Pilgrim Accounts

Consolidation of various public collections of pilgrim note accounts. This is an open collaborative project to add value to these historical narratives in the following ways:

1. Link each typed manuscript to one or more scanned originals
  1. This removes one extra layer of potential mistakes
  2. This allows volunteers to help edit and improve typed copy
2. Sort out correct date and author
  1. Many notes have incorrect author and date or are extracts from other notes.
3. Upgrade readability of typed copy
  1. Standardize spellings of Arabic/Farsi terms
  2. Sandardize formatting into simple Markdown with some extensions for page numbering etc.
  3. Expand acronyms for TTS
  4. Correct obvious typos in spelling and grammar

How to get involved

There are several ways you can interact with this collection.

1. Fork the entire collection and use it your own purposes. It's open source, help yourself.
2. Add or clean up documents and contribute back with a pull request. The documents are all MD so you can edit them right inside Github
  1. Note: if you wish to download the PDFs, you will need the git extension for large binary files
3. Join the project as an editor and help supervise

An Early Pilgrimage

February 9th, 1898

We sailed from Marseilles on February 9th, 1898, on board the S.S. Carthage bound for Bombay and arrived in Port Sa'íd on February 13th. We were met on board by Aḥmad Yazdí and Núru'lláh Effendi. They did everything for us, got us rooms at the hotel, attended to our baggage, and during the time we were there came to us almost every hour of the day and evening, inviting us to their homes, taking us to drive, and indeed showing us a love and kindness such as we had never seen before. At the time we could not understand the spirit which animated them, but afterwards we knew that we were dead and they were living and were quickened with the love of God. On the afternoon of our arrival Núru'lláh Effendi called for us and drove us to his house, where we met his dear wife and daughters with the same radiant faces and wonderful love that we had seen in our two brothers, and there for the first time we beheld the face of our beloved Master. I could not remove my eyes from this picture, and these friends gave us each a copy and a lock of hair of the Blessed Perfection. Then we were entertained with tea and many sweet cakes, and when we left, although not a word had been spoken except through an occasional interpretation of our brother, we were united in an indissoluble bond of love, and we felt that no language could have been more eloquent than that silence in which our hearts alone had spoken.

We were obliged to wait two days for the little boat running along the coast of Beirut, and we went on board about seven o'clock of the evening of the 15th accompanied by our faithful brothers. With what deep feeling they entrusted to us messages of love for their Master and with what longing eyes they watched us as we sailed away. Ah! soon I was to understand! I remember how calm the sea was under the noonday sun when we stopped at Jaffa the next day, and we spoke of the little house of Simon the tanner and the wonderful vision St. Peter had on that house top. We visited this historic spot on our return trip; now every hour that separated us from our Beloved seemed all too long. So we continued on our journey, sitting quietly on deck until the twilight fell about us, the shadows deepened, and with the gathering darkness the stars shun out one by one, large and effulgent in that clear atmosphere. We arose and went forward and saw looming up through the darkness, dimly at first, but growing ever more distinct and grand, the noble outline of Mount Carmel, then the twinkling lights along the shore, and the breath of the Holy Land was wafted to us laden with the perfume of roses and orange blossoms.

There were two Russian pilgrims on board who for hours had been standing motionless at the ship's rail facing the east, and now their steadfast gaze was on 'Akká, and thus we all stood in prayer and worship as the ship slowly entered the bay of Haifa and cast anchor. Then followed a confusion of boats, lights and voices which we heeded not until we were rowed ashore and saw the faces of our American brothers beaming upon us. They greeted us cordially as they helped us out, and said, 'Our Master is in Haifa.' We were driven to the house which the Master had taken for the American pilgrims and cordially greeted by sister Maryam and others, and we retired to spend our first night in the Holy Land, between waking and sleeping, waiting for the sunrise of that glorious day.

On the following morning, Friday the 17th, at about seven o'clock, sister Maryam hurried into our room and announced that 'Abdu'l-Bahá would arrive in a few moments. We had barely time to dress when a sudden stir without set all our beings in commotion. We went out into a large central hall from which opened all the rooms in the house and opposite the door of one of these we saw the shoes of the believers; thus we knew that the blessed Master was within.

The others preceded me. In a moment I stood on the threshold and dimly saw a room full of people sitting quietly about the walls, and then I beheld my Beloved. I found myself at His feet, and He gently raised me and seated me beside Him, all the while saying some loving words in Persian in a voice that shook my heart. Of that first meeting I can remember neither joy nor pain nor anything I can name. I had been carried suddenly to too great a height; my soul had come in contact with the Divine Spirit; and this force so pure, so holy, so mighty, had overwhelmed me. He spoke to each one of us in turn of ourselves and our lives and those whom we loved, and although His words were so few and so simple they breathed the Spirit of Life to our souls. To me He said among other things: 'You are like the rain which is poured upon the earth making it bud and blossom and become fruitful; so shall the Spirit of God descend upon you, filling you with fruitfulness and you shall go forth and water His vineyard. Now your troubles are ended and you must wipe away your tears, for you know the parable that Christ spoke of the sower and the seed; and so as in nature the good ground is made ready by rain and storm and ploughing and sunshine for the good seed to be sown, so is it in life, and the heart is made ready by all experience for the seed of life'

The Russian Jews who had been on the boat the night before now arrived, their faces shining with a great light as they entered His Presence. We could not remove our eyes from His glorious face: we heard all He said; we drank tea with Him at His bidding; but existence seemed suspended, and when He arose and suddenly left us we came back with a start to life: but never again, thank God, to the same life on this earth! We had 'beheld the King in His beauty. We had seen the land which is very far off.'

Our beloved Master returned at noon to lunch with us and again at supper-time, and whenever He arrived many of the believers followed. They always knew just where He was day and night and seemed to surround Him by their watchful love; yet wholly unobtrusive, never approaching Him in public, always humble and submissive, waiting for His least command, seeking to render the humblest service. That evening He invited us all to meet Him on Sunday morning under the cedar trees on Mount Carmel where he had been in the habit of sitting with Bahá'u'lláh. We were all most happy in this hope, and great was my disappointment next morning when I found myself quite ill. As soon as the Master arrived for breakfast He came directly to my room and walking over my bedside took both my hands in His, passed His hands over my brow, and gazed upon me with such gentleness and mercy that I forgot everything but the love and goodness of God, and my whole soul was healed and comforted. I looked up into His face and said: 'I am well now, Mawlana.' But He smiled and shook His head and bade me remain there quietly, until He should return at noon. Although I had been suffering during the night, all pain and distress were gone, and I slept quietly. That night we were sitting together with some members of the Master's family; the room was dimly lighted by candles which cast strange shadows on the walls and low ceiling; the latticed windows opened on to the narrow street flooded with moonlight, and as we sat thus in silence waiting for our Master we heard His voice in the hall, and all arose to greet Him as He appeared on the threshold, and the light of His beautiful countenance was shed upon us.

On Sunday morning we awakened with the joy and hope of the meeting on Mount Carmel. The Master arrived quite early and after looking at me, touching my head and counting my pulse, still holding my hand He said to the believers present: 'There will be no meeting on Mount Carmel to-day. We shall meet elsewhere, Inshá'alláh, in a few days, but we could not go and leave one of the beloved of God alone and sick. We could none of us be happy unless all the beloved were happy.' We were astonished. That anything so important as this meeting in that blessed spot should be cancelled because one person was ill and could not go seemed incredible. It was so contrary to all ordinary habits of thought and action, so different from the life of the world where daily events and material circumstances are supreme in importance that it gave us a genuine shock of surprise, and in that shock the foundations of the old order began to totter and fall. The Master's words had opened wide the door of God's Kingdom and given us a vision of that infinite world whose only law is love. This was but one of many times that we saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá place above every other consideration the love and kindness, the sympathy and compassion due to every soul. Indeed, as we look back upon that blessed time spent in His presence we understand the the object of our pilgrimage was to learn for the first time on earth what love is to witness its light in every face, to feel its burning heat in every heart and to become ourselves enkindled with this divine flame from the Sun of Truth, the Essence of whose being is love. So on that Sunday morning He sat with us for a while and we thought no more of the meeting on Mount Carmel, for in the joy and infinite rest of His presence all else was swallowed up.

Next day, Monday, others of our party, who had been up the Nile, arrived, and later our Beloved told us that He would be obliged to go to 'Akká that day as important government matters made His immediate presence there indispensable. Then He told us all to be happy and cheerful for soon we should be in the home of our Heavenly Father, and He bade us be ready to leave for 'Akká on Wednesday morning at about 6 o'clock, and then bade each one a loving farewell. On Tuesday his daughters and my spiritual mother, Lua, arrived from 'Akká, and on that same afternoon we received visits from several cousins and other members of the holy family who lived in Haifa. On Tuesday night I told my spiritual mother that the Master did not realise how ill and weak I was or He would never have expected me to leave with the others on Wednesday morning. Oh! We of little faith! No wonder she smiled and shook her head, saying, 'You will soon realise something of the power of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.'

It was about dawn when I awoke, feeling myself stirred by a breeze. I cannot describe what followed, but through my soul was flowing an essence; a mighty, unseen force was penetrating all my being, expanding it with boundless life and love and happiness, lifting and enfolding me in its mighty strength and peace. I knew then it was the Holy Spirit of God and that our Lord was praying for His servants in that blessed dawn, and I arose and prayed and was quite well. At an early hour we all met and set out in carriages for the holy city and the merciful spirit of God never left us as we drove along the shore, drawing ever nearer to the early abode of Him who was the Glory of God, His bounty descending like rain upon our souls. Our hearts were too full for words and in reverent silence we gazed upon the walled city as it lay white and clear and beautiful in the still morning light, with the deep blue Mediterranean at its feet and the dome of the luminous sky above. We crossed two streams which flowed from the land into the sea, the horses wading up to their sides, and reached at last the stone gates of 'Akká, drove through the narrow, picturesque streets where the early-rising oriental world was up and stirring, and arrived at the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

We passed through a large stone doorway opening on to a square court and ascended a flight of steps which led to the apartments above. There, standing beside the window of a small room, overlooking the azure sea, we found our Beloved. We came to His feet and poured out our overwhelming love and thankfulness, while He laid His hands on our heads and spoke low and tenderly to His poor servants. The Greatest Holy Leaf now entered, with the Holy Mother and her daughters, they welcomed us with love and tears of joy as though we had been parted for a while but had returned at last to our heavenly home, as indeed we had! They took us to our rooms which, alas!, they had vacated for our sakes; they gave us every comfort, anticipated every need and surrounded us with care and attention; yet though it all shone the light of wonderful spirituality, through these kindly human channels their divine love was poured forth and their own lives, their own comfort, were as a handful of dust, they themselves were utterly sacrificed and forgotten in love and servitude to the divine threshold.

During the three wonderful days and nights we spent in that sacred spot we heard naught but the mention of God; His Holy Name was on every tongue; His beauty and goodness were in the theme of all conversation; His Glorious Cause the only aim on every life. Whenever we gathered together in one of the rooms they spoke unceasingly of the Blessed Perfection, relating incidents in the life of the Beloved, mentioning His words, telling of His deeds and passionate love and devotion to His followers until our hearts ached with love and longing. There were some women in the household who were clad all in white and we learned that they were the wives of martyrs, and we heard the tragic and glorious histories of many of our Persian brethren.

On the morning of our arrival, after we had refreshed ourselves, the Master summoned us all to Him in a long room overlooking the Mediterranean. He sat in silence gazing out of the window, then looking up He asked if all were present. Seeing that one of the believers was absent, He said, 'Where is Robert?' This was a coloured servant, whom one of the pilgrims in our party, in her generosity, had sent to 'Akká. In a moment Robert's radiant face appeared in the doorway and the Master rose to greet him, bidding him be seated, and said, 'Robert, your Lord loves you. God gave you a black skin, but a heart white as snow.'

Then our Master spoke and said:

'We can all serve in the Cause of God no matter what our occupation is. No occupation can prevent the soul coming to God. Peter was a fisherman, yet he accomplished most wonderful things; but the heart must be turned always towards God, no matter what the work is; this is the important thing: and then the power of God will work in us. We are like a piece of iron in the midst of the fire which becomes heated to such a degree that it partakes of the nature of the fire and gives out the same effect to all it touches — so is the soul that is always turned towards God, and filled with the spirit.'

One of the believers asked how we could cut our hearts from the world, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered:

'If your hearts are turned always towards God, and filled with the love of God, that love will separate them from all other things, that love will be the wall that will come between them and every other desire. You must all be joined one to another in heart and soul, then you will be prospered in your work and gain ever greater gifts, and the Cause of God will be spread through all the countries by your means. Remember what Christ said; you have taken the gifts of God without money and without price; so also you must freely give. This command shows too that all these gifts are sent to you by the free generosity of your God and not on account of any merit on your part, and you must rejoice greatly in the loving mercy of your God upon you and all. For all will taste of these free gifts before long.'

They will come from the East and from the West to the Kingdom of God; and even as Christ has foretold this also has come to pass, that some of those who are nearest are cut off, whilst those from a far distance receive these great gifts.'

We all met again at table for dinner, and as we sat down to our first meal in the holy household a great light shone upon us, and the Master said: 'Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God.' Then He told us that the prophecy of Christ was now fulfilled and that we should thank God unceasingly and with all our hearts for this great blessing which it was beyond our power at present to realise. He told us that the meal was composed of two parts, spiritual and material. That the material food was of no importance, and its effects only lasted twenty-four hours, but the spiritual food was the life of the soul, and that the effects of this meal which we were enjoying would last for ever and ever. During the dinner our Master talked to us and taught us, referring to Christ, quoting His utterances and prophecies, and always speaking with a clearness and simplicity which any child could comprehend; yet His symbols and metaphors, drawn always from nature, embodied that essence of wisdom and truth which baffles the learnt and great. Our Master always answered all questions, however trivial, with the utmost courtesy and respondent genially to every subject of conversation; yet we noticed that He gave the most commonplace subject a higher significance, and transformed material things into spiritual realities. For instance, if anyone mentioned that the food was delicious, He smiled lovingly on the speaker and said:

'That is because your heart is full of love; when the heart is filled with love everything seems beautiful and delightful to us.' Then He told us the story of the hermit; how once when the Blessed Perfection was travelling from one place to another with His followers He passed through a lonely country where, at some little distance from the highway, a hermit lived alone in a cave. He was a holy man, and having heard that Our Lord, Bahá'u'lláh, would pass that way, he watched eagerly for His approach. When the Manifestation arrived at that spot the hermit knelt down and kissed the dust before His feet, and said to Him: 'Oh, my Lord, I am a poor man living alone in a cave nearby; but henceforth I shall account myself the happiest of mortals if Thou wilt but come for a moment to my cave and bless it Thy Presence.' Then Bahá'u'lláh told the man that he would come, not for a moment but for three days, and He bade His followers cast their tents, and await His return. The poor man was so overcome with joy and gratitude that he was speechless, and led the way in humble silence to his lowly dwelling in a rock. There the Glorious one sat with him, talking to him, and teaching him, and toward evening the man bethought himself that he had nothing to offer his great Guest but some dry meat and some dark bread, and water from a spring nearby. Not knowing what to do he threw himself at the feet of his Lord and confessed his dilemma. Bahá'u'lláh comforted him and by a word bade him fetch the meat and bread and water; then the Lord of the universe partook of this frugal repast with joy and fragrance as though it had been a banquet, and during the three days of His visit they ate only of this food which seemed to the poor hermit the most delicious he had ever eaten. Bahá'u'lláh declared that He had never been more nobly entertained or received greater hospitality and love. 'This,' exclaimed the Master, when He had finished the story, 'shows us how little man requires when he is nourished by the sweetest of all foods — the love of God.' At the end of the dinner one of the Indian boys who served at table brought in a basket full of flowers sent by Abú'l-Qásim, the gardener of the Ridván. The Master received them with pleasure, and then held the fragrant bunches to His face, then gave one to each of the believers. Often He would hand to one of us, in passing, a bunch of blue hyacinths, these pure symbols of the hyacinths of wisdom and knowledge growing in the garden of El-'Abhá.

We had learnt that to be with 'Abdu'l-Bahá was all life, joy and blessedness. We were to learn also that His Presence is a purifying fire. The pilgrimage to the Holy City is naught but a crucible in which the souls are tried; where the gold is purified and the dross is consumed. It did not seem possible that anything but love could ever again animate our words and actions. Yet that very afternoon, in my room with two of the believers, I spoke against a brother in the truth, finding fault with him, and giving vent to the evil in my own heart by my words. While we were still sitting together our Master who had been visiting the poor and sick, returned, and immediately sent for my spiritual mother, Lua, who was with us. He told her that during His absence one of His servants had spoken unkindly of another, and that it grieved His heart that the believers should not love one another or that they should speak against any soul. Then He charged her not to speak of it but to pray. A little later we all went to supper, and my hard heart was unconscious of its error, until as my eyes sought the beloved face of my Master, I met His gaze, so full of gentleness and compassion that I was smitten to the heart. For in some marvellous way His eyes spoke to me; in that pure and perfect mirror I saw my wretched self and burst into tears. He took no notice of me for a while and everyone kindly continued with the supper while I sat in His dear Presence washing away some of my sins in tears. After a few moments He turned and smiled on me and spoke my name several times as though He were calling me to Him. In an instant such sweet happiness pervaded my soul, my heart was comforted with such infinite hope, that I knew He would cleanse me of all my sins.

Next morning we assembled as before to hear His words, and when we were all present He said:

'All the sufferings you pass through in gaining the Kingdom of God will be obliterated when you attain its perfect happiness. It is as a man who has been ill and helpless for two or three years and afterwards becomes well and strong, then all remembrance of his pain vanishes. The happiness of the Kingdom is a perfect one unlike the imperfection of our best earthly conditions and is never again to be clouded by any vestige of sorrow. Whatever troubles we have on our way to the Kingdom are a test to the soul. When man enters this world it is in troubles and hardships, but he comes from the invisible to the visible to gain great things for himself. As the material birth is a time of trouble, so also is the spiritual. The way to God is strewn with troubles and difficulties, but remember always what Christ said: "Though the body is weak the spirit is powerful." Many great men and women have desired, century after century, to live in this wonderful Age of God, and you ought to thank God with all your heart that you have been chosen to be here at this time. Christ said that the stone the builders rejected became the headstone of the corner. This means that the spiritually great men and women of the world have been rejected and despised in all times by the builders of the world; but that now in this, the time of the Kingdom, these spiritual ones will become the chief stones in the building. The wise man does not work for the present moment but for the good results of the future. See in the winter how bare and lifeless the trees and plants seem, without leaves and without fruit. Suppose one should pass by at this time who knew nothing of the condition of the earth and saw a man ploughing it up and casting grain in the furrow. Would he not say, "How foolish this man is. He is troubling himself for no result, working for no purpose and wasting that which would give him food"? But in due time the showers descend upon the earth, the sun shines, the breezes blow and we see the result in great beauty and production. So is the work of the Holy Spirit in your hearts. The earthly sun is like the Sun of Truth; the rain is the shower of the mercy of God; the seed is the word of God; the air is the fragrant waves of His Holy Spirit and the soil is the hearts of the people. Now the spiritual seeds are being scattered throughout the world and the showers of the mercy of God are falling on the hearts of the people. The result will be a great and wonderful harvest and every tree and branch and scrub will bear fruit, and you will see it.'

In a large hall where we dined, were hanging two parrots in cages, and these, besides all the sparrows that flew in at the windows, twittering in the rafters overhead, made a great noise, so the Master bade one of the Indian boys remove the cages; and then the conversation turned to the treatment of animals. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that we should be kind and merciful to every creature; that cruelty was sin and that human race should never injure any of God's creatures, but ought to be always careful to do nothing to diminish or exterminate any order of living thing; that human beings ought to use the animals, fishes and birds when necessary for food, or any just service, but never for pleasure or vanity and that it was most wrong and cruel to hunt.

Then Mrs. Thornburgh asked permission to tell a story of a little boy who had stolen a bird's nest full of eggs, and a lady meeting him on the road stopped him and rebuked him: 'Don't you know that it is very cruel to steal that nest? What will the poor mother bird do when she comes to the tree and finds her eggs all gone?' And the little boy looked up at the lady and said: 'Maybe that is the mother you have got on your hat.' How the Master laughed, and He said: 'That is a good story and a clever little boy.'

The above incident is only one of many showing with what a universal spirit of joyousness, sweetness and sympathy the Master touches on all the concerns of our daily life, so that I have never seen such happiness nor heard such laughter as at 'Akká. The Master seems to sound all the chords of our human nature and set them vibrating to heavenly music.

How wonderful to be able to see our beloved Master at any hour, to hear His divine voice, to lie down beneath the same roof which sheltered His blessed person! But indeed every hour spent in His presence has no place in time and no part in the life of this world. Those days are unfading, eternal. They were the goal for which all life before was but a preparation, and the source from which all life since has flowed. When, in the twilight, all in the household had gathered together, and spoke in quiet tones of the Blessed Perfection and our Master, suddenly the glorious light of His presence would shine upon us, and all would rise to meet Him as He entered; then He would sit silently in our midst, while His daughter Rúhâ chanted a Tablet, and there would be about Him such heavenly beauty, from His Blessed Being would emanate such supreme mildness, gentleness, and humility as wrung our hearts with shame and sorrow for our sins, yet lifted them on mighty wings of hope and aspiration. He always bade us all good-night, telling us to rest well in our Father's home and to dream beautiful dreams; and in the morning He would greet us early and enquire of each one concerning their spiritual health and happiness, showing the most loving solicitude for those who were not well.

On one occasion of the American believers said to their Holy Mother that she was now an orphan since her parents did not believe. The wife of our Master took the girl in her arms, laid her head on her breast and told her that she was now her mother; therefore she should be comforted. Then she took her into the presence of the Master and sitting on the floor before Him in the most natural manner, still holding the girl close to her loving heart, she told Him all. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: 'Material relationship is nothing, it bears no eternal fruits. You are the child of God and of the Kingdom and the ties of the flesh are nothing, but the ties of the spirit are all. I am your father, these are your brothers and sisters, and you must be glad and rejoice, for I love you exceedingly.'

On Friday morning the Master told us that we would, that day, visit the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. Accordingly, that afternoon, we all set out in carriages and drove through the narrow streets, out into the stone gates into the beautiful surrounding country in the direction of the Bahjí and the garden of Ridván. It was a beautiful day, the sky was blue and clear, the sun shone with eastern warmth and splendour, a light breeze stirred and the air was perfumed with roses.

After driving for about half an hour we reached the garden where Bahá'u'lláh spent much of His time during His long years of exile in 'Akká. Although this garden is small it is one of the loveliest spots we had ever seen. Bahá'u'lláh frequently said to His gardener, Abú'l-Qásim, 'This is the most beautiful garden in the world.' With its tall trees, its wealth of flowers, and its fountains, it lies like a peerless gem surrounded by two limpid streams of water just as it is described in the Qur'án; and the atmosphere which pervades it is so fraught with sacred memories, with divine significance, with heavenly peace and calm that one no longer marvels to hear of the traveller who, passing one day before its gates, paused and gazing in saw Bahá'u'lláh seated beneath the shade of the mulberry trees, 'that canopy not made with hands,' and remembering the prophecy in the Qur'án, he recognized his Lord and hastened to prostrate himself at His feet.

We visited the little house at the end of the garden and stood on the threshold of that room where Bahá'u'lláh was wont to sit in hot weather, and one by one we knelt down, and with tears of love and longing kissed the ground where His blessed feet had rested. We returned to the garden, where Abú'l-Qásim made tea for us, and there he told us the story of the locusts. How that during one hot summer there had been a pest of locusts and they had consumed most of the foliage in the surrounding country. One day Abú'l-Qásim saw a thick cloud coming swiftly towards the garden, and in a moment thousands of locusts were covering the tall trees beneath which Bahá'u'lláh so often sat. Abú'l-Qásim hastened to the house at the end of the garden and coming before his Lord besought Him saying: 'My Lord, the locusts have come, and are eating away the shade from above Thy blessed head. I beg of Thee to cause them to depart.' The Manifestation smiled, and said: 'The locusts must be fed; let them be.' Much chagrined, Abú'l-Qásim returned to the garden and for sometime watched the destructive work in silence; but presently, unable to bear it, he ventured to return again to Bahá'u'lláh and humbly entreat Him to send away the locusts. The Blessed perfection arose and went into the garden and stood beneath the trees covered with the insects. Then He said: 'Abú'l-Qásim does not want you; God protect you.' And lifting up the hem of His robe He shook it, and immediately all the locusts arose in a body and flew away.

When Abú'l-Qásim concluded this story he exclaimed with strong emotion as he touched his eyes: 'Oh, blessed are these eyes to have seen such things; oh, blessed are these ears to have heard such things.' In parting he gave us flowers, and seemed, like all the oriental believers, unable to do enough to show his love. We then entered once more our carriages, and still gazing back at that lovely spot, we drove towards the Holy Tomb.

'Abdu'l-Bahá met us opposite the group of buildings comprising the Bahjí, the terrace, the little tea-house and the Holy Tomb. When we alighted we found a group of more than one hundred oriental believers waiting for us. Knowing that we were among the first American pilgrims to that Holy Spot they had come from all directions to behold our faces, and their own shone with love and joy which amazed us, and which we can never forget. We mounted the steps leading to the terrace above and entered the tea-house, and there we found our Beloved seated by an open window. He arose to welcome us, and greeting us with infinite love, He bade us be seated and we and to partake of some tea which was being prepared on a little table by His faithful servant, 'Alí-Muḥammad. Then with a word of excuse He left us. He stepped out onto the terrace and with His hands clasped behind Him and gazing upward He walked to and fro. As not the least action or word of the Master's is without a purpose and a meaning, we soon saw that He was walking on the terrace so that all His servants might behold Him; and we saw our oriental brothers standing in a group on the grass below, perfectly motionless and silent, gazing in rapt love and devotion on the Blessed One. Who indeed could remove their gaze from His face, so luminous, so calm and so glorious! Never was our Beloved more beautiful than on that day, when we were about to enter with Him into the hallowed precincts of the Holy Tomb. As we gazed on Him, we could only love Him, follow Him, obey Him, and thereby draw nearer to His beauty. I understood that we could not fathom the mystery of His being; we could only hope to be engulfed therein.

By and by He came to the door of the tea-room, and the lightning of His glance fell on us and He said in a quiet, low tone: 'We are now going to visit the Holy Tomb. When you are praying in that divine spot remember the promise of Bahá'u'lláh, that those who attain this pilgrimage shall receive an answer to their prayers, and their wishes shall be granted.' He then bade us follow Him and descended the steps, followed by the American pilgrim, then all the other believers in a body behind us, and in this order, the Master walking a few yards in advance, we proceeded slowly towards the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. When we reached the outer door 'Abdu'l-Bahá removed His shoes and motioned us to do likewise. We followed Him through a passage-way into a square court with a glass roof, and in the centre a plot of earth were flowering bushes and mandarin trees were growing. As we entered, a door in the opposite corner opened and in the ladies of the holy family arrived, thickly veiled; they came forward and greeted us tenderly. At the further end of the court is a door at one side, and within is the Holy Tomb. As we gazed upon the veiled door our souls stirred within us as though seeking release, and had we not been upheld by the mercy of God we could not have endured the poignancy of joy and sorrow and love and yearning that shook the foundations of our beings. The Blessed Master was calm and radiant and led us to the open space at the end of the court beside the Tomb, where, in the mellow light of a stained glass window, we all stood in silence until he bade one of our group to sing The Holy City. No pen could describe the solemn beauty of that moment, as, in a broken voice, this young girl sang the praise and glory of God, while all were immersed in the ocean of the Divine Presence. The tears of the pilgrims flowed and strong men wept aloud. The 'Abdu'l-Bahá led us to the door of the Tomb where we knelt for a moment, then He opened the door and led us in. Those who have passed that threshold have been for a brief moment in the presence of God, their Creator, and no thoughts can follow them. The Tablet of the Holy Tomb was chanted by a young Persian, and when we left that blessed spot the oriental pilgrims entered slowly, until all had been within; then our Beloved closed the door, and after singing Never, My God, to Thee at His request, we quietly withdrew.

Outside we found the carriages waiting at a little distance, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá leaving us to follow slowly, walked to a slight rise in the rolling green fields before us and there stood against the soft background of the evening sky. Oh, most glorious form! Standing there in the gathering twilight with the sunset fading in mild tints from the western sky and the full moon rising above His divine head. We returned to our home in ‘Akká in the cool of the evening through that perfumed land which is forever blest and holy above all places, ‘the joy of the whole earth.’

From that time a greater peace descended upon us, and in the heavenly calm and beauty of that last night in ‘Akká, we were girded with strength for the future. We were to leave next morning for Haifa, and in the afternoon we would be again on the sea, every hour taking us further from the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When we awoke on Saturday morning it seemed like the full realization of this separation descended like a great darkness upon us, and we were utterly alone in the wide world, save only for Him. He called us to Him at an early hour, and as we gazed upon His merciful face we saw that He knew all and that He would uphold us and give us strength; that verily He was sufficient for the whole world. In the might and majesty of His presence our fear was turned to perfect faith, our weakness into strength, our sorrow into hope and ourselves forgotten in our love for Him. As we sat before Him waiting to hear His words, some of the believers wept bitterly. He asked them for His sake not to weep, nor would He talk to us or teach us until all tears were banished and we were quite calm. Then He said:

‘Pray that your hearts may be cut from yourselves and from the world, that you may be confirmed by the Holy Spirit and filled with the fire of the love of God. The nearer you are to the light, the further you are from the darkness; the nearer you are to heaven, the further you are from the earth; the nearer you are to God, the further you are from the world. You have come here among the first and your reward is great. There are two visits; the first is for a blessing; the ye come and are blessed and are sent forth to work in God’s vineyard; the second ye come with music and the banners flying, like soldiers, in gladness and triumph to receive your reward. If in times past those who have risen up and gone forth in the Cause of God have been helped and confirmed by His spirit, even to suffering death for Him, how much greater is the flood of life with which ye shall be flooded now! For this is the end and the full revelation, and I say unto you that anyone who will rise up in the Cause of God at this time shall be filled with the spirit of God, and that He will send His hosts from heaven to help you and that nothing shall be impossible to you if you have faith. And now I give you a commandment which shall be for a covenant between you and Me — that ye have faith be steadfast as a rock that no storms can move, that nothing can disturb, and that it endure through all things even to the end; even should ye hear that your Lord has been crucified, be not shaken in your faith; for I am with you always, whether living or dead, I am with you to the end. As ye have faith so shall your powers and blessings be. This is the balance—this is the balance.’

Then He arose and bade us follow Him. He led us into the next room, and there resting on a divan against the wall was the portrait of Bahá’u’lláh. We fell on our knees before it, and the tears that flowed were of pure love and adoration. We could have remained thus forever with our eyes fastened on that wonderful face, but the Master touched us on the shoulder, that we might see also the picture of His Highness the Báb. His was a beautiful young face, but I could not keep my eyes from the eyes of Bahá’u’lláh, until ‘Abdu’l-Bahá turned suddenly to us, and raising His voice in a tone so poignant that it pierced every heart, He stretched His hands above us and said:

‘Now the time has come when we must part, but the separation is only of our bodies, in spirit we are united. Ye are the lights which shall be diffused; ye are the waves of that sea which shall spread and overflow the world. Each wave is precious to Me and My nostrils shall be gladdened by our fragrance. Another commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another even as I love you. Great mercy and blessings are promised to the peoples of your land, but on one condition: that their hearts are filled with the fire of love, that they live in perfect kindness and harmony like one soul in different bodies. If they fail in this condition the great blessings will be deferred. Never forget this; look at one another with the eyes of perfection; look at Me, follow Me, be as I am; take no thought for yourselves or your lives, whether ye eat or whether we sleep, whether we are comfortable, whether we are well or ill, whether ye are with friends or foes, whether ye receive praise or blame; for all of these things we must care not at all. Look at Me and be as I am; ye must die to yourselves and to the world, so shall ye be born again and enter the Kingdom of Heaven. Behold a candle and how it gives its light. It weeps its life away drop by drop in order to give forth its flame of light.’

When He had finished speaking we were led gently away by the members of the Holy Family, and for a moment it seemed that we were dying; but our Master never removed His compassionate gaze from our faces, until we could see Him no longer, for our tears. Then we were clasped one after the other in the arms of the Holy Family, and the hearts were wrung, and it seemed as if all the cords of life were breaking; until, as we drove away from the home of our Heavenly Father, suddenly His spirit came to us, a great strength and tranquility filled our souls, the grief of the bodily separation was turned into the joy of spiritual union.

We had left our Beloved in His glorious prison that we might go forth and serve Him; that we might spread His Cause and deliver His Truth to the world; and already His words were fulfilled:

‘The time has come when we must part, but the separation is only of our bodies; in spirit we are united forever.’

Cairo, Egypt. April 4, 1899.

As I have written an account of my first visit to the Holy Household, and sent to Mr. James, which undoubtedly you have heard here this, I thought perhaps you might be interested in hearing the description of my last visit there, though to me it was heart-breaking in the extreme.

On the afternoon of March 26th, I said, “Goodbye to Dr. and Mrs. Kheiralla and Nabiha and Labila in Haifa. (for they were to leave the next day for Port Sa’id) and sat out for myself for ‘Akká, the gardens, ‘Abdu’l Hasin, who happened to be in Haifa being my sole companion in the carriage and he made the drive over very pleasant, by telling me in simple Persian, some of the tablets and words of the Manifestation.”

When we reached the city, our Lord and Seyyed Yahyá were standing near the gate, but we passed them without speaking, or noticing them apparently for there were many Turkish soldier standing about – and went directly to the house, where I was most cordially welcomed by the “Greatest Leaf” and went the daughter of our Master.

It was nearly dark – so we went to the apartment of the “Holy Leaf”, where we had tea and then sat talking, waiting for the “King” to come. At last a servant announced that he was coming, so the two youngest daughters and myself ran out in the court to meet Him. I reached Him first and knelt down before Him, kissing the hem of His robe. He therefore took my hand, and saying in Persian, “Daughter Welcome,” helped me to my feet, and keeping my hand, walked with me into the house, where I sat down beside Him while He drank some tea and asked me if I was well, “Happily and content.” To which I could only reply that to be in His presence was health, happiness and contentment itself, then He said, “I am sending you back to America that you may work to gain a place beside me in the Eternal Kingdom.”

Soon after this, dinner was served and our Master seated me beside Him – then His wife “The Greatest Holy Leaf” and His daughters made up the rest of the party while His son-in-law waited upon us. This meal was served according to the Arabic fashion – on a very low table, around which we sat on the floor upon cushions. Once during the meal our Lord took a piece of bread, and putting on it some honey, and handed it to me to eat, say as He did so: “Let all of your words be as sweetly flavoured as kindness to all people as this bread is flavoured by honey.” Then I swallowed mouthful from His blessed hand, I truly felt a great spiritual blessing. I have studied the language through sometimes, we had a good laugh over my queer accent especially on words containing the E & C. they never tire of hearing about the work in America and the four daughters are studying English diligently so they can speak to the pilgrims as they come to ‘Akká in the future: We retired about eleven o’clock and I was very happy indeed.

Next morning very early the Bábís in ‘Akká began to assemble at the home of the Lord, the ladies going to the room of the Holy Leaf, and the men remaining downstairs. The occasion of this gathering was on account of March 1st being New Year’s day. Our Lord came into the room and gave to everybody some sweets from His hands. After which Rooha Khánum, one of his daughters chanted a beautiful tablet. Then He arose and saying a few words of welcome, went to the room occupied by the men. There He gathered all of the children together and gave each of them a few coins – about ten or fifteen cents, which made them all delighted and very happy, of course because He gave it to them. After drinking tea and visiting a little while, they all went away. Then we had lunch and directly after, prepared to make my last visit to the Tomb of the Manifestation, I went in a closed carriage with Rooha Khánum, and upon our arrival we went to a small room where we remained hidden until all of the others had the visit with our Master and departed. Then, He came and told us to come out which we did – Immediately he led the way to the room where lies the precious casket which contained the most Brilliant Jewel that ever shown upon the earth – Bahá’u’lláh and there He lifted up His voice in supplication for me – (worm of the dust that I am. Oh! God my heart burns like fire and my tears flow like rain when I think of it:) asking that I should receive the confirmation of the Holy Spirit, and go forth to work in the Cause of God guiding souls to the Kingdom. What this day was to me no one can ever know; My work, my work, my deeds must tell in the future where whether or not He prayed for me in vain: I can only say I wanted to fall at His feet then and there, and give my heart, my soul, and my life for the dear and sacred mouth that had spoken in my behalf! I then prayed for our teacher who was the means of giving us the Truth in America foul felt that if I should live a thousand years I could never ask God to repay him for what he has done for me and for those I love in my dear native land. I can never do it. God can only pay my deep debt of gratitude by answering my supplications for welfare. As we turned away my eyes lingered lovingly upon the Sacred Place – and in my heart I could only feebly thank God for His great mercy and many blessings which I can never deserve, though I give y life for His sake by shedding my blood in His Cause – which I pray maybe my happy lot – when His will in me is done:

It was dark when we reached the house of the Master in ‘Akká, so we have dinner soon after. The Master was not present as He was obliged to go on business directly after our return to the House of one of the government officials, we had a pleasant evening in the apartment of the “Holy Leaf” rading the tablets, singing, visiting. After which we retired.

The next morning, March 22, Mr. Getsinger came and was welcomed by our Lord who kissed Him tenderly on both cheeks and bade Him sit beside him. He wrote many tablets, accordingly smiling king a words to him, asking after to give to the hungry souls who are seeking to know their God – “The Bread of Life” which is the Word of God and to shiw them how sweet is the “Water of Life” – which faith in God.

He talked about our journey, inquiring most carefully how long it would take, and telling us, when we reached Cairo that we should see Mírzá ‘Abdu’l Tazl and ‘Abdu’l Karim who would tell us some things we wished to know. (Mírzá ‘Abdu’l Tazl) is we find a most learned man, he knows the Bible by heart and is a great historian. He then told us that he wished us to be in America in six weeks after we left ‘Akká, so our stay in Cairo must be short. Arising and bidding us “Goodnight,” He went to sleep.

Thursday, March 23, our last day at the Holy Household was a beautiful day. Early in the morning Rooha Khánúm called me and arising hastily, I went with her to the room of the “Greatest Holy Leaf” where the Master was sitting, He bade me welcome and entered and I knelt before Him, kissing His hand, and then sat down at His feet beside the “Holy Leaf,” and we drank tea together. As I looked at Him and thought, “I must leave Him today” the tears came to my eyes and my heart was very heavy, though I tried hard to conceal my feelings, He noticed it and said “Do not cry – be happy I will go with you in spirit – the separation of the body is nothing, I will go with you.” I dried my eyes and went with Him to the room where He writes, and with Rooha Khánúm sat down while He began His work for the day. He took up Mr. Chasis picture which was on the divan beside Him also one of Mr. Clark’s and one of Mr. Struven. (the two last names were pupils of mine in Ithaca) and looking at them, kissed first one and then the other, then turned and said; “You must tell them that I kissed their pictures and am glad to have them, that they are my sons and my heart longs to see them so I may kiss them.”

Soon after he called Mr. Getsinger into the room and gave him a bottle containing juice of pomegranate; also to each of us a small bottle of the oil of roses, shortly before noon He went out and we went out and we watched Him as He walked through the court for we wanted to see Him as much as possible. After a little while He returned and sat down to luncheon with us, one on each side of Him. We could scarcely swallow for we well knew that it was our last meal with Him, and the thought of parting was breaking pur hearts. As we left the table a servant said, “The carriage is ready,” so then came the “Goodbyes” which were painful to the extreme though everybody was trying hard to be brave – but it was impossible we all cried – and when we went to our Lord I was faint and sick. He came quickly from the room, and taking me by the hand, led me down one flight of stairs and I pressed His hand to my lips, while He turned away and silently kissed Mr. Getsinger – then left us hastily. When I reached the court below it seemed that the sun grew dark for I realized that I would not see Him anymore, the pain of it was awful.

We rode in silence back to Haifa and very soon went on board the steamer.
From the deck, we watched ‘Akká fade away out of sight and then I knew

To the Assembly in Chicago, Greeting!

We reached Haifa Thursday, December 8th 1898, about 10:30 p.m. and was met by Dr. E. and two or three Bábís. They all welcomed us heartily and conducted us to coffee house where we were served with refreshments. An old man was there waiting for us and he, as I was afterwards informed, is the uncle of the Greatest Branch, and was sent by the latter to welcome us. Never have I seen a face more full of love and kindness. He saluted us and countenance beamed with pleasure while he expressed himself as being so thankful upon our safe arrival. After drinking some tea, we went from this place to our hotel, several of the of the believers walking. The streets are very narrow and dark, so a man, the hotel keeper, walk ahead of us with a lantern to light the way. Our friends remained conversing with us at the hotel until after midnight, excepting the old gentleman, who did not accompany us, as it was late and he desired to leave early the next morning for ‘Akká to report our arrival to the Greatest Branch – our Master!

We slept but little that night; our minds were occupied with the thoughts that perhaps tomorrow we shall see Him and kiss the hem of the blessed garment of our Lord. We arose early the next morning, our hearts eagerly expectant, but all day no word came.

In the evening we were invited to the house of Housyn Effendi (one of the Believers living in ‘Akká), and upon our arrival he met us at the door, welcomed us, saying he was the bearer of the good news to us. He had received a letter from ‘Abbás Effendi that day stating that He would be pleased to welcome us on the morrow and that His “heart longed to see the first American pilgrims.” We went back to our hotel after spending a most delightful evening, our host and hostess taking great pains to make us happy, showing us every kindness and hospitality, often remarking that we must not consider ourselves guests, for their house was ours and everything they had at our disposal.

As you may imagine, sleep was out of the question that night. My husband and I were talking all the time and congratulating ourselves on our great blessings and good fortune and counting the hours, which passed much too slowly, until the [?] of the marrow should come. We arose early, dressed ourselves with much care, feeling the best we had was not good enough to wear upon this our first visit to the Holy City, and shortly after eight o'clock, the carriage drove in and Dr. K. and his daughter, my husband and myself started for the place of all places, the Now Jerusalem, the Holy Abode of the Most High and the Dwelling Place of our Gracious Lord.

It is about five miles from Haifa to 'Akká, the road close to the sea – indeed in the sea, for the horses were walking in the water and at times the waves dashed nearly to the top of the wheels. After riding for about a quarter of an hour we could see the city in the distance. It was a beautiful morning and as we looked we could but think of the description on in the Bible, “a city all of gold beside the crystal sun.” It was bathed in flood of golden sunshine and the sea splashing up against its walls sparkled with splendor! We gradually approached nearer and nearer until t last we passed “the shed which serves as a coffee house outside the wall,” and entered the city by its solitary gate and drove straight to the house of 'Abbás Effendi. We entered the garden, ascended one flight of stairs, and were shown into a hall, or reception room, where we removed our wraps, and were welcomed by the uncle who told us to pass into the next room. Dr. K. went ahead, and by the violent beating of my heart, I knew we were soon to behold the Blesses Face of the Prince of the House of David, the King of the whole world. We reached the door and stopped – before us, in the center of the room, stood a man clad in a long raiment, with a white turban upon His head' stretching out one hand to us, while His face, which I cannot describe, was lighted by a rare, sweet smile of joy and welcome! We stood thus for a moment, unable to move, then my heart gave a great throb, and scarcely knowing what I was doing, I held out my arms, crying, “My Lord, My Lord” and rushed to Him, kneeling at His blessed feet, sobbing like a child. In an instant, my husband was beside me, crying as only men can cry! He put His dear hands upon our bowed heads and said, in a voice that seemed to our ears like a strain of sweet music, “Welcome, welcome, my dear children, you are welcome; arise and be of good cheer.” Then He sat down upon a low divan and we sat on the side almost facing Him, Dr. K. and his daughter on the other side, and He began to talk to us. To my husband, He said that he would prosper in his scientific work and God would bless him and enable him to do good in many directions; and as the vibrations of light emanating from the sun magnetize the earth, _____ Word of God magnetize the hearts and draw them from the west to mingle in love with the hearts in the east. He remained with us but a few moments (as His time is so fully occupied), when He arose, and again bidding us welcome, went into another room where He writes and meets those who come to him for help and counsel.

We were then taken into another room where we met the Greatest Holy Leaf (the Master's sister) and many other ladies. They welcomed us very graciously, the Holy Leaf taking Dr. K's daughter and myself in her arms kissing us very tenderly on both cheeks. Then they made tea for us and showed us great kindness. We remained conversing with them until noon; then she took us by the hand and led us to the table, seating one on each side of her and serving us most bountifully with many varieties of food, which were very good indeed. After dinner we were served with coffee, the fragrance and flavour of which was most delicious. Then a servant brought us some sweet meats from the Greatest Branch and such a generous supply that I am going to bring them home that you may all taste.

In the afternoon they read Tablets aloud, and told us many interesting things connected with the early history of the Bábís. So swiftly did the time pass that we were quite astonished when dinner was announced. They served a special meal for us, as they eat much later than we do, but so anxious was I to see my Lord again that I begged He would at least come into the room with us. _____ and sat at the table, seating me on His right and my husband on His left. I felt too happy to eat and eat with my eyes riveted upon His glorious face. He turned toward me and sweetly smiling said, "The love of God burning in your heart is manifest upon your face and it gives us joy to look upon you." I then called His attention to St. Luke, 14th chapter and 15th verse, "Blessed is he who shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God." He thereupon took up the loaf and broke it and gave each one of us a piece of the same. I have kept mine and am also going to bring it that you may see it. After the meal was over He left us and went out, as He had something to attend to, and did not return until about 11 o'clock. Then He came into the room where we were sitting (all of us rising as he entered and bowing low before Him) and sat down and began talking to us in a low soft musical voice. My husband asked permission to sit nearer to him, which He granted and sat him down at His right; I longed intensely to go nearer, but said nothing. After a moment He turned toward me, smiled and waved His hand that I also might come. I sat down at His blessed feet, while He took my hand, and looking down upon me tenderly as a loving father, He sat and conversed with us for nearly an hour. Then He arose, bade us good night, blessing us, and we all retired. I couldn't sleep my heart was so full. I was too infinitely happy. I could only live over and over again the precious moments I had spent in His presence and long to see Him once more. I fell into a sweet sleep just as morn was breaking, after which I awoke, feeling greatly refreshed, and arose, dressing myself, impatient to be among my friends and the holy people, for I felt each moment with them to be a great blessing indeed, and every word falling from their lips to be a precious gem. Miss K. and I went to the apartment of the Greatest Leaf, who kissed us and inquired if we had rested well. Then a servant brought us some rice fruit and each a beautiful bouquet of flowers from the Greatest Branch who had sent her to ask if we were well and comfortable.

During the day we were conducted to the special garden of the Manifestation, the one described in the prophecies thus; "The place of my throne is part on the water and part on the land, under a green tent that has neither ropes nor center pole to sustain it." And it is literally so, for this garden is in a small island, a river on each side of it, and there are two places built upon which the Manifestation used to sit, one in the east and one in the west of the garden, and these places are built in such a way that they are “part on the water and part on the land”; then two large trees, one in each end of the garden, their branches meeting in the center, form the green tent most perfectly. In this most beautiful spot we sat down upon the seats before His Throne, and were served with tea by those who accompanied us thither; also the gardener brought us fruits and flowers from the “Garden of our Glorious God” and they were delicious. In one part of this place is a small cottage where the Manifestations used sometimes to stay, and we were permitted to enter this also, to go into the room which He always occupied, kneel before the chair upon which He sat, and to kiss the place upon which the soles of His feet rested! The spiritual atmosphere of this place was overwhelming; our tears fell like rain over our faces, and some of the Believers with us cried aloud. Indeed, to enter this room is a great blessing. I have felt nearer to God since that day! On the chair was a wreath of flowers, and some beautiful cut roses placed there by Greatest Branch, who commanded that they should be given to us (my husband, Dr. K., his daughter and myself); also four large oranges, which were on a table opposite as we left that most sacred place.

From here we were taken to the tomb of the Manifestation, and you must me if I do not enter into detail about this – I cannot find words to express myself. Suffice it to say that the Greatest Branch let me walk in His footsteps and led me by the hand into this sacred place, where I knelt down and begged God’s blessing to be showered upon you. I will try to tell you more when I see you, but I cannot write it. After this visit we walked in the garden and our Lord, with His own blessed hands, picked flowers and leaves which He gave us to take to the faithful Believers in America.

That night he sat us all at the table and dismissed the servants, saying He would serve us Himself and He did so. He did not sit at the table with us, but waited upon us. At the conclusion of the meal He said, “I have served you tonight, that you may learn the lesson of ever serving your fellow creatures with love and kindness.” He bade us goodnight and advised us all to rest early, so we went to bed and this night I had a long delicious sleep and rest.

The next morning He brought me a beautiful bunch of white narcissus and allowed me to kiss His blessed hand as He gave them to me! He sat down and drank tea with us, then arose and bade us adieu, as we were going back to Haifa that day and He had been called away. As we were quitting the city we saw Him standing by the gate and He smiled at us as we passed. Then we turned by the road in the sea to Haifa, our hearts both happy and sorrowful, happy because we had seen Him and sorrowful because we were leaving Him.

O dear people, make firm your faith and belief for truly He is our Lord! It seems to me that no one could doubt should He smile upon them, and no one could turn from Him should He seek to confirm them. But this He will not do, as God has declared that each must seek to confirm himself and gave to each of us the power of will for that purpose. I feel that these words are very weak and inadequate, but I assure you no one could describe this place and ‘tis foolish to try – to know each must see for himself. Therefore, pray God earnestly that the blessing of coming here may soon be bestowed. There is no other places in the world worth seeing, and surely no other King is worthy of homage.

And now I send you all my love and pray God to bless you all now and forever. May your hearts all be united, and your souls become as one soul living in separate bodies. Thus you will resemble our Lord, and draw nearer unto God, the loving Father of all of us!

Your loving sister and co-worker in the Cause,

Lua Moore Getsinger.

My Visit to ‘Abbás-Effendi

1898

Account

Spread of the Faith

Less than a decade ago there were not a hundred English-speaking people who were followers of the Báb. At that time a few Persians and other Orientals, with a sprinkling of Europeans, formed the sum total of the believers; today they are innumerable and are found all over the earth as followers of ‘Abbás-Effendi.

“Who is ‘Abbás-Effendi?” asks the reader, and occasionally one who knows will say: “He is the Head of the ‘New Religion’ that is creeping over the world as silently and surely as the daylight that follows dawn. He is the descendant of a noble Persian family; his influence and teachings extend over the globe from north to south, and from east to west.”

A book appeared a few years ago, edited and prefaced by Professor Edward G. Browne of Cambridge University, (Professor Browne occupies the chair of Persian literature and language) who having heard of the “New Religion,” went to Persia to see for himself what the basis for it might be. Here, he was directed to ‘Abbás-Effendi, and the year following, met him and obtained from him much information for the book referred to, which bears the name of “A Traveler’s Narrative.” ‘Abbás-Effendi thus introduced to the English-speaking people of the world, is today known and loved by a large following of believers. He is a prisoner of the Sultán of Turkey and cannot go beyond the precincts of Syria. His home is in the renowned City of ‘Akká on the shores of the Mediterranean; here he lives in seclusion and simplicity.

Journey and Decision to Visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

On the last day of the year 1898 the writer sailed from New York on board the “Aller” bound for the Orient by way of Gibraltar; it was not for pleasure, nor health, nor sight-seeing that the journey was undertaken, but in the pursuit of a certain knowledge which necessitated the coming in contact with all forms of belief. It was to learn some of the peculiar mystic phases of the East and the practical knowledge said to be understood and practiced there; also to become acquainted with the customs of those ancient sects which seem to have come down from remote ages.

“Be sure and go to ‘Akká; see if there be a genuine ‘Abbás-Effendi and bring us a reliable report from an American standpoint;” was the parting request of a friend. The smile in reply would have shown to the most casual observer that there was no thought or intention of doing anything of the kind. Indeed at that moment there was less interest in that subject than in any other. I had read “A Traveler’s Narrative” with the desire to know the history of the movement, but without a particle of sympathy or living interest in the Bahá’í teachings. I had met some of its representatives in my own country and instead of being impressed by them, had sensed somewhat of an aversion as a result.

During the following ten days of our journey, the subject recurred again and again to my mind and gradually there was a change of mental attitude; indifference gave place to curiosity; curiosity ended in interest; the impossible grew into the possible and possible became probable, until, by the time we reached Gibraltar, I had made a change of route that took in ‘Akká and ‘Abbás-Effendi. Arriving in Egypt, I wrote a letter to a friend in America, asking for letters of introduction to those in Cairo who could help me in meeting some of the leading Bahá'ís. After three weeks' trip up the Nile, I returned to Cairo and found the desired letters; to them I owe my visit to 'Abbás-Effendi. Here in Cairo I met one known as the "Learned Arabian" who gave me in two or three hours all the facts connected with the Bahá'í movement and also insured me an interview with "The Center Head in 'Akká."

(Only because so little has been written from an outside standpoint, has it seemed necessary for me to write this account.)

It was not until Baalbec had been visited and Damascus enjoyed that the preparations for the tenting trip to 'Akká were made. At Beruit, a famous leader of the Bahá'ís visited me; his presence affected me even more deeply than that of the "Learned Arabian."

Approaching 'Akká

We left Beruit on the ninth of March and rode by the shores of the Mediterranean Sea, camping in tents at night, passing the old cities of Tyre and Sidon; also solitary Mount Carmel and the plains that lie between Beruit and 'Akká; the following Sunday we approached the ancient city we sought. As we drew near to it the marvelous history of 'Akká began to unroll itself before our minds and this strange fact dawned upon us, that from prehistoric times this city had been chosen as a place of conflict; was it perchance a part of the divine plan that the faith of Christendom was here to be decided? Could there have been any ground for their claim in those days? Could a belief have taken hold of the people at that time (as this has done) and spreading throughout all countries necessarily have met with strong opposition and proved a matter of greater importance than the world now dreams? Far back in remote antiquity we find this sea port called Acre, and beyond that, we know nothing. Then we see Ptolemy coming up from Egypt to take it, adding it to his possessions as Ptolemais; a city of grandeur and magnificence - very desirable to be possessed. Some of the pillars and monuments of that time still exist as proof that history is true. Then the Saracens, made mad with the thought that a foreign power held this gate to the sea, resolved to conquer and retake it and became its rulers. The Saracens held it until the beginning of the twelfth century, when they were driven out by the crusaders of England and France under Richard and Philip, who, with their burning zeal to rescue the sacred land from the unbelievers, sacrificed scores of men to the conquest.

Brittanica gives little significance to the city of 'Akká, although it was the scene of some of the most notable events in history; of battles in which an hundred thousand men were destroyed in one single encounter. To go to the plains around 'Akká now, after the passing of centuries, we are told that to dig with our fingers an inch or two beneath the surface of the ground we find human bones. The land is literally covered with human bones - giving a reality to the fact, that in that period, human lives were considered as nothing compared with religious ideas. From this time on the city was called St. Jean de Acre and was held by these believers for a century.

We can imagine that a century of foreign rule how the spirit of the East grew more and more rebellious until they arose and fought for their land and conquered. Here began its decline and from that day to this it has been a scene of alternating rule. Even Napoleon could not resist the desire to subjugate and possess 'Akká and after sixty days' siege, was compelled to give it up.

During this time of soliloquy we had been approaching this wonderful city and the afternoon sun was nearing the horizon, when we caught our first clear view of 'Akká. At the left was an imposing group of white buildings, more palatial than any we had seen in Syria, surrounded with great walls and gardens shaded with beautiful trees; to the right lay the walled city of 'Akká with its residences and orange groves in the outskirts. Something seemed to say, "This is the place where Bahá'u'lláh lived," and so it proved, but it was closed. The present Head resides in a pasha's house in the city. At four o'clock our tents were pitched outside the walls and a messenger was sent to ask if 'Abbás-Effendi would receive those not of his faith.

First Meeting With 'Abdu'l-Bahá

We had not long to wait, perhaps half an hour, but it was a time of great suspense. Had we known what we now know, letters would have been sent from Egypt, making an appointment before our arrival. The messenger returned with the answer that an audience would be given us that evening at eight o'clock.

Only in the Orient could it be understood or realized what that meeting meant.

The night was most dark; we were accompanied by our own guide and interpreter, a soldier and a man carrying a lantern; and as we threaded our way along narrow streets, groups of men watching us were standing under arches that opened into a court-yard, where there were many other soldiers. All saluted us as we passed them to gain access to a long flight of stairs built on the outside of the house. We felt that this wonderful night would ever be a memorable one in our lives.

"You cannot enter" said one of these soldiers to our faithful dragoman [professional interpreter] who had never yet left us since entering our service.

"Then I will stand by the door" was his meek reply, as he followed us up the long flight of stairs to the door of the audience room.

The door which opened to admit us into the presence of the man, who is today one of the marked figures of the world, disclosed a long bare room, scantily furnished. On entering the room visitors from America were seated near the door, together with ladies and soldiers, converts from the Muḥammadan to the Christian faith. From the other side of this long room, we saw a figure rise and advance to meet us. The motion was almost like gliding, so smooth was it, and as he drew nearer, we noticed the mouse-colored gown he wore with a turban to match, and there stood before us One who was the personification of all gentleness and meekness, and yet a sublime dignity rested upon him which we had never seen in others of the same faith, unusual in type as they were. He approached with extended hands, as if meeting friends and followers and then led us to seats at the upper end of the long room, motioning us to sit at his right hand. He ordered tea, which was served by a gentleman placing tiny round tables before each one and proceeded to give us the fragrant cup of tea. So far as we could notice not a glance had been directed toward us, though the visitors from America, knowing me to be a non-believer, watched with keen interest this kindly courtesy ‘Abbás-Effendi extended me. We had come prepared to hear the history of the Báb who was the forerunner of the Great Manifestation; the sufferings of the martyrs; of his long imprisonment, also that of his father’s before him; but to our great astonishment he began to speak of the “Grand Architect of the Universe, about the Laws of Creation and Preservation,” and for the first time, he looked up as a question was asked, answering it by still adhering to the same line of thought. I could find no question to ask on the most important subject of all; its place in history and the fulfillment of prophecy. Our knowledge was absolutely nothing; how we did ransack our memories for some hint from Prof. Browne’s book to help us out of our dilemma, but none came, and, as if in response to this state of our minds, he avoided altogether any allusion to his own work or the significance of His Father’s Manifestation.

Looking down the room while we were sipping our tea, what was our surprise to see our dragoman, Joseph, demurely sitting inside near the door with a countenance as unreadable as a sphinx. ‘Abbás-Effendi also noticing him, motioned to him to come up nearer, and placed him at his left, saying in Arabic, that he would be glad to have him act as assistant interpreter. A cup of tea was also brought to Joseph. The conversation continued upon the plan of the Divine Being, who from the beginning, when the stars were sent forth into their places, till the present time, never changed a detail of what was in His plan. Worlds, empires, men and angels all had their station, which had been theirs from the ideal, first formed in the Mind of God. There had been no mistakes; there had been no retrogression. It was when ages had rolled by that man could see what had been accomplished and know that there was no possibility of frustrating even the smallest fraction of the Law. The great nations of the past had done the little part that was their work to do and the figure they completed in the tapestry of Life could never have been accomplished by any other peoples.

So long as the world was under the Law of the Mineral, it could not know God except as it saw Him in the face of stone, but, as centuries and eons passed, there awoke in the creature, man, a feeling that he had some relation to this Being, who was holding in His hand the sun, moon and stars; nay even more than all, the thinking creature who was the king of His creatures. It was then that the first Manifestation of God (of record) was seen in the Moses of the mountain, and the Law received from the Burning Bush. Then came the Prophets, with the inspiration of the Spirit, telling what was to come in the “latter days.” There remained much that could not be explained even after Jesus the Christ had come, and had been the fulfillment of a great deal which was ended by His work. With every new Revelation there has come a clearer meaning of man's relation to the First Cause until the time grew near when the dark places would be made Light, and the unknown understood.

When the rim of a new moon comes into view, if we had never seen it before, we would think it could be no greater, but night after night it grows from the crescent to the gibbous, and from that to the full moon, so also the Light of Truth had come by degrees, and when the fullness of the whole could be seen, it would be the same Light that had shown in the crescent, in the gibbous, and in the full moon, but differing only in degree.

At ten o'clock we rose to take our leave, and while thanking our host for his kindness in granting us so lengthy an interview, he said in that soft, but commanding voice, which no one would think of resisting, "I shall be glad to see you again tomorrow morning at nine o'clock."

Could we be dreaming? Were we to be so favored as to have another interview? Going forth into the darkness, to be escorted back to our tents, we felt a great interest awaken in this wonderful personality, so meek, yet so majestic; commanding, and yet so humble.

Leaving 'Abdu'l-Bahá

When retracing our steps through the same arches and courts as before, we found the soldiers of the Sultán, sitting on the walls over-looking our tents, evidently watching our movements. They were playing on the instruments of their country, soft, sensuous, dreamy music, that seemed to belong to the lonely, lovely night, to the quaint place and our new experiences. The skies of Syria are very blue; the stars seem very near; poetry breathes in every breeze; and when we finally entered our tents and closed the door, we seated ourselves on our beds and gave a sigh of delight, perhaps one of religious longing and fervor. "Do you know E—" I said at last, "I am surprised and very much impressed; who ever could think that 'Abbás-Effendi would be like that? Think of it! We have talked fully two hours and he never once spoke of those things one would expect to be uppermost in his mind. Where could we find, in the length and breadth of America, a man devoted to one pursuit and when meeting a stranger, would talk for hours and make no mention of it? He did not even ask whether or not the Movement was progressing in our own land; he made no inquiry as to the teacher who had first brought it into notice there; most astonishing of all is the fact that he did not try to tell us of how superior it was to all other Religions, nor did he speak of his Father, the Great Manifestation or of himself as his Father's representative. One cannot but marvel at the greatness of his universal knowledge; the meekness of his character; the majesty of his humility."

Going to meet him in the morning, my friend, thinking it would be a fine opportunity to take views of the palace of the Great Manifestation, took an attendant with her on horseback and started for the palace, planning to meet me later at the room where we had met ‘Abbás-Effendi in our first interview.

Second Meeting With ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

He had not yet appeared, but we found our friends and some of the ladies we had seen the night before and while we were talking together ‘Abbás-Effendi approached towards us. In a moment, every sound was hushed, as if in the presence of some divine person. He held in his hand three stalks of heliotrope-colored stock-gilly flowers, two of which he presented to me, keeping the third in his hand while he led me up to the same seat he had given me the previous evening.

“I should like to begin with the last question you asked me,” he said as soon as we were seated. “I should have answered it a little more fully.” He began at that point, continuing as he had in our first conversation until it was twelve o’clock. Then my friend came in, and he handed her the other flower. He bade us adieu, and gave to each a precious message that must linger in our memory so long as life lasts. This was the culmination of our search after this new sect scarcely known in our own country and yet is believed by many to have come as the sign of the full moon, of which nothing can be greater; a summing up of those who are the Avatars of the race; the blessings to mankind. We felt that we had seen the greatest that could be known on the earth at this time, and though we might not believe every claim their followers set forth, we surely had been blessed in the privilege of meeting him. We went to Jerico, to Jerusalem and the places connected with the earth life of Jesus Christ, and but little moment of thought was given to that scene which we left in ‘Akká. It was only, when on the deck of the steamer, sailing to Marseilles, that we again took up the thread of the Bahá’í doctrine. We read “The Life of ‘Abbás-Effendi” (a recent work by Mr. Phelps of New York) which impresses the reader with the daily life of this man, who has a place in the religious history of this new cycle.

After-Effects of the Visit

From the day I met him in ‘Akká he has steadily grown in my mind as one who in the race is a figure-head of religious progress. A correspondence with him has extended over a period of seven years; the truth of his claims and teachings has a foundation which cannot be overthrown by the mere opinion of man. If it were a creed upon which the Bahá’í Revelation rested, then it might fail, but it is “living the life;” it is the maturity of the Christ-life that was begun in Nazareth two thousand years ago. It has come when all nations are looking for the appearing of One who was prophesied to come; it has come in the east, and in spite of torture to its followers the Light had spread to the west with a rapidity that has never been equaled.

It cannot be a matter of indifference to any soul who thinks of the spiritual trend of events, who reads the history of the past, who knows that the race has not yet reached its maturity, to ask the meaning of the movement that today has spread to every country, without noise of the press, or methods of propaganda, or the fame of great works, but simply by the life of its members and more than all, by the life of ‘Abbás Effendi, who has taken the station of the “Centre of the Covenant” (‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the servant of God).

There surely was nothing in the bare room in which this Centre received us, nor in any attempt to exhibit healing or miraculous powers to prove the truth of his position. He did not even mention the Great Manifestation, whom he represented, in whom his hopes and adoration are centered, but with the simplest words, he expounded the revelation of God in nature and in man, from a wonderfully impersonal standpoint.

Did he not wish us to believe in that which to him was of the greatest importance in the world, and for which thousands have died by the most cruel tortures? Was it a matter of indifference whether we took back to America from an outsider’s standpoint a testimony of this truth that the Avatar, for the twentieth century, in reality, had come to fulfill the prophecies never yet fulfilled? With the calmness of one who can afford to await the results, and with the humility of one who knows his station in the work, both in this world and in that invisible one (the Cause-world), he made no effort to convince or to affect his hearers. All this, however, did not come at once to my mind, but has been the outgrowth of the years that have intervened between that day in ‘Akká and this in which I am writing these impressions which have been solicited. When thinking of the generous amount of time he had given me, I felt I must write a letter expressing thanks and my appreciation, and on the way from Alexandria to Marseilles I did so; then dismissed the subject from my mind. I had taken care of the flower he had given me and pressed it, bringing it to those who would value and cherish anything that had touched his hands. On my return to New York, many of the Bahá’ís called to know of the impression made by my visit, but I could only say that it was impossible to formulate into words the effect upon me, for I had gone there unprepared for anything, except to make a report to my dear friend that I had found ‘Abbás-Effendi at ‘Akká, a most humble and great man, great in his universality and perfect in humility. One day, a most exquisite letter written in Persian, with a translation into English, came to me and I felt as never before when reading those words which vibrated through me as would music from the chords of a grand organ, nor could I understand the power that could cross the seas and oceans, and give me a sense of such nearness and spiritual longing. From that time to the present moment, ‘Abbás-Effendi, or “‘Abdu’l-Bahá” has been to me an ever growing mystery, his letters have been filled with a spirit so great and holy that its equal cannot be found unless it be in the epistles of the New Testament. Only now can I analyze that feeling which has taken so deep a root in my heart and soul.

In ‘Akká, on the shores of the Mediterranean, dwells a man who is the center of thought of all the lands, whom the noblemen, the great, the wealthy, rejoice to meet even for one day. He is a comforter to the poor and unfortunate and a healer to the sick.

His home is a prison, where He has been placed on account of His dreaded influence upon the people of that land. He has the freedom of the city and through the goodness of God, the Sultán of Turkey has now given Him permission to visit the holy resting-place of His Father, just outside the city of 'Akká. He spends much time in writing tablets to His followers and in preparing, for future circulation, the wonderful utterances of His Father. He never allows Himself the barest comforts that the ordinary working man of America would think a necessity. He will not own two garments, for He gives daily to the poor, often sharing His meal and that of His family with some hungry man, woman or family. He sleeps but little and is up at all hours writing, praying or instructing a devoted one who may be leaving for some foreign country. He never speaks or thinks of Himself, the one thought and aim of His life is to do the work that He has come to perform. The best exponents of this Revelation are met in the land where they have been called to suffer martyrdom for their faith.

“Do you believe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the one who is to fulfill the second coming of the Christ?” say many who ask me of Him, and I reply. “He has frequently Written in His letters to me of the Christ, expressing more love and with greater reverence than we, who have been followers of Jesus for generations, and ‘Abbás-Effendi makes no such claims for Himself.”

Since the first history of man was given in the Bible, there has not failed to come an Avatar at the beginning of every two-thousand year cycle, and for many a decade it has been predicted that another cyclic change has come and that the next zodiacal representative is prophesied to appear now at this time. The coming of an Avatar has not been looked for in one land only, but in all lands; among the prophets of the western Indians, as well as in those lands where the main object of life is to study deeply the prophecies of all the different sacred books. Everywhere, in the predictions of all the sacred books, the time has been set as the present for this Great Appearance.

You ask if this be true, how and by what signs are we to know Him when He comes? Could wealth and magnificence be the outward symbol of the Manifestation of God? There has been in the past, the wealth of the Indies, of Croesus, and nothing is left to prove their divinity. Would it be by the gift of healing?

The great Physician was the healer of body and soul. Could it be by prophetic gifts and by miracles? No one of these signs have ever proved divinity. Must it not be then by the fulfillment of prophecy, something different from the ordinary, and yet having the same relation to the former dispensations, as, for instance, that which the full moon has to the slender rim of the crescent?

Were there no telegraph today as in those days when Jesus walked through Galilee, and no press to spread the tidings of every occurrence in the countries of this earth, we should never have known of this Manifestation and it would now be as then, that it must spread from one to an other, by word of mouth, until the world would know the gladness of this day.

I went there to please a friend; I knew nothing about this Truth which has now permeated my being to an extent that is astonishing. Having seen the failure of creeds to make lives beautiful and practical, I admit that the creed of this, the new, blossoming from the old-time Christianity, was unimportant to me.

The pleasure of telling this story, to those who asked of my visit to ‘Akká, rejoices me when they feel a glow of warmth in their hearts towards this man of whom I am writing. He teaches a doctrine which takes His followers among the poor and the sick, even when in danger of their lives, making them forget self. Their faith and the new “Name” is but another lisp of the soul to its Father. They take nothing on mere belief. When the Bahá’ís have tried the teachings for themselves and have found sudden and sure deliverance come to them, it needs no words of mine to urge them to be “Steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the works of the Lord.” [1 Corinthians 15:58] It does not take from the glory of the New Moon to know that the Full Moon has come.

Poem: ONE STEP BEYOND

Margaret B. Peeke.

Whether my future will be dark or bright I do not know, I only ask for enough light While here below, Always the step beyond to plainly see, Knowing that then The next will come to me. What matters it though friends I hold most dear Are called away To fill another sphere? Both they and I Are part of one great plan, The everlasting Upward growth of man. What difference can it make to you or me Whether in this World or eternity The next few years are spent?
Nearer to Him let us but strive to grow, Looking not backward on the things below But upward, ever on God’s will intent. Whatever comes of good, by us will stay; False doctrines, Though fair, will surely slip away. What matters how The summit we have gained, Since far below Us lies the barren plain?

About the Author

In Memoriam in the Foreword to the Author’s book, Numbers and Letters Or the Thirty-Two Paths of Wisdom

Dear Friends:

It is with mingled awe, timidity and appreciation that the pen of my beloved teacher and friend, Margaret Bloodgood Peeke, is taken up where she left it at midnight, November 2, 1908, to indite the foreword to this valuable posthumous work.

Born April 8, 1838, like all in Aries, she has throughout her three score years and ten blazed the way with courage and cheer for others less gifted. During years of leadings at home and in Persia, the Holyland, Egypt, Patmos, Madeira, and wherever learned mystics were to be encountered, she lavishly and esoterically gave of the rich harvest that she thus garnered to those less fortunate who hungered and thirsted for it. Yet like many famous forerunners, as she stood upon the threshold of the promised land she was denied the personal privilege of completing all the written words that she had in mind.

As initiates we know that her progression from our sight means for her life immortal, but that she is with us in spirit and in truth we cannot doubt, and in her beloved son, E. C. B. Peeke, she has a chosen representative who is carrying out the instructions given to him during her last precious days on earth.

Behind the production of this volume on “Numbers and Letters, or the Thirty-two Paths of Wisdom,” there is therefore a beautiful spirit of co-operation, and its appearance, just at this time, will bring joy to her host of friends.

As “Born of Flame” was her entering wedge, and “Zenias the Vestal” her heart’s story, this tome and those to follow will accentuate the living power of the Masters.

As a teacher of Hermetic philosophy Margaret Peeke was unsurpassed. Her joy was to interpret, not to mystify. She was rooted and grounded in Bible knowledge and nothing shook her faith in its teachings. In them she lived and moved and had her being. “Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him; I will set him on high because he hath known my name,” from her favorite XCI Psalm, were to her living words of daily strength and joy.

As Inspectress General in America of the Martinist Order of France, she did a voluminous work. She was also an ardent Bahá’í, a member of the Rose Cross Martinist fraternity, and the treasurer of the Light of France Hermetic Society of France.

In her own dear words we give “The greetings of universal peace to those who love the law of use and seek after truth and knowledge. To them shall all things come, even powers and dominion and light; for nothing that thought shall grasp or the human mind conceive is impossible. Love and light are the birthright of the human race and free to all. The echo of good words once spoken vibrate in space to all eternity. The portals of the temples are open. Enter thou in.”

Mr. Isaiah N. Bradford. Hubbard Minn. My dear Sir.

Your letter of Oct. 24th, was duly received and I regret my inability to reply to it sooner. But I had left my California home when it arrive there, so it was forwarded to me here; however I take pleasure in answering your questions, as it gives me great happiness to enlighten any Truth seeker regarding the “Holy City” and the Blessed Master who dwells therein. Although my stay in ‘Akká was very short, as I was there only three days, yet I assure you those three days were the most memorable days of my life. Still I feel incapable of describing them in the slightest degree.

From a material standpoint everything was very simple and plain, but the spiritual atmosphere which pervaded the place and was manifested in the lives and actions among the Believers was truly wonderful and something I had never before experienced. One need but to see them to know that they are a Holy people, the Master I will not attempt to describe. I will only state that I believe with all my heart, that He is the Master and that my greatest blessing in this world – is that I have been privileged to be in His Presence and looked upon His sanctified and Glorious Face.

His life is truly the Christ life and His whole being radiates purity and Holiness. Without a doubt, ‘Abbás Effendi is the “Messiah” of this day and generation, and we need not look for another.

Hoping some you will find the joy that has come into my life from accepting the Truth as revealed in these great days.

I am very sincerely yours, (Signed) Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst November 19, 1899.

Table Talks

The subjects of the great King are continually changing. Some pass away, but others come. Sometimes we see some of the countries rising, while others flourish. Thus it is with the reign of God. Sometime it is greater than at other times. Events are continually taking place in the world. One that occurred a thousand years ago is forgotten in one that is taking place today. Some events occur which take away the memory of all past incidents. The incidents which occurred previous to the coming of Adam have all vanished, because those which have occurred since have entirely erased them from the mind of man.

The Báb said: “The day of Adam is as compared with the Day of the Blessed Perfection, as a child in the womb of its mother beside a full grown and perfect man.” He did not mean that the world was then in its infancy, it that the Bounties of God then poured out upon all the people of those days were so much less than those manifested in the days the Blessed Perfection. The day of Adam was as the rising of the sun; the Day of the Blessed Perfection as the Full noontime. The joy, fragrance and spirituality in the time of Moses compared with that in the day of Jesus was like a river compared to the sea. The Science of geology also proves the work is not so young. There are many instances which prove the world to be much older than 5,000 years.

The Pyramids prove this. It takes thousands and thousands of years for each of the strata of the earth to be formed. Therefore it is impossible for the earth to be only five or seven thousand years old. Man reaches maturity in about fifteen years. Now is it possible for the whole contingent world to attain perfection in about 5,000 years? When God sees that the people are becoming agnostics He causes some incidents to occur which replace those of the past; that the people will return from their heedlessness and seek the center of these great events. For this reason the Báb and the Blessed Perfection said before the appearance of the First Adam, an hundred thousand Ads appeared upon the earth.

INTRODUCTION

Some notes corrected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his own hand

Keep its contents ever before you as a guide to the path of Righteousness. This is not intended as a tract, and should be known only to those who have received and respect the message. {{p1}} Consider yourselves the guardian of it.

My presence before you tonight is in the meek and humble capacity of the messenger and servant of the Master — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and as HIS messenger I am sent to you to deliver His words as pronounced from His very lips, and as written by His hand. The present conditions of the believers in America made Him very sad and He said that it caused Him more sorrow than all the persecutions and oppressions combined. But before I begin to read His words, it is necessary to define as to whom the message is sent and by whom it is sent, then we will better realize the importance of the words, to comprehend the truth as it is, and accordingly act and do in the future as will indicate your obedience. This message is sent by the Master, ‘Abbás Effendi, The Lord of the Kingdom, the Agent of God. It is sent by the one into whose hands the Kingdom has been delivered and the reins of government have been placed, and for this reason, he who disobeys His commands disobeys the commands of God. In His hands the management of the Kingdom has been entrusted, in accordance with the provisions in the Book of the Covenant, the last will and testament of the Manifestation. These words are sent to you by the Greatest Branch, ‘Abbás Effendi, the one whom God has chosen and desired, the one who is branched from the Ancient of Days, by the Branch who is building the Holy House as referred to in the prophecies, and who has already begun the structure. It is sent by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the servant of God, who has clad Himself with the mantle of servitude and devotion for the beloved of God, and who is the Eldest Son, who promised to come in the Kingdom with His Father. By the One who taught the world to pray — “Thy Kingdom come on Earth as it is in Heaven.” By the One who was and now is the living Example of the spiritual and righteous. By the One whose blessed Tablets have been spread everywhere, numbering in the thousands, and no one who has been honored with one of these finds it difficult to distinguish the texts of these Holy Utterances from those of other human beings, for they are incomparable. {{p2}}

By the One whose Supreme and Exalted position is acknowledged by everyone, and even by His most bitter enemies. By the One to whom the Manifestation referred to in the Tablet to the Czar of Russia, saying: “The Father has come, and also the Son in the Holy Valley, who cries out, ‘Labeick, O God, Labeick.’” Meaning, I am ready, O God, I am ready. By the One whose Love is incomparable, whose character is unquestionable. By the One who sends to you His great Love, salutations and blessings. The Message is sent to the American believers, to the beloved of God, to the honest, sincere and faithful servants of God. To you who are pioneers, and whose actions and like will linger in the memories of those who will come after you. To those upon whose character, uprightness and energy the success of the Cause depends. To those who are requested to lay a solid and valid foundation for the Kingdom of God on Earth; a foundation which will not be affected by storm or wind. To those who will be called upon to oppose, with the sword of wisdom and truth, the armies of error with whom you are surrounded, and not to oppose each other. To you whose duty it is to ignore everything for the sake of union and agreement. To you who are now laboring under trying circumstances — tested as to your firmness and faith — and who must pass through the fire of purification. To you who are not to allow any seditious rumors to prevent you from coming into the Kingdom. To the Beloved Children whose hearts have been Kindled with the love of God. To those who are commanded to live as one soul dwelling in different bodies, to live as brethren of one family, and who are expected to make this vivifying truth the basis of their practical life. To those who are commanded to spare no means within their power to promote the cause of God and exalt His word.

To those on whom rests the responsibility of creating and maintaining peace and harmony. To those whom God has chosen to become the vivifiers of the world; and this was written in a Tablet and decreed by the Supreme Pen. {{p3}} Therefore, do not let the waves of oblivion roll over this message, which is most important, and is for our own edification and for our own good.

A Message from ‘Akká

Anton Haddad

Dear Believers: —

It was a great thing for me to have that blessed opportunity to go to Syria and see the blessed face of our Lord.

O course my visit to Syria was on private business, but at the same time I was graciously granted the permission to go and pay a visit to the Head Quarters, which visit, I hope, will tend to bring everything into perfect peace and tranquility, especially under such circumstances which are known to you, and it is hoped also, that now is the time to unite with each other, and live in perfect agreement in order to boldly defend our position, and stand firmly before anything that may come against us.

You know that some time ago, the American believers were not allowed to go to ‘Akká, owing to the disturbances raised by the contradictors who violated the commandments of the Manifestation, (the brothers of our Lord, and their followers.)

On my arrival there, I found that this prevention applied also to all the believers wherever they are, in order to refute the statement of those contradictors and to show the Turkish Government plainly and clearly that the intentions of our Lord and His followers are only religious and have not the least connection with politics, as stated by the enemies, but on the contrary, are for peace and tranquility. Some of the believers who came from Persia after a long journey of about 60 days by land and sea, suffering great deal of trouble and hardships, were not allowed to remain there more than two days and some of them were telegraphed, while on their way, to go back home, fearing the Government might do them harm through the intrigues of those bitter enemies.

These circumstances made me share with them the difficulty in going to ‘Akká, and spending there a certain time. But on my arrival at Beirut, through the grace of Our Lord, I found a telegram, sent to one of the believers known as Muḥammad Effendi Martaba Baghdádí, telling him “Let Haddad come without waiting for permission.” This made me thank God for His mercy to this unworthy servant, and I proceeded to ‘Akká at once in compliance with the command.

I need not give you now any description of the Head Quarters of Our Lord, His dignity and wisdom, and how he receives guests, etc. {{p4}} You have been acquainted with all this for some time, but I wish only to relate to you the very words pronounced from the blessed mouth of Our Lord regarding the present condition of the believers in America. He said: “The field in America is now likened unto a field of land in which are planted small trees having not the powers within themselves to stand any assault or attacks from outside, or to repel the powers of storm and wind. Therefore, it is very necessary at first to treat such trees very mildly and take much care of them until they become very strong, solid and firm.”

Consequently the guides and teachers who are in charge of this field must first deny themselves and practice chastity, purity, and love all sincerely, out of their hearts from the world and not care for the comforts of their bodies or for any other worldly thing. And they must also abolish from their minds the word “Ego” or “I,” and be servants unto all, faithful and honest shepherds, watching very strictly day and night, putting all their efforts to the care of their sheep and secure them inside the fold. If any of the sheep go astray, they must do their best and not rest until they find it. They have to serve the worshipers of God, for He (praise to Him) is not in need of our service, our submissiveness or prayers, our kindness or assistance, etc., but those who are in need of such things are the worshipers of God, and by this they will please God the Almighty. Jesus said, And whosoever shall give to drink unto these little ones a cup of cold water, only in the name of a disciple, it is as though he had given it to me, Verily, I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

“Everyone of us, and especially the guides or the deliverers of the truth must know that what he does or acts, he does only to himself and none will profit but himself, and in giving the truth none will enjoy but himself.”

“The singer who has a sweet, soft and gentle voice, will, when he sings, please himself far better than he pleases his audience, and therefore his pleasure and delight is confined to himself. It is so in the case of the artist, the photographer and the inventor. Each one of them has a special delight in himself — in the thing he does — more than others have in their works. The same is true with the deliverer of the Truth. There is nothing in these days more important than the delivery of the Truth. It is the best thing and the greatest, because the future happiness of man and his comfort, the highness of his position and exaltation, depends on his delivering the Truth to the worshippers of God.”

The guide will not be confirmed by God unless he is a sincere and faithful servant to God. {{p5}} It might be that sometimes it happens that the guide will be successful, but it is only for a short time, but at last he will fall down if he is not thoroughly sincere, even if he is the greatest philosopher and the most learned man. It happens sometimes that the simple surpass and excel the intelligent and bright.”

He said also: “Besides my real knowledge, I have realized by experience that the sincere servants of God have in many cases excelled the learned, and although ignorant and simple, they were confirmed by God owing to their sincerity, and to such an extent that it made the others astonished and perplexed. There was a certain riddler once in Persia of low breed, simple and ignorant of anything, but owing to his pure sincerity of God he was confirmed by God and became one of the greatest; so that he was envied by even the most learned men in Persia, through the most wonderful knowledge given to him by God. Take as an example; the disciples of Christ were fishermen of the lowest and meanest, simple, ignorant and despised by everyone of their time, but owing to their pure sincerity they became the greatest and are even now worshiped by Kings and Emperors; their names are highly honored and respected by the great men of this age. As it was in the past, so it will be in the future.”

We are requested by Our Lord “to live in peace, love, union and agreement, and overlook the faults and defects of others and to see only their good actions and not their bad ones. These are things that will lead to perfect success and thorough happiness.”

To illustrate this more fully, Our Lord, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, told the following story: “Once on a certain time when Christ and his disciples were traveling from one place to another, they came near a dead dog. One of the disciples said: ‘How ugly this dog is;’ another said, ‘How offensive and putrid he is,’ another, ‘How bad;’ and another, ‘Fie on him, how abominable.’ On this Christ was anxious to show to them something that was good in that dog, thus to teach them that first they should look for the good things without caring in the least for the bad, and in some manner, he made the dog’s teeth appear, saying to his disciples, ‘How white and beautiful are his teeth.’ This made the disciples ashamed, realizing at the same time that they were mistaken and that what they said was wrong. This lesson teaches us how to behave toward each other and how to view and treat each other, i.e. to look for the good things in each other, caring not for the bad.”

He said also, “Tell the believers, if they hear some day that something has happened to their Chief, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, whether killed or crucified, they must not fear or feel broken — hearted, sad, or afflicted, but on the contrary should strengthen and comfort each other, stand firm and continue working in the field of God, teaching and delivering the truth to all the people.” {{p6}} “Tell” El-Abhá in America, that it is very necessary in these days that they should not notice the bad things of others, nor mind the small, trifling, worldly things, but seek the spiritual, which tends to their strengthening and confirmation, for these days are the days of persecutions, dangers and perils, and accordingly they ought to unite with each other, for union is power, and let them take as their example in everything, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, The Master.”

You know very well that our Lord is suffering from several things besides what he suffered in the past, but yet he is very patient, and his special desire and pleasure is to die in the cause of God, although greatly persecuted by his enemies, he is powerful enough to have them dispersed, yet he is very loving, compassionate and merciful for the sake of the cause of God, and requests every one of the believers to follow his steps, and by this, they will have the desire of his heart fulfilled.

The Master also said, “Perhaps you have heard some thing about Ibn-Abhá. He is a Persian teacher and one of the greatest in knowledge and spirituality and holds a very high position among the believers; still, when asked by anyone about any other certain believer he generally says, ‘I am not worthy to unloose the latchet of his shoes.' This teaches us humility and that we ought to speak very well of others, even to prefer them to ourselves, that we should not boast by saying, — 'I am the man and nobody else.' The believers should be thankful to the guide or teacher, and faithful to him for what he has done for them, in giving them that treasured thing which could not be estimated or re-compensated."

"What use will it be to you if you are an extinguished lamp and the other lamps are so bright and brilliant, or what harm will it do you if you are bright and the others dark? What profit will you get if you are poor and the others rich, or what harm will it do you if you are rich and the others are in need of you? And so on in all cases. Under these circumstances, everyone should at first reform himself and better his condition; when this is settled with him he will do great deal of good to others and be competent to fulfill many very important duties, then his words will have a great effect on the hearts of others. I love everyone of you and therefore I wish you to love each other sincerely."

He also said, "Tell the believers that I want the strong ones among them to strengthen the weak, just as Mary Magdalen did after the death of Christ. On that famous event the disciples of Christ became very weak and dissatisfied, and some of them were full of doubts, and were likely to disbelieve in him. At last they went to Mary and said to her, 'Do you not know He is dead.' She replied, 'Well it does not matter; Was the soul killed or the body?' They answered 'The body'; Then she said to them, 'Do not fear, he is still alive and will be with us always, and is ready at all times to help us. Go, be firm and strong, and do not let small things trouble you or fill you with doubts. {{p7}} Go and preach the word of God to everyone with sincere faith and you will be confirmed by the Holy Spirit.' So they were encouraged by her and went on preaching and teaching, thus she was the cause of strengthening them and promoting the truth among all the people."

'Abdu'l-Bahá wants you to follow the steps of that great woman, especially if you come under similar. He wants you to take no thought for any other thing but the cause of God, and to be as St. Paul when he said, 'I once had knowledge, wisdom and philosophy, but after I knew Christ I forgot everything, and now I do not know but Christ.'" If believers or guides fall into temptations, or commit any wrong, the others ought reform such infirmities with the spirit of sincere love for his edification, that you may with one mind and one mouth glorify God. Whosoever of you, if he had a certain beautiful tree in his garden for a long time, during which long time it was giving good fruits, would cut it down if, for one year he seeks fruit on this tree and find none; will he not be sad and have pity? Will he not wait another year and take much care of it, until he removes all cause which stood against that tree and injured it: this must be the case with the believers, especially with the teachers and guides. Whosoever, if he had all his clothes saturated with water, would care in the least if some small drops of water were thrown on him by another? Of course he would not care, for such drops will not effect him at all. Thus we should not notice the small faults committed against us by others. To speak evil against the believers, the guides or the teachers, will hurt but yourselves. Everyone is liable to mistakes and to fall into temptations; therefore we ought not to expect perfection in anybody. Jesus said, "There is none good, but One, and He is God." "No one can claim the Bahá'í religion unless very sincere and honest 'and born of water and the Spirit,' as Jesus said. Therefore, he who comes to this religion with perfect and pure sincerity will prosper and succeed thoroughly; otherwise, success will be only for a short time and then will fail."

