited and the other Tablet of Visitation chanted by the Guardian.

Back once more at the Western house, while awaiting the Guardian for dinner, Rúhíyyih Khánum suddenly arrived to say that the Guardian suggested to me that now, while the flowers were fresh, would be a good time to photograph the interiors of the Shrines. Though a suggestion in form, it was equivalent to a command in effect. He rarely commands but always suggests; in this way he leaves the initiative and responsibility and pleasure of the work in the hands of the individual concerned. I'm afraid that due to the stresses of the occasion, I had been far from relaxed that afternoon, and I didn't realise it till later. I was therefore very tired indeed (due also to my bad cold) but with happiness and great awe I climbed into the Guardian's car with Dr. Ḥakím and we were driven up to the Shrine (I mention these details because of what followed the next morning). For 3 1/2 hours I was there photographing from every possible angle (in order to safeguard, with 4 cameras) both in black and white and color. (These pictures the Guardian has not released for general viewing). Though it was midnight, many of the friends were awaiting me with buffet supper upon return. Some must have told the Guardian how tired I looked, he must also have realized the amount of work involved in fully photographing all the Bahá'í Holy places, for the next day, to my intense joy, Rúhíyyih Khánum informed me that the Guardian suggested I endeavor to obtain cable permission to prolong my stay another week, so that I may do the job properly.

Third Part

I have usually been unwilling to look deeply into the eyes of a stranger or in fact of most people. I wondered what I would do when face to face with the Guardian, he whom at the very least I believed to be the Sign of God upon earth. It seemed no surprise really when at the dinner table I found everyone, myself included, watching his every expression, and when spoken to, one naturally and with a feeling of complete understanding looked him easily and trustingly straight in the face. He himself would keep glancing into the distance while calmly and lucidly describing his thoughts.

Next morning, with Jessie Revell and Nellie French, I visited the other Shrines near that of the Báb. These lie in a separate garden about 200 yards away. That of the Greatest Holy Leaf, those of the Wife of Bahá'u'lláh and the Purest Branch, that of the Master's wife. These gardens, like the others, are beautifully and tastefully laid out. The cypress trees and red geraniums again giving it a very distinctive air. These gardens and some of the others (but not the one round the Shrine) are open to the public between certain hours and today being Israel's Independence Day, there were many visitors. I often saw large groups of schoolchildren brought here by their teachers. I was told by one local Bahá'í that the children are taught about various religions at school, including Bahá'í; they then come and visit the Bahá'í sites and holy places.

At dinner the Guardian read us a cable received from Cairo, in which they declared their devotion and determination to go ahead. Amongst other remarks he said that their tendency to emotion and their lack of action was in direct contrast to the attitude of the British Bahá'ís, who were deliberate and painstaking. It was at this point that he said with a piercing look and a humourous twinkle in his eye that he had no doubt that if he gave them the job of administering the Bahá'í world they would neither be surprised nor fail.

Tonight I endeavoured to draw the Guardian out on the subject of cycles previous to the Adamic. Here again, though disappointed momentarily, I received a very practical answer. He said we do not know anything about it and it is not good to spend the time speculating much. Now is the time to establish the Administrative Order of Bahá'u'lláh with all possible speed. Nor would he say much about Adam except that the story is symbolic not literal. "What," I said, "actually happened at the death of Christ, the transfiguration, etc. etc." Again, saying that the resurrection was not physical but spiritual in meaning, he directed our attention back to the job in hand.

e then spoke of his pleasure at the arrival of another band of Persian pilgrims. Amongst them was the son (now elderly) of the owner of the silk factory in which the Báb's body was concealed after its rescue from the bank of the moat. The Guardian explained that one of the prophecies concerning the return of the Imám is that his physical remains would be preserved. The Báb's body was thrown therefore outside the city moat in order that the wild animals would devour it and thus disprove the Báb's claim. The guards were posted likewise to ensure that this plan was not interfered with. The Bábís however bribed the guards to turn their backs.

The Guardian next went on to explain with emphasis and with a joyful ring in his voice that Adam and all the other Prophets till now were of a preparatory and preliminary nature to Bahá'u'lláh who will overshadow the next 500 centuries. Six thousand years of preparation are now complete, 500,000 years of fulfillment are to follow. There will be subsequent Manifestations, who will repeal the Aqdas and even (if they wish) have minor prophets. All this after 1,000 years or more. He distinguished very clearly between the Bahá'í manifestatoin of 1,000 (or more) years and the spiritual cycle of Bahá'u'lláh lasting 500 centuries.

Rúhíyyih Khánum said “Are the Guardians minor prophets?” Answer: “No.” He then spoke of the great efflux of Persian pioneers in the past. There has never been the like, but in Africa it may be so.

Jessie told me that one evening the Guardian had described to them the particular qualities which distinguished each Hand of the Cause. That there are no prominent scientists or artists, etc. yet who are Bahá’ís but when there are, they will be Hands also, i.e. in their particular line.

That evening the Guardian was too tired to come over for dinner and went to bed early.

The next morning I was driven to Bahjí for a prolonged stay. It is usual to spend just a night here, but Rúhíyyih said I was to take my time, to pray when I felt like it and take photos when I felt like it. Leaving my bags and cameras at Bahjí I accompanied the Persian pilgrims that afternoon first to the mansion at Masra’ih about 3 miles away. Luṭfu’lláh was the guide... I had forgotten to mention my reunion with Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím. I had been most attached to him in England and now we were delighted to meet again. He says “not once I go to the Shrines but I remember the British Bahá’ís”. The Masra’ih house, while smaller than the other houses and housing the Blessed Beauty for a much shorter period, is very important. The government recently considered using it for their purpose but when told it was a Bahá’í Holy Place, arranged for the Bahá’ís to rent it on an almost perpetual basis (sale being out of the question). The Guardian has restored it and filled it with Bahá’í relics and photos etc. installing a Bahá’í caretaker. The house is situated in beautiful countryside, surrounded with orange plantations and low mountains. Through its garden runs a Roman irrigation causeway. Rumour has it that Bahá’u’lláh seeing the dry condition of the district and the remains of this aqueduct told them to repair it. Now it brings water from 20 miles away for the whole area and many places on the way.

After supper I made my first visit to the Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh. First one enters a very large partly glassed-in room (leaving shoes outside). Most of this room is occupied by green luxuriant ferns climbing up to the roof high overhead. Amongst these and around the carpeted walk at the sides are large beautiful vases and lights, some inside the vases, making them look wonderful. At one corner of this main room is the door to a smaller room, the resting place itself. A glass chandelier hangs in the centre and a single electric bulb under this supplies all the light. Precious vases filled with flowers surround the central carpet. One tries to realise that here lies the Holy Dust of the Supreme Manifestation, He Who is the purpose of all the Prophets of the past since Adam and whose dominion extends over the future half-million years of humanity’s existence on this planet. Such thoughts are beyond our present capacity to comprehend. No wonder most pilgrims fall on their face and kiss the threshold of this room.

The mansion is a gold mine of Bahá’í relics and records. I was shown the original Hidden Words, all on one piece of paper, the fur robe of Bahá’u’lláh, a whole library of Bahá’í braille books, great selections of all kinds of Bahá’í books, printed in many languages. Many other books which mention the Faith. In the room the Guardian uses, on the wall near the bed, is a photo of the Kampala Group I took. On one side of the entrance door is a picture of the Báb's executioner and facing him across the passage are two large composite pictures of the members of the two new American N.S.A.s and communities. The Guardian said, "I want him to see the result of his handiwork."

In the afternoon Salah took me on an extensive tour of those places in 'Akká associated with the Master and Bahá'u'lláh. I saw the inn where the pilgrims stayed, the Mosque where the Master prayed regularly, the harbour where He landed, we walked through very many streets broad and narrow while talking of those times. Salah said, "All the streets of 'Akká have touched the feet of the Master or Bahá'u'lláh. 'Abdu'l-Bahá made countless secret journeys on his way to acts of charity here."

Next morning I spent several hours photographing many things in the House of 'Akká, and then we took a picnic lunch to the garden of Ridván. Here an ancient water lift supplied water to an ingenious fountain, from whence a stream flowed through a channel in the flagged stones on which our table was set up. Close by was the seat where He used to sit under two very ancient mulberry trees, whose trunks are still there. Many birds were singing and the gardeners, though unable to speak English yet made me very certain of their happiness at my presence. The three gardens (two of which existed in His time) total about 30 acres and grow not only great quantities of flowers for the various Holy places, but also barley, oats and other things, some for feeding the mules which work the two water lifts and help in the general work. Bahá'u'lláh referred to the Ridván as "Our verdant Isle" for streams used to make a complete island of it. Now one branch has disappeared since the British ordered the filling in of the spring due to mosquitoes which bred there.

Fourth Part

The International House of Justice (the Guardian said) is the dome to the Local and National Assemblies. We must now concentrate on the World Centre, for this is the world administrative centre and nervous system of the Faith. Think of its needs and composition. It had taken 20 years to build these institutions. Now the Holy Spirit would function through them.

The Harris's brought news of American plans and the forthcoming 4 conferences were touched upon. Again the Guardian extolled the British Bahá'ís and said that if the U.S.A. dropped the standard, the British would pick it up. He spoke of Martha Root, May Maxwell, Keith Keller, Dr. Susan Moody, Mrs. Dunn, now all buried all over the world, after following the Master's instructions to "go out into all the world". He spoke of the World Crusade, the World Order, World Plan, World Faith, World Conception. America the Chief Implementor of the Divine Plan, Canada her Ally, the Latin-Americas her Associates. Rúhíyyih Khánum said, "What about Britain?" The Guardian followed his train of thought undeterred, explaining the distinction between ally and associate, then with a twinkle in his eye, "Great Britain is the Chief Auxiliary to U.S.A." Then the Guardian proudly passed round the postcard just received from an island in the Pacific called New Caledonia — newly opened to the Faith. I asked why China had not had the Faith yet, he said "The Báb's relations took it there in the time of Bahá'u'lláh." "The 1953-63 Plan will be a World Plan, taking the Faith to every part of the globe." He said he would send instructions to each Inter-Continental Conference. On another matter he said that after the world calamity, there would be mass conversions to the Faith. In Africa this might come before the calamity. It depends on the quality of the Bahá'ís, their lack of prejudice, kindness, sincerity, etc.

Preparations being made to order a model of the temple to be built at Haifa — Remey was showing us the drawing. The Guardian hoped the model would be unveiled at the American Continental Conference next year. He talked of the 6 acres recently bought on Mt. Carmel above the Shrines. Bought from the Government cheaply, for they had become owners of it when the Arab owners had fled. Also a slum district in town (mostly Arab owned and now deserted) was being demolished and we were getting loose stone for nothing to extend the Shrine terraces.

We talked of the site for the Haifa temple. It must be in a position commanding city, bay and sea.

We now own 50 acres on Mt. Carmel and all was exempt from tax, 5 acres required for the temple. Buying the land has a spiritually strategic importance.

We talked of biblical history — there are two "Caves of Elijah". He may have used either. Gog and Magog perhaps symbolise good and evil. As long as the Teachings do not throw light on such things we must be liberal and follow scholars or those who are experts in such matters.

I asked about the successor of Muḥammad. The Guardian confirmed that when Muḥammad called for pen and paper on his deathbed, to appoint 'Alí His successor, His followers deliberately prevented it because they knew it was 'Alí intended and they wanted the position. All Manifestations appointed a successor but never has there been written an explicit authority to point to (till Bahá'í). Paul usurped the authority of Peter and so created the first Christian schism. The Caliphs did the same to 'Alí.

The next evening at dinner Ugo Giachery said he felt there was a warmer feeling in the Government for the Faith. Talk turned to the latest machinations of the Covenant-breakers. The Guardian did not want the Bahá'í world to be worried about it. However the Covenant-breakers were preventing him from turning his thoughts on the Inter-Continental Conferences. They were also now few and desperate. He mentioned the extreme nationalism in Israel now, of which even the Rabbis were complaining it was very irreligious.

Voting. Bahá'ís may, if they do not identify it with a party, but with the individual. They should vote if possible, as they had a duty to their country. Bahá'ís must accept the administration but not the political side of it. We must never accept political or diplomatic posts, but could even strive to be their secretaries and staff etc. in order to demonstrate Bahá'í integrity and loyalty to the State. We must serve the State but not the politics. Politics are the nerve centre of materialistic civilisation, therefore U.S.A. is in a most dangerous position. There is much fear there for the same reason. All this is why America was chosen by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to implement the World Plan, i.e. because of its corruption and fundamental defection. Deliberately then, he again praised Britain's qualities. Materialistic civilisation in excess leads to turmoil and burning of cities. The divorce of spiritual and material civilisation will lead to a breakdown. They should be complementary. The moral stimulus coming from the Prophets and Seers.

The Guardian noted the impulse of colonial peoples everywhere for independence. He said it is good and we should help them and encourage it, but must guard against its extreme. Materialistic civilisation implies the negation of Divine Civilisation.

The Persian people are more barbaric than the people of Africa and more morally depraved.

The English are clear thinking, slow to start but sure, notice much. The Americans enthusiastic but not sustained in their effort, easy to start but need frequent reminders. The English "steady drizzle" is very comforting, also their loyalty, efficiency, quiet determination, steadiness. The British have it par excellence next the Americans, at the other extreme are the Persians. There is some rain (effort) in America, but in England a steady drizzle. The gleam of high humour in his eye as he said this was too much for us and all burst out laughing.