"Fear not any trouble, persecution or calamity which may befall you, for it is said that when the flag of the truth appears it will be cursed by the people of the east and west; just as it was in the past, so it will be now without the least difference."

"Seek ye first the Kingdom of God." One of the believers in 'Akká spoke to me, (the master) that the only desire he was begging to attain was to get bread and water only without any thought for good clothes, and to devote himself for the service of his Lord; but owing to his sincerity, God the Almighty has given him, without knowing how, instead of bread and water on his table, more than ten kinds of good food. {{p8}} I have received news from Persia that someone there has imitated the picture of the Manifestation and sold it to one of the believers there for a sum of $200., thus be careful not to be deceived by anyone, for the real picture is not in the possession of anyone but 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

May God the Almighty help us keep them and take them as a lamp for our feet. Amen.)

THE WORDS OF OUR LORD RELATING TO DISAGREEMENT AMONG THE BELIEVERS.

"Disagreement among the believers is likened unto the clouds which prevent the rays of the sun from reaching into the space covered by the clouds. Although it may be for a short time only, the power of the rays will undoubtedly demolish the clouds, yet the clouds will stop the rays for a while and consequently deprive the creatures of God from that privilege of enjoying the beauty of the sun during the existence of the clouds."

"Accordingly, disagreement among the believers has the same effect and result. It prevents the confirmation of God for a while. No confirmation to anyone as long as disagreement is in existence."

"But know that the cause of God can never be demolished or destroyed and no one whatever is able to prevent or even stop its appearance and spreading. It may become latent or delayed for one, two or three years, but at last it will appear in spite of all the hindrances, difficulties, and impediments that come in its way.”

“Every one of you is aware that the tree has a special time for its leaves to come out, another for its flowers, and another for its fruits; but it may happen some year that icy weather and intenseness of cold may prevail for a while and thus stop the tree from coming out in time. Do you think that if all the world should unite, ‘can they stop the coming of Spring.?’ O no, it must come by force, although the circumstances are not suitable, still the trees bring out leaves, flowers, and fruits. This is the case of the cause of God and is after the same method. {{p9}} If delayed for a while nothing can prevent its appearance and promotion, for God is able to raise up some other people who will give their fruits in time: but the great calamity will be on the souls who were in existence during that time of disagreement, because these souls will be deprived of all the benefits that were offered to them. Thus they will be losing and the souls coming after them gaining. Disagreement is likened unto the destroyer of homes. It is an old saying that 1000 builders are not equal to one destroyer — how much more if there are one thousand destroyers after one builder? Do your best and use every effort to unite. Have accord and harmony among you, so that you may be able to defend your selves and oppose all the collisions and attacks that may come against you.”

“You are a small army and a very few in number in comparison with those around you. If dissension is existing among you and your opinions are different, everyone of you wishing to fight with a special sort of arms, i.e., some with swords, some with rifles, some with spears and some with guns, what will be the result? Defeat! and you will never see victory. But if you will unite together with one heart, one mind, one opinion, and one word, you will be able to fight all the armies of the world, and stand firmly before them. Truly, you have before you all the different armies of the world and you have to fight them. You will overcome them if you unite and receive the confirmation of God. When in Persia we were very few in number, but owing to our unity and harmony, and our fighting with one kind of arms, we stood before our numerous enemies, fought and at last defeated them and gained the victory.”

“There are before you so many temptations, trials, afflictions, calamities and difficulties because you have to be purified through fire and sifted through the sieve in order to separate the wheat from the tares. Verily I say unto you none will be saved but the believers, and from the believers only the sincere, and even those are in great danger, especially in such a time.”

“Also, We have recorded the same in most of the tablets, and perhaps they will awaken from their sleep and follow the truth in their days. Some of them have received the truth and some have refused it, and those who received were brought near to us.”

“Every soul is commanded by God to deliver the truth and work out His Cause, and those who comply with His High Command, should, FIRST, characterize themselves with the best characteristics and attributes, and THEN, try to deliver the truth to the people, who will undoubtedly, under such circumstances, be attracted by the words of such teachers, if these be truth-seekers. {{p10}} Otherwise his words will not have the least effect in the hearts of the worshipers of God.”

“God the Forgiving, the Merciful, also teaches you that those who do wrong and oppress others, and at the same time command the people to be just, will, by the words coming out of their mouths, be accused of lying and declared to be liars by the people of the Kingdom, and by those who go about the Handsome Throne of Thy Lord.”

“Oh, ye people, commit not what will make you lose your honor, dignity, and the sanctity of the cause before the worshipers. Be careful not to come near anything shunned by your minds. Fear God and follow not the unmindful. Do not be unfaithful to the property of the people. Be faithful and honest on this earth. Do not deprive the poor people, or exclude them from what was given to you from the Bounty of God, and He will give you the double of what you have and possess, for He is the Donor, the Bestower and the Generous.”

“Say! We have pre-ordained the delivery of the truth through eloquence and demonstration; therefore beware not to dispute or argue with anyone, and he who wishes implicitly and sincerely to receive the truth for the sake of the face of his Lord, will be confirmed by the Holy Spirit and inspired with what will enlighten the heart of the world, how much more the hearts of the seekers!”

Oh people of Bahá! make submissive the Cities of the Hearts with the Sword of Wisdom and Explanation; and those who argue in accordance with their own desire and wish, they are in obvious wrong.”

“Say! The Sword of Wisdom is stronger than the summer and sharper than the Sword of Iron, if ye are knowing. Draw out the Sword in My Name and Power, then invade with it the Cities of the Hearts of those who are fortifying themselves with the fortification of Desire, also, ye were commanded by your God, El-Abhá, while He was sitting under the swords of the disbeliever, that if ye know of any sin or wrong committed by others, do not make it public, and do not reveal it to the others in order that he may not reveal you, for he is the one who veils often — the Possessor of the Great Bounty.”

“Oh rich people! When you see a poor man, do not grow proud and haughty and despise him, but think from what you were created — for each one is created from despised water. Be truthful and sincere to Him and your temples will be decorated and your names elevated and your positions grow higher and higher among the people, and you will have, before God The Truth, a great reward.”

A TABLET TO THE GUIDES

“He who wishes to deliver the cause of his Lord must at first deliver it to himself, and then to others, in order to have their hearers attracted to what they say. {{p11}} Otherwise their words will not have the least effect in the hearts of the truth-seekers.”

“O people! beware of being of those who command OTHERS to be righteous, and at the same time they forget THEMSELVES, for that which comes out of their mouths will declare them as liars. Not only that, but they will be accused of lying by the facts of things, and by the angels who are near. But if it happens that the words of such guides do take any effect in the hearts of any certain one, it is not in reality from them, but from what was pre-ordained in the words by the Almighty, the Wise. Such guides will be likened unto a lamp from which the worshipers received light while it burns in itself, and at last is burned out.”

“O ye people! Commit not what will make you lose your honor and dignity, and the sanctity of the cause before the worshipers. Be not sowers of discord, and be careful not to come near anything shunned by your minds. Turn aside sin and avoid iniquity, for it is forbidden by God in the Book, which could not be touched by any but by those whom God has purified from corruption and made them pure. Be just to yourselves, then to other people, so that the traces of Justice will, through your actions and deeds, appear before the sincere worshipers. Do not be unfaithful to the property of the people. Be faithful and honest amongst them and do not deprive the poor people of what was given to you from the Bounty of God, and He will give you the double of what you have and possess. There is no God but He, and to Him is the Creative Power and Command. He gives to whom He wishes and forbids whom He likes. He is the Donor, the Bestower, the Invincible, the Generous.”

“Say, oh people of Bahá! Give the Word of God, for God has commanded that it is the duty of every soul to deliver His Word, and it is the best thing and the greatest thing to do; as no soul will be accepted unless it knows God, the Almighty, the Powerful. It is pre — ordained to deliver the truth through explanations and arguments and not otherwise.”

“It is also commanded by the Power of God, the Supreme, the Wise, not to argue or dispute with any soul, but remind that soul with good explanations and admonitions. If that soul is mindful, it is well. If not, leave and do not argue. Do not argue about the world and its vanities, nor what was pre-ordained to anyone in this world, for God has left the world to its people, and He does not wish anything out of it but the hearts of the worshippers.”

“It is also commanded by God, El-Bahá, the Almighty, the All-Knowing, to have mercy upon yourselves, then upon those near to you and then upon the sincere worshipers of God. {{p12}} If you come in contact with a certain low and contemptible person, do not grow haughty and despise him, for the Sulṭán of Glory and Grandeur will pass near him in these days and nobody knows how, but only the One whose will is the will of your Lord, the Almighty, the Wise.”

“Oh people of wealth and riches! If you see a poor man suffering from any calamity, do not run away from him, but sit with him and ask him about the things heaped upon him from the seas of determination and predestination.”

“By God, under this circumstance, the people of the High World will testify for you, pray for you and with pure, holy and eloquent tongues. Blessed is the learned man who does not boast of his knowledge and despise those who are under him. How good is the charitable man who does not ridicule the one who disobeys and who does not make public the faults committed by that man, so that his sins and crimes may not be unveiled by God, who is the Best Veiler.”

“Oh people, be veilers and forgivers so that God may forgive you from His own Bounty and overlook the trespasses of others, so that God may overlook yours and clothe you with the beautiful garment of Kindness. If anyone of the believers asks you for protection, have him protected and do not deprive him of what he wants if you are able to do it, so that God may protect you in the shadow of His Mercy, on that day in which the bosoms heave, the heart’s burn and the elements of all creations shake and tremble.”

“Say O people! tell the pure truth always, for it is the thing which will decorate yourselves and elevate your names and make your positions high and supreme amongst all the people in this world; and in the world to come a great reward from your God, the Truth. Also advise those who have believed and admonish them, perhaps they will accept the advice given to them in the Book of God and come to the right path.”

“Let no seditious rumors prevent you from coming into the Kingdom of God and receiving the Spirit of Confirmation. Take for example Jesus Christ, when He was here on earth 1900 years ago, how He was despised by the people to an extent unimaginable. How the Jews and even the Romans refused to have Him buried in their cemeteries, and at last He was interred in a dung-hill which they call now Golgotha. How in the second century after Christ some of the so-called learned people sprang up and wrote many books in which they denied Christ and His appearance among the people — that there was no person such as Christ, an, in fact, there was no one by this name, that it was only the invention of Peter and Paul, and so many other things besides. But look at the result now, and see! Consider how powerful is the cause of God! Be firm in the faith and let no doubts come to your mind, for THIS CENTURY IS THE MOST IMPORTANT OF ALL. He who pronounces one word of truth now, that word will continue to wave and vibrate without end and will never be annihilated; but not so the contrary. The same result follows those who commit good deeds and bad deeds. Think of the actions and deeds done in the time of the prophets and apostles, and consider — what were they? They were nothing but trifling things in comparison with those done after their times; but we know very well that these small things became known to everybody and will be forever and ever; while the great things done after the times of the apostles were known for a short time only and then were forgotten. What was done by some of the women and men mentioned in the Scriptures, in the time of the apostles? They did nothing of great importance. Some of them received the apostles in their houses, others rendered them service, while others gave them protection and assistance. But after the time of the apostles many built churches, others spent all their money in a charitable way, but nothing is now known about them. What a great difference there is between their works.”

“Look at the time of Christ! What of the two thieves crucified with him? Each pronounced but one word, and these two words became known for many generations up to the present time, and will still linger in the memories of those who will come after us, although a great many people did greater things after the time of Christ, they were not to be compared with the words of the thieves. Why is this? It is because what took place in the time of Christ and apostles was done in the time of their appearance, the time of distress and persecution. This is the case at present. He who does a very small thing now, that thing will be remembered forever by everyone, but the things done after this time, however great they may be, will never have the same effect, but will be remembered by some and last only for a short time. To do now is of greater preference and importance than hereafter, owing to the paucity of the number of the believers and the circumstances they are surrounded with; for after this time the believers will number millions and millions and they will be the majority everywhere. You are the pioneers and have to work very hard.”

“You have to be firm and solid. If success in the worldly things (which are nothing in comparison with spiritual) depends on firmness, how much more is the spiritual? He who stands firm will succeed, but the cowards who draw back will never see success. {{p14}} Disagreement is just like poison — whenever the poison enters the body it will kill it all at once, notwithstanding its vitality and strength. So beware not to let this kind of poison enter your heart.”

“The Kingdom of God is also likened unto the temple of man. We know very well that such temple is composed of many members which differ greatly in shape, form, action and office, and when these different members act in harmony with each other and have the real perfect affinity and attraction among them, they form together that temple which will be thoroughly ready to receive the Spirit — although so various and different. We cannot say that one member is preferred to another, or is of greater importance in the formation of the temple. No, we cannot say that, for each member has its own office and by the action of all in harmony and unison, a perfect result is produced. So is the case with the Kingdom of God, which Kingdom is composed of different members, and if these member, although differing in quality, form, shapes and characters, act in harmony with each other and in perfect agreement, they will form the Kingdom of God and will be ready to receive the confirmation of His Spirit. But if disagreement falls among them and EACH ONE WANTS TO MAKE HIMSELF GREATER THAN THE OTHER, THINKING OF HIS HIGH OFFICE AND IMPORTANCE, the Kingdom of God will not be formed of such members and they will NEVER BE READY OR WORTHY to receive the confirmation of His Spirit.”

“The Kingdom of God is also likened unto a garden of trees. We all know that a garden in order to be beautiful must contain a good number of trees, various in size and different in colors, flowers and fruits. Some of the trees are tall and some short, some bear good and sweet fruits, some sour and some bitter, but all these trees are necessary to form a garden. No tree can say to the other, ‘I am the most important organ of the lot,’ or ‘I am more profitable than you.’ Not so whatever. Because all the trees in that garden are watered by the same Hand, having the same sun and the same breeze passing on them. If any, distinction is to be made among them, such distinction must belong to the owner of the garden and not to the trees themselves.”

“So is the Kingdom of God. He is the owner and Lord of the Kingdom, and everything relating to the members of the Kingdom is in His Hands and belongs to Him only, although two members are not equal in everything, but different in size, disposition, quality, character, conduct, color and fruit. Yet, all of them are necessary to form the Kingdom, but they cannot make any distinction among themselves. {{p15}} High distinction belongs only to the Lord of the Kingdom. No one can prefer himself to others, because all are watered by the same Hand, having the same sun, the same breeze of air passing over them; therefore, they should be as one, loving and respecting each other and considering themselves as brothers and sisters and even more, for in spirituality, kinship is not to be considered whatever. Jesus Christ said, “He who hears my word is my brother, sister and mother.”

“Agreement, union, affinity and attraction have a great effect on the universe. Take our globe, for instance. I became so large through the great and perfect union, cohesion, affinity and attraction among the different ingredients and particles of which it is composed, but the small things which we see could not be any larger, owing to the lack of affinity between their and other substance. Thus affinity has a great effect in the enlargement of anything. so also among the believers. It should be the most important factor and the basis of their growth, otherwise they will go asunder if they ever meet with collision or difficulty.”

“Tell my beloved that great persecutions and troubles are awaiting them. They have not seen anything yet. They will be attacked by all the people around them, ridiculed and despised for His sake. A great many books will be written against them and the papers will attack them severely.” He said also that “a woman of great ability will write an article against the believers full of lies and false things, but they ought not to let these things trouble or give them the least doubt or fear. They will gain the victory and receive His confirmation and strength if they only listen to His words and unite together as one soul and spirit.”

(These are the translated words of our Lord spoken to me in response to the information I gave Him regarding the difficulties among the American believers. These notes were afterward corrected by His own hand, and may God help you to accept and practice them.)

TABLET DIRECTIONS FOR GUIDES

“Say! Know that We have commanded all who deliver the truth, and caused to descend, the conditions necessary for the teachers and guides which will make every discerning man cognizant of the Bounty of this Manifestation, and His Glory, GIFTS, DONATIONS and KINDNESSES.”

“Every man wishing to turn his face to the Supreme Horizon must purify his inside and outside, and abstain from what is forbidden in the Book of God, the Lord of the Worlds. {{p16}} He must adhere to God, and do in accordance with what was descended in the Vision, to wit: ‘Say! He is God, then, in their ford let hem play hopelessly.’ He ought to consider everything besides God, as a handful of dust. Also the Lights of the Cause on His Return, has shown from the Horizon of the Heaven in accordance to the Will of God, the Almighty, the Invincible, the Bestower; and he who wishes to deliver the cause of his Lord has to decorate his head with the crown of devotion and his body with purity and godliness. In another place, ‘Every guide has to overlook everything in his possession and in that of others, and look only to that which is in the possession of God, the Everlasting, the Unchangeable.’”

“We have said, and what we say is the truth, “It is not the calamity that I have been imprisoned and persecuted by my enemies, but it is caused by those who relate themselves to Myself, and at the same time commit what will make my heart mourn and my pen lament.”

(It is here plainly outlined that the greatest enemies are those who sow discord as believers, not those who are unbelieving opposers of Truth.)

Also, We likewise commanded the worshipers at that time when the Brilliant Light shone from the direction of Arak. Some of the people have violated the covenant, and some followed the command of the All-knowing and Wise.”

My dear brothers and sisters in Chicago - Greetings! -

Once more, through the Mercy and Grace of God, my dear husband and myself have reached this blessed land, have been permitted to kneel at the Holy feet of our revered Lord and Master, the beloved son of God, His greatest Branch and Mystery and our eyes have once more rested and feasted upon the Glory of his Face.

From this blessed Land, surrounded by the Sunshine of His presence – do we send you our loving greetings and in our hearts we humbly beg God to bless each and everyone of you, and facilitate the way that you may all come and see Him for yourselves. It is impossible to describe His Greatness, His Goodness or His loving-kindness to all the children of men — be they Christian or Muḥammadan, Jew or Gentile – His heart is large enough for all and the Cup of His Love is ever running over. Oh my dear brothers and sisters, listen to His words and be comforted. The same Holy spirit that spoke in Jesus Christ 1900 years ago, to-day speak in Him and through Him depth all Good works, everyday if His life is a pure holy and sanctified example for all the children of earth. To walk in His Footsteps is not difficult if we can but succeed in cutting our hearts from the world and turning our face fully to God. Therefore, let not your hearts be troubled over anything – the most important thing is to pray without ceasing and look not to the mistakes and faults of those around you, but each one must look to himself, and purify his own heart that it may be a fit dwelling place for the Holy Spirit.

We have found since we are here this time that our dear Master (may my life be a ransom to the dust of His feet) explained many things to Dr. K. during our first visit, which he (Dr. K.) never translated to us, as the teachings of our Lord conflicted with His own ideas – thus he translated to us, if at all, everything that would substantiate His book.

But, thank God, everything will be made clear, for the Truth is like light of the sun, nothing can hide it. Mrs. Kheiralla and Mírzá Asadu'lláh are, I hope, by this time in New York and they are well-prepared to give your hungry souls rich and delicious food. This teacher is

Biography of Sarah Farmer

Bahíyyih

1900, Sarah Farmer

---

January 20, 1949. Mrs. H. E. Ford, Box 1003, Colorado Springs, Colorado.

Dear Bahíyyih:

Renee Welsh sent your manuscript on Sarah J. Farmer to the Review-Committee and their remarks were considered at our recent meeting.

Receiving Committee, in a formal sense, would not need to come into the picture concerning this manuscript as it is not a Bahá'í manuscript, A, concerned with the Bahá'í teachings, etc.

The member of the Reviewing Committee felt that this manuscript did not come, under their function but "there is one point which the members nevertheless cannot refrain from commenting on. It is the feeling of the members, in varying degrees, that while the mss. conveys a wonderful story of a most inspiring life, the writing is uneven in quality and there are many sentences that need revision." (There are also *polling mistakes).

As we cannot afford to print the manuscript until after the emergency years, we feel sure that you will want to re-write at least parts of this wonderful record.

We are writing Mr. and Mrs. Welch of this action and sending you the mss. herewith.

With every good wish to you both,

Sincerely,
HORACE

Secretary

This book is dedicated to those who made the writing of it possible. Miss Farmer lives in the hearts of many and they have shared freely of their memories, letters, programs, pictures and momentos, that the record of her greatness might be told. We wish that tribute could be made by name, for each has given a link in the story, but that will have to wait for a longer biography. Someday the full story will be told about her parents, her childhood and youth, and much more about her womanhood and dream. Most of the source material has never been published. When many have written the same episode, in which details vary, we have used to facts which the greater number agreed upon. We hope we have conveyed in this book something of what they intended.

Sarah Jane Farmer

It was a hot June day in Boston, in the year 1892. Not a breath of air stirred in the crowded lecture hall. The speaker mopped his brow as he talked of the more abundant life. Half way down the room sat a gracious middle-aged woman. Her appearance belied the heat of the afternoon. She wore a soft flowing grey dress with a touch of lace at the neck. Her face bore a look of serenity and sympathy. With hands folded quietly in her lap she watched the audience strain to concentrate on the lecture. Suddenly her figure grew tense, her expressive brown eyes kindled with enthusiasm. She hastily drew a pencil and paper from her purse and quickly jotted down words: Green Acre – tent in riverbank – all races – religion – music – science – understanding – Peace.

As the lecture closed, Sarah Farmer arose and hastened from the hall. That had been an eventful afternoon for her and so many others. In a moment of clear insight, she had realized the significance of the hour in which she lived, that it was the dawn of a New Day of Unity and Peace for humanity. That the great need was for a place where this New Day could be discussed and lived, no matter on how small a scale. The Ideal must be put into practice and then it would spread throughout the earth as a pebble dropped into a pool sends its waves to the furthermore shore.

That evening, she told her father what had happened. “I was listening to a lecture by Coleville. The people were hungry for knowledge of themselves and sat patiently in spite of great heat and the noise of traffic that almost drowned the speaker’s voice. I thought of what a glorious thing it would be for poor, tired, struggling humanity to have some spot on earth where our bodies and souls might be refreshed at the same time. Suddenly, I saw the need and with it how to begin to help. I saw the picture of Green Acre with its acres of beautiful fields and pines and the river with the Inn high above its banks. But instead of a small summer resort it had become a great center of learning. Throngs of people were coming to it at boat, carriage, even walking. On the shore was a large tent with people comfortably seated listening to a series of Conferences on progressive subjects, free of charge so that all might come. There were all races and creeds there, and happy children and young people ready to learn how to make their lives of value. Peace was the aim of everyone’s efforts. It was a place to manifest in this world the wonderful power of God. And I saw also that in the years ahead, the Conferences would grow into a school and the school into a University on Sunset Hill nearby, which would be dedicated to man's highest achievements in the arts, sciences, religion and philosophy. The spiritual principles of the New Day would find their complete expression in the life of Green Acre. This is what you and Mother and I have always been working towards, but we saw only parts of the plan and now I have seen it all."

The seventy-year old man did not smile. His weary body, almost helpless in a wheel chair, had never trapped his soul. He caught the picture too. And far into the summer night those two sat making the blueprint of an Ideal.

Three months later found the father and daughter leaving their home in Eliot, Maine, near Green Acre, for Chicago. It was against doctor's orders but when had they ever not striven far beyond their physical strength? And there was the great plan to work for now.

The Colombian Exposition of 1893 was soon to open its doors. Prof. Farmer had been invited to have an exhibit of his inventions, for he was one of America's great scientists. Is first little model of a trolley car, the mantelpiece with its incandescent bulbs on it that had illumined the parlor of their home in 1859, a model of his electric fire alarm system; all had been carefully packed and freighted.

The next few months in Chicago were busy ones. The exhibition was arranged, Sarah had even made some contacts for Green Acre, and plans to sell several of the inventions had taken shape.

On the evening of May 17, as Prof. Farmer sat in their small apartment waiting for Sarah to return from a meeting, his thoughts wandered back across the years. They had been long hard years of struggle, and sometimes poverty, because his earnings had gone it seemed once again that she would collapse, Miss Wilson took her away, this time for eleven months. It was called a sabbatical year and Mr. Keefe was left in charge. He was in truth her King Arthur of the Round Table.

January 3, 1900, found Miss Farmer and Miss Wilson at a New York City dock boarding the S. S. Bismarck for the Mediterranean, and to their joy they met Josephine Locke and Elizabeth Knudson who were also sailing. This was a happy surprise for the four had been friends for years. Before many days at sea, Miss Farmer suspected that the two friends had a secret, as sometimes when she approached them on the deck, they would hastily conceal a small book they had been reading. Her curiosity was fully aroused and finally won from them the confidence that it was the "Hidden Words" a book written by a Persian who called himself, "Bahá'u'lláh". They told her they were on their way to see his son, a religious prisoner of the Turks, in the ancient fortress of 'Akká, in Palestine. Instantly, Miss Farmer was filled with a desire to make this journey also. Miss Locke was not sure it could be arranged; for her brother had cautioned her to be most secretive about her trip, lest she incur the disfavour of the officials in whose custody 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been placed; this did not daunt Miss Farmer, she and Miss Wilson cabled ahead, asking permission to come.

By the middle of January they were in Egypt meeting some of the followers of Bahá'u'lláh and his son. They became increasingly anxious to study this religion at its source. While awaiting permission from 'Akká they took a three-weeks' sail on the Nile. Miss Farmer felt the romance of this ancient land and explored Thebes and the pyramids with intense interest; she even took a moonlight ride across the desert on donkey-back. When they returned to Cairo, the trip to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been arranged. On March 21, the four friends boarded a steamer for the overnight journey to Haifa. Early on the morning of March 23, the carriage arrived to take them the nine miles around the bay of 'Akká. The high walls which surrounded it looked forbidding, and as they entered the gate, the stench and confusion of the narrow street were appalling. They rounded a corner or two and entered a small courtyard, the end of the journey; there they forgot all but the figure standing in a doorway at the top of a long flight of outside stairs – 'Abdu'l-Bahá! As Miss Farmer climbed the steps she gazed into a face of such nobility of character that she knew she was meeting, for the first time in her life, a man of true spiritual distinction. She was in a unique position to judge her fellow beings, she had known the great and the near great. In her diary that night she wrote this one sentence, "Heart too full for speech – received by our Lord."

The second day of the visit she decided to write down the many questions she said for 'Abdu'l-Bahá lest they be forgotten in the excitement of an interview. She thought them out carefully and laid the slip of paper in her Bible. The third morning at an early hour she was called, with a young interpreter, for her personal talk with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She forgot her paper in her haste but 'Abdu'l-Bahá's first words were, "Tell Miss Farmer that this is the answer to her first question." The young man hesitated for he had heard no question and 'Abdu'l-Bahá continued, "She will understand." One by one her questions were answered. He spoke with such wisdom and understanding that she was lifted into a state of exalted happiness. Some hearts are as a lamp filled with oil waiting for a spark to transform the wick into a light. Miss Farmer's heart was ready and the power of love of God that she now saw reflected in the life and person of 'Abdu'l-Bahá carried her to new heights of spiritual unfoldment. 'Abdu'l-Bahá told Miss Farmer that her dream of Green Acre had been real, that someday there would be a university and also a temple for the worship of God on her beloved Mt. Salvat, that her work had not been in vain, that it was to live and that she had been chosen through the mercy of God to found this center to herald the dawn of a New Day. But he cautioned her. He explained that the real religion was not composed of psychic experiences or manmade ritual and superstitions, that to encourage the study of these things would not lead to unity and peace, that not an electric Faith but rather a fresh outpouring of the knowledge of the Will of God was spoken though the pure channel of a Prophet was the only power that could transform human hearts. It had always been so down through the ages. Tolerance was not enough! And finally that a new step must be taken at Green Acre. The spirit had been established there, the platform for the reception of universal ideas created, and now it must become a focal point for the message of God for the New Day!

Miss Farmer met 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wife and family. Their prison life was filled with happiness and grace. She loved them and they loved her. Always she was to remember their example of patience in the face of deprivation and suffering.

These 'Akká days were the climax of her life. They could only be four of them because of the restrictions placed upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá but they were enough. She found the answer to the spiritual longings of her heart and soul.

On the fourth day the carriage bore them out of the city gate and back along the sea to Haifa.

They had a few days in Cairo and then started on a trip through Europe. The first stop was Greece; one day in Athens as Miss Farmer was walking along the street a carriage stopped beside her; the Queen leaned out to inquire who the lady with the radiant face was; Miss Farmer was a striking figure in Athens, New York or Paris. Her dresses and bonnets were made in simple Quaker fashion of a gray material with a touch of lavender in it, making a perfect background for her marvellously expressive face.

Rome, Oberammergau, Munich, Strassburg, Geneva and finally Paris. There Miss Farmer and Miss Wilson were the house guests of Madame Jackson, a wealthy American woman they had met in Cairo and with whom they became great friends. It seemed as though everywhere Miss Farmer went, she made close friends. Those Paris days held her first Bahá'í meetings too, at Charles Mason Remey's studio where there were other Americans, among them May Bolles Maxwell.

When Miss Farmer returned to America in December she began to organize the program for the coming season and also to see the Bahá'ís in eastern cities. She spent part of that winter in Washington with Mrs. Phoebe Hurst and there she lectured about the new Faith/ she had been radiant before but now this new happiness gave her a luminous quality that made people say she looked like a saint. She was a power for good wherever she went.

The Infinite Essence, so He was with God in the beginning, when the sun has risen, its light shines upon the earth, but before its rising, when the light is not perceived, it is still a sun with the quality of light in it. The rays from the sun are with the sun, and were with the sun before it shone upon the earth, so in the same sense they were with the sun in the beginning and in reality are the sun. Christ was with the Infinite Essence in the beginning and so He was God.

Once, some materialists came to ‘Akká to ask ‘Abbás Effendi what about the Immaculate Conception. He answered: “A living body cannot come forth from a dead body. Only a living man can make a living child; this is a scientific fact.”

The scholars said it is impossible for a child to be born without a father, and said nothing could change their opinion regarding it. They left the subject and began speaking of geology — scientific facts well known. They were glad to speak of their idea of evolution of man from the atom and molecule all through the different stations until at last man was evolved from all these previous conditions. Then ‘Abbás Effendi said: “Well, did the first man who was evolved have a father and mother, as you said a child must have that comes into this world?” They said: “Why no, of course not.” Then the Master said: “Well, if God could make the first man who came upon the earth without a father or mother, could not make Jesus Christ also without a human father” They were confounded and said nothing more, but after that they were converted and went away believers.

Look at the favors of the Blessed Perfection in bringing together these people from different parts of the world to sit down at a table in Haifa, at the foot of Mt. Carmel. It is almost impossible for the people.

A simple Story

William H. Hoar

May 1900

---

I have been asked to write about my visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. In compliance with this request, I submit a simple story of scenes and incidents as they occurred during my journey and while a member of the Household of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for two never to forgotten weeks in the month of May, 1900.

Having received the Message of the Bahá’í Revelation in October of 1893, and having shortly thereafter accepted it, I became desirous of visiting the place where Bha’u’llah had spent the latter days of his exile, and to receive confirmation from Him who is the Center of His Covenant, the Servant of God ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The opportunity to make this visit came to me in 1901. I sailed from New York on the 19th day of April, and after a short visit to the friends in London and Paris, proceeded on my way to ‘Akká by way of Alexandria, Port Sa’íd and Bayreuth, in all of which places I was cordially received and delightfully entertained by our Bahá’í Brethren living in these places.

The first Oriental Bahá’í I met was Muḥammad Yazdí of Alexandria. Proceeding on my way, the next stop was at Port Sa’íd, where I met that noble, gentle spirit, who seemed to me to be the servant and friend of all believers, Aḥmad Yazdí, the Persian Vice-Consul and the brother of Muḥammad Yazdí of Alexandria. By Aḥmad Yazdí I was instructed how to proceed, and provided with a fez, which I wore from the time of my arrival in ‘Akká until departure. He also entrusted me with many messages and letters for the household and friends in ‘Akká.

The next pause in my journey was Bayreuth where I met Mitstapha Baghdádí, to whom I was directed by the brethren in Port Sa’íd. Being an utter stranger in Beyreuth, and not knowing the address of Mustapha Baghdádí I asked the dragoman whom I secured immediately upon my arrival, if he knew a merchant bearing such a name in the city. He told me that he did and that on the following morning he would come to my hotel and conduct me to Baghdádí’s place of business.

The next morning, as I approached the bazar of Baghdádí it occurred to me that I did not know the language, that I could not speak either Persian, Turkish or Arabic, and I was somewhat at a loss to know how I should make myself known, not caring to tell my interpreter who or what I was, or what was my object in visiting Baghdádí. However, I trusted to fate, and as I approached the shop, I observed two young men sitting behind a counter, and not knowing what else to say I approached them with the Bahá'í salutation, "Alláh-u-Abhá", which I afterwards found to be an open sesame to the hearts and possessions of my brother Bahá'ís in the East. Instantly upon hearing this salutation, the faces of the two young men brightened, and they looked the welcome which it seemed to me they could not express. Not knowing what else to do or say, I said, "I am from America and can only speak English." One of the young men responded immediately, "I speak English", and instantly the situation was relieved.

We entered into conversation, and I learned that the young man who informed me he could speak English was Eunis Kahn, who was then on his way from Ṭihrán, Persia, to 'Akká Syria, where he was to take the place as English interpreter to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, previously occupied by 'Alí Kuli Kahn, whom I had met in Port Sa'íd on his way to America.

I was then taken by the other young man, who proved to be the son of Mustapha Baghdádí to his father and introduced to him as a brother Bahá'í from America.

Mustapha Baghdádí received me sweetly, cordially and lovingly and in that new spirit so characteristic of the Bahá'ís of the East. I spent a delightful hour with him and found him to be exceedingly interesting, ready and willing to give me all the information I sought and to aid me in every way in his power. Mustapha Baghdádí is one of the early believers and a Persian exile, contemporary with Bahá'u'lláh. He was able to tell me much that was that was entertaining and instructive.

After an hour spent in most enjoyable conversation, he took me about the city. We visited and observed places of interest, and finally we went to one of those places of refreshment where delicious Oriental drinks and sweetmeats are served, of which we partook.

I then returned to my hotel to meet my dragoman who was to come for me after luncheon to take me for a ride through the Mount Lebanon District, which lasted all the afternoon. It was a most charming drive, in the spring of the year; the country was green, attractive and beautiful, and the air laden with the perfume of fruit and flowers.

I returned in time to take the steamer that night for Haifa. All our friends came to the steamer to see Eunis Kahn and myself off.

I shall never forget dear Mustapha Baghdádí; he seemed to me to be the very personification of goodness and kindness and both his sons are like him in that respect. One of them is now in America, acquiring an education, with the intention of becoming a medical doctor.

Our trip to Haifa was uneventful. Leaving Bayreuth about eight o'clock in the evening, we arrived in the Bay of 'Akká about three o'clock the following morning. Our coming had been heralded, for we found upon our arrival a band of Bahá'í brethren on the lookout for us, and among them was that dear soul and devoted servant of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and of all Bahá'ís, now gone to his rest and reward, Taqí Manshdi. Taqí Manshádí seemed to know me instantly, and approaching gave me the Bahá'í salutation, telling me that he was to conduct me to the house at which I was to stay while in Haifa. It seemed as if the greatest pleasure that the dear brothers had in life while I was with them was in ministering to my wants and comfort. They were constantly with me, ready and willing to take me anywhere I wanted to go to give me any information I desired. It seemed as though nothing was closed to me neither their hearts, their homes nor their possessions. I was taken first to a little house provided for the entertainment of visiting pilgrims, and a breakfast was provided for me after which Ameen, then a boy of sixteen years of age the son of Asadu'lláh, came to me with the information that he was to act as my interprets and personal attendant.

I wish here to pay a loving tribute to the devotion of my little friend while I was in 'Akká. He was my constant companion, I could not think without him that is, in Persian or Arabic – and being unable to speak the language of the country, I felt utterly lost when he was not at my side. Frequently when addressed by a Syrian or a Persian, I would turn, and not finding my little dragoman at my side, would call, “Ameen, Ameen, where is Ameen”; he was never far away even at night frequently sharing my room. He contributed more than any other single individual to the pleasure of my stay in 'Akká, and I shall always hold in grateful remembrance his kindness and service to me while in 'Akká, and I am glad to say that our friendship has been renewed in America.

We spent the first day strolling about 'Akká, going up the mountain, visiting the tomb of the Báb, and calling upon the brethren living in Haifa.

Late in the afternoon information time brought to me that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had sent word that we were to come to 'Akká in the morning. So, about 8:30 o'clock the following morning, with Taqí Manshádí, Eunis Kahn and Nourilla, one of the Port Sa'id believers we started for 'Akká, in a carriage, by the way, made in America, of that type known in England as the “carry-all” made for rough roads and mountain climbing.

'Akká is situated on one side of the Bay of 'Akká, opposite the city of Haifa, on a point of land jutting out into the sea, commanding completely the coast north and south, a place capable according to the methods of ancient warfare, of being made almost impregnable.

There is no roadway between 'Akká and Haifa, the journey being made over the hard sand of the Mediterranean shore. It is a delightful drive, cool and pleasant. We arrived at about eleven o'clock A. M. and I was immediately ushered into the room that I was to occupy. It was a long, high ceilinged room, facing the Mediterranean Sea and overlooking the ramparts of the fortress. Along the side of the room facing the Mediterranean Sea was a low divan at the end was a book case containing books – a room nicely furnished and comfortable.

After baggage had been deposited in the room, a brother came to visit me, after which for a short time I was left alone, wondering when I was to see the object of my long journey, and gaze for the first time into the face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. I had not long to wait, for suddenly the double doors were thrown open, and a group of Persians entered. Foremost among them is a venerable, white robed figure with a long flowing white beard, and a most benign and beautiful countenance and him I at once took to be ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. However, I was mistaken, for he was not ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but an uncle of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the brother of the Manifestation.

Suddenly the group parted, and a figure strode forward, who I immediately knew by his very presence to be none other than ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He is not a tall man, but is nevertheless, a man of commanding presence, with a noble head splendidly set on regal shoulders, a man who would command attention and respect in any assemblage.

To me, his was a personality of ineffable sweetness and charm, a reposeful dignity impossible to describe. In his face was the light of a divine love, and his smile a glimpse of the heavenly radiance. I shall never forget that smile; it came but rarely, but in it did come, lighting up a countenance habitually sad it was beautiful to behold.

He approached me, to both my hands in his gave me affectionate salutation and welcome, seated me on the divan and took a place beside me. I turned and looked into his face, and for some moments not a word was spoken. Then he turned to me and asked about my health and my journey, about the friends in America, and told me how glad he was to see me, and bade me be comfortable and happy. I assured him it was happiness merely to be with him. He smiled and arose and left the room. Such was my first meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In about an hour we were summoned to the mid-day meal, which is the chief meal of the day. It consisted of a vegetable soup cucumbers and roast lamb, with sweetmeats and bread. I have said many times since visit to the East that I think the Orientals are the only people in the world who know how to live, so far as the culinary art is concerned.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá always has a guest at the noon-day meal, and I of course, was the guest of the day, and to meet me were invited two Persian believers, one of them a man of majestic presence, who had been with the Manifestation almost from his boyhood, who had suffered with Him in exile, and who was the faithful friend of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá – Hájí Níáz Kermani. Kermani is an old man, six feet tall, with a long white beard – a splendid type of the Oriental man, sweet, gentle but withal, commanding, and strong – such a man as an artist seeking a model for an Isaiah would choose. I spent very many happy hours with Kermani, hours that I shall always remember with pleasure. I loved him and shall always love him.

Thus passed the first day of my visit to ‘Akká.

During the noon-day meal ‘Abdu’l-Bahá discoursed upon the Message of Bahá instructing me as I had come to be instructed and, altogether, it was a delightful hour. We saw nothing more of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá until evening, When He again met with the family and friends at the evening meal.

Thus we met from time to time for twelve days. The conversation at these meals was varied. Sometimes we talked about the friends in America, and the progress of the Cause all over the world and at other times the conversation Of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was on the instructions of the Kingdom.

On the afternoon of the first day my little dragoman Ameen, told me that the brothers had gathered in the Garden of the Riḍván to meet me, and that I was to be taken there for a reception. After an hour’s rest, we sat out for the Garden, which is located midway between the City of ‘Akká and the Holy Tomb. The Riḍván is the Garden planted in the desert by Bahá’u’lláh, and is a delightfully green and verdant spot, with a stream of clear, pure water running through it such a spot a one on a hot summer’s day would seek for repose and meditation. There the Bahá’í pilgrims and the exiles of ‘Akká were gathered – a splendid group of men, cleanly dressed, intelligent and apparently prosperous. One can never tell, by looking at the Bahá’ís in the East, whether they are rich or poor. There is no pretence or show about them, nevertheless there is that in their appearance which one sees only in the well groomed man. One could not tell the merchant, from the barber, or the scholar from the shoemaker – brothers all.

I was taken by the arm and introduced to each one of them individually, and as I was introduced, I was told what the occupation and calling was of the one to whom I was presented. A nice, cleanly dressed young man was introduced to me as the barber; another as the shoemaker; another as a merchant, and so on through the entire group. There seemed to be no distinctions among them. It was a community of perfect equality, and they were loving and gentle and perfectly free in their intercourse with each other, and particularly attentive and kindly toward the stranger, myself. We passed a most pleasant hour or two together, during which tea was served with sweetmeats. After bidding them farewell, we returned to ‘Akká.

The following day, in company with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, we visited the Holy Tomb, and I was permitted a few moments of meditation and prayer alone in the crypt that holds the remains of Bahá’u’lláh.

Thus the time passed, in visits of the brethren, wandering about the fortifications and along the shores of the Mediterranean and visiting the Garden of the Riḍván.

The day after my visit to the Garden of Riḍván, returning from a stroll through the city, upon entering my room I saw bending over a table, inspect in some photographs which I had spread out there, a Turkish soldier. He looked up as I came in, with the photographs of Mrs. Hoar and our children in his hand, bowing, he interrogated me by signs if the originals of those pictures belonged to me; in the same manner, I indicated that they did. Just then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came into the room and I was introduced to Liva Páshá. Liva Páshá was the general second in command in 'Akká and he had come to pay a visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, whose friend he was and also to call upon the guest of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

After a few moments spent in conversation, dinner was announced. We repaired to the dining room, to partake of the noonday meal I was getting experience on every step of my way. I had never been among Oriental people before, and I had gone there with the prejudices of an Occidental concerning the people of the East, and the Turks in particular, but I must here bear witness that my pre-conceived notions concerning these people received a destructive shock, for I found such people as Liva Páshá and others of high and low degree, to be just as human, just as sweet, just as gentle, and yet a manly men among men, as any I have ever met.

We spent a delightful hour, and I was told later in the day that I was invited to be the guest of Tiva Páshá at his Headquarters on the following Thursday night.

In the forenoon of the day following, Liva Páshá came again to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and I being sent for was conducted into the courtyard where Liva Páshá and 'Abdu'l-Bahá were seated. We engaged in conversation. I was asked many questions about my country by Liva Páshá, to all of which I answered modestly, restraining whatever impulse I may have felt to flaunt the stars and stripes. In my turn, among other questions, I asked him if he knew Osman Páshá, who fought the battle of Plevna in opposition of Skobeloff, the Russian general, telling him that our soldiers in the West had profound respect for Osman and regarded him as a great soldier, and as a strategist, superior to his renowned opponent. His face broke into a pleased smile, as he opened his tunic and baring his breast showed me two ugly wounds, one on either side. These he told me, he received at the battle of Plevna, in which he took part as a young lieutenant, one from a rifle ball and the other a sabre thrust and that Osman was his friend.

The following day, Thursday, I was sent for by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and upon coming into the room where he sat was introduced to General Kerif Páshá, a grizzled Turkish soldier, Chief in command of the forces in 'Akká. I am told that aka is the headquarters of the second largest military department in the Turkish Empire, and general in command of an eminent Páshá. Kerif Páshá was a different type of man from Liva Páshá but with the same kindly, sweet, gentle Oriental courtesy. He conversed with me about things Occidental, chiefly, that subject seeming to interest him more than anything else, asking me many questions about my country, all of which I answered him to the best of my ability, telling him of the wonderful material conditions there, of our means of transportation, through the air, on the surface and under the round. This visit, I might say, was a visit of courtesy to me as the friend of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I was impressed more than by anything else that I saw, with relation to 'Abdu'l-Bahá while I was in 'Akká, with the deference, amounting to reverence and friendship shown to him by all rich and poor, high and low. The Governor was his friend; the military men, from the humblest lieutenant to the General in command, seemed to revere him and he seemed to me to be more a personage of distinction and honor than a prisoner and exile, as he was.

Among other dignitaries who came to see me as the friend of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, was the Judge of the District, a splendid looking man, tall, full bearded, with a magnificent, dome-like head and a countenance of great intelligence and sweetness, a veritable Moses.

We conversed a long time. As I had found in interviews with others he seemed extremely interested in conditions in the West. He asked me many questions about my country, as had the generals. This was not the last visit that I received from the Judge. He came again and again, and the last day of my stay in ‘Akká, he came for a short talk in the Garden and to bid me farewell. As he was leaving, he turned to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and said to him, and to me in turn through my interpreter, “Tell our friend I have a brother whom I have not seen for twenty-five years; but since I have seen our friend, I have seen my brother.” A delightful compliment, and which one can appreciate more by know-the, the people among whom I then was. They are past masters in the art of compliment, and their courtesy is exquisite and beautiful.

Thursday evening, and the hour of my dinner engagement with Liva Páshá came, and I was told to be ready at seven o’clock. I was ready. I dressed myself with care in a black suit, wearing my Turkish fez, and awaited the coming of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Seven o’clock came, eight o’clock came, but no ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. I, with my Occidental notions of punctuality in such matters, was somewhat disturbed and wondered if I would not offend my host by being late – an unnecessary apprehension as I found afterwards. Word was finally brought to us that we were to go to the headquarters of Liva Páshá without ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. So we went, myself, Ameen and Kermani to the headquarters of the general, where we expected to find ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had not arrived and did not arrive until nearly nine o’clock. I, of course, was nervous and fidgety, as became an Occidental, under the circumstances. However, I did not notice any nervousness or apprehension on the part of my host, and I learned afterwards that such was the esteem in which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was held by all the people in that city, that were they to have an engagement with him to dine at eight o’clock and he did not come until eleven, he would find his hosts awaiting him unruffled and apparently unconcerned.

Finally ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared, and as he was the only one for whom they were waiting, we proceeded immediately to the dining hall, which was an immense stone chamber of solid masonry without pillar or column. The table from which we ate was of stone also.

Gathered around the table were Liva Páshá, our host, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the Judge of whom I have before spoken, the Surgeon-General of the Department, several other Turkish officers and civilians, Ameen, Kermani and myself. It proved a most delightful company. I found my companions humorous, capable of telling delightful stories, which were interpreted to me as they were told.

The dinner itself is indescribable. It was served in courses as we serve them knives, forks and spoons being provided for me the rest eating in true Oriental fashion with their fingers. As one dish was served, Liva Páshá turned me and said, "This dish was prepared by an artist." I replied, "I can very well believe it", for an anything more delicious I had never eaten. It was a chick prepared I know not how, but as I have said, delicious. Some sweetmeats were passed to and as the plate was put before me, I was told that these were called, "Judges mouths". I ate one and turning to the Judge said, "These are indeed sweet, and I can only say that I hope justice is always as sweet in the mouth of our friend as those condiments." This pleased the Judge very much for being an artist himself, he was able to appreciate art in another, for, as I have said before, they themselves are adepts in the art of compliment.

So the dinner preceded, one course following another and each one a surprise and a delight to the palate, until the end.

During our conversation at the table I sat at the right of Liva Páshá and engaged him in conversation most of the time, with frequent references to 'Abdu'l-Bahá when, suddenly, he turned to me and striking the table with his hand with great vehemence he said "We believe 'Abbás Effendi to be the greatest man living in the world today." I replied that many others held him in like esteem; that there were some in faraway lands, and that as of them had come from over the seas from a country where there were many who belived as he did,

That "He was the greatest man living in the world." This seemed to pleasure him, for I found afterwards that Liva Páshá was the devoted, loving friend of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and I believe a devotee. Liva, Páshá is now a member of the Turkish Parliament.

The dinner over we repaired to an anteroom where we sat and smoked and talked, the soldiers telling the stories of their adventures and experiences, and all seemed happy. 'Abdu'l-Bahá sat alone and solitary figure, apparently not interested in the conversation, nobody taking offense or seeming to notice it; but the instant that 'Abdu'l-Bahá indicated a desire to speak every voice was hushed and every head was bowed while He discourse. He told them that He, too, as a soldier, but that his warfare was not carnal; that he did not fight with the sword and with guns, but that His weapon was the Sword of the spirit, and His armor the Breastplate of Rightousness.

I was impressed, too, in my intercourse with these men, with the reverence manifested by them whenever the Deity was mentioned; and if a hope was expressed concerning anything, to Liva Páshá, his reply generally was, "Inshallah" which being interpreted means, "God willing." They seemed to me to be God-fearing man.

Nowhere in my life or in all my experiences with men of other nations have I come in contact with a nobler, a sweeter or a gentler manhood than I found in these Turkish soldiers and gentlemen. They were exquisite in their attentions to the stranger, careful to see that I was being supplied with whatever was being served. If my cigarette was burned out, another was instantly tendered, and altogether it was a most delightful and pleasant evening. Toward midnight I signified to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá my desire to retire, and my wish being indicated to my host, he immediately arose and putting on our shoes, he escorted me to the roadway, then taking me in his arms and giving me the Turkish salute, he said to our interpreter, “Tell my friend that I love him as a brother,” and bade me goodbye.

The story of my journey to ‘Akká would be incomplete, if I did not say a word about the manner in which the Anniversary of the Ascension of the Manifestation is observed. During this day no Bahá’í eats from morning until evening. An early breakfast is taken and the fast is not broken until after sundown. In the afternoon of this day we went to the little rest house erected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá located near the Holy Tomb. Shortly after our arrival we saw coming down the road a cavalcade of soldiers and others, and in their midst rode ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá reined in his little white ass at the gate of the house, a young Turkish officer, dismounting quickly from his horse went to the side of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and falling to his knee, assisted him to alight, after which he kissed his hand and remounted his horse. This devotion and attention to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was general. Everyone seemed to love him. A Turkish gendarme is sent with him wherever he goes for his protection, not as a guard. He was at that time allowed absolute freedom, and so careful were the authorities of his welfare, that wherever he went this guard accompanied Him.

No Bahá’í sleeps during the night following this day. At sundown a feast is prepared consisting of bread, fruit, tea and a freshly killed sheep. This meal is served by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s own hands. His guests are seated about the table, and He Himself goes about serving first one and then another, not neglecting even the humble Turkish soldier to was his guard and who loved Him. After his followers had eaten, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, himself sat down and, received food from their hands. After this tea is served, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá retires to the little upper room in the rest house before mentioned, and spends the time in meditation and prayer, frequently sending for one follower and then another for an interview.

Toward midnight he sent for me and the experiences and emotions of the few moments spent with him in the little upper room at midnight, I can never describe or forget. After my interview I returned to the others and sharply at midnight, a procession was formed and with slow reverential step marched to the Holy Tomb. Each one was provided with two candles which he carried in either hand. The uncle of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, of whom I have already spoken, the brother of Bahá’u’lláh, and myself, were requested to head the procession. At the word from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was started, and as we went up the little slope and came to the foot of the hill on which the tomb is located and then arrived at the top of the hill, I looked back and the scene in the soft moonlight and at that four of that band of devoted men each possessed in me a profound impression, such as I can never forget.

candles, stood them on the railing surrounding the Garden, while others thrust their candles in the earth, after which they gathered around the little garden seated on the ground in Oriental fashion,, to await the coming of the dawn. The thoughtfulness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed itself in my case, for known that I was an Occidental and unused to sitting as our Oriental brothers do I was provided with a chair placed on a platform raised just above the ground and next to the Tomb. Then began the reading, and chanting of the tablets, first by one and then another, and then by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself, until the dawn. The celebration of this day of the Ascension lasts from dawn to dawn, and ends with this ceremony at the tomb.

After the chanting of v, tablet by one of the brothers, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent word to me that he would like to have me sing one of our Christian hymns. He had heard me, I presume, in my room humming a tune now and then, and thinking I could sing, asked me to sing a hymn. You can refuse ‘Abdu’l-Bahá nothing, and whether I could sing or not, I would certainly have made the effort in deference to his request. I sang for him that familiar old Episcopal hymn:

“Wearied of life, and burdened with my sin,
I looked at Heaven and long to enter in;
But there no evil thing can find a home –
And yet I hear a voice that bids me come.”

I sang several verses of this hymn, and whether it was the influence of the scene or the cadence of my voice, different from what they were accustomed to, it affected them in such a way that many were sobbing, and when I had finished my hymn it seemed that all were weeping.

Thus the night wore away, until finally the dawn was announced, and with a benediction and blessing from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, we were dismissed.

I had not been told what this occasion was, but noticing that something unusual was transpiring, I had asked Ameen about it, and he had told me that it was the Anniversary of the Ascension of the Manifestation, and how it was observed. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, doubtless thinking that the ceremonies of the day would be irksome to me, had not told me about it’ but I, thus learning from Ameen what was transpiring, asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá if I might not participate in the proceedings of the day. He kindly assented; but fearing that I would not be able to last the night out, he had provided a place to which I might retire and sleep. But I disappoint them, much endurance as any without apparent effort. While we were sitting in the Garden along towards midnight, Kermani who is an exceedingly humorous character, was chaffing me about my ability to sit the night out. I assured him that I could. Once, after a lull in our conversation, I chanced to look at Kermani, and I noticed that his noble head was bowing and falling, and that finally it sunk upon his breast in sleep. I watched him for a moment or so and then touched him upon the knee. Upon his awakening, I said to him, through Ameen, “Could ye not watch with me one hour?” I shall never forget the benign look that he bent upon me as he said “O, my brother, I have been watching these seventy years.” My heart was touched, and for a moment I could say nothing. When I had received myself, I raised a prayer to heaven, that after seventy years I might be able to say as devotedly and as truly , that I had been watching all the years.

After the vigil at the tomb, we returned as we choose into the little rest house, where tea was served, and I was taken to the house of one of the friends, where I was privileged to go to bed for a few hours, after which we returned to ‘Akká.

This was Thursday. The following Monday I was to take ship from. Haifa on my return journey. Before my return, and in this interval. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá graciously accorded me an interview, in which I received his blessing, and instructions to go back to my people and tell them of the things that I had seen and heard in that land, and above all else, to tell the people to love one another. This I have tried to do ever since when the opportunity offered and the occasion permitted.

Upon my arrival in Paris I learned that many of our brethren in Persia had been martyred by the opposers and fanatics, I thereupon sent a telegram to the Sháh of Persia beseeching him to protect the Bahá’ís from the assaults of their enemies, and to permit them to worship God with freedom.

Upon my return to America I wrote the Sháh following letter:

As I reflect, after a lapse of nine years, upon the loving-kindness of God in permitting me to enter the light of his Glorious Kingdom in this wonderful Age, my mind reverts lovingly to that community of men and women surrounding 'Abdu'l Baba in that White City by the Tideless Sea dwelling together in peace and love and unity.

They know that their "Redeemer liveth, for have not their eyes beheld the Glory of the Coming of the Lord, the Manifestation of God, the Blessed Perfection?

They were his contemporaries his intimate associates; they walked with him, they talked with him and they ate at his table.

They are indeed a sanctified people, but it is not the sanctity of gloom, it is the sanctity of joy and gladness. They stood with him at the portals of the morn and beheld the approach and dawn of this new and glorious age, and have therefore a reason for the faith that is in them.

One never hears among them discussion of dogmatic theology or of doctrine, or of any questions that admit of doubt. The subject of reincarnation or of psychic phenomena never troubles them. They are of those who know, and the impression of fidelity and devotion to God and His Manifestation made upon those that visit them, is deep and indelible.

There is no doubt in their faces, and the story of their regeneration is shown in the love they bear one another and all mankind.

Love – love – all pervading love is the quality most apparent to all that go among them. They do indeed exemplify and live according to the new commandment that Christ gave to his disciples, "that ye love one another," and more, they love their enemies; and this indeed is the grand consummation of God's plan. As Christ came not to bring peace, but a sword and Muḥammad came with the sword, so our Lord, the Blessed Manifestation, came to establish a Day of Peace, and from henceforth the spirit of conciliation and concession will more and more control men and nations in their dealings with each other, until the time shall come when a resort to war for the settlement of national disputes will be unthought-of and unknown. Then will have come in truth the day when men shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

Dearly beloved of God this Era has already begun, the Sun is mounting into the zenith of the heavens of this perfect Day, and soon it shall shine upon all men, and all shall know that Lord is in his Holy Temple, and all the nations shall bow before Him, acknowledge Him and love Him, and in loving Him, they will love their kind. That is all there is – that ye love one another, and if we truly love one another we will forbear; thus fulfilling God’s greatest command, after first seeking his Kingdom and His Righteousness.

the Ascension

The story of my journey to ‘Akká would be incomplete, if I did not say a word about the manner in which the anniversary of the Ascension of the Manifestation is observed.

During this day no Bahá’í eats from morning until evening. An early breakfast is taken and the fast is not broken until after sundown.

In the afternoon of this day we went to the little Rest House erected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, located near the Holy Tomb. Shortly after we saw, coming down the road, a cavalcade of soldiers and others, and in their midst rode ‘Abdu’l-Bahá reined in His little white Ass, at the gate of house, a young Turkish Officer dismounting from his horse, went to the side of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and falling to his knee, assisted Him to alight, after which he kissed His hand and remounted his horse. This devotion and attention to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was general. Everyone seemed to love Him. A Turkish gendarme is sent with Him whenever He goes for His protection not as a guard. He was at that time allowed absolute freedom; but so careful were the authorities of His welfare, that wherever He went, gendarme accompanied Him.

No Bahá’í sleeps during the night following this day. At Sundown a Feast is prepared, consisting of bread, fruit, tea and a fresh killed sheep. This meal is served by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s own hands. His guests are seated about the table and He Himself goes serving, first one and then another, not neglecting even the humble Turkish soldier who was His attendant and who loved Him, After the followers had eaten ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sat down and received food from their hands. After this Tea is served, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá retires to the little upper room in the rest house before mentioned, and spends the time in meditation and prayer, frequently sending for one follower and then another for an interview.

Toward Midnight, He sent for me, and the experiences and emotions of the few moments spent with Him in the little upper room at Midnight, I can never describe or forget. After an interview, I returned to the other, and sharply at midnight, a procession was formed and with slow and reverential step marched to the Holy Tomb. Each one was provided with two candles which he carried in either hand. The Uncle of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, of whom I have already spoken, the brother of Bahá’u’lláh and myself were requested to head the procession. At the word from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we started, and as we went up the slope and came to the foot of the Hill on which the Tomb is located and then arrived at the top of the hill, I looked back and the scene in the soft moonlight and at that hour, of that band of devoted men, each possessed, I believe of the spirit of a martyr, was strange indeed, and produced in me a profound impression, such as I can never forget.

Arriving at the Tomb, some of the brothers, melted the wax from the candles, and stood them on the railings surrounding the Garden while others thrust their candles in the earth, after which they gathered around the little garden, seated on the earth in Oriental fashion, to await the coming of the dawn. The thoughtfulness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed itself in my case, for knowing that I was an Occidental and unused to sitting as our Oriental brothers do, I was provided with a chair placed on a platform raised just above the ground and next to the Tomb. Then began the reading and chanting of the Tablets, first by one and then another, and then by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself, until the dawn. The celebration of this day of the Ascension lasts from Dawn to Dawn, and ends with this ceremony at the Tomb.

After the chanting of a Tablet by one of the Brothers, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent word to me that He would like to have me sing one of the Christian Hymns. He had heard me, I presume, in my room humming a tune now and then, and thinking I could sing, asked me to sing a Hymn. You can refuse ‘Abdu’l-Bahá nothing, and whether I could sing or not, I would certainly made the effort in difference to His request. I sang for Him that grand old Episcopal Hymn: — “Weary of life, and burden with my sin, I look at heaven and long to enter in; But there no evil thing can find a home, and yet I hear a voice that bids me come.”

I sang several verses of this Hymn, and whether it was the influence of the scene or the cadence of my voice, different from what they were accustomed to, it affected them in such a way that many were sobbing, and when I had finished my Hymn, it seemed that all were weeping.

This night wore away until the coming of the dawn, when with a benediction and blessing from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, we were dismissed.

I had not been told what this occasion was, but noticing that something unusual was transpiring, I asked Amín about it, and he told me that it was the Anniversary of the Ascension of the Manifestation (Bahá’u’lláh) and how it was observed. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá doubtless thinking that the ceremonies of the day would be irksome to me, had not told me about it, but I, learning from Amín what was transpiring, asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá if I might not participate in the proceedings of the day. He kindly consented; but fearing that I would not be able to last the night out, He had provided a place to which I might retire and sleep; but I disappointed them, showing as much endurance as any, without apparent effort, while we were sitting in the garden along towards midnight, Kermani, who is an exceedingly humorous character, was chaffing me about my ability to sit the night out; I assured him that I could. ---

It is my great and blessed privilege to visit our Beloved Master in company with Mr., Mrs. Dodge and Mr., Mrs. Getsinger in the year 1900, and from September 25th, till October the 19th, we were permitted to meet with Him daily.

We arrived in Haiji September the twenty-fourth, and were met by many beautiful believers, and escorted to our Hotel at three o'clock in the morning, Mr. Haddad's face was the first to loan up in the darkness – and our happiness at seeing him was akin to that of being home.

Word was sent to our dear Master that we had arrived and soon after a Messenger came bearing fruit and messages of love from Him, telling of His happiness at our safe arrival, and later in the day come the word that He was ready to receive us. He had been moving His tent to be nearer to us, thus preventing Him from sending us earlier.

I shall not attempt to describe that visit, nor my first impression of Him, I could not put it into words what I felt. Nor can words describe Our Beloved Master. Nor does one fully realize His Greatness, His love and gentleness, humility and grandeur, till they have passed beyond that Presence for the last time, and then it comes gradually, and the farther one recedes, the greater He appears. Our Master was spending some time in Haija and the Greatest Holy Leaf, and two daughters of our Lord were keeping house for Him, so we were invited to take breakfast, with Him nearly every morning. We would arise at five o'clock and after a twenty minute walk we come to the little house at the foot of Mt. Carmel, almost in a straight line from the Tomb of the Báb. There we would sit for an hour with our Beloved Master, and in company with dear Abaul Fazal – would have such beautiful lessons.

Our Master told us one morning that there is such magnetism between souls of the same belief that when the heart is pure, we are instantly drawn toward one another, and that the progression of the Truth, depends upon our attitude toward one another. That we must put away all feeling of envy or malice and love each other with our whole hearts, for that is doing God's Will.

He told us from the time of Moses, all the Messengers of God and prophets, announced the coming of “God”, Enoch the seventh from Adam used to preach the coming of “God” and with thousand of “His Sainte” Jude prophesied that “God” could appear on the earth for judgement. Also Job 19th Chap. 25-26 verse. “I know that my Redeemer liveth, and “that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and in my flesh shall I see God”. The soul and spirit is an abstract essence, which is separable from the material body, as to its individuality and identity, but in reality is inseparable. There are many definitions for the soul; but the ones has been agreed upon by the learned people.

Utterances of our Blessed Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in His Exact Words

Breakwell, Hopper, Brittingham

September, 1901

The Master said that the differences between this Revelation and that of Jesus Christ are that, in this Cycle, all the inhabitants of the world will be gathered into one nation; universal peace will prevail; bloodshed and war will cease; there will be a general language; union and harmony will reach the highest state; there will be no bigotry. All will be gathered under the tent of peace. Before the universal peace is established there will be wars and a general overturning of society. These wars are to warn the people, so that they may learn, if they do not follow the teachings, they will be punished, for the power of the Spirit will be taken from them and they will become as lamps without light.

The differences between this Manifestation and that of Jesus Christ are:

- 1st. The teachings of Christ amounted to a very few pages, but the teachings of the Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh amounted to twenty books.
- 2nd. The teachings of the Manifestation are greater than the teachings of Jesus Christ. For example, from the teachings of the Manifestation you can do everything; they include everything.
- 3rd. Apparently Jesus Christ was opposed by the Jews only, but the Manifestation was opposed by the whole universe. Jesus Christ, on account of injury from the Jews, and their opposition, used to go from one place to another, but that the Manifestation stood before all was evident, as He was seen by all and did not hide Himself, even in a village. At all times He said, “I am ready”. He wrote to the King of Persia; “Let all the divines and doctors of law assemble together and discuss the matter with Me, and I am ready to prove it”.
- 4th. In the time of Jesus Christ the greatest one of the disciples was Peter, yet he denied his Master three times. But the followers of Bahá'u'lláh under the most severe torture, were repeating the Name of Bahá'u'lláh and never denied it, not only one, a hundred or a thousand, but twenty thousand followers hastened thus to martyrdom.
- 5th. The Cause of Jesus Christ existed for three hundred years before it became known, but the cause of the Manifestation, in the day of the Manifestation, was known all over the world.

6th. Jesus Christ came to establish proofs of the Old Testament, and this was for the Jews, a consequently His opposers were few, But the Manifestation came for all the world, and for all religions, and to explain all the Holy Books of those religions. Another proof was that during the imprisonment of the Manifestation the Governor and Officials were His humble servants. Even His enemies were submissive to Him. Because the Cause of the Manifestation is universal, it will envelop the world.

7th. The miracles which appeared through the Manifestation the Master did not like to mention, because they will not be proof to others. They were only a demonstration for those who witnessed them. If the Master mentions all of these, the people will say that the idol worshipers attributed many wonderful things to their idols. The hearer will say that is right and this is wrong. While the miracles which actually appeared in the time of the Manifestation are greater than all, the Master did not wish to mention them, for the Manifestation said that the miracles would be like a veil over the people, for in every time, the proofs (of this Word) will be so evident and clear that the people can understand them.

The Master said, if anyone asks you about the Manifestation, say He is the Trainer of the whole universe. His Teachings are the cause of the life of the worlds, the unity and harmony of the creatures, the agreement of the people, and the universal peace.

Every great thing of which we hear, and every great event in the world must have something that will stand steadfastly for it and to defend it. The greatness of the Cause will be as a flood. It will be like the waves of the Pacific Ocean. No other waves are as large. If the Cause is firm and on a good foundation, all these events which take place will be the cause of its assistance and promulgation. When the winds blow severely, the small trees will be uprooted, but the fixed and large trees will remain firm. This illustration is in harmony with this Cause. It must have great assistance. The opposition and rebellion of the people will be very great indeed, but power for the Truth. Thus, if we see that the nations and people act and exert their utmost to destroy this Cause becomes illuminated. So all must be like confirmed mountains; fixed and firm believers; but we must act through consciousness and wisdom. All of our deeds must be done in kindness. We must not fling wisdom away, but we must always seize it. Be assured and confident that the assistance of God will be poured out upon you. The servants of GOD are the victors and they are the hosts of GOD. Meditate upon the time after Christ and upon this time and you will understand.

Once the Manifestation was imprisoned and chains were around His neck. At this time the Master was with some of the believers in another place, and the people finally captured Him also. The boys of this place gathered together and began to beat Him; about two or three hundred children surrounded Him. It may come to pass that the people will curse the believers, beat them, injure them, abuse them and do harm to them, and even cause animosity between them. GOD willing that you may be steadfast and firm and never be shaken. But under all kinds of tribulation you must always keep in mind the LOVE of the Master and remember to what a great degree He loves you.

Explanation of the First Portion of the Second Commune, which is taken from the “PRAYER OF THE DAWN”

This “Letter” means a person. As the Word came forth from the Mouth, that person is the reflection of the Light of GOD. It is the Letter in which all the mysteries of the Holy Books. It is the Letter that came forth from the Mouth of the Blessed Perfection. “The seas moved” — the seas of existence; the seas of life; the seas of science; the seas of knowledge; the seas of understanding; the seas of the Love of GOD rolled. “The wind did blow” — these breezes are the causes of life to the trees. These are the fragrances which will revive the beloved of the Kingdom of GOD, and which will cause the fragrance to exhale from them.

“The fruits appeared” — the new conditions upon the earth began to manifest and appear.

“The trees began to thrive” — the trees are the people in the Paradise of ABHÁ, who, through the fragrance of this letter will be nourished.

“The traces were destroyed” — these are the ancient traces which are destroyed by the Light. For example, the radiance of the Sun will destroy the sparkling of the star.

Personal Impressions of the Master

Charles Mason Remey

---

605 Corcoran Building, Washington, D.C., Sept. 1905.

Dear Co-worker, In His Holy Cause: —

I send you the following extract from a paper which, at the request of a brother Believer, I prepared to be read before some Truth Seekers. I trust it may be of sore assistance to you in your work of spreading the Glad Tidings of The Final Fulfillment of GOD'S Covenant with His People.

Statement of a few personal impressions of the Master together with some observations regarding His Title of "The Center of The Covenant".

During my stay of eleven days in The Master's house in March 1901, I was constantly impressed by His wisdom and understanding, not only of the visible or objective things of life, but more especially of those Unseen spiritual conditions of being which, because they are not seen with the physical eye, nor comprehended by mental reason alone, are the more difficult to understand. These soul conditions are the very root and cause of the visible or objective conditions to which man finds himself subject.

Through the Master's Teaching one realizes that the outer man is but the manifestation of the inner or spiritual man, and that in order to permanently correct and perfect the outward condition of mankind the remedy must be applied to the understanding of the real cause of these conditions. The Master's wisdom is the real wisdom — which has to do with this invisible or spiritual side of existence.

I saw The Master as the Divine Physician of mankind. The one who knows and understands all conditions of soul, for his understanding penetrates deeper than the mind. I was deeply impressed by his understanding of my inner-self.

One would naturally resent any one's attempt at reading his thoughts, but how different is his attitude towards one who from a height of soul unfoldment (gained, through sacrifice and suffering, for the Christ Life can be obtained only in this way), can penetrate the heart and silently give that divine strength and assurance — which every soul craves.

Man has a divine nature and that nature needs to be fostered and nourished. This craving for divine knowledge is but the manifestation of laws working in the spiritual realm, analogues to those which we see everyday working upon the lower planes. This divine law The Master understands. He gives us his strength to help us over rough places and at the same time he shows us and teaches us how to understand our own spiritual needs and how through obedience to this higher law, to keep our souls nourished and alive in GOD.

The advice and admonitions of The Master are both special and general in their natures. To individual souls he gives special and personal advice, through the carrying out of which each soul receives strength and enrichment. To his followers, the Bahá'ís as a body, he gives general instructions and admonitions applicable to all, and which when acted upon are conducive to the spread of divine knowledge and unity, and to the general welfare of the body of Believers as a whole. Thus it will be seen that the Masters work is that of leading souls to GOD. In this day all depends upon his guidance, and at the same time, all depends upon whether or not we are willing to be led by Him in the Divine Way.

Not every one who visits the Master and sees him with the outward eye, sees him with the inner spiritual eye. Outwardly he is like any other man, but inwardly he is entirely different. He stands unique! The indwelling spirit within him we only see as we look beyond his human personality. When we do this, we see that his personality is but the servant of the spirit within, and when once we see and understand this; we are prepared to have revealed to us the knowledge which he has in store for us.

In attaining to the presence of the Master the one thing to be avoided is the veil of our own personal imaginations and self-dependence. He teaches us to place our dependence upon GOD, and to be guided by His Holy Spirit. His message is a spiritual one which we must hear with our spiritual ears through the voice of the spirit. When we go to the Master, free from all thought of self, laying aside our own wishes and devices, and with open hearts earnestly seeking the light which he has, then we are in a condition to receive in the fullest measure those divine blessings which he has in store for us. On the other hand if we go to him self-sufficient and with our hearts closed we have neither eyes to see nor ears to hear what he has to impart to us.

The Covenant of GOD made with mankind through the Prophets of the past, and which He has renewed from time to time since the beginning of history through His various revelations, has been consummated in this Latter Day Revelation. The Promise given was that the People of GOD would inherit the earth. By this was meant that the Christ Life within man would predominate and overcome his human and animal natures, and that divine law should supplant that of men upon the earth. By the outpouring of Truth through the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh this divine state of man is being realized, and we now have the Final Fulfillment of The Great Promise of GOD to His People.

The Master was the first to recognize and declare Bahá'u'lláh as the promised teacher and deliverer of the world, and he was the first to attain to the station of perfect submission to the Devine Will, from whence comes his name “‘Abdu’l-Bahá” which means, “Servant of GOD”.

This is the highest condition of spiritual attainment and is the practical application of the divine or Christ Life.

The Mission of The Master is that of establishing within our reach, and making ready and possible the way for the people of the World to receive the Truth revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. This abundance of Truth or Divine Life is always to remain with mankind upon the earth as a testimony of the fulfillment of GOD's Promise to the world. The Master is the First Fruit of the Consummation of the fulfillment of this promise, and is the Center from which the Light is now being radiated to the people of all nations of the world. Therefore he in his mission lives and exemplifies in every way his title of “The Center of The Covenant”.

Visit with the Master

605 Corcoran Building, Washington, D. C. Sept. 1905.

Dear Co-worker,

In His Holy Cause:

I send you the following extract from a paper which, at the request of a brother Believer, prepared to be read before some Truth Seekers. I trust it may be of sore assistance to you in your work of spreading the Glad Tidings of The Final Fulfilment of GOD'S Covenant with His People.

Statement of a few personal impressions of the Master together with some observations regarding His Title of "The Center of The Covenant".

During my stay of eleven days in The Master's house in March 1901, I was constantly impressed by His wisdom and understanding, not only of the visible or objective things of life, but more especially of those Unseen spiritual conditions of being which, because they are not seen with the physical eye, nor comprehended by mental reason alone, are the more difficult to understand. These souls' conditions are the very root and cause of the visible or objective conditions to which man finds himself subject.

Through the Master's Teaching one realizes that the outer man is but the manifestation of the inner or spiritual man, and that in order to permanently correct and perfect the outward condition of mankind the remedy must be applied to the understanding of the real cause of these conditions. The Master's wisdom is the real wisdom which has to do with this invisible or spiritual side of existence.

I saw The Master as the Divine Physician of mankind. The one who knows and understands all conditions of soul, for his understanding penetrates deeper than the mind. I was deeply impressed by his understanding of my inner-self.

Man has a divine nature and that nature needs to be fostered and nourished. This craving for divine knowledge is but the manifestation of laws working in the spiritual realm, analogues to those which we see every day working upon the lower planes. This divine law The Master understands. He gives us his strength to help us over the rough places and at the same he shows us and teaches us how to understand our own spiritual needs and how through obedience to this higher law; to keep our souls nourished and alive in GOD.

The advice and admonitions of The Master are both special and general in their natures. To individual souls he gives special and personal advice, through the carrying out of which each soul receives strength and enlightenment. To his followers, the Bahá'ís as a body, he gives general instructions and admonitions applicable to all, and which when acted knowledge and unity, and to the general welfare of the body of believers as a whole. Thus it will be seen that The Master's work is that of leading souls to GOD. In this day all depends upon his guidance, and at the same time all depends upon whether or not we are willing to be led by him in the Divine Way.

Not everyone who visits The Master and sees him with the outward eyes him with the inner spiritual Outwardly he is like any other man, but inwardly he is entirely different. He stands unique! The indwelling spirit within him we only see as we look beyond his human personality. When we do this we see that his personality is but the servant of the spirit within, and when once we see and understand this; we are prepared to have revealed to us the knowledge which he has in store for us.

In attaining to the presence of The Master the one thing to be avoided is the veil of our own personal imaginations and self-dependence. He teaches us to place our dependence upon GOD, and to be guided by His Holy Spirit. His message is a spiritual one which we must hear with our spiritual ears through the voice of the spirit. When we go to the Master, free from all thought of self, laying aside our own wishes and devices, and with open hearts earnestly seeking the light which he has, then we are in a condition to receive in the fullest measure those divine blessings which he has in store for us. On the other hand if we go to him self-sufficient and with our hearts closed we have neither eyes to see, nor ears to hear what he has to impart to us.

The Covenant of GOD made with mankind through the Prophets of the past, and which He has renewed from time to time since the beginning of history through His various revelations, has been consummated in this Latter Day Relation. The Promise given was that the People of GOD would inherit the earth. By this was meant that the Christ Lifer within man would predominant and overcome his human and animal natures, and that divine law should supplant that of men upon the earth. By the outpouring of Truth through the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh this divine state of man is being realized, and we now have the Final Fulfilment of The Great Promise of GOD to His people.

The Master was the first to recognize and declare Bahá'u'lláh and the promised, teacher and of the world, and he was the first to attain to the station of perfect submission to the Divine Will, from whence comes his name “‘Abdu’l-Bahá which means, servant of GOD”.

This is the highest condition of spiritual attainment and is the practical application of the divine or Christ Life.

The Mission of The Master in that of establishing within our reach, and making ready and possible the way for the people of the world to receive the Truth revealed by Bahá’u’lláh. This abundance of Truth or Divine Life is always to remain with kind upon the earth as a testimony of the fulfilment of GOD’s Promise to the world. The Master is the First Fruit of consummation of the fulfilment of this promise, and is the Center from the Light is now being radiated to the people of all nations of the world. Therefore he in his mission lives and exemplifies in every way his title of “The Center of The Covenant”.

Paris, France. August 12th, 1907.

To Mrs. A.M. Bryant.

Dear Bahá’í Friend:

Since attaining to the visit of the “Master” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, now one month ago, I have had it in my heart to write to the Believers in America but because of the unrest of travel and of meeting people this is the first moment when conditions have been favorable to letter writing.

After some delays and trials of travel Mr. Phelps and I reached Acre on July 12th. We had arrived at Haifa on the previous day where we received word to go over to Acre for the day. Some trouble had recently-manifested itself on the part of the Government authorities, so probably this was the reason that we did not remain over night in Acre. During that day’s visit we met the Master several times, and delivered to him the letters and messages which we brought, from the friends on the other side of the water. I was permitted to mention your name to him, together with those of some other friends and he said – “Give my love and Greeting to each of these”. To the Believers in general our Lord sent his love and glad tidings of Joy and Peace, saying that it was through joy and love and peace, that the followers of the Blessed Perfection must meet and overcome the world. The more people oppose us, the more gentle, long suffering and loving we should be towards them. Between the Believers themselves, nothing but the most perfect accord, union and love should exist. They should sacrifice themselves for one another. This is conducive to unity and steadfastness which are the foundation of the well being of the Holy Cause.

The Master also wished me to tell the Believers how impossible it is for him to answer each letter sent to him, or even to answer one in ten, so great are the demands upon his time. He said that the Friends were always in his prayers and thoughts and that in spirit he was with them always.

Although we were with the Master but a few brief hours, our souls were rejoiced and filled to overflowing with that love which he alone can impart.

In this day the greatest blessing and bounty of God, is to realize the exalted station of Our Lord 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Exalted through his humility, servitude and daily martyrdom in the Path of God. He alone is making the way of the Kingdom possible to us. Without him as our leader we would indeed be lost. Let us lose no time in offering ourselves, our likes and dislikes and our all in his path.

This Cause will only flourish through its followers giving themselves heart and soul in the Holy Work. If we fail God will raise others to do His Work, so let our united prayer be to stand united and steadfast in His Service.

On the second day after our first visit to the Holy City we again spent a few hours in the Master's house, and then with no desire in our hearts save that of going back into our fields of work we left His Presence.

On returning to Haifa Mr. Phelps sailed immediately for Port Sa'íd and America, while two days later I sailed for Beirut from whence I came to Paris, and will later visit London in accord with the Master's instructions. God willing I will return to America the latter part of September.

On leaving Acre after our first visit we stopped to worship, at the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. You have heard our pilgrims speak of worshiping at this Holy spot. It is an experience which finds no expression in words. While worshiping I made a supplication for you the blessing of which I already feel in myself, in that thereby we have been brought nearer together.

Greetings in the Holy Name.

Your brother in service, Charles Mason Remey.

Notes Taken at Haifa

Ethel Rosenberg

Feb. and Mar. 1901

---

The question was asked whether, after the further declaration of this Truth, would the millennium begin at once?

No, gradually, for a plant that grows too quickly lasts only a very short time.

It is necessary to use judgment and common sense in declaring this truth. In Ṭihrán for example, where it is thoroughly well known, the teaching and speaking of it may be quite open; but in Khurasán where it is but little known, discretion must be used, and the same holds good in England, where it is as yet very little known. In Chicago, where it has been much taught, and written of in journals, it may be quite frankly spoken of.

Through all trials and distresses men gain great spiritual powers — and humiliation is the road to exaltation and honor. Because Moses, as a babe, chose the fire and had his tongue burned, therefore in after life, God endowed his mouth with great eloquence. Had not Joseph been sold as a slave, never would he have become the mighty ruler of Egypt.

Reference was made to the recently discovered “Sayings of Jesus”, found on the papyrus book in Egypt, and especially to the saying ‘Lift the stone and thou shalt find me. Cleave the wood, and there am I.’

Our Lord said that as we can only see different objects by the light of the Sun — one might in one sense, and with truth say that the sun is in everything, filling everything. In this sense also is Our Lord Christ in everything. As all things are nourished and sustained by the Light and warmth of the sun, so are all created beings filled with the overflowing bounty of Christ.

In the gospel it is said (St. Luke, ch. xii, 4) “Be not afraid of them that kill the body — and after that have no more that they can do. But I will tell you whom ye shall fear: Fear Him, which after He hath killed power to cast into hell. Yea, I say unto you, fear Him.” Our Lord said that this means that the death of the body is of no importance and not in the least to be feared, because a spiritual soul lives for ever. But the thing to be feared, is the death of the spirit.

It is said of Mary Magdalen that out of her went seven devils. This means seven evil qualities which Jesus cast out of her by teaching her the truth. She was not such a bad woman as some suppose before her conversion, but the wonder is that such a saint and miracle of purity and goodness could have been created by the New Birth. She was greater than all the disciples of Jesus because she alone stood firm after His death and never wavered.

The Parable of the Ten Virgins

The word Virgins, means those who are free from ties of this world, unspotted from the world, and empty — ready to be filled.

There are, for example, two kinds of sticks which we can imagine to be put aside for the fire. One is a damp stick, the other is a stick of alloo (a very dry kind of wood). When in contact with the fire, the damp stick will not ignite; but the other is dried up and ready to be ignited at once. So some people have the capacity to receive the light of God — others are full of earthiness (dampness) and cannot receive it. Some of the attributes of those people possessing this capacity are, for example, Devotion, Attraction towards God, Separation from the world. These, when trials come, are able to sustain calamities in the cause of God. But, though, sometimes flames will appear in damp fuel, they soon become extinguished.

The first necessity for us is to increase this capacity for light. The sun is always shining and brilliant, but the blind can never see it. We must train this capacity to receive the Divine Bounty. The oil in the Parable signifies this capacity. All food is good and a gift if God, but we must have the appetite to eat it. Suppose that rain is falling in abundance, no good is done by it to a salt desert, which only grows thorns and useless plants.

Resurrection

Jesus Christ had two bodies — one spiritual and one material.

The material body is of no importance; it changes and changes and changes always. An old person's body is not the same, as that of the same individual when young.

The visible world does nothing but change, and change leads to annihilation.

We must be sure that when the soul of man leaves his body, it never returns to that body again.

In the Gospel record, when Jesus Christ was crucified and ascended, Mary Magdalen and the other disciples had fallen into such a state of excitement and agitation, that during three days the cause of God was annihilated for them. After three days their agitation having abated, they realised that the cause of Jesus Christ, and His teaching was everlasting in the world. The disciples would not at first write to the other believers openly that Jesus was crucified till Mary Magdalen said to them what does it matter; His soul is with us. When Jesus was crucified, some said "His religion is annihilated and gone." Mary Magdalen said "Matter is gone, and flesh — but the soul of the religion is for ever."

Thomas was a feeble character who believed the cause was lost: after a little time he saw that though Jesus was killed, the cause of God still continued, and then he realised and believed.

After the death of the Blessed Perfection, one day the chief Muḥammadan priest of 'Akká came to our Lord, and said he had seen the door of his room open and the Blessed Perfection came into his room. This was the Truth and Cause of the Blessed Perfection which manifested itself and its continuance to him in this way.

To those who say Jesus Christ came back to earth in his earthly; they should reflect that Jesus Christ was thirty — three years old at the time of His death. According to medical science it is established that in thirty years a man's body has been completely changed at least three times. If it was the body of the third decade of His life which revived, what became of the other two?

The Perfections and characteristics of God towards man are not conditional upon any fact. God is merciful to man, and His mercy does not depend on the fact of Jesus Christ having done anything; but He is always sacrificed and this is the great question of the Mystery of Self — Sacrifice.

The Mystery of Self — Sacrifice

Our Lord said that the Prophets and Suns of God possessed two states or conditions. 1. The Spiritual. 2. The Material.

In the spiritual state or condition they reflect entirely the perfect Bounties of God, and His Perfections, such as Love, Joy, Goodness, Mercy, etc. etc., but these perfections they sacrifice and give, as a free gift to the people, without hope or idea of any return to themselves. For example, consider a growing tree — the sun shines upon it, the rain falls, and the breezes blow upon it. Then by the grace and power of God, the earth gives its strength to the tree, and it grows and lives. The tree then gives this power which it receives from the earth to the twigs, branches and leaves, which begin to grow strong and flourish; and in time it gives its power to make blossoms and fruits appear upon them. So Our Lord Christ gives His Perfection and Graces which He receives from God to the people; to make them grow and be strong and live, and He keeps nothing back for Himself.

Now in the second, or bodily condition of the prophet He also sacrifices and gives all these perfections to the people.

It is natural to man that his eyes should enjoy beautiful objects and views, but our Lord Jesus Christ never walked abroad for the purpose of this pleasure and enjoyment. He gave His perfect sight to the people. The ears love to listen to beautiful music and harmony, but Christ listened to the wailing and sighing of humanity.

It is natural to man to enjoy repose and the rest of sleep but Christ never forsook His work on account of weariness. And so with all the bodily and material comforts, which man naturally enjoys, He sacrificed them all to the people; yea, even giving His own life.

The Miracle of Walking on the Water

In this story of our Lord Jesus, the sea of Tiberias represents the Ocean of Creation, the two shores represent earthly truth. The boat (or ark) stands for the arguments and reasons by which men acquire knowledge, and in this boat Jesus' disciples were tossed on the waves of the Ocean of Creation. The shores which Jesus left in order to come to them, walking on the water, represents earthly knowledge. The haven and shore to which He guided them represent spiritual knowledge. There are three ways of apprehending truth. First the earthly way, by means of the five senses, second, the way by argument and reasoning, and all philosophers have taught that it was possible to reach the knowledge of all truth by this method. Third, the spiritual way, by which man receives knowledge from the inner light or inspiration.

The ancient philosophers, and indeed philosophers of all time, that the first method, that is by means of the five senses, was the one certain way of knowing truth. For example, when you see a large mass of water you know that it is the sea — and nothing contradicts that fact. But when you reflect deeply, you will see that this means knowing, is not to be absolutely relied upon. For instance, when you are in a steamer sailing along rapidly, the evidence of your sight tells you that the shore is moving, but you know this to be false. If you look at the heavens and behold the sun, your eyes assure you that it rises every day, and travels across the sky: but science has disproved this. If you take a small piece of fire, or lighted stick, attached to the end of a string, and whirl it round very fast, the appearance is that of a circle of fire. Again, people in the desert often see a most beautiful mirage of trees and water, but the nearer you approach to this phantasm, the more it fades away, and you begin to perceive its unreality. All this proves that the evidence of the senses alone is not to be realised on for conveying the truth.

The ancient philosophers have also taught that by the intellect (the second method of argument and reasoning) accurate and absolute knowledge of everything can be obtained. They said that they could prove the existence of God by the existence of force and motion (the mover, and the thing moved.)

They explained that motion is impossible without One who causes the movement. They observed the heavens and the motion of the seven chief planets, which they conceived to be caused by the movements of eight successive crystalline spheres enclosed within a ninth and outer one, which by its motion caused all the other to move. But later philosophers have said that these crystalline spheres are non-existent; that the planets are suspended in space and moved by the force of gravitation, attraction, etc., thus entirely contradicting ancient theories. These philosophers also said that as they could observe no movement or change in the heavens, they were therefore pre — existent and eternal. All these statements have been refuted. It is therefore evident that we cannot rely on this second method of obtaining knowledge, to ensure absolute accuracy. Successive philosophers are always contradicting each other and propounding diverse theories. If absolute knowledge was to be obtained by this means, the wisest philosophers would agree in saying the same things.

There is yet a third method of acquiring knowledge — by Revelation, or the Inspired Books, but the difficulty in this is that every person's interpretation of the book is coloured by his own individuality. In the time of Christ the Jews were prevented from accepting Him by clinging to the literal interpretation of their book. They searched their scriptures and prophecies and said "What we find in these writings does not agree with what we know of this man of Nazareth, but is rather against his claims."

As we have before said, in the account of this miracle, the disciples of Jesus attempted to sail over the sea of creation and existence in the Ark of Argument and Reasonings finding great difficulty and danger in proving the truth by so doing. But when Christ, the light of the world who knew all things by the Light of the inner spiritual illumination came to them in their boat, — walking by His knowledge over the Ocean of Existence, and having no need of the Ark of Argument — then immediately they were at their desired haven.

Our Lord said that all miracles have their mystic and hidden meaning enfolded within them, and that this miracle of the walking on the water is of the very first importance.

The Holy Spirit

Always from the earliest ages, the conception of the Trinity has been present. In the time of Moses the idea of the Trinity was shown in 1. God, 2. the Speaker of Mount Sinai, and 3. the Fire (which corresponds to our idea of the Holy Spirit).

In the time of Abraham, the Angels and God. As an illustration of the Trinity, take Light or illumination. There is the Light — giver, the Sun (God), the Light — receiver, and the ray of Light connecting the two. Again, there is the giver of Bounty, the receiver of the Bounty, and the Bounty, which is the Holy Spirit. Also the Quickener, the Quickened and the Life or Holy Spirit; the Gifts, Influence, Graces and Attributes of God showered upon man, are the Holy Spirit.

The Teaching of Children

We must be guided entirely by the intelligence and developments of the child, as to how soon we should begin to teach it.

A woman reaches the age of maturity at the age of twenty, and must then certainly receive the full teaching.

Many a child of ten is sufficiently developed and advanced to receive some teaching; and some are ready for it at the age of eight or nine.

The great thing that it is necessary to teach children is to be characterised with the Attributes of God, and to be good. Their hearts and minds must be prepared to receive the truth, as soon as they are old enough to be taught everything — but children should not be taught facts and details which they may not, during the present circumstances of faith, speak of openly to their fellows and companions.

Praying Public and Private

There are two forms of prayer in this religion, that is, the Obligatory Prayers which are 1. The Long Obligatory Prayer, 2. The Daily Prayer beginning “O my God, strengthen Thou these hands, etc.”, 3. The short one. One of these prayers must be used three times daily, according to the circumstances and time at the disposal of the believers using them. These obligatory prayers are entirely personal between the individual and God.

There is also the form of prayer to which the name ‘Supplication’ has been given, in the translations, which may certainly be used in public. That is, if you should desire to ask God anything, you may certainly do so in an assembly of believers. Chanting may also be used. But this religion has no set form of public worship.

Concerning the Teaching

Good people are of two kinds — those who are so by natural goodness of heart, and those who attain to this state by an after gift of the spirit. All those who are truly taught of God will accept this truth when presented with them, but, as it takes some fruits much longer to ripen than others, so some will accept it immediately, and others after a long time of gradual ripening in the Sun.

It is of course a great sin to reject these teachings and it is our duty to persuade and teach people to embrace this truth; but if they should reject it, we must bear it with patience and we are to remain towards them exactly what we were before. If, however, you find a person leading a truly good earnest life, who does not wish to hear or receive these teachings, you are to remember what our Lord Jesus said, “He that is not against me, is with me.”

The reason why some missionaries, monks, etc., who spend their whole time in praying and reading holy books, do not accept this truth is because though they act in this way, their hearts are really still with this world.

Wine — drinking

In reality wine or spirits, taken even in moderate quantities does not permanent good. It is like urging a horse to full speed by whipping him. The whip represents the effect of wine on man’s body.

Wine taken as a medicine for weak people, who have all their lives been used to it, is permitted. But they must on no account allow their children to drink wine or alcoholic drinks. Our Lord spoke of the Druses who never drank wine or smoked, and in consequence of this many diseases were quite unknown to them.

Muḥammad

There are many references in the Bible to Muḥammad. In Rev. xii the woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, represents the Mahomedan religion. The sun and the moon are the Persian and Turkish Empires. The twelve stars around her head represent the twelve Imáms.

In the New Testament, John I. 25 “Why baptizest thou then, if thou be not that Christ, nor Elias, neither that prophet?” “That Prophet” signifies Muḥammad — but Christians have not understood these references in their own Bible. Also in St. John, ch. xvi, v.7 — 15. The “Advocate” and the “Spirit of Truth” here spoken of signify Muḥammad. ‘Alí Qulí Khán asked our Lord which was the greater — Jesus Christ or Muḥammad. Our Lord said the Mahomedans were accustomed to think Muḥammad the greatest, because of His title “Seal of the Prophets”, but in the time of Jesus spirituality and the spiritual Life was far greater.

Great Prophets

Our Lord said that it was quite true that all the Great Prophets, — the Suns of God, — are without sin; though the word prophet is used in more senses than one by the Jews. A great prophet is always one to whom revealed writings have come. The only parts of the Bible we should count as sacred and inspired, are these revealed writings and visions.

With regard to the Books of Moses, only those parts are sacred which contain his inspired writings, such as the Ten Commandments, etc. The rest are more books of history, written much later than the time of Moses, and often are not literally true.

Isaiah is a true prophet; but the book of Esther is a mere tradition of story. In Solomon’s Song the symbolism which is used throughout it of a bride and bridegroom, is true symbolism and allegory — no real bride and bridegroom are intended.

David was a great saint, but not a great prophet, and many of the statements made about him are not accurate.

It is well known that when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Syria, he destroyed the whole of the Israelitish books and records. It is only needful for us to read and study the inspired and revealed parts of the Bible, the other parts are no more sacred than other books of history. The story of Joshua causing the sun to stand still is an allegory; for it means that he was so steadfast and true in the faith, that during his lifetime the sun of Moses never set, or went below the horizon.

Buddha

Buddha was a very good man — a divine philosopher, but not a great prophet. Many of his moral teachings greatly resemble those of Jesus. The doctrine of re-incarnation as taught by the Buddhists, and some ancient philosophers is not true. It was largely invented by those people who clung to this world, and loved it so, that they could conceive of no happiness apart from it. All those souls who are truly severed from this world and from everything save God, have always longed to depart and go onwards to a more spiritual existence. Many of the theosophists have said that it was necessary for people to return again and again, in order gradually to attain to perfection. But there is no spiritual benefit in mere length of time! Those who receive the Holy Spirit, can instantly become perfect.

Taken for an illustration the olive trees, which exist for thousands of years; yet they have not by this duration of time attained to the life and development of the animal kingdom. Whereas a small insect existing for only a few day or hours belongs to it. Indeed, many of the ancient philosophers evolved this idea of re-incarnation, in order to fill and void or flaw in their doctrines. They believed that material existence was all, for they had not attained as we have to the knowledge of the spiritual existence beyond; and they thought it was necessary for the sake of Justice, that a man should be re-born on this earth again and again.

No infant is ever born bad — all infants are born alike good, but their education and surroundings and their individuality make them become what they afterwards are. As everything is possible with God, He might grant return as a special gift and grace to some people. Amongst the many prophets, only Elias was said to return, and he did so.

The Devil

The word devil or satan as used in St. John viii “Ye are of your father the devil” means that the Pharisees were not true children of Abraham, or of God — for they had been so, in this case they would not have shown forth good qualities and attributes whereas they showed forth only evil qualities, such as envy, malice, uncharitableness, etc.

The word Satan has many meanings.

Every great prophet of God always has an active opponent or satan, who shows forth opposite characteristics.

In the time of the Prophet Adam, His opponent was Azazel.

The opponent of Abraham was Nimrod. Of Moses... Pharaoh. Of Jesus Christ... Caiaphas. Of Muḥammad... Abu Sufyán. Of the Báb... Ḥájí Muḥammad Karím Khán. Of the Manifestation... Şubḥ-i-Azal. Or Our Lord... His brother, Muḥammad-‘Alí.

In the gospels a man is spoken of out of whom went seven devils, that is seven bad qualities.

Again, there is a devil within man, just as there is the divine voice within man. Anything that for the time makes you become heedless of God is your satan.

In the story of the Pharisee and the tax-gatherer praying at the Temple, the self-righteousness of the Pharisee was his devil, whereas the sins and shortcomings of the tax-gatherer, which drew him towards God to confess and entreat pardon for them, became his angel.

The word devil or Satan means the opponent of God; there is no great entity of that name.

In answer to a question as to why in the Old Testament the prophets and saints hurled such denunciations upon wicked people, and prayed for their utter destruction, our Lord said that these prophets' denunciations and curses were not directed against the people, to whom they had no animosity, but against their bad and evil qualities. A gardener would be a bad gardener if he allowed rank and noxious weeds to grow up amongst his choice plants and beautiful flowers; he must weed them out and destroy them in order to protect and foster the lives of the precious and beautiful plants. It is not that he hates the weeds, and wishes them evil, but he cherishes and protects his flowers by removing them. When a doctor gives a sick person quinine, which is a very bitter medicine, it is not because he wishes to do ill to the sick man, but to destroy his disease. In our religion it is in no case allowable to use force or violence against those of an opposite faith.

The Justice and Mercy of God

A question was asked as to whether those people who had committed a great evil in this present life, and had died in their sins, would be hopelessly lost or destroyed — our Lord said —

Two great attributes of God are His Justice and His Mercy.

By the justice and judgment of God, those who commit evil suffer and are punished for it, and eternal punishment is merited by those evil-doers.

But mercy is by far the greatest of the divine attributes, and owing to this great mercy of God, those who die in their sins are not left without the possibility of attaining to life.

By the expressions hell-fire, and punishment, is not meant suffering inflicted by God, but simply the being deprived from the sight of His Beauty. For example, when a man is blind we say that it is the greatest possible affliction that he can have; but this affliction and suffering does not consist in any torture inflicted upon him; it merely consists in the absence of a great blessing, and this is his affliction.

Darkness is not a positive quality, but a negative one — merely the absence of light. So this punishment spoken of in the Bible is negative, and consists in being debarred from the Presence of God.

The Harmony and Unity of Believers

With reference to the wonderful harmony and unity existing between the Persian Believers, and also between those in Paris, and in England, Our Lord said this was but the dawn of what would be the case in the future. In time to come, one believer will represent all, because they manifest the Oneness of God.

The reason that in the Muḥammadan writings it is always said that Jesus Christ has gone into the Fourth Heaven, is because they conceive the Fourth Heaven to be the central one of the seven, in which the material sun abides. So they say Jesus who was the Sun of Truth, and Light of the world, now dwells in this Fourth Heaven.

Universal Peace

Our Lord said the Blessed Perfection had revealed secretly in a Tablet some words about Universal Peace. And also, just before His Ascension, He had revealed another tablet about the Universal Peace which should prevail between all the peoples of the world. We now see the effects of these words spoken by the Blessed Perfection, in the fact of the Czar of Russia having called all nations to a Peace Conference, and in the various societies and organisations for promoting peace, which are now seen in the world.

Two of the signs of the Manifestations of the Cause of God, are the preaching and acceptance of the religion of God — and also that the people shall be endowed with the characteristics of God. We are now seeing the first sign — and we must hope and pray that we may see the second sign also fulfilled. Many advances of the nations in civilisation and humanity are caused by the presence of this religion in the world, without their knowing the reason of this advance. There is a prophecy in the Mahommedan writings, saying that the standard of Truth shall be unfurled first in the East and then the West, and this saying we see fulfilled in our day.

People were always enquiring why, if this religion was such a great one, did not more people hear of it in the life — time of the Blessed Perfection forgetting that in the time of Jesus Christ, when He was at Nazareth, the people of ‘Akká even had not heard of Him; and when He died His followers numbered about 120.

Whereas this message had been written to all the kings and potentates of the earth, and had been made known amongst many nations, during the lifetime of the Blessed Perfection. The first of the ‘Letters to the Kings’ which was written to Napoleon III, was quite a short one and was to the effect that God had blessed him (Napoleon) with great powers and influence; and requesting him to enquire why these Bahá'ís were so oppressed? What evil of sedition has they committed, which caused them to be so closely confined, etc? But Napoleon never replied to this letter. Whereupon, after a time, the Blessed Perfection wrote the long menacing letter to Napoleon prophesying the downfall of his empire, etc., and this letter was published and circulated throughout Persia at least two years before these events happened.

Our Lord gave also a long account of the sending of the letter to the Sháh that he would never learn the truth from the Mullás and Divines, that if he wished to hear the truth, he must summon Bahá'u'lláh to his presence, and confront him with the Divines, when in the Sháh's presence He would give as many signs, proofs, and miracles as they wished for, to prove His truth.

Our Lord said that immediately after the Ascension of Jesus Christ, people began to write books against Him; and very soon some historians began to say that no such person as Jesus Christ had ever lived. That it was all an invention of St. Peter and other disciples! We must remember this, for soon many books would be written against our faith.

For the past 1900 years the Jews have been denying Jesus Christ. One reason they give for doing this is because they say Jesus went to Jerusalem and there stole the Hidden and Greatest Name of God, which was concealed there. And it was this which gave Him all His power to perform miracles and signs! They themselves had been always looking for this name without success, but Jesus knew where it was hidden and took it away. Another reason for their denial of Christ, was because they said the prophecies in the Bible about the Messiah were not literally fulfilled by this Jesus of Nazareth. It was said the Messiah would be King of a Kingdom, and they could not see that by this was intended a spiritual kingdom.

Just what the Jews did in the times of Jesus the Christian are doing now. They are looking for the prophecies of Jesus to be fulfilled according to the letter, and are expecting the stars to fall from heaven before His coming. Yet their own men of science have proved that the sun is infinitely larger than the earth (times) and so also are many of the stars.

If these were to fall upon this little earth conceive what the effect would be! Imagine a huge mountain falling upon a tiny atom! What part of the atom would remain?

Jesus also said that He would come when they were sleeping; how could this possibly be after the stars had fallen from heaven upon them? It is also said by Jesus that He came from heaven, and in like manner he would return to heaven, and would appear again from heaven. And now the Christians are expecting Him to appear from the atmosphere, where it is known that there is nothing! Jesus, who said "I came from heaven" appeared from a place called Nazareth, and from His mother Mary; in such wise, then, must we expect His second appearance to be.

Our Lord said that most of the Persian Jews had become believers, as many as 4,000 Jews out of 5,000, in one city, being of our faith. And in a short while all the Persian Jews would be believers.

Comparison between the East and the West

During a conversation our Lord has with the English Consul, the Consul had said that all inventions and improvements in civilisation came from the West, whereas the Eastern nations cared for none of these things. Our Lord replied that that was true; the western nations gave themselves up a great deal more to the pursuit of material improvements and civilisation than the Eastern nations; but, on the other hand, since the earliest times of history no prophet or religious teacher had ever appeared, save from the East. God divided His gifts, giving to the west the power of inventions and material improvements; but to the east He had given spiritual civilisation. The Consul remarked that in ancient times the Eastern nations were far more advanced and were of far higher character than they are now, in the present day. Our Lord agreed that this was true, and said the reason of it was because the Easterns depended entirely upon their spiritual leaders for their inspiration and advancement. During the days of these leaders they made great progress and advance, but this gradually died out. It was very long since the coming of a prophet, and they needed a new one to give them a fresh start!

But though we saw the people of the East had very few material comfort, yet their mental happiness and peace was very great, and they had no cares.

The Bedouin Arabs, who had often not enough to eat, were yet entirely happy and satisfied with what they had; whereas the reverse is the case with the western people; the more they have of comforts and riches, the more they need and want.

These who have this mental happiness and peace also have more bodily comfort and happiness, because this mental happiness re — acts upon their bodies, keeping them in health. And though they have very little, yet they are satisfied! Also if they find themselves in real need and want of necessities this mental condition gives them the power to arrange their material difficulties, with the greatest ease and speed, so they are gainers of both ways!

The Power of the Love of God

In the universe, all atoms and particles are united by the power of attraction and cohesion, if it were not for this everything would immediately be dissolved and annihilated. The life of the whole creation depends upon this power. So, spiritually, everything is united by the Love of God. This is the only thing which has the power to unite hearts; and this power of uniting hearts is always one of the signs of a true prophet.

The Love of God is like the Sun; it shines upon everything and this is God's relationship to man. Love is the greatest Bounty of God, so Jesus said “God is Love,” “I am love.”

It is said in the Qur’án “God loved you and then you love.”

Everything in the world which promotes union, harmony and love is from God, for union and harmony is life, and everything that causes discord is from Satan, and brings about death and annihilation.

At night when a lamp is brought into the room, all things as once become manifest, and such is the power of love...

Only the Náqidíne remain quite untouched by the word of God. There is a Mahomedan tradition that once a man met Jesus Christ fleeing hastily from a town to the mountains. When the man enquired why this was, Jesus replied “I am fleeing away from a foolish man.” Then the man said “Why do you not breathe upon him, and give him the power to leave off being foolish?” Then Jesus answered “God had given me the power that by my breath I can open the eyes of the blind and cause the deaf to hear, but more than one thousand times have I tried to breathe understanding to this foolish man without success. I can do nothing.” The cause of God is like the sea, which refuses to accept, or contain a dead body within it. It will only contain the living.

Union and Harmony

Our Lord spoke very much of union and harmony. He said it was almost beyond belief to see so many pilgrims from the most distant parts of the earth assembled together, and that this was one of the most wonderful works of God, to bring us into this unity. He spoke of the union of the East and West, and the North and South, and said that the union and accord between nations should be like that of the lover for his beloved. He said that He had lately written a long Tablet on this subject to a Believer. It was asked when this Universal Peace and Unity would come to pass, and He replied very soon...

Our Lord gave an illustration of the absolute necessity of union and harmony amongst Believers, by comparing them to the construction of the hand. When all the fingers are joined to the hand, what a wonderful instrument it is and how useful! But if the fingers are cut off and torn apart from each other — in separation they are absolutely useless.

The Universal Power of the Cause of God

All the things in creation are composed either of simple atoms, or of compound particles. In the mineral kingdom many substances such as gold, are composed of simple atoms. In the vegetable kingdom, plants are composed of more complex particles, hence we see that they have more qualities and powers such as growth, for example.

Then again in the animal kingdom, the creatures are still more complex; and have additional powers such as instinct; and in the kingdom of man, many more powers and qualities are possessed and developed. So, in the case of individual men, some have power to subdue only a few hearts and others have power to subdue many more. In an army, a sergeant controls a very few men, the lieutenant more than the sergeant, the major still more, and the Colonel controls a whole regiment. Over all these is the General who, under command, controls the whole army.

In the case of prophets, some have the power to sway and subdue one country only, such as Syria; others have the power to sway many more countries. But the Blessed Perfection sways and subdues them all, and also all prophets and all religions. We therefore see that such contrary and far — apart nations as the American and Persian, are completely joined together and united by this great cause of God.

The ‘Return’ of the Prophets

In the first days of every prophet, He was the source of the Bounties of God to the people, but after a time, the true spirit of His teachings waned, and the people lapsed into ignorance and darkness. Then it became necessary to send forth a New Appearance or Manifestation of the Bounties of God.

For one of the essential characteristics or necessities of the Eternal Essence of the divine is Un-changeableness, and one of the essential characteristics of created beings is change. Our Lord then gave the illustration of the Four successive seasons: spring, summer, autumn, winter — and said that no man of intelligence would venture to state that because the spring of last year has once come, that is sufficient for all time, and we do not need another spring!

Our Lord says that in these early days of the Faith it is of the first importance that all the believers should have the right qualities, and show forth the right attributes. One un — conquered fault would cast one down in a single moment from the highest station to the lowest. We must strive to change our bad qualities into good ones. Quick temper must be changed into calmness. Pride into humility, falsehood into truth, deceit into frankness, laziness into activity, etc.

The Arc of Ascent and Descent

In the Qur’án there is a verse which speaks of the “lowest point of the low” as being the station of man. If we represent creation by a circle, at the top of it is God the creator. From His left descends the material creation, beginning first with the mineral kingdom; next below that is the vegetable kingdom; below that again is the animal kingdom, and at the bottom of the circle is man.

This signifies that man has the power of being infinitely more degraded than the other three kingdoms, and can do more harm. In the lowest of the three, ferocious animals exist; but after all they can only kill one creature at a time, but when man is bent on destruction he can by his inventions destroy thousands at the same moment.

But though this station is the “lowest of the low”, it is also the dawning point of the new life and the spiritual ascent to God! And if, by the gifts and grace and guidance of God, man strives to rise by this “Arc of Ascent” towards God, then instantly all his evil qualities begin to be exchanged for knowledge; lustful passions and desires can be changed into chastity and holy thoughts; hatred into love, etc. etc. It is because man is naturally situated at this lowest point — this meeting place of the two arcs — that Jesus said except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he can never see God. According to Eastern ideas water is regarded as the beginning of everything. From water the lowest forms of life come, and they inhabit water. Also water nourishes and sustains all life. Hence water is regarded as the starting point of growth and life. In this saying of Jesus, water is not the symbol of cleansing, though the life of man is cleansed spiritually by the Bounties of God, such as love, truth, goodness, unity, etc. But in this saying, the meaning of water is primarily the Bounties of God.

MIRACLES by Madam d’Astre of Lord’s Teachings

The Holy Manifestations of GOD are the source of miracles and wonderful signs. To them even the impossible things are possible and from them the most wonderful things appear, but they have an especial mode of expression. If miracles were proofs, it would be for those present — not for the absent. For example, you might tell a Zoroastrian that wonderful miracles had been accomplished by Moses and Christ, but he would not believe you — even idolators believe that wonderful things were accomplished by their idols. In India many books are written in which endless miracles are ascribed to the Masters. So the Zoroastrian would say: “How can I decide which is true? If I accept one, I must accept all — if they rest upon this proof. “If miracles are a proof for those who are present, there are no proof for the absent. But if the true inner sight is opened at the time of each Manifestation, everything that appears from them is a proof, and no other proof is so important as the Manifestation itself. For what is the importance of causing the blind to see when finally, through death, they must lose their sight? What is the importance of bringing a dead body to life? Being material it must finally be decomposed. But that which is of importance is to give the sight which is Everlasting — is to give the Life which is immortal.

This material life, even at the time of its existence, is nothingness; for instance, at the time of Christ, though the people has this life, He said: “Let the dead bury the dead!” — for those merely living physically were to Christ as though they were dead. For the real life is the Life of the Spirit — the Life Eternal. Therefore, if it is mentioned in the Holy Books that the dead were raised, the meaning is the received Eternal Life; if the blind were cured, the meaning is they received the inward sight; if the deaf were healed — they found Heavenly hearing. This is explained in the text of the Bible itself, as Christ quoted the words of Isaiah, "Ears have they, but they hear not; eyes have they and see not." The inward sight, the Heavenly hearing, the Eternal Life is that which is acceptable; and when they are mentioned in the Books, this is the true meaning.

When the blind are healed, it means spiritual sight — knowledge. They were ignorant and became awakened, dark and became light, worldly and became heavenly.

NOTES on ST. JOHN Chapters VIII — XII

Taken by E.J. Rosenberg at Haifa February and March 1901

CHAPTER VIII

Verses I to II. This story needs no explanation. The meaning of it is plainly to be understood.

Verse III: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more."

This shows we should never look upon the faults of others, but only consider our own faults. Then the Master told the following parable:

A man once, as he was walking, saw a wonderful sight. In a certain place there were three men. The first of these was blind, but he could see things that were very distant. The second was deaf to all near sounds, but he could hear things that were very distant. The third was naked, but he held in his hands very carefully, a long hem of a garment. The man asked the teacher the meaning of this strange sight. The interpretation was this: These three men represent humanity. The first, who could only see things that were very distant, but was blind to all that was near him, means that people can generally see very clearly the faults and shortcomings of other natures, and of those who are from them; but their own faults are too near them to be perceived. The second man was able to hear of the deaths of others; but his own death was too near him to be heard. The third, who was quite bare, shows that in this state man comes into this world, and in this state it is quite certain he must leave it; and though he knows this very well, yet he spends his whole time in carefully preserving the hem of a garment from being soiled.

Verses 12-20: There is a great difference between GOD and all creatures. All the creation is in darkness, but GOD is the Light. Jesus says: "I am the Light of the World; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have light of life." The light here spoken of means the Light of His Perfection, mercy, and goodness, love, holiness, truth, unworldliness, righteousness, purity, etc. "He that followeth me," that is, he that does as I do, and is characterized with these attributes, then he is not in the darkness.

V13: The Pharisees argue that if a man says “I am good” and so bears record of himself — his record is not true.

V14-15: But Jesus answers “Ye judge after the flesh,” (that is, you can judge me only bodily — you are not able to judge me spiritually — you are not capable of it).

“And yet if I judge my judgement is true.” We have seen before that He said to the woman, “Neither do I condemn thee, “ thus refusing to judge her. Then He continues “I am not alone; but I and the Father that sent Me” — that is, the Light of the Father is in Him. Then in verse 19: “Ye neither know me, nor My Father: If ye had known Me, ye would have known My Father also.” Whilst Jesus was in the world, He was the Light of it — and no one could receive light except through Him.

“Ye are from beneath” — i.e. the material world: “I am from above” — i.e. the spiritual world.

even the same that I said unto you from the beginning, that is, the Son of the Father.

If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed. The Master said there are three kinds of belief: —

- (1) To confess with lips only.
- (2) To confess with the mouth and believe with the heart in sincerity — but not to do — according to our belief.
- (3) To confess and truly believe — and also to live as the heart believes — then indeed are we the disciples and followers of Christ.

There are two kinds of relationships — spiritual and earthly. “Ye cannot hear My Word” — i.e. Ye have not the spiritual ears to hear with. “Ye are of your father, the devil” — i.e. Ye have the same evil qualities of a spiritual murderer. Canaan was not the spiritual son of Noah — only his earthly son. Your father Abraham saw My day spiritually and was glad.

ST. JOHN, CHAPTER IX

V1-8: In this passage, Jesus taught that reincarnation was not true. His disciples asked why was this man born without sight. Was it because in a former existence this man had committed a great crime and so he was punished for it by GOD sending him to earth again without sight? Or was it because his parents had sinned? Jesus answered that it was neither of these reasons — but in order that the words and bounties of GOD might be made known to the people.

If GOD invariably created man with the great gift and blessing of sight, then at last people would come to think that it was a natural fact or law of nature that man must be born with this gift — and they would not realize that GOD might have created them without it.

V4-5 — Whilst Christ the Light of the World, is on the earth, then it is day — when He goes, the night will come.

The ground or earth (of which Christ made the healing clay) represents the fact of truth of GOD; the explanation and interpretation of it came from the lips and mouth of Christ. These two mingled together gave sight to the blind man — that is, spiritual sight, which is the great gift Christ gave him: and the whole miracle must be interpreted in this spiritual sense. Christ told the man to go and wash in the pool of Siloam, which was in the neighborhood, because in that day all the teachings of Christ and His disciples came from the center and religion. Therefore, Jesus said to him, “Go and wash in this spring, this running water of truth.” And when he had received this further teaching, his spiritual sight was perfected.

ST. JOHN, CHAPTER X

V1-5: The Shepherd is Christ — the true believers are the sheep — the sheepfold is Christ’s religion. They that hear my voice — that is, they that recognize My Divine Call, and acknowledge it and follow ME, are of the “Chosen” amongst the many called. During the time of Jesus, He was the only Door into the true religion of GOD; and those who rejected Him, and endeavored to climb up some other way, were only thieves and robbers.

V31-39: Jesus said to the people, “I have done nothing but kindness and good deeds to you. When have I ever done you harm? I have loved you all, and all that I have wished for is your good, and to benefit you. For which of these good works that I have done; do you stone me?” And our Lord said we might see the same thing in the days of the Bááb. All the people witnessed of him that he was the best man they knew, and that from the time of his babyhood, he had done nothing but good deeds. So also in the days of the Blessed Perfection: — All the people of Tíhrán were witnessing His good deeds and perfections, and He was called the “Father of the Poor” in Tíhrán.

V33: The Jews answered that it was not for these good works of Jesus that they wished to stone Him, for they quite acknowledged His good actions; but it was because of His blasphemy in saying He was the Son of GOD. Then Jesus replied that it is said in the Bible to the Holy Prophets of God, that they are Gods. And in order to explain this saying, the Master gave the illustrations of the Sun and the mirrors. If you placed a row of perfectly clear mirrors out of doors when the Sun rose, the Sun would be reflected perfectly in each of them, and that the sun might say with truth to these mirrors, “Ye are suns.” In the same sense, it is said to the Great Prophets of GOD, “Ye are GODS,” because they reflect the qualities and characteristics of GOD. Jesus said to these Jew, how was it that they did not wonder at this far stronger than expression, “Ye are GODS” being used to the Prophets. But when He only said He was the Son of GOD, they wished to stone Him.

ST. JOHN, CHAPTER XII

V1-8: Judas Iscariot was the chief among the disciples; their leader — yet when this test (V6) came to him, he fell. The higher our station is, and the nearer we are to GOD, the more severe do our tests become; and when we have received great blessings, we are apt to become self — confident, and think that we are apt to become self — confident, and think that we are secure from falling; — and then is our danger great. The Master said this story (of Mary and the ointment) has a deep spiritual significance. The bottle which contained the perfumed oil (ointment) represents the heart of Mary, the ointment is the love of GOD which filled her heart; and all this love she poured forth at the feet of Jesus. Then Judas said: — why did she lavish all this love upon Jesus, who did not need it so much as the poor; why did she not pour out some of this great love and care upon them.

Then Jesus said that she did well to give Him all her love, that that is what we ought to do. We must give all our heart's love to God. Then for His sake, and through our love for Him, we shall love all others. By the poor, in this spiritual sense, is meant those who needed love. The Blessed Perfection said “The poor are my charge to you.” Therefore, we must always cherish the poor for His sake.

V14-15 The Master said that the disciples of Jesus did not at first believe in Him, because of the fulfillment of signs and prophecies. They did not even remember or understand them until after His death. They believed in Jesus because of Himself — because of His character, and the Light that came from Him, and also because of the Light of their own inspiration within themselves.

To take as an illustration of this, the Sun. We do not believe in the existence of the sun because of the shadows cast by its lights, or because of the effects it produces in making the grass grow. But we believe in the sun because we see it shining in the heavens. We know that the sun exists by looking at it — not merely by its effects and the results it produces. So if you know that a man is a very clever and excellent carpenter, it is not needful for you to see all the things that he has made in order to believe that he can do them; but you believe he can do these things because you know the man and his skill; and you know that he has the ability to make them. So we must always believe in the Prophet of GOD, in and for Himself; and we must not search for proofs and prophecies in order to enable us to believe in Him. It is said that the disciples understood these things after Jesus was glorified.

Why is this expression “glorified” used of Jesus’ crucifixion? Our Lord then explained that in the eyes of the people of the world, that is, of ordinary human beings — to be killed or crucified was the most terrible thing that could possibly befall them; but it is not so for believers: — it is the most glorious privilege that can happen to them. So with all the trouble and misery of humanity; such as hunger, nakedness, poverty, etc. These for ordinary people are really troubles; but when they come to Believers, they are for them a bounty of GOD, and a privilege.

“Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of GOD.” We see that the disciples who were poor, ignorant men, are remembered and revered by all the world to this day. But how many kings and potentates of the earth have come and vanished, even as if they had never existed. Their names even are forgotten, and they have produced no effect or result in the world.

V23-26: The Master explained more fully the meaning of Christ being glorified by His death. He said that the Blessed Perfection, in the Book of Íqán, in explaining the meaning of the statement about Christ coming in heaven and riding on the clouds, says that one meaning of the expression cloud, is the body of the Prophet. Why is it that sometimes we cannot see the sun in the sky? It is because it is veiled from us by thick clouds; and in this sense, the body, the human nature of a Prophet, is a cloud, preventing the people from seeing His glorious light. For they argue that the prophet is a man such as they themselves are, requiring food, rest and sleep, and is also liable to ordinary human accidents and diseases. How then can this human man represent the Light of GOD, or be a Manifestation of GOD? But when the prophet has gone from earth; that is, has died or been killed, then the veil or cloud is removed, and the people see plainly the light of His teachings and the sun that was within Him.

V24: A seed, a grain of corn, if it were not planted in the earth and buried from our view, remained always alone and one; but if the seed is planted in the earth and buried, hidden from sight, then it brings forth much fruit — many hundreds of seeds like itself. So when the Prophet is killed or crucified, His religion and His teachings begin to grow and spread, and to “Bring forth much fruit.”

V26 to 31: The Master said that if any one would be the servant of Jesus, he must follow Him as a servant does; and so he would always be in the same place where Jesus was, just as a servant is always with his master. When the two thieves were crucified with Jesus, one was in this condition of service; and when he begged Jesus that he might be with Him, Jesus Christ answered, “Today thou shalt be with Me in Paradise.” that is, in the same place with me.

“Now is my soul troubled;” in this passage, “soul” means the personality, the human nature or body of Christ, not His Spirit, which was perfectly happy. The body of Jesus which was perfect — His perfect and obedient servant — naturally was sorry and grieved that this great Spirit would leave it; though this body was in entire subjection and obedience.

“Father, save me from this hour” means “Kill me, crucify me quickly, — that I may be with Thee and leave this earthly condition of being troubled.” “For this cause came I unto this hour.” That is, for this reason I came into the world that I may be crucified and so make Thy name glorious; i.e. renowned and known throughout all the world.

“Father glorify Thy Name;” that is, crucify Jesus Christ who is Thy Name — who represents and is GOD on this earth.

“Then came there a voice from heaven;” i.e. not from the atmospheric heaven, but from the high and heavenly condition and state of Jesus, so that it was actually heard by all the people. “I have both glorified it” means, now I am being crucified; and “will glorify it again” means, also I will glorify it in the disciples; i.e. they also will be martyred and crucified to make My name glorious.

“This voice came not because of Me, but for your sake” means, this voice came to tell you that you also will be glorified as I am.

A believer then said she had always thought that we might become so completely “cut” and severed from our body, while in this life, what it then was counted as a dead thing; and that it could not suffer or feel, apart from the spirit. In answer to this, Zia Khánúm explained most beautifully that though in perfect beings the spirit was so strong that it overcame the sufferings of the body, yet the body humanly felt and was conscious of human sufferings such as hunger, thirst, etc. Yet the perfect spirit was so strong that it was always happy and did not let these sufferings appear outwardly. She said that the night that the Blessed Perfection and the Holy Family and believers with them reached ‘Akká, numbering altogether about seventy souls, many of them being infants and very young children, they were kept by the soldiers who guarded them, entirely without food. Two sentries were placed at the door, and they were forbidden to go to the market to buy anything. The mothers, through not having eaten, had no milk for their children. The young children were famishing and the sufferings of the bodies of all of them were very great. But they were so happy in spite of all their miseries, and Khánúm especially, laughed so much that the B.P. sent a messenger to them to say “Do not laugh so much or the soldiers will say, listen to these foolish people enjoying themselves and laughing with nothing to eat.” Then the day following the governor sent them some rice, but it was very bad rice, unwashed and full of stones. The children were very happy when they saw this food, and crowded round the tables. But when it was cooked it was so black and filthy, that it made them sick, and they could not eat it. Then the Manifestation came to them and said, “Do not cry; I have some food for you.” And he gave each of the children one sugar plum. When they had eaten these, they all went to sleep quite peacefully and contentedly. Again, when the Pure Branch fell from the roof and was killed, the believers were not allowed to bury him; but four soldiers came and took away the body, and the Holy Family did not know for two years whether it had been thrown into the sea or what the soldiers had done with it. Naturally, his Holy Mother, in her human nature, was terribly sad and grieved at his death under sad circumstances; and this sorrow made her so ill that it caused a disease of the heart, so that for a long time she was not able to walk about, but was obliged always to sit on the bed. However, when the Blessed Perfection said to her, “For My sake his this come upon him, and he has born for me a sorrow and trouble that was coming to me.” From that day no one ever saw the Holy Mother weep; and she was always quite happy and cheerful. This was because of her faith and strength of her spirit.

V31 — 37. The “Judgement” here spoken of was the withdrawal — the departure of Jesus from the world — “of whom the world was not worthy” — on account of the unbelievers. Jesus Christ had lived His perfect life in their midst — had taught them, and done every good thing for them; and yet they subjected Him. Therefore, He (Jesus) the Prince of this world, would be cast out. Because Jesus had said this, the disciples felt very sad; and then Jesus explained it to them more fully, and said, “Do not be sad; if I be lifted up (ascended) I will draw you all to be with me where I am.”

Then the people questioned what did He mean by saying that He must be lifted up and killed. They had always been taught that Christ and the Kingdom would last forever. Who then, is this Son of Man? But Jesus did not answer this question. That was because He knew it was useless to reply to it, and that they would not understand His answer “Walk while ye have the Light.” Before the sun rises, the people are blind — in darkness — they can see nothing. But if, when the sun rises they keep their eyes shut, and refuse to see the light, then their ‘judgement’ is the withdrawal of the sun. While ye have the light, believe in it, that ye may be the children of light.

There are three kinds of belief: (1) That of the mouth. (2) That of confessing with the mouth and believing with the heart. (3) That of confessing and believing with the mouth and heart, and also performing all that is commanded with all the members of the body. If we do this then are we true believers, and the children of light; for the light shines forth from the whole body.

V38: Here, the “Arm of the Lord” signifies Jesus Christ. V40 This “Blindness” and “Hardness of heart” comes to them as a consequence of their own deeds and actions. It is not a bad thing inflicted upon them by GOD. Blindness and Deafness are not positive qualities like sight and hearing; but they are mere negatives of these qualities. Darkness, for example, is not a positive fact, but merely the non — existence of light.

V43: There are two sorts of praise and glory and respect of men. The one is earthly and material, and is for a time only. The other is spiritual. One lasts for a very short while; the other is eternal. Kings and potentates of this earth had a great respect and honor whilst they lived; but after their death, it vanished. V46 It is a sign of the New Birth, to leave the bad and evil qualities to exchange hatred into love, ignorance into wisdom, pride into humility. Every one who is sunk in darkness of these evil qualities must leave them, and come into the light.

THE TEMPTATION OF CHRIST

Zin Khánun gave an explanation of the temptation of Jesus Christ, which she had received from our Lord, as follows:

Every one has two states or conditions — the material and the heavenly — the bodily and the spiritual; and every one may follow one of two paths — the earthly or the heavenly — the spiritual or the satanic road.

In the Gospel account of the Temptation of Christ, the mountain top signifies His lofty station, His condition of nearness to the Divine. He who was “without sin” could not be tempted by the ordinary, material temptations of human kind; but His perfect and beautiful bodily human nature tempted His heavenly and spiritual nature by suggesting to him that with all His bodily and mental gifts, graces, and favors of God, He could, if He wished, become the King of all the nations of the earth; and by so doing, naturally He would have the power to benefit and improve them in every possible way, doing away with outward injustice, poverty, and the like miseries. But Jesus repudiated this temptation to become an earthly potentate and ruler, saying to His bodily nature, “Get thee hence, Satan.”

Utterances of our Blessed Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in His exact Words, revealed to three pilgrims; Thomas Breakwell of England, Herbert Hopper (an American) from Paris, and Isabella D. Brittingham of America, September, 1901.

The Master’s Message to the believers in America.

He said: Two or three years ago He wrote to some of the believers in America and also to Dr. Kheiralla, stating these events (His imprisonment and persecutions), which have now taken place. He also wrote the same things to other countries, and they are now exactly fulfilled. He said, now that these events have come to pass, we must feel happy, not sorrowful. The believers must not be troubled nor distressed about the confinement of the Master — He wishes them always to be cheerful. He is accustomed to imprisonment. We must not feel distressed, as this is sent from God, and it should be pleasant to us to have troubles from God. If we hear also of other things taking place, we must not feel grieved, but trust in God. Still greater things than these will happen, all of which have been prophesied. All of the believers must be in such a mood that when calamity exists in the greatest degree, they must rejoice exceedingly. The confinement of the Master must be the gladdest tidings to all, and it must be the cause of their steadfastness and confirmation. We should be very happy even under confinement. Neither hunger nor thirst, nor confinement in prison, nor bloodshed, nor martyrdom, should prevent us from being true to the Blessed Perfection. We should accept all of these things all of our lives; we should hope for them, and then we will be happy when they come. He said all the believers are under the Shadow of the Manifestation. We are not physical beings, He said, but spiritual bodies. We must thank God for our spiritual existence. The body is earthly, but the spirit is heavenly. The first is of this world, and the second belongs to the Kingdom. The first is of the attributes of darkness, and the other of illumination. The first is limited to space; the second is Placeless and Limitless.

The Master also said that the gladdest tidings to Him are that the believers are living in love and obedience, and are spreading the Great Message; and that our love, our unity, our obedience must not be by confession, but of reality. He also said that 1901 is the first year of tribulation.

The Master said that the differences between this Revelation and that of Jesus Christ are that, in this Cycle, all the inhabitants of the world will be gathered into one nation; universal peace will prevail; bloodshed and war will cease; there will be a general language; union and harmony will reach the highest state; there will be no bigotry. All will be gathered under the tent of peace. Before the universal peace is established there will be wars and a general overturning of society. These wars are to warn the people, so that they may learn, if they do not follow the teachings, they will be punished, for the power of the Spirit will be taken from them and they will become as lamps without light. {{p2}}

The beginning will be in our time, and the truth will be generally known by the year 1917.

The differences between this Manifestation and that of Jesus Christ are:

1st. The teachings of Christ amounted to a very few pages, but the teachings of the Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh, amounted to twenty books.

2nd. The teachings of the Manifestation are greater than the teachings of Jesus Christ. For example, from the teachings of the Manifestation you can do everything; they include everything.

3rd. Apparently Jesus Christ was opposed by the Jews only, but the Manifestation was opposed by the whole universe. Jesus Christ, on account of injury from the Jews, and their opposition, used to go from one place to another, but that the Manifestation stood before all was evident, as He was seen by all and did not hide Himself, even in a village. At all times He said, "I am ready." He wrote to the King of Persia: "Let all the divines and doctors of law assemble together and discuss the matter with Me, and I am ready to prove it."

4th. In the time of Jesus Christ the greatest one of the disciples was Peter, yet he denied his Master three times. But the followers of Bahá'u'lláh, under the most severe torture, were repeating the Name of Bahá'u'lláh and never denied it, not only one, a hundred or a thousand, but twenty thousand followers hastened thus to martyrdom.

5th. The Cause of Jesus Christ existed for three hundred years before it became known, but the Cause of the Manifestation, in the Day of the Manifestation, was known all over the world.

6th. Jesus Christ came to establish proofs of the Old Testament, and this was for the Jews, consequently His opposers were few. But the Manifestation came for all the world, and for all religions, and to explain all the Holy Books of those religions. Another proof was that during the imprisonment of the Manifestation the Governor and Officials were His humble servants. Even His enemies were submissive to Him. Because the Cause of the Manifestation is universal, it will envelop the world.

7th. The miracles which appeared through the Manifestation the Master did not like to mention, because they will not be proof to others. They were only a demonstration for those who witnessed them. If the Master mentions all of these, the people will say that the idol worshippers attributed many wonderful things to their idols. The hearer will say this is right and this is wrong. While the miracles which actually appeared in the time of the Manifestation are greater than all, the Master did not wish to mention them, for the Manifestation said that the miracles would be like a veil over the people, for, in every time, the proofs (of this Word) will be so evident and clear that the people can understand them. {{p3}}

The Master said, if anyone asks you about the Manifestation, say He is the Trainer of the whole universe. His teachings are the cause of the life of the worlds, the unity and harmony of the creatures, the agreement of the people, and the universal peace. Every great thing of which we hear, and every great event in the world must have something that will stand steadfastly for it and to defend it. The greatness of the Cause will be as a flood. It will be like the waves of the Pacific Ocean. No other waves are as large. If the Cause is firm and on a good foundation, all these events that take place will be the cause of its assistance and promulgation. When the winds blow severely, the small trees will be uprooted, but the fixed and large trees will remain firm. This illustration is in harmony with this Cause. It must have great assistance. The opposition and rebellion of the people will be very great indeed, but these oppositions and disturbances of the nations will be the cause of the strength and power for the Truth. Thus, if we see that the nations and people act and exert their utmost to destroy this Cause, we must not be at all disturbed, because the more they oppose the more the Cause becomes illuminated. So all must be like confirmed mountains; fixed and firm believers; but we must act through cautiousness and wisdom. All of our deeds must be done in kindness. We must not fling wisdom away, but we must always seize it. Be assured and confident that the assistance of God will be poured out upon you. The servants of God are the victors and they are the hosts of God. Meditate upon the time after Christ and upon this time and you will understand.

Once the Manifestation was imprisoned and chains were around His neck. At this time the Master was with some of the believers in another place, and the people finally captured Him also. The boys of this place gathered together and began to beat Him; about two or three hundred children surrounded Him. They beat Him severely on the head, cursed Him and otherwise persecuted Him. It may come to pass that the people will curse the believers, beat them, injure them, abuse them and do harm to them, and even cause animosity between them. God willing that that you may be steadfast and firm and never be shaken. But under all kinds of tribulation you must always keep in mind the Love of the Master and remember to what a great degree He loves you.

The nations oppose and persecute each other for supremacy, and they cause opposition and persecution against the Master because He is uniting the people. What a wonderful thing that the Oriental people clasp hands with the Occidental people and mingle together! So many different people — those who are fierce, and who hold animosity toward each other, will be gathered in union and harmony under one tent, to lay the foundation which will be the cause of harmony and union of all the creatures. To meet animosity and hatred by love and kindness! Thus war will be changed into peace, the sword and bayonet into the fragrance of flowers, bloodshed and the destruction of man will be transformed into joy and tranquility. Thanks be to God, in these days the steadfastness of the Truth is taking place; that this seed of love, {{p4}} after it was planted, has yielded, and the fruit of that is our meeting here tonight — all of us in one circle. On reliance and dependence upon God, we hope that this circle may be enlarged and that it may encircle the whole universe, until the entire human race will be gathered under one tent, and all will be under one law, as one nation, one family, one home. All this will exist and be manifested through the Power and Aid of Bahá'u'lláh. The more the teachings are distributed, the greater will be the success of the Truth. Pray for this; beseech and invoke the Kingdom for it. All this prophecy will, in a comparatively short time, be fulfilled, and love, peace and concord will be established. Praise be to God that you are the manifestations of the help of God and that the Light of God is enveloping all. The Hosts of the Kingdom are your helpers; the Holy Spirit is assisting all. The wave of God is your guidance and strength. Thus I invoke the Kingdom. Through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh you will be aided. Do not interfere with one another's sword. Do not raise disturbance with anyone. Be kind to all people; love them with a pure spirit; ask God for all. Should opposition or injury happen to you, bear it and be kind, as kind as you ever can be. Through all, love the people, and not by mere confession. If they beat you with swords, ask them for forgiveness. If they attribute infidelity to you, pray for their guidance. If they blame you, be sincerely grateful to them. The Manifestation said, "If it were not for the sake of the religion, I would appoint the one who should murder Me to be My inheritor." From this statement we can conceive the station of the martyrs and saints in His Cause. The Master told us to pray to God that we would be steadfast in His service, for us He is the Ruler and the Supreme. To serve humanity is to serve God.

The Master said: Have you read the Tablet written by the Blessed Perfection to Napoleon? Do you remember the words? That Tablet is a sufficient proof. It was revealed when Napoleon was so powerful that he said, "On this globe I am the one God." In such a time this Tablet was written and this was published over the world. The Manifestation was imprisoned in 'Akká, the Governor in Chief of 'Akká craved to be honored by admission to the presence of Bahá'u'lláh. For five years this one man, called Zeah Páshá, asked the Master if He would supplicate the Manifestation to permit him to make this visit, but the Manifestation never granted it. All the people of 'Akká know this. The Blessed Perfection was imprisoned, yet He had that power to refuse anything or to do anything that He wished.

The Master said that He Himself had been ill for three years, but ever since He had been re-imprisoned He has been very cheerful and happy. Before this His appetite was poor, but now it is better. He says, God willing, tribulation and trials may increase day by day. If life passes in ease, with no trials, it is useless and its result is fruitless. What is the conclusion and result if a person should live easily and comfortably for one hundred years? But if he passes through trials and hardships in the Cause of God, this is the extreme end of the Supreme Gift. When they took Qurratu'l-'Ayn to kill her, she put on the best clothes she had and she was beautifully adorned. They took her to a garden and there they killed her. Just think how many maid-servants and how many humble and submissive ones die in God's Cause! See how He trained them! It is not now understood, but many people hereafter will appear in the Cause and will be like the brilliancy of the sun. They may be attacked and taunted, but through humbleness and submission they will be enabled to spread the Cause. As they advance in His service, so they will be attracted to God, and as they give up their lives in the Cause of God, so also will they be enveloped by the assistance of Bahá'u'lláh. See the wonderful Power of the Manifestation that He has gathered us now! What great love! What a high degree of love! We must remember these meetings and their results will appear later. As the rain falls today upon the seed and the results appear afterwards, when it reaches the state of maturity it brings forth fruit. The tree has the power, but it is hidden, but, when it reaches the state of maturity, it stands forth. The Master hopes this will appear and be manifested in us.

Explanation of the First Portion of the Second Commune, which is taken from the "Prayer of the Dawn."

This "Letter" means a person. As the word came forth from the Mouth, that person is the reflection of the Light of God. It is the Letter in which are all the mysteries of the Holy Books. It is the Letter that came forth from the Mouth of the Blessed Perfection.

"The seas moved" — the seas of existence; the seas of life; the seas of sciences; the seas of knowledge; the seas of understanding; the Seas of the Love of God rolled.

"The winds did blow" — these breezes are the causes of life to the trees. These are the fragrances which will revive the beloved of the Kingdom of God, and which will cause the fragrance to exhale from them.

"The fruits appeared" — the new conditions upon the earth began to manifest and appear.

"The trees began to thrive" — the trees are the people in the Paradise of Abhá, who, through the fragrance of this Letter will be nourished.

“The traces were destroyed” — these are the ancient traces which are destroyed by the Light. For example, the radiance of the Sun will destroy the sparkling of the star.

The Origin of Evil.

Evil does not exist. Death is only the lack of life; therefore death does not exist. Darkness is only the lack of light. Evil is only the lack of good. Ignorance is only the lack of knowledge. Poverty is the lack of riches. Misleading is the lack of guidance. Miserliness is the lack of generosity. The non-existence of light is darkness. The lack of sight is blindness. The lack of hearing is deafness. All these things are non-existent. God did not create any evil thing. God did not create a man poor. Poverty is only the lack of riches. Guidance is the Gift of God, and if a person is deprived of it, he will be misled, but he is not misled by God; it is only the lack of the Gift of Guidance. {{p6}}

Everything save man has one condition, but man has two. The animal has one condition or nature, but man has the animal nature (human) and the Divine nature (spiritual). If the Divine nature predominates he will be good, but if the human nature predominates he will be evil. One will lift him up, but the other will send him down to the lowest depths. Man can become so debased that he will worship a stone, which is of the lowest kingdom; but the spiritual will lift him to the Supreme Realms. Jesus Christ had the same two conditions, the earthly and the heavenly, and man has the same. Man has the power of knowledge which will exalt him to Heaven, and the power of ignorance which will debase him to the lowest condition. The more the person advances in Divine things, the more will he receive the Attributes of Light; and the more he retrogrades, the more will he receive the attributes of darkness. This world is dark and in darkness, but the Spiritual World is Light. This is the Heavenly Kingdom.

Children of unbelievers and infidels, who die before the age of responsibility, are not punished, because they are under the favor of God.

Universal Language in the Spiritual World.

There is a spiritual language and that is one language. It is a language by which the hearts speak to one another. It is not the language of utterance, but the language of the heart. In this material world there is also a material language of the heart and by which the hearts speak. There is a poem in Arabic which says, “We keep silent when love speaks,” and that is called the spiritual conversation. The original conversation was the spiritual conversation. The material language is nothing, but the spiritual language is everything. What we feel now we feel spiritually, as we are in a spiritual condition. For instance, there are some here and some in America and they are speaking together through the spirit. There is another poem in Persian which says of a lover speaking with his beloved: “I am speaking to you now without using my lips. I am speaking to you through my love.” This is the spiritual language, the language of the Kingdom of God.

From this time, for the sake of the Blessed Perfection, you will endure many hardships; you will be persecuted severely; people will say evil things about you; they will shun you and they will seek to trouble you. When these trials come upon you, you must rejoice exceedingly, with great devotion and praise to your Lord that these calamities have come to you from God for His sake. If the people curse you, saying they are doing God’s service, that curse will be turned for you into a commemoration. In the days of Christ, Caiaphas was a most learned man and was greatly honored by the people, but now that praise is turned into a curse, while the disciples of Christ and Mary Magdalene, who were all cursed in that time, are now praised and worshiped, and their pictures and statues are now in the churches, and healing is asked of them. Therefore your calamities, hardships and troubles are for the Cause of God and are merciful ones. {{p7}}

The Abomination of Desolation.

The abomination of desolation is the one who appears and tries to destroy the Truth and make some changes in the teachings of God. He will destroy the foundation of the teachings of God from among the people. His intention is destruction, and it is divided into two parts, one physical and the other spiritual. The physical abomination of desolation is the razing and destroying of buildings. The spiritual abomination of desolation is the destruction of the teachings of God.

“Do animals have souls and so these souls exist after death?” The Master replied: Once it was said that the plant had a spirit and the spirit of the plant is the name which was given to it. Once it was said that the animal had a spirit, and the spirit of the animal is the sensation which it feels; that is, animals are a composition of the elements. They have feeling and sensation, but no mind (comprehension). For instance, the spirits of the birds cannot comprehend anything (reality), and cannot realize spiritual things. They cannot think about knowledge. The spirit of the animal can only feel and sense things, but can realize nothing about the spiritual. They are simply the results of the combination of the elements, and when they die nothing remains of them. Once it was said that man had a spirit and that power in the man was his sensation of reason. He can realize sensation and comprehend spiritual things. For instance, the globe of this world is round. Columbus discovered the existence of other lands than his own through his spiritual sense. All of the inventions, all of the arts and all of the improvements are by the power of the spirit in man. In past ages the existence of the elements was not known, but was afterwards discovered. In the Spirit of God, we — the believers — and the unbelievers, are called. “Let the dead bury their dead.” “That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit.” All who possess the Power of the Spirit are equal. The Spirit of the Kingdom is the favor of the Holy Ghost. Whosoever is granted that Power of the Spirit is one of the saved and believing ones, but otherwise he is a lamp without light.

The spiritual senses are numberless. They are the Perfections and Favors of God. The Spiritual Powers are the means of conveying to all the Spiritual Bounties vouchsafed to man.

Explanation of the Valley of Dry Bones, 37th chapter of Ezekial.

The Master said this meant the River of those who went before; that is to say, the religious laws of each preceding prophet are annulled by the succeeding one and are as dry bones. In the time of Christ the commands of Moses were as dry bones, and in this time all previous laws are as dry bones, but which are to be refreshed by the Great River of this time, and are to be clothed with the new sinews of Life by this Revelation. When the Blessed Perfection came, all previous things became as dry bones. {{p8}}

The Prodigal Son.

The “fatted calf” is the Heavenly Table of Knowledge; the “ring” is the Sign or Characteristics; the “sandals” are the symbol of action; the “robe” the Adornment or Embroidery of the Cause. Peter promulgated the Cause more than any other.

A question was asked regarding the elder brother and the Master replied: In any cycle or time some one has shown pride. In the time of Christ it was Judas. In the days of the Blessed Perfection, Şubh-i-Azal. Now it is the head of the Náqiđíne.

People must live for one another and not live in seclusion as the monks and nuns. People should not live solitary lives. Light is of no value in an empty room. A tree is of no service to anyone on the summit of a mountain, but should be in a place where it can give shade and where its fruits may be gathered. The Master also said the believers must always be together as much as possible. He said two lamps in a room give more light than one lamp, and that the believers are like flowers gathered from different bushes into one bouquet.

Man must work and in that work show the qualities of God and thus do good. His work, both material and spiritual, must show what he is. By his arts, sciences, inventions and all of his work he must show his best ability. It is better to do both kinds of work unless one is not in need materially, and then one may serve entirely.

At table one evening the Master said: The repast is divided into two parts, material and spiritual. We hope this is both. The Tables mentioned in the Bible are the Spiritual Tables. The effect of the material table lasts for twelve hours, but that which is Divine is Everlasting and Eternal. For example, Revelation is one of the Heavenly Tables. As an illustration, the knowledge revealed 2000 years ago we now feel the effect of and that effect will remain forever. Some of the Heavenly Tables are the Divine Teachings of this time, and their power and effect will {{p9}} be everlasting. Another of the Heavenly Tables is Love, which is the Cause of Eternal Life. Some of the Tables are unity and harmony among the believers. As we are gathered here tonight, so the effect will remain forever.

Our Lord was asked the question, “Are those who truly believe in this Great Revelation saved?” He said: All believers have attained the Heavenly Gift, but each in a different degree. All have arrived at this Great Rolling Ocean, but each one has taken that which will quench his thirst.

Justice and Mercy.

God selects a few souls and bestows upon them His Special Gifts, for it says, “Many are called but few chosen.” This is not of the Justice, but of the Bounty of God. For illustration, children are to be fed with milk; but Guidance is a Perfect Bounty, therefore His Favor is Bounty. But the strength and power come through obedience and piety. For instance, a person may be apparently unsuited to receive the understanding, therefore the Spirit of Faith will be a Gift which God bestows upon whom He chooses. God bestows His Mercy upon whomsoever He wishes. If the creatures act according to the Commandments, this has nothing to do with Mercy, but is Obedience. For illustration, a man called Shaykh Muḥammad Ḥasan was made to attain the Gift, therefore the station of the Bounty and Mercy is altogether different from that of Justice. If a person does everything in Heaven and earth, he may not be fitted to receive the Gift of God. For example, a king has many officials, but those who are called to sit with him and associate with him are few. Again, for instance, a monk, who worships God morning and eve for sixty years may yet be excluded, and perhaps a very simple person may attain the Godly Bounty. Like Caiaphas and Annas, who were excluded, but Peter succeeded in attaining. In the time of Muḥammad, Abu Jahl, who was entitled “The Father of Wisdom” by the people, and Abu Amir, who were two great learned ones among the Arabs, were excluded, while Suhaib, the basket maker, and ‘Abdu’l Rahman, another humble one, attained the Gift. The real intention in this teaching is that it refers to spiritual children, and the real relationship between the prodigal son and the elder brother is spiritual and not physical. For example, the real brothers of Jesus Christ were His spiritual brothers. Canaan was one of the children of Noah, but only physically, not spiritually. All of you are the spiritual descendents of the Blessed Perfection because He is the Father of all.

The Three Baptisms.

We are told in the Bible of the Baptism of Water and of the Spirit, and also of the Baptism of Spirit and of Fire, and these are the Three Baptisms.

Number Nine of the Greatest Name.

Number nine (9) is the last number and it is the greatest number. Number ten (10) is simply the continuation of the number one (1) because number 10 is 1 and 100 is 1. Place the units up  $\{\{p10\}\}$  to 10 and we simply return to the number 1, but they will be ended at 9. One cannot find any number greater than 9 written in one digit, and of all numbers it is the highest. Also, in the tens 90 is the highest, and in the hundreds 900 is the highest. Then see if you can find any number greater than 9 to be written. In a digit. All other numbers are simply a repetition of other digits. So number 9 is the highest, and from it all other numbers are made. Write all the digits up to the number 9. Now, through adding 0 one can reach any number one likes. It simply originates from number 1 to 9. For example, the calculation of the number of the word “Báb” is number 5, and Bahá is 9. Now, if you multiply 9 by 5 you have 45. Now 45 is the Arabic numerical value of the word Adam.

Aliph equals 1 Dal equals 4 Mim equals 40 and the sum of all is 45

As Adam is the Father of Humanity and it means the real man, therefore the product of the number of the Báb and Bahá is equal to the number of Adam. There is no great difference between the Greatest Name and the name of Adam. In their nature they are one. Also, 1 plus 2 = 3; 3 plus 3 = 6; 6 plus 4 = 10; 10 plus 5 = 15; 15 is the number of Eve. By the physical marriage of Adam and Eve the whole race originated, and by the appearance of the Manifestation and the Báb, the Spiritual Generation originated. Therefore there is great knowledge and understanding when the two names are made into one, because if you add from 1 to 9 consecutively, it is equal to the number of Bahá and Báb multiplied together, which equals 45, and it is equal to the number of Adam, and this is the wisdom in it. Also, in the fractions, the greatest is 1/9. Also .9 is the greatest decimal. The Name of Christ in numbers has no relation to the Name of Bahá'u'lláh, because the Name of the Messiah of the Jews is a Hebrew name, and in order to compare them we must take both names in Arabic. His name was Jesus. The Name of God which Christ gave to His disciples was the Name of the Kingdom of Bahá'u'lláh. It was the same spiritually, but it was a name which was never pronounced. All the bible was written for Bahá'u'lláh. Everywhere “The Lord of Hosts” refers to the Manifestation.

Advance always in the Kingdom of Bahá'u'lláh; make always thy heart occupied by the mentioning of Bahá'u'lláh; consider that only in your eyes is Bahá'u'lláh; in your heart is Bahá'u'lláh; in your inmost heart is Bahá'u'lláh. If you fall into trouble, say “Ya-Bahá'u'l-Abhá;” and if anyone oppose you, say “Ya-Bahá'u'l-Abhá.” Even when you may be in your work, mention “Ya-Bahá'u'l-Abhá.” Thou wilt be blamed for My sake; thou wilt be injured for My sake; people will attribute to thee infidelity for My sake; thou wilt bear trouble for My sake. Be encouraged and not fear; it happened just the same in the time of Jesus Christ.

Our Blessed Lord said: “Know the greatness of these days.” {{p11}}

A Conversation with Abú'l-Qásim, the Gardener of the Riḍván, September, 1901

This conversation took place in the general reception room of our Lord's House, in the Holy city of 'Akká, Syria.

Abú'l-Qásim came in, bringing to us three pilgrims (Herbert Hopper of Paris, Thomas Breakwell of England, and Isabella D. Brittingham of America) many beautiful flowers from the Riḍván. The Riḍván is a beautiful Garden situated on the outskirts of 'Akká, and which has been made sacred by the frequent Visits of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh. (Riḍván means Paradise.) In the Garden there is a little house where Abú'l-Qásim lives, and where Bahá'u'lláh often went to rest and to commune. He used to occupy a small cane seat chair by a window in the upper room of the house. Since His Departure that chair has been covered with flowers, and pilgrims coming to the Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, visit — by His Direction — that Holy Garden, and bear those flowers away to all parts of the world.

The following are the incidents which Abú'l-Qásim related concerning the Visits of the Blessed Perfection to the Riḍván:

At one time when the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, was in His little room at the Riḍván, a swarm of locusts filled the Garden. This troubled Abú'l-Qásim and he sought the Presence of the Blessed Perfection and told Him of their being there. The Blessed Perfection replied: "Go and entertain them. They are our guests." Abú'l-Qásim obeyed, gathering all the fruits and vegetables he could find, and placed them in the Garden. the locusts rapidly devoured these and then flew up and settled upon all the trees, shrubs and flowers, and upon every part of the Garden.

Again the gardener sought the Blessed Perfection, and expressed his fear that the insects would destroy everything, and especially the mulberry trees. The Blessed Perfection replied: "This is well. Let them devour them." The gardener supplicated: "This will not be good, for there will be no shade trees for Thee under which to sit." The Blessed Perfection replied: "Because you not wish them to remain, every well." And He then went down into the middle of the Garden, took the hem of His garment in His Hand, and, waving it, uttered thrice, these words: "Abú'l-Qásim does not want you! God Protect you!" Immediately, upon His uttering these words, the locusts arose in a body and flew away. There were many hundreds of them.

At another time Abú'l-Qásim was trying to beautify the fountain in the Garden, and he placed a tube in its apex to add to the grace of its flow. He also arranged some candles so that they would illuminate the spray of the fountain at nightfall. Then He sought the Blessed Perfection and supplicated Him to visit the Garden and see the fountain. The Blessed Perfection replied: "It is well. Ask the man to make ready the horses and I will go." When all was ready and they had started for the Ridván, Abú'l-Qásim plead(ed) to be permitted to go {{p12}} on before Him and put the fountain in running order, the Blessed Perfection replied: “No, you have already walked here from the Garden.” When about half way there Abú'l-Qásim renewed his entreaty, and this time the Blessed Perfection granted it. In the twinkling of an eye the gardener found himself in the Garden, but was unable to explain how he arrived there. He turned on the water and, when the Blessed Perfection appeared in the Garden, He said to the one who attended to the horses: “Abú'l-Qásim does not understand how he reached the Garden so quickly. He does not know whether he flew, or walked, or ran.”

After seeing the improved flow of the fountain, the Blessed Perfection was about to depart, but Abú'l-Qásim supplicated that He would remain and see the illuminating effect of the candles. The Blessed Perfection said to him: “O Abú'l-Qásim! Know, verily, that it was prophesied and foretold that the fire would be conflagrating amidst the waters; and this is the time and now here is the fulfillment of that prophecy.” (N.B. — A deeper meaning is involved.)

Once, when the Blessed Perfection was sitting in His room in the Ridván, and Abú'l-Qásim was in the lower room with ‘Abdu’l Sali (the uncle of the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) who had also come to the Ridván, — a man named Mírzá Musa knocked for admittance. The gardener went to the door, and then came in to the Blessed Perfection reporting: “It is the Master, Mírzá Musa.” The Blessed Perfection replied, looking intently at Abú'l-Qásim:

“The Master is One, and only One. Everyone else has his own name; but the Master is One. The Master is the Greatest branch. The Master is the Greatest Mystery of God. The Master is THE MASTER!”

At another time the Blessed Perfection instructed the gardener, Abú'l-Qásim, to attend to some business for Him, He and the Master both being in the Ridván. The Master, meeting Abú'l-Qásim just afterward, instructed him to go in to ‘Akká and bring them some food for supper.

The gardener sought the Blessed Perfection and supplicated that he might tell Him of the Master’s Command. The Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, said in reply to Abú'l-Qásim:

“That is very well. You must go. You must do everything that the Master says. Everything the Master says is just the same as if I said it. He is ME, and I am HE. There is no difference between My Commands and the Commands of the Master.”

When the Blessed Perfection first reached ‘Akká, He was confined in prison. Later on, after His release, He went immediately to the Ridván, remaining there twelve days, and having all the believers with Him. After those twelve days, He returned to His abode. But coming or going, He would always visit the Riḍván.

At another time Abú'l-Qásim came, in the early morning, to the Blessed Perfection, bearing to Him a bouquet of roses. When the Blessed Perfection inquired of him concerning the Garden, the gardener supplicated His Presence there, in the afternoon, saying: "You will see it when you come and bless it." The Blessed Perfection then said: "We have much work to do." The gardener replied: "Your work is never finished. But mine, in the Garden — if my work amounts to anything — will be finished by noon." The Blessed Perfection then promised to visit the Garden in the afternoon, and permitted Abú'l-Qásim to leave.

In the Afternoon a severe storm arose. Abú'l-Qásim prepared the samovar with its little charcoal fire, and placed it in the room of the Blessed Perfection, awaiting His arrival, in order to prepare some tea for Him. Then he climbed on to the roof of the house in order to command a wider outlook, and sat there a long time drenched to the skin from the rain, watching for the approach of the Blessed Perfection. After a time he saw the carriage looming up in the distance, and hastened down to make all things ready. And then he met the Blessed Perfection at the entrance to the Garden, with an umbrella, and walked by His side holding it over Him. The Blessed Perfection turned to Abú'l-Qásim and said:

"All the Household begged of Me to remain at home in this storm, but I said: 'No, I must go because I have promised.'"

Then the Blessed Perfection ascended the steps to His room. But before He reached the room the storm suddenly ceased.

Once the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, and the Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, were both in the Riḍván. Abú'l-Qásim brought a chair and gave it to the Blessed Perfection, and the Master turned and went up stairs to the room of the Blessed Perfection.

Turning to Abú'l-Qásim, the Blessed Perfection said: "Know thou, verily! All are creatures, — but the MASTER IS NOT."

Once the Blessed Perfection said: "If any one offers a cup of water, in the Day of God, for My sake, it will be greater than future offerings of mountains of diamonds and gold."

The Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, said at one time when in the Riḍván: "This Garden is like the Garden of the Martyrs."

Abú'l-Qásim said that sometimes Bahá'u'lláh slept in His room at the Riḍván. At such times Abú'l-Qásim never slept, but, in his devotion, remained watching.

One night, sitting thus before the door of the room of the Blessed Perfection, being weary, sleep overpowered him. He was awakened by a touch upon his neck, and beheld the Blessed Perfection standing beside him, Who said to him: “You were sleeping and I awakened you.” He told the gardener to come into the room, and then He said to him: “Do you see this Garden? Do you see all these stones? All will be destroyed. But the time will come when these will be renewed, and then they will be fixed for all. {{p14}}

But the people will not be satisfied, but will bring marble. even this will not satisfy them. They will bring one brick of silver and one brick of gold. But these stones, in My Eyes, are greater than gold or silver the people will bring. And in that time the people will weep and cry, and will say: ‘What a great time was that when Abú’l-Qásim used to serve in this Garden!’ and they will beg to be permitted to visit this Place.

One day the Blessed Perfection said to Abú’l-Qásim: “All the trees in the Garden are mentioning thee, are saying that thou art doing thy best to serve them.”

The next day He again visited the Ridván, and while there He said: “I have never enjoyed being in any Garden as much as in this one, and I have never seen so beautiful a Garden.”

This was the last time before His Ascension that the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, ever visited the Garden.

Abú’l-Qásim said to us: “It seems to me that my inmost heart is melting when I am stating these incidents.

“None of the believers realize the greatness of these days, and that this is THE DAY for which the world was created. If the people will cut themselves from self and from the world, they will realize it; but, on account of their materiality, they are veiled from realization of it.”

He said the Blessed Perfection said, and the Master says: “Know the greatness of these days.”

Abú’l-Qásim also said that he could not possibly relate or convey the wonderfulness of the many events, or the power of the many experiences, which occurred in the Ridván.

Description of a Visit

Isabella D Brittingham

September 1901

Notes

A portion of a letter, written during March 1905 by Mrs. Isabella D. Brittingham, in response to a letter received in a letter from a far western believer whom she had never personally know, for a c Passing over the journey to Syria, which was but the way to the accomplishment, I take up my pilgrimage from my first point of entry into that land.

In the beginning of September 1901, having taken the steamer from Beirut, Syria, sailing southward on the Mediterranean Sea and standing out a little from the land, we came opposite the Acre on the northern point of the bay of Acre. The Lebanon Hills behind the city were half veiled by a cloudlike mist, but Acre – the “City of Life” – stood out white and shining, touched here and there by the golden rays of the setting sun: “beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth” (Psalm 48:2). As we slowly passed on down, I watched it – sitting motionless and with thoughts too deep for words – one beautiful Utterance from the Sacred Lips of the One who abode therein constantly reverberating through my soul: “From that Holy Fragrance in that white Spot all sides and regions have been perfumed. Blessed are they who inhale the odor thereof!”

Passing on the southern point of the bay, we landed at Haifa, at the foot of Mt. Carmel, to the south of which and coming up to it, lies the valley of Sharon, and back of the mountains, the low lying Lebanon hills. We were in the midst of Bible prophecy. I went off on shore with Mr. Herbert Hopper of Paris, my companion pilgrim, having met him for the first time at Port Sa’id – the bond of the Faith having at once made us brother and sister – for our faces were turned toward the same Holy Spot. We were taken to a hotel, which was also situated at the foot of Mount Carmel, The Master’s returning ambassador, Hájí Hasan Khurasání of Cairo and his interpreter with both of whom I had been making the pilgrimage from NewYork – went off with an Oriental brother, and when next we met them, it was in the Presence of our Lord.

At this hotel we awaited the Word of our Lord to come to Him. Early on the following morning the Summons came for Mr. Hopper, and I was left for a few hours alone. In the interval our Lord’s wife, the Holy Mother, who was then in Haifa with the Holy daughters – but soon to go to Acre – overwhelmed this unworthy one with a most gracious visit of an hour. The power of GOD emanated from her to such a degree that she seemed naught save the embodiment of Divine Love. She appointed an hour in the afternoon for me to come to her, and to remain to tea with the Holy Household, which in due time became a blessed consummation. Late in the afternoon, also, third pilgrim arrived at the hotel, a young ‘Englishman, Mr. Breakwell by name. Although we had never met each other, yet in one moment, through the precious Spirit of this Glorious Revelation, we were as brother and sister talking together- with tears of happiness upon our faces- of the Faith and of Its Power which had brought us together under the shadow of Mount Carmel, to await the Divine Call to the Sacred Feet of the world’s Redeemer.

Early the following morning that blessed Word came, and together we began this last stage of our pilgrimage to His Presence.

The drive from Haifa to Acre is northward, around the shore of the bay of Acre, through the Valley of Acre, with Mount Carmel and the “Land of Zebulun” behind us, the hills of Lebanon to the right, and before us the “land of Naphtali” – and the city of Acre ever looming up clearer and more defined as our carriage followed the road “by the way of the sea”, its left Wheels frequently submerged in the blue waves iridescent with their tinted seaweed. Here and there lonely palm tree appeared, a silhouette against the perfect blue of a Syrian summer sky; and the shore was occasionally enlivened by an Arab with his camel.

That ride has often been described by pilgrims, and it has never been overrated. The air was perfect that blessed September morning, and our hearts were throbbing with the sense of nearness to the Beloved, ‘but we talked but fragmentarily. We read some Hidden firds and Holy Utterances a little. “The Light of His Beauty” was upon my companion’s face, and it was in my soul. Our companionship had reached its acme in a sense of oneness of ineffable joy which could be expressed only in the language of the Spirit.

We passed within the gates of that penal City, on up through its narrow streets amid its Oriental confusion and noise, alighting at the entrance of a courtyard, and followed a guide therein. A row of beautiful Oriental brothers in the Faith awaited, there, our coming, and greeted us in the NAME of that One Who has made the world one home and then, still following our guide, we ascended an outer staircase and were ushered into a large ante-room, most simply furnished, in Oriental style, and were requested to be seated, and then were left alone. The hour was that of noon, - golden and calm. We sat there with thought in suspension. A great stillness fell upon me. Love seemed vibrating everywhere. In a few moments a messenger entered, and in low tones invited us to “partake of a material and a Spiritual feast.” We followed him silently, passing through an upper court which had for its roof the blue sky, and entered a long room, advancing a little and then involuntarily pausing. The floor was tiled in the stern fashion the walls plastered and lofty also an Eastern custom. On one side, toward the upper end of the man, was a wide window, which was I think, lattice. At that upper end which was slightly elevated, was spread a table for the noon meal with a simple snowy cloth and pure china chairs surrounding the table. There was nothing else whatever on the floor or the walls of that simple apartment. Around the room were standing, in perfect silence, with folded arms and bowed heads, a number of the Oriental brothers who I had previously met, - awaiting the entrance of our Lord. We had not long to wait. At the far end, beyond the table, a door swung calmly open, and a Figure, all beautiful and majestic, entered, clad in white flowing robes, and advanced toward us. It was the MASTER. So different was He - so absolutely All Spirit - so much more glorious than the photograph taken of Him by a believer, many years ago (and the copies of which have encircled the world) that I did not, for one instant, recognize Him. The next instant I knew my Lord - and then I lost all earthly consciousness in that Presence. Those about me said that I called: "ID, it is my Master!" - and that I ran to Him, - but I did not know that I had done so. I only knew that I found myself There, before Him, kissing His beautiful Hands, which were extended toward me. Then they said. He left me and went to greet Mr. Breakwell, who was standing dazed and motionless. I do not remember the Master leaving me, but dimly remember seeing Him greet my fellow pilgrim. Then they said He returned to me and taking me by the hand, led me to my seat at the table, but I remember nothing of this, That Great Vibration had broken up the old conditions, and I was lost to the consciousness of this world then, and for hours thereafter, although I, doubtless, mechanically lived and moved. I had entered that Great Light, and Its Power already had begun the work of disintegration.

Great days followed; too great, too sacred, to speak much of. For with what language of the flesh can we portray them? Only those who have been vouchsafed the blessedness of attaining that Visit, and have continuously prayed during the pilgrimage thither to be emptied and cleansed that they may be filled with Him, know what that Visit means to the longing heart. I - the least of all His children - had seen the King in His beauty.

During later meals, as I sat beside my Lord, I understood the joy of "breaking bread in the Kingdom of GOD" - and I understood the mystical Glory of the Truth of the "Lord's Supper!"

The parting, as I sat at the Feet of our Lord, seemed like the rending asunder of the spirit. But His Divine Benediction, there so graciously bestowed upon this unworthy one, healed my sorrow and wiped away my raining tears, and I went forth in the Light of that Love and Mercy, made live by His WORD.

I was in our Lord's Presence five days - the number of the Báb. Twice during that time I was permitted the Blessing of Visiting the Holy Tomb of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh, and once the beautiful Ridván; and, praying in each, I received, through further unveilings of His Presence, the unspeakable realization of the Power and Eternal Glory of GOD.

On the last night, before sailing from Haifa nine of us - Orientals and Occidentals – together assembled at the Tomb of Báb, upon the holy heights of beautiful Mount Carmel, and sitting in an almost unbroken silence, looked across the blue waxes to Acre, the City of Love and Peace for the whole world, watching it until the sunset gold deepened into rose and then turned into ashes, and the of City was hidden from our eyes by a mist; then by the light from a lantern carried by one of our Oriental brothers in the Faith, we descended the mountain.

Early on the following morning September 9th sailed away from Haifa and the land which held our hearts for evermore – we three pilgrims sitting in the stern of the steamer and again watching the blessed City of Acre until it glimmered out of sight.

And then with the preciousness of that Holy Visit, as a Perfume permeating our souls, we turned back to the world to serve Him whose benediction upon us had changed for us that world; Whose Love had made us its humble, unworthy, but privileged cup-bearers of Divine Knowledge concerning its latest and greatest Gift from GOD – the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh.

Before I tell you of my visit – and the Master said I was bear the ‘joyful tidings’ to you all – I must give you another command of His. You have heard, of course, from our honored Ambassador, Mírzá Asadu’lláh of the letter of recommendation which is to be received from the Turkish Ambassador to the Governor of ‘Akká before the pilgrim can be insured comfort, but as the Master has commanded me to speak of it in every audience where I was, I am obedient. Everyone of course, receives a passport when they travel on the Continent, but when we travel on Turkish dominions we also gave a Visa, which makes it possible for us to enter all the Turkish ports, but this is not enough at present. Owing to the Master’s incarceration the way of access to him is very difficult and therefore there is a specific letter to be obtained from the Turkish Ambassador, recommending the pilgrim especially to the Governor of ‘Akká in order that the Pilgrim may be made comfortable in going into the Holy Presence of the Master; otherwise the Master says there may be difficulty.

The veil which I wear is worn by the request (which is the royal command) of the Holy Mother who gave it to me. Before I left the Blessed Holy Land and requested me to wear it at all the Assemblies and at all the meetings, and this is my reason for doing so.

Of course I come before you with a very simple message. It is the old, old story, but it is the sweetest story and because of its sweetness we know what it means in our hearts and it is the simplest story and therefore the most beautiful, for its simplicity proves its greatness, it is the message of “The cup renewed by the One who has come in the Kingdom of His Father” and therefore it is the message of eternal life to the believers and eternal death to the disbelievers. It is the message of “The Father and The Son” The Father said: “Drink to the Chalice of My remembrance, the dearest, the new” in the message of the Covenant, and Christ said 1900 years ago “My sheep hear my voice.”

As you all know I had the honor and privilege of making the pilgrimage with our Master’s Ambassador, Hájí Mírzá Hasan Khurasáním, and his interpreter, Mirsa Hussun Rúhí, to the Holy Headquarters Of course the material part of the journey is no At Port Sa’id we met Mr. Hopper, who is a young American, but who for two years has been in Paris receiving architectural instructions and we four all went into quarantine together. When we left Beirut we stream down the Mediterranean to Haifa and this wavy first glimpse of the Beautiful City. As we passed it, it was sunset and the light of setting sun was thrown over this blessed spot. It is a white city and the light upon it was as a glory, and back of it all the mountains were shrouded in a mist, a most beautiful symbol of the great Light contained therein. As we passed along, from the lips of the Orientals about me, on the steamer, I heard the name, “‘Abbás Effendi”, “‘Abbás Effendi, “‘Abbás Effendi”, Presently Hájí Mírzá Hasan Khurasání who was sitting not far from me commenced to talk and he also said “‘Abbás Effendi” and presently he came to say “Bahá’u’lláh”. Presently Rúhí came by me and dropped down in a seat in a quiet way and said: “These Orientals are talking of our Lord, and they are all saying what a wonderful person he is and one wan especially said that our Lord had taken his son and was educating him and looking after him, and spoke in such a beautiful manner of Him.” And so it le, unbelievers and believers alike recognize a greatness in the presence of our Lord. They do not know what it is of course, they do not all openly know, but the Light is lighting all; some unconsciously some consciously. May of tile poor people in the streets call The Father of the poor”, they say they want no governor but “‘Abbás Effendi’.

The ride from Haifa to the Holy City has never been overrated It is the most beautiful ride I ever took in my life. It is a fit Ling approach to the city of the Great King, wherein shines the light of the world. Mr. Breakwell, a young Englishman who joined us at Haifa, and myself made this holy trip. Jr. Hopper went the day before by the suneeonin6 of our Blessed master, because it was thought best for all of us not to go together, but in the meantime Mr. Breakwell came and the Master sent word for us to go at the same time, and we made this very wonderful trip together, the Beautiful City shining out in front of us all the while like a Light beaconing to us from that Great Precious Center, the Light from which has so radiated in every heart. We were in the midst of the prophecies as we passed through. You know the Bay of Haifa is on the shores, and on the southern point is ht. Carmel, the mountain of God. On the northern point of that Bay the City of ‘Akká. Cumming up along the Mediterranean to the shadow of Mt. Carmel is Sharon, from Mt. Carmel around the Bay of ‘Akká to the City of ‘Akká, and including all the surrounding low land region between the Mediterranean and the lbw lying chain of hills, is the plain or valley of ‘Akká. Then there is a low chain o: hills running back of ‘Akká, and this plain, just back of these and through that region, lie the lands of Zebulon and Naphtali. The people who walked in darkness there have seen a Great Light, in the lands of Zebulon and Naphtali, by the way of the sea. The sea does not mean a small limited body of water; it means the Mediterranean Sea. It is further proven by continuing to read this 9th chapter of Isaiah, because it says: ‘For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall, be called Wonderful, Councillor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.’ This great One is the Everlasting lather, the Mighty God, and we know that Jesus never claimed it. It also says in Isiah that ‘The plain of Sharon, and the valley of Achor shall see the glory of our God. It also says in Hosea that 'The Valley of Achor shall 'be for a door of hope'. It also says in Isaiah 'And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for My people shall have sought me. And here we were right in the midst of these prophecies, and if this is not prophecy, the Bible is not prophecy.

My stay, in the Holy City was limited to five days, owing to the conditions, but it was a blessed number for it was the number of the Bat. Of my meeting, our Blessed Lord, it is impossible to tell you, and yet I will try to tell you the surface of it. It was at noon when we arrived, and we were taken into an Otto room, Mr. Breakwell, and myself, and presently we were summoned to 'partake of a material and a spiritual feast.' We went out with a feeling of awe, but it was the unknowable yet in the flesh, and we entered the dining room, beautiful for its simplicity as is the whole home of our Holy Lord, the perfection of simplicity, the Oriental beautiful people, beautiful men, the Holy people. My saints, indeed" the Blessed Perfection said, were standing all about a dozen of them, with folded arms and bowed heads, doing homage to the Great One of the earth, awaiting His presence. As I entered one door, and Mr. Breakwell with me from the opposite door came a wonderful Being. He was so totally unlike his photograph that I did not know the Master. But I looked at this marvelous, beautiful Being, and I thought, O how beautiful he is and the two things which impressed me were majesty and spirit. I instantly knew him, and can anyone tell me how I knew him? But I knew that he was my Master, and I did not know what I did, because it was like a burst of revelation to me but they say I ran to him and said "O, it is my Master!" I remember kissing His beautiful hands, which he held out to me I do not remember how I left him, for the world had changed, but the next thing I saw was the Master some distance Mr. Breakwell, who was very much dazed as well as myself, say he came back and led me to my seat at the table, but I do not remember it. I do not remember anything about that meal, except one thing which he said to me, and which I was to remember He said: "Praise be to God, thou must praise Him as I do that thou hast attained to this Visit." That was the one thing I remember; then hours after that passed of which I do not know. I was lifted up above the earth and am not aware of what passed. People say that we are hypnotized; they call this hypnotism; they say there is an undue influence thrown about us, and that we are victims of sorcery, etc., I thank God if we are, for it shows us a God through it. If this is hypnotism, thank God for hypnotism; as long as we live! Another thing that they say is that the Master suggests things to you. If he does, thank God that He does because he suggests God to our hearts. We have the weapon because He has given the Light of God. I realized God in that Holy Presence as I never realized Him before. Jesus had these powers if you call them suggestions and hypnotism. Did we not realize God through His utterances? Did not the people of His time realize God enough to know that it was a God and chronicled these events? Is that hypnotism? We have God on earth. In the Book of Revelations are many prophecies of the coming of the two. The "Glory of God" and the 'Glory of the Lamb' _____ this kingdom, God and the Lamb are to build up the temple. We are to be written in the Lamb's Book of Life. The Lamb is to open the seals, the book of Kilab-el-Aqdas. They are to be one and inseparable. In Zechariah, the Branch, the Lamb is to build the Temple. In Isaiah, the Son is to be clothed with the robe of His Father and to build that throne and to be decorated with the decorations of the Glory of His Father. All is fulfilled. When the Blessed Perfection came to this earth and revealed the great law He left that revelation in the hands of another. Have you had the fullness of that revelation? Has anyone of this revelation in America or anywhere else yet? Has a nation? Has a body? That wine is yet sealed, and who is going to feed us with that wine? Who is going to open these Books? Who is going to deliver revelation of Bahá'u'lláh to the world? No one, but the one appointed because he was to have the illumination adequate to deliver the holy Revelation. The illumination must be complete. I never realized until I stood in the presence of the Master what God's greatest mystery was.

I had a beautiful talk Abu'l-Kázim, the gardener. Of course you are all familiar with the beautiful garden of the Blessed Perfection. Abu'l-Kázim was the gardener in His time, and is the gardener in the time of our Most Exalted Lord, the Center of the Covenant. Among many instances which are very familiar, and of which I will not speak so much, two or three were remarkably beautiful. One time the Master accompanied the Blessed Perfection the Garden of the Ridván and there they decided to remain for some time and the Blessed Perfection instructed Abu'l-Kázim to attend to a certain business matter. Our Master spoke to Abu'l-Kázim and told him to go and get some food to bring to Him in the garden. Abu'l-Kázim went to the blessed Perfection and supplicated as to what he should do and when he should fulfil those two commands. The Blessed perfection said: "Everything that the Master says is just the same as though I said it; He is and I am he. There is no difference between my commands and the of the Master"

Another time the Blessed Perfection was in His own private Room at the Ridván, when someone knocked for admission, and Abu'l-Kázim went to the door and then came back saying: "The Master, Mírzá Musa, is here." The Blessed perfection looked at him intently and said: "The Master is One and only One. Everyone else has his own name but the Master is One. The Master is the Greatest Branch, the Master is the greatest mystery of God, the Master is Master.

Another time the and the Blessed perfection had gone to the Garden of Ridván and the gardener brought the Blessed Perfection a chair. The Master turned and went up to the little room. The Blessed perfection turned and looked at Abu'l-Kázim and said "I know, thou, verily, all are creatures, but the Master is not."

From these utterances, from the prophecies in our Bible, from the station which the most enlightened and the most illuminated, in the presence of the Master, give Him, we know that his station is as exalted as anyone can possibly imagine and He is as unlimited as the Word incarnated can be.

There are two points for everyone to bear in mind, to bear upon their hearts, when they are making this Holy and Heavenly pilgrimage, for when we make that pilgrimage we are undertaking a visit to Heaven. It is the Paradise of God. The two points are these, and I specially want every dear sister and brother to listen to this, it is very simple but it is very pertinent: Each one receives according to the measure of the cup that he takes. If the cup is full of something else, or some other things, only a little will be placed in that cup and that will mix with the other things and be lost; The fragrance will depart. The light of its beauty will not be present when it is confused with other conditions in that cup. Another thing upon this one point: The length of the visit has nothing to do with the absolute blessing, but it is the condition of the heart. You may go and stay there ten years in the presence of our Lord and receive very small bit, and you may go and be filled in an hour. That is with your soul and mine.