"The soul is the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh" (I believe he was referring to the soul of humanity). Each part of the body (mankind) is the unbelievers during the Muḥammadan dispensation occupying Jerusalem, Daniel 12. "The woman with child" — Bahá'u'lláh. "Women in the wilderness" — Muḥammadan Era. "Child" sometimes means Bahá'u'lláh and sometimes not. The two witness (Rev. 12) 2 Candles, 2 Olive branches, are Muḥammad and 'Alí (See "God Passes By").

Saturday evening — The Guardian was talking of the English weather, its steady drizzle, so unlike the American efforts which were unsteady and spasmodic. He laughed heartily for almost the first time; we were so happy to see it. He said the "steady drizzle" was much appreciated.

The Covenant-breakers had recently given a party for the British Consul and Government officials. The Guardian instructed the Council to take effective measures to inform these guests of the status of the breakers.

He then talked of the methods of praying and worship at the Shrines.

He went on to say that some prominent Persian Bahá'ís may have to be sacrificed owing to their nationalistic tendencies. It is better to lose a limb than the body. Looking back only now do I realise the intense suffering he must have experienced on that matter yet how fearless his resolution.

The world is now like the Roman Empire just prior to its collapse. There are few leaders left either in England or America. Poverty in every direction, in art, in finance, etc. — What a mess! (running for the presidency) What a pity!

Christianity did not have the institutions what we have at this stage. Now the question is, do we have the courage and the spiritual energy? (necessary to use them as they can be). The early Popes were in the true Citadel and had great courage.

Politics will murder itself. Oligarchy of the Press (newspapers) now rules in America because they influence the masses. It is not a democracy. It should be “rule of the people, by the best of the people”. Bahá’ís should side neither with the U.S.A. or with Russia, for both are wrong. Both are based on extremes of materialism, one atheistic, the other materialistic. Bahá’í not true democracy. (Note: this paragraph is disconnected notes).

The Catholic, Anglican and Presbyterian churches are most backward and prejudiced.

An Egyptian newspaper has recently publicised the Africa Conference.

Palestine has acquired a spiritual potency due to the Prophets, it is also at the junction of three continents. The Holy Land is now becoming the world spiritual and administrative centre and will always be so. These two will never again be separated.

Previous manifestations have been localised except in spiritual influence.

The end of the evening, though very late, we all gathered in the lounge after the Guardian had left, and discussed what we had heard and other things too. We decided this was a most valuable practice and would try to do it more often.

The next evening, Friday May 9th at dinner the Guardian was happy about Turkey creating three new L.S.A.s this year, they had at last found courage, they were even asking for an N.S.A., but prematurely. Rúhíyyih asked him if I could take a photo of the International Council. A single “No” was the only answer. We thought afterwards that he felt it was not large enough yet.

The Guardian described what we should teach the world. The existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the necessity for religion, stress the purpose of it, and the oneness of humanity, its coming of age. In other words, the teachings of the Master and do not use traditional or prophetic methods as proofs positive. Appeal rather to the reason of the individual than to his feelings. Necessity of true religion, separate from creeds. What is the purpose of God? — the creation and evolution of mankind. The purpose of the Prophets? — to prepare mankind for the recognition of Bahá’u’lláh. Teachers would find the “Íqán” and “Some Answered Questions” most important. We must both spread the seed and try to make converts (using the word in its correct sense).

“Bahá’u’lláh said that if the Cause had appeared first in Europe it would by now have attained ascendancy over the thoughts or mankind, because of the greater freedom, intelligence, background culture. The culture in Europe is due largely to Socrates, who studied with the Jews who in turn were the result of Moses’ efforts with a decadent thieving race in Egypt.”

I feel I should repeat here two previous matters. (1) My notes were often skeleton and I am trying my best to put down here what I consider was meant, but there cannot help but be inaccuracies. You should all use your own judgment when reading these notes. (2) You will have noticed the wide range and type of subjects touched on each evening. This remarkable practice is significant in that it shows a detachment and fluidity of thought quite unique. With the Guardian setting the example, each matter is closely, feelingly and justly considered, discussed and then completely put aside for the next subject. (i.e. turned off).

This is the end of the notes on table talks at Haifa, I am sorry to say. I can’t help thinking — I was only present at about a dozen such, but what a bounty to be always at that table! I think I could also safely say on behalf of those permanently there that they look forward with eager loving anticipation to the visits of future pilgrims for a particular reason (amongst others). The very nature of each separate pilgrim will provoke new streams of spiritual refreshment from this fountain, our Guardian. Such an exhilaration is this experience that I confess I was frequently trying to imagine means of stying in Haifa permanently; any service that could justify it. The nearest practical idea I had was to offer myself as a driver for the new lorry bring purchased for the Shrine work.

I wish you could see and hear the Guardian at table. He always stands and welcomes each person as they enter and while dinner proceeds he pays it little attention but will look up a little above our heads while carefully considering something, then with regular, long, direct glances at whoever he is directing the remarks, he will explain the matter in lucid carefully chosen words, masterfully emphasised, always using a simple and common-sense approach, saying neither too little nor too much; leaving usually a margin of thought for one to follow up oneself, always relating the knowledge imparted to the present efforts of his hearers and their needs in those efforts. The indications of pleasure or pain in his eyes are difficult for one not accustomed to these table talks to recognise or even distinguish, for he rarely allows an excess of either to show.

The exhilaration of a visit to Haifa is not an ordinary one, it is certainly not a vague “current” as imaginative people might think, rather it is a perpetual process of effort in all directions, from simple daily tasks (many for everyone) to such new conceptions as the station of Rúhíyyih Khánum and Shoghi Effendi — the tiring straining effort to see world conditions in their new relationship with Haifa and all that it means; the wearying exhilarating practice of looking deeply and justly into things and far, far ahead.

The afternoon of my departure, the Guardian as is his usual practice with pilgrims, called me to his house for a private talk, the one and only of the whole pilgrimage. Rúhíyyih Khánum was also present. First he gave me some coloured photos of the Shrine and gardens and also talked of the photos I had taken, how he hoped they would be of sufficiently high quality for “Bahá’í World” and that I should distribute them. “Tell the British believers how much I admire their devotion, service and organising ability. They will give much help in Europe. I hope you will have an L.S.A. in Nairobi soon, perhaps for the Africa Conference. I live for the day when the first African believers arrive in Haifa, perhaps you will bring them. This is only your first visit in Haifa, you must come again. I am glad you stayed the extra time. God evidently meant it to be so.” He then put his arms around me and kissed both cheeks quickly but firmly and left.

The practical details of the return journey were considerable and anxious, but I do not wish to dwell on them here. Only should I say that Rúhíyyih Khánum said many are awaiting permission to make the pilgrimage (about 80). When I realise how very very few can be accommodated at a time, I know I have been most fortunate and greatly blessed.