The second point is this: The responsibility of the Visit. To go headlong into that Great presence, who can recognize it? Who will understand its greatness? The lantern is seen and that is a beautiful and a wonderful lantern, but who sees the Light if they rush in where angels fear to tread? The responsibility to so great and tremendous that one should think well of it before they make that Visit, because they never can afterwards evade it or escape from it.

Our Lord is the same to every pilgrim, there is no favoritism. He would not be the Master if he favored anybody. All are children of His love. He has come to all; His love blesses all. Believers and unbelievers alike in his presence feel the power of His love, but it is the heart which must be right to feel in its fullness. Indeed the feeblest lambs require the greatest nourishment. We know we are all babes. We need a great deal of food because we are very, very hungry, and we know that the food is inexhaustible; the table of Bounty is without limit, when we are ready for it.

One time the question arose as to the salvation of mere believers and that of a believer. I do not mean one who confesses to be believer, but by a believer I mean one whom God knows is a believer, and yet has not worked much, has seemed an idler to some extent and yet is a believer in God's sight. The question arose as to the salvation of a mere believer and those who were striving to attain the greatest of spiritual gifts. The question was discussed in the Master's presence, who knows everything which goes on and answers all our questions, if He wants to, without our asking Him. He answered many and many questions of mine without a word from me. I went to the Blessed Tomb and uttered a supplication, that nobody, not even my own husband, knew, and when I came back my Master began to talk to me about it and to say some very wonderful things about it. Another time I began to tell him about something that was very dear in the else knew what it was, and as to about it' and began to tell him. His greatness.

This question was then asked the Master "Are all of those who believers (as God knows them, remember) in this great revelation saved?" Our Lord answered: "All believers have attained to the Heavenly gifts, but each one in a different degree. All have arrived at the great rolling Ocean, but each has taken that which quenched His thirst.”

Our Lord’s daily life is a living epistle known and read by all men and this great reality upon earth is proven in His self-effacement. He never thinks of Himself. His life is filled with the thoughts of others and the comforts of others. When we were there the Master appointed us our rooms, and there were very many of us, therefore Hájí Korassani was given the Master’s room and the master went out to sleep. One night the Governor having been there and others, to see the master, and the supper was very late that night, too late for the Master to go out and incommode others, so he remained in the house, and who can say where the Master slept? In the morning is the hour when the Holy Household is with him and the maid servants come in for a cup of tea. That is hour when he meets them at six o’clock in the morning, a most beautiful time with the Master, as every knows who has been there, and it is no use to try to convey the reality of it. They are all served with a cup of tea before the Master is served; every servant, and He receives the cup last. Also at the table He is the last to be served; everything is before the Master. He never talks of himself. It is a great lesson to me I know because we are weak and apt to do that very thing, and it was such a wonderful thing to me to see the Blessed master never talking of Himself. He has left His body, for other people’s service. By that I mean that he has departed from the things of this world because He is the Servant, as He says, of the servants of God. It is impossible to speak of the joyfulness in his spirit. I do not think many have spoken of this. It was one of the most beautiful revelations to me the Master’s joy, the brightness, the sweetness, the beautiful Light in His life, the wonderful smile which comes over His face, and lightens every heart which sees it. He not only smiles but He laughs, and happy hours are in the presence of the Master when He is enjoying and receiving and giving, some bright and beautiful things in the blessed conversation. Everything which the Master receives is passed on to others. For instance, one evening Hájí Khurasání brought me a flower and gave it to Him, and He passed it on to me. I was selfish enough to keep it, but I have dedicated it and I hope to give it away for I have seen the Master and I have the best Gift. I have promised to give it away, but I had to learn the lesson and think about it first. It was a sacrifice to give away that beautiful rose. Also the beautiful gifts that the pilgrims bear to Him are given away to others. Sometimes they are very elegant gifts which are given to these others. We do not realize, perhaps, that the very gift in itself, whether it be a very beautiful thing or a very simple thing (as it was in the case with me) is a test to the person. His great footsteps are marked out in lines for us; obedience, love, joy, self-forgetfulness, generosity – the characteristics of God – are there in perfection. He is the Absolute Beauty. He is our Great Light. These Blessed Embassadors who have come to us radiate that Light. They never speak of themselves. They have come here for the service of and their fellow men.

One evening at the table the Master said: “The .Orientals and the Occidentals are gathered together around; this table, clapping hands’ and He told me that I must speak of this and tell the people of this beautiful evening when we all eat together at the table. If it were possible. I should like to tell you who was there, but the time is too short.

While I was there, I visited by the Mercy of God, the Holy Tomb twice and the Ridván once, and the Shrine of the Báb once; but these would occupy much time in themselves and I have today to do with the Master.

One great lesson which the Master gave us and which is a very practical one is in regard to this revelation and that of Jesus Christ, and of which we all took notes. The Master said the differences are, that in this cycle, -all the inhabitants of the world will, be gathered into one nation; universal peace will prevail; bloodshed and war will cease; there will be a general language; unity and harmony will reach the highest state; there will be no bigotry. All will be gathered under the tent of peace. Before the universal peace will be established there will be wars and a general overturning of society. These wars are to warn the people, so that they may learn, if they do not follow the teachings that they will be punished and that the power of the Spirit will be taken from them and they will become as dead bodies. The beginning will be in our time and the truth will be generally known by the year 1917. In this connection I will say that the Master said that this was the first year of tribulation.

The difference between this Manifestation and that of Jesus Christ are:

1st – The teaching of Christ amounted to a very few pages, but the teachings of the Manifestation amounted to twenty books,

2nd –The teaching of the Manifestation is greater than the teaching of Jesus Christ. For example if you wish to originate a religion from the teachings of Christ you could not do it. But from the teachings of the Manifestation you can do everything. They include everything

3rd – Apparently Jesus Christ was against the Jews only, but the Manifestation was against the whole universe. Jesus Christ, on account of injury from the Jews and their opposition, used to go from one place to another, but that the manifestation stood before all was evident, as He was seen by all and did hide Himself, even in a little village. At all times He said ‘I am ready!’ He wrote to the King of Persia “Let all the divines and doctors of the law assemble together and discuss the matter with me, and I am ready to prove it.”

4th – At the time of Christ the greatest one of the disciples was Peter, yet He denied His Master three times. But the followers of Bahá’u’lláh, under the most severe torture were repeating the name of Bahá’u’lláh and never” denied It. Not only one, a hundred or a thousand – but twenty thousand followers. 5th – The Cause of Jesus Christ existed for three hundred years before it became generally known; but the cause of the Manifestation, in the Day of the Manifestation was known all over the World.

6th – Jesus Christ came to establish the proof of the Old Testament and this was for the Jews; consequently His opposers were few. But the Manifestation came for all the world, and for all religions, and to explain all the books of these religions. Another proof was that during the imprisonment of the manifestation, the Governor and Officials were His humble servants. Even His enemies were submissive to Him, because the cause of the manifestation is universal, and it will envelope the world.

7th – The Miracles which appeared through the manifestation, the Master did not like to mention, because they will not be proof to others. They were only a demonstration to those who witnessed them. If the Master mentions all of these, the people will say that the idol worshippers attribute many wonderful things to their idols. The hearers will say this is right and this is wrong. While the miracles which actually appeared in the time of the Manifestation are greater than all, the Master does not wish to mention them, for the Manifestation said that miracles would be like a veil over the people, for every time the proofs (of the Word) will be so evident and clear that the people can understand them.

Sometime since some of the people in a town in Persia took one of the believers and put him on a donkey, and in this manner took him around the City. All the people and the children gathered about him, clapping their hands (this being the oriental custom on such occasion and said they intends to kill him. Upon hearing this, his spirit was filled with joy. When they reached the place where they intended to kill him, a crowd of about a thousand people gathered about him and he was beaten until he was dead. During all that time he danced for joy. This is to make us understand that we should suffer martyrdom with joy. The waster said the believers did not begin to realize the greatness of their station. The Blessed perfection said and the Master says ‘Know the greatness of these days!’”

Once the Blessed perfection slept in his own room at the Riswan. Sometimes this event occurred, and always as an act of love and devotion Abu'l-Kāẓim kept guard. On this especial night he sat down in front of the room door and while sitting there, fell asleep. He was, awakened by a touch on his neck and looking up he saw the Blessed Perfection. The Blessed perfection said: “Abu'l-Kāẓim, you were sleeping and I wakened you”. He told Abu'l-Kāẓim to follow him into the room. There he said to Abu'l-Kāẓim: “Do you see this garden? Do you see all these stones? All will be destroyed. But the time will come when these will be renewed and will be fixed for all time. But the people will not be satisfied with this, but will bring marble. Even this will not satisfy them; they will bring one brick of gold and one brick of silver. But these stones are greater in my eyes than any gold or silver which the people will bring. And in that time the people will weep and cry and saying great was that, time when Abu'l-Kāẓim used to serve in this garden’ and they will beg to visit this Place”.

You have all heard of our Blessed master’s imprisonment and many of you, no doubt, no something of the circumstances. You know there was a time when we received a Light from one in this City, and that one gave my husband and myself the Light, but today he has denied the Light, because to deny the Master is to deny the Manifestation of God. They are One and inseparable. You must deny the Revelor if you deny the One into Whose hands that Revelation has been delivered, to proclaim and interpret it to the people of this world. This one you all know. We all know the story of these past days. We all know that we tried and begged and pleaded to God to bring Him back to His God. We all know that he must do one thing to come back to his God and that is to acknowledge his. Master Who is, not what he has said, but as he is, the interpreter of God. He cannot be less than the Light which He interprets. There is neither logic/reason, prophecy or anything in such a position that the Master is less than His appointed work. Since the Master's imprisonment the Glory has become greater than ever in his face, because God is with Him, manifesting more gloriously than ever through Him. He, as you know, wrote a book conveying His teachings as he used to give them and in that book, has he honored our Master? Has he recognized the Greater Branch? Has he recognized the Center of the Covenant? Has he recognized the Lamb who is to open the Seven seals? This is not a personal thing, but it is a vital thing for' He that is not with Me is against Me. Now the book which he has written was sent to Muḥammad-ʿAlí, in Syria, and also a letter was registered to Muḥammad-ʿAlí, from the author, stating in that letter that he had fulfilled all of Muḥammad-ʿAlí's instructions. These facts are known to everybody in and about the Holy City. You can go to the believers or you can go to the unbelievers, the Nakaseen. I saw five or six of them (the Naakaseen) I wanted to see them. They are their own witnesses. They show their condition. I do not wish to talk about them in any personal manner, but they show what a Nakaseen, what a violator of God, is. There is no spirituality in their faces, there is no intelligence, nor culture of any kind. I will tell you how I saw them, because some might misunderstand it. I went with the Most Exalted Leaf and three of the Holy Daughters to visit the Blessed Tomb. As we came out there were five of them standing very near, five of their representative men. At another time (the second time I visited the Blessed Tomb.) We three pilgrims went; with a young believer there, Mírzá Ameen, the son of Mírzá Assa Ullah. Mírzá Asadu'lláh, Mírzá Ameen did not have the key, so he went into the house of the Nakaseen to get their key-because the Holy Tomb is free to all the sons and daughters. There is no limit to god's mercy. One of the Nakaseen came in and worshipped with us, so that I had the opportunity of seeing, him. Now the book before referred to, and this letter sent to Muḥammad-ʿAlí were appropriated by the Postal authorities and sent to Constantinople and are there being translated into the Turkish, received all this information in 'Akká. The sultan immediately sent down an official to arrest our Blessed Lord and to arrest Muḥammad-ʿAlí and Badi' Ullah and they immediately brought them into 'Akká. But they honored Our Lord; they could not help it. They waited for Him. Our Lord knows everything. He foretold this several years ago. Our Blessed Master could burst the bands at any time, but this tribulation is to work out a good for the Cause, and then, by the power of God, it may be removed. They waited for the Master. He was in Haifa with the Holy Household and said to them; I must go to 'Akká. The Holy Mother tried to dissuade him from going, but he went. When he reached 'Akká He went into the of a believer in the suburbs and drank tea. He said then that He must go to 'Akká, and they tried to dissuade Him from going because the day was very warm. It was in the early part of August. But He said, no He must go and He went to 'Akká and went immediately to the official Headquarters to receive what, of course, He knew was there, and the officials there, of course, performed their official duty. When next He saw the Holy Mother she said to Him: "May I ask you one question? You seem so happy Will you please explain to me your happiness? (I have this from the Holy Mother herself) He said: "I am happy because my imprisonment has begun,"

He instructed me to give his love and salutation to everyone, individually and separately so if you will please accept it thus I know that the Master will accept my effort.

He said that two or three years ago He wrote to some of the believers in America, and also to him of whom I spoke before, stating these events which have now taken place. He also wrote the same thing to other countries and these are now exactly fulfilled. He said that now that these events had come to pass that we should feel happy, not sorrowful. The believers should not feel troubled or distressed about the confinement of the Master. He wishes them always to be cheerful. He is accustomed to imprisonment. We must not feel distressed as this is sent from God and it should be pleasant for us to have troubles from God. Still greater things than these will happen, all of which have been prophesied. All the believers must be in such a mood that when calamity exists in the greatest degree, they must rejoice exceedingly. The confinement of the Master must be the gladdest thing to all and it must be the cause of their steadfastness and confirmation. We should be very happy even under confinement. Neither hunger, nor thirst, nor confinement in prison, nor bloodshed, nor Martyrdom should prevent us from being true to the Blessed Perfection. We should accept all of these things all our lives; we should hope for them and then we will be happy when they come. He said that all the believers were under the shadow of the manifestation We are not physical beings, He said, but spiritual bodies. We must thank God 'for our spiritual existence. The 'body is earthy, the spirit is heavenly. The first is of this world and the second belongs to the Kingdom. The first is attributed to darkness and the other to illumination. The first is limited to space, the second is Placeless and Limitless.

Our Blessed Lord said that the gladdest tidings to Him are that the believers are living in love and obedience and are spreading the Great Message and that our love, our unity, our obedience must not be by confession, but of reality. You must remember this one thing: Bahá'u'lláh is the Messiah, the Deliverer, the Father who has come. He said Himself: "The Father has come" Then where is the Son who has come in the Kingdom of the Father? The Son has come, the Greatest Branch has come; for the Father has given Him the Kingdom, and He is worthy. There is no middle ground. "He that is with Me is with Me, but He that is not with Me is against Me."

In closing I want to say that our Blessed and Exalted Lord said that we would have many trials, much tribulation, much persecution, as believers that we would be reviled.; that we would be called infidels; that we would be accused of blasphemy; but He said: "Be encouraged and do not fear. It happened just the same in, the time of Jesus Christ."

“Our beloved sister Mrs. Agnew has requested me to write you something with which I was deeply impressed while in ‘Akká, the “White City” the New Jerusalem by the tideless sea.”

One event which stands out pre-eminently and most impressively was the Anniversary of the Departure of Bahá'u'lláh, the revered father of our beloved Master, on the twenty-eight of May.

After a sojourn with those beloved people of nearly seven weeks and my visit was about completed, it seemed like leaving Paradise, and I thought my heart would break. I knew that it was wrong, for had I not been blessed beyond all that I could ask or think? While I remained there what could I do to serve the Glorious Cause to which I desired to devote the remainder of my life? To leave an atmosphere of love which, like the fragrance of rare exotics, permeated every thought, and where every service rendered was divine, was almost beyond the power of the human will. I knew that it was best, and, while I was willing, I did not wish to go. But when the dear Master, like a pitying father, said; “do not weep, I will be with you”, my heart was comforted. And again, when He told me that I was to remain until after the night of the Departure and receive that blessing, I was almost happy.

On that evening all the believers repaired to the Holy Tomb (which you probably know is about two miles outside the city), there to spend the night. After Tupper we were driven there, where we met all the members of the holy household, and the believers.

The Tomb is connected with the main building (the Bahjí) by A kind of chapel or enclosed garden, at the entrance of which you remove your shoes, and advance to the Holy Threshold, at which you kneel and pray.

The rooms were brilliantly illuminated with lamps and candelabra, and thickly carpeted with rich Oriental rugs, all of which were love offerings from the many pilgrims from all over the world. The Tomb proper was covered with a costly and most beautiful Persian shawl, and thickly strewn with flowers.

The night was wondrously beautiful; the full moon was shining with such magnificence that it was almost as light as day. Through the open window we could see the blue Mediterranean in the distance, and the air was heavy with the fragrance of jasmine and roses. The only audible sound was the wail of a solitary night bird, whose cry seemed like some lone wanderer whose lamp had become extinguished and who was calling out for help.

Within the chapel the aisles were filled with kneeling women, and one of the Holy Leaves chanted the prayers. The sky, the air, the sea, and even the flowers with which the room was profusely decorated, were in perfect accord. The solemn chanting amid those prostrate forms was a scene long to be remembered; and there we remained till midnight. Then we retired to the rooms on the left of the chapel, and the men in like manner filled the places so recently occupied by us. In that gathering there were venerable men who had suffered years of imprisonment, whose shining faces beamed with holy light; young men were there too, whose every look spoke of the deep veneration and love with which they had dedicated their lives to the Holy Cause; even the little grandchildren were there, whose gentle and subdued manner spoke of holy reverence. One of the venerable believers chanted the Holy Utterances and Prayers, and for three hours they remained in solemn devotion.

During that time there was singular phenomenal occurrence. While from the open window we could distinguish the sea and sky in the distance, which was beautifully calm and clear, not a cloud to be seen, where we were there was quite heavy thunder storm. The lightning flashed, and the reverberation of the thunder through the heavens seemed indeed as if God were speaking. The bowed forms of the worshippers and the solemn chanting made one feel as if he stood upon the boundary of an invisible world, “one not made with hands, but eternal in the heavens.”

At three o'clock the men retired, the women went into the chapel and prayers again were chanted. Three of us went into the “Holy of Holies” the Sacred Tomb – and there prostrated ourselves in prayer.

I have often wondered if the believers in other lands could think what was the burden of our supplications that night. While no one spoke to the other, I afterwards learned that the release of our beloved Master was the burden of all hearts poured out at the Holy Threshold of the Exalted and Divine Father, Lord of all the worlds.

On the Threshold of the Tomb were a few sprays of Jasmine which the Greatest Holy Leaf venerated, and gave a part to me.

In the early dawn we passed out and walked in the fields. The full moon was still above the horizon. The blue of the distant sea, the paling of the stars, the pure azure of the sky without a single cloud, the purple line of the low mountains in the east, and the plain of Aces, which has been the scene of some of earth's greatest conflicts, were all before us. As we wandered in the early dawn there was a calm, such as would follow a night of deep excitement, and a feeling of expectancy, as if we were waiting for something. It would take a mightier pen than mine to describe the wonderful emotion which took possession Of us, and I could only think of the holy women nineteen hundred years sip watching at the Tomb of our crucified Saviour, Jesus Christ. As the dawn advanced the birds began to chant their morning matins, and as the fun burst forth upon our expectant vision in all of its splendor and poured a flood of golden light over the world, I could but exclaim: " The Lord is risen, yes, He has risen indeed:"

O my beloved friends: How powerless are my words to make you see and feel what I experienced on that memorable night. It was like standing in some holy sanctuary, on the borders of e world beyond, where we had entered into the Sacred Place of The Yost High, and communed with the angles. A few hours of such a recollection will suffice for a lifetime. It is an experience never to be forgotten. It nerved as if we could never leave such an influence' and when we thought of the Precious Casket entombed in that Sacred Shrine, and what It had Manifested to the world, we could but feel our utter un-worthiness. To think of self or to harbor one selfish thought were worse than sacrilege.

But where, this night, is our beloved Master, the Center of the Covenant, the Lover, the Friend of all the world? He is not with us. His holy feet have not pressed the earth outside the city gates for four long years, but every foot of ground inside those walls has been made forever sacred and blessed. In a little room on top of the house where He dwells, whence He could see the Holy Tomb, He kept His lonely vigil. No not alone, for who can tell what heavenly angels were there ministering to Him, and like the Prophets of old, He may have talked with God. When we saw Him the next day His face was resplendent with divine Glory, and the Voice of the Holy Spirit rang clear in His every Utterance."

Letter To Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl

Elsa (Laura) Clifford Barney

To Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl,

My revered teacher and dearly loved friend.

It is at your request, that I am going to put this halting speech in to writing it has no value outside of the fact that these words have arisen from a sincere heart. Friends, it is indeed a great joy for me to be with you all today and I thank you for your warm welcome. I am going to have the privilege of telling you the impressions I received while at Haifa and 'Akká. I wish to begin this talk by a short and beautiful prayer written by the Master for a Believer whose only wish is to love God as she should and to be near Him in the Great Hereafter. "Oh My Lord, my beloved, befriend me in my loneliness, accompany me in my exile – remove my sorrow, cause me to adore Thy Beauty; withdraw me from all else save Thee, attract me through the fragrance of Thy Holiness. Cause me to be associated in Thy Kingdom with those who are severed from all else, save Thee who yearn to serve Thy Sacred Threshold and stand to work in Thy Cause; enable me to be one of Thy Maid servants who have attained unto Thy good pleasure for Thou art the Merciful, The Generous!"

When I first went to Haifa and 'Akká in the month of October 1900, I had heard very little about this great Revelation, beyond the facts that a wonderful herald and fore runner had appeared on the earth. He was called the Báb – His appearance was followed by an extraordinary Being named Bahá'u'lláh, who declared Himself to be "He whom God would manifest." He was unjustly exiled from His country and afterwards imprisoned in 'Akká. Though in close confinement, His writings and teachings went out through the power of the Spirit, and are now encircling the world. Bahá'u'lláh passed away in 1892 – leaving all things and His great work to be continued and established by His Wonderful Son 'Abbás Effendi the "Center of the Covenant." It was to see that 'Abbás Effendi that I left America a little over a year ago. We were three making this pilgrimage. My cousin Ellen Grin, Madame Emma Trouve, a Frenchwoman, and a servant catholic, who as yet had heard nothing of this great revelation, and myself.

When we had landed, I sent this message to the master, "that I believed, He must be the Christ Spirit of the awaited day. I believed that this great hour was at hand for the whole world and sin itself was calling for a Redeemer. If He was truly the Saviour He had the power of awakening my sleeping souls." I sent this message because I believe the first basis of everything is, or should be sincerity, and I did not want to appear to have deeper feelings than I truly possessed. My cousin and myself were bidden to come to Him next morning at the house of six in the full beauty of the awakening day, we walked to the Master's humble home, there we were greeted by a number of Believers who showed us into a simple room to await 'Abbás Effendi.

When the Master appeared on the Threshold. I was overwhelmed for such an atmosphere of perfect Majesty and humility surrounded His whole being. He swept into the room, and after having given us a most beautiful welcome, bade us be seated, then the flood of His words became to us as living water – I could not understand the language, but the spirit was so strong that we felt as though we knew the words even before they were given us though the clear translation of Aly Kuli Khán. At first we remained as though stunned, but soon to my great surprise for it is something that I seldom do. I began to weep. They were not tears of sadness, oh no they were tears of hope and of deep gratitude, tears that one might shed after having been released from a dark prison for years, I had tried to remove the darkness which enveloped my soul, but in vain, all had seemed useless, my despair increasing tenfold after each successful struggle! I listened to the Master's words, I saw my way and saw my way clearly, my tears flowed from the source of gratitude, my chilled heart fill the warm life pulse of the love throb for the first time. The cage of darkness was shattered and my freed soul felt the wings of the spirit upon which to soar upward to God.

When I returned from this first and ever to be remembered meeting. I told my friend Madame Trouve that I had a wonderful message to give her, and that I would do so as I was sufficiently collected in thought. That afternoon, we drove up Mt. Carmel where we visited a picturesque monastery – my friend knelt down and prayed with great fervour when we had entered the chapel. Next morning she came to me and said, "Elsa I had such a strange dream last night, now I feel quite prepared to hear what you have to tell me." She then related how in her dreams she was kneeling in the chapel upon Mt. Carmel and her prayers were directed to the figure of Christ on the Crucifix. She prayed for guidance and light, gradually the figure on the Cross descended and approached her laying His hand upon her head, and said, "Be at peace – your prayer is answered." When my friend had finished telling me the dream, I replied, "Your prayer is answered, the Spirit of the Great Saviour has again returned to earth." She accepted the whole Message with joy and fragrance.

The next day, she saw the Master once the first, the wave of emotion has passed away, she told me that it was the same face, the same form that in her dream had come down from the crucifix to answer her prayers. After having spent a few blessed days with the Holy Household, we left Haifa and 'Akká. When saying farewell to the Master, I felt so sad, oh so sad, even unto annihilation for I had not yet understood that wherever I should be there I should find the everlasting strength and guidance of the spirit. I had so yearned to remain as a humble servant in the Master's home so as to pass my life by His side – but He called me to Him and He said, “To be near me hereafter, you must now go far away to do the Master's work. I have hope and confidence and you will return unto this Holy spot, Fear not I am ever with you.” As the ship sailed out of the harbour – we expected our hearts to be rung with anguish, but instead, we all felt a great peace and a great happiness – and I then realized His first promise had been fulfilled – since then I had never felt the pang of separation. Sometimes my eyes have been blinded by the dust of the world, and then I see Him not but if I look upward He is ever visible!

On our return to Paris I had to change the whole course of my life, so as to be free to follow His commands. After a few weeks an unexpected joy came to me; for circumstances formed themselves in such a way that I had to return to the Orient. After spending some few weeks in Egypt, I arrived in ‘Akká the 1st of March – Madame Trouve and my cousin were no longer with me. My second trip was made in the Company of Madame Jackson, and a youth Sigurd Russel by name. At the outset of our journey he did not even believe in God, but now he is one of the finest and most devoted followers of the Master! My friend, Madame Jackson arrived in Haifa full of doubts, but when she left she was full of faith. She said that she had again found the joy of her childhood in regaining her strong faith in God. We arrived in Haifa-‘Akká early in the morning. I was told that I was not to see the Master until evening. My impatience was great. In the afternoon as I was dreaming of the heavenly joy in store for me, or heavenly is the only word which can express the feeling that comes to one in the Master's presence. Yet the joy of anticipation was mingled with apprehension for I feared that since my former meeting, my imagination and love had idealized him and that perhaps a great disillusion might be awaiting me.

The Master entered suddenly, I instantly realized that this ideal was an absolute reality and far beyond my anticipations. I then comprehended that we can only see in Him that which we are capable of seeing – for what we seek we find. I beheld the absolute mirror of the Divine Spirit! – When we ascend a mountain the horizon ever stretches further and so it is with the soul the higher the spiritual state, the greater the power of comprehension, there is no limit to Perfection. After having lived in the midst of the Holy Family, one understands the emptiness of all outside the higher life there are two paths, one material, one spiritual – the more material things we have the more we want and the harder it is to get them. The more one acquires in the spiritual the easier it is to advance onward. In the material obstacles become insurmountable, while in the spiritual every effort makes the path easier and more beautiful.

After a while efforts become the greatest joy – sacrifices made to the Beloved are painless – for this is no greater happiness than proving one's love! After my second visit, the real depth of this religion opened before me. Formerly I had looked at it as an extraordinary Truth but I had not realized its stupendous proportions. At first I had thought that one could go into it full of past habits and many ambitions, but now I know that all worldliness must be cast aside at the very Threshold – the moment we accepted the name Bahá'íst we must live the life of one. Religions have taught what is right and wrong to all nations, but this great Revelation has brought one special truth and command to all men, it has come to teach – all absorbing union and harmony, and if we do not follow – this command, this great command we are casting side the foundation and how can we seek to build on nothingness, let the lives of every believer be built on the Rock of Truth and Union and not on the shifting sands, of fancy and imagination! A great lesson can be learnt from the Persians for they have seen the seriousness of this belief they know that it is no child's play and that it is not to be distorted by the whims of men – The Persians have seen it spring forth and grow through the blood of their near and dear ones. They have seen martyrdom grow like a flame in the hearts of thousands.

One day when I was with the Master two of our Eastern people (brothers) came to Him. And for the first time I understood and beheld the meaning of the word reverence. Their reverence for Him was perfect for they realized and know who He was! One night in the humble dining hall – we were seated at the Master's table during the meal I studied the expressions on the faces of three Persians who were there and I received a wonderful lesson for their looks expressed love, courage, tenderness and devotion. I understood what this Truth meant to them and what it will mean to us in after years; we were just on the Threshold we have not yet followed in the footsteps of our grownup brothers. Through this religion we find the Key of Hope by which to open the prison doors of the Eastern women's life for in this teachings, women are counted equal to men! I wish to speak a few moments about the soul refreshing Kurrut'ul Ayar – Prof. Brown of Cambridge writes that in such a country as Persia the appearance of such a woman is one the Greatest Miracles of history, and so it is for miracle means a power beyond men and in Kurrut'ul Ayar was seen the power given by the Spirit of God regardless of the praise or blame of men. She stepped out of the habits and traditions of her people – firm pure and courageous, she walked over the road of hardships. Her dauntless spirit glows like a beaming torch to guide her awakening sisters out of ignorance and darkness towards liberty and God. In all she was a perfect example of what a woman's life be. At the age of 33 or 34 she was martyred for the Glorious Cause of Truth! Eastern people (believers) seem to realize more fully than we do, that imperfections and mistakes are experiences by which human beings develop. I feel so with John Knox, who whenever he saw the executioners cart fearing some criminal to death used to say, “If it were not for the Grace of God – there goes John Knox.” Here is a beautiful lesson given by the Master!

“A man once saw a wonderful sight. In a certain place there were three men. The first of these was blind but he could see things that were very distant – the second was deaf to all near sounds but he could hear things that were very far off! The third was naked, but he held in his hands a long hem of a garment, the man who beheld this strange sight asked a teacher the interpretation thereof the answer was this, “These three men represent humanity! The first who could only see things that were very distant, but was near him means that people can generally see very clearly the faults and shortcomings of others, but their defects are too near them to be perceived. The second man could hear of the deaths of others but his own death was too near him to be heard. The third who was quite bare, shows that in this state man comes into the world and it is certain that in this state he must leave it; though he knows this very well – yet he spends his whole time in carefully preserving the hem of a garment from being soiled! Never does the Master speak an idle word, every sentence contains some uplifting. I will now have the pleasure of reading to you some fragments of His Conversations but before I begin I want to say a few more words about the Master, though all the beautiful words are too few to describe the beauty of His form and Spirit.

There is but a single word that can convey to you the endless wealth of His virtue and powers, and that single word is perfection! Now here are the Master’s words I have just promised to read. “Welcome and enter into the Kingdom of Light and Life! If every minute you thanked God a thousand times for the grace of having been born in this marvellous century even that would not be sufficient, thanks. Every day and hour, every minute let your heart overflow with gratitude for the great privilege of living in the latter days. In past ages people have called themselves blessed, if they lived at the time as one of the saints how much greater is your privilege! So the people then a candle was given while your eyes are opening to behold the Glory of the radiant Sun – least aside the worthless honors and praise of the world and enter into a living Kingdom of Gods. Many Irvens have lived but their memories have died with them, while Saint Barbara lives forever with the sceptre of martyrdom in her hand. The names of the children of God – shone throughout eternity regardless of the world’s recording! During a terrible storm, Christ wandered on the mountain, seeking a shelter! A den full of wild beasts, was the only shelter He found and He was the Beloved son of God – He came to those on earth, but they knew Him not. The manifestation in the Book of Igham – explains the meaning of Christ coming in the clouds He says that one meaning of the expression ‘cloud’ is the body of a Prophet.

Why is it that sometimes we cannot see the sun in the sky? Because it is veiled by clouds. The body of a Prophet is the thick clouds often preventing the people from seeing His Glorious Light for they argue that the Prophet is a man such as they are requiring food, rest, sleep, etc. How then can this man represent the Divine Light! Or be a Manifestation of God? Out when the Prophet has departed, then the veils or clouds is withdrawn, and the people see plainly the Light of His teachings and the Sun of the Holy Spirit that was within Him. The nearer we are to God the more severe do our tests become and when we have received great blessings we are sometimes apt to become self-confident and think we are secure from falling and there is our danger greatest Tests should not become stumbling blocks for when trials are surrounded they are steps leading upward to God! Christ mounted on an Ass, Christ crowned with thorns shows that suffering and humiliation cannot stay the Light of the Spirit! If a man nine faults and but one good quality – I beseech you to overlook these nine defects for this one virtue. Sinners are the sick of humanity and the enlightened are bidden to heal the ill and feeble and not to turn aside to leave them alone to die – Mercy mercy is of God! So be mindful to use it. The great bond created by God to join altogether is union, so be caught to abide by this, for he that casts aside the living commandments of God is of the dead and cannot enter the Kingdom of Life.

I wish you rest from the tormenting spirit, be aware of false seditions rumours for they will come. I pray that your faith may stand all verily the mercy and justice of God protects the flame of faith from a too violent mind! If a bird's wings be covered with mud it cannot fly and so it is with the soul, wash off the earth and the freed soul will soar to heaven. Your faith has come like rain – the first drops were for between, but soon it will pour in torrents. In a tree weal-ways judge its life and strengthen by the way it grows upward, and so it is with man. The knowledge of God arises in the heart like the Sun, showering luminous radiance over all! Open your hearts that ye may be filled! Open your soul, open your souls, that the divine light may shine therein. Strive, strive to receive the spirit of Truth – Truth awaits you all! Pray in the Greatest Name from the depths of true sincerity – then the breath, of the Spirit with its rush of Life will enter your craving souls. Remember well, there is nothing in the whole Universe which is mouth seeking but the Almighty God.”

In the Life of Christ there is one hour of the deepest paths, when on the eve of crucifixion, even the Great Disciple Peter – denied Him thrice! Oh friends let us not fall away from the Master in those His hours of trial! He has willingly stood all hardships ever since the hour of childhood He has borne all to guide us into the Paradise of firm belief now we must all stand as rock columns upon which God can erect His church throughout eternity! Friends, I thank you for the patience with which you have listened to me and if I have been able to give you even one crumb which has fallen from the Master's table, my happiness is complete. Now before we part I want to say these words of Christ and verily they are as spoken by Master today, “Continue ye in my words then you are my disciples indeed and ye shall know the Truth and the Truth shall make you free.”

With 'Abdu'l-Baha

William Copeland Dodge

November 16, 1901

At in the afternoon of November 16, 1901, 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered our room and greeted us. We had just arrived at His Holy Household in the prison city of 'Akká' (Acre) Syria, having traveled in a carriage driven by two horses along the shore of the Mediterranean from Haifa.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "welcome, my boys and chanted a prayer for my brother Wendell and me.

Wendell was eighteen and I was twenty one (September 6, 1901) My father, Arthur Pillsbury Dodge, had arranged the trip for us.

At that time, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a prisoner of the Turkish government, but He was allowed the freedom of the City. His home was in the original section of the City enclosed by a high wall. As 'Akká' increased in population, a second high wall was built around the City. Finally a third high wall enclosed the entire area.

Before we could enter 'Akká' it was necessary to obtain a recommendation from the United States government. This requirement was in addition to the usual passport. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was such a living example of love and humility, that the government officials became friendly with Him. General Badri Baik of the Turkish army was a frequent guest at dinner with 'Abdu'l-Bahá while we were there.

We stayed with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in His household nineteen days, November 16, 1901 to December 4, 1901. Every day breakfast was served to us in our room. The noon day meal and the evening dinner we had with 'Abdu'l-Bahá at His table. Generally about sixteen Persian Believers attended each meal, making nineteen present. In the Holy land at that time, women did not eat with men when others than the family were present.

Each morning, after breakfast, 'Abdu'l-Bahá came to our room and greeted us. He was gracious, considerate and always concerned with our comfort. At every meal 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave us lessons, and allowed us plenty of time to record his remarks in our note books. These talks were later published by the Board of Counsel of New York City in a booklet of twenty-four pages entitled:

Those days the Advisory Body of the Believers In New York City was called the Board of Counsel.

A photograph of the first BOARD OF COUNSEL in New York City appears at page 23 of Volume IX of the Bahá’í World.

In His lesson of November 19, 1901, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

“One of the most severe of the world’s diseases is that of contention anti strife, the fire of which is burning among all nations and cannot be removed except through the Word of GOD. As this intense fire can only be quenched by the Heavenly Water, therefore the faithful followers of GOD must be as a banner of peace and as a most luminous sun of harmony and union.

“In the days of Moses the people pitched the tent of martyrdom, and in the time of Jesus Christ they established the greatest church; but in this time the believers in Gm must raise the tent of Peace, Union and Concord. I hope that through the providence of GOD the brilliancy of love will light all the horizons. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá often wrote to the believers in America. These communications were called Tablets, and many were published in book form. They answered many questions concerning world problems. My father received sixty four of these Tablets. I have copies, of all of them.

Although ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a serious expounder of the Bahá’í Faith, he had a fine sense of humor.

One day at dinner, we were eating soup, a nice thick soup. Leaving my spoon in the plate, I raised my hand to adjust my collar. As I brought down my hand, my elbow came in contact with the handle of the spoon and soup was sprayed upon the whiskers of the Persian believer on my right. Of course I was terribly embarrassed. However, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, observing the incident, quickly said: “Do not worry; that is a blessing and laughed aloud. My brother Wendell then remarked “Who gets the blessing, Bill, you or the friend with the whiskers?” and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá laughed again.

Wendell and I were so glad to be with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that sometimes we were quite jolly. We were mere boys of eighteen and twenty-one. Our interpreter, Ameen Faríd, told us that we must be reverent; that when we entered the presence of the Master we must bow our heads, clasp our hands, never smiling. Of course we fait the rebuke.

So, the next time we entered the dining room, our heads were bowed, our hands clasped, and we did not smile. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá passed quickly by us; he seemed to ignore us. We felt further rebuked.

Returning to our room, we wondered why ‘Abdu’l-Bahá seemed different in His attitude toward us. Well, we decided that we were not good actors.

So, when we entered the dining room for the next meal, we smiled. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá smiled; he came to us, took us into His arms and said “That’s the way I want you boys to act; be natural, be happy”

At the supper table, November 21, 1901, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

“When this blessed Cause was manifested in Persia, some of the divines and famous learned men became believers and were martyred. The people murdered the Báb, thinking they had ended the Holy Cause. They annihilated thousands of families, plundered the goods of the Believers, killed men and captured women and children. However, it was found that this had no destructive effect upon the Cause, but that the flaming fire of God was kindled the more. The lamp of God became more brilliant, waves of the sea of bounty increased, the breeze of God grew stronger, and the fragrance of the Holy Spirit became more powerful; and after imprisoning the Blessed Perfection, the government decided to banish Him to Baghdád, thinking that through this banishment the root of the Cause would be destroyed. As it took one month to go from Tīhrán to Baghdád, it was thought by the people that all trace of the Cause would be lost. On the contrary, the Cause of God became more powerful, His words more widely spread, His proclamation more generally hoard, and the power of His Cause the stronger; consequently the government decided to send the Blessed Perfection from Baghdád to Constantinople. As Constantinople was a large city and as there were many Persians in the city who traveled freely, this plan also proved fruit-less. Through the power of the Persian government, the Blessed Perfection was then sent to Adrianople, in Roumalia, a country very far from Persia (and a possession of Turkish. Because there was no railway, there was very little travel by the Persians to and from Adrianople, and therefore it was thought by the learned men of Persia that the Cause of God would have no effect upon the Persians. However, it was soon learned that these places were not places of banishment for the Blessed Perfection, (glory be to Him), and it was therefore decided that He should be sent to some small place – a place where murderers were confined, where robbers were imprisoned, so that this Cause would be weakened. Accordingly, the clergy, or learned men of Persia, being hostile to this Holy Cause, so arranged that the Blessed Perfection was sent from Adrianople (the Land of Mystery) to Acre, Syria.

“In this prison (Acre) the flag of the Gardener of God was raised, the greatness of the Word of God appeared and the Sun of Truth shone in such a degree that all the horizons became clear.

“Praise be to God! The promises about the Holy Land were fulfilled and the glad-tidings uttered through the tongues of the prophets of God were realized, for the enemies caused the Blessed perfection to be sent to the Holy Land and to have his residence in the Promised Land.

“Therefore the faithful followers of God must know that calamities in the path of God will cause His truth to become more apparent.

“The crucifixion of Jesus Christ was the means of spreading the light of the Cause of God and the martyrdom of His disciples resulted in the eternal greatness of the Cause. The disciples were like torches, which, though burned by the fire of the hostility of the people, yet they enlightened the world.

“Therefore the Believers must not be sorrowful for this re confinement and for these new calamities, but they must be more attracted and kindled in cutting themselves from the world.”

The 22nd day of November, 1901 was the Muḥammadan day of worship, similar to our Sunday. The mid day meal is either one half hour before noon or one half hour after noon. So, our luncheon that day with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was at twelve thirty o’clock.

During the early days of the Bahá’í Faith in the United States, many of the believers wore a ring containing a stone on which was engraved the Greatest Name. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to our room on November 24th, 1901 with ten of those stones. He kissed each one and then handed five of them to Wendell and five to me, and then chanted a prayer for us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá often talked to us about mother and father. They had visited Him in 1900. On November 26, 1901, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told us that He dreamed that our father was with him again. He said that although “Mr. Dodge was not with him in person, he was always with him spiritually”.

It is a great privilege for me to look at my father;’ picture on page 118 of volume IV of the Bahá’í World. One of the Disciples of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, one of the Heralds of the Covenants God surely did bless him. Alláh O’Abhá!

During the early days of the Bahá’í Faith in New York, the believers were confronted with various ideas of the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh. It therefore became necessary for teachers from the Holy Land to come here to enlighten us.

Many of us believed that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the Spirit of Christ referred to in the 24th chapter of Saint Matthew. We were quite emotional. There were critical discussions.

Therefore, on the 1st day of December, 1901, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dictated to Wendell and me the following:

“In this greatest period there are only two Manifestations, the Blessed Báb (may my soul be a ransom to him) and the Manifestation of the Blessed Perfection (Glory be to Him).

“We are all the servants of the threshold of Bahá and the one who series most in His Holy threshold is the most beloved. My greatest wish and desire is submissiveness and servitude at His Holy Threshold. My name, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, means the servant of God; my heart is the servant of Bahá, and my spirit is the servant of Bahá and rejoices only in this name. My purpose is love, not only by word but by action.

“The essence of all essence is love, which is likened unto the meat of the nut, while all else is likened unto the shell or outside. Through the providence of the Blessed Perfection our spirits must be full of the love of God. Therefore, anyone who asks you about me should be told that I am the servant of Bahá, because this is my only wish.

“Some years ago two believers became excited over a discussion as to the station of the Blessed Perfection, one of them declaring that Bahá'u'lláh was the Holy Identity of God. To settle the dispute they submitted the matter to the Holy Presence, and the Blessed Perfection answered: when there is a quarrel, all are wrong, but when there is love, all are right. The Blessed Perfection said the only thing that is not beloved is discord and all that is beloved is love.

“The believers must love each other and must reflect the love of God. Some may say the lamp is a light; others may say the lamp is the place of the manifestation of the light. Both statements are correct, but what is wrong is to quarrel, because it is contrary to the foundation laid by God.

“Therefore, in order that there may be no discord, all of the believers in the Truth must not mention me except as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the servant of God. The essential thing is love. I must love you, and you must love me. Such is the meaning of the truth, while untruth means rancour, discord and hatred. All else save love is merely outwardly uttered words.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed the hope that the faithful followers of God in America will become gardeners in the Paradise of El Abhá, and the fruitful trees of that garden. “The [??] of their love should be as the healing rays of the sun; their teachings should be like the rains of providence; their spiritual characters should be like the life-giving breezes which diffuse the fragrances throughout all regions.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s last lesson to us, December 3, 1901, was as follows:

“It is stated in the New Testament that Jesus Christ was once drinking the juice of grapes and said He would drink no more except in the presence of the Father. This means that the spirit needs food for strength as well as the body. The appearance of the Holy Mantle tattoos is for the purpose of causing the heavenly table to descend. This table means the Divine virtues and characteristics, and is the means of strengthening the spirit and life. Therefore we hope that as this heavenly table has descended from the Kingdom of Abhá in this marvelous period, the believers and friends of God will have a great portion of it, so that they will be the cause of eternal life and the means of enlightening the hearts of the people of the world.

“In short, I hope you will ask God to bless you as being the real sons of the Kingdom, because the sons of the Kingdom are of two kinds. One is the real son and the other is the material one. Judas Iscariot and Peter were both sons of the Kingdom, but Peter was the real son. Judas was the material son, consequently he was deprived. The real sons of the Kingdom are those souls who act according to the instructions and teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, the Blessed Perfection.

“They are drunken with the cup of providence, and are illuminated by the Divine Light. They are honored by all their perfections and virtues of humanity, and are characterized with attributes which embellish the essence of man in such a manner that all the people, even the enemies, testify of their good actions, attractions, separation from the world, purity, sanctity, knowledge and belief.

“In conclusion, I most humbly supplicate that God will admit you as the real sons of His Kingdom in such manner that you may be an honor to the cause of. God and that all the people, being astonished, may say: these young men are not the same. When they started for Acre they had a station, but on their return, they possess another station. They are baptised by the providence of God, by the fire of the love of God, and by the Holy Spirit. They have received a second birth, they have found eternal life.”

During our visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in ‘Akká (Acre) we were privileged several times to go to the Ridván, that beautiful Garden of Paradise, planted by Bahá'u'lláh, the Blessed Perfection.

On our last day in the Holy City, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá permitted us to visit the Holy Tomb and there see the pictures of Bahá'u'lláh, and the Blessed Báb. in that solemn atmosphere, prayers were chanted by Persian believers.

At 2:45 o'clock that afternoon, December 4th, 1901, we entered the carriage for our return to Haifa and home. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá bade us farewell, He gave us the following tablet for our father:

“He is God.

O thou pure soul.

Bahá'u'llah is upon thee. Thy two happy sons have presented themselves to this Blessed spot and were honored by a visit to the Most Holy Tomb.”

“I have associated with them for a while during which they were cheered by the fragrances which perfume the nostrils of the spirit by commemorating the beloved of God and by giving them the teachings of God.”

“I do supplicate God to make them two lamps glowing with the fire of the gift of God, that they will serve the Kingdom of God, put their strenuous efforts in the Kingdom of God, and spread the teachings of God, inasmuch as the traces of the love of God are brilliantly manifested in their faces.

“I ask God to help thee to be humble and submissive to all the beloved of God. Be kind and easy and compassionate to all, and dispute not with anybody over anything. Speak of the Divine Word, but if contradicted by a certain person do not argue with him. Follow my steps in all matters and take my disposition as an example for you in dealing with all persons.

“Rely upon God, the Living, the Self-existent.

Upon thee salutation and praise.

On the 24th day of February, 1912, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote my father of His plan to visit the United States of America. Here is that Tablet:

To Mr. Dodge Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh El Abhá.

O thou dear friend:

I always remember thee and beg for thee the protection and preservation of the Possessor of the Kingdom. Ere long I shall hasten to America to meet the Friends and spend some time with joy and fragrance through the Favors of Abhá, and shall become engaged in proclaiming the name of the True One.

Convey on my behalf the wonderful Abhá greetings to all the Friends and the Maid servants of the Merciful, especially thy respected wife and thy dear sons. They are always in my memory and I seek for them Heavenly Confirmation.

Túba Khánum told us an interesting incident relating to Mademoiselle Letitia, who lives in the home and teaches the children French.

During the visit of a French believer ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called upon Mademoiselle to interpret for Him, as the pilgrim was very eager for instruction and there was no one else who would speak his language. Mademoiselle, being a Catholic, and knowing nothing of the Bahá’í teaching, became very much embarrassed over her tasks which quite amused ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Some days later she evidently confessed to the nuns in the covenants who keep strict watch over her, and for several days she looked very shy and forbidding.

Finally ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called her to him and said: “Letitia, tell the good nuns that they need have no fear. I asked you to interpret for me because there was no one else to speak French, not because I desired to teach you. We have so many Bahá’ís who come here begging with all their hearts and all their love for instruction, that only to them do we give our precious teachings. You would have to beg and beg and before I would give it to you, and even then I might not do so; for is not so cheap as to be bestowed where it is not wanted.

“Stay in the home if you like, or go if you are not happy here. We are glad to have you if you care to stay, but free your heart of all fear that we will try to make a Bahá’í of you.”

Mademoiselle is very sweet and they all love her. Her parents live at Haifa and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has been wonderfully kind to them; they are very poor. She is always happy here, but of course she does not know why.

One morning at early tea 'Abdu'l-Bahá told us that He had a dream about America. He said that there were many sincere, earnest souls there. He said that in His dream He thought he was in a large room with a number of the Persians, naming them, and others also of the teachers there. These told Him that there were many earnest believers in America, but that they were far apart, and all playing on different musical instruments, so they did not play in harmony. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, I will see what I can do. Finding one, I told him to stay until I brought others to him, but when I came back with another, the first had gone away, piping in his instrument. And so it was; I could never get them together." He added, "When I awake, I was very tired."

Miss B. said she hoped He would dream again that they were all united, and He smiled.

Extracts From a Letter After a Visit to ‘Akká

We arrived at Haifa early in the morning of Friday, February 5th, and, as it was not wise for us to attract any attention, we were not met by any of the believers; but, after getting through the customs, we looked up one of the believers in his little store, and he conducted us to the house of Mírzá Yazdí. He served us tea and by some rapid means let the believers know that we were there. Among others, there came to see us Mishkín-Qalam, the writer, a man seventy years of age, who with love in his eyes said that he had been too unwell to leave his home for some days, but that the news of our arrival had so cheered his heart and strengthened him that he was able to come and bring greetings to us and to express his love for us. This is only one example of the love and kindness shown to us by the believers throughout the Orient. Aḥmad Yazdí, at Port Sa‘íd, and the little circle of believers with him, Muḥammad Yazdí, at Alexandria, — everyone, had only the desire to show us some kindness, to be of use to us, regarding their own business always as the secondary {{p25}} thing, the thing to be laid aside the moment that they have the opportunity of serving another believer in the Cause.

After a visit of an hour or so with these pure souls in Haifa, the carriage was sent for and we left for ‘Akká. The drive is along the shore of the bay and takes about two hours. Starting from Haifa we are facing ‘Akká all of the way. At first, it is just a white city on the water, but, as one gets nearer, the minaret and domes become distinct, and the buildings and walls begin to take shape.

Soon we were there, under the walls, through the gate, up the narrow streets, built for defence; then through the second line of fortifications by means of a second gate, twisting around right-angled corners, with streets just wide enough for the wagon and its three horses, with pedestrians close up to the walls to get out of the way, and so on to the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. There loving greetings were awaiting us and many willing hands to carry luggage and parcels for us. We were conducted up the long flight of stone steps to the second story, and shown into the room where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá usually receives His visitors. After a little delay, spent with Mírzá Yúnas Khán, the interpreter, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to us with kindly inquiries as to our health and our journey, with an apology that all that He could offer us was the hospitality of the prison. With kind words and wishes He {{p26}} left us, and we were taken to lunch and then shown our rooms.

We left during the afternoon of Thursday, February 11, and of the days between I hardly know where to begin nor how to tell you about it all. We saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá every day at luncheon and at dinner, and some days He would come to us for a little while in the morning or for a few minutes in the afternoon, and once He spent a long time with us at night after dinner. At the table, between courses, or when He was not eating, He would talk to us, giving us the teachings, the proofs of this great Manifestation. Always His words came with graciousness, with kindness and encouragement, and over and over again did He impress upon us the necessity of service in the Cause. For myself, I had not those great experiences of emotion that some visitors to His Presence have been seized with; but a great peace fell upon my soul, a tranquility and a surety took possession of me, such as comes nowhere else. That is the pervading atmosphere of the Holy House, a calm security that no cataclysm can shake; a love that encircles one, that is expressed by every person there, the great love of service, of doing something for another, of losing one’s self completely in the absolute love that comes only from God. The love shown us there I can never forget. May God grant that I may be able to carry the message of it to others! The solution of all the {{p27}} world’s misery, of all the social and economic questions of the day, is in that love for which Bahá’ísm stands, which it touches, which is its basis, and which all Bahá’ís should be constantly giving out.

It was not considered wise to permit us to go out very often, nor to visit the homes of any of the believers in ‘Akká, but the friends came to us in the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and from all of them came that great spirit of love and unity.

Of one experience I must tell you. While we were in ‘Akká there was also visiting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá a man from Bombay, one who had been a Zoroastrian. He was accompanied by his little son, a child of perhaps eleven or twelve. He heard that two Americans were there, and he begged to be allowed to see us, because in the sacred book of the Zoroastrians, written thousands of years ago, it was prophesied that a new world should be discovered, and that in the “last days” people from this new world should meet with the people of Zoroaster, that they should meet in the worship of the same God, in the same place. To him it was the literal fulfillment of the prophecy, and he wanted to see us. He was a tall man with a great simplicity of manner, that simplicity that comes of great earnestness. He said: “I can not tell you how happy I am to see you, or what my heart feels to meet you here. My words can not express it, but I would give my life for you.” He added that he should always remember having seen us. Neither shall we ever forget that meeting. {{p28}}

In the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“You are going now to your greatest test,” said a friend, as we drove to the station to begin the trip to ‘Akká, the “White City by the Sea.” The words were unintelligible to me then, and it was not until some weeks later that their real meaning became clear. Scarcely heeding them, in fact, in the happiness of making the start, they were forgotten until their truth came back to me when the visit at ‘Akká was slowly moving into our past.

Six days in ‘Akká! Six days in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! Six days in an atmosphere of the most perfect love and peace that it has ever been mine to know. Others may have spent six weeks there, six months. That is nothing, for time is nothing in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. If a thousand years are but as a day in the sight of the Lord, it may be equally true that a day may be as a thousand years. We lived a lifetime in those six days. The outside world disappeared. The past had never been. There was no future. It was as if the moment in that Presence were all of life, and that it was eternal. “Prayer, peace, {{p29}} glory, and praise” enveloped us from the moment that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took our hands in His in a welcoming grasp until He said, “Go back and serve!” and we left His physical presence perhaps forever in this world.

Before starting on our journey I had feared being overwhelmed with sadness at the sight of the imprisonment of our Beloved Master; so I had prayed earnestly that I might be enabled to look into His dear face with smiles only. Once in ‘Akká the prayer was as completely forgotten as if it had never been uttered, but I found myself wondering at the readiness with which I smiled into those eyes that always smiled back at me in tender love. It was not until ‘Akká was fading into the distance beyond the blue waters of the Mediterranean, that I remembered my prayer and marveled at its complete realization.

The entrance into the Holy Presence came as simply and naturally as into that of some dear friend. We wondered somewhat, my husband and I, for we had thought it impossible to meet Him whom our hearts so revered and loved without being overcome with emotion. Hours passed, we met Him face to face, felt the touch of His hands, basked in the light of His smile, and still we had not been overcome by any mighty wave of irresistible feeling; and still we wondered. Days passed. The life in ‘Akká had received us, had taken us into its loving arms, and still we were wondering when and how was to {{p30}} come that mighty sweep of power. It did not come. The dominance of the Lord spoke to us only through His love, everywhere triumphant. The influence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed itself in the peace around us that was always unbroken. His wisdom was manifest in the reverence of the gray-haired men who bowed before its decisions in unquestioning acceptance. The efficiency of His teachings was illustrated in the eagerness of those who had been Zoroastrians, Muḥammadans, or Christians to all live together there in perfect love and unity, under His sheltering care; and in their determination to carry with them to the ends of the world the same peace and harmony that wrapped them in its folds in that dreary, but glorious, little prison city, ‘Akká.

The day of departure came. The doors of the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá closed upon us. The grim walls and the defiant gates of the crumbling old city of the Crusaders were behind us. The world and the service upon which we had been sent were before us. Slowly driving away, two questions perplexed us: What was the “greatest test” to which we had been subjected? We had been unconscious of it. Why had we not felt some overwhelming conviction of the sanctity of that Presence in which we had spent six such bliss-filled days?

In a moment we almost laughed at our simplicity in asking ourselves the latter. What experience could have been more overwhelming {{p31}} in its conviction than the steadily cumulating proof of those six days? For now we realized, as it had been impossible to understand while still in the presence of our Beloved Lord, that every hour, every interview with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, every observation of the life around us, had brought conviction to the reason, to the judgment, to the emotions, to the whole mental, moral, and spiritual nature, that this was indeed the Messenger of the Lord for whom we searched, sent to show the world the way into life eternal. We realized at last that when we first entered His presence so quietly, it was as if we had been taken gently up by the first swell of a great tidal wave, raised so tenderly that we had been scarcely conscious of the uplift; we had been carried on and on, higher and higher, until, as the tidal wave may sweep over coast, rocks, and even cities, we had been carried high over all worldly consciousness, and it had become to us as if the world were not. As this realization came to us, we prayed that we might never again be upon that lower spiritual level where we had been when that wave lifted us and bore us so high into the realms of absolute, common-sense, unquestioning conviction. “By their works ye shall know them,” Christ said would be the final proof of the Manifestation of God in the last days, and it was through the works of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and of those who serve Him that we had attained to the heights of our conviction of the truth of this Manifestation of God. {{p32}}

There still remained the question, What had been our “greatest test?” It had sunk into insignificance. That incorporation of the living spirit of God in a human body could never be a stumbling block now to our steps. We had met a man, it is true, a man with all the needs and elements of humanity; but it had been to realize how perfect an instrument of the Lord the human body may become. How else could God have spoken to us so forcibly as through those human lips that let fall divine wisdom? As through those human eyes, whose glances bore into one’s soul a conception of the love and tenderness of God? As by that human tongue that never uttered a harsh or unkind word? As through that stately form, unbowed by all the grievances of the world or by the sufferings of long years of prison life and deprivation? Surely, if man is the greatest work of God, man must also be the most perfect messenger of God to man.

There had been but six days in ‘Akká; but the human world was behind us, before us was the world of God. They were separated by a conception of timeless eternity made comprehensible to us by the visit in the presence of the Master.

Alláh-u-Abhá!

To the friends in the Cause of El-Abhá at Chicago, our greeting and salutations.

“As you pass on your journey see as many as possible of the Believers in this Cause, and convey to all and each of them My message of greeting and of love, say to them they are in My heart and always I am with them.”

These were the words of our Lord and Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, to us – Mrs. Winterburn and myself – the last day of our visit to ‘Akká last February. The delays of our journey previous to arriving at New York and an arrangement for a certain date in California, made our visit in Chicago extremely short, and we were able to meet but few of the friends there. It is at the request of Mr. Thornton Chase, that this short account of our visit to the Holy City and the presence of our Master is written. It would have been our great pleasure could we have greeted personally at the friends in Chicago with the above message and could we have spoken with all about our visit to ‘Akká.

As I call to mind all that the visit means to me, all the impression I received, truly I know not just how or where to begin. Perhaps somewhat chronological account of our arrival and stay will be good to commence with.

We arrived, then, at the entrance to the house of the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, nearly at noon on February 8th 1904, driving over from the port at Haifa. As the carriage drew up at the door we were greeted by I know not how many friends; eager hands took our baggage and Mírzá Younass Khán – the Master’s interpreter – conducted us through the Court and up the long plight of stone steps leading up to the room in the second story where the Master receives the European and American visitors. This room is a long one, with a divan round the walls, in which we seated ourselves after a few words of welcome, Mírzá Younass Khán absented himself from the room and returned in a few minutes with two Persian gentlemen, and it was not until a young man who was with us, and who had been in ‘Akká before, knelt at the feet of the elder that we knew we were in the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the servant of God, the Master.

He greeted us warily, with kindly inquiries to our health, to the comfort of our journey, and expressed the hope that our journey was at an end we would find rest. He offered to us an apology that all He was able to give us was the hospitality of the prison, and again, expressing the hope that we would rest and refresh ourselves after the long journey. He left me.

Many times since I have been asked about my first impressions of the Master. Some have expressed surprise that in that Presence I was not utterly overcome, me, I know, others have been on first seeing Him. Perhaps it was my own condition; perhaps with their needs; perhaps not knowing that the Master was coming to us at that moment had something to do with it, but of these things I know not.

I felt myself in the Presence of a man of great power, great character; strong in every way as regards character, mentality, intellectuality. I felt more strongly, perhaps, then anything else that with all this strength, this dignity, there was insatiable kindness, a great underlying of love. The kind of man that kings would bow to, and that little children would cling to in perfect trust, and in a perfect sense of perfection.

After this first meeting, we saw the Master everyday at lunch and at dinner, frequently also for a few minutes in either the morning or the afternoon, and ones for about two hours after dinner in the evening.

It was at the dining table, or seated with us at the other odd times that He taught us; giving us in simple, plain language, some of the proofs of this Cause, or some of the Teachings of the Truth. Of all these talks we have [??], that are not here in Berkeley with me now. I hope before very long to go them and have them typewritten, when a copy of them shall be set to you. So I will not go into the matter of them here, [??] confine myself more clearly to an account of the visit, of the impressions that I gathered.

Every day I was there convinced me more and more of the truth of this great revelation, and in many ways. [??] of Master and His followers is some great, sustaining power. We earthly thing - the greatest of human love - the finest system of philosophy, has produced or can produced the pervading atmosphere of that household. Absolutely no the thought of self in any shape can be found there. In each and everyone of the Bahá'ís there, from him who waits at table, or who ___ the garden, to the Great Example Himself, is the great desire of self-sacrifice, the [??] longing to [??] anymore. Back of it all is the love of GOD - the divin in man, and there love of GOD finds its expression on the human plane in love to one's follows.

No words of mine can possibly convey to you the spirit of calm, the absolute trust, the perfect sence of security that pervades the entire household. All the rest of the worlds seems to have been left miles and centuries away. Absolute peace and perfect content takes possession of one's heart. Such, at least, was my experience. There, in that Prison City, the Divine rules, the attributes of GOD are manifested - [??] kindness, goodness, love reign, the human shows forth the divine, the divine is clothed in humanity.

I have been asked since; How do I know, what proofs have I seen of the Master's divine commission in the world? The answer seems to me to be; The proof of the light, the power of the word. In everyday's life filled with unselfishness, with anxiety for others, with services towards all; easy words to write, but only perfectly fulfilled in a heart where reigns the perfect love of GOD, the absolute power of GOD, unadulterated by human desire. Another proof: "Never man spoke as this man." To hear is to obey. Strong men bow their heads in humility as the words of grace fall from His lips; strong hands stand ready, may anxious, to sacrifice everything for the love of His service, counting as honor, as great glory, suffering, and the ills of this world when attained in His service.

It is difficult to convey in written words the great power of love by which we were surrounded by our visit there. On every hand, from everyone, we received nothing – but the greatest love and affection. Everone of these dear souls there had but one thought of us – to render to us all possible service.

On the fifth day of our visit in the Master's house, Mírzá Younass Khán come to me in the morning and said that when the Master gave us permission to make the visit we had expected that we could remain but for three days, but that our entry into 'Akká had been achieved so quietly that He had hoped we could remain for quite a time; but that now the officials had began to comment on our stay there and to wonder at the length of it. So it would be wiser for us to leave and the Master begged of us not to be and of sorrowful because of our departure and He asked of us to leave with the same kindness with which we had come to Him. Herein, again, was the power of the Master shown, for he ask us at lunchwere we sorrowful that He has asked us to go and I am very thankful that from Himself He gave us the strength to say "No." that from His had come the gracious permission to come to Him, from Him also had come the word for us to leave, and that from Him could come to us nothing but what was for our good, and but what was ordered though His great love and wisdom.

This we deeply felt at the time, and have felt it ever since.

The last morning of our stay there, our leave taking with the Master will always remain deeply fixed in our hearts and minds. It was then that He told us we were to return to California, that as were to serve in the great Cause of this Truth. Ever since then, now, as I write, these words of His "To serve" ring again in my ears. I beg of all of you to whom these words may come, to pray for us that we may be enabled by the [??] power and mercy of GOD to render "service" as He would have it rendered; that we may always be faithful to the charge committed to us and this by His great mercy, in spite of our unworthiness.

He – The Master – charged us to be filled with the spirit of this Truth that it would shine in our countenances and so attract people to it fully over us since leaving His Presence. In Port Sa'id, in Alexandria, in Persia, in New York, in Chicago – as some of you will know – and here in California the believers, the dear friends in this Cause have met us with the spirit of love, of unity that [??] from the White City on the [??] of the [??] Mediterranean, where [??] intolerance and ignorance once have tried to imprison the Lord of the Worlds, and from where.. notwithstanding has commanded a spirit of unity, of brotherhood, that has already encircled the earth, that is bringing mankind even to the Most Great Peace.

May the peace of El-Abhá be upon everyone who my read or hear these words.

My regret is that I have so poorly set forth what the attainment of the visit to the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá – The Master – means to us, what His Presence in it means to the world.

May our seals be a sacrifice to Him!

In His service,

Most unworthily your servant,

(signed) George T. Winterburn.

Visit to 'Akká

Sigurd Russell

April 1904.

Notes of Sigurd Russell taken of the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá during his Visit to 'Akká,

In speaking of the kings and queens of earth, our Lord ('Abdu'l-Bahá) said:

“Their glory is but temporal and mortal, for they are but rulers of this ophomoral sphere where all things change from day to day and, finally pass away entirely; but, the women and men who in the time of a divine Manifestation come forward to acknowledge and believe in Him, become real kings and queens whose reign, glory and dominion are immortal. For example, Mary Magdalene was the daughter of a farmer and but a peasant, yet, today, name is known and renowned throughout the world, because in His day, she accepted Christ and went forth to serve Him.”

When asked concerning the station of the “Pope” who recently departed this life, 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered:

“His condition, there, in the world of spirit is the same as it was here. While here, his eyes were not opened to the real spiritual light neither did he comprehend the real truth of God. Thus, when he left the earth, his spiritual eyes were not opened – neither his spiritual ears. He occupied a great and exalted station in this world, in as much as he was chosen and selected by men to be a mediator between them and God, Therefore, it was human and not divine.”

“Let us consider a little, the difference between his life and the life of Christ. Jesus, the Son of God, walked barefooted in the wilderness without a place to lay his holy head. His shelter was the canopy of heaven, his lamp, the stars and often his food consisted of the grasses of the field or brooked corn. He was without friends or money, arrested and taken before officials, beaten and spit upon and debased (as far as the opinion of those attested his treatment was concerned) yet his election and calling was of GOD. His glory and dignity consisted not in the opinion of men, but In doing the will of his Father in heaven: and though he was nailed to the cross, his divine head crowned with thorns, today his name is revered, his memory hold sacred, his glory fills the earth divine sonship is acknowledge by the whole world, because he was chosen by God and not by men.

He was worshipped by the people, and called “Holy Father” but even now, though he has been dead but a short time, the world is already busy with the new “Pope” and he is nearly forgotten and after a little no one [??] mention him at all, for his election was of earth, his appointment was by man, his dominion terrestrial and temporary, his glory earthly and his dignity but the false idea of the people.

“Thus, think of the difference between him and Christ and you will see that the fame of the “Pope” was of short duration, while that of Christ is eternal. As a man, the “Pope” was very good to his people, but he was a human being without divine inspiration, and therein consists the greatest difference between Him whom God called His Son, and the people called “The Holy [??].”

‘Akká, April 14, 1904.

Madame J. said that at times her heart became sad, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered:

“Yes, I know and the more you think to know the reason the less you can solve the problem; but I will tell you – God created man after His own image, therefore, He has created His condition to be divine, and his real happiness, cheerfulness, wealth, dominion and power - must all be of divine origin, and if he will always turn to the kingdom, he will be in happiness and contentment. Man erroneously thinks his happiness comes from the world and for that reason, he is always unhappy and in difficulty – for example, a man in poverty thinks if he were rich, he would be happy, but after attaining wealth he still finds himself unhappy and often in the very depths of sadness. Therefore, man thinks his happiness is from this world and what it contains, while God has created him in such manner that his happiness must come from the kingdom – that is, he must find joy from the spiritual world. I have been in prison and chains, and was never happier than at that time, because I knew no happiness can come to me from anything this world has to offer. Therefore when I was in prison for the sake of God, my joy was and is now, beyond words.

“The things of this world are transitory and passing and will soon vanish, but turn to God, and you will receive heavenly joy and blessing which will never become dimmed.

Madame J. Asked - asked our friends see us from the

Alláh-u-Abhá!

To the dear friends and maid-servants of the Merciful, of Chicago:

Greetings and Salutation!

Our beloved sister, Agnew, has requested me to write to you of something with which I was deeply impressed while in ‘Akká, “the White City, the New Jerusalem by the tideless sea.”

To me while there, each day, hour, and moment, were fraught with such deep and impressive experiences, that the number perplexes me: “Like stars in a rich cluster in the heavens, they run together into a haze of brightness, only to be resolved into their separate elements by the strongest glass.” Each incident, if drawn apart and studied separately, affords reflection for both the mind and the heart.

Today the Master stands among us talking with us face to face like a brother, and giving us through His own Spirit, glimpses of that Heavenly rest, for which at times all the world doth sigh.

The Precious Words fell from his Divine Lips like strings of pearls seemed to fascinate as much as is wonderful Presence astonished.

One event which stands out pre-eminently and most impressive was the Anniversary of the Departure of Bahá’u’lláh – the revered Father of our beloved Master – on the 28th of May.

After a sojourn with those beloved people of nearly seven weeks, and my visit was about complete, it seemed like leaving Paradise, and I thought my heart would break. I knew that it was wrong, for had I not been blessed beyond all that I could ask or think? While I remained there what could I do to serve the Glorious Cause to which I desire to devote the remainder of my life!

To leave an atmosphere of love, which like the fragrance of rare exotics, permeated every thought, and where every service rendered was Divine – was almost beyond the power of human will, I knew that it was best – and while I was willing – I did not wish to go. But when the dear Master, like a pitying Father, said – “Do not weep, I will be with you” – my heart was comforted; and again, when He told me that I was to remain until after the night of the Departure and receive that blessing, - I was almost happy.

On that evening, all the believers repaired to the Holy Tomb (which you probably know is about 2 miles outside of the city) there to spend the night. After we were driven there, where we met all the members of the Holy Household and the believers. The Tomb is connected with the main building (The Bahji) by a kind of chapel or enclosed garden, at the entrance of which you remove your shoes, and advance to the Holy Threshold, at which you kneel and pray.

The rooms were brilliantly illuminated with lamps and candelabra and thickly carpeted with rich Oriental rugs, all of which are love offerings from the many pilgrims from all over the world.

The Tomb proper was covered with a costly and most beautiful Persian shawl, and thickly strewn with flowers. The night was wondrously beautiful. The full moon was shining with such magnificence that it was almost as light as day. Through the open window we could see the Mediterranean in the distance, and the air was heavy with the fragrance of jasmine and roses. The only audible sound was the wail of a solitary night bird, whose cry seemed like some lone wanderer whose lamp had become extinguished and who was calling out for help. Within the chapel the aisles were filled with kneeling women, and one of the Holy Leaves chanted the prayers. The sky, the air, the sea – and even the flowers with which the room was profusely decorated – were in perfect concord. The solemn chanting amid those prostrate forms was a scene long to be remembered; and there we remained until midnight. Then we retired to the rooms on the left of the chapel, and the men in like manner filled the places so recently occupied by us. In that gathering were venerable men who have suffered years of imprisonment, whose shining faces beamed with holy light; young men were there, too, whose every look spoke of the deep veneration and love with which they had dedicated their lives to the Holy Cause; even the little grand-children were there, whose gentle and subdued manner spoke of [??]. One of the venerable believers chanted the Holy Utterances and Prayers, - and for three hours they remained in solemn devotion.

During that time there was a singular phenomenal occurrence. While from the open window we could distinguish the sea and sky in distance, which were beautifully calm and clear – not a cloud to be seen, where we were – there was quite a heavy thunder storm. The lightning flash and the reverberations of the thunder through the heavens seemed, indeed, as if God were speaking. The bowed forms of the worshippers and the solemn chanting, made one feel as if they stood upon the boundary of an invisible world – “One not made with hands, but eternal in the heavens.”

At three o’clock the men retired, the women went into the chapel and prayers again were chanted. Three of us went into the “Holy of Holies” – the Sacred Tomb – and there prostrated ourselves in prayer.

I have often wondered if the believers in other lands could think what was the burden of our supplications that night. While no one spoke to the other, I afterwards learned that the release of our beloved Master was the burden of all hearts poured out at the Holy Threshold of the Exalted and Divine Father, Lord of all the worlds.

On the Threshold of the Tomb were a few sprays of jasmine, which the Greatest Holy Leaf separated and gave a part to me.

[??] is the dawn advanced the birds began to chant their morning matins, and as the sun burst forth upon our expectant vision in all of its splendour and poured a flood of golden light over the world, I could but exclaim: "The Lord is risen; yes, He has risen, indeed!"

O my beloved friends! How powerless are my words to make you see and feel what I experienced on the memorable night! It was like standing in some Holy sanctuary of a borders of a world beyond where we had entered into the Sacred Place of the Most High and communed with the Angels. A few hours of such a recollection will suffice for a lifetime. It is an experience never to be forgotten. It seemed as if we could never leave such an influence; and when we thought of the Precious Casket entombed in that Sacred Shrine, and what It had manifested to the world, we could but feel our utter unworthiness. To think of self or to harbour one selfish thought were worst than sacrilege.

But where this night is our Beloved Master? The Center of the Covenant, the Lover, the Friend of all the world? He is not with us. His Holy feet have not pressed the earth outside the city gates for four long years, but every foot of ground inside those walls have been made sacred and blessed.

In a little room on top of the house where He dwells, from whence He could see the Holy Tomb, He kept His lonely vigil. No – not alone, for who can tell what Heavenly Angels were there ministering unto Him, and like the Prophets of old, He may have talked with God. When we saw Him the next day His Face was resplendent with Divine Glory, and the Voice of the Holy Spirit rang clear in His every Utterance!

To perfect souls sorrow is not needed, but to the creatures like ourselves, seeking to escape the thrall and burden of animal propensities, sorrow is helpful and necessary. As the frost unlocks the hard shell and sets free the kernel of fruit therein, so sorrow develops in us ripe fruit of the Spirit, and in noble natures unfolds the great plan of righteousness; only in gentle school master to those who are exercised thereby. Thus like raindrops falling to the earth but to spring up in flowers, all the good in the world which has risen has been born from some great soul's sorrow.

We all march under a Captain Who has been made perfect through suffering, and we are to find peace only as we learn of Him in the school of patience and obedience.

Our blessed Master has said that "when we are all in perfect unity in America, every door of inner significance will be opened," This is the vital need of the hour and can never be accomplished until we learn to serve that we may become "producers of Unity" in the highest service. Our Merciful Lord has been so patient and long-suffering that we must not be satisfied with a little unity: nothing short of falling at His Feet in perfect obedience will ever bring the desired result.

"Our Beloved Lord is surrounded by trials, difficulties, and sorrows, the greatness of which it is impossible for us for one moment to realize, and the only thing which can render assistance unto Him, is the unision of the hearts of His people, the binding together of the nation and the universal spreading of the knowledge of the Greatest and Most Glorious Manifestion and the acceptance of His Covenant, which He has made to endure forever and ever. We squander life's forces in intermitted effort, while our endowments are great. Yet they are frittered away uselessly. But when we unite in one grand spontaneous harmonious whole and all become part of one reality, there will be a breadth, a depth, which will yield more of joy than we can now realize. If we carry a lighted torch can we keep the light from shining in other people's eyes?"

How few are those who have only obtained a glimpse of Him Whose Holy Fragrance makes 'Akká the Mecca of longing hearts! But to be there and behold Him in His Majesty, it is impossible to ever again be separated from Him! Still many behold Him, yet see Him not! Many hear His Words, yet know not their meaning!

As we come to the mildness and serenity of spring only through the blustering and boisterous days of March, - so the now Kingdom must enter through a period of resistance and persecution, and all who are taking part in the early establishment have to accept persecution and learn to find joy in it, as the sign that they are exalted to a superior realm of experience, to the companionship of the noble heroes of prophetic ages, and the fellowship with God.

"It all lies herein, entrance into the reality of the Covenant, Realization of the Mysteries, glories of love, servitude, prayer, holiness, humility and the inner apprehension of the meaning of Allah-u-Abhá."

Your humble sister and servant,

Foreword

Before there were Bahá’í books, pamphlets, periodicals — before there were, properly speaking, Bahá’í administrative institutions; before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá made His historic voyage to America; before Shoghi Effendi transmitted to the English speakers of the world his own sensitive and authoritative translations of the Writings central to the Bahá’í Faith — there were Bahá’ís in America. On what spiritual food did they subsist? As soon as the announcement had been made at the World Parliament of Religions in 1893, concerning the spiritual sanctity of Bahá’u’lláh, Americans began to explore the new Revelation. Some Persian Bahá’ís came from the Holy Land about that time to give lessons in the Bahá’í Faith in New York and Chicago. The first pilgrimage to ‘Akká and Haifa, in 1898, was followed by a steady and ever increasing stream of Americans intent on hearing the Faith expounded by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Whom Bahá’u’lláh had designated Center of the Covenant. The pilgrims, on their return to the United States and Canada, conveyed their ardor, enkindled at the feet of the Master, to their questing compatriots. They did it by word of mouth, by private letter, by widely circulated and continually copied and recopied letters, descriptions, journals, and accounts that went from hand to hand. Sometimes they published their little books and pamphlets; and, when the Bahá’í Publishing Society (predecessor of the present Bahá’í Publishing Trust) {{pviii}} was established in 1902, these travelers’ accounts constituted an important part of its output.

But infinitely more important than such publications were the Tablets, or letters, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent to the North American pilgrims. He maintained a continuous correspondence with the early believers, who welcomed the Tablets and eagerly, reverently shared them with their friends — by the same means, informal and formal, by which their personal experiences as pilgrims had been shared. The Tablets were written in Persian and were translated into English either in the Holy Land or in America by Persian believers and teachers.

One of the translators of these Tablets was the Master’s grandson, Shoghi Effendi, destined by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Will and Testament to become the Guardian of the Cause of God. There came to be, even before Shoghi Effendi’s accession to the Guardianship, a strong sense of the difference between official, authoritative expressions of the thoughts of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, on the one hand, and the informal reminiscences of travelers, on the other — of travelers eager to capture the precious words uttered by the Master as He taught the pilgrims — for He always taught; at tea, at lunch, on walks, on expeditions of mercy to the poor, He taught by deeds as well as words. Every minute of the pilgrims’ day was a lesson, sometimes concealed to all but the truly sensitive, sometimes apparent to the least gifted. Clearly, in the “pilgrims’ notes” (as they came to be called) there was necessarily involved the fallibility of each pilgrim’s memory and interpretive capacity. There was a danger that a sentence in a letter, dictated {{pix}} in response to a very particular question, might be generalized far beyond the case to which it was addressed or that an oral lesson, adapted and filtered by the needs of the hearer, become the basis of a doctrine that, emanating from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, would be seen as binding on all believers. Precisely this had happened in Islám: the Traditions, or Ḥadīths — that is, the sayings of Muḥammad as reported by His disciples — had come to represent, for the majority of Muslims, an authority second only to that of the Qur’án itself.

Bahá’u’lláh Himself had made it clear that, as Shoghi Effendi put it in a letter written on his behalf, “only those things that have been revealed in the form of Tablets have a binding power over the friends. Hearsays may be matters of interest but can in no way claim authority” (Bahá’í News, no. 125 [May 1939], 6). Shoghi Effendi was particularly vigilant in such matters and repeatedly warned the friends against accepting hearsay as binding on anyone except him who had heard the Master with his own ears. However that may be, what can be more thrilling, short of the immediate experience, than hearing or reading the account in a pilgrim’s own words of his reception in the loving arms of the Master? Who can tire of the description of those penetrating eyes, that warm and merry laughter, the wise brow, the wisps of hair escaping from the confining turban? Surely pilgrims’ notes are not binding on us; they cannot be adduced as proof of anything; they cannot provide the basis of a serious, critical analysis of Bahá’í teachings-though the temptation to use them so is sometimes nearly irresistible! — but the sense of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s presence, His quintessential courtesy, His tenderness, {{px}} His occasional severity, His powers of intellect and concentration — all these are infinitely precious to Bahá’ís, every one of whom is in love with the Master.

In spite of considerable effort of research, we know practically nothing about the life of Julia M. Grundy. There are records of John M. Grundy, her husband; O.Z. Whitehead, in his chapter on Mr. and Mrs. Howard MacNutt in Some Early Bahá'ís of the West, p. 36, mentions Mrs. Grundy as having been in their party of pilgrims in 1905 — this is certainly the pilgrimage of which the present book (published in 1907) is a record. She was listed as a Bahá'í in Brooklyn, New York, as late as 1944. After that, no further trace. Some reader of this re-edition is bound to know more, and we shall be grateful for any more information that may be sent to us.

This account of Julia Grundy's pilgrimage to 'Akká tells us more about her than we would probably learn from external sources. Ten Days in the Light of 'Akká gives us a glimpse into the life of the Holy Household and introduces us not only into the presence of the Center of the Covenant but also into that of some other persons of lesser degree-but more of that later.

The central object of this account — which appears to be daily notes only slightly organized and barely rewritten for publication — is to enable the pilgrim to share with fellow believers the lessons she heard from the lips of the Master Himself. At this point we must sound once again the customary caveat: "Pilgrims' notes" convey, not the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but the {{pxi}} pilgrim's memory and understanding of those words. We must, however, be permitted to inquire as to the degree of reliability of these notes. Two indications appear that seem to confer on them a rather high degree of accuracy.

The first has to do with the lack of evident discrimination in presenting the lessons, whether of 'Abdu'l-Bahá or some of the Persians (or Mr. MacNutt, for that matter) who happened to be at 'Akká. Mrs. Grundy makes very few observations of her own, contenting herself for the most part with a few statements of fact: "'Abdu'l-Bahá sent for me. I found Him in a little room opening from the courtyard. He was sitting upon a raised chair, His beautiful face, majestic in repose and strength, turned toward the only window. He greeted me joyfully. Both the daughters were present. He said..." Yes, her admiration is expressed, but with sobriety and modesty. The sentences are short and direct, and except for the chapters "Visit to the Tomb" and "Visit to the Ridván" the text consists preponderantly of direct quotations. Although the attributes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá — His beauty, kindness, and soon, are clearly marked, there is no comment or judgment made concerning His words or any other speaker's: the quotations stand on their own, without any attempt on the part of their self-effacing reporter to influence the reader.

It would probably be evident to one quite unacquainted with the principles of the Bahá'í Faith, solely on the basis of the lessons given by the several teachers, that there is a sensible difference between 'Abdu'l-Bahá and all the rest, as to spirituality, intelligence, reason, and sense of structure and rhetoric; and {{pxii}} among the rest, there is a clear gradation, my perception of which I have no intention of imposing upon the reader. The fact that those differences leap to the eye is a testimony to the objectivity of the reporter.

Another evidence of accuracy in reporting emerges from the substantively exact correspondence of Mrs. Grundy's version of the lessons of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with the authorized Writings of the Master that have been published since her pilgrimage. Again, comparison with the other teachers serves to confirm the author's faithfulness to the text of the lessons spoken in her presence.

'However, there are several points of variance between Julia Grundy's pilgrim's notes and what we know, from authorized Writings, to be either the historical truth of certain events or the doctrine revealed by the principal Figures of the Bahá'í Faith.

As to more theoretical — even theological — interpretation, here again there are discrepancies between the discourses of the lesser teachers and those of the Master. Mírzá Asadu'lláh comes very close to {{pxiii}} implying that 'Abdu'l-Bahá enjoys direct Revelation: "...His Knowledge has descended from the Invisible Source of Knowledge, and the Holy Spirit is speaking through Him" (p. 98). Yet 'Abdu'l-Bahá, far from ever making such a claim, is quoted in this book as denying most emphatically that He is the returned Christ, in spite of the strong wish of many of His disciples to believe so (see pp. 36-31 in the chapter on "The Manifestation"). Another indication of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's appreciation both of His secondary status compared to that of a Manifestation of God and of the importance of that station as commanding the obedience of all who believe in the Covenant is clearly delineated in the chapter entitled "The Second Coming." On page 62 He establishes a multiple analogy: Moses: Joshua :: Christ: Peter :: Bahá'u'lláh: 'Abdu'l-Bahá, adding that this last authorization of successorship was, unlike the previous one, written in the Manifestation's "own Hand." One should remark that this is not the progressive revelation of the chain of Manifestations; the very different proportion John the Baptist: Christ :: the Báb: Bahá'u'lláh is not in question here. That is the difference between the successorship of Mírzá Yahyá to the Báb, and the supersession of the Báb by Bahá'u'lláh. Just as Joshua continues the Mosaic era, and Peter the Christian era, Subh-i-Azal was supposed to continue the Bábí Dispensation; and, just as Christ superseded Moses, and Muḥammad, Christ, so Bahá'u'lláh has superseded the Báb. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, by comparing Himself to Joshua and to Peter, and in denying His correspondence to Christ, clearly rules out for Himself the station of Manifestation of God. {{pxiv}}

It is hard to read the lesson of Badí'u'lláh in the light of hindsight and to retain one's objectivity and thus judge Mrs. Grundy's. Our hindsight comes from having read Shoghi Effendi's God Passes By, where Mírzá Badí'u'lláh and his brother Mírzá Diya'ullah are identified as Covenant-breakers of the party of the infamous Muḥammad-'Alí. The two brothers vacillated, returned to the Bahá'í fold several times, and ultimately chose to rebel against the Covenant. Obviously, Badí'u'lláh was undergoing one of his episodes of repentance, for he mentions Muḥammad-'Alí with evident disapproval (p. 82). It is impossible to read these words today without at least suspecting Badí'u'lláh of hypocrisy.

The mention of Muḥammad-'Alí recalls to the reader that this pilgrimage took place in a time of great trouble for the Bahá'ís. The sadness that the nefarious activities of the Covenant-breakers occasioned the Master breaks through from time to time in this account (pp. 50, 51) but for the most part He clearly makes of cheerfulness in adversity a law of conduct. With what courage (and foresight!) He proclaims: "If all the world combined against Me, I would still possess this power, and all the world could not take it away from Me. I can fight with this weapon forever and will always be victorious. It is a sword which can never be dulled, a magazine that is always filled." This from the gentle, modest Servant of Bahá shows His other side — His firmness in the calm knowledge of His invincible station and of the power that will always sustain Him.

What do we learn about Julia Grundy? Here is the picture that emerges, for me at least, for I could be {{pxv}} proven quite wrong by one who really knew her: She is modest, even fearful, but has the courage of faith. I have the distinct impression that 'Abdu'l-Bahá tried to inspire her with confidence. He succeeded, at least to the extent that she could produce this book. She is earnest, perhaps lacking in humor; it is odd that she never mentions 'Abdu'l-Bahá's love of laughter, a characteristic other pilgrims rarely fail to observe.

That this preface threatens to become longer than the book indicates the power of these pilgrim's notes to stimulate curiosity, imagination, and thought, in spite of their modest mien. They constitute a personal, though not intimate, record and, at the same time, a document of considerable historical value. In them we hear the voice of 'Abdu'l-Bahá through the mind and heart of a good and simple person and once again appreciate His ability to teach anyone right to the limit of his spiritual and intellectual capacity to learn.

Introduction

{{p3}} I realize that the doors of a new Life are opening within me and that I have been awakened as if from a sleep. Now it seems that never again can I go back to the life which is so trivial, unsatisfying, and without eternal purpose.

It is a supreme pleasure to live in an atmosphere which is all Light. Here I see about me those who have already laid hold upon Immortality, and viewing them I realize that I too am a child of the Kingdom.

I met 'Abdu'l-Bahá shortly after our arrival in the Household. He said, "Blessed are you that the Word of God has reached you and found your soul awake. Blessed it is that the East and the West have met in the Kingdom of God as Christ prophesied." I said, "It is a heavenly privilege to know the Truth and become a child of the Kingdom." He replied, "I hope to meet you in the Spiritual Kingdom." I said, "That will be my wish and desire." He answered, "I will pray for you." {{p4}} {{p5}}

FROM THE WORDS OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

“Moral life consists in the government of one’s self. Immortality is government of a human soul by the Divine Will.”

“The soul is the Sanctuary of God; Reason is His Throne.”

“Our Actions reveal what we are, no matter what the tongue speaks.”

“Every drop of blood shed in the Cause of God will raise up one hundred believers.”

“Martyrdom is the supreme test of belief. Great martyrs will arise in this Cause in the years to come. A believer is sometimes called upon to suffer a living martyrdom.”

“Are miracles performed in this Day?” “Miracles are constantly being performed in the material world about us, yet they make but little impression. Every Prophet has His own particular Mission and function. He does not come merely to perform miracles. People do not trouble themselves about the proof of miracles. The function of a physician is not to make a tree talk.”

“Be firm in the West! Let the foundation principles of this Truth become deep-rooted. Hold fast until the {{p6}} fullness of reality comes to you. Christ’s Teachings were established largely through the firmness of Paul. Many calamities will befall the believers, but by loving the Cause of God, it will be uplifted in human souls and the believers strengthened. Love one another. Live in Unity under the Tent of God. Firmness and Love make Unity. God will assist all who serve in this Cause.”

“Spirit is universal. Man is created in a potential degree of Spirit. Growth is from the mental station into the Spiritual, something like the development from soldier to Commander. God Himself cannot compel the soul to become spiritual. The exercise of a free human will is necessary. We can point the way and furnish the example. We should do little things as well as great things for the Love of God. We should love people because they are God’s creatures.”

“Are the Manifestations sinless?” “Yes, there must be a standard of perfection for human example.”

“Are Manifestations limited?” “They are limited only by the capacity of souls to whom They reveal the Word.”

“What becomes of an undeveloped infant’s soul?” “It rests with the Mercy of God and through the Eternal Bounty it will not be deprived of that Mercy.”

“Will the Tablets and Utterances of Bahá’u’lláh be added to our Bible?” “No, they are a distinct Revelation {{p7}} of God and will form a Book larger than our Bible.”

“What will be the future of this Revelation?” “Know this — that the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh is the Word of God. There will not be a home which does not contain a believer. Look not at the present. Turn your vision upon the future. All the books written concerning the History of this Revelation number about fifty volumes.”

“Will the money of the rich ever be divided among the people without revolution or bloodshed?”

“Will some men amass great fortunes in the future while others remain poor?”

“Will the law prevent this condition of affairs?”

“It will not be possible in the future for men to amass great fortunes by the labor of others. The rich will willingly divide. They will come to this gradually, naturally, by their own volition. It will never be accomplished by war and bloodshed. The ruling power or government cannot treat the rich unjustly. To force them to divide their wealth would be unjust. In the future, proportionately about three-quarters of the profits will go to the workmen and one-quarter to the owner. This condition will prevail in about one century. It will certainly come to pass.”

“The Blessed Perfection has revealed a Tablet called ‘Tablet of the Spiritual World.’ All who read it are filled with an anxious desire to leave this world and enter the next condition, so wonderful are the glories {{p8}} of the Spiritual Kingdom. In Persia, one man who read this Tablet killed himself. he could not wait for the happiness it promised him. Another, a youth of Işfahán, could not stand the spiritual food contained in this Tablet, and lost his reason.”

“I once lived in a cave on Mount Carmel. One day I went to the Carmelite Monastery and asked to see someone, saying I had a message to deliver. They refused to see me or hear my message. I said, ‘I will put it in writing if you will read it.’ They still refused, so I returned to ‘Akká in great sadness, walking the whole distance of nine miles.”

“Everlasting Life is the Bounty of God. It is like the Sea of Reality. The believers are the waves of that Sea, one great Sea and a thousand waves as one. Again, Everlasting Life is like the rays of the Sun and the believers are windows; the Sun which produces the Light is One and the same. Into these soul-windows the same Light enters and various things within are illuminated. The Kingdom is like a garden. The flowers differ in color and perfume, yet they receive growth, beauty, and bounty from the one God and are developed by the same Divine Breeze. Truth is like the Light which is always the same. The souls of Believers are as mirrors which reflect the Light. Truth is like the light of a candle which does not vary, yet the candlestick which holds it may change. Each year the rose is the same beautiful flower although it appears in different gardens.”

“What will be the food of the future?” “Fruit and {{p9}} grains. The time will come when meat will no longer be eaten. Medical science is only in its infancy, yet it has shown that our natural diet is that which grows out of the ground. The people will gradually develop up to the condition of this natural food.”

“There is no appointed length of life for man. Lengthen your life by living according to God’s spiritual laws. Then you will live forever. This is the true longevity, the real life. The real life is eternal happiness and existence in the Knowledge of God.”

“Jesus was a dyer by trade. He also lived in Egypt ‘Out of Egypt have I called My Son’ (Matt. 2:15 Hos. 11:1) was spoken of Jesus. The 5th Gospel which is considered noncanonical gave other history of Jesus than is contained in the Gospels of the New Testament. There were fifty gospels, but only four were accepted as genuine by the priesthood.”

“Spirit is the highest and supreme development of the soul. Soul is the material or outer self — the Mind. Mind is the action of the Soul’s powers. The Body is the physical covering or medium in which Mind acts and functions. At death everything but Spirit is destroyed and becomes extinct.”

“The Prophets and Holy Men always went into the wilderness to pray. Many of them walked upon Mount Carmel and communed with God.”

“True Religion has nothing to do with human imagination. God’s Will is independent of human opinion. {{p10}} Personal ideas and mere human prejudice are the great obstacles to spiritual growth. For instance, some difference of opinion arises between two believers in God. Each expects the Lord to support his view of the question. The Word of God is perfect and arbitrary in Its perfection. When there is difference of view there is absence of the Spirit. The Word is the only Standard of Truth. Discord and disagreement are impossible among those who adhere to the Manifestation and sever themselves from human opinion.’ There are no ‘heads’ in this Cause; all are ‘Servants.’”

“If all the world should combine to overthrow the Covenant, it could not succeed. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá loves all no matter how they turn away from Him. Whether they love or hate Him, go or come, He never changes in His love for them. The Blessed Perfection has left nothing undone. What He ordained can never be set aside.”

“Everything in life ministers to our development. Our lesson is to study and learn. Money and difficulties are alike advantages to us. Tests are either stumbling blocks or stepping-stones, just as we make them.”

“The Prophets of the Word could not sin. They possess the power and will to violate the Will of God, but the desire to do so is never present in them. Knowing the perfect fruit of Oneness, they have no inclination toward that which is imperfect. Like beautiful flowers, they do not change in beauty even when surrounded by foul conditions.” {{p11}}

“There are two kinds of suffering, one subtle, the other gross. The subtle suffering is hatred, anger, fear, and torment which follow evil actions of the soul. The gross suffering is imprisonment, chastisement, and physical pain of martyrdom.”

“At the time of Muḥammad, He sanctioned war for the preservation of the lives of His followers. The laws of individual justice were confused and preliminary in the souls of men. Therefore, the law of general justice of the community was revealed by this Prophet. He commanded His followers to carry the Religion of God by the sword. When a man is about to take poison, it is right to dash the cup from his hand even with extreme violence. It will inflict injury but at the same time save his life. There must be a law to prevent the wolves from destroying the lambs at such a period of religious history. That is why the Shepherd sanctioned such vigorous protection for the sheep. Behind such laws of a Manifestation there is always a supreme wisdom.”

“During dinner ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ate entirely with His fingers. After awhile He said, “In the East there are many peoples who never use a knife or fork. To eat with their fingers is custom among them, just as the, Western nations have their own peculiar customs. We must each view with respect the customs of the other. There is a kind of food which needs neither knife nor fork and of which every one may partake with perfect ease and benefit. It is the food spiritual. This food brings life and stimulation instead of indolence and apathy. It brings peace and content to the one who {{p12}} partakes of it; the more food, the more joy and peace. For the Spirit is always eager to furnish sustenance to the soul.”

“Allusion cannot convey what Reality teaches. Christ said, ‘What has happened in the past will happen again in the future.’ The reason of this is that all things are under the operation of Divine Law which is the same today, yesterday, and forever. By this the spiritual eye may discern that which is authentic in the Scriptures.”

“Sow the seeds of love in the heart and not the seeds of hatred. The reflection in the glass proves whether we are laughing or frowning. By our actions we reveal what is growing in the heart. Actions are mirrors of the soul.”

A These are precious and wonderful days in ‘Akká. Each day is as a year. Your visit cannot be measured merely by the length of time you have been here. The real spiritual visit will be after you have gone. Some who remain but one day go away filled and enkindled with the Spirit of God. They are like the dry wood which bursts into flame as soon as it touches the fire. So it is with a lamp; the oil within it responds instantly to the fire and gives forth light. The soul which possesses sight can see in a moment, while the blind never see. An awakened soul is like a precious pearl in the midst of a load of pebbles which have but little value. To some it is given to hear and know the Message of Life in a short time, while others hear and receive {{p13}} nothing even though they make a long stay in this holy place.”

“We should not be occupied with our failings and weakness, but concern ourselves about the Will of God so that It may flow through us, thereby healing these human infirmities.”

“Faith is not so much what we believe as what we carry out.”

“In America you have only received a taste of the spiritual food which is to come to you. Some will arise to serve the Cause of God in your land who will sacrifice themselves entirely. They will be given great power from God when they come forth to do His Will. Concentrate the soul upon God so that it may become as a fountain pouring out the Water of Life to a thirsty world. Live up to the principles of Sacrifice. The world will then become as nothing and be without power to attract you away from God. Sacrifice your will to the Will of God. The Kingdom is attained by the one who forgets self. Everything becomes yours by Renunciation of everything. A lion, wolf, and fox went hunting. They captured a wild ass, a gazelle, and a hare. The lion said to the wolf, 'Divide the spoil.' The wolf said, 'That is easy; the ass for yourself, the gazelle for me, and the hare for the fox.' The lion bit off the wolf's head saying, 'You are not a good divider.' Then turning to the fox, he said, 'You divide!' The fox said, 'The ass, the gazelle, and the hare are yours!' The lion looking at him, said, 'Because you have {{p14}} accounted yourself as nothing, you may take all the prey.'"

"The miracles of Christ were spiritual teachings, not literal."

"A What is true greatness in man?"

"His spiritual attributes. No one can destroy his spiritual qualities; they are from God."

"Tests are like fire which purifies."

"How will the masses be benefited by this Revelation?"

"The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh contains all the great laws and principles of social government. The basis of God's perfect laws is love for humanity and help for human needs. If all people followed this Revelation, the masses would be immeasurably uplifted and the Cause of God glorified. This development of humanity will be gradual, not sudden. It will surely come to pass; it is impossible to swim against the current of Niagara. Teaching the Truth is like building bridges by which humanity may cross over the current which threatens. The world must come to know the Word in Christ. How He was mocked, scorned, and laughed at, yet His mission was to uplift the very world which refused Him. Realization of this will bring tears to the eyes of those who deny Him, cause them to grow silent and thoughtful. Christ is always Christ."

"What is the best way to benefit humanity?"

"Guidance to God. What is dearer to man than life? {{p15}} So, therefore, leading a soul to Eternal Life is the greatest blessing and benefit you can bestow upon that soul."

"When does our responsibility cease in giving the Message?"

"When we give the Message, we develop ourselves. Our own heart is opened when we teach the heart of the listener. The more we give, the more we get. Therefore, as this is the means of our own development we should never cease teaching. Our responsibility remains as long as we have a listener."

“What is the best thing to do when met by a difficult question?”

“A sincere worker in the Cause of God is always assisted by the Divine Spirit when such questions arise. The Truth will flow through you if you stand in the right attitude toward the Truth. In the Spiritual Station you will never be without the Knowledge necessary to answer a question. With Spiritual food the capacity to know increases with the will to serve.”

“What is sacrifice?”

“Giving up everything in the Cause of God and following His Will no matter where it leads. We must not have desire for anything else but God. We must entirely forget self. To be perfected we must give up everything in the cause of God, judgment, reason, will, everything. To hold back anything is to be imperfect. The thing we hold most dear is the thing to give. This is real sacrifice.” {{p16}}

“Upon which finger should the ring with the Greatest Name be worn?”

“The right hand is the hand of honor. In the East, wearing it upon this hand attracts attention and causes comment. But the real place to wear the Greatest Name is in the heart.”

“What is prayer, attitude or word?”

“Prayer is both attitude and word; it depends upon the soul-condition. It is like a song; both words and music make the song. Sometimes the melody will move us, sometimes the words.”

“What will be the future of this Teaching?”

“Know and realize the greatness of the Cause into which you have entered. Look not at the present. The day will come when there will not be a house which does not contain a believer in this Revelation. One Book or Tablet of the Blessed Perfection is more comprehensive than fifty volumes of the world’s greatest wisdom. The Books and Words of God have been sealed and the meanings locked. All the sacred mysteries were sealed, but now Bahá’u’lláh has broken the seals, revealed the meanings, and we can understand the Realities.”

“My greatest wish is to teach this Message.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “I will pray God to assist you. It has often happened that one who is not able to teach would be sent forth, and when the time came, that one would be found powerful and eloquent. One man of this kind in the East has even written a book. Two Jewish children have written a beautiful commentary {{p17}} proving the Cause of Christ, Muḥammad, and the Blessed Perfection. Two unbelievers in the Center of the Covenant have recently returned and are serving with zeal in the Vineyard of God.”

“Belief in this Revelation is a priceless spiritual blessing. Just as a child will give up a jewel of great price for a sugarplum, so men will exchange the Truth for a treasure of earth. The Báb said, ‘One glance from the Eye of Him Worn God shall Manifest is worth all the wealth of the world.' In this one look we can attain life everlasting, resurrection from the dead, and the treasures of Heaven."

"The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh is not mere history; it is the Voice and Will of God. If we guard the seed of Immortality, it will bring forth the tree of Eternal Life. This is the true realization of the Manifestation's Coming. His Mission is accomplished when we enter the Spiritual Kingdom and attain Immortality. God be praised! This is the Spiritual Sight. Peter perceived Christ when thousands of Jews saw Him not. Peter reached that Station at once. This Knowledge is the glance from the Eye of God. It is more precious than all the wealth of the world."

'Abdu'l-Bahá visited us in the afternoon. He said, "Speech is necessary and good between soul and soul. Nothing of this world is eternal. The highest longing and ambition of some people is to be a king or queen; but at the last even the great ones of earth must perish. Even the earthly personality of Jesus has come and gone. Only by serving God do we attain everlasting Life. All our fame and glory should be in service to Him. This will never perish. Live in the Cause of God; {{p18}} this is the Harmony of the Universe. Shine in the Horizon of His Will. Life is wasted if not spiritual. Be of the Spirit, not of the body. The Light of the body is the eye. The eye of conscience stands between the power of knowledge and the spiritual world. Does your soul feel as sure of God as your eye is sure of Nature? 'Blessed are the pure in heart; they shall see God.' Once I was in prison under the ground and in chains, yet I was happy because I was not deprived of spiritual sight. I tell you this so that when you hear of my troubles and difficulties in the future, you may know that I am spiritually happy. I am showing you the way of true happiness. By comparing the future with the past you may understand, no matter what the future brings forth. Firmness is the beginning of spiritual happiness. Christ appeared in Palestine and was held in contempt because He was from Nazareth. Only twelve believed in Him; one deserted Him. There were other believers, but they were not strong. They were troubled with doubts and afterward fell away. Mary Magdalene held steadfastly to Christ and made others firm. God will assist all who are firm in His Cause. Firmness is the beginning of spiritual happiness."

"Spirituality is the possession of a good, pure heart. When the heart is pure, the Spirit enters, and our growth is natural and assured. Everyone is better in-formed of the condition of his own soul than the souls of others. Our responsibility to God increases with our years." {{p19}}

The "Government is upon the shoulder" of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He bears a burden of human griefs and troubles, yet helps all and is happy; for He has cut Himself from the world. {{p20}}

LOVE

"How can we love another whose personality is unpleasant?"

“See how the enemies of Christ persecuted and crucified Him, yet He loved them all. Man is like a tree. The tree lives to produce fruit. The fruit of man is love. It is easy for us to love a friend or even an animal, but how difficult to love one who is without attraction. Yet if the Love of God is shining in our hearts, we, like Christ, may see that Love reflected in every personality, and love all alike.”

“What is the difference between universal and individual love?”

“We must love all humanity as the children of God. Even if they kill us, we must die with love for them. It is not possible for us to love everybody with a personal love, but we must love all humanity alike. Man is capable of attaining a supreme station. Through the manifestation of Love God created Man. To attain a supreme station man must reflect the Love of God.”

“There are many stages or kinds of Love. In the beginning God, through His Love, created man. Man is the highest product of His Love, and the purpose of man’s existence is to reflect this Love of God in his soul. But man in his egotism and love of self turns away from his Creator and thereby prevents the accomplishment of the Divine Plan. The Manifestations appear to show man the way to God through Love. By them, man is brought to the condition of severance from his egotism and being absorbed into the Ocean of Love Divine. The three stages of Love are therefore:

1st — God’s Love for man.

2nd — Man’s love for self.

3rd — Man’s love for God.”

“There is a profound, a Divine Wisdom in Love. The Light of God shines in the eyes when the heart is pure. The home of Religion is the heart.”

SOUL AND SPIRIT (Compiled from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Teachings)

Soul is the human will to live temporally.

Spirit is the Divine Will to live forever.

Salvation is the quickening of soul into Spirit.

All souls are alike in essence or quality as created. Owing to environment, soul-needs differ; rich and poor, wise and ignorant, etc. Environment has its dark side and its light side. Development has its good aspects and bad aspects. Sin is the absence of Righteousness. Righteousness is doing the Will of God. All souls have a free will to choose or refuse the Will of God. Each soul has its station of individuality in which it may develop itself, but a soul cannot leave its own station for another station or individuality. Man accomplishes his true growth when the soul develops in its own station. His station does not change; simply his capacity for knowing God is increased and developed. Knowledge of God is the only spiritual development. The Power of the Manifestations of God is beyond question inasmuch as human development invariably follows their

Teachings. This development is unmistakably toward a higher existence. Every Manifestation teaches the Existence of God. As their Power is evident their Knowledge must likewise be true. The soul can prove the Existence of God through its intellectual powers, but the true perception of God is through the spiritual eye of the soul. This Knowledge {{p23}} transcends mere mental proof; it is spiritual Sight; it is Vision. The atheist has intelligence of the mere mind. His words denying the existence of God are in reality evidence that God exists. The atheist's real station of development is not ours to judge or estimate. Spirit is Oneness of vision and Knowledge. The mind has many attributes or powers. The Spirit is Conscious Perception. When all the powers of the soul work together and are concentrated upon God, the soul has its highest employment. Spirit is like the Sun, the Source of all Light, alone in Its Station. The mind or soul has many lights, as the stars. The mind or soul manifests itself throughout the whole body in perfect harmony. The Spirit or Spirit of God manifests Itself throughout the whole body of the universe and is in perfect harmony wherever manifest. A wicked soul is the only thing out of harmony in the universe. As it does not come into the flow of the Divine Will, it is not of the Spirit. This failure of the soul has led man to believe that God will give the wicked soul another opportunity by allowing it to return in another body and atone for its failure. There is no proof of this outside or inside the Holy Book of Scriptures. Whatever is the destiny of the wicked soul in the hereafter, we know that its development rests with the Mercy of God. A wicked soul, lacking development, is non-existent spiritually, just as in the station of the tree, the stone is nonexistent because the stone lacks the powers and development of the tree. Therefore, a soul which continues in a condition of non-development through violating the Will of God suffers extinction and is spiritually nonexistent. The fields and {{p24}} flowers of the Spiritual Realm are pointed out to us by the Manifestations who walk amid their glories. It remains for the soul of man to follow them in these paths of eternal life, through the exercise of its own human will. {{p25}}

THE HOUSE OF JUSTICE

“The House of Justice must be obeyed in all things because it has been established by the Blessed Perfection. The Council of Constantine decided many things wisely, but its power and influence did not continue because it was not established by Christ Himself. It was founded upon the Words of Christ interpreted according to the ideas of men. The House of Justice will be appointed by the people. It must be obeyed because it is the Law of God expressed through the people by their own will and voice.”

“In this Day we are near to the Source of true Religion and the Law of God, before Revelation has been corrupted by the interpretations of men. The true believer is the one who follows the Manifestation of God in all things. After the Departure of Bahá'u'lláh we are commanded to obey the House of Justice. I myself will obey the House of Justice because it is founded upon the Commands of the Blessed Perfection. The Council of Constantine did not survive because it was not founded by Christ; but in this Day the House of Justice has been established by the Manifestation of God. It is the center of true government and must be obeyed in all things. It is the Law of God embodied in the people, reflecting His Will and their need and desire, not blindly following command.”

“In war both parties are wrong. Neither Japan nor Russia is fulfilling the Law and Will of God. The kings and rulers of the world will find their true authority {{p26}} under the rulings of the House of Justice. The Law of God will be vested in nineteen men who will compose the House of Justice and render decisions. War is never necessary. It is always an expense and a calamity, never a great help. God utilizes even the wars of nations to carry out His ultimate purposes. The House of Justice will decide between kings and kings. All judgment will be from the standpoint of God’s Laws. Then rich and poor will be alike justly treated. When men are developed spiritually, they obey God. The rule of the House of Justice will be the dominion of the Spirit of God. Human will brings conditions to a climax in the affairs of nations. The only solution and remedy is the administration of God’s Laws.” {{p27}}

HEAVEN

“What is meant by ‘Heaven’ in the Bible?”

“Christ said that nothing could ascend into Heaven except that which came down from Heaven. He also said, ‘I came from Heaven and will return to Heaven,’ and ‘The Son of Man is in Heaven.’ He said this while still upon the earth and notwithstanding the fact that He had been born of Mary. There is no doubt Christ came from Heaven and always was in Heaven, but when He spoke He did not mean the literal sky. What then is meant by ‘Heaven’? Science proves that there is no heaven or sky, but all is limitless space and one universe. In this limitless space the heavenly spheres revolve and have their orbits. But the ‘Heaven’ of Christ is that invisible world which is beyond the sight and comprehension of mere man. It is the spiritual condition. Therefore, the ‘Heaven’ of Christ is the Will of God. The Sun of that Heaven will never set. In it the Moon and Stars are always shining. It is the limitless Kingdom of God. It is sanctified from all place. Christ is always there. There Elijah and the Holy Prophets live eternally. It is sanctified from all comprehension. The Jews were deprived because they could not understand this spiritual condition.”

“The ‘heaven’ of the material world is something else. It is the sky overhead in which the clouds move. This heaven is ‘up’ to us and ‘down’ to those upon the other side of the earth, while vice versa their material heaven is ‘down’ to us. In the Heavenly Book it is said {{p28}} that the ‘stars will fall from heaven.’ Where will they fall? Science proves that nearly all the stars are larger than the earth. Where will they find room to fall?”

“When the heart is pure and filled with the light of the Spirit, we will know that we are in the true ‘Heaven.’ Christ came from Heaven, and still the Jews are sleeping. The Kingdom of Heaven is within your soul. Let all people see that you have the Light, that they may recognize something in you which they themselves do not possess.” <29> </29>

THE MANIFESTATION

A When you give the Message of this Manifestation many say, ‘This is nothing new — I prefer the home of my old religious belief which has been so serviceable and trustworthy.’”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “Bahá’u’lláh is the same Light in a new Lamp. To see, we must look at the Light and not at the Lamp. This is Spiritual Sight. The sun is one orb, but it has different rising-points on the horizon. One point was Jesus, one Moses, one Bahá’u’lláh, and so on. Therefore, be a lover of the ‘Sun’ and worship it, no matter at what point it may arise. If you worship the dawning-place, you will fail to see the Sun when it arises in another point of the horizon. Many stand at the old point and worship while they are losing the Light of the Sun in this Manifestation. True layers of the Sun worship the Sun Itself and not the point of Its rising. They see and know the Light. Pray for those who stand worshipping the old rising-point of the Sun, spiritually blind to its New Appearance upon the Heavenly Horizon, spiritually deprived of Its Light and Bounty. The ministers and clergy do not accept the Message on account of their position in the Church. As stars in heaven they have become darkened. When the Báb arose and declared His Mission, many of the clergy who had occupied positions found it necessary to give them up and follow His Teaching.”

“Many people, likewise, who hear the Message are {{p30}} deprived of its Glory because they receive it from one whom they deem less competent to know than themselves. The Word of God is revealed according to the degree of Spiritual Sight, no matter who the messenger may be. Again, people do not receive the Manifestation of God because they are veiled by their imaginations. Imagination is one of our greatest powers and a most difficult one to rule. Imagination is the father of superstition. For example, two men are dear friends. They love each other so much they never wish to be parted. Yet when one of them dies, the other through fear dreads to be alone with the one he cared so much for in life. His imagination controls him and fills him with fear and horror. We are led astray by imagination, even in violation of will and reason. It is our test power. We are tested by our ability to control and subdue it. A man imagines he is wealthy. Some day real wealth comes to him, but it is never what he imagined it would be. Imagination is our greatest misleader. We hold to it until it becomes fixed in memory. Then we hold to it the stronger, believing it to be fact. It is a great power of the soul but without value unless rightly controlled and guided. Through imagination men receive a distorted view of a former Manifestation and are prevented from recognizing and accepting the Truth and Reality of the present one. They are veiled from the Light and Glory of God by imagination. These veils prevent the true Light from entering the soul. Therefore, men follow the false light of their imaginations and cling to error instead of truth. Thus the Egyptians were veiled from the Light of God in Moses. The Jews were veiled from the Glory of Jesus simply because they did not know Moses {{p31}} rightly and so were blinded to the one He promised would come after Him. Today Jews, Muḥammadans, Christians, not seeing the former Manifestation with true vision, are veiled from the Glory of God in Bahá'u'lláh. One of the greatest veils is literal interpretation of the prophecies. Again, many refuse the Manifestation in His Day because they do not want to walk the hard road of devotion and servitude, but prefer the easy road of hereditary belief. Misconception of the Word of God and its meanings is another great veil which imagination throws over the soul and by which the Light is lost. Also, people inherit their belief from parents and ancestors and follow it blindly, too negligent to know and see for themselves. Negligence and apathy are heavy 'veils of Glory.' Read Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl's book of Bahá'í Proofs, and you will find irresistible evidence of this Manifestation.[^ ] Will is the center or focus of human understanding. We must will to know God, just as we must will in order to possess the life He has given us. The human will must be subdued and trained into the Will of God. It is a great power to have a strong will, but a greater power to give that will to God. The will is what we do, the understanding is what we know. Will and understanding must be one in the Cause of God. Intention brings attainment."

[^ ] Abu'l-Faḍl, The Bahá'í Proofs: Also a Short Sketch of the History and Lives of the Leaders of this Religion, trans. Ishtael-ebn-Kalantar (New York: Bahá'í Publishing Committee, 1929). — Ed.

"Do the Manifestations differ in degree?"

"These Supreme Holy Souls are Godlike in their attributes. The garments in which they appear are different, but the attributes are the same. In their real intrinsic power they show forth the Perfection of God. The Reality of God in them never varies; only the garment in which the Primal Reality is clothed is different {{p32}} according to the time and place of their Appearance and Declaration to the world. One Day it is the garment of Abraham, then Moses, then Jesus, then Bahá'u'lláh. Knowledge of this Oneness is true Enlightenment. Some see the garment only and worship the Personality; some see the Reality and worship in 'Spirit and in Truth.' Some of the Hebrews admired the embroidered beauty of the garment of Abraham but were blind to the Real Light which shone upon the darkness of the world through Him. Moses was denied; Jesus was denied, crucified; all have been denied and persecuted for this reason. Men see the garment and are blind to the Reality, worship the Personality and do not know the Truth, the Light Itself. Some worship the Tree of Life but do not eat of the blessed Fruit of the Tree. Therefore, differences and disagreements arise in religious belief. If all would eat of the Fruit Itself, they could never disagree. For instance, four men were traveling along a road. They possessed a franc between them. One was a Turk, the others Persian, Arab, and Greek. They became hungry and wished to buy some grapes, but as they did not understand each other's language none of them could express his wish to the others. So they began to quarrel and abuse each other. Finally a man came along who knew all four languages. He asked what the trouble was. Then he said, 'Give me the money. I will buy each one what he wishes.' So he bought grapes, and they were all satisfied. They had disagreed upon a word or term only; all meant the same thing. Terms are of no importance. The Fruits of the Tree should be our desire. These are the Spiritual 'grapes.' Find the Light Itself, and there will be no difference of opinion {{p33}} or belief as to the Personality or Degree of the Manifestations of God."

"The greatest proof of a Manifestation is the Manifestation Himself. We do not have to prove the existence of the sun. The sun is independent of proof. He who has sight can see the sun and prove it for himself. It is not necessary to seek for other proof. For instance, it is a fixed fact that nothing could grow upon the earth without the light of the sun. It is easily proved that without the sun's heat and light no animal life could exist. The sun's light is indispensable, its heat essential. This is the sun's greatest proof. God with all His qualities is independent of all His creatures. Look at the Christ. He was a youth of Israel, not a great and honored man, but born from a poor family. He was so poor that He was born in a manger, yet He changed the conditions of the whole world. What proof could be greater than this that He was from God? It is so strong and evident that no one can deny it. Without this Light the world could not grow spiritually. The Blessed Perfection came from Persia, which is not a prominent nation. The great Prophets did not enter school to be taught of men, yet so many things did they manifest that at last we must admit that the world is not able to destroy the wisdom of the Prophets or grow without them. Everything of God is proof against the people and evidence for God. Peter was the greatest of all the disciples. He was the 'head' appointed by the Christ, yet he denied the Christ three times. See what happened afterward! See what a power of penetration the Word of God possessed! How the Truth in Christ grew and spread all over the world! There must be a Standard. The Kings of the earth {{p34}} cannot stand against the power of the Word. The Light of God will shine, must shine. The great flag of Nero was lowered, and Christ's standard raised in its stead. All the kings of earth, all the learned men have become subject to the Word and are its worshipers. The Blessed Perfection during His own lifetime had one thousand followers who believed in Him. Only one proved ungrateful, yet he did not deny Bahá'u'lláh. Many of these followers were martyred with His Name upon their lips. The renown of Jesus' Name did not reach outside His own country. We hear nothing of Him from the Phoenicians. But the Name of Bahá'u'lláh reached the whole world while He lived. Jesus did not write to any of the rulers of the world. Bahá'u'lláh sent Tablets to all the Kings and rulers of the earth. When Napoleon III was in the zenith of his power, the Blessed Perfection wrote to him. If we should gather together all that the Christ said, it would be very little in amount. But consider the number of Tablets and Books left by the Blessed Perfection! Although the Christ was not a great and honored man, although He was of such poor and humble condition that He was born in a manger, yet He changed the whole world by His Power and Divinity. What proof could be greater than this? How can anyone deny His proof! In the same way, the Blessed Perfection came from Persia, which is not an important nation of the world. He did not go to school, and yet so much Knowledge was manifest in Him that we must confess that is impossible to deny His Wisdom and His Divinity. So universal were the Bounties of the Blessed Perfection that the very stones and trees mourned His Departure. Everything sent {{p35}} from God is proof enough for the people of the world to accept and believe. The Manifestations of God are sent when most needed. There were Nineteen ‘Letters of the Living’ who accepted the Báb. The Blessed Perfection Himself spread the Báb’s Message. Great and learned men likewise embraced His Cause. They were Mullá or clergy of the Muḥammadans. One of them is known as the King of the Martyrs on account of his death for this Cause. They were celebrated for their great knowledge and learning. The Manifestation of God is proof of Himself, just as the sun is its own greatest and sufficient proof. The sun says, ‘I am proof.’ In the ancient times the women of Egypt thought Joseph was an angel. No proof was necessary but his own beauty and excellence. The proof was himself. People of sight and perception see at a glance what the blind and incapable can never see.”

“Another great proof of a Manifestation is His power to develop souls. Miracles are but secondary proofs. Our first and important duty is to ascertain if the real Physician has come to heal the Spiritual sickness of the world, to learn if the Commander of the hosts of righteousness has appeared, to prove the appearance of a true Manifestation of God. If in crossing the ocean everyone on board the ship should assume the authority of captain, where would be the safety of the ship and its passengers? It would be impossible to reach the destination if everybody was Captain. Then after we have found the Captain of the ship of Truth, it is our duty to obey Him, submit to His Wisdom, and be guided by Him into Eternal Life.”

“Before each Manifestation a sign appears in both the material and spiritual heavens. It is the appearance {{p36}} of a literal star and the rise of a man as a Forerunner. The Forerunner announces the Manifestation of the Promised One. Before Moses appeared, a messenger came to the Hebrews, bidding them prepare for His Manifestation. John the Baptist came before the Christ. The Manifestations are greater or less in degree according to the Message they are able to reveal. Muḥammad was preceded by a Forerunner or Announcer. Before the Manifestation of this Day, as it is the full Reality of Revelation, there were two Heralds, Aḥmad and Kázim. It will be a long time before the rise of another Manifestation. The Manifestations are like seas. Some seas, such as the Caspian, are alone and separated from all the others; some, like the Mediterranean, are connected with the great body of the Ocean itself. The Manifestation in Muḥammad was like the Caspian, alone and separate. The Báb and the Blessed Perfection are as the Mediterranean and the Ocean. The Manifestations are as suns in the Heaven of the Divine Will. Sometimes the sun and moon are far apart; for instance, in the middle of month they are 1808 from each other. But in the beginning and end of the lunar month they are only one degree apart. In the Qur'án Muḥammad prophesied that in this Day the Sun and Moon will meet in Heaven; that is, the spiritual Sun and Moon of this Dispensation will rise together in the form of man. We should thank God continually that we live in this Day of a Manifestation of God. This Manifestation ended with the Blessed Perfection. The Cycle of the Sun and Moon is finished. I am nothing but the Servant of God. Some in America are looking for a 'third Christ' or personage. This is only imagination. Some call me {{p37}} Christ. This also is imagination. The Cycle of the Blessed Perfection will last for a long time. The next manifestation will not be so great as this One. When He appears, He will not be an independent One. Do they realize that I make no claim for Myself? I have sacrificed everything — My body, My comfort, My Station, all — to the Blessed Perfection. Bahá'u'lláh is the consummation of all degrees. He is the Revelation of all Truth and Light. Whereas the Revelation of other Prophets had to be spread by the sword, Bahá'u'lláh commanded that we 'must be killed rather than kill.' So He was the consummation of all degrees of Revelation which preceded Him." {{p38}}

SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT

'Abdu'l-Bahá sent for me. I found Him in a little room opening from the courtyard. He was sitting upon a raised chair, His beautiful face, majestic in repose and strength, turned toward the only window. He greeted me joyfully. Both the daughters were present. He said, "I want you to carry away from 'Akká the joy and peace of the spiritual life." I answered, "It would be impossible for me to be in this atmosphere of Spirit as I have been and not receive wonderful benefit." He continued, "God is like the calm and limitless sea. His Bounty is overflowing and illimitable. In our physical selves we are like the animals; yet in some ways the animals are even higher than men — they are more restful and composed — more trustful and reliant upon the Bounty of God — more in the flow of His Will. The birds of Mount Carmel are His creatures. They can fly to the highest branches of the trees and build their nests. From the treetops the bird can enjoy the beautiful view of sea and mountain by its power of sight. All this beauty exists for us as well. The Love of God, the Beauty of God is everywhere and exists for man if he will but rise to spiritual heights, open his spiritual vision, and behold it. Is the king free as the bird is free to fly upward? The king's head is often heavy with anxiety and the things of this world which hold him down. The true pleasure and happiness depend upon the spiritual perception and enjoyment. {{p39}} The powers of mind are the bounties of God given to man to lead him toward spiritual happiness. The highest grace in man is to love God. Love of God, Knowledge of God is the greatest, the only real happiness, because it is Nearness to God. This is the Kingdom of God. To love God is to know Him. To know Him is to enter His Kingdom and be near Him. This is what I desire for you — that you may walk in this path."

I answered, "Now that you have shown me the way, I wish to walk in this heavenly path." He said, "You are near to God, and day by day you will progress by the knowledge of God toward spiritual joy. Then you will be a source of guidance to others. In you they will now behold another person; in fact, everybody will witness the change in your life. You must develop spiritual love in yourself and in them. Physical love is very different from spiritual love. To awaken spiritual love in others is to attain peace and joy for yourself."

I said, "I wish to teach this Message of Light and Truth, but I feel that my efforts are small and unimportant." He answered, "The mountain is large, but it has no intelligence. The diamond is small, but it is filled with light. The elephant produces no melody; the nightingale's song is like the music of Heaven. I will pray that you may become the recipient of the Bounties of God. You will be filled with power because the Spirit will speak through you. You must not bring unhappiness to others. In the future sacrifice yourself more and more in the Cause of God. Then the Love of God will grow and grow in your heart." I told Him my regret in leaving the Household where {{p40}} everything is in such peace and harmony. He said, "You are always here in spirit; you will never be absent now."

I asked, "What shall I say to those who state that they are satisfied with Christianity and do not need this present Manifestation?" He answered, "Let them alone. What would they do if a former king had reigned and a new king was now seated upon the throne? They must acknowledge the new king, or they are not true subjects of the Kingdom. Last year there was a springtime. Can a man say, 'I do not need a new springtime this year — the old springtime is enough for me'? No! the new spring must come to fill the earth with beauty and brightness. The sun rose this morning. Shall we say to the sun, 'Go away! We do not need you this morning; you were here yesterday'? If we strive to upbuild this Cause with faith and love in our hearts, it will overpower all the science, philosophy, and metaphysics of this Day. I Myself am surprised at the wonderful things that are happening. The Word of God shows such power and penetration that all will be surprised and astonished at Its advance."

I said, "I will pray to be assisted and strengthened." He replied, "God will help you in this." Then He continued, "Do everything in your power to help the poor and needy. Serve God in this way. The poor are the trust of God. Give the Message to every listening soul. Give them whatever they can take of it. In Persia there was a man who could not read or write, yet he was the cause of guidance to many great men in this Truth by his pure love of God. If you will turn to God, He will turn to you and assist you. He {{p41}} will make you eloquent. He will make you irresistible by His Wisdom. The tongue speaks from the heart, and if you are sincere, God will speak for you. Help and assist others to see this Truth as you do. Be their guide and helper. This Message is vital to young and old. In it the young must make more progress and bring forth more fruit than the old, just as young and vigorous trees yield the most fruit to the gardener. Christ said, 'Ye shall know the tree by its fruits,' meaning whether the fruits be good or bad, much or little. Those who are born of the Spirit have all the Divine qualities of growth. Without these qualities they are nothing but mere men and women; they are not spiritually alive; they are without the power of growth. Christ said they were ‘dead.’ Let all your thoughts be upon this so that the believers and others will know that you have the Spiritual Spring within your soul and have attained a newness of life. This is complete happiness, the only Peace. After awhile you will realize that you have been in the Presence of the Blessed Perfection. You are always in the Presence of God. Open the windows of your soul so His Presence may be within you.”

“Souls differ in their capacity to receive and manifest the Light of the Spirit. The Blessed Perfection said, ‘There are as many ways to God as the breaths of His Human creatures.’ Each soul must develop according to its individual capacity. Peter differed from John, Paul from Barnabas, yet all of them were filled with the Light of the Spirit of Christ. Therefore, it follows that as each soul has its own possibility of development, it is necessary for each soul to stand alone before God. No one can stand for you in the Presence {{p42}} of God in the ‘Last Day.’ As the soul grows, its capacity increases. Capacity is the measure of development. Love is the evidence of capacity. When we love humanity as God loves us, we have reached the perfect station. Eternal Life is then ours, and this mortal world can give us nothing more. Do good each day, if only by speaking a kind word. Knowledge of God is attained through Desire and Patience. We must knock at the Door of Truth and seek God with earnestness. Ignorance is as much our natural condition as Knowledge is our condition of Development. A good conscience is the divinity within us that needs to be awakened and which shapes our eternal destiny. All souls come into this world through the Bounty of God and have equal right of Development. The soul is affected by its hereditary qualities, but no matter what its condition, it never loses the possibility of being quickened by the Fire of the Spirit of God. One brain may work quicker than another; one soul may acquire intelligence easier than another; but the power and presence of the Spirit does not depend upon mental capacity. The disciples of Christ were humble fishermen, while the learned Pharisees failed to see Him. The soul or mental intelligence awakes in the mother’s womb. Spirit enters when the conscience is quickened and the soul awakes to eternal Realities. Jesus said, ‘The true worship is to worship God in Spirit and in Truth; for such worshipers as these the Spirit seeketh.’ Therefore, as all souls have capacity for enkindlement by the Spirit and as we may all be assisted by Its Divine Power, we must will to receive it.”

“Some behold in a seed only a hard black substance, {{p43}} while others see in it the life principle, a tree, leaves, and fruit. The true believer in Bahá’u’lláh brings forth leaves and fruit, proving that the life principle within him has been awakened and quickened. People are not sure of this being the Reality and complete Truth. It is bound to be true if we see spiritual growth in souls from the Blessed Perfection’s planting. Christ spake the parable of ‘the seed.’ The seed contained the Truth. Some of the seed was wasted He said — and some that grew up was choked by human teachings. For instance, by associating with people who do not believe in God the growth of the Spirit is stopped. When we find believers in this condition, we should strive to get them into different surroundings and under better influences. They need a physician. The most needy are the ones to help first. The ‘poor are always with us,’ Christ said, meaning those who are without the Teachings of the Word. They are our charge and responsibility. During the Greek-Turkish war the condition of the Turkish soldiers was frightful. The people appointed, a Commission to raise money for their relief. Many contributed for a while, but finally nobody but Myself gave to help them. The soldiers complained that they were receiving less and less assistance. The Governor replied to them that all they were getting came from the hand of ‘Abbás Effendi and that all other donations had ceased. The soldiers showed no gratitude for what they were receiving but on the contrary complained bitterly against their benefactors. Just so we cry out to God, ‘have mercy upon us,’ when God is the only Giver of Bounty to us. War is a grievous calamity. It begins and ends in disaster. {{p44}} A mother has a beautiful boy filled with every grace and promise. He develops into manhood, goes to war, and in an instant all his possibilities and usefulness are cut off.” {{p45}}

RETURN OF THE SPIRIT

“In the Book of Íqán we can read the Word of God concerning the true Reincarnation, which is the Return of the Spiritual Qualities in the Servants of God. In the Gospel it is written that they asked John the Baptist if he was Elijah and that he answered plainly, ‘I am not.’ Elijah appeared long before Jesus. When the Christ came, He was veiled in a cloud from the eyes of the Jews. A voice came out of the cloud saying, ‘This is my Beloved Son.’ Clouds and darkness gradually obscure all the former Manifestations. Although they are promised and expected, they are refused during their earthly life on account of the spiritual blindness of the people. Elijah came but was not recognized in John. It was not the person or entity of Elijah but his perfection and qualities which John embodied. The flowers of last year will come again this year. We can say they have returned not the actual substance of the former flowers, but their color, perfume, and perfection have returned. Some are awaiting the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven. He has already come in the heart if you believe, while those who do not believe in the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh cannot see Him on account of clouds and veils. Many people are going out of the churches dissatisfied with religious teaching. It is because they do not see spiritually.” {{p46}}

SPIRITUAL RELATIONSHIP

At dinner a violent rainstorm swept in from the sea.

“May we all live in the Sea of Reality and be filled with the Love of God. Thank God we are in the Ark of the Covenant. See what great blessings God has showered upon us. How many people of Persia looked upon the Blessed Perfection, yet they do not know as you know. You have reached this station, while they are deprived. There are two kinds of relationship — Physical and Spiritual. The highest and greatest is the Spiritual. The physical is of no importance. It is very good to possess both in each other.”

“God be praised! At this table we are joined in Spiritual Relationship. We are all of one family because we are under the Shadow of the Blessed Perfection. Look at the earth. Of itself it is worthless, yet it can reflect the light and heat of the sun. Clouds gather, the rains descend, and the earth becomes fruitful. In the same way the Spirit of God gives life to the soul of man, and the Breeze of God awakens the soul from its sleep. Peter was only a catcher of fishes, yet his attainment was very great. Ananias, the High Priest, was much greater in the eyes of the world, yet he was deprived while Peter received the Bounty of God.”

“Spiritual Relationship is the true Family-hood of God’s children. The Báb had many relatives. He particularly wished that His mother should believe in this {{p47}} Revelation and attain. Christ said that His mother Mary was not of His Relationship, also that those were His brothers and sisters who were in the Kingdom of God.” {{p48}}

OBEDIENCE

“Today we will speak about Obedience! The Manifestation of God is a perfect example of real obedience. Like Him, we must sacrifice everything; every plan, every longing and ideal must be given up completely to the Will of God. We must look to God for all we desire, all we attain. The Will of God must outwork Its Purposes in us. Our human will must be laid down in sacrifice and love. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has given everything in sacrifice and obedience to the Will of God. I am only His Servant, nothing more. All our soul-powers, our outward self, our inward self must be consecrated to God in service and sacrifice. Even life must be given if necessary. If we have not reached this station of nothingness, we have not attained to real obedience to the Will of God. A pupil must submit entirely to the will of the teacher. This is true Sacrifice — true Obedience.”

“Real obedience and real sacrifice are identical — absolute readiness to follow and perform whatever you are called upon to do in the Cause of God. When you really love God, you will be willing to sacrifice everything and submit yourself entirely to His Will. Consecrate yourself wholly to Him. His Will is everything, His service paramount. If they were to burn Me, kill or torture Me — no matter what affliction may descend upon Me, I shall welcome it as one welcomes pleasure. These are precious moments in ‘Akká, so precious we wish they might never end. How is the Bahá’í Faith {{p49}} progressing in America? After you return, the believers will be in a much stronger and better condition. But this cannot be unless they see and know the Will and Desire of God. I have no wish but His Will. His Will is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. If each human creature had his own will and way, spiritual development would be impossible. The soldiers in an army are under the will and control of one commander; therefore, they are united and can press on to victory. If each soldier carried out his own inclination and desire, there would be just that many different intentions and nothing would be accomplished. One thousand soldiers under the control of a commander can overthrow and defeat any number of disorganized troops. Without a directing will all would be conquered and defeated. Be sure, therefore, that if the believers are not united in the Will of God they will not be assisted. This is especially necessary because all of them are under the Tent of the Covenant in this Revelation. There is strength only in unity. Under one Tent there is union and harmony. The Covenant of God in this Day of Manifestation is a Lifeboat, an Ark of Salvation. All true followers of the Blessed Perfection are sheltered and protected in this Ark. Whoever leaves it, trusting in his own will and strength, will drown and be destroyed. For the Blessed Perfection left no possibility for discord, disagreement, and dissension. The Covenant is like the sea, and the believers are as the fishes in the sea. If a fish leaves the water, it cannot live. There is nothing to equal, nothing so effective as the Covenant of God to bring about and continue Unity. Christ said to Peter, 'Thou art the rock upon which I will build My church.' Therefore, all the disciples followed Peter, {{p50}} and there was no dissension among them. The Blessed Perfection wrote a Testament or Covenant with His Own Pen so that no one who obeys it will deny or disobey God. This point is expressed very clearly in the Covenant He revealed. Therefore, there can be no possibility, no position of disobedience. He knew that Muḥammad-ʿAlí would disobey the Covenant. By violating the Covenant he has become a fallen branch. The Covenant was also written by Muḥammad-ʿAlí's own hand from dictation of the Blessed Perfection who knew he would disobey. What cause of union could be greater than the Covenant God has revealed through His Manifestation Bahá'u'lláh? Many of those who followed Muḥammad-ʿAlí are coming back. After the departure of Bahá'u'lláh all the beautiful blossoms upon the Tree of Life were destroyed by Muḥammad-ʿAlí and must now be grown again by the Love of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The work and mission of 'Abdu'l-Bahá are very great. No one could express the grief which followed the turning away from the Covenant by Muḥammad-ʿAlí. We should be thankful that the Blessed Perfection, foreseeing this action, ordained a Center of the Covenant through which, by allegiance and love, we may protect and preserve the Revelation of God."

At the time Muḥammad-ʿAlí denied the Covenant and occasioned so much grief and suffering, the perfect calmness and spiritual strength of the Holy Leaf were most remarkable. The Blessed Perfection devotedly loved 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and when He appeared, {{p51}} His expression would change from gravity to one of great happiness and joy. Before His Ascension, the Blessed Perfection, realizing the trouble Muḥammad-ʿAlí would bring about, would say, "Bechaveh Áqá!" ("O to be pitied Master!") [^ ] [^ ] Becheveh may be Bicharih, which means poor.

WOMAN IN THE BAHÁ'Í REVELATION

"Why are women so favored in this Revelation?"

“Women in Persia were treated badly in former times by the Muḥammadans. When speaking evil of a man, they would say, ‘He is just like a woman.’ When they wished to lower a man’s pride, they would say, ‘He is a woman, not a man.’ In this Day see what great firmness and strength women are showing for God. The way to spiritual attainment in this Dispensation will be made more and more easy for women, for they are more devoted and zealous in this Cause than men. How many women are higher than men in moral and spiritual development! How much more eloquent in the Cause of God! Women are held in great honor in this Day. In Persia a handsome youth of twenty, son of a believer, was despised and oppressed for announcing his belief in this Revelation. He was imprisoned. His oppressors offered to release him provided he would deny his faith. He still remained steadfast, saying, ‘I will give my life willingly for my belief.’ He came from a very well-known and respected family. His mother was asked to speak with him, his persecutors thinking her influence might induce him to recant and save his life. She told them her words would have no effect upon him except to increase his faith. Then she was told he would be killed. The Governor sent him word that if he would renounce his faith his life would be spared. Still he remained fixed and steadfast. His friends pleaded with him, begging him for their sakes {{p53}} to change. Then his mother stood up beside him and kissed him, saying, ‘Do not be shaken! Do not waver! Be firm! Give your life to God! Say nothing that will deny His Cause! Glorify it by your death! If you deny or waver, you will no longer be my child!’ She stood beside him as he was beheaded, pleading with him to the last that he might not deny the Truth. In this Dispensation the women will progress more rapidly and to a higher station than the men. God will assist them.”

“Qurratu’l-‘Ayn (literally, ‘consolation of the eye’) was one of the greatest and most heroic women of this Truth. She came from a learned family and deeply loved knowledge. If Fatima, daughter of Muḥammad, had been a boy and enjoyed greater opportunities, she would have elevated her family and become a mighty pillar in the temple of Religion. While Qurratu’l-‘Ayn was visiting her cousin’s home, she happened to read a pamphlet explaining the Mission of the Báb. She instantly became a believer. Afterward she was taught by the Báb Himself and received her name ‘Qurratu’l-‘Ayn from Him. Some say she was taught in Baghdád by the command of the Báb. She was independent and absolutely fearless. Upon her return home, her husband refused to recognize her, so she left his house. Her uncle was killed in a Mosque for his Bábí faith, and for a time she was kept prisoner in his house. After being released, she went with a number of believers to a celebration outside the city, in a grove near a deserted village. The Blessed Perfection was present. It was a meeting filled with faith, love, and rejoicing. In speaking to the meeting, she became so inspired she removed the cover from her face. Her {{p54}} mother and some of her relatives were present, and her action produced a great commotion among them. When the news came to the ears of the Muḥammadans, their charges and persecutions against her became violent and bitter. Finally, she was taken away from her friends and put to death. She died a martyr and a heroine. In her impassioned speech she had said, ‘What God has created pure shall I call impure?’ removing her veil as she said it. She spent the night before her execution in prayer. Her last wish was that she might be strangled instead of decapitated. Once at a wedding all present left the bride and gathered around Qurratu’l-‘Ayn; she was so eloquent and sincere. She knew the Blessed Perfection before He declared Himself to be the Manifestation of God. In herself she was a revelation to the women of the world. If this Revelation had produced only one martyr like Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, this would be sufficient proof in the Cause of God.” {{p55}}

MOUNT CARMEL AND SYRIA

“The history of Mount Carmel is holy history. A spiritual atmosphere surrounds this ‘Mountain of God.’ Elijah and Jesus spent part of their precious lives upon it. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá loves Mount Carmel and has often visited it, sometimes staying overnight in caves which overlook the sea, in prayer and communion with God. Syria is the center of the world. The extent and variety of its resources, its wonderful fertility and natural advantages will make its future history extraordinary. Its possibilities of development are unlimited. It is the focus of interest in world history, the site of the Old and New Jerusalem. Mount Carmel will be a Mountain of Knowledge, Peace, and Protection in the future — the vineyard of God. We will not live to see this in the body but will view it spiritually. Mount Carmel will someday be covered with great universities and colleges of learning. Then the poor will enjoy the highest advantages from the establishment here of free institutions of education.”

“This is the Holy Land from whence all the Prophets and Holy Men came. No country in the world has such a bright light of Religion. The Light of God has always shone upon the world from this land, and the Religion of God has had its Source and Revelation here. It is wonderful even in its physical conformation. The Phoenicians came from here. Their great civilizations spread from Syria. Abraham came to {{p56}} this land. Here His Teaching became known. The King of Salem, Melchizedek, came from this land. All the Prophets had their missions here.” {{p57}}

“Soon it will be the time of Spring. Already the signs of the flowers may be seen upon the mountains and in the valleys. When Spring comes, there is a Divine Wisdom in its appearance. God has a special object in renewing the earth with its bounty. For the dead earth is again made to blossom so that the life of plants and flowers may continue and be reproduced. The trees put forth their leaves and are able to bear all kinds of delicious fruits. All the birds and animals, everything with soul-life is rejoiced and rejuvenated in the coming of Spring. If this does not come to pass, it is not Spring; it may be autumn. But it is possible that Spring may come, and yet a tree rooted in bad ground will be deprived of its vivifying powers. Or a fruitless tree may not bear, although the warm sun and vernal shower are descending upon it. So, likewise, an evil soul may derive no benefit, produce no fruit from the Coming of a Manifestation of God. The Divine Springtime which brings forth spiritual flowers in other souls fails to beautify the soul that is evil. In general, however, just as everything is vivified, refreshed, and renewed by the bounty of the literal spring, so every soul receives some degree of illumination and growth from the Manifestation when He comes. He is the Divine Spring which comes after the long winter of death and inaction. The Wisdom of God is seen in His Coming. He adorns the soul of man with new Life, Divine Attributes, and higher Spiritual {{p58}} qualities. By this the soul is enlightened, illumined. That which is dark, gloomy, and forbidding becomes light, hopeful, and productive of new growth. So in the Divine Springtime the blind receive sight, the deaf are made to hear, the dumb speak, the timid become courageous, and the heedless awaken to new realizations. In short, they have become the image of that which God planned them to be and which the Heavenly Books promised shall be the true station of Man. This is the power, purpose, and virtue of the Heavenly Springtime.” {{p59}}

FAITH

The question was asked, “What is real Faith?”

“Faith outwardly means to believe the Message a Manifestation brings to the world and accept the fulfillment in Him of that which the Prophets have announced. But, in reality, Faith embodies three degrees: — To confess with the tongue; to believe in the heart; to give evidence in our actions. These three things are essential in true Faith. The important requirement is the Love of God in the heart. For instance, we say a lamp gives light. In reality, the oil which burns produces the illumination, but the lamp and the chimney are necessary before the light can express itself. The Love of God is the light. The tongue is the chimney or the medium by which that Love finds expression. It also protects the Light. Likewise, the members of the body reflect the inner Light by their actions. So the tongue confesses in speech, and the parts of the body confess in their actions the Love of God within the soul of a true believer. Thus it was that Peter confessed Christ by his tongue and by his actions. When the tongue and actions reflect the Love of God, the real qualities of man are revealed. Christ said, ‘You will know them by their fruits,’ that is, by their deeds. If a believer shows forth divine qualities, we know the true Faith is in his heart. If we do not find evidence of these qualities, if he is selfish or wicked, he has not the true kind of Faith. Faith is mentioned in the Scriptures as the ‘Second Birth’ or ‘Everlasting Life.’ In this {{p60}} day it is the Spirit of God, the real true belief. Many claim to possess the true Faith, but it is rare and when it exists it cannot be destroyed. ‘Many are called but few are chosen.’ Many believe themselves to be courageous, but the battlefield of tests and trials will prove whether they have the real strength to stand firm. In Persia some believers who claimed to have Faith in Bahá’u’lláh fell away when they were tested. On the other hand, some who thought themselves weak, proved to be heroes and martyrs. I pray that you who have journeyed from America to visit the Holy Tomb may become as pure glass through which the Light of God may shine. Be firm! Be strong! We need to be strongly tested in order to prove our Faith to ourselves and to the world. Tests are always surrounding us. They are according to the greatness of the Cause, just as the size of a wave is according to the sea upon which it rises.” {{p61}}

THE SECOND COMING

“What is the Second Coming of Christ in this Dispensation?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “In the Book of the Zend-Avesta the Zoroastrians are awaiting the Coming of two Manifestations. Also, in the Old Testament Scriptures there is the promise of Elijah and Messiah. In the Gospel of the New Testament they are expecting the Father and the Second Coming of Christ. Likewise, in the Qur’án the Muḥammadans have the promise of the Imám Miḥdí and Christ. In brief, all the Holy Scriptures announce the Coming of two Manifestations, and these two Manifestations are the Báb and the Blessed Perfection. If you look into the Bible, it is Elias and Christ; in the Qur’án it is the Miḥdí and Christ. These tidings are the same in all the Holy Books, only expressed in different ways—two successive Manifestations. And all the Universe is promised these two. We must not search for the outer word in Elijah and Christ but look for the Reality. The Blessed Perfection said in His Tablets that once He was Abraham, once Moses, once Jesus, once Muḥammad, and once the Báb. This is explained clearly in the ‘Book of Íqán,’ that is, the meanings and perfection of qualities which were once hidden are now revealed in Bahá’u’lláh. Therefore, we can consider Bahá’u’lláh to be all the Prophets, no matter by what Name He chooses to call Himself; for all their meanings, perfection, and qualities are manifest in {{p62}} Him. Bahá’u’lláh is the center of all their perfections. For instance, in Moses the world received the Revelation of material laws, in Jesus spiritual laws, while in Bahá’u’lláh we have received both material and spiritual laws. The Laws of Moses would cover but few pages, and the Teachings of Jesus could be gathered into a small pamphlet. The Old Testament contains nothing but material laws; no mention is in it of spiritual laws such as we find in the New Testament. In the New Testament there are no material laws except the laws of divorce and of the Sabbath. The New Testament contains no answers to questions of science. But all knowledge has been revealed by the Blessed Perfection in books which if gathered together would make many volumes. He has revealed demonstrations in sciences, and He is the epitome of all previous Revelations.”

“Now Moses said that after Him should come Joshua. The Christ said, addressing Peter, ‘Thou art the Rock, and I will build My temple upon this Rock.’ Jesus spoke this to Peter by word of mouth. The Blessed Perfection did not appoint His successor by statement of tongue, but in the ‘Book of ‘Ahd’ (‘Book of the Covenant’), He wrote it with His own Hand, commanding therein that all the branches and relations should look toward the Center of the Covenant. Also, in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, revealed thirty years before His Ascension, it is mentioned in two places. During these thirty years these commands of the Blessed Perfection were known and clearly understood by all. Again, in a Tablet He refers specifically to this, naming one who would violate His Commands. This Tablet was dictated by the Blessed Perfection {{p63}} and written at His Command by the hand of Muḥammad-‘Alí. Muḥammad-‘Alí has made many copies of it. Therefore, we cannot deny what it says. If it was not so, Muḥammad-‘Alí would be able to deny. When he violated the Covenant, he went out from the shadow of the Blessed Perfection. Bahá’u’lláh also said in this Tablet mentioned, that if for an instant this one should disobey His Commands, he would become a ‘fallen branch.’ He mentioned this expressly for Muḥammad-‘Alí, knowing that he would disobey and deny. He left no possibility for anyone to disobey or misunderstand what He commanded. If it were not so, Muḥammad-‘Alí could do many things that would injure. As it is, he has appropriated many papers and Tablets written by the Blessed Perfection. It is possible for these writings to be altered, as the meanings in Persian are greatly changed by a single dot here and there. Before His Ascension, the Blessed Perfection said to me, ‘I have given You all the papers.’ He put them in two satchels and sent them to Me. After His Ascension, Muḥammad-‘Alí said, ‘You had better give me the two satchels to take care of.’ He took them away and never returned them. He thought the Center of the Covenant would be helpless without these papers. But he did not realize that My strength is the assistance of the Blessed Perfection. If all the world combined against Me, I would still possess this power, and all the world could not take it away from Me. I can fight with this weapon forever and will always be victorious. It is a sword which can never be dulled, a magazine that is always filled.” {{p64}}

VISIT TO THE TOMB

In the afternoon we drove to the Tomb of the Blessed Perfection, passing out through the narrow gateway of the city and following the road toward the Riḍván for a short distance. Then a sharp turn to the left toward the Lebanons took us more inland and away from the sea. It seemed to be a holiday or festival occasion; a great number of people were seen along the roads and highways. Bright colors prevailed in the peasant costumes, natives coming and going in picturesque little groups of twos and threes. Some of the Arab girls were dressed like the boys, hardly to be distinguished one from the other. They wore wide pantaloons of a very bright colored cotton fabric, this costume no doubt being cheaper and requiring less material than the voluminous gowns of the older women. We drove on through a village of mud huts built very low and surrounded by a squalor and filth most unpleasant to foreign eyes and nostrils.

People and animals were living or rather herding under the same roof. Dogs looking like wolves vigilantly guarded these hovels and savagely attacked visitors. Here and there upon the filthy ground we saw groups of men sitting and lying, intent upon games of cards. The women were busily working. Women and donkeys bear the domestic burdens of the East and shoulder the full quota of suffering. Altogether, these Arab villagers were wild, almost desperate looking creatures. Beyond the villages we drove across a beautiful level {{p65}} plain carpeted with red anemones, the Bahi'i flower. Finally, we came to the Bahjí, a very large white mansion in which Bahá'u'lláh lived and from which His Spirit passed into the Supreme Concourse. The room was pointed out to us as we stopped and looked from the outside. We entered the Tomb, which adjoins Bahjí, the "Palace of Joy." Flowers were growing abundantly all around the Sacred Shrine. In the center of the building is a court where orange trees and rare plants were growing. We removed our shoes at the entrance. The passageways surrounding this court were covered with soft and costly Persian rugs. Then we stood at the Tomb itself where the Blessed Perfection sleeps. Lamps and beautiful vases were placed about the room, loving gifts and tokens from Bahá'í believers in all parts of the world. A great slab plain carpeted with red anemones, the Bahá'í flower. Lamps and beautiful vases were placed about the room, loving gifts and tokens from Bahá'í believers in all parts of the world. A great slab in the floor marked the place of burial. Here we knelt and prayed in solemn silence, communing with the great and glorified Spirit which had ascended from earth to the Supreme Horizon. Then we silently withdrew to a small side room at the opposite end of the building where some ladies served tea and related experiences of other pilgrims and believers who had visited the Tomb. Upon the anniversary of the Blessed Perfection's birthday they remain all night at the Tomb, chanting and praying without intermission and standing throughout the ceremonies. During the last few years 'Abdu'l-Bahá has not been able to attend this holy celebration. After receiving flowers from the ladies in attendance we bade them loving good-bye and drove home across the flower-carpeted plain, another spiritual visit accomplished, another priceless spiritual experience fixed in our memories. Ahead of {{p66}} us mounted upon donkeys were a number of elder pilgrims and believers also returning from a visit to the Tomb. As they rode along, they looked like the old Jewish prophets and the Disciples of Jesus. Among them were Haydar-'Alí, Mírzá Asadu'lláh, and eight or nine others of those faithful devoted souls who love God, serve humanity, and follow the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. We entered the city, still silent, still wondering, still communing with the Glorified Spirit which shed Its Light down upon us from the Supreme Concourse. {{p67}}

VISIT TO THE RIḌVÁN

We went to the Riḍván with the holy daughters of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Driving through the city and passing out the gates we saw the barracks where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was once imprisoned. Then along the roadway bordered by fine trees we went until well away from the city and its distressing pictures. The roads now be-came rough, here and there poor-looking houses of the natives. To the right we saw the hill Tel el Fukhar upon which Napoleon I planted his batteries and laid siege to ‘Akká in 1799. Unable to overcome it, he abandoned the siege, saying, “My fortune has been arrested by a grain of sand; were it not for ‘Akká I would have conquered the world.” Finally, we came to the Riḍván, a beautiful garden filled with palm trees and wonderful flowers. The air was redolent of perfume from them. A river, the Na’mayn, runs through the garden in two streams, just as the prophecies foretold, forming an island upon which an arbor is built. High above the arbor tower two great round mulberry trees under the shade of which the Blessed Perfection loved to sit. A fountain was playing in the midst of the garden. This heavenly spot is in the midst of a desert-like barrenness, an oasis indeed amid dry and hostile conditions of nature and humanity — a Paradise upon earth, a garden of God — for here in this beautiful consecrated spot Bahá’u’lláh spent His summers. Some day the Riḍván will be visited by pilgrims from all over the world, just as the Garden of {{p68}} Gethsemane is sacred with the memories of Jesus Christ. No one sits in the Manifestation’s chair under the mulberry trees. These two wonderful trees were leafless when we saw them, for it was January, and they are at their best in June. Everywhere beautiful odd trees were growing — oranges, lemons, and tangerines ripe and waiting to be picked. All kinds of flowers, violets, narcissus, heliotropes, roses, and red anemones greeted the eye. In summer golden pheasants fly about the Riḍván — ducks and waterfowl swim around in the waters which quiver and glisten in the shadows from the arbor of leaves overhead. Abú’l-Qásim, the good old gardener who served the Blessed Perfection during His lifetime, took us into the cottage where that Blessed One rested and slept. Everything there is holy and sacred to His memory, His chair in the same place He left it, and beautiful tributes of love placed about the room. We knelt at the foot of the chair while one of the daughters chanted a prayer. Then an Arab woman with tattoo marks upon her face served tea and mandarins under the single mulberry tree near the cottage. We were indeed upon holy ground. {{p69}}

‘AKKÁ

‘Akká is the home of exiles and prisoners of the Turkish Government. A few merchants and bazaars comprise its present meager commerce, although in former times it was an important market for Syrian products. It is the residence of a governor and various officials. The inhabitants generally are poor and wretched, evidences of poverty and squalor everywhere. Haifa has absorbed the business vitality of ‘Akká. The city looks like a catacomb with the roof lifted up, heavy walls, a labyrinth of passages, narrow streets, and dark alleys leading in every direction. But the spiritual atmosphere which surrounds us here is unmistakable and uplifting. Here in this unholy yet holy place we have been taught that the Peace, Power, and Knowledge of God can only be attained by severance from the things of earth and freedom from the influences of transitory surroundings. ‘Akká is to us a gateway of Heaven. {{p70}}

IN THE HOUSEHOLD

We looked again at the faces of the Blessed Perfection and the Báb in the inner room. In the Blessed Perfection is the composite of all the Power and Love of the universe. The eyes seemed to scrutinize the very depths of my soul. In that Face shines the greatness and majesty of all the Prophets and Heavenly Messengers. It is the Face of a Manifestation of God. Mercy and Love surround it like a halo. Its Beauty encircles the whole world.

The servants of the Household give their services willingly, so they may be near ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. One of them is Sakinih Sulṭán, whose husband was a martyr. It was her husband’s mother who said, “What I have given to God I will not take back,” throwing the head of her decapitated child at her persecutors when they brought her the ghastly trophy. Sakinih Sulṭán and her daughter both serve in the Household in love and devotion. She said to me, “May the Light of God always descend upon you! May your soul be a pure mirror always reflecting God! Pray for me!” She is indeed a glorified soul, a conqueror through Love.

The ladies of the Household showed us how to cook the Persian pilau. They gave us many gifts and presents, everything haloed with words of love. {{p71}}

AFTERNOON BEFORE THE FEAST

‘Abdu’l-Bahá came in to see us unexpectedly. He said, “I wish I might be with you always, but unfortunately other things claim My time and keep Me swab from you. But My heart is filled with love and the thought of you. The important thing is the heart, and that is yours. That heart may be united with heart, Spirit with Spirit — this is the real life, the real existence. All else is earthly and will pass away. But the Love which is of the Spirit will live forever. I wish we might always be together. Tonight there will be a Meeting of the believers here. At the table they will be gathered together from all parts of the world. This is the reason of My happiness, seeing the East and the West joined in the Kingdom of God. May all the believers in the world be so joined until the whole world shall come under one rule and all nations be as one family. This will surely come to pass.” Then turning to Mr. MacNutt, He asked, “What do you say to this?” He answered, “What could I say that would add to an already perfect wisdom!” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá responded, “May we all be perfected in the Wisdom and Light of the Blessed Perfection.” Again to Mr. MacNutt, “Will you speak?” He answered, “It is a blessed privilege to listen. I am usually called upon to speak, but I love to listen.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “May you always listen, always hear, always speak with the power of the Spirit.” {{p72}}

AT THE FEAST

Tonight we met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and a large number of believers from all parts of the East at the Feast, or Supper, under the shadow of the Blessed Perfection. As we entered the large hall, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá greeted us, extending both hands and bidding us, “Welcome! Welcome!” His face aglow with light. Then He helped us to our seats and gave us our napkins. As the believers came in, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá clasped each one in a loving embrace and gave them their places at the table. Then He passed around the table anointing each one with attar of rose, sometimes upon the cheek, again upon the forehead, or over the heart. Some of the believers kissed His hand or touched His garment in loving appreciation. As He walked about, He spoke beautiful spiritual words: “This Meeting is through the Love of the Blessed Perfection.” “In the sensibility of the heart is this realization.” “God is Love!” “May spiritual fragrance refresh thy soul as this perfume refreshes the nostrils.” “The Beloved of God have gathered together to partake of material and spiritual food.” “You are in prison here — My partners in imprisonment — prisoners of love — God be praised!”

The food, pilau, made from Persian rice, was brought in, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá served each one, again speaking heavenly words. “This is the blessed supper of the Lord, for we have gathered under the shadow of {{p73}} the Blessed Perfection.” “We are the lambs of the Blessed Perfection. Jesus said to Peter, ‘Lovest thou Me — feed My lambs.’ Christ said, ‘I am the Living Bread which came down from Heaven; he who eats of this Bread shall live forever.’” “The Heavenly Books prophesy that they shall come from the East and the West to sit down in the Kingdom of God.” “In the last day all the sheep shall be gathered together.” As He passed around the table serving the brethren, He said to Taqí Manshádí, who has a particularly dark face, “Eat plentifully dear brother; you are pale with hunger.” Throughout the supper, which was very simple in its character and appointment, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the Servant of the believers. This was indeed a spiritual feast where Love reigned. The whole atmosphere was Love, Joy, and Peace. Sometimes when American believers are not present at this Feast, their places are left vacant in loving memory. After the rice and oranges, Mírzá Asadu’lláh introduced Mr. MacNutt saying, “He is one of our eloquent American brothers who has great power. God has given him the power to attract souls to the Fountain of Life. His words are like a magnet. In the midst of his work he has come to visit ‘Akká. We have not been brought into this blessed brotherhood of the East and West through miracles, but through the Word of the Manifestation of God Bahá’u’lláh. Through His Word the prophecy of Christ has been fulfilled, that they should come from the East and the West to sit down at the Table of the Lord. Jesus said that the coming of the Son of Man would be as the flash of lightning from the East to the West. All the proofs are confirmed here tonight.”

Mr. MacNutt said, “My spiritual brothers in {{p74}} Al-Abhá! The Persian language always seemed difficult to me until I visited the Holy Household. Now I find it very easy to understand. For the Persian alphabet contains but four letters, and the Persian language has only one word. These letters are ‘m,’ ‘h,’ ‘b,’ and ‘t,’ and the word is ‘Muhabat,’ which means ‘love.’ For ‘Love’ is the sum total of the Persian language as I hear it spoken in ‘Akká. That is why I am able to understand and speak Persian so quickly. The Blessed Perfection in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas recommended that the nations of the earth should adopt one language. This was the outer language of unity. At the same time He revealed the Divine Message of Unity in the inner language of the Spirit. This inner language is understood by His children in the East and the West. When the East and West meet in the Kingdom and commune in this inner language, the putting together of mere words is an easy matter. If men love each other, all the details of unity can be quickly settled upon. Business would become a part of Religion and Commerce would be filled with the Spirit of God if Love reigned in men’s hearts. Religion underlies the laws of nations. If we love each other, the Most Great Peace which Bahá’u’lláh promised will come in all hearts and so spread throughout the world. Love is the foundation of all unity, for God Himself is Love. Races will blend together when the will of man becomes the Will of God. The various religious systems are coming closer together. Bahá’u’lláh stands at the meeting of their ways to God. In Him the Muḥammadans are going forward to meet their promised Imám Míhdí, the Christians to meet Christ, the Jews their Messiah, and so on. When they meet Bahá’u’lláh they meet {{p75}} each other as at the top of a mountain. There they find unity because there they find Him. There is the widest view, the heavenly horizon. No one but a Manifestation of God can unify the religious systems of the world. No law, no war, no power of kings could do this. The Kingdom is a real visible Kingdom, a real Unity. This cannot be attained from books. It comes from the heart. In these Bahá’í faces one can see the image of the Blessed Perfection. He is here. I will take back this picture to the American believers. Their spirits are here with us at this table of Love. The atmosphere is Love. The soul of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is among us; the glorified Spirit of the Blessed Perfection looks down from the Supreme Concourse. Alláh-u-Abhá!”

Mírzá Asadu’lláh said that the rice pudding we had for dessert was the same kind which some Muḥammadans believe Muḥammad ate with God when He visited Heaven. Asadu’lláh recalled the difficulty he experienced in speaking through an interpreter when he visited America. After the speaking was over, a Bahá’í from Persia chanted a Tablet. His voice vibrated throughout the hall like the tones of a clear bell. This was indeed a spiritual feast where Love reigned and Joy predominated.

The next morning we were with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at breakfast. “Greetings!” He said, “How are you?” in English. Then He spoke of the feast, saying, “I have been taught the lesson of servitude and sacrifice in these meetings where the believers come together in spiritual joy and fragrance. My heart is touched with pity as I look upon the discord and lack of unity among men. But when the people of God, the children of the {{p76}} Kingdom, meet together, we find the true peace, the real Unity, and the Love of God manifest." Mrs. MacNutt mentioned the three progressive spiritual steps — Obedience as Christ taught; Resignation as Muhammad taught; and Renunciation as revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "I pray that you all may be assisted to attain these stations in the Cause of God." He continued, "The cause of My happiness is meeting you here and seeing your faces filled with the Light of God. I shall never forget the beautiful meeting last night. You must meet together in this way in America. Be true, loyal servants of God. Arise to serve His Cause. These are divine meetings, and the Bounties which surround the Kingdom of Heaven will descend upon you. The same Spirit of Love and Life which fills the Supreme Concourse will fill your meetings. This is a time of trouble and testing to all the believers." Then one of the daughters chanted a Tablet most beautifully. The chant was rhythmic yet without form in the melody, seeming to follow the words and adapt itself to their expression. {{p77}}

HEAVENLY SUSTENANCE

"God has favored us by bringing us together again at His Table. May His Mercy and Bounty make night as day and make the Day everlasting! For night and day are according to the motions of the earth, but, in relation to the sun, day and night do not exist. To the sun, day is everlasting. If we could ascend to its station in the heavens, there would be no night because there would be no horizon. The earthly things have an existence, though they must perish. All creatures have this same existence; all created things must die. The wise man sees them as perished. But that which belongs to the Divine Kingdom of Heaven is everlasting. The souls of those who are awake and mindful will take heed unto this and turn to the Everlasting Kingdom before it is too late. The outward and perishable is but the sign of the inward and imperishable. How many celebrated people have come and gone since Christ lived! How many kings and princes, famous men, and men considered wonderful for their learning have arisen and passed away! No sign of them remains, no result, therefore no existence. But those humble, meek, and unimportant men who partook of the Cup of Christ's Teachings shine forever in the Spiritual Horizon, although they were looked upon as having no knowledge. That which is of the Divine Kingdom is everlasting; that which belongs to the kingdom of the world will fade away and perish."

"The Word of God is Love. It has gathered us {{p78}} together to partake of material and spiritual food." He then asked if we were "happy." Speaking to the servant of the Household He said, "Why do you bring them food? They do not partake of it." I answered, "We are so filled with Heavenly Food that other food is not necessary." Then He continued, "Many of the people are heedless of this Great Day. We are the blessed ones who Know and are acquainted with its wonderful significances. Why are they sleeping while you have been awakened? You have attained while they are deprived because they will not see. The reason of this is mentioned in the Bible — ‘Many are called, but few are chosen.’ This is from the Bounty of God. His Mercy has descended upon us although we are not worthy.” {{p79}}

FROM BADI‘U‘LLÁH

Badi‘u‘lláh came in during the afternoon. At first he seemed somewhat self-conscious, but in a little while the Power came over him and the Light shone in his face. Then he forgot self and spoke with fervor and eloquence. His theme was “Love and Severance.” He said, “Cut yourself from the perishable things of this world. There is a beautiful Persian story which tells of the love of Majnún and Layli. It is mentioned by Bahá‘u‘lláh in the Tablet of the ‘Seven Valleys.’[1] Majnún was seen searching everywhere for Layli after she had passed into the Spirit world. The lover, although he knew his search was hopeless, continued to seek his beloved even by sifting sand through his fingers, proving his devotion and worship. The story of this love teaches us that there is a deep hidden wisdom in our trials and disappointments, for they prove the quality of our love and devotion to God. Like Majnún, we must seek Him everywhere, we must seek Him continually. ‘While seeking for his beloved one dark night, Majnún was seen and pursued by a patrol. Just as he was about being taken prisoner, Majnún climbed over a high wall and jumped down into a garden, falling at the feet of his beloved Layli, who happened to be searching with a candle for a lost ring. When he found himself in her presence, he forgot his fears, offered a prayer of thanksgiving, and asked God to bless the patrol who had pursued him. So it is in our search for God. At first everything seems difficult. {{p80}} Trials and oppositions beset us on every side. But when we find Him, in our love and confidence, we thank Him for all the difficulties and troubles we pass through. Our faith and peace have been perfected by our search for Him; our enjoyment of His Love is so much greater for the obstacles which have beset us on the way. The Prophets and Messengers of God live their lives through storms of oppression and tempests of hatred and suffering. They are despised and rejected, imprisoned, tortured, and martyred. If they did not love God and know to what a Paradise of Love this road of thorns was leading them, they could not go on to the end. The soul is like gold which must be tried in the fire and in the crucible before it is perfected and purified. In the crucible of His Love, all the base metal, all the alloy is burned away and disappears, leaving only that which is precious and proof against all tests. Outside the soul are innumerable barriers, numberless enemies, and hostile pursuers. By the Mercy of God we have been permitted to surmount these walls, escape from these pursuers, and fall at the feet of our Beloved. Having found Him and His Love, we must be like our Beloved and love one another, even blessing our enemies and those who have persecuted us. All the Light and Love you have received in ‘Akká will illumine and uplift other souls in America if you love them. In our actions we reveal what the tongue cannot speak. This is like putting a candle in a dark place so that the light may reach many eyes and guide many souls. The real light of the soul shines forth to the world in our actions. The most important message for us to deliver to the world is the message of Love. Through love we form companionship, {{p81}} and by uniting in spiritual companionship we attain power. When this magic circle of love, unity, and power is established, our influence widens, and the number of our friends will increase. The reality of Love is to love others better than we love ourselves, to excel one another in service. To do this, all ill feeling must be taken out of the heart. We must remove ill feeling entirely from our dispositions. The Blessed Perfection said in one of His Tablets that if He knew He had been the cause of sadness to any soul during the day, He could not sleep until all that sadness had been taken away by Love. If this love and companionship do not exist, our meeting together in the Cause of God is impossible and fruitless, for without Unity there is no accomplishment. God has said, ‘Because I loved thee, therefore I created thee.’<sup>[2]</sup> The elements have been attracted toward each other, coerced as it were through affinity for each other. Therefore, in their mingling we witness growth and being. The existence of the physical and mental Kingdom is through the cohesion of these atoms, and this makes the Life of the Spiritual Kingdom possible. For the Spirit, although not of these atoms, can only manifest Itself in the mental and physical, and it is by the Life of the Spirit in us that the Eternal Life of God is transmitted to humanity. Why do we Bahá’ís love one another? Because God wishes us to love the creatures of God so that His Purpose may be accomplished in them and in us. Then we are the lover, and humanity is the beloved. Majnún and Layli could not be mated because they belonged to opposite and hostile tribes, just as Romeo and Juliet came from different families which bitterly hated each other. Finally, the {{p82}} love of Majnún grew so strong that he wandered away into the wilderness where a dog crossed his path. Weeping, he stopped and caressed the creature, for it had once belonged to Layli. If the earthly love was so strong in Majnún, how much stronger should our spiritual love be for each other! In everything we must strive to find God. Our love for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá must bring peace, harmony, and goodwill everywhere among ourselves. The foundation of all existence is Love, and the foundation of Love is God. What would there be in this world without love? The Blessed Perfection said, ‘The reason I have suffered all these tribulations is that Love should be established among the friends of God.’ They asked Majnún, ‘Why do you love the earth?’ ‘Because it is dark like Layli,’ he replied. The lover of an earthly beloved is most unhappy and yet most interesting to us simply because he loves. In the ‘Seven Valleys’ the Blessed Perfection shows that some lovers of God must slowly traverse all seven stages of the road toward the Eternal Beloved, while others attain in one bound, in one step. Love is the true self of the soul, for God Himself is Love.’<sup>[3]</sup>

“The sign of a true lover is that his heart must be in perfect accord with his actions, or rather that his actions must speak the secrets of his heart. Events show that Muḥammad-‘Alí has followed his own will and not the Will of the Blessed Perfection. A true seeker must seek for the Reality. May the Power of God grow so strong within you that the world will become aflame with your words and all the people be enkindled with the Fire of the Love of God. What the Blessed Perfection has desired and announced will surely come to pass. When Love is established in human {{p83}} hearts, war will cease and swords be made into plow-shares. Then will Peace reign over all nations and kingdoms.”

Question asked Badí‘u’lláh: “Was there communication between the Báb and Bahá‘u’lláh?” He answered, “Before the Báb was martyred, He directed that a large box of books and writings be sent to Bahá‘u’lláh. This was less than a year before His death. At the age of twenty-five He declared Himself to be the ‘Door’ or ‘Gate’ to ‘He Whom God will make manifest.’ He announced Himself to be the Mediator between this Promised One and the people of the world. It is said that for a short time They were together, but this statement is without authority. I never heard Bahá‘u’lláh say that He had seen the Báb. It is not historically established that They met, but the sending of the box is a fact of history. There were many writings of the Báb in this box; treatises upon the Qur’án, etc.; also a paper entitled ‘Conjugations in the Name of Abhá’ in which Bahá‘u’lláh is mentioned cabalistically and otherwise three hundred and sixty times. The purpose of this was to announce the ‘Hidden One,’ the ‘Manifest One,’ to the people and prepare them for His Appearance. ‘Bahá’ means ‘Glorious Light’ or ‘Effulgent Splendor.’ The Báb knew this was to be His Name when He appeared. He also knew and announced the year of the Manifestation of Bahá‘u’lláh, who first declared Himself near Baghdád. Thereupon the Name Bahá‘u’lláh descended upon Him.” {{p84}}

FROM THE MOTHER OF THE HOUSEHOLD

She said, “I regret indeed that I cannot speak your language. You also feel your need of Persian. Persian is most important in this Day as it is the language of the Word. We will understand each other perfectly in the spiritual world. A tradition of Muḥammad says, ‘Blessed is the one who sleeps one night in ‘Akká.’ He also said, ‘They who rest in ‘Akká shall be honored even though they know it not.’ Again, ‘Blessed is the one who has seen the One who is in ‘Akká.’ The eyes of the Muḥammadans in ‘Akká are spiritually closed.”

Then she read to us in Persian from the Tablet of “Ishraqát.”<sup>[4]</sup> She continued, “The House of Justice will be established. Men will watch over this House day and night. The people will come to it for protection. They must obey its laws and be attentive to its commands. It will be the Sun of Wisdom, which will distribute Light to the politics of the whole world. The people of wealth, honor, and power must turn to Religion as the evident Light and firm fortress of humanity. Our duty is to be kind to everybody and avoid wrongdoing. The Light of the world is Religion; without it we live in darkness. The Blessed Perfection commanded all the people of the world to establish Peace. The kings of the world must unite. They are the dawning-places and rising-places of the Will of God. To assist them we must strive to obey the Laws of God. The Wisdom of God is revealed in two Lights, the ‘Sun’ and the ‘Moon,’ just as in the material world. {{p85}} One, the ‘Moon’ is the consolation or the mercy to the world. The other, the ‘Sun,’ is the foundation upon which the world must build. What shall be our reward and punishment? — we ask. The victorious armies of God are made up of good deeds and actions. These are the soldiers of His Army. The Commander of the Army is Righteousness and Guidance toward God the True Helper. The King must know his subjects and reward or punish them according to their merits, so those who are dishonest servants may not receive what the good are rightly entitled to. So it is with those who come to ‘Akká.’

[^4] See Bahá’u’lláh, Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh, pp. 99-134. — Ed.

“When the Blessed Perfection was six years of age, He had a vision. He saw Himself fall into the sea. In the water His long hair became shining like the sun and spread out around Him like a golden net. All the fishes, large and small, came swimming toward Him, holding to the strands of His hair. The fishes came closer and closer, following Him as He swam through the waters, which were shining like the sun. The fishes were countless in number. When He awoke, He told His vision to His father who was an important man of Persia. His father consulted a wise man named ‘Abdu’l-Karim who interpreted visions for the kings. ‘Abdu’l-Karim said, ‘Your son will be a great man. The water is Knowledge, and the fishes swimming about Him are the people of all nations who will come to be taught by His Wisdom. He will be forced away and separated from earthly things and will reflect the Light of the Word of God.’”

“Give the Message whenever you are called, even if it be in China. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has often prayed that His conditions might become more severe in order that {{p86}} His strength to meet them might be increased. This blessing has always followed His prayer. In prayer we must seek for strength to meet conditions.”

“The garment with which God will clothe you when you teach will be an armor of protection against all assault. The teachers in this Cause will be as planets in the heavens, illuminating the great world of the West. Teaching is the crown of action. This was the Crown Jesus bestowed upon His disciples. The Blessed Perfection said, ‘When the Sun of My Beauty has set, be not disturbed nor troubled, for I will see you from the Highest Horizon and help those who arise in My Cause.’”

“All existence is in conformity with Divine Law. This Law is and must be universal. It is a natural order and there can be no deviation in its action. Man must conform to Divine Law. That which is at variance with the Truth and Reality of God cannot stand against the action of Divine Will or Law. The Law of God which punishes and destroys is at the same time Eternal Life to those who obey It.”

“It is necessary for the soul to prove the Message and reach a station of belief through its own power of judgment. Few can see at once. When the soul is firm and steadfast in its Faith, it instantly reflects the Light. Are many firm in America? Even the greatest are sometimes weak, Peter for instance.”

“The Báb was a supremely holy soul. He went to school at the age of six. His teacher confessed that he could not teach Him — saying, ‘He knows more than I do.’ This same teacher was one of the Báb’s most devoted followers and was afterward martyred.” {{p87}}

TALKS FROM MÍRZÁ ASADU’LLÁH

“Persian is the language of the Word because Bahá’u’lláh revealed Himself in it. God be praised that you have come to ‘Akká! Mr. M. is a teacher. It is well that he has come to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. As a pupil he should come to learn how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá teaches. This Revelation is like beautiful writing which the teacher sets forth as an example for the devoted pupils to copy. It is from God. All who teach must come to learn in order that they may give forth Truth to others. Christ’s Teachings came forth after His Ascension. He was the example. By washing the feet of His disciples, He taught them the lesson of Servitude and Love. He set forth His qualities, and they followed Him. Every day of your stay in ‘Akká will be as a year. This will be evident to you after you have returned to America.” Here Asadu’lláh remained silent, not speaking for a long time. Then we asked him to talk. He said, “It is not difficult for me to talk; that is my work. Why is it so? Because I look upon the universe for my knowledge, whereas the teachings of science and philosophy are from books, and books are faulty. The whole world is my book. Therefore, it is no trouble for me to talk, for I simply speak of what I see in this great volume. It would tire my eyes to read the books of science, weary my brain to repeat and remember all they say. When I read the Book of the Universe, I read the essence of all books. All the prophets of God read this Book and were taught in this a {{p88}} way. Those who love true knowledge know in this manner. When a Prophet appeared bringing a new Message of Truth, He was considered crazy. The Prophets are able to speak from different standpoints because their knowledge is from God and not from books. Where are the books of men? They perish and are destroyed. The Book of God is everlasting, imperishable. Messages from God are as points of beginning. They are Sources of Light and Knowledge.”