Alláh-u-Abhá! Ted

Pilgrim Notes

Ben Levy

March 9 — 16, 1953

The following notes `{{p1}}` as set forth are not authentic, and are merely impressions and comments which I thought were stated by our beloved Guardian, and should be considered as such.

Guardian's comments at dinner table, Western Pilgrim House

7:00 — 8:30 P.M. March 9, 1953

1. Bonn is a very important center. The Germans are trying to build an Assembly there by April (Note: an Assembly was established Ridván 1953)
2. I mentioned the adornment of the Ḥazíra (German) with the rug from Bahá'u'lláh's tomb, and the Guardian said "Yes, this is a very precious gift and is not only a blessing but an adornment as well."
3. Guardian asked "How is the Ḥazíra (German) is it fully completed?" I said it's beautiful, and of course the outside is yet to be stuccoed. He said that was fine. I said the inside is ultra-modern and He said — "the German believers are very fond of it, aren't they?" I replied "yes, they are, Guardian."

4. The Guardian said “What do the Germans think of a new Temple being built in Frankfurt?” . it doesn’t have to be built near the Ḥaẓíra, but in the city of Frankfurt. It can be built even on its outskirts, just so it’s the city, and within close range of the Administrative Institutions. It must fulfill two conditions (1) must be nine-sided (2) must be circular. first the site must be selected; second the land must be purchased and a design made. It doesn’t have to be designed by a Bahá’í but it is preferable. The more original the better. It doesn’t have to be large — like the Temple in Wilmette, but it must be original and carefully designed. He hopes it can be built before the completion of the 10 year Crusade. The NSA must consider it very carefully. Their reward for the completion of the Temple construction will be a portrait of the Báb, a priceless treasure.
5. I said the Bahá’ís all over Germany are excitedly talking about going to Stockholm. They haven’t much money, but they will get there somehow. Probably even hitchhike. He said “Yes, the Germans have their bicycles, don’t they? They can ride to the North Sea and then go by ship or train.” We all laughed heartily. The Guardian said “Their (Germany’s) role is very great — at the Stockholm Conference, during the Ten Year Crusade, and especially after it. It is most important they attend.”
6. “It is sad that Dr. Grossman couldn’t go to Kampala” (he planned to but became ill), the Guardian said, and asked if I had seen him before I left. I said no, but talked with him over the phone and understood he was much better now. The Guardian said of Kampala — “the Germans were not represented and they were missed — and needed there.

It’s a pity the German Bahá’ís couldn’t be there. Their presence at all these conferences are very important. It wasn’t so bad they weren’t at Kampala, because their field is in the North, and in Stockholm it is most important they attend. Their destiny is to struggle with the Russians.

7. America, Persia and Germany will collaborate in the field of Russia; Germany from the West, Persia from the South, and America from all directions — the Guardian said. Then he spoke of Alaska and went on to say — Alaska has a very important position, spiritually as well as Administratively. It is most important that Alaska get to Russia. Alaska is a base of operations — that is why we are developing it there; {{p2}} Alaska from the East, Germany from the West, Persia from the South — all converging on Russia.
8. Our Guardian then said “You know Alaska is the back-door to Russia.” I said in exclamatory tones “My gosh, Guardian, You know I just received a letter from Frances Wells in Fairbanks several weeks ago, and she remarked how strange it was that I was (with the Germans) at Russia’s front-door and they in Alaska at her back-door.” The Guardian just smiled.
9. The Guardian said “Frau Schwarz — she is a pillar of the Cause in Germany. She is staunch — yes a pillar — a very devoted believer.”

10. And our Guardian asked about Edith Horn — how she was; I said — fine — and she is very much loved in Germany. Then the Guardian said; “You know, Edith was here in 1938 (I believe the Guardian said that year) and I sent her to Frankfurt from Stuttgart, at a time when there was no Cause there — and she persevered — she held the fort — and look now, Frankfurt has its Ḥazíra and is the administrative Center. The German Bahá’í should honor Edith Horn.”
11. Herr Benke attained the station of Martyr in Bulgaria — said the Guardian. The Guardian then asked about Frau Benke and I said I never met her, but understood that she was living with Dr. & Mrs. Grossman at Neckargemund. I asked Rúḥíyyih Khánum if that was correct, and she said, yes, it was.
12. Then the Guardian said “Germany and Austria — their mission is to work together,” He said “I have urged Germany and Austria to attend the Stockholm Conference. And also the British Isles, Ireland, Scotland and France. They should send one representative (and mentioned several other countries). The conferences are paving the way for the launching of the Ten-Year Crusade — a preliminary step.”
- 13... as many visitors to Stockholm as possible, in passing through Norway, should try to visit the grave of Johanna Schubart. The Guardian said “She was not only a pioneer but the Mother Bahá’í of Norway — a mother pioneer. Dagmar Dole was a pioneer — but Johanna Schubert was a mother pioneer, her station is much higher.”
14. I said that Dr. Muhlschlegel and Dr. Schmidt said it was all right to mention the death of Frau Herrigal, and that Herma Muhlschlegel said for the last ten years she was old and really harmless. The Guardian commented “She was misled by her husband, and Herr Herrigal was misled by Mrs. White.” Rúḥíyyih Khánum said that the husband of Mrs. White wrote a few years ago and said he did not believe all his wife said, and that she was not sane, and the Guardian replied, “Yes, she was unbalanced.”
15. The Portrait (of the Báb) must be put away (speaking of its being viewed at Wilmette) before prayers and meditations begin. Otherwise in due time it might develop into a Christian service. Once prayers begin — there must be no pictures exposed. Bahá’u’lláh has forbidden this — no ornaments or pictures are to be hung.
16. I said to the Guardian that all the friends, and particularly mentioned the Youth, were all excited about the possibility of pioneering in Russia and the Eastern countries and that several have expressed their desire to go one day, and replied that it is too early to think of Russia — but rather direct their eyes upon and think of Germany. Germany must make itself a base upon which to launch the Crusade to the East — expand existing centers — strengthen and consolidate present communities.