“In the Persian alphabet you will find points or dots which change and form the letters. These letters form words, the words make sentences, and the sentences express thoughts. For instance, beginning with the letter ‘Alif’ or ‘A’; then ‘Alif Bay’ or ‘Ab’; and so on by addition of other letters and words until the meaning is conveyed. In the first point, in Alif, the meaning was hidden, waiting to be revealed. This meaning was not opened until the book and its sentences were formed with Alif as a source or first point. So it is with the seed and flower. The flower is in the seed and comes from it at maturity. Thus words gather together, make a chapter, and the chapters form a book. The Prophets from the Point of Oneness with God composed a Holy Book. The world is a book. It proceeds from the Point of Oneness. The Báb said, ‘I am the point of the Book of the World.’”

“All things are good if we see aright. A flower is beautiful; we desire to smell it and possess it. When we see something ugly, we wish to get away from it. Once we possess something good, it is always beautiful. Therefore, Truth and Righteousness are forever beautiful. The Prophets came into the world as living {{p89}} examples so the people might acquire their good qualities and perfections. The Ridván is not in its full beauty at this season of the year; but when its flowers are in bloom, when you breathe their many and varied fragrances which fill the air in summer, when you look upon their lovely, glorious faces — you are made happy — all your senses are delighted. Your nostrils are saluted by the heavenly odors, your eyes are greeted by matchless colors, you taste delicious fruits, you hear the sweet song of the birds. All this beauty is for your benefit, intended to make you happy. Then why not praise God for the beauty of the garden in which everything praises God! But if you go to another place which does not contain these beauties, you wish to hurry away immediately, for instance, a swamp infested with gnats and mosquitoes. This is only natural. Thus it is with the people of God who show forth the Beauty and Graces of God in their attitude toward humanity. We long to be with them. We love the beauty of their good qualities. They refresh our spiritual senses. We are filled with their beauty. They are the flowers and fruits in the Garden of Abhá, Ridván of the Blessed Perfection.”

“Now I will tell you something about an orange. It will encourage you as a teacher in this Truth. For each one you teach will be the means of leading twenty others into the same pure Light. Out of one seed, by planting, you may produce one thousand oranges, the outcome increasing in greater and greater proportion. So it is with the Word of God. A teacher drops a seed. The one he teaches another, and in the end the outcome of your planting will be one thousand {{p90}} believers. If this increase is certain in the vegetable kingdom, how much higher and greater the result in the kingdom of men!”

“Just as the description of ‘Akká by one who has lived here is different from your own impressions as you drive through these streets and actually see for yourself, so it is with the real disciples of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Without knowing the question asked Him, I gather from what He says the attitude of the seeker. His words cover every phase of a question. A perfect discourse must meet and fill everybody’s requirements. To teach aright one must wander through the wilderness of human ideas as I have done. Then you will learn the secret of teaching by meeting all sorts of people and discussing and answering every kind of question. No one loves to teach more than I do with my own tongue. But the Truth and Reality of Interpretation must be given according to the form of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Teaching. The one desire of a teacher should be to reflect the Truth as a mirror. On the face of the listener, the teacher should see what is needed and desired so that he may give forth that which will confirm, strengthen, and develop the one taught. That is to say, there is a key of knowledge which will unlock any door and enable us to enter with the Message of Truth. This may sound difficult, but it is easy to prove if you possess it. You must lead the seeker into the right road, then progress is straight ahead. In Chicago I taught many ladies. I will now give you a beautiful lesson, for you are a comparatively new believer, a new child in the Kingdom of Al-Abhá. Human hearts are like mirrors, and their Light is the Knowledge of God. If the Light should be dim, the mirror cannot reflect the Knowledge of God. But the Light of God is never dim. We can always depend upon its standard purity and power. Depend upon the Light, and it will always increase in power and illumination to you. The great need is to keep the mirror polished and clean and its face always turned toward the Light. When the mirror is pure, you will have perfect knowledge, full power, and true Light. The more Faith one has in the heart, the more the mirror is kept turned toward God and the more fixed the soul becomes upon God. The greater the firmness, the greater the understanding. Then the greater the Peace, and so on. If you do not grow after you see the Light shining from your words, it is your own neglect and failure. The Spirit of man is the cradle of the Lord. In it there comes the new birth, the new being which is to live forever. If you teach but a few souls, you have attained to spiritual greatness. From each one you will gain a hundred spiritual children. You are in the Kingdom. Gratitude and love will guide them to you. You will be like a lamp. The souls you have illumined have been lighted from your flame. You will be the focus of the rays, the center from which they come. Christ taught Peter. Peter planted the seed, and a thousand souls arose in the Kingdom of Christ. The Blessed Perfection would teach one soul, and from that one a multitude would be raised up. When the heart is pure, it will be guided and directed in the Truth, and power to teach will be given to you."

"Sometimes in America I had no one to translate for me. To speak in the language of Love we must have an instrument through which that Love may manifest itself. Love lives in the heart, even if one tries to hide it and is unwilling to speak it forth. Love in the heart becomes evident and speaks in our actions. For instance, suppose I have a strong desire to perform some action. Can I do it without the hand to carry out my desire? It is through actions that qualities and attributes express themselves. The rose is revealed through its color, perfume, and outer beauty. Knowledge is our greatest possession, but we cannot give it to others without speech or writing. If we do not express it in this way, it remains hidden and unrevealed. Take for instance a quality like mercy or generosity. If we do not use the tongue and bring forth these attributes, they are hidden, concealed. Therefore, all the human and divine qualities become visible through the powers God has given to man and through the Powers God Himself possesses. The tongue, the eyes, the ears are necessary to perfect man and enable him to express Reality. God created man with the intention that man should perfect his powers. If we did not possess these qualities and the powers to express them, we could not reflect the Work of God. God has said through His Manifestation, 'I have created man, and through man My likeness is revealed.' Man can, therefore, attain a very high station by reflecting the attributes of God. This power of expression is the Spirit."

"Independence is man's greatest gift. The knowledge of good and evil makes us responsible. Otherwise, we would be as the angels who are messengers of Divine Purpose. So it came to pass that man was made of the dust and from the earth he should appear and be developed into a high station. This is reflected everywhere in creation. The eyes, ears, all the body of man evidence this high purpose." {{p93}}

"A child's knowledge does not depend upon the size of a child but upon the capacity of its mind. A mountain is very large, but it does possess understanding. A bird is small by comparison, yet it has life and the power of flight which the mountain has not. Do not look at your own inability and shortcomings when you wish to teach this Truth. Look at the Power and Bounty of God, which are limitless. When man looks at himself, the view is hopeless because he sees no ability and capacity in himself alone. But when he looks at the Bounty of God, he is encouraged, strengthened, and feels that nothing is too great for his accomplishment. The birds which fly above Mount Carmel can reach the upper regions of the atmosphere, inhale the breezes of life, and view the beauty which the creatures below cannot enjoy. These are the relative positions of the Manifestations of God and humanity. All the fields of the earth with their grains and seeds are for the sustenance of the bird, wherein he gains his food without sowing or planting. These things are provided by God. In the same way man has reasonable sustenance and pleasure, for God's Bounties of Love are in man. God wishes that man should enjoy these Bounties, but while doing so, fly into the upper regions of the Spirit. There is one Standard, One Who is perfect, One, the Manifestation of God. He is infallible; others are not. Absolute obedience to Him is necessary. The Judgment of God is in His Manifestation. The soul must be as a perfect reed so that the Breath of the Spirit may blow through it pure and free. Truth is like a lake of pure, living water. Our thirst for it should be conscious of nothing but that water. The greatness of a {{p94}} man depends upon his soul development, upon his drinking from the Waters of Truth. The Manifestation, the Blessed Perfection is a lake. He is Truth."

"The earth said to the sea, 'I am more excellent than you!' The sea replied, 'In what respect art thou more excellent?' The earth answered, 'Because the Blessed Perfection lived and walked upon me!' Who can understand this? None but those in whom the Eye of the Spirit is opened. In a Tablet, Bahá'u'lláh says that He understood the language of the waves, trees, birds, and all living things. How much happier are we who understand the Blessed Perfection than those who do not. He knew the Secrets of all living things, looked within their mysteries and perfections. In the Day of the Resurrection all of the prophets speak, and this is the language of the Spirit. Only those who are awakened by the Divine Trumpet can hear and understand. To those who are not awakened there is no Resurrection. When we go to sleep, we close our windows and relapse into unconsciousness. The morning brings a new day. We awaken, return to consciousness, and open our windows. Then the light and illumination enter. When a man is really asleep and his soul inactive, we may say the tenant of the house is not occupying the house and that the soul is not living there. But an active soul is awake and occupying its house. The Universe is a vast House, and He Who lives in it is God. Before the Appearance of the Blessed Perfection it was as if the Owner of the Universe was asleep. When Bahá'u'lláh came, He opened the windows of the Universal Spirit; a New Day dawned, and Light poured down upon us from Heaven. All things reflected this New Light of the {{p95}} Morning. Arts, Sciences, and all human intelligence were filled with new illumination. The power of the Sun produced new Life everywhere. The earth thus awakened was vivified and filled with new energy. This is the Light which appears in the human lamp at the Time of the Coming of a Manifestation. Progress, development, and civilization must inevitably follow, just as all mankind receives benefit from a new invention or discovery. That is to say all the world is awakened when He awakes. When a man is asleep, They awake with him. Many people of the world have been awakened by the New Daylight, but they do not know from whence it came, nor can they tell you what they are in search of. They simply know that a Light has come and disturbed their slumber. So they are filled with uncertainty and unhappiness while seeking. When they meet the Light of the New Day of God, it is like a man having thoughts and hearing statements he does not understand the meaning of. You from America have been awakened by the New Day; you have heard the Call of God. You are alive and the Spirit vibrates within you. To give you a more homely illustration: When dinner is served, all in the house will gather in one room to partake of and enjoy the food. A bell is rung to summon us. The Voice of Bahá'u'lláh is a Bell in the center of the Universe, sounding the Divine Call to the Heavenly Table where the Feast is spread. Knowledge of these things is like collecting precious stones. After you have secured them, do not throw them away but preserve them in your Heavenly Crown."

"Do the Manifestations retain their individuality in the next world?" {{p96}}

"Man is composed of three elemental conditions — the physical, the mental or rational, and the spiritual or potential. The physical begins and ends here, the mental or rational begins here, and in our true development it has no ending. The Spiritual or potential depends upon our will to know God. When we become quickened with the Knowledge of the Will of God, we can say we have always existed and will never cease to exist because His Will is from everlasting to everlasting. These three conditions of man are from the Bounty of God and His Gift. All Life is from the Word, which is from the Manifestation of His Will. Spirit is born and unifies with Spirit by the power of the Word. Spirit is the perfected man and is eternal. The Manifestations are Spirit. Christ is in Moses. All the Manifestations have their own mental identity; but all are one in the Spiritual. Therefore, as the mental in man's true development has no ending, and as the Spiritual which is the Will of God is eternal, the Identity of the Manifestations must continue in the Supreme Horizon. They exist in their own stations forever and eternal."

“The Blessed Perfection may be likened to a Lamp which illuminates the Universe. For instance, suppose three people are in a room, each seeking an answer to a different question. Although these questions involve different points, the Light of the Blessed Perfection will illumine all of them and reveal the answers. So from Him we enjoy the fruit which ripens and grows because the rain has come down upon the earth. Therefore, we see by the Light which shines from the Mirror of the Blessed Perfection. He reflects the Light to the soul, and the soul forthwith has vision. Through Him also we grow to understand each other and to know what is in the minds around us. All souls have some oil which will produce illumination. All souls will bear fruit. We must strive to understand them and recognize what they possess. By studying the Word of God and teaching it, we will develop this power of penetrating other souls. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá does not ask questions. Each one of us in His presence may have a different thought or idea upon the subject He is explaining, but before He finishes, all our ideas will be met, all our questions answered. When a soul displays evil qualities, we are depressed, disappointed, and wish to turn away immediately. On the other hand, we seek to associate with one who manifests good qualities. The Coming of the Blessed Perfection was to teach us to absorb His Knowledge and show forth His Bounty, in order that we may be joined together in Unity and Love by becoming like Him. His Word is Unity. His Perfection is Oneness. This is our goal. This is our standard of perfect attainment. The Blessed Perfection revealed a Tablet in which it is said, ‘A wicked man asked, “What is Paradise?” We answered, “Paradise is where I live; Hell is where you abide amid disease and horror.”’ The effect of a Manifestation is to drive out all that is evil in the soul and replace the natural growth of virtues, just as Jesus went about casting out devils. An evil soul is like a stony field in which the seeds of beautiful flowers have been planted but no growth has followed. God created man perfect in powers and possibilities. Therefore, by reflecting the good qualities of God the soul will witness this heavenly growth in itself and find rest and peace in the Knowledge of His Will concerning us. A good man manifests the qualities of Heaven, a bad man those of Hell. Heaven is upon the earth because these good qualities are witnessed here and now in our lives, Heaven is not above us, overhead. The condition of perfect happiness is found when we are beside ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. There you are in Heaven. When the heart is pure you cannot help being happy. A good soul is like a beautiful rose. Not only do you enjoy its beauty but inhale its fragrance and are delighted with every good quality it manifests.”

“In each Word of God there are many meanings, many interpretations. These interpretations vary according to the spiritual vision of the teacher. The interpretation of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is always the greatest and most complete. Why? Because His Knowledge has descended from the Invisible Source of Knowledge, and the Holy Spirit is speaking through Him. Therefore, He has all the meanings. When a teacher wishes to explain the Word of God, he does not confine himself to one kind of demonstration but uses many according to the capacity of the listener. The interpretation of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is always the true form and the best example to follow. He often gives us a spiritual meaning and then follows with a material one showing the harmony which exists in the application of the Truth of God. For instance, we go into a factory. One goes this way, and another that way among the machinery, and when we come out we have various explanations and viewpoints to describe what we have seen. Again for instance, in the seed, there are many potentialities hidden, and we may speak of whichever one we please. The rain and sunshine produce many beautiful colors and fragrances in the {{p99}} flowers. So the Teachings of God and the Love of God produce spiritual flowers of all kinds within us according to our potentialities. The eye sees the rose; the nose smells its fragrance. There are many ways of sensing the same object. Similarly, we can spiritually enjoy the beauty and fragrance of the heavenly growth in our own souls and in the souls of others. The senses act in harmony, all wishing to express to us in their own way and language the beauty of the rose. Everything has speech; everything has a language of eloquence and expression. I come into your room. You greet me by word and look. I read the same greeting in this vase of flowers upon your table. My ears listen to the greeting, my eyes witness it, my nose inhales it. The tongue explains. The real speaker is the tongue. For when I enter the room, I have something beautiful to tell you — something the ears never listened to before. Man is the real tongue of the universe, intended by the Creator to express God and set forth His Beauty and Love. The Blessed Perfection embodied all the language of existence. All the Knowledge was poured into that one Cup from which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá drank. The Prophets of God had veiled this Knowledge, sealed the Wine of Inner Significances. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá drained this Cup. We must drink from His Teachings. The Blessed Perfection said that the ocean spoke in its own language, saying, ‘O God! O God! My Beloved!’ The Blessed Perfection understood the language of the ocean. He heard heaven and earth telling the Glory of God. To know as He knew we must understand this Language of the Spirit. The Prophets, knowing it, were able to speak to all people in their own language, no matter if Jews, Muḥammadans, or Christians.” {{p100}}

Mírzá Asadu’lláh came to see us again in the afternoon. We mentioned the red anemone which carpets the mountains and fields of Palestine at this season of the year. He said, “Little by little the flowers will be coming. The red anemone, called ‘Shaḡayiq’ and pronounced ‘Shaḡa-yeq’ by the Persians, is the forerunner of spring. The Lebanon east of ‘Akká, where the Blessed Perfection frequently walked, are covered with these beautiful, crimson-hearted flowers.”

“The more you see of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the more you will realize the inexhaustible fountain of Knowledge within Him. He is the ‘Bazaar’ of God, where everything humanity needs may be found without money and without price. In Him there is always something new to learn and possess, always some new thought in His words and explanations. What you receive from Him is measured by your capacity. The possessions of God are limitless, whereas man’s possessions are limited even though they be vast and many in number. So man must always fall back upon human treasures which are old and mostly worn out. Creation never repeats itself. Truth is one, yet its expressions are innumerable; and no two things are alike in the Kingdom of God. The Prophets are representations or Manifestations of Truth. Truth is fixed, unalterable, whereas everything human is changing and unstable. From death to life and from life to death, man comes, man goes, never fixed, never permanent. Human life is a point in a circle. If you whirl a burning stick around, it makes a circle of fire. Man is a point in the circle of life. He always comes back to the starting point in a process which is perpetual. Every day {{p101}} he is born anew; every day he dies. The past never returns. The future comes toward us inevitably. Childhood cannot continue; youth cannot be ours again. The Law of Time is inexorable. With God there is but One Reality. There is but One Primal Truth. Teachings may differ, but the meaning remains fixed, everlasting. The Prophets renew the Word of God, which has been defiled by human interpretation. God has a new splendor every day. We see evidence of this in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá No one can understand the real Essence of Truth. When we look at a rose, we can understand its form and color but cannot penetrate the Essence of Truth which lies back of its creation. Who can surround and know God? This is a proof that the Prophets cannot be known in their fullness and completeness, for they come to express God to us. How can a human mind encircle God and His Knowledge? When we look into a mirror, we see only a part or representation of the Reality Itself. The Blessed Perfection has often said in His Tablets that no matter how high the mind may soar it cannot comprehend God. That which is in a lower station cannot understand the station above it. For instance, the vegetable kingdom cannot comprehend the station of the animal; the animal cannot know man; and so on. Man progresses perpetually toward the Kingdom of Spirit, which is God and which is everlasting. Therefore, as the human mind cannot encircle a Kingdom which is everlasting, we cannot completely know the Prophets who appear from that Kingdom. They have infinite Knowledge, for like the tides of the sea there is limitless volume and force back of them. {{p102}} Therefore, we recognize the Manifestations by their perfections and Divine qualities, but we cannot know them unless we rise to their Station.”

“All human accomplishment is mortal; the Divine Will alone is immortal. Man is composed of a mortal body and an indestructible Spirit. Good qualities are Divine perfections reflected in man. The Prophets came to this world to show us the way to Immortality. Good qualities evidence their light; bad qualities are as darkness. When man feels the Divine Spark within him, these godly graces appear as light in his actions. God is eternal. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Teachings aim to develop these heavenly qualities in us so that we may become eternal and immortal. The soil of the soul must be made ready for the seed and its development; then the fruit appears. As the seed increases tenfold, so both good and bad qualities bring forth a corresponding increase. The Reality of Spirit cannot be completely understood. We can simply know It through Its attributes and good qualities.”

“The Prophets each had an individual mode of expression. In the outer language of their teaching we must understand their terminology in order to comprehend their utterance. Moses had His characteristic mode of expression; Jesus spoke in parables; Muḥammad spoke as if God were speaking. The Prophets are like clouds; the Word of God in them is the rain which brings forth fruit from a parched and thirsty world. All the Prophets are alike in essence and meaning, and all of them are the children of the Blessed Perfection.” {{p103}}

THREE STORIES TOLD BY ‘ABDU’L’L-BAHÁ

“The disciples of Jesus, passing along the road and seeing a dead dog, remarked how offensive and disgusting a spectacle it was. Then Christ turning to them said, ‘Yes, but see how white and beautiful are his teeth’ — thus teaching that there is some good in everything.”

“A master had a slave who was completely devoted to him. One day he gave the slave a melon which when cut open looked most ripe and delicious. The slave ate one piece, then another and another with great relish (the day being warm) until nearly the whole melon had disappeared. The master, picking up the last slice, tasted it, and found it exceedingly bitter and unpalatable. ‘Why it is very bitter! Did you not find it so?’ he asked the servant. ‘Yes, my Master,’ the slave replied, ‘it was bitter and unpleasant, but I have tasted so much sweetness from thy hand that one bitter melon was not worth mentioning.’”

“A certain king had a subject who, having by a heroic action rescued the king from a great peril, was raised to a position of honor in the royal court. Here he continued to please the king and finally came to occupy an apartment in the palace close to the imperial chambers. The other courtiers of the king naturally became very jealous and lost no opportunity of carrying tales to the king, seeking to lower his opinion of the fortunate subject. One day they reported to the king that this man was unfaithful and dishonorable, {{p104}} that each night after everything was quiet in the palace, it was his custom to go stealthily to a room in a remote corner of the palace carrying a bundle of stolen valuables, which he hid there. The curiosity of the king was aroused. He watched and found the report true. Thereupon, he summoned his retinue and next evening, when the subject had gone to the room as usual, the king quickly followed, knocked upon the door, and demanded entrance. When the door opened, nothing was seen in the room but a dilapidated bed, some old clothes, and the suspected servant. ‘What does this mean?’ demanded the king. ‘Why do you come here like a thief every night, and what do you bring in the bundle you carry?’ ‘O King!’ replied the subject, ‘thou hast blessed me with every gift and kindness, far more indeed than I can ever deserve. By thee I have been raised from poverty and lowliness to greatness and honor. Knowing this and fearing I may grow negligent and fail to appreciate thy bounty and love, I come here each night to pray God that I shall ever remain grateful to thee for thy goodness, bringing with me my old peasant clothes, which I put on, and then sleep in the humble bed in which I slept when thy love and mercy first lifted me up from my lowly state. Thus am I taught gratitude and appreciation of thy loving kindness.” {{p105}}

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’S LAST WORDS

‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent for me. I went to Him in the little room where He writes. He said, “Be strong! Be firm! You are not leaving Me; it is only your body that is going away. Your spirit will always be here. I shall always see you. There is work for you to do in the West. You must teach your husband the Way to God. Then you will both grow spiritually and be one in His Kingdom. I hope you may come again to ‘Akká and remain with Me a long time. You will always be here in the spirit. Think of this wherever you are, and happiness will come to you.” I held His hand a long time, asking that I might receive Light and Guidance. {{p105}}

(Anointing with rose water)

Now have we, the beloved of God, gathered together to partake of material and spiritual food. As this perfume is to the nostrils, so many spiritual fragrance refresh the soul.

'You are in prison here, my partners in imprisonment, prisoners of love, God be praised'

(Serving the food)

This is a blessed supper of the Lord for we have gathered under the shadow of the Blessed Perfection.

Christ said: "I am the living bread which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever."

This meeting is through the love of the Blessed Perfection. Jesus said, "Lovest thou me, Perfect? Food my lambs"

It is prophesied in the Heavenly Books that so shall they sit down at the Lord's table. From the east and the west so shall they come to sit down in His Kingdom. In the last day, all the sheep shall be gathered together.

In this manner shall ye gather together in America. Then shall the bounties of the Blessed Perfection descend upon you, divine Assistance will be given to you and from your meeting the love of God will be spread to all men.

Strive, strive always that ye may be united. If one single sheep strays away from the fold, do all in your power to bring it back. Kindness and love must be your means of gathering all together.

I had been in Egypt nearly six years when I received Permission from the Master to visit His household for two nights. I was rejoiced and gladly would have gone had it been for an hour only. The steamers are very uncertain in these localities on account of the quarantine, so I started alone on the first one leaving Port Sa'id which sailed by way of Beyrouth.

During the season of the year there are few tourists, and on this occasion the limited number on board disembarked at Jaffa, leaving me the only passenger on the vessel. At first thought this seemed rather dismal, but when I remembered where I was going, and to Whom, I was happy though my sole companion for the night was the German stewardess. She was very kind, and I made use of the little German I knew to good advantage.

The next morning the steamer arrived in the harbour at Beyrouth, and I engaged a Cook's courier to take me ashore and to the Oriental Hotel. My surprise and delight were great, as the carriage stopped at the door, when I saw one of the American pilgrims who had just returned from 'Akká, standing in the doorway. After a warm greeting, he took me inside to surprise the two other friends and the meeting was a happy one.

The Austrian Lloyd steamer had been expected that day, and I had hoped to sail for Haifa, but it was 24 hours behind, so Friday the 26th, of January 1905, I spent a most delightful day with my friends, walking about Beyrouth in the morning, visiting the bazaars and seeing much of the native people. After luncheon we engaged a boat and four Arabs to row us to the Pigeon Grottoes. These are nature's natural caves made by the water in the great rocks, where the pigeons build their nests. The day was perfect – the blue Mediterranean reflected the azure sky above, yet the pure transparency of the water was like emerald green and silver, as we came near and into those caves, with lofty arches the exquisite coloring of the rocks shading from a deep purple to the most delicate shade of green.

We had carriage following, and after landing, climbed the steep cliffs and met the carriage waiting for us at the top of the hill. The drive was delightful. The beautiful fresh air was invigorating, and the tender spring flowers were charming. I saw violets and daisies here and also the first red anemones (spoken of by Bahá'u'lláh).

We visited the American University which commands a wonderful view of the sea, and had a most interesting time. We met the founder and his son who were exceedingly courteous, and they showed us the points of importance. It was impressive to hear hundreds of those Orientals singing the hymn Nearer My God to Thee. I learned that many of our well known Americans are the directors of this great institution, which embraces all departments of learning. The atmosphere of the place is decidedly American, and the effort is indeed like that of an oasis in the desert.

Our little party of four spent the evening together, and the returning travellers talked of their recent Visit to 'Akká, which was delightful. The next morning, Jan. 28th 1905, I learned that my steamer has arrived, sailing for Haifa at three o'clock in the afternoon. My friends were now en route for Jerusalem by way of Jaffa, they decided to go later in the day by Russian steamer. So we seemed to part here, I embarked with a Cook's courier, rowing out to the ship. I was greatly surprised about an hour later to see my friends come aboard the Maria Teresa. They had learned the Russian steamer was uncertain, so they changed their plans suddenly, sailing for Jaffa by way of Haifa. We had beautiful talks before and after dinner, retiring about ten o'clock.

The wind was blowing a gale, and the waves were running high. It was 2:30 in the morning when the steamer arrived in the open sea at Haifa. There is no harbor here, the landing is most difficult, and at times very dangerous. The distance to Haifa is about a half hour row in a small boat.

The steamer arrived in the blackness of the night and the Arabs who had come in the small boats to take the passengers ashore, rushed on board in a wild excited state after their wrestle with the sea. I alone (the only woman) with a Cook's courier, and these insensate creatures went down the side of the ship, into the night, and into the sea – it seemed as the Captain commended me to GOD, for he realized how perilous the night was.

Mr. ____ came on deck to be with me to the last, and he was sorry to see me go down the side of the ship alone, - but even at such moment his keen sense of humor did not desert him. When the Arabs came on board screaming in their excitement like reckless demons, my friend remarked: "Don't be alarmed, he is only telling his friends how much he loves his mother"

But I had no fear and as I jumped into the little boat, itching and tossing in the roaring sea, my first thought was to set the light at 'Akká, which was shining there in the distance.

We had about eight, and as they rowed against the mighty sea, their movements were regulated by song and rhythm (and by this rhythm they rowed evenly together). They sang these wonderful Words, repeating over and over. "There is no GOD but GOD! There is no GOD but GOD! My heart sang with for they were calling upon the Name of GOD for help: your GOD, and my GOD!

What great thoughts are here” But I must continue my pilgrimage, and arrive at ‘Akká as soon as possible.

When the boat came near the beach at Haifa the sea seemed rougher and when the frail bark was on the top of the wave I jumped to the shore amid the shouting and screaming of the Arabs, who were waiting there to assist the landing.

With the Cook’s courier, who was extremely kind and considerate, I drove to the Mt. Carmel Hotel about a mile distant. All the inhabitants of the hotel were invisible. An old man opened the door, and then disappeared. But the courier seemed to know the ways of the hotel, and showed me to my room on an upper story. As I ascended the stairs I wondered how much higher he was going to take me, in the dark with only a match to light the path for our feet. Finally we arrived at the top and found the room. It was bare with no carpet, but had two beds and chair. After I had made a choice of beds, I was settled for the remainder of the night, and the hour moved then four in the morning. No sooner had I become quiet than I heard the gnawing of what seemed like rats, but I consoled myself with the realization that it could not be on until daylight.

At the first peep of dawn I arose, arranged things, taking with me only such as were, necessary, - leaving my trunk at the hotel. Then after breakfast I engaged a high carriage, for I knew there were two rivers to ford during the ten mile drive from Haifa to ‘Akká - I told the driver to drive me to ‘Akká. He said it was a long drive and would require three horses, and that he would have to go to the stable for an extra horse, and food for their dinner. So after this preparation we started for ‘Akká, the White City, which was glistening in the distance.

The drive was along the beach all the way from Haifa. As one looks from Haifa to ‘Akká, it seems like a horseshoe. The wind was still blowing, and the waves of the Mediterranean were rolling high. The sun was shining, the sky was blue, the sea emerald green, with the white caps glittering on one side and on the other stretches of sand, and an occasional palm tree swaying in the stiff breeze.

When we reached the gate of ‘Akká, I told the driver to take me to the house of ‘Abbás Effendi. He drove for a little while in the narrow dirty streets of ‘Akká. They were so narrow that it was impossible to pass the heavy laden camels which we met coming in the opposite direction. There was quite confusion when we encountered it grow of those. They were obliged to back out of the way of the carriage and how the Arabs started when they saw the vehicle with its foreign looking passenger! The oriental environment was so strange that it seemed to me like a dream.

At last we reached the house of the Master. As the carriage stopped, a man in a red fez came forward to meet me, and asked me to follow him- which I did, - in perfect silence. I followed him up the stone steps rough and uneven - they timed very old.

At the top of this long flight of steps, perhaps twenty-five or thirty in number, - is a door which opens into a courtyard that is square in shape, as I remember, and the doors of many of the room open out on this enclosure. It is built about with 4 stone wall of considerable height. If one looks up, he sees the sky – and in order to go from one room to another, it is necessary to pass through this open space. I remember how strange it was at night, going from one room to another, to look up and see the stars overhead The doors of the rooms are light blue color, and are opened by iron latches, If one straight on after entering the courtyard, the large dining hall is reached, which has a stone floor. This is the largest of the many rooms opening out on the court. The furnishings of all are extremely simple and oriental in style.

To return to my story: at the top of the steps I saw familiar face, that of Miss B., who greeted me, and showed me to my room. It was now about eleven o'clock in the morning. I was obliged to arrange my hair, for the wind was so high I was unable to wear my hat during the long drive. I stood by my window looking out on the sea, singing softly to myself:

“I waited for the Lord, He inclined unto me. He heard my complaint. Oh, blest are they that hope and trust in the Lord!”

When luncheon was announced, Miss ____ came for me, and we walked across the courtyard to the small dining room where the Master was standing, waiting for us to appear. Shall I ever forget how He came and took me by the hand! It was not in the ordinary way in which one is greeted when meeting a stranger for the first time - but as though my Host were continuing a friendship which had always existed. He took me by the hand, turned His back to me, and led me to my seat at the table, and not one word was spoken. The Master's two youngest daughters were also at the table, together with Miss ____ and the man with the red fez who met me at the gate.

The Master asked about my trip from Port Sa'íd, and I told Him of the difficult landing the night before in the small boat, but that I had no fear because I knew I was coming to my Lord. He smiled and said “Yes”, - and, told a story of Bahá'u'lláh how one man walked for days to see Him, suffering hardship and fatigue.

After luncheon He walked to little washstand in the corner of the room, and washed His face and hands while all remained standing. Then He went and stood in the doorway, He turned to me and said: “You are fatigued with your long journey. Go and, rest.” Then I saw those Glorious Eyes which He directed upon me for the first time.

I rested in the afternoon. Later Rooha Khánum came to my room, and about four o'clock the Master knocked at my door and came in also. He sat on the divan a few minutes saying very little.

At dinner Sunday, Jan. 29th, in the evening He spoke of tests, and remarked that those in America had not experienced the severe tests of the Orient. He spoke of the parable of the wedding feast, when all the invited guests made an excuse to remain away, - by this the religious leaders of the day were indicated.

Then spoke of the simple ones in comparison, - Peter, for instance. I retired soon for dinner, - not seeing the Master again that night.

Every morning it is the customs of the Household to meet in the large sitting room, where tea is served, and the little children of the family come and chant for the Master while he drinks His tea. At this first meeting, at seven o'clock in the morning, how inexpressibly I was impressed by the absolute poise of the Master; His absolute naturalness; absolute freedom! There was an utter absence of any desire or effort to impress one with His Greatness, - which is majestic in its simplicity. When we consider that He has never been enrolled in any school, has always been an exile and a prisoner, has had no access to books, - that in spite of all this, His knowledge is unbounded! Truly we must marvel! An illustration of this is found in His answer to the musical question I put to Him. I have all my life been interested in music, - have studied in America and in Europe, and when I asked the Master some special questions in regard to this subject, I was amazed in one sense at His familiarity with it.

He has never heard any music such as we are accustomed to, having been a prisoner all His life, and yet His knowledge far exceeds that of people who have had great advantages. This fact not only applies to music, but to all things.

This was my question: "I used to be very critical of people; would judge them if they did not meet with my approval I would dislike them. But when I heard beautiful music all these feelings were forgotten, and the most intense love for the people, for animals, for the whole world filled my heart and being."

I asked for an explanation of this and I give you the answer. The Master spoke one whole luncheon and dinner consecutively on this point, and has given us but a crumb of His great wisdom. I realized how much was denied me by not knowing the Persian language in which He spoke, for he glorious is that eloquent tongue, - and the Words necessarily lose many shades of meaning through translation.

MUSIC.

"Voice is the vibration of the air, and is like the waves of the sea. The voice is produced through the instrumentality of the lips, throat, tooth, tongue, etc. These cause a wave in the air, and this wave reaches the nerve of the ear, which is thereby affected. This is the voice.

All pure things are acceptable. For example, water-pure is acceptable; fresh air is most acceptable. As all pure things are acceptable pleasing, - therefore a pure voice is most acceptable, and causes great enjoyment. There are three kinds of voices. One when the complete instrument is perfect, then the emission of sound is perfect. The second is when the instrument is imperfect, - it affects the voice in such a way that it is far from pleasing. What we have just said refers to the voice itself.

It is natural for the heart and spirit to take pleasure and enjoyment in all things that show forth symmetry, harmony, and perfection. For instance, - a beautiful house, a well designed garden, a symmetrical line, a graceful motion, a well written book, pleasing garments, - in fact all things that bare in themselves grace or beauty are pleasing to the heart and spirit: therefore it is most certain that a voice causes deep pleasure.

What is music? It is a combination of harmonious sounds. What is poetry? It is a symmetrical collection of words. Therefore, they are pleasing through harmony and rhythm. Poetry is much more effective and complete than prose. It stirs more deeply, for it is of a finer composition.

A fine voice when joined to beautiful music causes a great effects for both are desirable and pleasing. All these have in themselves an organization, and are constructed on natural law. Therefore, they corresponded to the order of existence like something which would fit into a mould. A true voice fits into the mould of nature. When it is so, this affects the nerves, and they affect the heart and spirit.

In the world of existence physical things have a connection with spiritual realities. One of these things the voice, which connects itself with the spirit, - and the spirit can be uplifted by this means: for though it is a physical thing, it is one of the material, natural organizations, - therefore, it is effective.

All forms when understood aright gladden the spirit. Melodies are like water. The voice is like a goblet. The pure water in a pure glass is pleasing Therefore, it is acceptable; but even though the water be pure, if it be in a goblet which is not so this receptacle will make it unacceptable. Therefore, faulty voice even though the music be good, is unpleasing.

In short melodies though they are material, are connected with the spiritual - therefore, they produce a great effect. A certain kind of melody makes the spirit happy, another kind makes it sad another excites it to action.

All these feelings can be caused by voice and music, for through the nerves it moves and stirs the spirit. Even over animals, music has an effect. For example When they wish to take a camel over a desert road, they attach to him some bells, or they play upon a flute, and this bound prevents him from realizing the fatigue of the journey; his nerves are affect but he does not have an increase of thought he feels nothing but physical sensation.

-Continuation of the Conversation at Dinner.-

Whatever is in the heart of man melody moves and awakens. If a heart full of good feeling and a pure voice are joined together a great effect is produced. For instance, if there be love in the heart, through melody it will increase until its intensity can scarcely be borne: but if bad thoughts are in the heart, - such as hatred, it will increase and multiply. For instance, the music used in war awakens the desire for bloodshed. The meaning is that melody causes whatever feeling is in the heart to increase.

Some feelings occur accidentally and some have a foundation. For example, some people are naturally kind, but they may be accidentally upset by a wave of anger. But if they hear music, the true nature will reassert itself. Music really awakens the real, natural nature, the individual essence.

With whatever purpose you listen to music, that purpose will be increased. For instance, there will be concert given for the poor and unfortunate, and if you go them thinking of the aim the music will increase your compassion and generosity. This is the reason music is used in war. And so it is with all the things that cause the excitation of the nerves.

But the principal effect is caused by the Word, - and when words are united to beautiful melody, the most exquisite harmony is produced.”

Monday afternoon Rooha and Monever Khánúm came to my room and told me the ladies of the Household would call upon me after sunset. So the Greatest Holy Loaf – the Mater’s sister – and the Holy Mother – the Master’s Holy wife - Rooha and Monever Khanon - the Master’s daughters – came to my room. I gave them presents sent from America and delivered to Rooha Khánúm, many supplications for the Master, from Americans.

Monday night I spent with the ladies in the large sitting room. They asked me to sing for them, and I sang many things. They requested the hymn “Nearer my God to Thee.” While I was in Egypt I learned from one of the Persian believers a Tablet in Arabic, and also learned to chant it. The members of the Household were such pleased when I chanted it for them. This was Monday night, Jan. 29th, 1905 –my second and last night, I thought, in this sacred and spiritual atmosphere, - as the Master had said I could come for two nights.

During my stay the Master was never present in the evening after dinner. The Household consists of the Master, the Greatest Holy Leaf, the Holy Mother, two married daughters their husbands and children – Rooha and Monever – the Master’s two youngest daughters – besides some little children who are orphans and have no one to take care of them – and woman who are widows – their husbands having suffered martyrdom in the Path of GOD. These serve in some capacity in the Household, and the sentiment of love and equality in every member of this Home is a living example for the world. Everything is done in the spirit of love.

These women whose husbands have been martyred who are living under the Master’s roof, are very happy as their beaming faces testify for all their sorrow is forgotten in the Presence of this Great One. Through Him they are learn the reality of life.

It is beautiful to see this Master with the little children and observe His consideration for their childish troubles. One morning His tiny granddaughter, about two years of was talking to the Master in the most serious way, telling Him with expressive gesticulations her difficulty. Something had gone crosswise with her. The Master without a smile listened most attentively. This was a great lesson.

When we consider that the Master has to bear – a man of ordinary strength could not endure it one hour, - yet when a little child games aid confides in Him her trouble hew tender how loving 1e is! How forgetful of self!

Shall I ever forget the Heavenly smile and Love expressed in that Beautiful Face when this tiny maiden was chanting for nu a Tablet! Every now and then slow would forget a word. He would gently chant it for her, while He drank His tea, seated in the corner of the divan or the little children love Him!

Tuesday morning Jan, 31st, tea was served in the large sitting room at seven o'clock. When I entered the room, the Master was sitting in the corner of the divan, and He bade me come and sit beside Him. We sat in silence for some time. How one is at rest in this Presence! I had no desire save to remain with Him always! He spoke this morning on miracles. How wonderful art these explanations and interpretations which banish all imagination and superstition, - so that the Scripture can be understood according to reason! This is what He said:

Miracles

“The Holy Manifestations of GOD are the Source of miracles wad wonderful signs. To them even the impossible things are possible, and from the most I wonderful things appear, - but they have an especial mode of expression. To them miracles are of no importance. They do not mention them. If miracles were proofs, it would be for those present - not for those who are absent. For example you might tell a Zoroastrian that wonderful miracles have been performed by Moses and Christ, but he would not believe you – even idolators say that wonderful things were accomplished by their idols. In India many books are written in which endless miracles are ascribed to the masters. So the Zoroastrian would say, - how can I decide which is true? If I accept one, I must accept all, if they rest on this proof.

If miracles are a proof for those who are present, they are no proof for those who are absent; but if the true inner sight is opened at the time of each Manifestation, everything which appears from them is proof, and no other proof is so important as the Manifestations themselves. For what it is the importance of causing the blind to see, if finally through death they must lose their sight? What is the importance of bringing a dead body to life? Being material it must finally be decomposed? But that which is of importance is to give the sight which is everlasting is to give the life which is immortal.

This material life even at the time of its existence is nothingness. For instance, at the time of Christ, people had this life, but He said: “Let the dead bury their dead.” Those who merely lived the physical life wore to Christ as though they were dead for the real life is the life of the spirit, the life eternal.

Therefore, if it is mentioned in the Holy Books that the dead were raised, - the meaning is that they received life eternal. If the blind were cured, - the meaning is they received inward sight. If the deaf were healed, the meaning is that they found Heavenly bearing. This is explained in the text of the Bible itself, and as Christ quoted the words of Isaiah: "Kars have they and they hear not; eyes have they but they see not..."

The meaning is that the Manifestations are not able to perform miracles – for they are able – but the meaning is that to thou the inward sight, the Heavenly hearing, the Eternal Life - is that which is acceptable: and when it is mentioned in the Holy Books, this is the true meaning.

When the blind are healed, it means spiritual sight, knowledge. They were ignorant and became wise; heedless and became faithful; asleep and became awakened; dark and became light; weirdly and became Heavenly."

Then the Master asked me to speak to Him – and I took this opportunity to mention to Him the names of all those we had asked me to speak of them, or had sent any message. He replied by bidding me go to the Holy Tomb, and while there to pray for all those I had mentioned; and also to sing at the Holy Tomb. So later in the morning, Rooha and Monever Khánum, Miss _____ and myself went to The Tomb, and this experience I shall never forget.

The day was superb and after driving through the narrow streets (which now seemed so wonderfully beautiful to me) we came to the open country. At this time of the year it is the same as our Spring, the 1st or middle of May. The fields were green, carpeted with the red anemones, the yellow buttercup and daisies. The blue Mediterranean and the hills were in the distance. How magnificent was the view! We got out of the carriage and gathered the flowers, - and then proceeded on our way to the Tomb, with the flowers we had plucked.

As we entered this Holy Precinct we took off our shoes.

The silence here was like nothing. I have ever experienced. As we advanced toward the door no one spoke, but we all prayed. I remembered the Master's wish, and sang part of Gounod's Sanctus, "Holy, Holy, Holy!" It was the first thing that came to my mind. It seemed as though I was not singing, but the voice of itself was soaring, and had left my body.

We all came out without speaking a word, the flowers still with us. Then we drove to a hill which Bahá'u'lláh used to frequent, and gathered some more flowers there, - then returned in time, for luncheon.

At luncheon, Tuesday the Master talked of the Holy Manifestations of GOD; and Tuesday night at dinner gave the explanation of the fish and the piece of money. He also told of miracle ascribed to Christ in the Qur'án which is not in the Bible. Christ is written of in other Books besides the Bible. I reproduce below my notes in regard to the Master's words concerning the fish and the clay bird.

The Story of the Fish and the Piece of Money.

Interpretation.

The hook is the teaching; the fish the man who receives it; the money the teaching which is in his mouth.

When the disciples asked a certain teaching of Christ, He bade them go and teach one particular man, who would explain this to them. This they did, and so it come to pass.

The Bounty of GOD is so great that as soon as a man believes, he can receive the true knowledge or wisdom.

The Clay Bird.

In the Qur'án are many things referring to Christ not mentioned in the Gospel. For instance, it is said that Christ took a bit of clay and shaped it into the form of a bird. Then He blew upon it, and it flew away.

The interpretation of this is that the bird symbolizes an earthly man, who received spiritual education through the Christ. The story says: "He blew upon it, and it flew away." This means that the man received the Breath of Life Eternal, and through this enlightenment, soared into the Heaven of Knowledge."

The Master told us a beautiful story written in a Persian book of the Christ and His disciples. They had nothing to eat, but nevertheless Christ possessed a great treasure, buried in the earth. There was a rule in that country that no stranger should be entertained in the village where he stopped, - but Christ went to the house of an old woman, and Christ's Face was so beautiful that she could not refuse His entrance. The old Woman confided in Christ, and told Him of her unhappy son. When Christ met the son, He told him he could help him if he would confide in Him. So the son confessed to the Holy One that he was poor and loved the King's daughter, and he felt there no hope for him in his obscure position. But Christ consoled him. Then He took the buried treasure and gave it to the young man; so he became rich and won the King's daughter. But after he had gained the desire of his heart, he wondered why Christ had given him the treasure instead of keeping it for himself. So he questioned him, and Christ replied: "You are My treasure."

When the young man realized what this meant and that treasure was that of His love, he left the material riches he had acquired, and took from Christ the spiritual and eternal riches which He offered him.

Tuesday afternoon Monever came to my room talked, telling me many things of interest. Nothing had been said of departure. It is the custom to await the Master's Command in regard to coming and going. Tuesday night I spent with the ladies in the large room. The Holy Mother told me of an old prophecy - I have forgotten the name of the book from which she quoted - it says: "Blessed are those who attain to 'Akká, and blessed also are those who see and know who have visited 'Akká."

Wednesday morning in the large room, tea at seven o'clock. After the Master inquired as to my health, - He spoke of the absolute Authority of the Divine Manifestations - who are Kings of Independence.

This morning the Master said Christ spoke the Hebrew language but not the pure language, as it was intermingled with the Chaldean (if I understood aright). Christ spoke but one language.

Wednesday at noon I watched the Master walking in the garden. He walks and holds His Head like a king. Outside the garden gate were many Oriental pilgrims who had come long distances to see Him: sages philosophers and scholars, I was told. Some had long white looks: all wore the red fez. With their flowing robes they made a picture as they stopped and watched the Master, outside the enclosure. He walked about the garden and seemed examining its condition and attending to such things as were necessary, as it was spring and time for planting. As these Orientals stood and watched Him there, what an impressive sight it was! As He went back and forth in the garden their bodies followed every movement, and they were careful to keep their faces always turned toward Him. They stood in the most reverent attitude with their hands folded. Later they gathered closely about the gate to see Him pass out. Of course they have their interviews with Him, at certain hours, as do others. It reminded me much of the pictures I have seen of the wise men of the East who came to worship the infant Christ.

Wednesday afternoon I spent with Rooha Khanoum. The Master was not at dinner tonight. During my eight days stay He was absent from two meals only, but we all missed Him on these occasions, and were disappointed. He knew this so well that often He would come to the table and say: "I am not hungry, but I come to sit with you.

Thursday Feb, 2nd, we had tea as usual in the large sitting room at seven o'clock. The talk from the Master explained St. John 5:43. It was in answer to a question.

"I am come in my Father's name and ye receive me not. If another shall come in His Own Name, Him ye will receive."

The Master said: "These words of Christ were addressed to the Jews and Pharisees. By coming in the name of Father, Christ meant He came with the Divine Attributes and Perfections of GOD, - but still the Jews did not accept Him though they were waiting for the Promised One to come and establish His Kingdom. They did not see that the prophecy was being fulfilled in Christ, because they were waiting for a great victorious material kingdom to be established on earth, and the Messiah was to be one who possessed endless wealth and sovereign earthly power: While Christ came in a contrary manner to this, and the Jews would only obey and accept according to their desire and the will of man. Therefore when men like Caiaphas came in their own name, full of worldly power and qualities, they were accepted by the Jews as leaders of the people. Christ explained their unbelief, their rejection, when He said: "How can you be a believer when you are looking to others who are imperfect, and thereby reject the everlasting honor which GOD can give."

At luncheon Thursday, Feb. 2nd, the Master gave the interpretation, in answer to the question as to the meaning of the passage in St. John, 2:1-11; "Jesus saith unto her, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come.'"

"For everything there is a special time. There is a special time to plant the seed; there is a special time for its growth; a special time to gather the harvest; a special time for the threshing. When the seed is first planted, you cannot expect to gather the harvest immediately. A baby is first nourished by milk, - gradually he is fed on other food. Mary desired that Christ would reveal Himself to those present, but He said 'the hour is not yet come.'

"The water in this sense bears the meaning of words, for it is the cause of life, in its literal and spiritual interpretation. Therefore Mary desired He would speak to them something that would exhilarate their spirits, like wine for the body."

At luncheon the Master had with Him a bunch of hyacinths and violets which He left on the table, and I took them. When the master inhales the odor of flowers it is wonderful to see Him. It seems as though the perfume of the hyacinths were telling Him something As He buries His Face in the flowers. It is like the effort of the ear to hear a beautiful harmony - a concentrated attention! How He understands the mystery of all these things, - of which we know nothing!

Before dinner, Thursday Feb. 2nd, I talked with Monever Khanoun. The Master asked me tonight at dinner if I was happy, because He permitted me to remain over ray stated time, told Him, "You know!" and He smiled and said "Yes." Our talk was "The Words of GOD are like buds."

"The Words of GOD are like Buds."

Each bud when it opens has a particular perfume and color. Christ explained the hidden meaning of the Bible, - the Blessed Perfection, the hidden meaning of the Gospel. When They appeared the reality of these Books became apparent. The Law of the Bible was like a tree, and Christ was the fruit of that tree. Until the fruit appears upon a tree, the tree is unknown. From the fruit wooden judge of the tree. Therefore, the fruit makes clear the reality of the tree. The Christ explained the reality of the tree of the Bible. The Blessed Perfection explained the Reality of the Gospel. The Bible is like a body, and Christ is the spirit, and the spirit gave it life. The Bible is the Word, and Christ is the meaning, - the purpose of the Lord was the Meaning.

In the same way the Gospel to like an exquisite body, and the Blessed Perfection is its spirit. It is the Word, and the Blessed Perfection is its Meaning.

The Bible is like a lamp, with oil and wick, and the Christ is like the Light. The Jews became the lover of the lamp, oil and wick, - but not of the Light, If they had looked for the Light, they would have accepted It in the appearance of Christ."

Friday morning, Feb. 3rd, we had tea as usual in the large room, at seven o'clock. The Master again in the same way if I was happy because He had permitted me to remain over the stated time. I told Him, He knew. He smiled and said, "Yes." He then added that all He did was prompted by great wisdom. He said some see the wisdom, and some do not, - and some of My Wisdom is impossible for any to understand, but all that I say and do has great significance. Every day that you remain here is a year. So I understood that my remaining so long over the time appointed for me to leave had an important meaning.

As I looked from my window on the courtyard below, I saw women seated on the ground with little children about them, while some carried infants in their arms. There were old decrepit men also, and all were in an attitude of expectancy. Presently I heard the Master's Voice in the distance (that clear penetrating voice). Often when I was in my room sitting at my table and writing out the talks I had been privileged to have with Him, I would hear the Master's Voice outside in the distance. It always thrilled me; I listened and was unable to go on with my work until the very last sound of it had died away. Upon this occasion He came nearer so that I could see Him. He spoke words of encouragement and love to everyone as they crowded around Him and gave something to each. Every Friday morning it is His custom to minister to these poor unfortunate and wretched ones. They come to His house to wait for Him on this day, how does the seer give in this way to the poor He is a prisoner and far from wealthy Himself. A circumstance was brought to my mind which explained the matter, and the incident was related by one who had been long a guest in the Master's Household. All that the Master gives is a real sacrifice, and is saved by the cutting off of at most people would consider necessities.

It is the custom of families to have three meals a day, though the Master as a rule eats but one and that a very staple one. Upon the Occasion with was described to me this Holy One said to His family:

"You have had two meals today, and there are many people who have had none so we will do without our supper, and give it to those who have had nothing to eat all day." Thus the supper was given away, and the faces of the family were radiant and happy in making the sacrifice. In fact they did not consider it a sacrifice for their hearts were full of love.

The Master has many gifts sent to Him but He gives them all away. A story is told of a beautiful silver service which was presented to Him, and He did not even look at it. One and another received portions of it until piece by piece it disappeared. A significant incident is that of a wealthy woman who offered him a sum of money before she left 'Akká. At refused to accept it, and as the lady pleaded for the privilege of placing it in His Hands, He said at length: "I never accept anything for myself but if you wish you may bestow it upon poor man (mentioning his name) for the education of his son." So the money was used for this purpose.

The Master slept on the stone floor with only a rug and a matting between His body and its cold hard surface, and no cover except His cloak. One of the American was grieved to see Him so deprived of comfort, and gave Him a bed and mattress. Soon afterward it was discovered to be gone, and when questioned about it, the Master replied: "How could I sleep in luxury when so many have nothing!"

His asceticism is always that of love; and His principles are indicated by the following extract from a Tablet recently received by an American believer:

"... Man while in this life should endeavor to learn of the Throne of GOD to serve the Holy Threshold, to seek knowledge of the other World, to soar to the Realm beyond, to become of the Kingdom heavenly, spiritual illumined: and to attain a temperament like unto the rose in the garden, making fragrance to the world."

In personal appearance the Master is of medium height and slender build. His complexion is rather dark from the American point of view, but He is fair for a Persian. His eyes are bluish grey, and there is a white line within the iris which sometimes seems to radiate light, making His Eyes wonderfully luminous. His countenance is of the type rendered familiar to us by the old Master's paintings of Christ. His Hands are small and delicate, decidedly of the spiritual and artistic sort, but with a grip of steel. Though but sixty years old His hair and beard are white, and His hair falls over His shoulders in Oriental fashion. He is very indifferent as to His appearance – though extremely neat and in warm weather frequently tucks His flowing locks up under His fez in undisguised desire to get them out of the way. His ordinary costume is a tan colored robe of simple material, and a white fez.

He replied: "My Heart is in a continual state of thanksgiving and so often those accustomed to this form say the words with the lips merely, and their hearts are far from being in a state of thanksgiving."

I noticed that when the little children chanted the Holy Tablets in the early morning, the Master sat looking out of the window, as He drank His tea. Now beautiful it was to see this entire absence of form and how pure and brilliant is this great heart!

The following is one of the Master's talk on:

Form and Spirit.

“Religion can be divided into two parts: the first is the spirit which never changes; and the second the laws which are regulated according to the time. The spirit of religion is expressed in the Attributes of GOD, truthfulness, justice, Leroy, humility, sanctity. The laws represent the element which alters: for instance, divorce and the Sabbath of the Jews changed by Christ.

True religion is always one in whatever form it may appear. True religion can be compared to a flower: If you find it in valley, in a garden, in a vase, - it is always a flower. The spirit of religion may be likened to a man, - and the laws and forms to the clothes he wears. These he may change - but it is of little import, for he is always living, though the outer garment be altered.”

In the afternoon Rooha and Monever Khanoum and the older sister with her little daughter together with myself, drove to the garden of Riswan. This also was a beautiful day, and the garden was a delightful place. A stream runs through the garden, and the great tree and seat where Bahá'u'lláh used to sit is on the edge of this stream. There are all kinds of birds and fowl in this garden the peacocks were especially attractive. The varied collection of trees and shrubs was exceedingly charming. Many species of orange trees were there, and date palms. I brought two oranges home with me. They were of a sort that would keep. Many of these plants have been brought from a distance to adorn this garden by those who love Bahá'u'lláh and the Master.

There are flowers of every description, the roses and violets were especially beautiful. There is also a house in the garden where Bahá'u'lláh lived in summer. I saw the room where He was accustomed to sleep and receive His friends. Rooha asked me to sing at the Threshold of the door, and again I sang, “Holy, Holy, Holy! Abide with me! Hark, Hark my Soul! and “Blessed art Thou Who Cameth in the Name of the Lord! Monever went inside and took from a vase there some peacock feathers and gave them to me.

As we sat in the garden the keeper brought us some lettuce just picked from the bed, and with it a dish and some orange juice. We sat there and ate the lettuce, all dipping the leaves into the orange juice in the same dish. I was so much reminded of the days of Christ! I was even living in a recurring period of the sage grandeur, and this simple custom was still in existence in those localities.

After leaving the garden we took a drive, and as we drove once again through the streets of ‘Akká we met the Master walking on the street. The carriage stopped, He said something and then passed on. The Master was not at luncheon today.

When we had tea this morning, Saturday Feb. 4th at seven o'clock, no subject was discussed, - but we sat together with the Master in silence. Later in the morning the Master sent for me to come and sing for Him. I now went into a large room I had not seen before, with a divan running all around the sides. In one corner the Master sat. I sang: “I Waited for the Lord”-Mendelssohn, and “Came unto Him”-Handel. And then He asked me to sing the Arabic chant, which I did.

The Master listened intently while I sang, and when I had finished, He said: "It is beautiful, and you sing with such feeling. The quality of your voice is like the Persian voice."

At luncheon Saturday the Master expressed a desire that I return to New York by way of Paris.

Several scriptural questions I asked the interpretation of "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold"- He said this meant others outside the tribe of Israel: Europe, Asia, etc.

Another text presented was: All those who have gone before me are thieves and robbers."

He said in substance: "This I dictated first of all those who claim falsely to be the Messiah, - but they had no followers. The sheep always listen to the Shepherd's voice,- but it is impossible for another who is not the Shepherd to rather them. True Shepherds can attract and keep their flock together, for the truth is with them. But as to another, even if he gathers the sheep, they will be finally separated, for that which is not established on truth cannot remain. A tree even though it be green must wither if it has no roots. All buildings, if they have not a solid foundation even though they are very high, must finally crumble." Another question was in regard to the leaves. St. John, Chapter 9:

The Master said: "The leaves are five Words with which Christ answered and satisfied the questioning multitude. The fish represents the spiritual meaning of these Words. The basketful that remained in the superabundant teaching gathered from the Words."

A question was asked in regard to the passage in St. John 8th chapter, which describes the episode of the woman taken in sin, whom the Pharisees condemned and Christ forgave. The answer was: "The bending of the head denotes a state of surprise. The Christ was amazed that these people who were sinful themselves should condemn her who had sinned. This attitude showed that He did not accept their condemnation. What He wrote on the ground contained the Words that He pronounced: "He that is without sin let him first cast a stone." Afterward He forgave this woman and she became a believer."

As to St. John 9:6- He said this in regard to the miracle of the blind man, speaking especially of the dust and spittle.

"The spittle coming from Christ was the meaning. The dust was the expression that He used in accordance with their understanding."

Another passage in St. John 18:10, was in regard to ear and the sword. The Master replied; "In the Gospels the Christ said to His disciples, 'He who has no sword let him go and buy one.' This had not a literal meaning. The sword which He meant was the eloquent tongue, - like the one spoken of in Isaiah as the two edged sword. This symbol is used because a sword out and separates and in this some it separates wrong from right. The Christ meant this. Peter did not understand, therefore Christ ordered him to sheathe his swords thereby showing plainly that His reference to the word was a spiritual one”

The Master sent for me again this afternoon, and I spent a long time with Him alone. Monever interpreted for me and I talked to Him of everything in my heart. He said again He desired me to go home by way of Paris. As I sat beside Him on the divan He made for me a cup of tea with His own Hands. He also dictated Tablets for those for whom I requested them and wrote one for me while He talk. Here is the translation of it:

“To the maid-servant of GOD, Mrs. ____ Upon her be Oh servant of GOD! Give thanks to GOD for you have come to the Holy Land, visited the Sacred Threshold associated with Us for a few days, and heard the Divine Admonitions, which are in the Heavenly Books. Now return, behave and act with perfect firmness, according to the Heavenly Teachings, in those regions, in order that you may become the cause by which human perfections will be attained.”

The Tablet I had requested for my friends is as follows:

“HE IS GOD!”

To Mr. _____, Mrs. , Mrs. , upon him, and upon them be Bahá'u'lláh!

Oh united souls! The letter you sent is perused, and by its contents, happiness and joy was produced- for it expressed union and harmony, that all of you have became one in heart one in thought and one in purpose. I hope that this union and harmony may increase day by day and produce good results, so that it may become the cause of fragrance and joy, and the means of happiness in the hearts of friends. Today union and harmony are important things, and have satisfactory effects. If souls be found who will entirely put aside their thoughts, sacrifice their hearts and lives to the Beloved, become free from all blemish, and attain to the capacity of manifesting the Lights of the Sun of Reality, such souls will be lightened like Heavenly candles and bestow upon all the world, of humanity the lights of love, kindness and Heavenly Blessing. Upon him and upon them be greeting and praise. EE”

The Master again spoke of my music, and said: “Now how you will sing when you return!” and also, “Teach singing!”

He called me to come to Him and anointed my head and forehead with attar of rose oil. Then He called Rooha and Monover Khanoum and anointed their heads also I supplicated for many of my loved ones, mentioning their names, and asking for them the same blessing I wished for myself.

Words are very weak thing to express what this Visit with the Master meant to me. One cannot come into this Presence without being changed in every atom of the entity. The Master said that words are incapable of expressing the things of the spirit.

At dinner tonight, He said; "You have had a very beautiful Visit here. You have heard beautiful Teachings and Talks. I hope that these Words will be like seeds in a pure soil,- that they will grow and cause you spiritual development and progress!"

The Master said there are five kinds of love.

1st. The Love of His own perfections Which caused GOD to create that His Beauty might be made manifest and appreciated.

2nd. The love between sanctified souls for the attributes of the Divine which they see reflected in one another.

3rd, GOD'S Love to man individually that is gained according to the measure in which a man turns to GOD.

4th. Man's love for GOD the Creator, This is the cause of his life, progress and happiness.

5th. Is the love of self, which directed to the ego will deprive the man of All true development but if the love of self is a standpoint but from one of inspiration.

The Master gave the following explanation of the passage in St. John 12:7, in which the story of the anointing of the Savior's feet is told:

"Then said Jesus, let her alone; against the day of my burying hath she kept this."

He said in substance: "In olden times when they washed the dead they perfumed the bodies. The kings were sometimes buried in the midst of perfumes and spices. The Christ was to be crucified, and had no need of this embalming; therefore this ointment was put upon Him then by Mary, and she dried it with her hair"

Sunday morning the Master sent for me, I asked Him questions which were purely personal. After luncheon the Master sent for me to go to His room again. This time it was a small room where He slept,- it was the first time I had seen this room. Rooha Monever and the Holy Mother were also there. I rested my head on the Master's knee While He talked.

And now the time had come for me to go, so I took my leave of Him. I left Him sitting in His small room with His face turned toward the window looking out in deep thought. After I had left the room, I turned my head and looked again, and He had not moved,

In the Promised Land

Mary MacNutt

January 3rd 1905

The White Star steamship Republic sailing out of New York harbor for the Mediterranean December 1st 1904 carried nine Bahá'í pilgrims en route for the Holy Land. They were Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, Mr. and Mrs. Percy A. Woodcock, Miss May Woodcock, Ms Eva Woodcock, Mrs. Mary Lucas, Mrs. Julia M. Grundy, Mr. and Mrs. Howard MacNutt.

The voyage was a happy one, the sea calm and weather perfect. In due time all reached Port Sa'íd where Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, seriously ill after his long and devoted labors in America found loving welcome from the Egyptian Bahá'í Friends. The rest of the party proceeded to Haifa in groups according to instructions telegraphed by 'Abdu'l Baba. Three of us, Mrs. Grundy, Mr. and Mrs. MacNutt, accompanied by Miss Barney sailed from Alexandria at midnight December 31st. After a strenuous trip up the Syrian Coast we were resting January 3rd upon the top of Mount Carmel where we had arrived the day before and registered at the Prose House. Our instructions were to await further message from 'Akká. As we sat in the warm brilliant sunshine, looking outward and downward upon the magnificent picture of mountain, sea and sky, a tall handsome man clothed in all-white oriental costume with crimson tarbush came swinging up the rocky pathway at a rapid walk. At once we concluded our messenger had arrived, but without turning his head, he kept straight on, looking neither to right nor left, passed over the summit and started down the path on the other side of the mountain. Something impelled Mr. MacNutt to follow him which he did for half a mile. Suddenly the stranger without changing his pace, put his hand behind his back and Mr. MacNutt saw that he held a letter which he dropped in the road. In a short while we were reading the letter.

It was a message of instructions from us to go to 'Akká next day. In half an hour the messenger came back up the road, his white garments fluttering in the wind, looking neither to the right nor left, passed by and disappeared down the mountain. Then we saw him take a horse from behind a point of rocks, mount and gallop along the shore toward 'Akká.

Next morning we drove over to 'Akká, reaching the great gate of the prison-fortress just before noon. In a short time we were in the Household, surrounded by a number of faithful believers who brought us word that 'Abdu'l-Bahá would be with us immediately. Suddenly all present rose with the exclamation “Mowlana!” “Mowlanah!” and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá entered quickly, saying “Mahv-abah!” “Welcome! The mercy of God is very great. Two years ago I sent for you. For a long time I have yearned to see you. You have come from America, I from Persia, to meet here in unity, and unity is only through love. How are the beloved of God in New York? Are they unified? Are they one in love and harmony? Are they enkindled by the fire of the love of God?” Mr. MacNutt answered “There are more signs of unity and love among us in New York now than there have ever been in the history of our meetings; and this is owing, ore to the good work of our women than to any other cause”. Then turning to Mrs. MacNutt, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said “Are you happy to be in the Promised Land? Go and rest until we are ready to have food”. Altogether we were privileged to remain eighteen days amid the holy scenes and surroundings of Haifa and ‘Akká, ten of which were spent in the Household of the Master. On account of an acute crisis in political conditions, Mr. MacNutt was restricted to two short visits to ‘Akká aggregating five days. When he was sent for the second time, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said “You are moat welcome. I have so longed to see you again that I sent for you to come today. Your visit here is during a time of great political difficulty. Spies are many; espionage is constant; enemies are everywhere. The Governor knows that you have arrived. It will be necessary for you to remain very quiet. Do not go outside the house and do not show yourself upon the roof during the daytime lest you may be seen by those who are watching to make trouble. Your coming to ‘Akká is not so dangerous to yourselves as it is to the Bahá’í Friends who live here. They may suffer the consequences of your coming to ‘Akká after you have gone”. Mr. MacNutt had been brought over from Haifa on this occasion, hidden in the rear of a covered wagon, gowned like an oriental and wearing a tarbush. The notes which follow were taken during our visit to the Household. They reflect the radiance and beauty of the “Light of ‘Akká” according to the capacity and degree of the mirrors upon which it shone. “Yet a little while is the Light with you. While ye have Light, believe in the Light, that ye may be the children of light.

In the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá you partake of food from the heavenly table of his words, every crumb of which is filled with spiritual nourishment. His answers to questions or his happy greetings in the spirit of love are deep, wise and epigrammatic,- the very essence and brevity of Truth, conveying inner meanings and significances which must be thoughtfully considered and treasured. Historically his words are of the very greatest importance, often explaining as they do the events of the Bahá’í Revelation in which he himself has been a central and commanding figure since the day of his birth and the Báb’s declaration day May 23, 1844. Naturally we were anxious that none of these precious crumbs should fall to the ground wasted, and so it happened that in addition to his talks with us upon specific subjects, our notes contain many statements from his lips which we have not classified under separate headings. Our trip to the East naturally centered in the ten days we spent with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in ‘Akká, and it is wonderful how every contingent fact and impression, whether in Europe, Asia, or Africa, by sea or by land, upon mountain, desert or river – everything we saw, everything we did or thought was haloed by the light of that love which shines so brightly out into the world from the walls of the Prison City. Without connection, sequence or classification, we record here the words he spoke to us, then add a few chapters of our own impressions, reflections and experiences during the days of our happy pilgrimage.

MOUNT CARMEL.

We sailed from Alexandria on the little Khedivial steamer Mariout at ten o'clock on the night of December 31st 1904 bound for Jaffa and Haifa. It was the eve of the New Year, fitting symbol of a Bahá'í journey out of the darkness and bondage of the land of Egypt into the light of the New Day and Dispensation; servants of GOD going in to possess the Holy Land of Promise. The night was clear, but a wild gale from the north blew directly into the mouth of the harbor as we fought our way out against it past the light-houses into the open. Beyond the breakwaters the sea grew violent, the little ship pitching and plunging in a hissing cauldron of waves, the stars reeling in their courses overhead and life below decks full of excitement and discomfort. Morning broke upon a wild, savage picture of desolation, the sea gray and furious, lashed and scourged into raging white by the stinging whips of the wind. At noon the tempest suddenly abated, a characteristic of Mediterranean storms, but the sea refused to be comforted and we were rocked in deep cradles of billows all day. After another night of motion and emotion during which the little steamer seemed to have lost her course and to be turning handsprings for exercise, the second morning came and we saw land, the low-lying Syrian coast below Jaffa. Off Jaffa we lay five long hours; – a glistening sun overhead and a great rolling ground-swell coming at us from the open sea with every variety of motion known to those who go down to the sea in ships. These Jaffa "rolls" were our only breakfast. By noon the Captain had decided no landing could be made at Jaffa. We lay more than a mile off shore, but even from that distance could see a fearful surf running its white race-horses along the rocks and black reefs which make the entrance to Jaffa one of the most dangerous in the world. So we raised anchor and roiled away up the coast toward Haifa, twisting and gyrating upon the still heaving bosom of the deep. At three o'clock the grand old head of Carmel came into view, looming up from the low coast like an elephant's back with the head and trunk thrust into the sea. Still reeling and pitching along in futile effort to find a centre of equilibrium, the little Mariout finally crept past the headland of the Mountain of GOD, bringing the white square walls of 'Akká into view across the indented Bay. Beyond 'Akká on the mainland the Lebanons raised their heads into a peaceful blue sky. Further in we crept until Haifa emerged from the base of Carmel and when we had reached a point just between Haifa and 'Akká, cast anchor about a mile and a half from shore and prepared to land in the Arabic language. Great surf boats had come off from Haifa filled with half naked Arab boatmen straining their splendid muscles at immense oars. In a few moments the Mariout from bowsprit to rudder was pandemonium. These bare-footed sons of Ishmael literally swarmed over us, yelling, screaming, gesticulating; a jargon and babel of voices, – as if the one with the strongest lungs was most entitled to employment. None of us after our wild experiences with wind and wave on the Mariout had the physical energy to resist so we were lugged down the long swaying rope ladder like so many bags of grain and carried away shoreward by our vociferous captors. But the sea still had its claims upon us. At first the boatmen steered down into the point of the bay intending to land us through the surf but realizing almost too late that this was hazardous we turned about and fought back with straining oars to the dilapidated wharf at the Custom House where we were dragged by muscular arms from above and pushed by strong shoulders from below up to a rickety terra firma, drenched and soaked by waves which still leaped hungrily after us. Thus we landed at Haifa on the afternoon of January 2nd, by what we afterward termed the “Haifa lift”. The Customs examination of our trunks and bags occupied very little time, after which we drove along the shore front, practically the only street in old Haifa to the foot of Carmel. To ascend the mountain by the most direct road, we passed through the German Colony or modern Haifa, a village or community of devoted German Christians who settled here in 1868 to it the promised Coming of the Lord, the very year in which Bahá'u'lláh was sent to ‘Akká just across the Bay. Over the doorways of some of the thrifty little houses is written “Der Herr Kommt” (The Lord Cometh). The German Colony offers striking contrast to the old city; clean streets well laid out, neat modern villas, shade trees, lawns and flower beds, everything evidencing thrift and industry. The native houses are quite the reverse. The Oriental builds his home hostile and secluded from the eyes of the outside world, walls it up solidly from the street; leaving only a single doorway of entrance and a few narrow close-latticed windows overhead; lavishing his taste upon the court interior which he alone sees and enjoys. The type of European house is just the opposite, a thing of beauty from the outside, open and hospitable, as if welcoming a visitor. This contrast is strikingly sown in the old and new sections of Haifa and perhaps if we had time to make further comparison, the relative characteristics of the Oriental and Occidental would stand forth still more sharply outlined in the way they build their homes and houses.

The road turns at right angle at the German settlement, leads directly through it and climbs the mountain as straight as it can without being a sheer gravity pitch. As we go up, the horses stumble upon loose rocks and there is, plenty of mud from recent heavy rains. We pass the Tomb of the Báb, see the monastery of the Carmelite monks upon the brow of the mountain just overlooking the sea, make a couple of turns at the summit, bringing ‘Akká into clear view golden with sunset glory, and alight at Pross House a small hotel tending in the middle of Carmel’s head. We are the only guests, and the host Hans Schneider a lay preacher in the German Colony gives us most kindly greeting, figuring out in his own language who we are, why we have come up here in January and how much he shall charge. S. terms are very low and his suspicions incline to the belief that we are American friends of ‘Abbás Effendi. The next day was golden with sunlight and balmy with spring-like warmth. How we enjoyed it! And what a difference between the “firm foundation” of Carmel and the tricky deck of Mariout. From first to last our eyes never tired of the view from the mountain-top, one of the most beautiful and wonderful in this world of beauty and wonder. Let us stand here awhile and look around. Imagine that you are standing upon the brow of a gigantic steamer just starting from land, out into the open sea, its brow projecting, so far forward that you seem to be surrounded on all sides by a blue horizon of water. The vast vault of the sky overhead is just as blue, a few filmy clouds floating like flotsam and jetsam upon the bosom of the celestial ocean, the line where blue meets blue impossible to distinguish, no other thing visible, just sea and sky that is all, desolate yet grand, awe-inspiring, sublime) weird and luring in its sublimity. You are nearly a thousand feet above the Mediterranean. From the lofty eyrie you look up and down the coast fully thirty miles each direction, the far away vistas reduced to miniature and nearer views dwarfed into Lilliputian perspective. To the right, stretching away eastward and curving to the north is the shore line of the Bay of ‘Akká flanked by titanic masses of the Lebanon ridges and heads. The sand is golden color and rimmed by the white line of surf as sharply and distinctly as the curving edge of a bowl; the whole shore from Haifa and extending far beyond ‘Akká to the Lebanon and sea horizon forming a horse-shoe. ‘Akká lies upon the distant side of this vast horse-shoe, five miles across from Carmel and twice as far around, fixed four-square upon the golden shore-line as if a gigantic glistening white boulder had come tumbling down from the Lebanon tops, rolled across the plain and poised just upon the brink of its plunge into the sea. Deep in the midst of the Lebanon background of this sea-picture rises the snow-covered head of old Hermon the highest point in Palestine, seeming just behind ‘Akká but in reality fifty miles away; its grand majestic brow dominating all Northern and Central Syria, literally a “mountain in the tops of the mountains”. Back of you and still to the right as you stand upon Carmel’s head stretches an open vista as if carved through mountain obstacles, opening the way inland to Tiberias, Nazareth, Tabor, Esdraelon and Galilee and furnishing a seeming outlet for the waters of Jordan hurrying southward through the heart of the Holy Land to be lost in the salt tomb of the Dead Sea. The words of Bahá’u’lláh come to you as your eye sweeps the picture “Surely the River Jordan hath joined with the Great Sea”; for nowhere in Palestine could Jordan find all outlet to the Mediterranean except through this “Way of the Sea” into the Bay of ‘Akká; and upon the spiritual side of the wonderful Words, nowhere except in the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh that Most Great Sea of Utterance can Christianity find its outlet and apotheosis. There is a Christianity which follows its own narrow discolored course into the Dead Sea and is there lost in the bitter waters of non-accomplishment. There is another, a higher, truer Christianity which pours its current, pure as the waters of Galilee, into that Ocean of the Revelation of the Word of GOD which Christ himself plainly and prophetically promised would appear in these the “latter days”. But we are standing upon Carmel viewing its limitless horizons. The mountains look old as if sleeping away time, their history and warfare accomplished. Carmel itself resembles a great elephant back, the head dipping into the Mediterranean, the back extending about ten miles inland and gradually increasing in elevation until sixteen hundred feet above the sea and plain. Straight inland from us and toward the south west the blue hills of Samaria are seen and still more southward the eye searches for but cannot make out the position of Jerusalem. Directly down the coast to the left as we face the Mediterranean, a succession of ruined cities mostly Crusaders strongholds perch like 'Akká upon the shore line, As there were no harbors on the coast line, these ancient warriors watchful of military advantage built their cities as far out into the sea as the rocky foundation would permit, and ran up their heavy stone walls four-square in the form of fortifications which they could approach from the seaward side without the danger of shore landing. As we look, we see Athlit, Caesarea, Tantura and far down in misty perspective on a perfectly clear day Jaffa, distant sixty miles, where Hiram King of Tyre sent Lebanon cedars for the temple of Solomon. Strange commentary upon the religion of or these Crusaders and their walled forts! 'Akká itself a storm-centre of their fanatical invasions with fire and sword; the name of Christ upon their lips and emblazoned when the banners under which they slew those who were defending with equal valor and fanaticism their belief in the religion of GOD Our Jesus Christ Calm, unmoved amid these long centuries of human violence, oppression and bloodshed Carmel has stood awaiting the "Great Day of COD" when the "Sun of Righteousness would rise with healing in His Wings" and the Message go forth from 'Akká, I come to bring peace, not to lay the sword.

Our point of observation on the mountain head is just over Haifa. As we look seaward and toward the southwest, the white stone monastery of the Carmelite monks is directly in the line of vision. It is built over the cave or den in which, according to tradition Elijah the Tishbite lived; that picturesque solitary figure of Old Testament history; the prophet of GOD so inseparably linked with Carmel during his eventful life and who is announced to appear again as the forerunner when the Lord of Hosts reveals him-self in Carmel, Sharon and Lebanon in the latter days. Near where we are standing is the place from which Elijah invoked the rain upon the parched and of Israel; the "little cloud no bigger than a man's hand". Far behind us on the back of the mountain overlooking the Plain of Esdraelon a small stone chapel marks El Mahrakah the "Place of Burning ", the spot where he called down fire from heaven upon the priests of Baal. Along the base still flows the brook Kishon whose waters ran red with their blood when the prophet slew them.

Nowhere is the view of 'Akká more perfect and complete than from the top of Carmel across the scintillating waters of the sea, shining like a pure glistening white pearl in the mountain atmosphere of the Lebanons. We saw 'Akká from Carmel in all lights; in the soft purple gray of early dawn, in the golden burst of sunrise, in the zenith radiance of high noon, at sunset, golden in the slanting arrows which reflected from the burnished bosom of the sea, in the rose curtains of twilight, and under the silver of the moon. Even at midnight under the glorious procession of heavenly orbs and constellation our dev ted eyes still sought 'Akká when nothing but the red eye of its lighthouse shone seaward into the black darkness.

What sacred memories and heavenly atmospheres surround the head of this old mountain! Here Abraham dwelt and was blessed by Melchizedek King of Salem; Jesus, walked upon Carmel and Muḥammad the Prophet of Arabia followed the footsteps of the Nazarene. Here Bahá'u'lláh walked and prayed. The holy atmosphere of the mountain is impressive beyond description. Nor are Carmel's natural beauties any less impressive and glorious. Standing out alone and solitary in the blue skies, surrounded upon three sides by waters of still deeper blue, the Mountain of Goo is unique and wonderful in its natural beauty. The colors upon its summit are indescribable;- a composite holiness of the past seems woven, blended and mingled in its mosaics; an atmosphere translucent and vitalizing, redolent of vineyards, as if an incense rising from the bosom of earth to the Goo of power and beauty.

But word-pictures are endless, innumerable. A world and wealth of fact, narrative and description come crowding into the mind claim, in expression and utterance. The centuries focus in Carmel history haloes it; spiritual forces surround it, outworking human destiny in the chain of its hallowed associations.

The splendid forests which once covered and crowned the mountain and from which it takes its flume have entirely disappeared. Only a few olives growing here and there in vineyards and gardens adorn the otherwise bare picture. From base to summit the soil is scanty, the rocks and rough ridges peeping through. As you look, the landscape seems covered with a velvety soft mosaic of carpet, but as you go about on foot the conditions are incredibly rough and hostile. Sharp edges of flint and hornblende out your shoe like knives, briars and prickly bushes catch your cloth most tenacious limestone clay clogs under your feet hardening like cement wherever it adheres.

There are no roads, simply donkey paths filled with rocks and stumbling places. Agriculture is practically unknown. Here and there the Arab scratches the soil with a primeval plough hitched to a pair of small wiry bullocks scatters seed with careless hand. What there is of the soil is wonderfully fertile however. Without further care or cultivation he gathers good harvests from his rude tilling. There are no fences or boundary lines. As you look across Carmel' back the untrained eye sees nothing betokening human occupancy or habitation. After awhile growing accustomed to the picture you begin to pick out few little huts built of rocks, and mud so secluded among natural surroundings that you come upon them before you clearly make them out. As you approach threading your way through the rocks and briars, a lot of savage dogs rush out challenging and checking your approach. Long before this you have been seen by watchful eyes of the Arab's family. Although you have not seen them, they have seen you. If your eye is quick you might have detected a scurrying of children and elder females to inner seclusion. If the Arab himself is away, your visit to his hut is profitless; you will probably see nobody but an old crone who bids you begone. If the liege lord is within he will come well out to meet you, the expression of his face as dark, forbidding and non-committal as a Comanche Indian. But the jingle of a little baksheesh transforms him from an ogre to a beneficent genie in a moment. If he is a Muḥammadan he still denies you the inner hospitality of his home and view of his household. If he be a Christian convert; you are now welcome at his door and may drink a cup of coffee which he brews himself in a brazier over a charcoal fire. A little more baksheesh entitles you to a quasi-cordial send off. He has done the best he could. Life to him is a hostile and hard condition. He has but little, he can give but little. You have warmed the simple sensibilities of his heart, helped him by your gift and pittance. As we looked upon him the whole world seemed to be ours and so little of it his; his existence a dull limitation of conditions which we through civilization have been privileged to surmount.

Sometimes these rough ramblings far back upon the mountain are attended with danger. Mr. MacNutt happened on one occasion to approach an Arab but without seeing it, and was confronted by a sinewy son of Ishmael armed with a double barrelled shot gun held toward him at full cock. The morning salutation "Arag said!" and a few copper coins relieved an otherwise embarrassing interview. The atmosphere of Carmel is wonderfully pure and translucent. Distances are deceptive, much greater than they look, a characteristic of all mounti.lin atmospheres. Standing at the edge of the declivity which overlooks Haifa it seems as if you might throw stones down into the streets. The whistle of the little locomotive just outside the city is heard ten seconds after you see the steam, although it does not appear distant. Shepherd boys call to each other from ridge to ridge across the valleys although actually half a mile apart. One day we started to walk down the road to the shore of the sea on the side opposite Haifa. It seemed half a mile or so and we intended to return in an hour in time for dinner. After a long walk the distance appeared undiminished, so we returned without accomplishing it and learned that we were attempting a round trip which measured over five miles.

A deep stillness rests upon the old mountain, a silence pro-found and impressive. Literally there is no noise whatever, neither sound of insect, song of bird nor hum of busy human centers. As you go about you feel that you are alone with GOD and surrounded by vibrant spiritual beings. Sometimes it seems that every human trace has disappeared. Then your eye will detect a moving bit of color in the mosaic of rock, sea and sky. If you have your glass you will see a shepherd slowly following his herd of goats as they scramble amid the rocks,- then another and another appears as if by magic, so completely hidden and blended into the picture have they been. The holy scenes of Christ's life and parables are constantly before you; the shepherd and his flocks, the sower going forth to sow, the vineyard and its laborers, just as he saw them, still true and unchanged as if they, like his Words, would never pass away. At morning we saw the sheep hurrying up the mountain ahead of the shepherd, eager, self-willed to seek the pasture. In the evening we saw them following him home to the fold, content, obedient to his guidance. So in life's morning we go forth in self-will and strength but in the eventide we are content to follow the Shepherd home. How vivid the Christ picture of the sheep and goats; the sheep tractable and Obedient to the shepherd's word; the goats wild and self-willed browsing in impossible places, restless, untamed and a constant anxiety to him as he patiently follows them in their erratic wanderings.

It was January, therefore we did not see Carmel in its spring robe and in the beauty of summertime. Few of the flowers for which it is celebrated had ventured forth. Yet some of them welcomed us. Wherever we walked we found crimson carpets of red anemones spread. This wonderful flower expresses in its outer beauty that inner spiritual loveliness and fragrance which characterize the soul of man when it blooms in the paradise of His Will and blossoms upon the mountain of His Manifestation. It is essentially the Bahá'í flower for it has been utilized by the divinely alert eye of Bahá'u'lláh to symbolize that loveliness and submissiveness which must characterize the true servant of GOD. Botanically it is called the "wind-flower" The Arabs call it Shaqiqat human. Early in the spring, before winter has really departed, it appears upon the mountain slopes of central and north Syria, rearing its little head amid hard, hostile and inclement conditions which other flowers have not the hardihood to face. It grows amid the rocks, finding its foothold in cracks and crevices where ever so little soil has lodged. No blast of the tempest can uproot or destroy it for its happy face is mounted upon a long stem which bends double without breaking and is strong as wire. Its color is blood crimson and its odor permeates the landscape particularly at dawn like the fragrance of a thanksgiving incense to GOD for its life and beauty. Its face follows the sun from dawn to sunset, opening its petals and disclosing its heart at sunrise and closing them in sleep just before twilight. Nor can it be persuaded to open at any other time or by the influence of any other light. Through the night and when the skies are cloudy it remains asleep, seemingly dead, only awakening when the sunlight calls it back to life. What more perfect symbol of a Bahá'í could be found bending, submissive to the hardest blasts of oppression yet impossible to break; growing in most difficult environments and in the wintertime of religious conditions when all other flowers of the Spirit seem dead; coming in the Spring-time of a New Dispensation, called into life by the sunshine and showers of His Word; crimson with the blood of martyrdom; redolent of spiritual fragrance, permeating and perfuming the atmosphere of this early dawning of the Day of GOD; the face turned toward the Light of this Manifestation, refusing to follow, or open the heart to any other Light than the Light of the Sun of Reality in Heaven;- is not the symbolism complete and perfect? So Bahá'u'lláh seeing in the simple beauty of this mountain flower a matchless lesson which would ever refresh, stimulate and admonish the soul of man, said "Discover the truths of the mystery of Love from the red anemones of this New Garden which hath appeared in the open court of Holiness" (Persian Hidden Words 18).

A few miles back from the sea Carmel is almost savage in its rugged wildness. Throughout its entire length great wadys or valleys are scored into its sides like gigantic incisions by some great titan knife. These wadys or cuts extend from the spine of the great elephant back down either side of sea or plain. Through them in heavy storms the water rushes as it does through the canyons of the Western Sierras. Near the sea the sunny slopes of the wadys are planted as vineyards and produce a mellow pure wine. Farther back on the mountain no cultivation or agriculture is attempted and here the scenery in the wadys is surpassingly grand and beautiful, the flint rock gnarled and twisted into fantastic designs and rude geological architecture forming cave grottos and dens where wild animals and serpents make their habitation. Five miles from the Mediterranean, Carmel is literally a howling wilderness minus only the trees. In our ramble we hyenas, foxes, adders and evidences of larger and more dangerous four-footed inhabitants. Wild birds abound, perching upon rocks in lieu of tree-tops. It is usually difficult scramble down through the wadys to earth and sea level, twisting about these erratic water courses like miniature alpine climbing. It seems but half an hour's undertaking but sometime you find the white foaming surf which seemed just below, four or five miles away in reality. Everything is larger and more distant than it appears and after awhile you yourself seem to be the only thing insignificant in the colossal proportions of Carmel and the picture in which it stride so majestically.

Sometimes in our early morning rambles we would meet Syrian girls and women coming down the mountain paths from shepherd huts far back in the interior carrying upon their heads great jars of sour goats' milk called "leben", on their way to Haifa. There they sit along the streets among the bazaars selling it until late in the afternoon. Then you will meet them coming homeward climbing the "short cut" mountain paths with tireless vigor making perhaps a round trip of twelve or fifteen miles between sunrise and sunset, balancing their jars upon their heads with perfect skill, barefoot and walking swiftly among boulders and loose stones which bothered us to scramble over with nothing to carry. Some of these girls are magnificent physical specimens, veritable amazons in poise and figure. They walk majestically, swaying the body with an indescribable rhythm and grace from the hips, the arms free and swinging, the chest and shoulders held rigid and erect supporting the heavy burden on the head and the vivid Oriental colors of their costumes making striking and picturesque effects in the mountain scenery.

No word picture of Carmel would be complete without mention of its weird beauty at dawn. The day comes suddenly. Long before the sun appears, a calm holy radiance begins to steal over the Lebanon summits and the night shadows on Carmel slowly merge into an iridescence of soft grays and purples like an exquisite mosaic. For a lone time this lingers. It seems as if the daylight itself is not coming. Then a great fan-shaped burst of rose-tinted glory mounts to the zenith from the black silhouette edges of Lebanon, the stars of heaven pale and vanish as it comes; Carmel is glowing with dull fire. The red glory fades as quickly as it appeared and a pure radiance reflects from the mountain as if from mirrors of alabaster. Will the day ever come? Suddenly the sun flashes its fiery eye over the summit of Hermon, every shadow vanishes and the day literally "springs" into being Men may come and go but this heavenly panorama goes on forever. The divinely sensitive eye of Bahá'u'lláh awake to its sublimity, viewing the illimitable worlds of Spirit, has likened this matchless effulgence in the phenomenal world to the coming of the Day of GOD and termed the Manifestation himself the “Dayspring of Glory”. Blessed are those who understand.

Often the thought came to us “Why did the Abhá Glory reveal Itself here upon Carmel And in ‘Akká?” The answer is simple and direct, the conclusion irresistible. Here is the very heaven and firmament of the Divine Will; here is the land made holy and illumined by the coming of the same Sun of Reality in former Dispensations; here is the focus of the spiritual vision and belief of humanity; here the hope, promise and expectation of the Day of GOD; Be could have come in no other place. The Dayspring of Illumination must arise upon ‘Akká; the glory of Lebanon, the excellency of Carmel, the beauty of Sharon must witness the coming of the Lord.

And often at midnight as we looked out from the summit of Carmel, the constellations of heaven overhead, the earth wrapped in blackness of night beneath us, nothing but the watchful eye of the lighthouse out upon the sea-wall of ‘Akká to meet our straining vision, – often we thought – there indeed is the Light of the World, shining, glowing in the darkness, a beacon of warning and guidance to the world, streaming out into the dimness and obscurity of religious belief; and into the radiance of that Light all the illumination of this world must be polarized. And this shall verily come to pass.

One more, our last picture. We have come down from the top of Carmel, taken our final drive through the narrow muddy streets of Haifa and gone aboard the steamer in the Arab surf boats ready to start homeward. The sun is setting; its glowing face goes down, down, lower, lower until from our anchorage out in the middle of the horse-shoe Bay we see it finally sink and disappear behind the Mountain of GOD. As the daylight fades, the sea turns into molten metal iridescent with fire, and shadows fall like azure robes upon the land pictures. We stand silent, spell-bound upon deck looking toward Haifa. Behind us ‘Akká pure white and glistening is still bathed in the sun’s last arrows. The colors deepen, the light is going out. Then from the high blue heavens overhead descend curtains of fire upon Carmel, great palls of flame which envelop its grand old head with auroral magnificence. Someone speaks “Elijah is again calling down fire from heaven upon the priests of Ba-al.

It was nearly midnight before the little steamer weighed anchor and sailed out of the Bay. The sun had long since gone but in the east the full moon had arisen bathing earth, sea and sky in chaste reflections of silver, no color, just pure white radiance. On the top of Carmel, ghostly and gray we saw the Carmelite monastery where the monks are still awaiting through the night, the coming of the Day of GOD. 80 we swept on out into the Mediterranean, around Carmel, the only moving thing in this still, silent, holy, radiant picture. And the eye of the Light upon the sea wall of ‘Akká followed us as we turned our course into the west.

TOMB OF THE BÁB.

A little more than half way up the eastern side of Mount Carmel, terraced deep into its bosom of solid rock, stands a splendid white mausoleum looking out with five great round eyes toward 'Akká upon a heavenly picture of sea and sky. Above it rise the massive beet-ling brows of Carmel's rough ridges and boulders gnarled and twisted into convulsive shapes like wrinkles of agony upon a giant forehead. Below, the profile of the giant face projects peacefully down the mountain slopes and merges into the sea. This mausoleum, the most conspicuous object upon Carmel, is the Tomb of the Báb, that winsome messenger and forerunner of the Day of GOD, who came in the spirit and power of Elijah to prepare the Way of the Lord in the year 1844, and who, like Elijah, ascended into heaven in the fiery chariot of a glorious martyrdom. No spot upon earth could more appropriately mark his last resting-place, for here upon Carmel cluster the scenes and historical events in the life of his illustrious prototype, the old Tishbite prophet, that grand, solitary figure who stands out alone and luminous with the radiance of GOD against a black background of Israel's degeneracy. The more we study these two holy lives, the more they parallel in character and accomplishment; each appearing suddenly upon the scene, speaking words of burning fiery zeal with unflinching courage and fearless confidence in GOD; each calling down fire from heaven upon the priests of religion and consuming their ignorant idolatries. Just westward along the mountain side is the cave or den in which Elijah lived, and it may be, notwithstanding the tradition of his literal ascension into the sky, that the mortal dust of the old Israelitish prophet is mingled with that of the Báb in this same sanctified soil.

The Báb suffered martyrdom at Tabriz, a city in north western Persia, July 9, 1850. After the tragedy of his execution, his body was thrown into a moat outside the walls of the city where it lay until midnight of the second day. Then loving hands carried it away and since then knowledge of its whereabouts has been locked and sealed in the depths of loyal hearts. This much can be said with certainty, however, that after being removed from the moat, the body was embalmed, swathed in silk and afterward sent as a bale of silk to Ṭihrán by the command of Bahá'u'lláh. It remained hidden in Ṭihrán many years. The method of concealment was to cut a hole in the solid masonry of a room in some believer's house, put the body therein and wall up the opening. There it remained until it was deemed expedient to remove it to another similar hiding place. From Ṭihrán it was finally carried by faithful and appointed souls through Irak-Arabia across the Syrian desert to Beirout and from thence transported to Haifa where it now rests.

The Tomb is a solid gray-white structure built of the lime-stone rock from which its site has been excavated. This rock hardens by exposure to the atmosphere and merges in color after a time into a soft mellow grayish white tone peaceful and refreshing to the eye. The terrace upon which the Tomb proper stands is built out into a projecting level, flanked upon either side by deep square subterranean cisterns hewn out of the solid rock for the purpose of storing water which is always soar upon Carmel's rocky slopes. The surface of the terrace, about fifty feet square is laid out in paths and planted with beautiful flowers. In the centre of the terrace and leading down the steep slope between the great cisterns is a long stone stairway. From the foot of the stairway the mountain side descends sharply perhaps six hundred feet to the upper edge of the German Colony in Haifa, the Tomb being located so that a line drawn from the stone stairway down to the sea will pass through the whole length of its principal street. That is to say, when we stood in front of the Tomb looking down the mountain, the line of vision passed directly through the center of the long beautiful avenue of the German settlement, bordered upon either side by fine trees which meet in perspective at the Pier and shore front. The purpose is obvious. As all the mountain side from the Tomb to the German Settlement is owned and controlled by Bahá'ís, someday a broad, beautiful esplanade surmounted by the Tomb and terrace will extend down to Haifa, making a continuous and striking scent from the shore of the Great Sea to the Tomb of the Báb.

The Tomb itself is about fifty feet in front width and rises about half as much in height above the level of the terrace. It is built in three distinct sections separated upon the front wall by high pilasters of masonry, each section containing two long windows, the only doorway of entrance opening into the middle section. High above the doorway and windows, just under the simple square stone cornice are five great round eyes or circular openings, two upon either side and one directly in the middle over the doorway. As we entered the doorway we stood in a large square ante-room or chapel which communicates right and left with two other rooms of equal dimensions. Each of these three ante-rooms opens at the back by a doorway into the actual Tomb or crypt. There are three tomb chambers in the crypt of this wonderful Bahá'í mausoleum, extending side by side with head toward the sea, their hemispherical mounds of masonry almost flush with the floor. In one of them the blessed body of the Báb rests; the remaining two await the mortal temples of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Back of the crypt, excavated into the very heart of the limestone rock will be three other chambers or rooms, similar to those in front. At the time of our visit (January 1905) all work upon the Tomb had been temporarily discontinued owing to an investigation by the Turkish authorities, certain enemies of 'Abdu'l-Bahá having circulated a report that the structure was in reality a fort so planned that it commanded Haifa and approach to the harbor by sea. The three rear chambers were therefore not yet complete. The structure throughout is unique in architectural simplicity and solidity, being entirely without ornamentation or embellishment, chaste, Pure, religious, in tone and designed to last for centuries. Its central purpose is to enshrine the mortal bodies of the Forerunner, the Manifestation and the Servant of the Glory of GOD. The three outer rooms or ante-chambers are intended for congregation and assembly; back of them three tombs or sarcophagi; and the rear chambers evidently for retirement, communion and prayer. In ground plan the sacred edifice is built in three times three divisions making in all nine, the number of "Perfection."

Before we enter upon a statement of its evident symbolism and significance in architectural design and detail we must speak of our own experiences and visits to this Kibla of the world. We first saw the Tomb as we came into the Bay from the open sea. Far out from land, the eye catches its white conspicuous head rising from the sombre side of the old mountain. It resembles no other building near it nor anywhere in fact, and could not be mistaken for church, chapel, monastery or fortification. Architecturally it is designed and blended into the mountain picture, prominent and striking, yet such an intrinsic part of the whole that it seems as natural as the rocks, ridges and boulders upon which it stands and as if it had always stood there. As we drove up the mountain the evening of our landing, we passed directly behind it, the terrace upon which it stands being about two hundred feet from the roadway leading from Haifa at the base to Prose House at the summit. During our stay on the mountain we spent long hours upon the edge of the cliffs looking out toward 'Akká, Haifa at our feet and the glistening white Tomb just below our rocky eyrie. Nestling almost beneath the Tomb in the ensemble picture is a little white stone Bahá'í house, its blue-shuttered windows looking up at you like timid eyes beseeching yet not courting recognition. Several times we went down the steep mountain foot-paths and spent hours at the Tomb lost in holy reflection and looking with ever new delight and wonder upon the matchless picture of mountain, sea and plain stretching from far-away horizon to horizon. One rainy day when Mr. MacNutt was alone upon the mountain he went down to the Tomb and found it closed, the attendant absent. It was his first visit to the sacred spot. Above the doorway was an open transom unfinished and still in process of construction. He climbed up and looked into the interior. Upon the pure white cemented wall of the middle chamber hung a frame surrounding these words from the Bayán "I am forever alive in the Horizon of El ABHÁ." The Spirit of the Great Báb is still speaking these words to our conscious listening souls from the horizon of the Supreme Concourse. They halo the Tomb, express its meaning, embody its purpose, perpetuate its memory and significance. Like the glorified Spirit of the Messenger of the Day of GOD they will never pass away.

The attendant at the Tomb was a simple-hearted Persian believer, his face filled with the fire of love, his whole life centred upon service in the Cause of GOD. Whenever we appeared, he would come running to meet us from his little but anon e the rocks, showering Persian greetings and salutations upon us, holding our hands und breathing the Greatest Name. Then having found us rude seats, he would hurry back to his little house and presently return bearing steaming cups of tea. While we drank the tea he would gather anemones and other wild flowers for us among the rocks. One day to test him we offered him a coin in return for his kindness and service. He took it, held it a moment, said some holy word e in Persian, then carefully placed it in Mr. MacNutt's bosom just over his heart.

Immediately behind the Tomb, between it and the roadway is a group of cypress trees ten in number, growing very close together upon a circular knoll and forming a dense shade. They are about twenty feet in height and most striking in appearance from the fact that the slopes of Carmel at this elevation are absolutely bare. Beneath the shade of these cypresses the Blessed Perfection pitched his tent, rested and drank tea upon one occasion with those who loved Him so completely, devotedly. Each time we visited the Tomb we stood silently under them hearing the voice of the Spirit in the waft of the mountain winds through their branches, our hearts filled and overflowing with realisations so deep, so solemn, yet so completely happy.

I shall not venture into extravagant or emotional interpretation of the inner meanings so evidently, embodies in this glorious Bahá'í shrine of the dead. The soul of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is speaking in its plan and mysteries; his, not mine the power to set forth the heavenly lesson of its architecture and significances, for the design and authority of its construction are from him. The secrets which lie unrevealed behind that authority will be known in the years and centuries yet to come long after the spirit of the third and last of these wonderful beings has ascended to the horizon of El ABRA and loving hearts have entombed the mortal dust of its glorious Temple with tender tears of love and remembrance. O 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Blessed is the soul which hath been quickened by the breath of the spirit of thy words! Happy are those who know and have looked upon thee! Thrice happy those who perceive the Blessed Perfection of the Mystery of the Oneness of GOD in his Messenger, his Manifestation and his Servants

Yet I cannot turn away from the Tomb without some simple sincere mention of its broader, clearer symbolism. As we looked down upon it from the cliffs of Carmel, as we saw it from the sea in the calm radiance of the moon when we sailed away, as we see it now by the spirit-light of memory, it is ever the expression and symbol of those wondrous mortal bodies in which the divine breath of the Holy Spirit was once manifest. Standing there white and glorious upon the bosom of the Mountain of GOD, a shrine of earth, pure, holy and spotless, its five eyes of vision turned toward 'Akká, looking out upon the Great Sea of Revelation, filled with light from the heaven of the Divine Will, nine chambers of soul-powers within, now empty, now nothing but dust, the light of Spirit fled from the mortal Temples of its Messenger, Manifestation and Servant, three shrines yet one in whom the Glory of coop has appeared, spoken and ministered unto humanity;- we are looking not upon the Tomb of the Báb, but the Shrine of the ABHÁ Manifestation.

When the day of our departure from these holy scenes came we walked down the mountain for the last time and sat upon the beautiful terrace in front of the great white mausoleum, looking over toward 'Akká where the blessed Servant of GOD still kept his faithful vigil upon the walls of the Holy City. We were watching down the coast for the little steamer which would carry us away from him. Few words were spoken; the mountain wind sighed through the green cypress trees just behind us. For a long, long time we sat there; then we saw the steamer coming and we started away, down the mountain to meet her. And as we slowly went the simple hearted Persian believer who keeps the Tomb came running after us, his arms filled with roses and red anemones.

THE TRIP FROM HAIFA TO 'AKKÁ.

Never dawned a day more fair, more perfect than January 4th, 1905, when the sun-arrows of morning glancing from the tips of the Lebanon s awoke the valley and plain of 'Akká with streaming floods of light. From the summit of Carmel we looked upon pictures of sky, sea and land bathed in vibrant life and splendor; the heavens opened at the call of the sun; a new day descended upon the horizons of the phenomenal world. But the splendor in which the outer world lay immersed was but dim reflection of that inner glory which illumined the Kingdom of Spirit, quickening the conscious eye with celestial vision and a perception heavenly. For we were standing upon a supreme apex of the visible world, lofty, towering and luminous in the light of history that is holy and associations that are hallowed and sacred, within the very forces of powers and forces spiritual, upon Carmel, "Mountain of ODD" where the hosts of the Supreme Concourse and holy souls of earth alike center their vision. Everything in the wonderful picture brought its attendant spiritual suggestion and lifted the soul to contemplation and consciousness of GOD. We were enveloped in the Spirit; upon holy ground indeed, and in the Holy Land of the world's promise, expectation and fulfilment. Such was the glory and heavenly prospect of the day upon which we made ready to complete our pilgrimage from the mountain of endeavor to the holy city of attainment, from hope and longing to the joy of realisation, from the Camel of announcement to the 'Akká of appearance and manifestation.

We drove down the mountain early in the morning, aglow with the exhilarating, crystal pure atmosphere, stopping a few moments at the Báb's Tomb to pick a bunch of red anemones. Shepherds with large flocks of sheep and goats were coming up the mountain from Haifa, on their way to pastures at the summit. Our cheery greeting "Arag sa-id!" met a cordial response and even the four-legged creatures with "baa" and bleat gave us a morning salutation as we went on down the steep road, through the long, street of the German Colony, turning at right angles but before we reached the sea. At the foot of the street is the pier built by Sultán 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd in honor of Emperor William of Germany when he visited the Holy Land in 1902. In a few minutes we entered the old city of Haifa, threading our way along the narrow principal street lined upon either side with little bazaars, mere holes in the wall, each one presided over by a faced dignified merchant in white gown, his head topped by a lofty red tarbush. There are no sidewalks and our horses were jostled by donkeys, camels and a kaleidoscopic current of humanity, making the going very slow, but thanks to his cracking whip and Arabic yells cur driver pulled us through the confusion and completed his contract by depositing us at the eastern edge of the town, close by the starting-point of the railroad now building between Haifa and Damascus. There are only three railroads in all Syria; this is one of them. Having dismissed our conveyance we strolled nonchalantly along the sandy beach as if a further trip in the direction of 'Akká was the last thing in our minds, until, importuned by an Arab who spoke a little French, we engaged him to secure us a beach wagon for a “promenade” along the shore as far as River Kishon or Nahr Mukatta, a mile or so on our intended way. Reaching the river, the horses fording it, our ideas of “promenade” expanded and after a lain colloquy in kindergarten French and Arabic assisted by eloquent pantomime we bargained for transportation, to ‘Akká as if suddenly to go. The conveyances which make the trip of nine miles along the surf are known as “American wagons”, high-wheeled, long canvas-covered and much like the prairie schooners of our Western plains before the rail roads were built. Three horses abreast furnish the motive power and long experience upon the sandy footing has made them very knowing. Without slackening pace and with reins hanging loose, they follow the surf out as it recedes and dexterously avoid the next wave by running up higher on the beach when it breaks, making a zigzag course as they go, always finding hard sand for their footing. The Mediterranean by the way is not a “tideless sea” as the sacred poets would have us believe, bit rises and falls appreciably. The Kishon which we first crossed, drains the Carmel slopes and wanders toward the sea in serpentine course from far back in the ‘Akká plain. Tradition says its current ran red with the blood of the four hundred and fifty priests of Baal when Elijah slew them at the foot of Carmel. After heavy rains its waters are deep and furious and fording is impossible. We saw other wayfarers crossing the river in primitive fashion, all unconscious of formality and conventional garb.

The Oriental is always a picture of deliberation. Haste and levity are unknown words in his vocabulary. When he reaches the Kishon on foot he calmly rests awhile, then slowly die robes, carefully tying his few clothes in a little bundle, puts the bundle on top of his head and solemnly wades across the river. A we drove along we met strings and strings of camels, usually ten or a dozen, traveling in single file, the largest in front, the procession preceded by a diminutive donkey who acts as guide and pacemaker to his giant followers. Now and then little donkeys scurried past carrying long-legged Arabs, so long of limb that they had to turn their feet up at the bottom to prevent trailing upon the ground. This disproportion has its advantages however, for when the Arab wishes to accelerate the donkeys speed he nimbly kicks him in the face from either side. Sinewy Arab fishermen, bronze-black from toe to turban were casting their circular nets into the surf with scanty results; patriarchal old Bedouins in baggy white bloomers, gaunt and wiry in muscle and limb, passed um on foot as if the nine mile jaunt from ‘Akká to Haifa was only a trifling morning exercise. We saw a few specimens of the “murex” lying on the shore, a spiny fish from which the ancient people of Tyre extracted the purple dye which made them famous. The coloring matter is found in a gland in the throat of the fish. A little beyond, half way to ‘Akká we gave the hard working horses a good rest; then off again until we reached the second river, Nahr Namen, the Belus of the Ancient Greeks. This bright forceful stream, although narrow, is deep and rapid in current. It rises in the Lebanons and in its short hurrying course to the sea, passes through the garden of Riqván situated a little over a mile from the gate of ‘Akká upon the plain. Upon its banks in ancient times stood a colossal statue of Memnon similar to those in the plain of Thebes. The white sand of the Nahr Namen was esteemed and utilized by the ancients in their manufacture of glass. On the plain of ‘Akká nearby and to the right we saw Tel el Fukhar, the high sand dune upon which Napoleon 1 planted his batteries in 1799. In a little while we came upon a wide boulevard lined with fine old trees and extending from ‘Akká gate toward the Riḍván. As we drove along it we had a critical survey of the city and the inhabitants thereof. Right before us the high forbidding walls of the prison-fortress loomed up in discouraging monotony, unbroken save by a high gateway flanked on either side by heavy bastions and military towers. ‘Akká’s population had poured itself out through this gate and distributed itself along the highway by which we reached the gate and entered the city. However we toured no curiosity among the Orientals although their picturesque kaleidoscopic grouping and color excited our liveliest interest. It seemed indeed as if an Oriental rag-bag had burst open at the city portal, covering sand and sward with a motley assortment of remnants;- men, women, children, goats, sheep, cattle, camels, and donkeys in heterogeneous confusion, the picture vivid and glowing in a Mediterranean brightness of clear sky and perfect sunshine. We drove on into the city through the angles and double walls of the great gate, passing keen-eyed sentries who asked our Arab driver questions, then emerged into a large court-apace surrounded by barracks and coffee houses where groups of Turkish soldiers lounged and stood apart. Passing across the court, the street suddenly narrowed and we unhitched one horse, leaving but two for the finale. The wagon jolted and bumped over rough heavy stone blocks of street pavement through the centre of which ran an ill-smelling drain, the open sewer of the city. On either side as the wagon toiled slowly along we peered into great vaults or dungeon holes of mediaeval construction and suggestive of horrors past and present. Every fifty yards the street ended in a black wall, then turned at right angles in another direction, a veritable catacombs with the roof taken off. Squalid pictures of humanity were everywhere before our eyes, pestiferous odors rose to the nostrils from the filth in the passageway; it could no longer be called a street. After ten minutes slow going the conditions improved; we were passing between the high walls of buildings upon either side, a few bazaars more cleanly and attractive appeared and finally we came into an open court at the far end of the city just inside the sea-wall toward the east. Our driver had received his instructions from us in the words “‘Abbás Effendi” and drove straight across the court to a large doorway from whence a number of Bahá’í brothers came and welcomed us with “Alláh u ABHÁ. We passed into an inner court. A fountain was playing in the centre and bright faced roses welcomed us in their beauty and fragrance. We climbed a long flight of steps to the upper rooms of the house which opened upon the court of roses and were shown into a large room around which ran a low divan. We had reached the goal of our pilgrimage.

‘AKKÁ

From ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:- “Concerning my freedom thou hast expressed great joy. I am always free although I remain a prisoner. All the fortresses and castles of the world cannot confine me; nor is the dungeon able to bring me under the narrow bondage of the world. The spirit is ever soaring in untrammelled heights even though the body be in the depths. Those who surround me may imprison the body but the spirit they cannot restrict. The spirit will ever soar in the atmosphere of eternal bliss and glory. Therefore neither is the prison a cause of sorrow, nor is freedom from it a source of joy. When thou dost find, the way to the kingdom, the earthly world shall be of no account; and when thou art illumined, the darkness will not affect thee, nay rather the four corners of the earth will then be radiant, every thorn become a rose, every prison a rose garden."

From the tablet of Bahá'u'lláh to the Shal of Persia: "The rulers of authority are about to send us forth from this land (Adrianople) to the city of 'Akká and according to report it is most assuredly the most desolate of cities of the world,, the most unsightly of them in appearance, the most detestable in climate, the foulest in water, the metropolis of the owl; no sound is heard from its regions but its echo. And in it they intend to imprison this servant, to shut in our faces the doors of mercy during the days that remain of our life in this world. But though weariness should weaken and hunger destroy us, though the couch should be made of hard rock and our associates be beasts of the desert, we will not falter but will be resolute and determined in the strength of GOD and under all circumstance give thanks unto Him. And we ask GOD to make this ark calamity a shield for the Temple of His Command, to protect it thereby from sharp swords and piercing blades. Through affliction hath the Light shone; this hath been His method through past ages and bygone times."

From Tablet to the Pope: "Even though they burn Him upon the earth, verily He will lift up His head in the midst of the sea. And though they cast Him into a dark pit they shall find Him upon the summits of the mountains, crying "The Desired One heath come with the authority of might and sovereignty." And though they bury Him in the earth He will arise from the horizons of heaven proclaiming with loudest voice El Baba hath coma in the Kingdom of GOD! Under the swords of enemies We call the servants unto GOD; end neither by hosts of the oppressors nor influence of the wicked can. We be hindered."

'Akká is the key of entrance into Palestine, the gateway of the Holy Land. From the rock-rimmed coast of the far north where lofty mountain ranges rise like gigantic fortifications and palisades out of the Mediterranean, to the low sandy shores and plains of the extreme south where shoals and shallows menace approach to the mainland, the Holy Land possesses no harbor or natural port except the bay and plain of 'Akká which lying between the Lebanons and Carmel, open an inland way to Galilee and the valley of the Jordan. Upon one side of thin natural gate stands Haifa planted at the foot and upon the slopes of Carmel itself. The opposite gate-post of the great water-way is 'Akká built directly upon the shore-line and separated from the Lebanon ranges by a wide strip of arid sandy plain. Upon this natural site, the ancient Canaanites or perhaps still earlier peoples founded a city. Long before the posterity of Jacob came up out of Egypt to possess the Land of Promise and Israel became a conquering nation, Accho had an existence and history extending back into the misty centuries were record ceases and even tradition wanes in its narrative. Its history was comparatively modern when the Israelites took it about 1200 B.C., with keen military sagacity allowing its inhabitants to remain undisturbed under their conquering yoke. When the power of Israel declined, the Egyptians under one of the Ptolemys overcame Accho about 300 B.C. and hued its name to Ptolemais, Later the all-conquering Roman legions laid it tribute to their triumphal series of conquests and built a military road along the coast north to Beirout, paralleling similar roads evidently built by the Assyrian and Egyptian long before, the ruins of which furnish interesting and comparative archaeological studies along the route through Tyre, Sidon and in the Lebanons near Beirout. Paul visited Ptolemais on his way along the coast, remaining as the Scriptures state “one day with the brethren”, then going on down to Caesarea. In the centuries after Christ, Ptolemais became a stronghold of Christianity and the seat of a See or Bishopric. When Muḥammad arose in Arabia, the destiny of Ptolemais passed under Muḥammadan control. The Arabs in fanatical zeal of conquest took possession of the much-conquered city in 638 A.D. Then followed five hundred years of comparatively calm historical weather broken only by occasional storms and campaigns in which the Muḥammadans stronghold was the center. Finally in 1104, Baldwin 1, brother of Godfrey de Bouillon King of Jerusalem came upon it with crusader legions and ended the domination of the Saracen and his religion. At this time the Crusaders built the fortified cities of Athlit and Tantura on the shore-line just below Carmel, modelling them upon the plan of Ptolamais which had become the chief landing-place and military centre Of the Crusaders. Through it poured those sanguine hordes of Christian warriors, the flower and chivalry of Europe bent upon the recovery of the Holy Land from the power of the infidel Saracen. Two and a half million of these warlike Christian zealots perished in the endeavor before defeat and destruction wrote the fiat of non-accomplishment upon banners of war which had defiled the name of Christ in their mad fanatical invasion. In 1187, the Saraced came back under Saleh-ed-Din (“Fidelity of Religion”) and humbled the Christian Crusaders into second place and subjection. History records the justice and clemency of this conqueror toward his Christian prisoners.

He signalized his triumph by administering the “Oath of Muḥammad’ to his army, under the terms of which the life, property and religious belief of their Christian captives remained protected and inviolate. In addition to this he liberated most of them after depriving them of weapons. Four years afterward the scene changed and history again reversed itself. Richard 1 of England, Coeur de Lion, took the city by storm in 1191. In cruel contrast to Salet-ed-Din’s mercy, Richard the Lion Heart, arch-king and Christian conqueror massacred twenty-five hundred Muḥammadan captives outside the walls after promising them protection if they surrendered and laid down their arms. Nothing more fearful and foul in the annals of war and history can be found than this unwarranted deed of treachery and Christian violence, It will remain forever a stigma upon Christianity in the memory of man, a wound which will never cease to rankle and burn in the Oriental heart and for which centuries have furnished no balm or hearing. Significant too is the fact that their massacre took place near the Riḍván, perhaps upon the very site of the Garden of Paradise planted by Bahá'u'lláh amid the hostile conditions of the Prison City and its desert surroundings. About 1200 A.D. the Crusader Knights of St. John changed the name of the old city to St. Jean d'Acre from which the modern pronunciation of 'Akká or 'Akká degenerated in the tongue of the Arabs. In 191 the irrepressible Moslem appeared on the coast and again made 'Akká the spoil of his ever-ready sword. Five hundred years of somewhat quiescent history followed during which occasional tempests of local conflict raged about the walls of this devoted city, but the dominion of Islám remained unbroken. About 1790 Jezzar Páshá an alert, capable Muḥammadan leader infused new life into the old battered city. He built an aqueduct from the Lebanon across the plain and restored the city walls and defences with material brought from the ruins of Athlit about twenty miles, down the coast. Napoleon I appeared upon the scene in 1799, another vivid and central figure in the varied drama of war enacted upon this religious yet bloody stage. Determined and long was the siege. With cannons mounted upon Tel-el-Fukhar a high sand dune near the Garden of Riḍván, this European genius of war heretofore irresistible and invincible bombarded and besieged the little Syrian city in vain. The months passed. Jezzar Páshá with fiery unflagging zeal still held out against the would-be world conqueror and 'Akká gave a mortal wound to the ambitions of the French Napoleon by delaying him. His opportunities and accomplishments in Europe waned and weakened; his failure to overthrow 'Akká marked the beginning of his humiliation and end. Abandoning the siege, he said "My fortunes have been arrested by a grain of sand. Had I taken 'Akká I would have changed the face of the earth."

During this memorable siege, three hundred French cavalry swore an oath pledging themselves to take the gate of the city by sea or never come back from the attempt. They kept their word to a man; not a single one came back. In 1832 Ibrahim Páshá of Egypt took 'Akká by land and sea attack and after plundering it abandoned it as wasted and worthless. In 1840 the combined fleets of England, Austria and Turkey came up the coast and bombarded it once more, levelling into ruins every building that stood higher than the walls. By this time all vestige of antiquity and archaeological interest had been swept away. 'Akká had become a counterpart of Jerusalem, the Jerusalem of the Coast, built and rebuilt of rubbish. In the distribution and allotment of the spoils of war and by agreement of nations, 'Akká was apportioned to the Turk and continues today under the government of the church and state of Islám.

Such in very brief is the superficial record and history of this "holy" yet most unholy city; strange commentary upon the lives, motives*, and religious belief of men; fitting evidence that the heavenly Messengers who have appeared from time to time for the purpose of eliminating animalism and infusing the spirit of GOD into the souls of men, have labored against well-nigh impossible conditions. For so dimly has the light of the Spirit burned in these dark centuries that, strange paradox, men have esteemed it a privilege and principle of the religion of GOD to kill and destroy their fellow-creatures from these heavenly Heralds of His Will have come to uplift and save. Practically all the warfare, siege and bloodshed waged within and without the walls of 'Akká have been in the name of GOD and under the banners of His Religion. While the physical forces of Ptolemy, Alexander, Richard, Baldwin, Saleh-ed-Din and Napoleon have assailed and destroyed the outer walls of the city of GOD; the spiritual powers of, Abraham, Melchizedek, Elijah, Jesus, Muḥammad, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá have Ministered to its inner upbuilding. Therefore the inspired ones looking forward with divine perception and prophetic vision have pictured an ultimate, eternal city of GOD which shall be "without walls" and wherein warfare shall be accomplished and ended; a City of True Religion and Love within the soul of man instead of the cruel warring selfish animalism of humanity, the Will of "Our Father Who art in Heaven."

The history of 'Akká is the history of religion from sun-worship and Ganaanitish idolatry to Islám and the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. It stands today a mute witness of eternal and inviolable laws of survival and degeneracy. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Roman and Greek disappeared in the tombs and dust of the past, deprived of the vitalizing power of the Word of GOD. Even Israel a still more significant and awful example, degenerated into oblivion when the Law of Sinai merged into idolatry and priestcraft. And today 'Akká stands looking seaward upon the disintegration and impending doom of modern nations in whom the light and spirit of true religion is burning dim and low. Whenever and wherever the Word of GoD descended the nations and peoples who received it witnessed in themselves a corresponding and immeasurable uplift.. When the Spirit of Truth departed from their worship and belief and only dead forms and the corpse of ecclesiasticism remained, nations and peoples were eclipsed and disappeared. This had been and is the law of the centuries, and the fixed, unchanging rule of destiny.

'Akká is the only counterpart in history of Jerusalem, that other paradox of human blindness and divine favor. Upon no two cities of earth has the light of GOD descended so continually, yet no cities of earth have such fearful records of war and bloodshed. In themselves they witness the inexorable outworking of the law of destiny and divine judgement. With a history extending for five thousand years backward into the past, 'Akká is now a prison, a penal colony, a place of exile, built upon ruins and rubbish. Notwithstanding boundless possibilities this has been the outcome; sap commentary upon the frail, perishable, powerless kingdoms of this world. Yet GOD has chosen 'Akká to furnish the soul of man with His supreme example. In contrast to the degeneracy of human power, a King of Eternity he descended there to rule with dominion which has been from everlasting in the spiritual world and will continue forever in the world to come, His heavenly lineages from the Son of Man who walked amid the Lebanons and by the shores of Galilee; His Spiritual Ancestors are the Kings of Glory who have spoken the Word of GOD ever since the world began. Why GOD has chosen to reveal Himself in 'Akká is at once apparent. Why He has in the "latter times" made it "glorious by the Way of the Sea" needs no explanation. Why "the desert has blossomed” and the parched land has been made glad” by the rain from heaven is easily understood. The “glory of Lebanon, the excellency of Carmel and the beauty of Sharon have seen the Glory of the Lord; ‘Akká the very centre of the prophetic picture has been the scene of the heavenly drama and the home of the Promised One of the centuries in order that GOD might emphasize the supremacy and independence of His dominion over the kingdoms and powers of earth, teach man severance from the world and dependence upon the Heaven of Divinity, -seed show that oppression, violence, persecution and imprisonment constitute the very training -ground of the Spirit and minister to its highest, holiest fruits. For the Law of GOD has gone forth from this “Prison City”, which, so long unholy in its human history and purpose has yet become holy and heavenly in the Plan Divine. In this way GOD has made human conditions of war, violence and hatred minister to spiritual outcomes and the fulfilment of His Eternal Purpose; utilized unrighteousness to upbuild righteousness and made the kingdoms of earth contribute to the foundations of the Kingdom of Heaven. This is the supreme lesson of ‘Akká to humanity. How clearly then we see that although Bahá’u’lláh the Manifestation of GOD was sent to ‘Akká by the independent exercise of human power and human will yet the Divine Will and Knowledge had preceded Him and spoken the place of His appearance by the tongue of the prophets. He must appear there to fulfil prophecy. Even from a logical standpoint of necessity He must appear as He did. Read again the history which surrounds ‘Akká; history accomplished in the Name of GOD and Religion. View again the bloody record of Israel at Tabor and upon the Plain of Esdraelon, of Elijah at the brook Kishon, and the slaughter of Siserá’s hosts; consider the Christian Crusaders, Richard and Napoleon the Emperor of a Christian country; remember where Israel, Christianity and Muḥammadanism have laid the sword for more than three thousand years; reflect upon the harvest of death and vintages of human blood shed for religion; then ask in what other spot of earth should He come, could He come. So we find His Words continually directed toward that crucial calamity of the world “religious discord”; hear the Voice of GOD amid these tempests of human hatred called “religious beliefs”; see Him standing in the gateway of the “Holy Land”; upon the walls of ‘Akká the key to the home of Religion and the focus of Sacred History, not seeking to recover or possess city, land and mountain in the name of code and creed, but overcoming human souls by the power of love, setting up in them the Kingdom of Heaven and that Peace of GOD which shall have no end;- this King of Glory, this King of the New Jerusalem who is destined to bear the government upon His shoulder”. And upon the banners of His spiritual crusaders His servant this ‘motto “I come to bring Peace, not to lay a sword.”

VISIT TO THE RIḌVÁN.

“And the Lord GOD planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there He put the man whom He had formed.”

“The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon; they shall see the Glory of the Lord, the excellency of our GOD.”

“And He pointed out to me a river of the water of life, bright as crystal, issuing forth out of the Throne of GOD and the Lamb and a Tree of Life bearing twelve crops of fruit, every month yielding its fruit; and the leaves of the Tree were for the healing of the nations.”

Happy are they who have the right unto the Tree of Life and rough the gates may enter into the City.

These are Scriptural pictures of soul-gardens and the Divine 114rner; from the natal endowment of man to the degree of his __ i: ly attainment, from material creation to spiritual consummation the paradise of Eden to the Riswan of El-ABHÁ. Created the Heaven of His Will, the human soul through disobedience and _____ of the Divine Will and Command, loses its condition of _____ and becomes a “desert”, “-solitary place”, a “wilderness” parched land”. Into these hostile, desert-like soul-conditions _____ of GOD descends; the Word of GOD speaks from the ‘Akká of prisonment; so the desert blossoms and living streams bring _____ life into the wilderness of human idea. Then high above _____ of the soul-city upon earth is seen the Holy City of the _____lled with the Light of GOD, the Tree of Eternal Life Te growing in its midst and a river of the Revealed Teaching going forth to accomplish the healing of souls and nations. No detail has been omitted in the heavenly pictures of the Divine Books. Blessed are those who understand! Blessed are those who have the right of entrance into that City! Happy are those who eat of Its Tree of Life forever as gods.

Bahá’u’lláh the Blessed Perfection of the Word of GOD manifest in the temple of Man has said “O People of the Delectable Paradises Let the people of Certainty know that a new Garden hath appeared near the Ridván in the Open Court of Hilliness and all the people of the heights and temples of the exalted heaven are around it. Radiant are the eyes of those who have entered therein with trust.”

Today we visited the Ridván, the garden of Bahá’u’lláh, driving out from the city in the early afternoon. The air was soft and balmy as the breath of June and golden sunshine poured its wealth of glory upon those wonderful vistas of mountain, sea and plain which form the historical setting of the great religious dramas of the world. Straight out through the massive gateway along a fine boulevard lined on either side with splendid trees, we kept the road which has its far away terminus at Nazareth, Galilee and the plain of Esdraelon. After a short distance how-ever, probably a mile from the city, we turned suddenly to the left and came to a large rustic gateway through which we passed on foot into the Ridván the earthly and visible symbol of the Paradise of GOD. In the guide books it is referred to as “a wonderful Persian garden”. In the books of our Bahá’í hearts it is the garden of a wonderful Persian. Old Abu’l Ghassim who kept the garden when the Blessed Perfection walked among its quiet paths, greeted us with loving words of welcome, his face still radiant with that light which once shone upon him from the Luminary Itself. The love of this humble yet glorious soul finds expression in the flowers he so carefully rears and tends. In a few moments our hands were filled with hyacinths, narcissus, heliotrope, violets and roses, their sweet odors mingling with the gracious love and fragrance of his words and greeting.

Flowers, flowers, everywhere flowers surrounded us like a picture of enchantment; golden fruits hanging low and ripe from green branches brought back the scenes of Eden, oranges, grape-fruit, lemons and tangerines, strange-looking oriental trees with deep, thick-leaved foliage, some of them heavy-weighted with blossoms, palms, olives, cypress, dwarf evergreens and here and, there a tall, stately carob, quiet paths lading aimless, about under them, rare birds flitting overhead in the branches, where they have their nests, knowing nothing of fear, and just a soft breath of wind stirring the leaves, luring the soV11 into Elysium. This is the Ridván, the visible Garden of El-ALBA. "And there were two other trees in the midst of the garden, wonderful Towering mulberry trees growing upon an island encircled by living streams of water. For the Nahr Namen or River Belus which comes rushing down the Lebanon slopes fed by never failing sprint and streams, waters the Ridván with its pure current before it loses itself in the bosom of the Great Sea. As it approaches the garden it parts into three heads or streams, two of which pass directly through it and at times form its boundary. Before the river reaches the sea, these divided currents are again blended into one, fitting symbol of the Bahá'í Dispensation in which the Ridván of human souls is watered and refreshed by three living streams conjoined as one, flowing from the mountain of Manifestation, then divided and again conjoined after watering the garden, and pouring together into the bosom of the ocean of eternity.

Beneath the mulberry trees is the chair or rustic seat where the Blessed Perfection spent long afternoon hours, sometimes alone and silent, sometimes surrounded by the holy souls who loved Him so devotedly, speaking to them and dictating to scribes those majestic words burning with the fire of eternal truth, literally a Tree of Life in the midst of the garden. Just in front of His chair stands a flower-pot in order that no one may inadvertently sit therein. Separated a short distance is the chair or seat of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in which likewise no visitor ever sits. Here we rested a long time under the sheltering canopy of the two great trees, looking down into the depths of the pure limpid waters as they hurried by. While we sat there lost in silent reflection, Abu'l Ghassim brought us fruits of the garden, ripe delicious oranges and tangerines beautiful to the eye, refreshing to the taste and haloed by spiritual reflections of Eden and Paradise. Then we visited the little house or cottage of the gardener and saw the room where the Blessed Perfection often rested during hot midsummer afternoons. Near the window which opened toward Carmel was the chair where He sat; nothing has been disturbed, nothing changed, the simple picture just as He left it. Tea was served, then more delicious fruits, after which one of the daughters of 'Abdu'l-Bahá chanted a commune, "O Thou Who art the Almighty and the Powerful! All are captive in Thy Hand of Power! Thou art the Helper and the Protectors Grant us Thy Blessing and Favor!

Open the doors of bounty! Look upon us in kindness! Send the life-giving breeze! Vivify the longing hearts! Illumine the eyes!

Cause the plain of the hearts to become the envy of the garden of roses and the verdant meadows! Give joy to the souls and great happiness to the spirits!

Manifest eternal power and show forth Thy mighty strength! Cause the birds of the soul of men to soar in a different atmosphere! Cause the intimate friends of the world to become acquainted with the secrets of the Kingdom of GOD!

Grant us steadfastness! Bestow upon us a constant heart! We are sinful, Thou art the Forgiver! We are creatures, Thou art the Creator! We are homeless and without a resting-place, Thou art the Protector and the Defender!

Assist us in diffusing Thy breeze and grant us help in proclaiming Thy Word. Make the destitute a ruler, give the unfortunate the treasures of the heart, grant strength to the weak and bestow upon the feeble heavenly power. Thou art the Creator, the Forgiver, and the Lord of Creation!”

After the chanting we knelt beside the chair in silent communion with the ABHÁ Spirit, then returned to sit again under the canopy of the mulberry trees willing to stay forever amid these holy, spiritual scenes. As the eye looks upon them, all the senses are permeated with peace. We breathed an inner atmosphere redolent of sanctity; our souls glowed with the Divine Life of Nearness; the Presence Itself enveloped, surrounded us.

And if our limited soul-vision awakened to such light and glory what heavenly vistas of time and eternity must have opened to the eye Of the Manifestation of or as He sat here under the leafy tent of Divine Protection looking out upon the world of humanity through these azure-tinted Mediterranean pictures! To this holy place pilgrims will come from all parts of the world, not in mere spirit of curiosity or routine of religious duty but to feel that inspiration of Divine Life which still thrills its vibrant life through the trees, mellows the heart of the Riḍván fruits, reflects from the chastened hearts= of its violets and heliotropes and sings in the flow of its glistening river. The ABBA Glory still lingers and lives in the Riḍván. GOD is still peaking as He spoke to His servant long ago – “Thou shalt not go up after the evening; turn away from them and come upon them over against the mulberry trees. And it shall come to pass when thou hearest the sound of marching in the tops of the mulberry-trees that thou shalt go out to battle, for know then that GOD hath gone out before thee.”

It was not by mere chance and happening that Bahá’u’lláh the Manifestation of GOD planted a garden eastward in the plain of ‘Akká and that therein He put the man whom He had spiritually formed. We are upon holy ground. These are illimitable vistas into which our poor dim eyes are looking. Some day we shall see clearly the Riḍván transplanted within ourselves, the wilderness and the solitary place made glad, the desert blossoming abundantly there, yea, even with joy 3.nd singing, for we shall truly see the Glory of the Lord, the excellency of our GOD.

One more picture from this Eden of Holiness. we are at the gate of the Riḍván. Abu'l Ghassim the old faithful gardener is standing there in the soft radiance of the afternoon sun. His hands are filled with kaoricus flowers. He is looking over toward Carmel as he speaks; the sun's dying arrows are tipping the Tomb of the Báb with gold. He says "In the souls, of these beautiful flowers which. Bahá'u'lláh loved so much you will carry away the fragrance of the Riḍván. Remember Abu'l Gbassim'a words when you are far from here to the beloved in the West he sends the fragrances of the Blessed Perfection from the Riḍván of His Love."

VISIT TO THE TOMB.

Our visit to the Tomb of the Blessed Perfection today was the outer realization of that inner soul pilgrimage which devoted and faithful servants of GOD are making from all the religious systems of the world to meet the Manifestation of GOD in this "Day of Judgment". For now that Holy Temple in which the Spirit revealed Itself and from which the Word spoke, has become the universal Kibla of mankind. The Spirit needs Its Temple of Manifestation; the soul of man requires its Kibla of worship; and these two are one in Bahá'u'lláh. Though we have not been privileged to see Him in the flesh yet we may look upon the beauty of His life and the divinity of His teachings; be uplifted by the sacred association of these holy scenes amid which He walked and behold the Glory of GOD revealed in the Blessed Perfection of Man. The true "pilgrimage" is not a mere visit to 'Akká to look upon these scenes of historical interest with a vision colored more or less by sentiment and emotion, but it is that journey of the soul across oceans of superstition and imagination, through valleys of trials and tribulations and over mountains of obstacles to the Holy Land of Spirit where we meet GOD, see Him with the eye of a pure heart and know Him by the light and knowledge of His Manifestation. Happy are those who perceives! Blessed are those who know: Blessed are those who give ear unto this Message and attain this pilgrimage!

We drove slowly through the narrow crooked streets of the "Prison City", literally threading our way through its scenes of squalor and wretchedness, on and outward toward the great fortified entrance, that door of hope and gateway of despair through which all must pass coming or going. A few wretched shops or bazaar s line the passageway on either side as we approach the gate, mere holes in heavy walls of masonry. Mendicants and cripples, (every native of 'Akká seems to be one or the other), begged alms almost under the horses hoofs. Mute imploring eyes, eyes of sinister hatred, sightless orbs from which the light of vision had fled, sharp scrutinizing glances from soldiers and sentries are turned toward U.S as we go along until the narrow tortuous road opens into a small square just inside the walls where throngs of soldiers are sitting in barracks and drinking-shops. Now we have passed the sentries and are outside the walls of 'Akká. The heavens seem to open and flood the picture with light and beauty. It is a golden oriental day, deep blue sky overhead, the sun brilliant in the zenith, a balmy southwest wind coming up listlessly out of the land of Egypt and almost directly across the back of old Carmel; away to the left as we go rise the heaven-kissing heads of the Lebanons, Hermon with its snowy cap surmounting them all; behind us and seeming all around us the encircling arc of the Mediterranean deeper in blue than the sky itself; a rare day, and in January too, a rare day indeed for us in every sense, a Day of GOD! From the gate the road leads straight out into the plain of 'Akká. For awhile the border of fir trees upon either side deceived us with the promise of fertility and cultivation but after half a mile the trees ceased and sandy desert-like soil, the true plain of 'Akká, came all around us. Over there to the right upon Tel-el-Fukhar a high sand dune, Napoleon I planted his guns and laid siege to 'Akká without success in 1799. Called away by momentous demands in Europe he abandoned 'Akká with the memorable words "My fortune has been arrested by a grain of sand; had I overcome 'Akká could have changed the face of the earth." Everywhere as we drove along the earth seemed crying out for water, a very realistic symbol of those parched and arid conditions of human need which have called down the deluge of Living water from the Heaven of the Divine Will in these the "latter days". The road grows more and more sandy; the going more and more difficult. After awhile we turned sharply away to the north-east; heading toward the Lebanons. Here and there we passed little clusters of mud huts, mere hovels thatched with straw, harboring chickens, dogs, donkeys and miserable looking Arabs. The sand gave place to dust which followed us like a cloud. Savage looking dogs kept guard over the mud villages. Groups of lazy vagabond men were playing cards in the dusty lanes between their habitations; the women whenever visible, hard at work. Children scantily clothed mingled with the animals in the squalid doorways of the huts, darting out to pursue us with shrill cries of that omnipresent word "baksheesh"! Three or four miles from the city gate upon a slightly raised plateau stood a group of buildings white and clean with red sloping roofs, oriental in aspect and architecture. We were approaching them. Soon we made out Bahjí the "Place of Delight" wherein the Blessed Perfection lived and just beyond it the Tomb in which His body lies. Before we reached them we were joined by a number of believers who seemed to spring up out of the earth. Passing by but not entering Bahjí, now the home of Muḥammad-'Alí, we looked reverently up at the windows of the Blessed Perfection's rooms, where He so often sat and beneath which during His life-time groups of faithful pilgrims were accustomed to gather. Beyond Bahjí we entered the Tomb, a simple unpretentious building rectangular in construction, one story in height and lighted by a number of windows upon all sides. At the threshold we removed our shoes. After passing through a small vestibule the interior opens into a large room built in the form of a court with side aisles and columns. The atmosphere is redolent of sanctity. Rich beautiful rugs cover the white stone floors. Banging around this court and standing upon the floor are numbers of costly and rare lamps, gifts from pilgrims to the shrine. Plants and flowers are growing luxuriantly in the centre leaving the side passageways clear. Spiritual associations halo the interior, and spiritual forces surround you as you walk slowly upon the soft silken rugs or stand silently in prayer bathed in the holy light which filters through the windows. Nobody speaks. One of the ladies with u beckons with her hand that we should go forward to the f end of the room. We do so, turning to the right and entering the sacred precinct of the Tomb itself. The same chaste simplicity prevails even in this inner holy of holies. A rug covering a great stone slab in the floor marks the restingplace of that mortal shrine in which the divine breath of Spirit once manifested Itself. We were swept with profound emotion. The ages and cycles seemed to have their quintessence and culmination. Here we stood in the presence of the Blessed Perfection Himself; that glorified Spirit now manifest in u as we knelt in prayer upon the Tomb of Its mortal body realizing in ourselves the eternal purpose of Its Incarnation in the temple of man.

The earth receded and the Haven of the Divine Will opened. We were indeed upon "holy ground". The voice of inner consciousness spoke "Let all the earth keep silence before Him."

The Spirit knows; It sees, hears and feels, but speaks not in words of tongue or pen. These are realizations through inner channels, only to be received and conveyed 511 the language of intuition and inspiration. In these precious moments we lived forward, backward through cycles of time to the threshold of eternity. All seemed so clear, so real, so true and perfect. We saw our own little lives enlarged and expanded into illimitable vistas of purpose and accomplishment. Soul quickened into Spirit. The significance of oneness with the ABHÁ Spirit became clear and evident to us. In silent wonder we withdrew; then stood a long time amid the flowers Ne loved so much, lost in vivid panoramas of past and future, seeing ourselves by the Light of the Glory Itself, as now creatures of immortal vision and eternal life. Our pilgrimage to the Tomb was perfect, complete.

Tea was served in a small ante-room just opposite the entrance door. One of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daughters chanted a prayer and we drove "home", for "home" indeed 'Akká has become to us "home" of the Spirit of the Blessed Perfection. Nobody spoke on the way back to the prison gate. The "Holy Leaf" took me in her arms and we rode on in silence. This time we did not see the mud-villages, the Arabs, dust and sand, Ahead of us on donkeys rode a number of believers', holy and patriarchal men, their faces turned toward the sun which had now burn to sink behind the purple brow of old Carmel the Mountain of GOD. We entered the city just at sun-down; drove again through the narrow and crowded streets, narrow and crowded no longer, for we had come to realize that prison walls and oppressions of earth have no power to restrain the spirit Ms from soaring upward into that paradise of freedom where it has its home. Nay, rather through oppression persecution and imprisonment is the soul of man perfected and released unto its divinely appointed station of oneness with GOD 4nd His Manifestations.

‘ABDU’L-BABA.

Although the secret of the power and beauty of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lies in the eclipse of his personality and the shining forth of the Spirit Itself in his perfect servitude to GOD and man; although what impressed me most was his impersonality, yet I find I cannot forget the face, the features and the man so beloved by the people of BAHÁ throughout the world. To meet Him is to come under the charm and spell of the spirit, but notwithstanding the inner realization, memory holds up the winsome lovable picture of the personality to the outer eye. Knowing that the light within the temple is the reality will describe the temple itself.

After climbing the long flight of steps leading from the inner courtyard, we were taken into a large light room immediately to the right. A soft divan extended completely around it. There we waited, welcomed in succession by several Bahá’í brothers, until – Miss Barney arose and announced ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He was clothed in a long black robe open at front, disclosing another robe of light tan; upon his head a pure white turban. The face was light itself, the voice ringing with happiness. A man of medium height, strongly and solidly built, weight about one hundred and seventy pounds, alert and active in every movement, the head thrown back and splendidly poised upon the shoulders, a profusion of iron-gray hair bursting out at the sides of the turban and hanging long upon the neck, a large massive head full-domed, remarkably wide across the forehead and temples, the forehead rising like a great palisade above the eyes, the eyes themselves very wide apart, their orbits large and deep, looking out like soul-windows from under the massive overhanging brows; strong, perfect nose, generous ears, the mouth and chin kindly and tender, yet fixed in unswerving decision, complexion a creamy white, beard same color as the hair, worn full over the face and carefully trimmed at almost full-length; this is a very insufficient word picture of a face which in its composite is haloed with love and expresses majesty. The focus of the soul of this wonderful being is in the eyes. Love lingers in their depths and tenderness quivers in flashes of sympathetic light upon the lids. If the tongue were silent the eyes would voice the Spirit’s messages in tremulous thrills of eloquence. When the full battery of this irresistible personality is turned upon the soul, you are immersed in an ocean of Love, you see that which was hitherto invisible, hear the inaudible, and attain knowledge which had seemed unknowable. As to His power there can be no doubt. The secret of His spiritual beauty lies in the eclipse of His personality. The Holy Spirit is manifest in this perfect temple of servitude, this incarnation of love.

One morning about a week after our arrival we saw Him in the narrow garden strip which borders the sea just outside the crumbling stone wall. He was standing under a small evergreen, looking out over the blue Mediterranean, His face turned upward into the sunlight silent, motionless, reflective, perhaps in prayer. A short distance away from Him stood a group of ten believers, all of them patriarchal men, holy and picturesque in garb and attitude, the very reproduction of the group of disciples who attended the Christ of Nazareth nineteen hundred years ago. Some of them wore pure white gowns and turbans, some with a fold of red in the head-dress, some with the green turban, indicating lineage from the Prophet. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in full black with a white turban. All stood motionless for a long time; then the central figure began to walk slowly to and fro, inhaling the fresh breeze coming down from the pure laboratory of the Lebanons. When he stopped, they stopped; when he walked they followed, always maintaining a distance and evidencing love and reverence in their movements. Love haloed the picture. The scenes of long ago had come back in living reality before our eyes, so accustomed to different pictures in the West. After awhile an elderly believer arrived at the gate of the garden carrying a large bunch of roses, which he gave to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, who took them aside, buried His face in them a long time, then slowly separated them into small bunches, which MA gave to each of the brethren. As He did so they held His gift to their lips, then placed the floral treasure in the bosom of their loose flowing gowns. Altogether it was a heavenly picture, these bronze faces luminous with the light of love, splendid looking men, but doubly glorious in their spiritual beauty, pictures of what men should be, of what men must ultimately become when humanity is up-lifted by the grace of GOD into His spiritual image. GOD is manifest in any man who has the power of transforming hearts into this semblance. These loving souls had been drawn together by divine attraction from different walks of life, and still more significantly, from different systems of religious belief. Among them were Jews, Muḥammadans, Parsees, and Christians; now all Bahá’ís, now loving each other as Christ taught.

On a Friday morning we saw another picture which carried us back to scenes in old Jerusalem and by the waters of Galilee. It is the custom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá each week on Friday morning to distribute alms to the poor. From his own scanty store he gives a little to each one of the needy ones who come to ask assistance. This morning about one hundred were ranged in line, seated and crouching upon the ground in the open street of the court where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house stuns. And such a nondescript collection of humanity they were All kinds of men, women, and children, poor, wretched, hopeless in aspect, half-clothed, many of them crippled and blind, beggars indeed, poor beyond expression, waiting, expectant, until from the doorway came ‘Abdu’l-Bahá attended by His brother. He was clothed in pure white from foot to turban. Quickly moving from one to another, stopping sometimes to leave a word of sympathy and encouragement, dropping small coins into each eager outstretched palm, touching the face of a child, taking the hand of an old woman who held fast to the hem of His garment as He paused along, speaking holy words of light to old men with sightless eyes, inquiring after those too feeble and wretched to come after their pittance of help and sending them their portion with a message of love and uplift, this is what we saw with our western eyes untrained to holy scenes, this is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Servant of God as Be ie. Light and love seemed to emanate from Him.: As we looked, our eager, rushing, selfish, money-grasping life in the West beyond the peaceful blue of the Mediterranean horizon, seemed dwarfed, insignificant, little, and our hearts turned wearily away from its burdens to the rest of these quiet, holy scenes in a land made holy by such service, such sacrifice, such love. O the rest and peace of doing, of being the Will of GOD! The saints and holy ones of GOD found the true secret of life,- "they went about doing good".

A few days later we said goodbye to 'Abdu'l-Baba, saw Him standing radiant and beautiful at the top of the long staircase which leads down to the inner court where the fountain plays and roses bloom all the year. The light of love was still upon His face; it is always there; it is a face of love, and so I shall ever see Him.

Notes

These Pilgrim Notes are a graphic record from the pen of the highly-esteemed 'Alí Kuli Khán, of the words, stories and actions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that he witnessed. He spoke Persian fluently, was used by 'Abdu'l-Bahá as a translator, and submitted the most important of these notes for correction by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Many works were translated by him early this century. Given these details and the wide scope and substantial length of the topics addressed, these are very important pilgrim notes. At the same time, like all Pilgrim Notes they are not necessarily the exact words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and this must always be borne in mind when weighing matters up. Please note that page 50 was missing. 'Alí-Kuli Khán (c. 1879-1966)

'Alí-Kuli Khán, also known as Nabílu'd-Dawlih, was an eminent Iranian Bahá'í. He was born in Káshán (Persia) about 1879; his father was a mayor. About 1898, he became a Bahá'í and served briefly as 'Abdu'l-Bahá's English-language secretary (1899-1901), and was subsequently sent to America where he translated several Bahá'í books into English as well as continuing to translate 'Abdu'l-Bahá's correspondence with the American Bahá'ís and to act as a teacher. He was appointed Iranian chargé d'affaires in Washington in 1910 and later served in various high-ranking diplomatic posts, becoming Head of the Court of the Crown Prince Regent (Qájár), and ever maintaining a passion for linking together Persia and America. He married the American Florence Breed (1875-1950) in 1904, praised by 'Abdu'l-Bahá for being the first marriage between an Eastern and Western Bahá'í, and served the Faith for almost seventy years until his death in Washington DC on 7 April 1966. Their daughter, Marzieh Gail (1908-93), also became an eminent Bahá'í translator.

Preamble

In 1906, when we (my wife and our baby son, Raḥím, about eleven months old) were on the point of leaving America for ‘Akká, a number of Bahá’í friends requested me to take notes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s conversations during our visit, in order that these might be translated and published for the benefit of the Bahá’ís in America. {{p1}} This I did, and towards the end of our visit, I copied my Persian notes and submitted the most important among them to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for revision.

My translation of those notes (done in 1907) appears in the following pages. In rendering these beautiful Episodes and Teachings into English, my purpose has been to retain as much of the literal sense and the atmosphere of the original as possible.

By request, I also supplement these notes with my translation of some hitherto unpublished instructive Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, bearing upon the subjects treated in the above conversations.

Arrival in ‘Akká

After two days’ stay in Haifa, we proceeded to ‘Akká where we arrived early in the afternoon of Saturday, June 9, 1906. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and others had already had the mid-day meal, my wife and I were served separately in our room. After the meal, we were called into the side-room where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was awaiting us.

Meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, welcome and family blessings

He embraced me and kissed me on the cheeks. He also most warmly welcomed my wife, and took Raḥím from my arms. He then sat on the sofa holding Raḥím on His lap, and while He gave the Baby His rosary to play with, He lovingly inquired after our {{p2}} health, and asked if we had had a good journey. Then looking at me, my wife and the Baby, He said to me while smiling, “O Khán! This is the sign of blessing and increase; you went to America one and returned three.” These words we took to mean that He blessed our conjugal family life with unity and harmony, and that He bespoke for us Divine bounty and increase. He asked for the Baby’s age and I answered that he was one year and four days old. Turning to my wife He said in part, while showing her great kindness and favor: “Welcome! Welcome! Marḥabá! Praise be to God, that as a result of the Revelation of Al-Abhá, the East and the West have embraced each other like unto two beloved ones. You are the first American bride to be united to a Bahá’í from Persia. Praise God, for this great favor.”

Before being seated, and while I had the Baby in my arms, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá looked at Raḥím with His glorious face illuminated with joy, and He said in part: “This is the fruit of the union between the East and the West.” Turning to my wife, He said: “I see that you love Raḥím Khán very much.” Upon other occasions during our visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá often said: “As Rahím Khán is the first fruit of the union of the East and West, whoever looks upon his face loves him.”

Mrs Maxwell

He inquired of Mrs. Maxwell. I spoke of my visit of nine days at her house in Montreal before sailing, where I taught the Truth and spoke to large gatherings every night. He asked if I had remained there nine days and I said yes. Then I said how Mrs. Maxwell was wholly devoted to teaching and to service of the Cause, and how she had specially rented a house with a {{p3}} large parlor to hold meetings therein. He inquired after her health, and when I said that she seemed better than ever since she had become a Believer, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “Some years ago when Mrs. Maxwell came to ‘Akká, she was very weak and seriously ill, — so much so that no one could believe she would ever get well. But God healed her.” Then in connection with Montreal, I spoke of Mr. Woodcock and his work, and He was greatly pleased to hear it.

Letter from Persia

Later in the day He showed me a letter which He had received from Persia. He told me to read it and to see how the Cause of God was growing in Persia, and with what devotion the Believers were bringing many new souls to the Truth.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá arrives with white roses for Florence Khánum

The next morning while I was in our room with my family, a gentle rapping attracted me to the door. There I found ‘Abdu’l-Bahá standing with a large white handkerchief full of flowers. He said, “Give these flowers to Florence Khánum and bring me back the handkerchief.” This I obeyed instantly. To our joy and delight, we found the flowers to be no other than a bridal bouquet of white roses. In them I found another small bouquet. It was easy to see its significance! All can imagine our joy upon receiving that blessing! My wife burst into tears of joy; for in this lovely act of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s she found the fulfillment of a prayer she had offered for a long time. The prayer was that she might receive a rose from the hand of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

On true freedom, pain and pleasure

In the morning, while I was in His presence with other pilgrims, He said in part: “I have just been telling Hájí {{p4}} (Khurasání) that there is no real pleasure in freedom from pains and ailments as such freedom is not permanent. For if a man who suffers from a fever is freed from it, he shall sooner or later have other ailments and finally he will die and depart from this life.

“But real pleasure is this that a hundred thousand bullets may be fired at a person from all directions by those who seek to destroy him, and none of these should touch him. Or that enemies try to drown him in the Sea and their efforts fail in so doing.” By these and similar utterances, He referred to His own calamities and to the efforts of His many enemies who had quite recently exerted themselves to bring about His exile unto the burning deserts of Arabia or Africa, or to effect His total destruction. While speaking these words, His joy was so great that one could not help feeling that real faith is the only source of real joy and that Truth makes one invulnerable and immune to all attacks and oppositions.

Mrs. Cowle and Mrs. Jackson; on sorrow and happiness

I spoke of Mrs. Cowle’s (* Later Mme. de Lagnielle *) love and devotion.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “She came here with Mrs. Jackson and remained for sometime. Though she was poor, she was always happy, I had her stay with us in the Household. Here she labored very hard in cooking certain dishes. She said she {{p5}} wished to learn how to cook Persian dishes in order to make them for the Bahá’ís in America. Her only son had died and this had given her great sorrow. She continued sad until she became a Believer in the Cause of God. This brought her true happiness. If she had not become a Believer in this Manifestation, sorrow would have destroyed her; for she had no other attachment or hope in the world.”

On true joy

Then He spoke at length of the “Composure of Heart,” or “Tranquility of the Soul.” “This”, He said, “is a state of true faith which gives man such assurance and conviction of God’s bounty, that all the trials and sufferings of this earth cannot affect him.”

Speaking of true joy and happiness. He said in part: “If a man is not happy in his life, death is better than such a life. True joy comes from the tranquility of heart, and this state comes from faith! Praise be to God who gave us tranquility of heart! This is why we are always happy. I pray and supplicate to the Beauty of Abhá to bless all the servants and maid-servants with true happiness resulting from the tranquility of heart.”

Steadfastness of a believer; opposition in America

Speaking of a Believer He said: “She is a courageous woman, and she is firm. In a recent letter she said how happy she was, for while traveling in different districts to teach the Truth, children had pursued her in the streets, and had insulted, ridiculed, and reviled her. As all this was in the path of God, it gave her great joy.”

In this connection He said in part: “In America certain {{p6}} men of religious influence will arise against the Cause, and will try to prevent people from this Truth. When this comes to pass, the Cause will progress, and joy and fragrance will increase in the Believers.”

Mrs. Coles' death; her purity

The second day at luncheon in the small room beside ours, opening to the Sea, (* A room attached to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's reception room, a room which was memorable to me as my work and living room during many months of my last long stay in 'Akká in 1899 to 1900! *) I took occasion to mention our departed sister Mrs. Coles, and to say how I was grieved at her death, and how I had been often thinking of her and praying for her since reaching 'Akká. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said in part: "I was very much grieved at Mrs. Coles' death. She was very pure in spirit, and she was very devoted and firm. She never fell short in serving the Cause, for she exerted her utmost in assisting the friends. She was therefore an esteemed maid-servant of God and a child of the Kingdom."

At the table; little Raḥím; thanks for rest

While we were at table, little Raḥím came tripping into the room. 'Abdu'l-Bahá most lovingly greeted him. Then He gave him a piece of bread with His blessing. My wife thanked Him for the restful sleep she had enjoyed in the Holy Household. He said she had not yet had sufficient rest but that she shall enjoy real rest during her visit.

News from America; Mrs Goodall and daughter in Oakland

In the afternoon, He summoned me and enquired concerning the news of the Cause in the leading cities of America, and at {{p7}} San Francisco. I spoke of the untiring devotion of Mrs. Goodall and her daughter in the great work they do in Oakland. This rejoiced Him greatly. He then inquired concerning certain Bahá'ís, and spoke to the Bahá'í Publishing Society of Chicago (* Whose message I had already given Him. *) in part:

Harmony in printing and publication; benefits of Indian trip together of Harris and MacNutt

"The assemblies of Chicago, Washington and New York must be in harmony with each other in the matter of printing and publications. The publication of any matter by any one of these Assemblies must be at first reported to the respective publishing societies of the other cities, — thus removing all causes for in harmony." Speaking of the then prospective trip of Mr. Harris to India, He said in part: "If Harris and MacNutt travel to India in company, this will be very useful for the Cause."

On large appetites and the spirituality of eating; Ṭáhirih

As a nursing mother, my wife apologized to 'Abdu'l-Bahá for what she spoke of as her "great appetite." He however referred to her duties as a mother and the labors which make part of that calling, and to the need therefore for more than usual nourishment. Speaking of appetite and taking food, He said further in part: “Virtue and excellence consist in true faith in God, not in having a small or a large appetite for food, or in similar matters. Jinábí Táhírih (* Qurratu’l-‘Ayn *) had a good appetite. When asked concerning it, she would answer, ‘It is recorded in the Holy traditions that one of the recorded attributes of the people of paradise is “partaking {{p8}} of food, continually.”’ (Whatever may be the outward meanings of this tradition, in its spiritual sense it means that when man is brought into the Paradise of Divine Nearness, through faith, he perennially and perpetually partakes of the food of Divine Bounties and Favors.)

“To be brief; when man takes food, it strengthens him in whatever mood or state of mind or condition he may be in at the time of eating. For instance, if a man is full of love, eating food increases his love; on the contrary, when a man is angry and eats food it intensifies his anger. Thus it is necessary that man think only of the Love of God. Then if he eats a little more food than may seem usual, it does no harm. But otherwise, that is, if he does not possess the Love of God, to eat little or much food is all the same.”

Joy as medicine

Then turning to Hájí Khurasání (* Who was just recovering from a long period of mental and physical indisposition. *) He said in part: “Joy is the best cure for your illness. Joy is better than a hundred thousand medicines for a sick person. If there is a sick person and one wishes to cure him, let one cause joy and happiness in his heart.”

Persecution progresses the Cause; St Peter and St Paul

Concerning the fact that blows, suffering and tribulations and trials endured by true believers are conducive to the progress and advancement of the Cause of God, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: [see Acts 17:15++] “Paul and Peter, the Apostles, once went into one of the cities {{p9}} of the Greeks and engaged in teaching the Truth. In that city, there was a temple which bore the inscription, ‘To the Name of the Unknown God.’ Paul arose and, addressing himself to the multitude, said: ‘We bring you tidings from the same “Unknown God,”’ thus preaching to them the message of Christ. A great number of the Greeks became interested in the Cause. This aroused jealousy in the Jews who began to make trouble. The multitude, aroused by these seditions, attacked the Apostles and beat them until they fell unconscious. Then their bodies were dragged along the road and thrown outside the city. Paul and Peter continued in a death-like unconsciousness all night. Early in the morning, Paul, who was brought to himself, said to Peter: ‘There is a fair today in a place in this neighborhood, at which many people will be present. Let us move along to preach the Gospel in that place.’ Peter called attention to their wounded and bruised bodies; and although at first too weak to move, they finally arose and betook themselves to the fair and preached. Briefly, these persecutions caused a further spread of the Cause of Christ, in that they caused them to be removed into a new place and preach to a new multitude.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s imprisonment and its advantage; MacNutt in America

On June 11, 1906, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá summoned me into the garden within the house-walls where He was walking alone. As the time seemed opportune, I spoke of my great sorrow in finding Him a close prisoner within the walls of ‘Akká, and I remarked that His imprisonment had already lasted for a long time. To console me, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “We have wished it to be such. For {{p10}} many reasons, this incarceration is useful for me. One is that this is conducive to protection; for our enemies, finding us imprisoned, would not think of further steps (to harm the Cause). Moreover, after the Blessed Perfection (who died a Prisoner), we must delight in being a prisoner; and no other state is good for us and no freedom can give us rest. Our purpose is to serve the Threshold of the Almighty, whether imprisoned or free. If we dwell in a royal palace surrounded by delectable meadows and gardens and have every means for rest and composure at our disposal, but news comes to us that the believers are not filled with the fire of faith and do not act in accord with the laws and exhortations of God, — what good could all the luxury of a palace do to comfort us? Nay, such news would make a palace seem to us darker than a dungeon and our hardships increase. But now that I am in prison and you have come here from America and tell me that since his return from ‘Akká Mr. MacNutt continually spoke at the Bahá’í Meetings with great enthusiasm and love and attracted the hearts of the believers, — this good news transforms this prison into a paradise. Therefore, imprisonment gives us no pain; for our purpose is to act in accord with the commandments and exhortations of God.”

Gifts of white jasmines and apricots

Áqá Mihdí, the Gardener of Bahjí, came in and brought a bunch of white jasmine. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave me one-half of the flowers to share with my wife, and we walked back to the court-yard. There was brought a basket of apricots into His presence. He took the fruit and distributed it to the pilgrims and the believers. He also gave several to me, and several others “to take to Florence {{p11}} Khánun.” He then especially gave me an extra one which He said was “For Rahím Khán.”

Visit to Bahjí; vision of the future Bahjí; fragrance of author’s previous meeting

On Tuesday, June 12, 1906, after partaking of the midday meal with Him, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá commanded me to go to visit the Holy Tomb at Bahjí in company with my wife. She donned the Persian chádur and veil (* As she did all through our visit to ‘Akká and then during the entire length of our stay in Persia, in accord with the Command of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. *), and we took the baby with us. While my joy was great in revisiting the Holy Tomb, after years of separation, and in presenting Wife and Child at the Holy Threshold, the memory of the past years when I often visited the Tomb and Bahjí with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, as well as the thought of the present changed conditions due to His imprisonment, weighed heavily upon my heart.

Upon our return to the town, I went to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá who was in the tent in His little garden outside the house. He inquired of our visit to the tomb. I answered that by referring to the visits of years before when He would lead large gatherings of believers of all lands and nations to that Holy Threshold, and saying that because those days are no more makes me disconsolate and dejected. He lovingly spoke words of comfort to me. Among other things He said in part: “In the end, all will be well and happy times will come. ‘Once again a time will come as sweet as sugar.’ The time will come when the procession of pilgrims of all lands will be densely extended from the gate of ‘Akká to the {{p12}} Holy Tomb without any interruption. Thus men of all nations and districts will come to visit this Sacred Spot.” “O Khán, do you remember the days of Haifa? (* Referring to my first visit during 1900, when I had the blessed privilege to be His amanuensis and translator and enjoyed His presence night and day. We remained for long months in Haifa where visitors, formerly of all creeds and of all nationalities and races, successively came and partook of physical and spiritual food at His Holy Table. *) What happy times were those! Do you remember that night in Haifa when people of many lands and nationalities were present at dinner, — Americans, Persians, Europeans, Persian Turks in huge sheep-skin head-gears, and European and American ladies in their wonderful hats, made part of the same meeting, which was also attended by Qá’im Maqám (Governor of Haifa) and the turbaned Turkish Judge? How words and explanations were continuous? Great joy and fragrance indeed predominated in that gathering. Indeed, all those present were sincere and deeply impressed and even the Governor and the Judge were fully possessed with joy and fragrance! What a wonderful night it was!”

On the Gospel’s ‘To him that hath shall be given...’: On faith, progress and decline

On Wednesday, June 13, 1906, while at luncheon, my wife asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá concerning the interpretation of the following verse of the Gospel: “To him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that he hath.” [Mt 13:12, 25:29; Mk 4:25; Lk 8:18, 19:26]

In answer ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “This is the exposition of one of the great questions of Divine Wisdom which Christ has {{p13}} couched in this brief and simple utterance. The great question is this: In the world of existence, pause (or discontinuation of progress) marks the beginning of fall and decadence. For instance, as long as the bird soars or moves upward in the air, it is in progress. But no sooner it pauses than it begins to descend. Or, as long as a merchant lives on the interest or income produced by his capital his business is successful and in progress. But no sooner he begins to consume his capital than the beginning of his decadence is reached and he inclines toward bankruptcy. Hence it is customary amongst men of trade and business to say of one who draws on his capital for self-sustenance, ‘It is all over with him.’ Now by the word of Christ, ‘To him that hath shall be given,’ is meant briefly: To him that hath the capital of Truth and Faith shall be given an increase of such when he employs this capital by living up to the requirements of Faith, and by communicating them to others in word and deed. Thus he who is endowed with any degree of capacity and ability must constantly exert himself in order to increase them, or he will see the beginning of failure and decadence. For this pause is like unto consuming ones capital, or allowing his capacity to decrease and thus fulfilling in himself the verdict, ‘And from him that hath not shall be taken away even that he hath.’ ”

On the impermanence of healing physical illness and the origin of good deeds from the Prophets

Florence Khánum spoke concerning a certain sect which is interested in healing physical ailments and devoted to what is called a better life than that of the usual sects. She then asked, “Are these people who claim to surpass the other Christian sects in charity and good deeds to be considered possessors of a {{p14}} special excellence or are they one of the new sects of Christianity?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered in words to the following effect: “Whatever good deeds man performs in this world have originally inculcated by the Prophets and Manifestations of God. Were it not for the Prophets’ teachings, man would remain ignorant and heedless like unto the brute beasts. For instance, if out of one thousand sheep nine hundred and ninety-nine be slaughtered before the eyes of each other, the last sheep would remain unmindful and continue heedless, diligently engaged in grazing. Material Philosophers say that they perform good deeds and therefore need no religion; not knowing that the very ‘Good Deeds’ they claim to perform have originally been taught by Divine Prophets. Hence true excellence consists in acknowledging the Manifestations of God and living up to their teachings. (For they set the standard of a truly good life and enable men to perform Good Deeds.)”

“As to healing the ills of the body and caring for the sick and the poor. This is very good, but its effect or result is not a permanent one. For when man is healed of one physical pain, another will sooner or later affect him; and finally as a result, bodily death will overtake him. But the healing performed by the Manifestation of God is of the Soul and is permanent, and the Life conferred by them is spiritual and therefore keeps man alive forever.”

On how long to offer assistance that is declined; intentions superior to acts

Florence Khánum asked: “If one is situated with a family or a number of people who are in need of help and assistance, and one should have tried his best to assist them with, however, no cooperation {{p15}} or encouragement on their part, — until one feels utterly impotent to render them any further assistance, — should he still remain with them and endeavor to offer them help, or should he leave them and go after his own business?” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “Man is responsible to the degree of his power and capacity.” (That is, man should do his best to help his fellowmen as much as it is possible for him.)

He was further asked: “If one feels grieved at his failure to help others much more than one actually could, while one had the desire and intention of rendering them greater help, what should he do?” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “In this case, the fact that one had the desire and the intention of helping is enough for him. For ‘God judges man’s deeds according to the intention which actuated them.’ This authentic tradition has come down from the Prophet, to wit: ‘A man’s intention or will is better than his act.’ This means that when a man has a good intention, that is, cherishes the desire in his heart for a righteous act, it is impossible that such an intention be anything but pure. Whereas, in acting, it is possible that selfish reasons may have prompted it. For instance, it is possible that a man performs a good deed with a view to personal interest; such a good deed done is not separated from hypocrisy and insincerity. But when a man cherishes a good intention, it is impossible that it be prompted by any prejudice or be intended for anything but good. In this sense, ‘A man’s intention is better than his act.’”

He further said in part: “It is possible that men may have a good intention to perform a worthy deed, but be without the means {{p16}} to execute it. For instance, a man may have the intention to succor the poor and assist the orphan, but be without the necessary means with which to carry it out. Such an intention will have its effect in the world of Existence, and will be accepted in the Kingdom of God. And if a man be enabled to put it into deeds it will be ‘light upon light’ (i.e. doubly acceptable, as is commonly expressed).”

On Sagacity and Intellect (Dhikávat and Aql)

We asked as to the difference between Sagacity and Intelligence (or intellect). ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered in part: “Sagacity is a power which enables one to become cognizant of the existence of a thing by means of the outward senses, or to feel the presence of a thing through certain outward signs. For instance, the slightest motion felt in a room makes one conscious of the presence of some one upon the roof, without, however, knowing who or what or which he or it may be. This is the limit of the knowing power of Sagacity. (* The term “Dhikávat” used by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which is here translated “Sagacity” better corresponds to the terms “Quickness of parts” or “The power of instinct,” as differentiated from “Intellect” or “Conscious intelligence” which I give as equivalent to the word “Aql” used here by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. ) This ‘sagacity’ or ‘Quickness of parts’ is to be met with in most animals, while in man this is found in a much less degree. For instance, if, during the night, some one enters your house clandestinely, the man of the house may not feel conscious of such presence, while the dog of the house will instantly become {{p17}} aware or it. Thus a dog is more sagacious than his master in the matter of the power of the instinct, but the dog has no intellect which is a gift particular to man. But the intellect is a power by which man ponders over things and secures tangible results from them. ( Or, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said elsewhere, “The intellect is a power by which man comprehends the realities of things. Or, it is a power by which man reasons from the part to the whole, or is consciously led from premises to the conclusion.” *) Among children, some comprehend things quickly, while others take time to reach a conclusion. The former are called intelligent and are praised by some as being superior to the latter who are laughed at and considered stupid. But often the child of the latter class, who seems slow, is endowed with superior intellect, and he therefore needs to ponder over things before pronouncing a judgment upon them. While having less sagacity and quickness of parts as possessed by the other, he surpasses him in real intellect.”

On intuition and the four kinds of light, and its duplication in others

We asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá concerning Intuition, or what is called “The Sixth Sense” (Or inner perception or insight. I translate it “inner perception” as this is nearer the sense of the word used by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá). He said in part: “Intuition (or inner perception) is a power or a light by which man comprehends and perceives the realities of things without the mediumship of the outward senses. To illustrate: There are four kinds of light: 1 — The outward (or phenomenal) light, which makes things manifest or {{p18}} visible, but which does not discover them. 2 — The light of the eye or Eye-sight. This makes things manifest and also discovers them, but it does not comprehend them. 3 — The light of the Intellect (or reason). This light makes things manifest, discovers them, comprehends them, but things pre-exist it, (i.e., its existence is posterior to the creation of things). 4 — The Light of God. It is the revealer of things (i.e., by it things are made manifest), the discoverer of things, the comprehender of things, and it precedes the creation of all things and follows the existence of all things, as it is said, ‘God is the Light of the Heaven and Earth’ (Qur’án).

“To be brief: The light which is the manifestor of things makes things manifest; the light which is the discoverer of things discovers them; the light which is the comprehender of things comprehends things. Likewise, the outward faculties and senses of man discover and perceive the appearance of things. But the light of Intuition (or Inner Perception) is a light which comprehends the realities and the core of things. Intuition (or Inner Perception) means the Divine Universal Reason, and it comprehends and grasps supernatural things and conditions which cannot be grasped by the outward senses.

The Prophets and Divine Manifestations have taught that this sense of Intuition, Inner Perception, or Innate Reason exists in man. Philosophers are also in accord with the Prophets in this matter, that is, to the degree of believing it possible that such a power may exist in man. For Philosophers do not deny the existence of powers which are supernatural. But Prophets demonstrate {{p19}}

the existence of this Inner Perception and Intuition in man in a practical way. They show forth this power first in themselves by inspiring men with the faculty of comprehending the realities of things and grasping things supernatural.” (That is, the Prophets prove the existence of Intuition or Inner Reason, by showing forth themselves such a comprehension which is beyond the power of any man. They also inspire their disciples with, and develop in them, the same power. This is illustrated in the life, prophetic vision and deeds the Prophets and their true followers.

Greatest Holy Leaf gives a most precious gold ring to a child

One morning, the Greatest Holy Leaf [Bahíyyih Khánúm] gave Raḥím a gold ring in which the Greatest Name engraved on a pretty black agate was mounted. This made my wife very happy. At luncheon she spoke of this to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and thanked Him for this great favor shown to our Baby. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “This Greatest Name ring was the dearest of possessions to my sister. This is why she gave it to your son.” Then my wife thanked Him for His kindness to her for the rest she was enjoying in the Household. He lovingly answered: “We have done nothing for you and we have been able to do nothing worth mention, but we have heart-felt love and this is the principle thing and of great importance.”

A Turkish official’s loss through indulgence; the endurance of sacrifice

One morning, I was in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the other pilgrims. A believer from one of the towns in the vicinity of ‘Akká was also present. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá inquired of him concerning a certain Turkish official. He said that this official was now imprisoned and closely guarded by four soldiers; that he was not allowed to see or converse with anyone. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, turning to {{p20}} us, said: “See, how for the sake of a trifling gain, people subject themselves to terrible difficulties and suffering and trial, though it gives them no result or benefit whatever. This is the consequence of exerting one’s self to gain the things of the world. But such is not the case in the Cause of God: for whoever takes a single step or endures the least hardship for the sake of God, it will never be lost or prove fruitless. Consider, how many people in this world have given life and property and sacrificed their families to bondage and captivity! But as they did not suffer this in the path of God, they profited nothing, nor were their names highly spoken of or even mentioned among them. But consider Ḥusayn who suffered martyrdom for the sake of God. He was refused water by his enemies. His family were made captives. But his very cry for water at the time of death was so far reaching that it still dings in the ears of the multitudes, — for he suffered martyrdom for the sake of God. On the other hand, consider the war between Japan and Russia: How about one million people perished during that war, either in actual battle, or from disease, or from fatigue in the deserts and mountains! Yet no one hears any mention of them, although there were many men of fame and glory among them. But when a single person suffers martyrdom in the Cause of God and gives up family and property, his name and mention continue forever. For he suffered this for an immortal Cause and endured trials for a Divine purpose.”

The Prime Ministers of Persia and transience; a prophecy for the current one

Speaking on the same theme ‘Abdu’l-Bahá continued: “When we were in Tīhrán, Mírzá Áqá Khán of Núr was the Prime Minister, and the Núrí family held official honors and positions, and had a great distinction among men. A little while, and that court of glory was {{p21}} closed and it became the turn of Amínu’d-Dawlih of Káshán to be the appointed Prime Minister. His carpet was also folded up and his time ended. Then Mírzá Husayn Khán “The Commander in Chief” was given the rein of affairs. He too passes away and was no more. Then Mustawfi ul-Mamalik became the Premier. He too went by and his time changed. Finally Amínu’s-Sultán became Prime Minister. He too went by, his carpet of fame was folded up. (* At the time ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke these words, Amínu’s-Sultán was in Europe. A year hence, 1906-1907, he was recalled to Tīhrán and reappointed Prime Minister, but he was assassinated in the same year. Hence the prophetic words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. *)

Uniform conditions in prison; the Turkish official’s indulgence

“To be brief: All these events transpired. Men come and men went by. But during all these transformations and changes in Persia, we have continued here in a uniform condition, occupied with our own affairs without suffering any change of position. All this, because our whole interest is confined to the Cause of God, and we have no attachment to the things of this world.” Then reverting to the Turkish official, He said: This official suffered such hardships and imprisonment for the mere reason that he had a salary of one thousand piastres, and he wished to raise it to fifteen hundred.”

Mr Harris; Covenant-breakers and specifics of their falsehoods; ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s appointment; petitions

In the evening at dinner, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá inquired of Mr. Harris. I spoke of him highly and praised him because of his eloquence and service to the Cause. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was rejoiced and, referring to the false statements of the Náqíqín, He said to us in part: “See how Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí has said that ‘Áqá (i.e., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself) {{p22}} has abolished and effaced the Cause of God!” By the life God, see you whether I, — who have caused the Cause of the Blessed Perfection to reach the East and the West until numerous devoted and eloquent souls like Mr. Harris have appeared therein, — have effaced the Cause, or Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí who has done so much harm by arising against me!” On the same subject He said in part: “That Bahá’u’lláh appointed me as the Center of His Covenant was not because I was His Son. Nay, I swear by His Holy Spirit, that had He found a negro of Zanzibar more capable than I am, He would have appointed him preferably to me!...”

“Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí exerted his utmost to bring about my exile from ‘Akká, in the vain hope that in my absence the believers would obey him, or that he would be protected! But he is too heedless to know that in case my life is destroyed, he too shall be afflicted with a great calamity.... Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí went even so far as to occasion the shedding of my blood. That is, he sent Jamál (* One of the Chief Náqíḍín. *) directly from here to Ṭihrán. The latter went to the Ottoman Ambassador and said that he ‘had lived for years in the Turkish countries and enjoyed the blessings of peace and freedom under that government; that he had thereby become such a well-wisher of Turkey that in order to express his gratitude to the authorities, he deemed it his duty to inform them of a matter which is vital to the protection of Turkey,’ etc. Then he said to the Ambassador of that ‘vital matter’ to wit:

“‘Abbás Effendi has brought the British people into ‘Akká and is considering turning over Syria to Britain, that he is in cooperation {{p23}} with the young Turk party, the Sulṭán’s enemies,’ etc...

“To be brief, by stating such falsehoods, Jamál stirred up such sedition and made such misrepresentations it seemed very difficult to explain or remedy them! Finally to prove the utter falsity of such assertions, Jinábí Adilíh (one of the venerable Bahá’í teachers in Ṭihrán) gave a copy of the “Book of Aqdas” to the Turkish Ambassador to see for himself. We too sent directly to the confidants of the Sulṭán two hundred and fifty petitions, letters received by us from the American Bahá’ís, for his consideration. Thus it was made known to him that our work is wholly of a spiritual nature and that our mission is entirely removed from such accusations; and that by the Command of the Blessed Perfection we are obedient to governments and are far from seditious.”

Muḥammad-‘Alí in India

Referring to the two trips to India taken by Muḥammad-‘Alí for seditious purposes during the life-time of Bahá’u’lláh, and to the fact that he even tried to set up a party by the help of Nadhír (who became a Náqíḍ) against the Covenant, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “I swear by His Holy Spirit that one day Bahá’u’lláh called me to Him saying, ‘Áqá! ‘Áqá! (* i.e., Master, Master!, the term by which Bahá’u’lláh addressed ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ) See how limited is your brother’s intelligence, for a man like this Nadhír has succeeded in leading him twice to India and bringing him back.”’ ( This refers to the plots in which Muḥammad-‘Alí and Nadhír were engaged to prepare the way for supremacy and become the leader of {{p24}} the Cause after the Departure of Bahá’u’lláh. Bahá’u’lláh knew of these too well, as is testified by many Tablets and incidents, especially by the Revelation of the “Book of His Covenant” prior to His departure, in which He clearly appoints ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as the One to whom all, including the Branches, are to turn for light and guidance. *)

On voting

One morning while speaking on various topics, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “Voting is a practical means for the settlement of any matters under consideration, especially because those who deliberate may naturally advance various opinions pertaining to it.”

On the House of Justice, its power, rule and divine confirmation

He then dwelt at length upon the subject of the House of Justice, and spoke words to the following effect: “The House of Justice is so mighty an organization that no one shall have the right to resist or oppose it. By that is meant the Universal House of Justice. That is, when all the local Houses of Justice of the different countries will be represented in the organization of a General House of Justice, that House will rule over all. For such a House of Justice shall be under the protection and infallibility of the Blessed Perfection and favored by His confirmation.”