17. Germany has a great destiny in the Baltic States, the Balkans and Scandinavia. They will proceed to the Ukraine and as far as the heart of Russia. The Master said that Germany has a great destiny, and revealed it at a time when little was known of the Cause in the North. Now look at it today.  $\{\{p3\}\}$  The light of the Faith will radiate to the North, East and South.
18. Marion Jack is a great soul — a pride of the pioneers in the East and the West; an example to all pioneers; she has persevered long and hard. The Master called her “General Jack.” She has the spirit of Martha Root — combination of heroism and saintliness; some are either heroic or saintly: Persians aren’t all saints. They are pious but not all saintly. Martha Root combined three qualities — martyr, heroine, and saint — a unique distinction. Saintliness is very rare — it comes from purity of motive.
19. In speaking of the Africans — the Guardians said they are pure, unsophisticated, unspoiled.
20. The Holy Land, Persia, and America are in very great danger. Persia is the cradle of the Faith — it is in constant danger. America is the stronghold of the Administrative Order in the West. The cradle and the stronghold are both in danger. The Holy Land is the spiritual center — it too is in great danger. But in spite of that, we launch a Ten Year Crusade. Look at the Second Seven-Year Plan and Europe. It was conceived alike. There were very few centers before it began. Europe was groaning and impoverished.
21. He hopes there will be sixty NSAs after the Ten-Year Crusade. They are like pillars of the Universal House of Justice. First the pillars — then the Universal House of Justice as the dome (i.e. Monument of the Greatest Holy Leaf). Amelia Bowman asked if the Universal House of Justice would be established by 1963 — he said, not necessarily. The Greatest Holy Leaf is the symbol of the Administrative Order. The main thing is — teach the Cause — extend its range — consolidate its foundation. First the local, then the National, later the International.
22. Goal countries — won’t have outside pioneering in the Ten-Year Plan. — only within their own countries, First, will establish Regional National Assemblies.
23. Alaska will have its own NSA — in the Ten-Year Plan. Will be a pillar of the Universal House of Justice in the North. Will have its own National Endowments and Ḥaḏīra. Alaska is the back-door of Russia. I asked where the Ḥaḏīra would be located and the Guardian replied that it would be decided when the NSA is formed. First two things; One multiply LSAs. Second establish NSA.
24. Fairbanks is near the Arctic Circle. There is a spiritual competition between Canada and Alaska, who will go beyond the Arctic Circle first. They are aiming beyond the Arctic Circle.

25. The Guardian said “You know, Alaska is going to have its own NSA during the Ten Year Crusade” .”there is good news from Alaska — they have property now — their own endowment. This is very fine — near Anchorage, I believe.” I said yes, I know — and Rúḥíyyih Khánúm asked where — and I told them of the Huffmans and Gregorys donating the land — 10 acres each, I believe.

Guardian’s comments Western Pilgrim House

March 11, 1953

1. I asked about the peacock and if it was true it was a sign of immortality. Guardian said yes — and was recognized most undoubtedly as the most beautiful bird in the world. Bahá’u’lláh referred to it as the bird of paradise in many Tablets.
2. Spoke about the eagle, and how majestic they were. The eagle is the symbol of ascendancy — hence, ascendancy of the Cause — that is why many eagles adorn the surroundings of the Shrines, at Bahjí, at the Shrine of the Báb. {{p4}} It represents the ascendancy of the Cause in the world — not imperialism — but power and ascent.
3. It (the Year nine) commemorates the Birth of Bahá’u’lláh’s Revelation. The Centenary of the Báb nine years ago commemorated the Birth of the Bábí Revelation which announced the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh. Bahá’u’lláh kept it a secret from mankind for ten years.
4. I mentioned to the Guardian how beautiful the gardens at Bahjí were, and that the grass lawn surrounding the shrine itself was like a velvet carpet, with lights at evening casting a shimmering profusion of soft shadows and light around the landscape. He smiled and was pleased. He asked “How is the grass in Germany? Is it as beautiful as the grass here?” I smiled and said, I knew Germany was famous for its landscaping and gardening and flowers, but didn’t think it was as beautiful.
5. Mentioned to our Guardian how different it was for me, an American, coming to Germany; that it was a great change; that Germans think so differently. Our Guardian said in reply, that the Germans are very painstaking — painstaking and methodical — deep. And that they are loyal; are anything but superficial. They don’t just read — they study. They pay great attention to detail. Germans have a great capacity — great endurance — great vitality.
6. German, Persia, and American — through Alaska, borders Russia. That is why they have a great mission there.
7. The Year Nine is the Birth of Bahá’u’lláh’s Revelation. Bahá’u’lláh kept it a secret for ten years. First intimation — He disclosed it to His companions who were exiled with Him. In Adrianople He proclaimed His mission to the Rulers of the World. First direct intimation; then declaration to companions; then proclamation to all mankind. Proclamation began in Adrianople — ended in ‘Akká.

8. Reply of Queen Victoria “If this is of God .etc” — is hearsay — we are not sure she said this. No Kings or Rulers replied to His Tablets. Some completely disregarded His Summons. Napoleon was reported to have said — “If this man is God, I’m two Gods” — one year later he was defeated in the Franco-Prussian war his only son was killed in the Zulu war. The Pope lost his temporal power and retreated to the Vatican where he imprisoned himself.
9. Amelia Bowman spoke of “Lamentations of Berlin.” Our Guardian pointed out that during the first World War this prophecy was fulfilled — the people lamented their loss of the war — their poverty and abasement.
10. Monarchies are being overthrown; accelerated since the time of the Master’s death as he predicted. France and Germany became a Republic — also China became a Republic; in Portugal the monarch became a Republic. The Czar fell — later Germany and Austria. The decline of monarchy increased after the Master’s death. Then Turkey fell — then the Qájár dynasty — which is still tottering in Persia. A series of monarchies have fallen — Bulgaria, Albania, Hungary, Serbia, all became republics (then listed more). Later came Italy. Fourteen monarchies have fallen since Bahá’u’lláh gave His Message. The process still continues. Kingdoms were abased. Some lost their thrones — others were humiliated — other humiliated themselves by their own acts (Farouk was mentioned and the Guardian agreed that as a recent example).
11. There is the decline in the East and West. Princes of India have lost their Princedoms. They were protected by England and finally most of them were absorbed by the Republic of India. Hundreds of princes have lost their position and provinces to the Republic of India. Amelia Bowman asked about Pakistan and the Guardian explained that though Moslem — this is no doubt temporary and will be absorbed later by the Republic of India. {{p5}} The Bahá’ís have a very great struggle there in the East. The process of princedoms being lost will continue.
12. Just as the Jews have crucified Christ — they suffered 2000 years of persecution — so also will the Moslems suffer a similar fate. The Jews rejected Christ — the Moslems Bahá’u’lláh and His Cause.
13. I mentioned that I always thought of the German people having great minds and that I’ve seen much narrow-mindedness in the people. The Guardian said most Catholics are in southern Germany — Lutherans in the north. He said that the opposition from the Moslem is now spreading to the Christian Church; it began in America with the Presbyterians and Anglican Church in England. There are many Presbyterian and Anglican Missionaries in Persia. The Anglican Church has attacked the Faith in Persia; — gradually it will spread to the Orthodox Russian Church — they are very strong. And — eventually it will go to the Catholic Church. Its culmination will end with the Pope. His opposition will lead to his downfall. By opposing the Faith he will plant the seeds to his own downfall.

14. In the Fiji Islands the Moslems have officially denounced the Bahá'ís as Infidels. They are very influential there. They are dominant there.
15. Godlessness and unbelief — decline of religion. People are becoming more nationalists and less religious. The Jews in Israel are nationalists. Religious leaders are interfering with politics. Catholics in America — Moslems in Persia — also in India. Bahá'u'lláh urges His believers to keep away from politics. Religious leaders are becoming subservient to the State, instead of the State becoming subservient to religion.
16. Uphold non-interference in politics. We are above parties — we are God's Party. We promote God's policy — not God's politics. I lay down the principle and the NSA'S apply it. The NSA has the responsibility to determine if believers can vote for a given party without being identified with it. Bahá'ís must be completely free in voting — detached from any party.
17. There is the material world and the spiritual world. We must not confuse the two. In the next world we do not lose our identity — our individuality — we retain it. We become more perceptive — but there is nothing physical about it. It is spiritual. In the material world there is much yet to be revealed, — there may be life on other planets. Still, the material world must not be identified with the spiritual world. Bahá'u'lláh tells us that we have a great effect on the souls who have passed on — that is why we pray for them — to help their progress in the next world. there is always progress for the soul — there is always progression in the next world also. It is both through the Mercy of God and the acts of the souls also. The soul can, through its own self progress, by its deeds. We know that Bahá'u'lláh says that the soul in the next world can reflect on life in this world and whether it lived a good life or not. Earthly life is but one stage in the journey of the soul. On earth the value is that the soul has the opportunity to develop itself. Now we must look at to-day, and the Ten-Year Crusade. Each person must do his part, and God will take care of the rest.
18. The unity of mankind is now approaching — the stage of maturity. Maturity means responsibility — and all men are responsible to God for their acts on earth. Great responsibility — both as an individual and as leaders of men. Suffering for mankind is inevitable. Man suffers — he is cleansed. It is a cleansing force.
19. The coming ten years is a very crucial period for the Cause. It precedes the establishment of the Cause. Humanity as a whole must establish the unity of mankind. The more it delays — the greater the suffering. {{p6}} Unity is the keynote — the great need in the world of today — not union but unity — union is quite different.

We require organic unity. First — the Lesser Peace — next the Most Great Peace — a new civilization will be born. The birth of this world civilization is dependent wholly on the Bahá'í principles based on Bahá'u'lláh's writings. The Laws of Bahá'u'lláh must be applied to community life. We must not worry about the future now — everyone must play his part in the coming Ten-Year Crusade — insure its success.

20. I asked the Guardian about his oft repeated mentioning in varied letters about the Hosts of the Abhá Kingdom, and the Maid of Heaven, as mentioned by Bahá'u'lláh, and he explained that these are completely allegorical and should not be taken literally. there is nothing physical about it. It means the Power of God working through Bahá'u'lláh. This Power from Bahá'u'lláh working through pure hearts. They become channels of His Grace.
21. I pointed out to our beloved Guardian how as a Bahá'í we are human and full of error, and whatever we do, we know many times — even though our best — that it many times is wrong too. He said we should do our best and even if we are wrong — if we are sincere and pure, God will decide for us. We must look at the tasks at hand and accomplish these.
22. Amelia Bowman mentioned, in reply to our Guardian's question about how Norway feels about monarchies, that "They love their King" and the Guardian said, "yes, they love their King" — "Scandinavia is like that. Bahá'ís must be careful not to say anything against their King in those countries. another day (Mar. 9) The Guardian said — the Norwegians were like the English — very slow to catch on — very slow — but once they caught on, they were very staunch.

Guardian's comments on March 2, 1953

1. Mashriqu'l-Adhkár on Mount Carmel will not be built above the Shrine — but to the side — preferably west of the Shrine — and should have a commanding view of the land and sea.
2. I mentioned to our Guardian about the codification of the Aqdas, which he wrote of in a recent cable and asked what he meant. The Guardian replied that excerpts of the Aqdas are to be published in different languages — to present to officials of the land. This will help to establish the independent status of the Faith.
3. In regard to translation of Bahá'í writings into various languages, as stipulated in the Ten-Year Crusade, the Guardian said — translations can vary from the Bahá'í principles to the Dawn-Breakers. It does not necessarily mean Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era only. It can be any pamphlet.

4. When asked when will be the beginning of the Golden Age — Guardian said the Golden Age may be in 70 to 100 years. Leroy Ioas commented that the establishment of the Universal House of Justice does not mean the beginning of the Golden age.
5. Speaking of the Greatest Holy Leaf and of the glow of her eyes on the large photo at Bahjí — Guardian said the Greatest Holy Leaf could be described as the fragrance of the robe of Bahá'u'lláh.
6. He called Panama the heart of the Americas.
7. There will be an Asian Committee appointed — in addition to the European, African and Inter-America (to be re-instated) committee.
8. “We own the heart of Carmel — we want to have the head too.” {{p7}} (toward western part of Mt. C. Bay of Haifa leads away from)
9. In buying the land of Mt. Carmel we accepted the provision that we cannot sell produce from the land (must give to poor and needy), cannot build, sell or rent. Only Bahá'ís pay no taxes on land (for religious purposes) in Israel — no other religious communities will accept these conditions — not the Muḥammadans, the Christians, not even the Jews.

Guardian's comments on March 13, 1953 at dinner table, Western Pilgrim House

1. Asked of our impressions of the portraits of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh (in Shrine, Major Archives) and spoke of their preciousness. Said to me “The Portrait of the Báb will be shown in Stockholm. You must tell the German friends about this — for it will act as a stimulus for them to attend. The Portrait of the Báb is to be shown at Wilmette, then Stockholm, and also at New Delhi in India.
2. Read news article from Ethiopian newspaper about Bahá'ís and recent publicity there connected with the visit of Mason Remey, Mildred Motadadek and others from Kampala and the article said all about the uniqueness of this Conference and of the basic principles of the Bahá'í Faith. The Guardian went on to say how important Ethiopia was, and that the American friends should concern themselves with this and other territories, not only Liberia. encouraged Ludmila von Sombeck to communicate with New York friends and encourage pioneers to this land. Pioneers to here must be capable, devoted, and it would be advantageous to speak Italian. and — Negro, if possible. Orientals don't impress them very much there, but anyone from the West especially Americans. Said it would be very meritorious for those pioneers going there.
3. Our Guardian went on to say that “tibet is the roof of the world” — then smiling he said “the nearest place to Abhá Kingdom” — we all roared with laughter. Our Guardian is very witty, and has a terrific sense of humor.

It is very difficult for the Cause there. It has a theocratic government — a government run by monks. It is a stronghold of religious orthodoxy — a stronghold of the Buddhist Faith. It will be difficult to enter there — and doubt if any one can just now. It has been overrun by communists, and is difficult to cross the border. The Soviets are in control there. But it is a very important land.

4. Then our beloved Guardian spoke of the Islands of the South Pacific. There we must have the greatest concentration of effort. There the islands are scattered — numerous — backward — and are virgin territories. Look at Europe, look at America — there aren't many places which haven't been at some time opened to the Faith or established there, — but in the islands of the South Pacific there are hundreds of virgin territories. They are inhabited by the Brown Race. They are very important, very promising. the Cause has been revealed to the white, the yellow and black — but little amongst the brown. look at its significance in the Ten-Year Crusade. The New Delhi will find eight NSAS cooperating. This is more than the participation of all the other individual conferences. the responsibility is very great. They will deal with propagation of Faith to So. East Asia and the Islands of the So. Pacific. The Master mentioned this in His tablets of the Divine Plan. The area is wide and extensive. It is the heart of the Pacific Ocean. It is surrounded by three continents — three continents — Asia, So. America, Australia. It has a great future.
5. The amount of Bahá'ís in Kenya is becoming so great that I'll have to ask them to disperse there — establish new centers. Whenever there is a surplus of Bahá'ís — over 15 — I like them to disperse to other surrounding areas. {{p8}} I don't like regulations — but I like to say whenever there is a surplus — I like to see the Bahá'ís move to new locations.
6. I brought photos taken at Bahjí, Mar. 10-11 when we first sat down, to the Guardian, and said he should feel free to keep whatever he would like. He looked through them and spoke of the work being done at Bahjí. To all of us and particularly to Ludmila von Sombeck, who was having her last night of pilgrimage there — and said “you must take these photos to all the friends wherever you go — especially Vienna and show them the progress which is going on at the world Center. They are very much isolated, and it is important they know of the progress, and be contacted, for they have a great task during the Ten-Year Crusade — that of establishing a NSA there.”
7. The Guardian went on to say — regarding teaching — we must not look for or expect official and outstanding people to become Bahá'ís — we must look for capable people — not necessarily outstanding. Officials and important people can be our friends — but they are tied to either politics or to other obligations. They cannot separate themselves from their ties — they will always remain involved. They can accept the principles of Bahá'u'lláh and the Cause but usually not wholly converted to the Cause.

They come in with reservations. We must not sacrifice the principles of the Cause for popularity — never sacrifice our principles to be popular. We should proceed wisely — cautious — slowly — We must look for pure souls — capable souls not necessarily important people. They are important but we must concentrate on pure souls.

8. The spirit of Martha Root touched the heart of Queen Marie. We need more active supporters of the Faith — not sympathizers — but people who support the Institutions of the faith. Martha had that ability to meet important people in high places. But now we need active supporters — not sympathizers.
9. The stronghold of materialism is in America. We must avoid total concentration of teaching in the cities. There the people are immersed in their own surroundings — are distracted — disinterested in things pertaining to the spirit. The more primitive the people are — the nearer they are to the spirit — to the Faith. People speak of the so-called civilized world. The more primitive the nearer they are — the more civilized — the farther away.
10. The Moslems are exerting a very great effort in America — allying themselves with the Christians — they are not sincere — but compromise their principles. The building of the Mosque in Washington D.C. is a direct result from our building the Temple. Diplomats and Ambassadors from the East, from Egypt — went back and told their people — if the few Bahá'ís can build such a beautiful Temple — why can't we of the Moslem world do better. They will do everything they can to attract people — but they compromise their principles. Even to the extent of forming ties with the Christians — even with the Catholics, their bitter enemies. To Bahá'ís, principles are first, popularity second. The Moslems and Christians are forming a religious front against a common foe — Communism. They join in an unholy alliance. The Pope is inviting the Egyptians and Moslems to help in the fight against the common foe — Communism. All are compromising their principles. Their fundamental beliefs are directly opposed to one another. The American government is glad to see the alliance — anything to consolidate their ranks. They have all been besieged by fear — fear has entered then and they don't know where to turn. They cannot even think clearly — they are confused, they are afraid. They call it the “barbarian from the East” — a “history repeating itself” they are losing their balance — fear seizes them. Of course, this does not mean that Communism is good. The U.S. is afraid — none more afraid than they, the richer the state — the more afraid. The poorer — the less afraid. The old order is dying — the New Order is not yet born. The Administrative Order is not the World Order — one is the embryo of the other. Now we have the embryo. The world must be organized and spiritualized — a spiritualization of mankind. {{p9}} Now the world suffers from organization and materialism.

11. In respect to teaching, our Guardian speaks of the difficulty in bringing officials into the Cause. They are bound by official bond — materialistic bonds. We must look for pure souls, we must search for them. Bahá'ís must go places where it is easy to find them. (Rúhíyyih Khánum injected the thought that the Guardian says we must go from the easy to the hard). We find them in their modest homes — villages — small towns. We establish the Administration in the cities — concentrate teaching outside the cities. Think what would happen if New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles would do this. Bahá'ís can spend years in the cities but many times to no avail; people there are preoccupied. Bahá'ís must propagate the Faith in small centers. We want localities in the Faith, not cities. We must go with the people — live among them — search for them. Bahá'ís must go to the villages — they are important.
12. It is a great mistake for pioneers to get into capitals and stay there. We must scatter — there we reap a rich harvest. It is highly meritorious — very effectual. This does not mean to abandon cities. We must have a firm functioning Assembly, but the surplus Bahá'ís must scatter. Of course, there are many difficulties involved — many problems to overcome — but it means sacrifice. Many have families — homes — ties. I lay down the principles — the Bahá'ís must try to apply them. All required of them is to make an effort — they must make an effort.
13. I spoke to our Guardian of the fact of having Goal cities in Germany — and the importance of the Five-Year Plan — but asked about all the other places. The Guardian said: We are interested in Goal Centers — not Goal Cities. In making plans — NSAs must study the situation — determine receptive centers — not choose from a map the important cities. They must consider which points are receptive — which is the easiest place to establish a center, and then include it in a plan. It doesn't have to be an important city. We must study where we have a rich and quick harvest. Our main consideration is to propagate the Faith. As soon as a center is established — the surplus must disperse. We must husband our resources — must be careful how we dispose of them. Places like Germany and the goal countries can't do this yet. If they dispersed there would nothing left. But a general rule to follow is to have at least 15 believers — then the surplus must disappear and establish new centers. If one tenth of the Bahá'ís in Tíhrán alone would disperse — the Bahá'ís would have the Faith all over the world. They have learned in Persia the importance of villages. We cannot compel Bahá'ís to disperse — there are many hinderances and difficulties — but people must make the effort. The pioneering spirit must be created in the friends.
14. To Ludmila von Sombeck — the Guardian said — when you go to Vienna — try to contact Bahá'ís in some way — in Hungary — Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia. Vienna is a very important center. During the coming Ten-Year Crusade it has a great task — to establish an NSA of their own.

Austria must collaborate with the German NSA but must make new centers. Otherwise they will be indefinitely attached to the German NSA. They must collaborate with the German NSA, but begin extensive teaching — in cities like Graz, Linz, Innsbruck. Encourage friends in Austria to attend the Conference.

15. The Conference in Stockholm has the purpose to stimulate activity in Europe. The Bahá'ís must discover ways and means to spread the Faith on the Continent of Europe — not the goal countries only — all countries. The map (refers to the map the Guardian made to outline full scope of the Ten-Year Crusade) is no secret now. Tell the friends if they only want the maps alone — to communicate with Geneva. They are getting a supply of them. If pamphlets and maps are wanted, they can obtain them from England or America. {{p10}} It would be cheaper if they would get them from England. During the Ten-Year Crusade, tell the friends the effort must be continuous — not spasmodic. If there is any sceptic you meet (to Ludmila) tell him to look at Kampala, and the Conference there — the success in Africa.
16. The dome has been started and the Guardian goes on to say he hopes for the gilded tiles in another month. Tell them (Ludmila) of the Gardens — and the progress at the World Center — especially Vienna — for they are isolated.

Guardian's Comments March 15, 1953 at dinner in Western Pilgrim House

1. Our Guardian said to me that he has read the Tablets I brought from the friends in Germany (from the Master). Also read the diaries (17 volumes) from Mr. Samandarí sent from Persia. Yesterday the Guardian said he had read for 14 hours straight — the letter over 70 pages long in Persian (in his own hand) to be sent by pilgrim to Írán, reviewing and checking it. This letter, as he previously said at dinner table the evening before — was the Significances of the Year Nine and a review of happenings in the Bahá'í world during the previous two years. He went on to say “whenever I do something extraordinary like this letter, all the routine work piles up and I must then begin to catch up on this routine material,” referring to letters, Tablets, Samandarí's diaries, and all other data.
2. There will be an Israeli Branch of the NSA established during the coming Ten-Year Crusade for the NSAs I have designated on the map with a star. Germany is one of them. You must tell the German friends that. The first step is incorporation — every NSA must incorporate first. Next — through a lawyer in the Holy Land — a Branch is established — as a Religious society. When the government accepts the incorporation documents — I will transfer land to them. At present America and India have an Israeli Branch. The Branch is a legal bond to unite the NSAs of the world to the World Center — this is unique in religious history. This will add to the prestige of the Faith in Israel — and will consolidate the International endowments. Then this property has the backing of the respective governments. If someone wishes to encroach on our property — we refer them to the legal owners — which are the NSA's of the various countries who are not here (in the Holy Land). The Branches add to the prestige of the Faith — consolidate its ties to the World Center. Later on — the historic sites in Persia. Persia will establish branches. Other NSAs will own some of the land — NSAs will own land in the cradle of the Faith and the Holy Land. First Persia must show its national constitution to the Persian Government and become incorporated before Branches can be established there.

3. All NSAs now have the same constitution — this is unique. Spain and Portugal will have the constitution translated. First the national Constitutions must be presented to the government — then receive recognition. I asked the Guardian how Persia will get recognition and be incorporated and he said this will be very difficult — for it must be presented to the Persian government and the Sháh.
4. I mentioned seeing the Bahá'í school of India on his map — for the Ten-Year Crusade, and asked if it will be like the Summer Schools. The Guardian explained that it is quite different. It is to be opened all year round — maybe non-Bahá'ís will be admitted also.
5. The nature of the Dependency of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in Wilmette during the Ten-Year Crusade is not yet decided.
6. In regard to my questions regarding Buddha, the Guardian said His Teachings are based upon Divine Revelation — the Master told us so. {{p11}} There is nothing in writing — we don't know exactly what He taught. Scholars and Priests say He taught immortality. The religion of Zoroaster, the Indians — Buddha — are alike in this respect. We do not know exactly what they said. The books of laws have been written by the priests. The priests deviated from the path. Wrote about Buddha's teachings years after His death — like the Catholic Church. Scholars say Buddha taught the middle way of Nirvana — of the state of blessedness and peace on earth — that He taught little of the after-life. We know this is wrong. All Divine Manifestations taught of life after death. He had to have spoken more than just the life on earth.
7. Divinity of Bahá'u'lláh is a stumbling block in the West. The best answer is as written in the Íqán. Bahá'u'lláh tells what He means by Divinity. Bahá'u'lláh is Divine — we believe this — but we must explain what is meant by Divinity. The Catholics are correct when they teach the Divinity of Christ — but they have the mistake of confusing the God-Head with the Prophet. Only God and the Prophet are Divine. When people question when Bahá'u'lláh says “I am God” — refer them to Christ's statement “I am (in) the Father” — it is the same thing. All Prophets have said the same thing. Bahá'u'lláh has said the same thing in the Íqán. Catholics believe that God and the Son are the same — this is fundamentally wrong. It is like saying the ray is the sun. To say that Bahá'u'lláh is greater than other prophets is wrong — they are all Divine — all mirror the Light — but in Bahá'u'lláh — his mirror deflects the Light greater — not because He is intrinsically superior — rather because the capacity of the people is greater to receive the Light.

8. The soul has tremendous experience in the other world — we know this but we cannot understand how.
9. I asked our beloved Guardian if there isn't some ties between the Germans and the Greeks (Germany has Greece during the Crusade). He said the Germans have a greater appreciation for the Greek culture and their art. You know, the Germans had their eyes on Greece during the last war and had Crete.
10. A letter was received from Shanghai — the believers are very active there — even under the Communists. The question is whether or not to tell the authorities. If they do — they may be expelled — if they do not, they risk being imprisoned and sent to Siberia.
11. The sub-continent of India is very vast — there is a great deal of work to do beyond its frontiers. The India Bahá'ís have had 3 plans — more than any other country — America has had only two. Now India is finishing its 19-month Plan. They have sent a pioneer to Nepal. In Burma there is great progress.
12. I asked our Guardian of the nature of the auxiliary boards to be appointed during the Ten-Year Crusade. They are designed to help the Hands to complete the Plans. There are not many Hands so they need help — and the Plans are vast. These auxiliary boards are the first extension of the Institution of the Hands of the Cause — are elected by the Hands — assists the NSAs to fulfill plans.
13. The function of the Hands is to protect and propagate the Cause — its two chief functions. Now the NSAs function is also to protect and propagate the Faith — later these functions will be fully handled by the Institutions of the Hands. Like the NSAs — they will have their own boards — committees and sub-committees. They will have Institutions parallel to the present NSAs committees, etc. {{p12}} The Institution of the Hands and the NSA functions are complimentary — not at odds with one another. The NSAs will become more and more legislative — will handle the affairs of the community — they will first legislate — then apply laws.