On the infallibility of the House

In this connection I asked concerning infallibility, whether by this is intended the Power of the House of Justice to do and order that which it willeth, or whether it refers to another state. (* In the Tablet of Infallibility preceding the Tablet of Ishraqát — my translation — Bahá’u’lláh speaks of the Infallibility of the Manifestations of God to be their unquestioned authority to do that which they will or desire, for they are Manifestations of the Almighty, who is the possessor of Omnipotence and unquestioned authority. {{p25}} Bahá’u’lláh has conferred such absolute authority upon the House of Justice. For it is a foundation which safe-guards the order and unity of the world and the peace of society, and it would fall short of this vital accomplishment were its authority to be questioned by any one. *)

On infallibility; decrees of the House

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “Infallibility is of two kinds; (1) Intrinsic or immediate Infallibility, (2) conferred, extrinsic or mediate Infallibility. Intrinsic or immediate Infallibility means that God, exalted is His Glory, and none else save Him has any portion thereof. He is the doer of that which He willeth. And His Infallibility is specialized to His Universal Manifestations who appear at the head of each great Cycle.

“The conferred, extrinsic or mediate Infallibility is that of those Holy Souls who are under the protection of the Divine Manifestations, for preservation from error is conferred upon souls as a pure gift of God. God’s Infallibility is intrinsic, whereas that of the Holy Souls under the protection of His Manifestations is extrinsic, for it is acquired as a gift or quality from them. For instance, the light of the Sun is intrinsic or immediate, but the light of the planets is acquired from the Sun and is therefore extrinsic. The light of the Sun is independent of the planet, while that of the planet is dependent upon the light of the Sun. {{p26}} To be brief, God will raise pure, righteous and sincere beings for the House of Justice who will be under His protection and the decrees of the House of Justice shall be effective in all matters not especially ‘provided for in the Book.’ ”

Sex and number of membership of the House

Being asked as to the sex of its membership, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “The membership of the House of Justice shall be all men.” Being asked if the members of the General House of Justice will be nine in number, He answered: “The membership is not limited to nine. Nay, nine is the minimum number and it will gradually be increased nine by nine. For instance, it will be raised to numbers which are multiples of the number nine, such as eighty-one which is equal to nine times nine, and so forth.” Supplementary to the above utterances, I hereby translate an important Tablet, concerning the House of Justice, revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, for a Persian believer in the early years of this century:

Tablet concerning the House of Justice and its enactments of laws

He Is Al-Abhá!

O thou who art holding fast unto the hem of the Covenant!

Thy letter came and the questions mentioned therein were considered. ... Thou hast asked as to the wisdom of the formulation of certain important laws having been (in this Manifestation) relegated to the care of the House of Justice. It is to be known primarily that this Divine Dispensation is a purely spiritual and merciful one dealing with the things of the soul. It has hardly any direct relation with the physical and temporal affairs or with the worldly concerns. Similarly, the Dispensation of Christ was a purely spiritual one. In the whole of the Gospel, excepting the law prohibiting divorce and the reference made to the Abolition of the (Jewish) Sabbath, all laws were spiritual ones and directed to the cultivation of divine morals. {{p27}} Thus it was said, “The Son of Man has not come to judge the world.”

Now this Most Great Cycle is also purely spiritual and confers the Life Eternal. For the basic principle of the Cause of God is to purify morals, to beautify attributes and to moderate and adjust (Human) manners. And by this it is intended that beings veiled from the Truth may attain the station of Meeting, and darkened and imperfect souls may be illumined.

As to other laws (than those which concern the spiritual side of man), these are secondary to Certitude, Faith, Inner conviction, and Knowledge. Nevertheless, because this blessed Cycle is the greatest of All Divine Cycles, (laws concerning) all temporal as well as spiritual matters are laid down therein with the utmost power and authority. Consequently principle questions which constitute the chief foundation of the Law of God have been enacted and written (in the Book); but secondary questions (or those of less importance than the principal laws), have been referred to the House of Justice, The wisdom of the latter case is this that times do not always continue the same, and that change and vicissitudes are among the essential characteristics of the world of time and place. Therefore the House of Justice will act and order (those non-principal cases) in accord with the requirement of the times.

Moreover, let it not be supposed that the House of Justice will settle any matter in accord with its own thought and opinion. I ask forgiveness from God! (* This expression means, “No! Far from it!” *) Nay, the House of Justice will execute laws and settlements through the Confirmation and Inspiration of the Holy Spirit. {{p28}} For this House of Justice is under the protection, preservation and keeping of the Pre-existent Beauty (i.e., Bahá’u’lláh), and whatever it may decide must be followed by all as a fixed necessity and as a decreed obligatory duty, and there is no other refuge (or choice) for any one.

Say, O people! Verily the greatest (or universal) House of Justice is under the wings of Our Lord the Clement, the Merciful, that is, under His protection, supervision, preservation and guardianship. For verily He hath commanded the assured believers to obey that pure and sanctified Body and that Holy and Mighty Gathering. Its dominion is heavenly and divine, and its ordinances are spiritual and inspired.

To be brief, this is the purpose and wisdom of committing such civil laws (or secular, administrative ordinances) to the care of the House of Justice.

Similarly in the Religion of the Qur’án, all laws were not revealed as Sacred Texts; nay, even the tenth of the tenth of a tenth of them was not revealed (by the Prophet). Although the principal questions of importance were revealed, yet most assuredly some half a million of its laws were not put down (in the Book). Subsequently, these were legislated through the “Method of Analogy”. {{p29}} (* Or rules of deducting new laws from essential roots as revealed in the Text. *) During the early legislations, various individuals among the legislators advanced different opinions through their various applications of the method of Analogy, and these were enforced as laws.

No such legislation is entrusted to the body of the House of Justice and any deduction and selection (of laws by the “Method of Analogy”) by any individual doctor of laws is of no importance, unless it is submitted for approval to the House of Justice. The difference (* Between this system and that of legislation through analogical deduction by individual doctors as was the case with subsequent legislation in Islám. *) is this that by submitting such analogical deduction for the approval of the House of Justice, no disagreement will arise among different legislators; for the members of the House of Justice are elected and trusted by the whole community; while legislation based on individual doctors’ analogical deductions will necessarily result in discordant opinions and conduce to indecision, inharmony and dissension, destroying the oneness of the Word and the unity of the Religion of God and shaking the foundation of the Law of God.

As to the matter of Matrimony: This is entirely one of the laws of civil society, and yet its conditions have been revealed and its essentials explained in the Law of God (Book of Aqdas, etc.). But the marriage of kinsfolk has not been revealed in its details, and this matter has been referred to the House of Justice to settle according to the rules of Civilization and in keeping with wisdom and medical science and with the requirements of the human nature. There is no doubt that in accord with the rules of Civilization, medical science and human nature, the marriage of remote individuals (or non-relative or distant relatives) is better than the marriage of near kin. {{p30}} Although in the Law of Christianity the marriage of kinsfolk is in reality allowable, for a law prohibiting it has not been revealed in the Book, — yet due to the above consideration, the early Christian Councils prohibited the marriage of relations. Otherwise, this would be in force in all the sects of Christianity even at present, for this question is a purely civil (or secular) one.

In short, whatever decision the House of Justice may make in this matter, it will be a conclusive and inviolable Divine Law, and no one shall depart therefrom. With due consideration, you will clearly see how this matter of relegating civil (or secular) legislation to the House of Justice is in accord with a great wisdom. For whenever a new difficulty may arise, and an unexpected phase may come up in a question already decided by the House or Justice, a special session of the House can again be called to decide upon the new case under consideration, and remove the unforeseen difficulty. For the House of Justice has also the authority to abolish a decision that it itself has already made.

Such special phase in legislature was also allowed in the Qur'án, for it was referred to the Judgment (or will) of the Man of Authority (i.e., a ruler, chief, or head). No rules were revealed in the Qur'án concerning the different degrees or the limit of its application, but it was relegated to and made dependent upon the opinion of the “Chief Executive”, whose authority in the matter included the pronouncing of verdicts and even the death sentence; for the administration of affairs in the Islám community mostly revolve around this axis.

To be brief, the foundation of this Most Great Dispensation has been laid in such a comprehensive manner that its laws and ordinances are agreeable to and in accord with all future cycles and ages. {{p31}} It is not like unto the laws of the former Religions, the application of which is impossible and impracticable at the present time. For instance, consider the laws of the Torah (the Old Testament) which it is impossible to execute in this day; for they contain ten death sentences. Likewise in accord with the Law of the Qur'án, the hand of a man who may steal ten Dirhams is to be amputated. It is now impossible to execute such. No, by the Life of God!

But this Holy and Divine Law (The Bahá'í Revelation) is in accord with all times, ages and cycles. ... etc.

Upon thee be Al-Bahá! (Sig.) ‘A. ‘A.

Ego in American Bahá’ís; qualities become manifest to all

One day, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, speaking of the early stages of the Cause in America, said in part: “That which is always the cause of inharmony and delays the progress of the Cause of God is love for leadership and self-interest. Those who cherish such tendencies imagine that these will be concealed from others. But they know not that if anyone possess a quality, whether praiseworthy or objectionable, it is impossible that it may not become known to others, sooner or later. If it remain concealed today, it will be exposed tomorrow. And if a man do not possess a certain quality, he cannot persuade others of his possession thereof by dint of proclaiming it.

On humility and meekness; Mullá Ḥusayn’s submission to Quddús

“That which is conducive to the progress of souls, is humility and meekness, gentleness and evanescence. Every individual must suppose another to be the possessor of a gift of which he himself is deprived. This will cause every one to be humble and meek before another. One must not think of becoming leader. {{p32}} If anyone imagines himself the possessor of this or that high quality, and of certain superior powers not possessed by others, this will fill him with pride and haughtiness. But when each one supposes the other to be the possessor of a high gift, and therefore humbles himself before him, by this means all men will become humble before one another and love for leadership will wholly vanish. This then will conduce to the progress of individuals and to the advancement of the Cause of God. But he who entertains the desire to live for leadership will in the end be deprived. He will never succeed to serve the Cause of God. For instance, everyone in Persia praises Ḥájí Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí in writing to us. But everyone used to complain of Jamál in their letters. (* Jamál was the Bahá’í teacher who always posed a leader and tried to exact homage from all. He became a Náqíḍ after the departure of Bahá’u’lláh. *) The reason was that Ḥájí was humble and meek before all. He has been highly successful in the service of the Cause, and all believers love him. But Jamál was disliked by all because of his haughtiness, and you see what he came to in the end.

“To be brief: each one of the believers in mentioning the other must praise and speak highly of him. On a certain occasion some of the believers inquired of Ḥájí Siyyid Yahyá of Dáráb (* One of the martyred nineteen Letters of the Living. ) concerning Jinábí-Bábu’l-Báb ( Bábu’l-Báb was Mullá Ḥusayn Bushrú’í, the first believer in the Báb’s Message. *) and his character. He answered, ‘O that I were as worthy as a single hair of his body.’ {{p33}} This was the degree of his meekness, though he — Áqá Siyyid Yahyá — was of so high and lofty a rank (while a pontiff) that whenever he went to Tīhrán over thirty thousand Mullás, grandees and other city people would go out of town to meet him and show him the utmost respect.

“Upon another occasion Bábu’l-Báb was asked concerning Áqá Siyyid Yahyá, and he answered, ‘I can not be counted as worthy as the dust of his feet.’ To be brief, this is the meaning of meekness and humbleness, and this is the highest attribute of the people of faith.

“One evening Haḍráti Quddús (* The great soul who led the Bábís in the Shaykha Ṭabarsí fortress. *) went to the house of the Bábu’l-Báb. In those days, Haḍráti Quddús was not recognized as a man of high rank and authority. He was only accounted as a religious scholar. Bábu’l-Báb occupied the highest seat, and Jinábí Quddús occupied a place near the door. During that night various conversations and explanations took place between the two. This acquainted Bábu’l-Báb with the lofty degree of knowledge possessed by the young scholar, as a consequence of which he made himself humble before him. On the following morning, when the party of the preceding day went again into the presence of Bábu’l-Báb, they discovered a great change:

They found the young scholar occupying the highest seat, while in his presence stood Bábu’l-Báb with the utmost humility and meekness.

“To be brief: the principal thing in the Cause of God is humility, meekness and service to the Cause, and not leadership. {{p34}} I remember once when I was a child, I was in the arms of Jinábí Ṭáhirih (Qurratu’l-‘Ayn), and while Áqá Siyyid Yahyá of Dáráb was outside the room. He possessed great learning and was a man of high endowments. Among other things, he knew thirty thousand traditions and quoted verses of the Qur’án in demonstration of the Báb’s Manifestation. Jinábí Ṭáhirih, addressing herself to him said: ‘Oh, Jinábí Siyyid! Bring forth a deed if thou art a man of mighty action.’ (Qur’án) Hearing this, Áqá Siyyid Yahyá was suddenly so impressed that he became submissive and humble. It then dawned upon him that the matter is a different matter, and that it is not only to prove the claim of the Báb, but to sacrifice one’s life in spreading His Teachings. He traveled and taught the Truth in various cities until he finally suffered martyrdom.”

Mrs Watson; being undeterred by physical ailment

One day, while in His Holy presence, I spoke of Mrs. Watson and certain other American believers who, notwithstanding physical ailments and paucity of worldly means, are so devotedly active in the service of the Cause that it is a matter of astonishment to all. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “This is one of the conditions of the teachers of the Truth; he must possess pure severance, so that his words may produce such an effect on /the/ hearers that even if they do not become believers and approve the Truth, yet they will be impressed by his sincerity and devotion, and testify that he has no attachment whatsoever to the world, and his only purpose is Truth.” {{p35}} Then He gave the following illustration:

Story of a pilgrimage during Bahá'u'lláh's time in Baghdád and consulting the Qur'án

“During the years of (Bahá'u'lláh's residence at) Baghdád, word was brought that Mírzá Yahyá Khán, the Governor of Mázindarán, a nephew of Mírzá Áqá Khán of Núr, the Prime Minister, had come to perform the pilgrimage of the Shrines (at Karbilá and Najaf, etc.), and that he was now in Kázimayn. (* A city within three miles of Baghdád, where two of the twelve Imáms are buried. *) Because of former acquaintance the Blessed Perfection bade me go and call upon him. On arriving at his house, I found Siyyid Ibrahim, a Muḥammadan Mujtahid, was calling on the Persian Grandee, and was engaged in various conversations. Among other things, he asked the Khán as to the destination of his journey. In answer he named it to be Najaf (where the Tomb of 'Alí is situated). The Siyyid said, 'Oh no! Now that you have come this far, it is well that you go also to Mecca and have me also in your company to the pilgrimage of that Sacred Spot.' The Khán answered, that as manifold occupations awaited him in Persia, he was bound to be back in that country within three or four months, but that after returning thither and transacting his business, he hoped, God willing, he would start for the pilgrimage of Mecca in the following year, etc. The Mujtahid again persisted in his attempt to persuade the Khán by saying how many people had come this far and returned in hope of coming back at a future time and proceeding toward Mecca, and how they either had died or were unable to return and were finally deprived of visiting the House of God! etc etc.

“To be brief: He finally succeeded to the point of persuading the Khán to 'Consult the Qur'án' and then to act accordingly. {{p36}} (* This means taking omen from the verse appearing at the top of the page, when opened at random. This form of taking omen is frequently practiced by Muslims in Persia. *)

The Khán consented and ordered the Qur'án to be brought. The Mujtahid, himself performing the ablution of the face and hands, took the Qur'án and opened it for consultation. But to the utter amazement of the Siyyid, the verse at the top of the page, on which depended the whole decision, was a prohibitive verse, that is, a verse which seriously advised against the proposed undertaking. For a whole quarter of an hour, the Siyyid was lost in meditation, wondering what to say and what to do. Finally he said the verse was subject also to a different interpretation and he explained it in such a way as to mean a decisive command. Nevertheless, the Khán protested while astonished at the liberty taken by the Siyyid in controverting the meaning of the verse. In reply, the Siyyid, intent upon proving his own position, offered to cite an illustration. He began by saying: 'When Siyyid 'Alí-Muḥammad the Báb...' No sooner had he mentioned the name Báb than Mírzá Yahyá Khán realized that the Siyyid did not know me, and that he might offend me if allowed to continue talking against the Cause. In order to avoid such an awkward dilemma, the Khán seemed determined to make a sign to the Siyyid in order to stop him. As I wished to hear what the Siyyid would say in regard to the Báb, I so fastened my eyes upon the Khán that he found it impossible to use a gesture to the Siyyid without my noticing it. {{p37}} So he was obliged to remain silent, and the Siyyid continued: ‘When the Báb appeared, and his followers were on their way to the fortress of Shaykh Ṭabarsí, there was a man in Karbilá (* In ‘Iráq. *) called Ḥájí Muḥammad Taqí of Kirmán who was also one of the Báb’s followers. He was, however, a man of lofty character, and showed forth all the high attributes of the people of faith. That is, he was well known for faithfulness, rectitude, trustworthiness, sincerity, generosity, charity and obedience to the Divine Laws. As he was also a man of means, he greatly assisted poor religious students with funds. In short, he was so perfect in his life and deeds, that no one could find the least flaw or defect in his character. But alas! such a noble soul was a Bábí, and was intent upon traveling to the fortress of Shaykh Ṭabarsí to join the rank of his co-religionists. The Muslim Doctors and the Mullás in Karbilá who knew him to be such a good man, did their utmost to prevent him from the error of following the Cause of the Báb and traveling to Persia. But he would bring many proofs as the truth of the Báb’s claim and persisted in going to Persia to help His followers. The Mullás who were extremely anxious for his salvation, vainly endeavoured to prove to him his ignorance and his error. Finally they persuaded him to accompany them to the Shrine of Ḥusayn and stand with all humility before the Imám’s Tomb, and after earnest prayer, to open the Sacred Volume and ask for guidance in the matter. {{p38}} They agreed, that if the verse should contain a command, the Ḥájí would be convinced of the righteousness of the Cause and proceed on his journey, without any further interference on their part.

“To be brief: At dawn a body of the Mullás, accompanied by the Ḥájí, proceeded to the Holy Shrine, and after chanting the visiting Tablet, and performing the morning prayer, they made the following wish: “O Holy Imám: We pray that thou make clear to us through the verse in the Sacred Volume that we are about to consult, if this Báb is in error or his claim is true and sanctioned by God.”

“‘Then they took the Qur’án and opened it with all reverence, when, lo! the verse in their answer was the following: “Whoever turns aside from my Admonition, verily, he shall lead a miserable life.” (K. 8. 20) This verse astounded all the Mullás present. For they had all heard that in those days the Báb had already declared himself to be “The Admonition (i.e., Dhikr) of God.” (* The above verse is pronounced by many of the past commentators of the Qur’án to be a clear reference to the Manifestation of Qá’im. *) Great uproar and agitation arose among them, and they knew not what course to pursue. At last, they attempted to offer an explanation. They said: “The Qur’anic verses are of two kinds: ‘Perspicuous Verses’ and ‘Ambiguous Verses.’ And now this verse is not to be taken in its literal sense. Nay, we should interpret the word, ‘Admonition’, to be the ‘Holy Religion of Muḥammad’ and not a reference to the Báb.”’ The Siyyid resumed: ‘To be brief, Ḥájí Muḥammad Taqí would not listen to any further explanation, for the verse had added to his conviction. He, therefore, started for Persia to join the Bábís at Shaykh Ṭabarsí. {{p39}} He, however, did not reach his destination, for upon his arrival in Ṭihrán he was arrested and put to death as a Bábí!”

Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá continued: “I turned to the Siyyid and said, ‘O, eminent Sir! What is your authority in considering the above verse as being “an ambiguous verse,” needing an allegorical interpretation? Do you not know that all authoritative commentators of both the Shí’ah and Suni Schools have considered this a “perspicuous verse?”’ The Siyyid answered haughtily, “We have the authority and the right to interpret the last verse as an ambiguous one, and we also have the right to interpret the present verse dealing with the Khán’s pilgrimage to Mecca, in a similar way.” I answered: ‘You are plainly wrong in your interpretation of both verses. For by ambiguous verses is meant those whose literal sense is not in accord with the fundamental principles of the Law. Such verses are therefore liable to an allegorical interpretation. By perspicuous verses is meant those whose literal sense is plainly in accord with the general laws and fundamental rules of Faith. Such verses are therefore taken literally.’ This explanation admonished the Siyyid to some extent.

“Sometime after, this Siyyid Ibráhím attained to the Presence of the Blessed Perfection. During subsequent years, I heard Siyyid Muḥammad of Iṣfahán say that this Siyyid finally became devoted to the Cause of Karbilá. For when Siyyid Muḥammad had called on him, he had returned the call and expressed his love for the Truth. This story was cited to illustrate the fact that although Siyyid Ibrahím considered Ḥájí Mírzá Muḥammad Taqí of Kirmán a man of error religiously, yet he fully testified to his lofty character and noble life. {{p40}} Thus the Bahá’ís must live such a perfect life among men, that even those who will not see this Truth or believe in it, would not fail to be impressed by the noble life they live as Bahá’ís.”

The faith and assurance of the author’s wife, and in those accompanying Bahá’u’lláh’s exile, and those that complained

One night at dinner, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke joyfully of my wife as one endowed with great Faith. He testified to her sincerity, faithfulness and assurance in the most impressive tone of voice. He ended by saying: “This is the meaning of Faith! This is but true Faith. She is indeed possessed with perfect assurance. She shall indeed rest, she shall enjoy perfect peace.”

Speaking at length concerning true faith, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke thus: “When man has faith, even the mountains of the world can not oppose him, nay, he bears every trial and calamity, and nothing can conduce to his weakness. But one who is not a true believer, and does not possess real faith will lament over the least disappointment and complain of the slightest thing which may mar his peace and pleasure. When in company with the Blessed Perfection we arrived in Constantinople as exiles, we were all filled with joy and gladness and enjoyed great peace of mind. Then when we were removed to Adrianople we still continued in the same spirit in our new place of exile. None among us offered any complaint, except three persons: Mírzá Yaḥyá (Azal) who was extremely downhearted and confused: Siyyid Muḥammad of Iṣfahán; and Ḥájí Mírzá Aḥmad of Káshán. (* The latter two also finally denied Bahá'u'lláh and became Azalís. *) {{p41}} These three constantly complained of the hardships and bothered and troubled the believers. At least Mírzá Yaḥyá and Ḥájí Siyyid Muḥammad of Iṣfahán appeared morbid and sullen without complaining openly to others; they only seemed dissatisfied and lost in melancholy. But Ḥájí Mírzá Aḥmad, though a brother of Jinábí Zabih (one of the great Bahá'í Martyrs) constantly troubled the believers with fits of impatience, complained of the violence of the cold weather, and the severity of the snow and frost, often saying sarcastically: 'Though I often said at Baghdád that this Shaykh 'Abdu'l-Ḥusayn Mujtahid is busily engaged in making trouble for us, in company with the Persian Consul, working for our exile, no one listened or heeded my warnings. Now you all see how they brought about our exile to this wretched place, and afflicted us with great calamities in these cold countries. And now we are God's faithful servants and must need suffer these trials! etc.

"To be brief, He so constantly found fault with everything and showed impatience, that on several occasions the believers were provoked to the point of beating him, so that he might perhaps abandon us and leave the place. But each time I prevented them from so doing. But the rest of us, who were over fifteen in number and yet were obliged to live in one single room, were nevertheless filled with joy and composure, for we were blessed with exile for the sake of the Cause of God. And in order to pass the time, each day one of us cooked a certain dish for the rest to enjoy. So the severe winter went by and in the course of a few months the snow and cold passed away and the famous delectable spring-time of Rumelia came on. {{p42}} Then the weather was so delightful, that even the above Ḥájí Mírzá Aḥmad began to praise the glorious air of Rumelia.

"To be brief; as he had no faith, he could not endure the winter or restrain himself from complaining and remain patient until the cold weather would be superseded by fine weather.

"Now this is the difference between a man of Faith and one without Faith. A man of Faith endures every hardship and suffering with patience and self-restraint. But one without Faith bewails and mourns, and utters complaint. He has no power to endure hardships and fails to think of the future when better times will come as a substitute for present hardships. (* In these utterances we later saw a prophetic vision into the suffering my wife was to endure in Persia, during her long illness, the perfect patience she showed during that period and the coming of spring-time which brought on sufficient change for the better in the invalid, to allow our return to this country, where once again she was restored to perfect health. These words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá proved my chief stand-by during the many weeks when I was in constant attendance in my wife's sick-room. For nothing but the prophetic nature of these words spoken months before, could convince me that my wife would survive what seemed to be unfailing signs of an imminent death! *)

On joys from trials; a Zoroastrian Bahá'í from India, Mihrdban, and the fortune his broken leg brought him; the army officer

During our visit there was in 'Akká a Zoroastrian Bahá'í from India, named Mihrdban, who was a strong athletic young man. One day on his way to the Ridván in company with other pilgrims, he and a Bahá'í Siyyid from Persia started to wrestle together. {{p43}} The Zoroastrian, believing in his superior strength, underestimated his opponent's physical ability. So, the wrestling which started in a pleasantry ended by giving the Zoroastrian youth a broken leg. He was obliged to remain in 'Akká and treat his leg for a number of weeks before he was able to return to his country. On our arrival he was beginning to go on crutches to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house daily with the other pilgrims. He was, however, extremely happy over his broken leg which had allowed him such a long stay in 'Akká. Besides, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had visited him often at Musafir Kháníh to inquire after his health.

One evening I was in the Holy Presence with other pilgrims including the Zoroastrian young man. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of Mirraban and how a broken leg which was a great physical suffering became the means for the great joy the Zoroastrian's long stay in the Holy City gave him. He then continued in part: "Many a time, a calamity becomes the means to a bounty. Not until man has endured hardship because of a thing will he appreciate the full value of the thing. The more one suffers on account of an object, the greater he realizes its worth. It is said in the Qur'án: 'They will never attain (unto Divine Bounty) except through severe trials.' The more you search the earth and the deeper you dig into its bosom with the plough, the more fertile it becomes. For the people of Faith, calamities, trials and tribulations are conducive to spiritual progress; provided one endures them patiently and with severance for all else save God. It is said in the Qur'án: 'Did ye suppose that ye will enter the Paradise, but when trials, similar unto those suffered by men before you, come upon you, you were overcome with grief and afflictions?' Man cannot find intoxication without drinking from his cup. {{p44}} Man cannot take part in the hilarity of those drunk from the wine of the love of God without quaffing the cup of calamity. The more you beat the iron, the sharper it becomes; the longer you subject gold to red-hot fire, the purer and clearer it becomes.

"Even among the people of the world, and even in worldly pursuits, trials and tests play a similar part. The more a man endures hardship in a matter and the more trials one meets in learning a handicraft, the more experienced and skillful he becomes therein. But a man who spends his days in quiet and ease never attains a high degree in any matter. Once a great general told us the following story: 'While still a novice and a youth inexperienced in the art of war, I led an army corps to battle in company with other young officers. As soon as we encountered the enemy who gave us battle, we became wholly confused, and knowing of naught else, we turned our back to the battle and set to flight. While running for our lives, we were met by some veteran soldiers, who bore the scars of many wars. They asked, “O ye our officers! Where are you fleeing? Ye are our generals and leaders. Return and command us to repel the enemy and we will obey you, and the day will end in our favor!” We were encouraged, returned, led our troops and won the battle.’ Now you see how tried and experienced soldiers could strengthen and inspire their generals with courage. This is the worth of tests and trials, and the benefit of hardships and suffering! Trials {{p45}} and tribulations cause a true believer to ascend unto high stations.

One must therefore, know their value and wish for whatever suffering may befall us in the path of God. His Holiness the Supreme (The Báb) has said in one of His supplications: ‘Were it not to suffer calamities in the path of Love (* Addressing Himself to Him whom God shall Manifest. *) I would never have accepted to be born into this world.’ This is the worth of trials in the path of God!”

Barren ground made green and projects during the times of great danger; persecutions; repairing the Báb’s House; weddings

One evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in the little garden outside the house. A number of us pilgrims were present. Calling attention to trees and flowers he had planted, He said in part: “This was a place of dirt and refuse and loathsome to look upon. During the days when ‘Akká was in confusion (* Referring to the troubles of the previous year. *) and the whirl-wind or tests was violent, and a rumor persisted that they were about to banish us to a remote place, we were engaged in planting these trees and flowers, and laying out this garden. Now this has become such a delightful place. How surprising indeed is the assertion made by some people that existence needs no trainer! Were it not for the direct result of care and training, this place would have ever remained a heap of dirt and refuse.” Then He walked toward the house, followed by us all. In the sitting-room downstairs, He resumed the above conversation to the following effect: “While numerous obstacles were pending from all directions and great calamities surrounded us, we took up the building of the Báb’s Holy Tomb on Mt. Carmel. We also attended to the much needed repairing of other places. {{p46}} The Sacred House of the Holy Báb at Shíráz needed much repairing; and yet the people were so violently aroused against the Cause in the City and made so much trouble, that the believers could not even pass through the street in which the House is situated, — how much less to be allowed to work at it. The populace revolted against the Bahá’ís to such an extent, that even the Governor was made incapable of checking them. He finally said that nothing could be done, and that the Bahá’ís should quit the city in order to save themselves. Such was the news we received at the time from Shíráz. But we notified them not to mind the words at all, but to engage in repairing the Sacred House immediately. We wrote them: ‘Go and build, and let them come and destroy it directly!’

“To be brief: They began to work in repairing the House, and by God’s providence no one interrupted them, nor said a word against the undertaking, whereas the believers had at first thought that naturally no sooner they laid down one brick than the people would remove it. Thus all such repairing was completed. Moreover during those days of confusion and excitement at ‘Akká, we ordered the marriage of certain Bahá’í couples in the city, and spread feasts of rejoicing. All concerned shed tears and wept, saying, ‘Now is not the time for a wedding.’ But we insisted that it was essential for such weddings to be celebrated during times of confusion and trouble. Indeed God worked great wonders, and showed mighty munificence. For the times were very hard. {{p47}} What a colossal wave it was! and what an astounding storm raged! God does His work of protecting when it is most needed. Such events are all the means by which God executes His plans. Sometimes a stupendous, unforeseen calamity results from the means intended for peace and quiet; and sometimes calamity leads to tranquility and rest, confusion precedes composure, and a destruction results in rebuilding.

Stories of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s kindness to enemies

“When Áqá ‘Alí-Akbar was on his way to embark from Haifa, the Governor ordered his effects to be brought back and himself prevented from leaving! This was indeed very strange. The Governor then had his effects minutely examined, and the only ‘objectionable thing’ they could find was a page bearing, ‘Ya Bahá-ul-Abhá!’ They took this away, as if he should not be allowed to possess such an article! The Consul protested to the Governor for such treatment of foreign subjects, stating the Bahá’ís to be Persian subjects and entitled to equally good treatment with other foreigners. The Governor answered that the Bahá’ís were not to be classed with other foreign subjects; that they were hated by the Persian Government and it was not advisable for him, the Consul, to make a plea for their favor.

“But see God’s power! Some time after, this very Governor fell into a strange plight and was found in a helpless position; but overlooking his behavior towards the Bahá’ís, I treated him with kindness during his troubles. I even made him the present of an Aba (robe). I showed him so much affection that he began to doubt my having the least knowledge of his ill-treatment of the Bahá’ís during the days of his authority. He imagined himself to have used such diplomacy by which his acts of sedition against us had remained unknown to us. For how could he, other-wise, think it possible that we would treat him as a friend and show him kindness in the days of his trials? {{p48}}

“To be brief; When he was for personal reasons arrested and imprisoned by the order of the government, and no one dared associate with him, I expressed sympathy for him by sending him word that I would have even called on him in person had I not thought it probable that, at this juncture, this might give his enemies further occasion to do him harm. In truth nothing is sweeter in man’s taste than to do good toward those who have done him ill. For, whenever one remembers such kindness to one’s enemies, one feels highly rejoiced. In short, I showed kindness to each one of the officials who, during those days of trouble, had ill-treated the friends. They found my kindness to them so unexpected that they imagined me ignorant of their former deeds. And I never displayed the slightest sign of my knowledge thereof, lest they might be confused and feel ashamed.

Persecution increases the Cause

“Were men endowed with a sense of justice, when they realize that even during such times of great troubles and with so many obstacles against it, nevertheless the Cause of God continued in steady progress, — they would acknowledge this Truth. Praise be to God, in the very midst of great persecution and troubles, the Cause of God was in progress in Persia. But I did not mention this lest it might create an uproar! Thus it is clear that had this not been the Cause of Truth, such events and obstacles would have already extinguished it. But, as this is the Cause of God, it grows in spite of obstacles, and torrents of opposition but intensify its fire. {{p49}} But if they had exiled us to a remote place, this would have created a greater fire of enthusiasm, and the Cause would have made sudden and greater progress everywhere!”

Necessity of a holy life; Bahá’ís appearance in scrutinizing eyes

Concerning the necessity of a holy life for every Bahá’í, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “Today the world’s gaze is extended to the lives of the Bahá’ís: when they find a believer committing an evil deed, they may imagine such to be the deed of all the Bahá’ís or permitted by the Founder of the Cause. Thus they may judge the whole community by the misdeeds of one of its members. He whose deeds do not accord with his words is not a true Bahá’í. That is, a non-Bahá’í who leads a good life does less harm to the Cause than a Bahá’í whose life is not righteous.”

On alcohol

In condemning drinking, He said in part: “Man should be intoxicated with the wine of Knowledge and drink from the Chalice of Wisdom. For this joy and exhilaration continues to Eternity. Man should be intoxicated by gaining increased intelligence, not by that which quenches reason and decreases consciousness.”

Bahá’í Holy Days; Declaration of the Báb

In celebrating the Feast Day [Holy Day] of the Báb’s Declaration, a Banquet was spread at which all the Bahá’í pilgrims and Bahá’í residents of ‘Akká were present. In the morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took tea, with the believers, and the Tablet of the Feast, revealed by Bahá’u’lláh, was chanted. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had a copy of this Tablet given to me to translate to be sent to the West. This I did with great joy. While at tea ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke words the gist of which is the following:

“These Bahá’í Feasts are celebrated in the East according to the lunar calendar.

We also celebrate them here in accord with the lunar reckoning. {{p50}} For this was the custom during the days of the

[NOTE: page 50 missing] {{p51}}

On celebrating the Declaration of the Báb; ignoring ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s birthday and making no other special days then at its purest.

“The beloved of God must therefore consider this Day highly blessed, and glorify and praise it greatly. They must bring this Day to a close with the utmost joy and happiness and gather together in the spirit of infinite love and affection. If a sad feeling should have existed between two individuals, it should be cast away with the dawn of this Day: Great joy and happiness must be the common bond of all who come together at this feast. By chance my birth has also taken place on this Day. But all must celebrate this Day as the Anniversary of the Báb’s Declaration. And because my birth also happened on this day, they must not consider it of importance. Let the Declaration of the Báb be the significance of this Day, and not my birth. In America the believers have celebrated this as my birthday; but this Day is the beginning of the Voice, the beginning of the spirit, the beginning of the Effulgence (of the Manifestations of Bahá’u’lláh). It must be celebrated out of regard for these facts, and for the dawn of Unity which has taken place on this day, and because the Blessed Perfection has celebrated it and has revealed many Tablets in its commemoration. The believers must commemorate this Day with all joy and gladness. To celebrate this for other purposes is against the Law of God. No feast days can be set aside or created except [i.e. which are not the] Feasts which concern the Blessed Beauty and His Highness the Supreme (the Báb).” Then turning to all of us present at table, He said with great emphasis and earnestness: “Do you understand what I am saying? For if contrary to this be acted upon, it would become like unto the numerous feasts and holidays of certain sects which, out of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, have some hundred and eighty feast days. {{p52}} To sum up, The purpose is that this day is the anniversary of the Báb’s Declaration, and it must be celebrated as such. Not only my birth, but the birth of hundreds of thousands of people has coincided with this Day. So, this mere coincidence must not be used for celebrating a feast for my birth.”

Refusal to seek his own release from prison; the importance of sacrifice

One evening while I was in the Holy Presence with other pilgrims, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “Certain officials in the City have requested me to write a petition for them to use before the higher authorities to bring about my release from incarceration. I have answered, ‘God forbid that I write such a thing! This is far from being my wont.’” He then continued: “This imprisonment is a rest for me. There is no hardship in it. God willing, by the Grace of the Blessed Perfection, I must suffer great hardships and persecutions.” Then He quoted a verse from Bahá’u’lláh’s great poem (entitled Varqá’iyyih) in which Bahá’u’lláh says: “The sign of irons is still manifest on my neck; the scar of fetters is still visible on my limbs.” Then He added, “While Bahá’u’lláh has suffered such persecutions, God forbid that we seek anything but suffering, hardships and pains.” Referring to what He called “the rest” occasioned by His imprisonment, and to the many responsibilities that afflicted Him before being confined within the walls of ‘Akká, He said: “When we were in Haifa, we suffered great troubles. That is, compulsory responsibilities, such as those of intercourse with outsiders, occupied our time considerably. But now I am at rest, and my outside occupations are not even one-half what they were then. How can I call this a prison? Here are roses, trees, plants, the sea view. {{p53}} Moreover, it behooves man to endure hardships. For hardships train man for higher efficiency. Ease and pleasure are becoming to the basest of the multitude. No one who has the least particle of Faith in God seeks the least degree of ease and indolence. Were ease and pleasure and freedom from hardships to be considered the highest result of human life, no man could equal in this the cattle. For even when a man becomes the master of great wealth and attains the loftiest honor in the world, a mere cow grazing on the hill-side will by far surpass him in ease and contentment. For the cow enjoys the whole pasture as her sole property, while a man of wealth wrestles with obstacles and hardships and his labors benefit others. For a little bird perched upon the loftiest branch of a tree on a hill-top commands a view and occupies a height that Kings might envy. He has no troubles or trials. But such freedom and loftiness are of no consequence; while a man who endures trials, and sacrifices ease and comfort to great achievements, is endowed with true independence.”

Farewells to a pilgrim party as His ‘letters’ and ‘books’

In bidding farewell to a party of departing pilgrims He said: “Though I had not time to answer all the letters you brought from your cities, you are the true letters that I send unto them as answer. For there are two kinds of letters: Written and creative. Creative letters are the beloved of God, for they are the manifest book in which the mysteries of creation are read. {{p54}} Those who act in accord with the Exhortations of the Blessed Perfection are as eloquent books which no reading can ever exhaust.”

On developing talents to their perfection

“Bahá’u’lláh has said that whoever has an art or handicraft, it is incumbent upon him to endeavor to develop it to the point of perfection — even though that art be as humble as that of weaving straw matting. For it is said by His Holiness the Báb that the degree of Perfection reached by a thing is its Paradise. That is, when a thing is developed to the highest point possible for it, it has reached its paradise; while its failure is its hell.”

On being calm and firm and not being shaken by worrying news

On Friday, July 6, 1906, in the evening, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was seated in the reception room downstairs, surrounded by believers. He sent for me and gave me a letter to translate. When we were all seated, He spoke concerning the necessity of continuing firm, and steadfast in the Cause of God under all circumstances. He said in part: ‘The believers must not be influenced by the conditions in ‘Akká, be ‘Akká in a state of calm or confusion. No matter what happens in ‘Akká, the believers in every country must look upon the Cause of God which is increasingly Calm and Mighty — even if ‘Akká is in turmoil. Last year when ‘Akká was disturbed, the believers became agitated everywhere. The only place where the believers kept their poise was Tīhrán, where they attended to teaching the Truth and to their duties in the Cause as usual. ‘Akká is the Most Great Prison of the Blessed Perfection; it is therefore bound to experience sudden changes and various conditions, — to be calm and cheering for a time, then to be in trouble, now to be in peace and quiet and again fall into turmoil and agitation. {{p55}} But the Beloved of God must look to the Cause of God which is unchanging in its general aspect; that is, they must be in great enthusiasm and devotion, and act in accord with the Laws and Exhortations of Bahá’u’lláh.

Unimportance of numbers; the importance of purity and adherence; story of Mary Magdalene

“The main purpose is that all should be wholly attached to the Cause of God. They should not suppose that the greatness of number is necessary to accomplish the Mission of the Cause. Nay, I swear by God, than whom there is no other God, that if five persons arise and act wholly and literally in accord with the laws and commandments of the Blessed Perfection, they would equal five million souls in efficiency. Thus, the believers must adorn themselves with good deeds and pure actions, and obey the Law.” Then pointing to the lamp in the room, He said: “This lamp is efficient through its light, so the light of men is their deeds. To be brief: Whatever may happen in ‘Akká, the believers throughout the world must not become lax in their duties; nay, they must serve the Cause which is of the utmost importance. When His Holiness the Spirit (Christ) was martyred, the only one who was not disturbed at all was Mary Magdalene. For the rest of the disciples were confused and discouraged. When Mary became a believer, and fell upon the feet of Christ, although she was a villager of no good repute, Christ did not withhold His feet from her. This caused many of His followers, as well as many among the Jews, to turn away from Him. But Christ heeded them not, and said to Mary: ‘Arise, thy sins are forgiven.’ Then Mary arose and repented; and from that time on devoted herself to the service the Cause. {{p56}} Mary had a friend among the Roman officers (who at that time were Masters of the Holy Lands). He was the one who protected her from enemies after the death of Christ. When she had brought the disciples together and confirmed them in the service and inspired them with courage after the Crucifixion, she herself went to Rome into the presence of the Emperor. How marvelous indeed were the words she spoke to him! She said to the Emperor: ‘I have come in behalf of the Christians to bring to your notice the fact that Herod and Pilate martyred the Christ at the instigation of the Jews. But now they have both repented of their deed. For they were Roman Governors and to them Jews and Christians made no difference. For, indeed it was not the Romans, but the Jews who were the chief antagonists of Christ. Now that they have realized the wrong they have done and have repented, they are engaged in punishing and suppressing the Jews for instigating them to commit this act. But I have come to appeal to the Emperor to prevent Herod and Pilate from punishing the Jews. For neither Christ nor we Christians are pleased that the Romans punish the Jews because of their condemnation of Christ!’ The Emperor was greatly impressed by these words, and he praised Mary highly. This was why in those days the Christians did not suffer persecutions in those lands, and engaged in spreading the Gospel.

“Later the Roman officer who protected Mary asked her to marry him. She answered that, as a follower of Christ, she would not marry him unless he believed in Christ also. Thus he was converted and then joined to Mary according to the ceremonies of a Christian marriage. By relating this, it was meant to illustrate the steadfastness and firmness which was manifested by Mary after Christ’s Crucifixion. Now the beloved of God must live up to their own duties and serve the Cause, and they must continue firm and steadfast no matter what may happen in ‘Akká. {{p57}} They must gaze toward the horizon of the Cause and obey the Laws or Bahá’u’lláh.”

On St Peter and St Paul’s martyrdoms

One evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that “both Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom with all steadfastness by the order of Nero.” He said, “This is a clear and indisputable fact.” This statement proved of great benefit to me; for I had not yet seen any text in the revealed words of this Manifestation in regard to the martyrdom of St. Paul.

On suffering, hardships and wants

Concerning sufferings and hardships, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Men are trained and developed through these; that is, through poverty, vicissitudes and want. Otherwise, God would have ordered that His friends and Saints become endowed with great wealth and every material means. All must beg of God for real severance and detachment from the world. For this is of the utmost importance.”

Persecutors now seeking reconciliation; prohibition of conflict

One evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed the pilgrims in part: “Those who first arose to persecute us and plotted against us are now seeking a means for reconciliation. We have no quarrel with anyone, nor have ever had any. Praise be to God, the Blessed Perfection made us free and blessed us with peace. He forbade us all conflict and strife and commanded us to show love and kindness to all the world. {{p58}} Strife is to be shunned as the worst of things, for it diminishes man's spiritual powers and ruins the soul; and it keeps one subjected to constant torture."

On food that is prepared with love — story of the poor couple in a desert hut

We spoke of the Feasts and how the food served was delicious. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said in part: "A food that is prepared in love and partaken of in love gives one great delight. Nay, whatever is done with love imparts great delight. When we were in Baghdád, there was a poor man living in the desert who used to earn a scanty living by digging up thorns and selling them in the city. He was a very devoted believer. Often he had invited me to take a meal with him at his house. Finally we agreed to go with some of the believers. He lived about twenty miles away from Baghdád. The day was hot and we walked the whole distance until we reached his dwelling. It was a very small humble hut made with reeds put together in a triangular shape with a small entrance to it. He was alone with his wife — a very old woman — located in a lonely desert. He asked us to enter the hut. We found it so narrow and the heat there was so excessive that all decided to leave the hut for the open; but having no shelter from the darting rays of the hot sun, we were all obliged to reenter it and make the best of the shelter. Then the man dug a little hole in the ground and set fire to a few thorn bushes. Having made the fire, he threw upon it some lumps of dough which he made before us with no yeast to raise it. This was his bread which he threw upon the fire to bake by covering it with ashes! After a few minutes he took the lumps out of the fire. The outside was burnt while the inside was plain dough. Then he brought some dates and served us with the bread. Because he was a true believer and had a great love, that plain coarse food tasted so delicious that we all enjoyed it. He had great faith and our presence filled him with joy. {{p59}} The food in that humble hut gave such a good taste that I can still relish it in memory.

"To be brief: The world is full of delicious foods and rich meats. But that which is taken in love and served through love gives the most delicious taste. We spent the night with him, and next morning we returned to the city. He was very happy to entertain us and we were delighted to visit him, for he had a great love."

Specifics of the recent troubles and Bahá'u'lláh's protection; the importance of love to all

'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of the troubles in 'Akká in the preceding year, and how Bahá'u'lláh protected him and the believers against the terrible seditions of their enemies. He said part: "Our shelter is strong; our protector is a Mighty One. He protected us last year when the enemies made such false representations which might have resulted in our destruction. They accused us before the government of such deeds which if any one had committed he should deserve to be condemned to death. For instance, they asserted that we had founded a new dynasty and established a new religion. The enemies even made a banner on which they displayed the Holy Words ‘Yá-Bahá-ul-Abhá!’, and sent it to The Porte [Constantinople], saying that we had hoisted that banner and carried it through the city among the tribes of the Arabs and incited the Arabs to rally around us to raise a revolt. They even said the Arabs had responded to our summons, had all become Bahá’ís and were ready for action against the government! They even sent the absurd report that we had created a new Mecca, i.e., the Holy Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, and a new Medina, i.e., the Tomb of the Báb on Mt. Carmel! They had represented us as men of revolt and sedition and as enemies of law and order; while it is known clearly throughout the world that we seek for peace and unity. {{p60}} While Bahá’u’lláh has commanded us to love all mankind and work for universal peace, and has forbidden us corruption and sedition, how can we ever have committed such evil deeds? I take refuge in God from such false accusations! We wish for the good of all. The Blessed Perfection has forbidden all to bear rancor, hatred or enmity towards anyone. He has purged our hearts from animosity and hatred. He has blessed us with love toward all men.” ... Then in a gentle tone of voice, addressing Himself to Bahá’u’lláh, He chanted a few lines of poetry, the translation of one or two of which is the following:

“O Lord! Let friendship exist between Thee and me. I have no fear if the whole world is my foe. Let the whole earth abandon me, if Thou abide with me as my Protector.” etc. ...

The power of Truth to shine — stories from previous Manifestations

On Friday, June 29, 1906, in the evening, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed us (the pilgrims) in the following words. Pointing to the stars in the Heavens, He said in part:

“Were the whole world to act together in order to prevent these stars from giving light — verily they will fail to do so. Now, see how unwise are the enemies of the Cause — who are endeavoring to resist this Truth and quench this Light. How senseless are they! They do not see the Power of Bahá’u’lláh who proves the Truth of Christ to unbelievers after nineteen centuries, the Truth of Islám after thirteen centuries and the Truth of Abraham after four thousand years! They do not realize the Bounty of this Manifestation in that it upholds the Truth of all the Religions and unifies mankind upon the basis of faith in one God. {{p61}} When Sulṭán Muḥammad II besieged Constantinople and was bombarding the walls of the city to enter it with his triumphant army, one of the Ministers of State rushed to the residence of the Christian Patriarch to report the critical condition and ask for advice. He found the Patriarch calmly seated at his desk engaged in writing. The Minister asked: ‘What is your Eminence writing?’ ‘A book disproving the mission of Muḥammad,’ answered the Patriarch. The Minister rejoined with great emotion: ‘Now is not the time to write against a

Prophet, the army of whose followers has already entered the city, and will in a little while control everything.’

“Today the opposers of this Cause show the same heedlessness. While the Cause is spreading with the swiftness of lightning, and its great light is blessing nations, its enemies attempt to resist its strength and prevent its beneficent effects. When Christ was crucified He left only eleven Disciples, and yet see how Christianity encompassed the world! Bahá’u’lláh at the time of His Departure had from one to two hundred thousand followers. While they have already filled the world with His light, see how marvelous will be its effects in the future! When we were exiled to Constantinople from Baghdád, the Persian Ambassador at the former city did his best to bring about our total destruction. Supposing he had succeeded in destroying us, — could he destroy the Cause of God? They said they would wholly annihilate the Cause by destroying the Báb. Could they do so? No, the very martyrdom of the Báb strengthened His Cause a thousand-fold. Now some people imagine the Cause of God depends upon my existence; and that by destroying me they could destroy the Cause! Verily, this is far from reality. Nay, when I go, the Cause will make great progress after me. {{p62}} Remember this, Ye can [not] destroy and finish the Cause of God.”

Departing pilgrims should scatter love, good deeds and faith across the world

In bidding farewell to some departing pilgrims, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in part: “Ye came and visited the Holy Place and associated with the Beloved of God. It is hoped ye will carry with you the effect and result of this contact as a present to your countrymen. The result of this association is good deeds, the glad tidings of the Love of God, devotion, enthusiasm, love towards mankind, rectitude, honesty, harmony, gentleness and benevolence. Do not look to the world, their deeds and words, their enmity or unkindness. Look to the Blessed Perfection, and show love to all men for His sake.

Radiance in the face of the persecutor; to say only good for all people and governments; Sháh Muḍaffar

“If a man does you harm with his tongue or his hands, be not grieved; but smile and be rejoiced, and treat him in turn with utmost love and sincerity. It in your hearing anyone reviles and execrates you, heed him not. Say unto him that you are commanded by the Blessed Perfection to wish good to those who hate you, to love those who wish you evil, to consider the stranger as a friend, and to have your gaze purified and sanctified from all that men do and extended toward God whose Bounty comprehends all. Say, ye are commanded to speak not a single word of evil against any one nor against the Government.

“In reality, Sháh Muḍaffar is very gentle in his action and it is not indeed possible for him to show you more consideration than he does. Besides, God has now brought it about that the administration of affairs be in the hands of both the Government and the people. {{p63}} (* This refers to the new Constitutional Regime in Persia. *) To be brief: God willing, ye will be assisted by the Confirmations of the Blessed Perfection and will be favored by His Protection and will attain to His Good Pleasure.” etc. ...

On discerning the future vocation of children

Florence Khánúm asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá concerning the training of children. She asked: “Should parents train their children according to their own wish and judgment, or should the children be trained along lines for which they show a natural ability?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “Parents must find out as to that calling or profession for the acquisition of which their children show the most aptitude and natural desire, — and then they must train them in the same, by engaging their attention in that direction. For a child will sooner or later make manifest his natural abilities and gifts. To train his natural abilities in a manner different from this is not right. For it has often been found that certain parents forced their child to study a certain line desired by them for which, however, the child had no natural aptitude. Thus the child lavished years of his life in that line, with no progress whatever. This shows that the child’s abilities were adapted to some other line of study.

On punishment and discipline of children

Then it was asked as to the early training of small children, as for instance if it were allowable to punish children? ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “If by punishing is meant striking, No, this is very bad for the child. Children should be trained through love. But if parents show them the utmost love without requiring of them good behavior, and thus make them feel that in any case the parents will treat them with love, such a feeling will lead the child to rebellion and disobedience. {{p64}} For he will see that, whether he behave well or ill, the parents will love him. A child must be so treated that even though he is convinced of the parents’ great love towards him, he may still be more convinced that the parents have a greater love for lofty human qualities and perfections. That is, they love the child because of the virtues of faithfulness, godliness, truthfulness and devotion which he should show forth in order to justify their love for him. When the child see that the parents love him more for his good qualities than purely for his own self, then he will endeavor to obey his parents by characterizing himself with noble qualities. For he will know that by this means, his parents’ love for him will increase, and that to neglect this, he shall forfeit their greater love and affection. If this course in training the child be overlooked, he will be raised discourteous, disobedient and untrained. These Arabs do not give their children good training. For when their children show no regard for good human qualities and persist in disobedience, not only the parents fail to reprimand or correct them but they will even feel displeased or resent it if other people speak of their children’s unenviable qualities. Thus the Arab children grow up disobedient and untrained. To be brief; parents should so conduct themselves that the child shall know that they love good character and noble qualities in him more than they love the child himself.

“But by no manner of means should the child be beaten. For if by beating, it is meant to correct and threaten the child no fear is greater to the child than the feeling that he will offend the parents and forfeit their love through disobedience and evil conduct. {{p65}} This feeling should be developed in children.”

On discerning and undiscerning children

It was asked, “How should little children, such as ours (then one year old), be treated in order to be trained?” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

“Children are of two kinds: Those capable of distinguishing and those incapable of distinguishing (right and wrong). Now, this child is too young to have the power of distinguishing and his sense or feeling has not yet developed. He should therefore be allowed to remain as he is until he grows older and develops capability and adaptability to training.

On always speaking the truth to children

“In training children, it is essential that the parents never speak to them anything but the truth, and never try to cheat or appease the child through untrue words or promises. For instance, when the parents wish to go to the garden and prefer that the child remain at home, they should not try to cheat him by saying that they are not going to the garden but to the bath or to any other place not loved by him. No, if it is not advisable that they take the child with them, they should tell the child the truth that they are going to the garden but that, because of this or other justifiable reason, it is not allowable for him to accompany them. For if the parents start for the garden, and tell the child that they are bound for another place, — then when they return home and may have by chance a rose or a flower in their hand, the child noting it will detect their falsehood and thus learn to disbelieve them.

“Likewise, a child should not be frightened into good behavior by the mention of a wolf (or any improbable object), for when he once noticed that the wolf did not come, he would know that the parents did not tell the truth. {{p66}} This will make him discredit their words, will diminish his respect for them, and finally will lead to his ill-training and bad behavior. To sum up, parents must so behave before their children that they may be noble examples to them in words and deeds.”

Tablet to Miss Farmer; on organizations to achieve ideals: only spiritual ones succeed

In answer to the message which I brought from a believer, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dictated the words which I translate as follows:

“Inquire after Miss Farmer’s health on my behalf and convey to her my greeting and say: “Many ideas are conceived by the human mind, some of which are based on the truth and others on untruth. Each one of those ideas which is reflected from the light of truth becomes realized and attains a tangible existence; whereas ideas not based on truth, which haunt the human mind, come and go, producing no tangible result, like unto waves on the sea of imagination. Such ideas are never realized in the world of existence.

““Similarly, numerous assemblages and gatherings have been organized during past ages and early periods, all of which however produced no result or fruit. Only such assemblages which render unmixed service to the Light of Truth flourished and conferred great results upon the world.

““For instance, consider how thousands of gatherings religious, political and literary, were organized during the past ages in India, Persia, Turkistan, the lands of China, and in short, throughout all Asia. None of these gatherings produced any result, except the little gatherings of the Apostles upon the Mount, fifty days after the Crucifixion of Christ. All that transpired in Christianity through the diffusion of the pure fragrance of Christ and the promotion of His Gospel in uplifting humanity and training and guiding the souls in the pursuit of a noble life — are traceable to the effects of that early reunion of the Disciples. {{p67}} Nay, the results of that gathering have continued even to the present day.

““Similarly if in this day praiseworthy results and everlasting effects are sought after, it is necessary that Green Acre shall be made a gathering place for the Word of God and an assemblage for heaven-aspiring spiritual souls.

““The fossilized, two-thousand-years-old superstitions of heedless and ignorant multitudes of Asia or Europe should not be spread in that gathering-place. Otherwise, it must be known for a certainty that that Assemblage will produce no result whatsoever. Nay, it will before long be abandoned and forgotten, even as did the above-mentioned assemblages of the past.

““I beg of God that that esteemed maid-servant of God may become the cause of spreading the Word of God, so that the Light of Truth may shine forth and the world be illumined. When you consider attentively, you will realize that what has been said here is but the truth, while all else beside this is pure imagination and superstition, which is vanishing and unenduring.

““A tree must possess roots, in order that it may bear fruit. The trees of the forests of Asia have imparted no fruit for thousands of years. But the Blessed Trees of the Divine Manifestations have each so flourished and developed that they have fed and trained the whole world with fruit and yields. Upon these be greeting and praise!”

(Sig.) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás. {{p68}}

Six Tablets to the author

The following Six Tablets revealed in my name are translated here for the benefit of readers as they contain highly instructive points. These are translated in full or in extracts:

Tablet regarding Hindu beliefs; the inability to transcend the human station; spreading the Cause

I.

He Is God!

O thou intimate companion of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

I pursued your letter to His Honor Manshádí and noted its contents. You have written concerning the statements of certain Hindus.

Exalted is God! (* Used as a note of exclamation. *) What speech is that and what an idea and supposition whose error is obvious! In the world of humanity, certain personages appeared who became the trainers of the world, shone forth like unto the sun, were adorned by the people of all religions, became recipients of Divine Revelations and dawning places of the light of Truth. Consider, therefore, the human temple, and see to what heights of loftiness and exaltation it has reached!

On the other hand, many exist as human beings who are adorers and worshippers of stone and clay, that is, the mineral, which is the lowest of beings. Consider how base and low are they when their object of worship is the basest of things, such as stone, clay and mineral!

How then can one compare the two above classes of human beings with each other? No, by God, this were a great calamity! The outward is the expression of the inward. In the different species and classes of beings, none that progresses can reach the station of a higher being. {{p69}} For instance, no matter how much the mineral may progress, it will not attain the virtue of growth in its mineral world. Likewise the vegetable, no matter how much it may progress and develop in the vegetable world, it will never attain sense-perception. Similarly the animal, no matter how much training it may receive or make progress, it can not attain the rational faculty.

It has thus become evident that the beings have, each of them, a particular station, and that each progresses in its own station. Similarly, human beings have each an innate station, and each progresses in its own station and grade. A witless person, no matter how intense a discipline he endures and how abundant an exertion it may make to become a new creation, he never can attain the station of the Dawning-places of Revelation and Day-springs of Inspiration. The “Tree of Zaqqúm” (* Qur’án — a tree of bitterest fruit. *) will not become a lofty palm tree, and the fell colocynth (i.e., bitter-apple) will never bear a sweet fruit. What imagination is this? What a strange superstition and supposition is this! How astonishing that people listen to such superstition!

To be brief: O, Jinábí Khán, let us refer to that which concerns ourselves. These days (* Referring to the great troubles of those times in ‘Akká. *) a great danger seems imminent. You and the beloved of God must be in such a state that no matter what may happen, even if this Holy Land fall wholly into confusion, or even if greater troubles come up, you should by no means become lax or fail (in your duties). {{p70}} Nay, (in that case) you should wholly forget yourselves and abandoning rest and ease, make yourselves extremely humble and evanescent in the Cause of God, and you should raise your voice and call out and spread the Fragrances of Holiness.

Convey Most Wonderful, Abhá greeting to the maid-servant of God, Florence Khánum, and kiss the cheeks of Raḥím-Qulí Khán.

(Sig.) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás.

Tablet on steadfastness and faithfulness as the magnet for divine confirmations

II

He Is God!

“Praise be to God, it has been repeatedly proven that firmness in the Covenant and activity in the service of the Cause is the means by which man is favored with Divine Confirmations both in this world and in the world to come; and Man’s eternal felicity is built and dependent upon his attainment to this excellence. I swear by the Light of Truth, that if anyone arise with a sincere heart and sanctified character to serve His Highness the One God in these days, all the existent beings will become his servants and every door will be opened before his face, and he will see success and victory approaching him from every direction. {{p71}} This is but the truth! But this state is conditional upon his showing steadfastness, loftiness of character and exceeding purity and sanctity; in order that all men may testify that such a person is the essence of faithfulness, the reality of guidance and the banner of the Kingdom of Abhá.” (* From a Tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. *)

Tablet on sacrificing all things to reach immortality

III

He Is God!

“O Thou Jinábí Khán! Exhort thou all the believers, and say:

“The Beauty of Abhá — — — has opened a great door before your faces, and has bestowed a weighty gift upon you. Ye must appreciate its value and sacrifice yourselves. Nay, we must forget ourselves entirely; we must wish for no rest and seek no joy. We must seek no name or fame, no ease nor abundance nor convenience. Nay, we must sacrifice everything, in order that we may enter the Kingdom of Immortality.” (* From a Tablet by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. *)

Tablet on Bahá’í Teachers; its greatness and the need for strength

IV

Concerning the duties of a Bahá’í Teacher.

He Is God!

“O thou servant of the Holy Threshold of the Beauty of Abhá!

I read what you had written to Jinábí H. Siyyid Taqí. Thank thou God who has made thee a teacher of His Truth and assisted thee in encouraging and guiding the seekers. If, God willing, thou arisest in all that is worthy this station, before long thou wilt see great results and gain extended victories. This station (that of teacher) is in this Day the greatest of all stations, and this is acceptable in the Threshold of the Almighty. {{p72}} Every sincere soul who arises in this Day to spread the signs of the Kingdom and engages in guiding the seekers, will be assisted by the Invisible Hosts and rendered successful and victorious by the army of the Kingdom of Abhá. But in this path (* I.E., As a Teacher of Truth. *) men must endure every suffering and calamity, and one must by no means become lax; nay troubles and trials must tend to increase his efforts and calamities must strengthen his wishes (for service).

“I hope you will show a firm and steadfast footing in this station, and be so evanescent, humble, detached and resigned, that thou mayest become a sign of the Almighty’s Mercy, and the Cause of guiding a great number of souls in that country. ....

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sorrow at recent martyrdoms

“O thou my friend! Because of the painful occurrences and frightful sufferings inflicted upon the friends in Persia, the shedding of the blood of the Martyrs, (* The Tablet was revealed for the translator at a time when one hundred and fifty Bahá’í men, women and children were destroyed and martyred in Yazd Persia by the mob, about five years ago, i.e., about 1902. *) and the utter helplessness of their survivors, — my condition was like unto that of a shepherd whose sheep have been torn by wolves. I cannot describe my state and my sorrows. In every hour a martyrdom and at every breath an unavoidable hard fate, and at every instant an affliction! Thus both writing and speech have been out of the question. {{p73}} I however, wrote answers for the letters sent by you, in order that no interruption may intervene against the spread of the Fragrances of God; and this was due to my love for you.”

(Sig.) A. A.

Tablet on Bahá'í Teachers and Believers — unity, humility and evanescence

Concerning the duties of Bahá'í Teachers and Believers.

V

He Is God!

“O thou intimate companion of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

You must so hoist the banner of nothingness and utter humility that thou mayest diffuse the pure fragrance of Severance in those lands and regions, and spread the spirit of entire devotion, sacrifice, spiritual nothingness, Merciful Unity, oneness, singleness and the Abhá Bounty in that country. This is the essence of the Cause. I beg of God that we may all be assisted and confirmed therein.

The beloved of God must be as one soul, one spirit, one heart, one thought; nay each should be ready to sacrifice life for the other, and each must present himself as an offering for the other in every instant. Not until love and unity, singleness and fellowship have reached this degree will the loved one of confirmation and success become manifest, unveiled in the gathering place of the spiritual ones.

To be brief, guide thou all the friends unto unity:, fellowship, harmony, accord and spiritual oneness. If this gift, which is the eternal Bounty of the Beauty of Oneness, be freely and worthily spread in that country, the mystery of Truth will certainly become manifest, and the Beauty of the Merciful One become unveiled. Otherwise, the tree of being will remain fruitless, and all efforts will be as unproductive as the summer cloud is rainless. This is the truth of the matter! Wherefore exhort the beloved ones in friendship, and urge the chosen ones on to poverty (of all else save God) and evanescence; and encourage the righteous ones in that unity which is the Strongest Handle. {{p74}} (* i.e., chief means for deliverance. *) For the everlasting Bounty of the Beauty of Abhá is but pure love, is the attachment of hearts to each other, and is unmixed union, in order that all may thereby become drops of one stream, waves of one sea, rays of one sun, the fragrance of one rose-garden, the flowers of one field, the nightingales of one meadow and the lights of one assemblage. This is the quality of the sincere ones! This is the attribute of the favored ones!”

Upon thee be greeting and praise!

(Sig.) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás.

Tablet on America — great movement afoot, shortage of teachers, spirituality and equality needed

VI

He Is God!

“O thou servant of the Beauty of Abhá!

From the contents of thy letters it has become evident and clear that the standard of the Cause of God is in great motion in those lands, and the musk-scented fragrance is wonderfully diffused in those regions; and that seekers and inquirers are numerous, but that teachers are few, nay fewest in number. This is the Decree of the Mighty and Knowing One!

Up to the present time, favorable conditions have not been available. His Holiness, Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, has written us that were there one hundred teachers in the land, there would be enough hearers to listen to them. {{p75}} God willing, confirmation and assistance will reach you. ...

Now it is necessary to cultivate lofty attributes in America, so that such souls may be found who will be truly worthy and befitting the Cause of God; who may be wholly humble and meek and quit of self and personal desire; who may abandon their own wish, purpose and personal aims; and be resigned to the will of God; who may shine forth from the horizon of the Love of God like unto the Holy Souls (Bahá'ís) in Persia, and may hasten into the field of sacrifice with the utmost joy and gladness. Not until man reaches this station and acquires such morals and qualities is it possible for him to find (spiritual) success and prosperity. For, man must fly upwards through this power. And without this, (spiritual progress) is impossible. For some may gain an enthusiasm for a few days, which in a short time may be extinguished by a prevailing apathy.

That which is conducive to constancy and steadfastness is severance from all superstitions and grades, and is firmness in a state of humility and meekness and utter separation from all else save God."

(Sig.) 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás.

Tablet on meetings; themes, unity and focus

Portion of a Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"Thou hast written concerning the meetings and the gathering-places of the believers of God. Such assemblies and congregations will greatly aid the promotion of the Word, — and all the audience, whether friends or not friends, become affected. {{p76}} But when the friends have the intention of entering these meetings and assemblies, they must first make their purpose pure, detach the heart from all other reflections, ask ceaseless Divine Confirmation and with the utmost devotion and humility set their feet in the gathering-place.

"Let thee not introduce any topic in the meeting except the mentioning of the True One, neither must they confuse that merciful assembly with perplexing outside questions. They must either teach or open their tongues in propounding argument, either commune or supplicate and pray to God, read Tablets or offer counsel and exhortations.

"Make an effort in every meeting that the Lord's Supper may become realized and the Heavenly Food descend. This Heavenly Food is knowledge, understanding, faith, servitude, love, fellowship, kindness, purity of purpose, attraction of hearts, and the union of souls. It was this state of the Lord's Supper which descended from the Heavenly Kingdom in the Day of Christ. When the meeting is continued after this manner, then 'Abdu'l-Bahá also is present in heart and soul, though His body may not be with you.

(Sig.) 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás.

Tablet on becoming a servant of the Divine Garden

Extract from a Tablet (* Through the translator. *)

“O thou esteemed one: This world is like unto a forest, and its trees are fruitless. Now the Divine Gardener hath come in order to make this unfruitful forest a Divine Garden and increase its trees in fruit and yield, through Divine training. {{p77}} Before long thou shalt see how this Gardener will engage in adorning the avenues of hearts with the flowers of Significances, and make the trees full of blossoms and fruits.

“Accordingly, exert thyself in heart and soul so that thou mayest become a servant in this Divine Garden and be the cause of honoring and exalting the world of humanity. In whatever work thou mayest engage, its results are temporary, except this great Cause, which gives results and imparts Eternal Life.

Upon thee be greeting and praise.”

(Sig.) 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás.

On Daniel Chapter 9

Tablet revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

He Is God!

O thou sincere servant of the Beauty of Abhá!

Thy letter was received and its contents were noted. It is earnestly hoped that, by the Grace of God, thou wilt be assisted with strong Confirmation, wilt open thy lips in praising and glorifying the Ancient Lord, chant the Verses of Guidance, hoist the banners of Righteousness, raise a ringing voice throughout the world, become a personified spirit, an embodied light, a shining lamp and a beaming star. Be thou hopeful in the gifts of the Beauty of Abhá, for they make the earth luminous, develop pebbles into gems of exquisite color, change the mere clay into royal pearls and mold the dusky stone into a cup of great price.

You had asked concerning the twenty-sixth verse of the ninth chapter of Daniel, {{p78}} that ‘though the meaning of the twenty-fourth Verse is made clear, the reality of the twenty-sixth verse is yet unknown.”

O thou affectionate friend: Know thou that four proclamations were issued from Kings for the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The first is the order of Cyrus issued in the year five hundred and thirty-six B. C. See the Book of Ezra, Chapter One.

The second proclamation is from Darius, which was made in Five Hundred and Nineteen B. C. See Ezra Chapter Six.

The third is from Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign. This was in Four hundred and fifty-seven B. C. See Ezra Chapter Seven.

The fourth is from Artaxerxes in Four hundred and forty-four B. C. See Nehemiah, Chapter Two.

Daniel's reference concerns the third proclamation. His Holiness Christ lived thirty-three years. When we add the figures thirty — three to Four hundred and fifty-seven, the total is four hundred and Ninety; and this is the Seventy weeks complete. (i.e.,  $70 \times 7 = 490$ .)

Likewise, in the twenty-fifth verse (Ch.9), Daniel speaks of "Seven weeks, and three score and two weeks." Then mention is made of another week which completes the seventy weeks, in the midst of which week the "Sacrifice and the obligation", ceased by the Martyrdom of His Holiness Christ.

This matter in detail is this: There are two dates stated (by Daniel). One of these dates has its start in the decree issued by Artaxerxes for Ezra concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and terminates in the ascension (Martyrdom) of His Holiness Christ. This date comprises seventy weeks.

The second date begins with the finishing and completing of the rebuilding of Jerusalem, {{p79}} and ends in the ascension of Christ.

This date comprises three-score-and-two weeks. For, the rebuilding of Jerusalem took seven weeks, — each day of which weeks is one year. That is, it was completed in the seventh week. And the interval of time beginning with the completion of the building of Jerusalem until the ascension of Christ, is sixty-two weeks; and in the sixty-third week, which immediately follows and is connected with the sixty-two weeks, the ascension of Christ took place. This date of "Seven Weeks" is the period of the rebuilding of Jerusalem.

Thus if you take the date to begin with the issuing of the decree of Artaxerxes, it will comprise seventy weeks, and if you take it from the completing and finishing of the construction of Jerusalem, it will be sixty-two weeks; and in the midst of the sixty-third week the sacrifice ended by the martyrdom of His Holiness Christ.

On the wisdom of the author's trials and their future departure

O thou servant of God! I am informed of thy trials and calamities. There is a wisdom in this, of which you shall personally be informed afterward. At present you must bear them in the utmost patience and endurance. These hardships and troubles shall vanish, and happy times shall arrive, and these calamities and afflictions are not due to any shortcoming on your part, but are because of consummate (Divine) wisdoms.

On spiritistic discoveries of the soul

You had written concerning spiritistic discoveries. The human spirit is a power which comprehends the realities of things. A that thou seest such as arts, inventions, traces and discoveries, were once in the realm of the unknown, and were a hidden matter. {{p80}} But the human spirit discovered such hidden mysteries and brought them out of the sphere of the unknown into the visible world.

For instance, the power of steam, photography, phonography, telegraphy and mathematical problems were all once a hidden mystery and unknown secret; but the human spirit discovered such invisible mysteries and brought them from the hidden into the visible world. Consequently, it is a comprehensive energy, and has control over the realities of things, and discovers the hidden secrets in the domain of the physical world. But the Divine Spirit discovereth Divine realities and cosmic mysteries in the realm of the Divine (Supernal) World. I hope thou mayest attain the Divine Spirit, discover the mysteries of the Divine World and comprehend the secrets of the physical world.

On John 14:30, the Prince of the World

You had asked concerning the thirtieth verse of the fourteenth chapter of the Book of St. John, where His Holiness Christ has said: "I will no more speak much with you, for the Prince of the World cometh, and hath nothing in me." [Jn 14:30] By "The Prince of the World," is meant the Blessed Perfection. And "He hath nothing in me," signifies that after Him (i.e., Jesus), all receive bounty from Him; but that He (Blessed Perfection) is independent of, and does not seek bounty from Him (Jesus), that is, is in no need of bounty from Him.

On the relationship and disclosure of souls after death; the equality and stations of souls

You had asked concerning the disclosure of spirits after the dissolution of the bodies. Undoubtedly the Other World is a world of disclosures and vision, for there the veil will be removed, and the human spirit will witness the souls above it, beneath it, or of an equal rank with it. As an example to this, when man was in the foetal world, he had a veil before the eyes, and all things were therefore covered from him. {{p81}} When he is born out of the womb into this world, because this world in comparison to the foetal world is a world of disclosure and vision, he can witness all things here with his outward eye. Likewise, when he departs from this world into the Other World, whatever was veiled from him in this world will become disclosed unto him in the Other. And in that World he will comprehend and perceive all things with the eye of Insight, and will witness those like him, equal unto him, above him or outside him.

As to the equality of spirits in the Supreme World: By this it is meant that the spirits of the believers, at the time of their appearance in the world of bodies, are equal; and are all pure and unsullied, But in this world, they will find distinction: Some attain to a lofty station, some seek an intermediate grade or stagnate in the early stages. This equality (of the spirits) is in the original state of their being, and this distinction is after their ascension (or departure from this life).

On Seir, a place in the direction of Nazareth

You had written concerning “Seir”. Seir is a place in the direction of Nazareth, situated in Galilee.

On Job 19:25, “For I know that my redeemer liveth”

As to the words of Job, spoken of in verses twenty-five and twenty-seven, chapter nineteen: “For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth”, etc. But in this place, the purpose of these words is that “I (Job) shall not continue abased, and I have a protecting friend, and my helper and Redeemer shall in the end appear. And though, now my body is body is weakened and afflicted with worms, yet I shall again be healed, and shall see Him with this mine eye, that is with mine Insight.” {{p82}} These words were spoken by him after he had been blamed, and after he had himself too spoken of the intensity of his afflictions; and after his body was suffering from worms by the violence of disease, he wished to say that he shall be healed from all his diseases and shall see his Redeemer with his own eye in his very body.

On John’s Revelation Chapter 12

As to the “Woman” who betook herself to the wilderness, as spoken of in the Twelfth Chapter of the Revelation of St. John, and the great wonder which appeared in heaven, and “the woman who was clothed with the sun and the moon under her feet.” By this woman is meant the Religion of God spoken of here under the term “Woman”; and the two orbs of “Sun” and “Moon”, that is the two empires of Turkey and Persia, are under the shadow of the Religion of God. The sun is the emblem of the Persian Empire, and the moon, that is, the Crescent, is the sign of the Turkish Empire. And by the “Crowns” (* Though the “Crowns” are mentioned as “Seven”, yet they mean the Twelve Imáms, because there were five proper names common to the Twelve Imáms, whereas Seven different names belonged to the Twelve. Hence “Seven Crowns” (i.e. Twelve Imáms). *) is meant the Twelve Imáms Who assisted the Religion of God like unto the Apostles. And as to the “Man-child which was brought forth”; This child is the Promised Beauty (i.e. Bahá’u’lláh) which was born out of that Religion of God.

Afterward it is said that the woman fled into the wilderness, that is the Religion of God was transferred from Palestine unto the wilderness of Ḥijáz, and remained there for One Thousand Two Hundred and Sixty Years, that is unto the day of the Manifestation of the Promised “Man-child.” {{p83}} And it is evidently that in the Holy Scriptures each day is given as one year.

Upon thee be greeting and praise!

(Sig.) A. A.

In the following, I translate some Tablets and extracts from Bahá'u'lláh:

Homily during the Wedding Ceremony (Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh)

The Homily to be read during the Wedding Ceremony:

“In His Name, the Giver, the Bounteous!

Praise be to God, the Pre-existent, the Everlasting, the Eternal the Changeless, — to Him who has testified to His Essence by His Own Essence. Verily, He is the One, the Independent, the Lofty!

We testify that there is no God but He, and we acknowledge His Singleness and Confess His Oneness. He has been everlastingly in the height of His loftiness and in the summit of His Impregnability sanctified beyond the commemoration of all else save Him, and purified, and independent above all commendation by all else beside Him.

And when He desired to accomplish the order of the World and show His Bounty and Beneficence unto nations, He enacted Laws and established Paths, wherein He laid down the Law of Matrimony, and appointed it to be a fortress for prosperity and salvation; and He commanded us to act In that which He revealed from the Holy Kingdom in His “Kitáb-i-Aqdas” (i.e. Book of Bahá'í Laws), and this is His saying, Glorified is His Might, ‘O ye people! Engage in matrimony, in order that there may appear from you that which (or those who) may commemorate and praise Me among My servants. {{p84}} This is My command unto you, if ye will take it as a helper unto yourselves!’

And we salute and bless the followers of the Bayán who are the people of Bahá, — those who expended their efforts in promoting this Manifest Religion, and whom the reproaches of blamers did not prevent from following God.

Praise be to God, the Lord of all the Creatures!”

Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh — “In the Name of the Object of the Whole World!...”

“In the Name of the Object of the Whole World!

Praise beloveth and befitteth that Beloved One who has ever been and Who will remain unto all Eternity. His Mercy has encompassed all in existence. This Mercy, in its primary state, is the declaration of proof which becomes manifest from the day-spring of Providence of the Merciful One, — in order that all may thereby attain unto knowing that Sea of Pre-existence which is the Essential Motive for the creation of the world.

“In its secondary state, this Mercy is the Divine Commands, through which mighty and great ladder all may ascend unto the station of Sanctity, of Singleness and unto the summits of Glory of Oneness.

“Blessed are those who in this day arise to assist the Cause of the Lord of Mankind with spiritual attributes and pure deeds. God willing all the beloved ones must be in the utmost love and friendship, and never fall short in helping one another. The meaning of the term “Mowasat” (i.e. fellowship) revealed in the Divine Book is this, — That each one of the believers must consider the others like unto himself, that is, he should not count himself superior to other; that the rich should not withhold their goods from the poor, and that they make equal choice for other believers of whatever benevolent deeds they choose unto themselves. This is the meaning of “Mowasat”. {{p85}} And the limit intended for “Mowasat” (in the Book) has been to this degree, — to exceed such limit is accounted before God of selfish grades and egotistical desires. Nay, God forbid that we do so! Beware lest ye commit that which is not loved by God. God willing, all must engage in this commemoration with the utmost sanctity and purity.

“Verily He is the Commander, the Hearer, the Knower!”

The Perfect Word (Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh)

“A word was seen in thy letter which is indeed a “perfect word.” If any soul acts (in the spirit of) that word, he will attain to all good, and it is this: ‘O my God! O my Master! My wish is Thy Good Pleasure.’

“Ask thou God that thou mayest continue firm in this word. Blessed is whosoever drinks from this Cup and is of those who know! God’s munificence is boundless and His Grace is endless; There never is any interruption in the Bounty of the Bounteous One. He has ever granted the wishes of all; In some instances, He has delayed this, as it has been deemed advisable for the person who made the wish. Otherwise, he will attain unto the best of that which he has wished. But for those souls who are indeed holding fast unto God’s Good Pleasure, another (loftier) station is ordained. Blessed are they! Blessed are they! ...”

Parents of believers in the next world (Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh)

“You had asked concerning the station of parents in the next life. {{p86}} One of the special bounties of this Manifestation is this that every soul who believes in the Dawning Place of the Cause, the Rays of the Sun of Divine Favor will surround his parents, although they may not have attained to belief in the Manifestation. This is His Bounty unto His beloved Ones. Praise thou God, and be of those who are thankful!”

“I exhort you, O ye my beloved, to show forth the utmost great Trustworthiness among my servants and creatures. For, through trustworthiness the Cause of God will be uplifted in the world, and the sanctity of the Cause will become manifest among men. Be ye trustees among the servants!

“Thus have We exhorted them in the Tablets. Verily, thy Lord is the Knower, the Wise One! Say: Trust ye in all matters in the forgiving True One. Verily He bestoweth that which He willeth upon whomever He willeth and He prevents whomsoever He desireth from that which He desireth. Verily He is the powerful, the Mighty!

“Let not the things of the world grieve you. God has indeed ordained unto you that which naught in creation can equal, were ye of those who Know. Be ye firm in the Cause in such wise that the storms of the misleading ones may not shake you.”

Souls and their acquaintanceship after death (Tablet of Bahá’u’lláh)

“As to thy question concerning the souls, and their acquaintance concerning the condition of each other after their ascension (from this life): Know thou, Verily the people of Bahá who are established in the “Red Ark” [Crimson Ark] will ever associate, consort and harmonize together and soar and travel and ascend in company with each other, as though they were one soul. Verily, they are of those who are informed, who will perceive and who will have knowledge. {{p87}} Thus has the matter been decreed on the part of the Knowing One, the Wise One!

“The people of Bahá who dwell in the Divine Ark are all informed of each other’s conditions, and they are in the society and company of each other intimately. This station depends upon the Assurance and the deeds of those souls. Those who dwell upon the same plane are informed of the state, particulars and degrees of each other. Those who are situated on a plane lower than that of these souls are not entirely and duly informed of the degrees and stations of those on a higher plane. Each has his (particular) portion before thy Lord. Blessed is the soul who turns unto God and is steadfast in His Love, until his spirit soars up unto God the Sovereign, the powerful, the Forgiving, the Merciful! As to the souls of those who do not believe (in God); By my life; they will know of their failings, and will cry and lament both at the time of death and after the departure of their souls from their bodies.

“This is very evident and clear that after their death, all will be informed of their own deeds and actions. I swear by the Sun of the horizon of Power that at that time such a joy will come upon the people of Truth which it is impossible to mention. Likewise at that time, such fear and trouble and anxiety will come upon the people of error harder than which can not be imagined.

“Excellent is the condition of whomsoever receives the pure immortal Chalice — wine of Faith from the hand of the Possessors of Religions, and drinks thereof”’.

Extracts From Notes Taken At 'Akká

Aline Shaw Devine

Oct. 13, 1906?

Yesterday Oct. 13, word came from Mírzá Jallal that 'Abdu'l-Bahá receive me at 'Akká where Miss Bingham had preceded me. Today we had several short interviews with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In explaining questions He spoke first of prayer.

Is it right to address prayer to a Manifestation of God?

It is as difficult for the human mind to understand the Essense of God as for the watch to understand its maker; but thro the Manifestation it becomes easier to understand its Spirit and therefore draw near to it. Otherwise we must form for ourselves a mental conception of God, which may be a false one. The only test of its Truth lies in the influence the conception has on our lives. If it makes us kind and loving in our relations with our fellow man, we know it is a true one. In other words it must produce in our hearts a love of God which must be transmitted into love of man.

Is it right to pray to 'Abdu'l-Bahá?

He shook His head positively, made a negative motion with His hand, then replied with emphasis, "No, not to Me but to the Glory of God, Bahá'u'lláh, whose light I reflect."

Is a newborn soul newly created?

Yes, every soul has a beginning, but once created is immortal.

At the conclusion of this talk, 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose and walked up and down while He spoke. He said that while these questions were interesting and might be endlessly discussed, the only thing of supreme importance is that we learn to know and love God. Going up to a mirror that hung in a wall, He said His hand on it, saying make your heart as bright and as shining as this mirror, so they may

My Impressions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Hooper Harris

December 1906

Dear Mr. Hoar: You write re that many of the friends in America are anxious to know my impressions of 'Akká and of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. How shall I write so as not to feed the fires of superstition on the one hand, or fail to do justice to the greatness of the subject on the other? There are times when we find the symbols we call words entirely inadequate and when we know that, in spite of all effort to avoid it we shall be misinterpreted and misunderstood. There are some unkind ones who, if we allow the heart to express itself freely, will accuse us of emotionalism and over-credulity; and there are others Who, if we restrain the heart, and write of facts as facts, setting them forth in their physical aspect only, will accuse us of lack of spiritual comprehension and almost of infidelity. However, God knows the heart, and acknowledging responsibility to Him alone, I shall endeavor to convey to all interested something of the impressions received on my visit to the Beloved One at Most in December, 1906, now nearly four months ago.

To begin with, I would to God that all the people of the world could see and know 'Abdu'l-Bahá as I saw and know Him! Then indeed would war, strife and conflict cease, the fires of hell and hatred cease to burn, and peace and good will reign on earth. But if we write of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as a personality, as a man, we must describe him as the simplest and most humble and most natural man in all the world. He indulges in no poses, makes no pretensions, asserts no superiority, claims no special privileges and in no way whatever, seeks to impress you with his dignity and importance. He will eat with you, walk with you, talk with you, ask about your health, discuss the simplest matters with you, and answer your most trivial questions. In every sense of the word he is natural, and in every sense of the word simple. The physical eye will observe no halo, see no sign of supernatural power, detect nothing, in fact, that might not be noticed in any really good, simple minded and naturally dignified man. We shall see one who, like all those in this world who wholly sacrifice themselves to God, the evil minded can lie about, accuse of evil and of ambition, mock at old revile. In a word, 'Abdu'l-Bahá will appear to us so simple and so natural that we will wonder what it is that some have been able to see in him, Who have set in circulation certain stories Which have appealed powerfully to the imagination of many, and which may easily, in time, pass into records of signs, wonders and miracles. We will find it difficult at first to realize that this simple, dignified, kindly and lovable man is the Centre of a spiritual power, of a knowledge and inspiration which is re-creating the world; and is the object of a love and devotion Which no man in the history of the world, except Bahá'u'lláh, his father, ever received in his lifetime. And this love and devotion is not confined to his followers, but is seen in those who know nothing of the Religion of Which he is the Centre. We will see high Turkish officials (his jailors), Turkish women of high rank, and people of all classes and conditions come to consult him on their most important matters, to seek consolation and advice from him in their domestic troubles and to ask for his prayers. Twice a week we will see the poor gather around him to receive gifts at his hands, their only benefactor, their only real protector, in this prison city of squalor and wretchedness. We will plainly see, even with the physical eye, that there is something in this simple, unpretentious man which causes all around him to lean upon him in all things, and to regard him with a love and devotion which prevents his bitter enemies (a mere handful of envious and jealous ones) from speaking ill of him except in the most round-about and stealthy manner. What is it in this man that conquers all who come in contact with him? This man to whom all about him go in their troubles, but who himself, if he has any troubles, never mentions them except to rejoice over them as victories! This man who is so universal that from him we never hear the word "I"

As I write these words tears fill my eyes and run down my cheeks. I, whose heart has often seemed to him like a stone, a man hard-headed and combative by nature, accustomed to indulging in plain speech, and in argument to giving and receiving blows, one who has never been regarded as sentimental or emotional - I, as recall my Impressions of this man, am obliged to confess that my heart melts like wax that the tears blind my eyes, and that all desire for controversy and argument, except as God may will, is taken out of me. What, I repeat, is the strange power of this man, so simple, so natural, so unassuming, who asks for himself no special consideration or reverence whatever, but who continually points us to the things of the spirit and to God? To tell, so as to make myself understood, is beyond any power which God has given to me, or to any man. There are some things which the heart can apprehend, but the tongue cannot utter. In a Tablet to me the Master once wrote, "Turn with thy heart to the heart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the hidden mystery will be revealed to thee." I have obeyed this command and the mystery has been revealed to me; but I cannot express it in words; not even he can do that. The mystery, however, is no mystery at all to those who can meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá heart to heart, and this meeting can be had, and by many has been had, without paying a physical visit to 'Akká. Only through the spirit can the reality and power of this man be apprehended. One is reminded of the words of Jesus, "No man cometh unto me except the Father draw him."

In spite of all I have said, however, I will try and give you an outer description of the Master. First, it must be remembered that he is 63 years of age and that he has lived a life of imprisonment, of constant anxieties, and of hardship. He looks his age. But no sign of physical weakness is apparent; on the contrary, he impresses you as being full of strength and energy, an example of splendid manhood at that age. His hair and beard are grey, and the thoughtful lines on his face and forehead are in keeping with his years. His beard is not very long nor full, but of silvery, fine quality. His hair, which is the same color as the beard, he wears about level with the shoulders. Mule the hair, like the beard, is inclined to thinness, there is, as I remember, no sign of baldness. His nose is large, slightly aquiline and finely moulded. His mouth is large and firm, but without, in the slightest degree, being hard, indicating a combination of firmness and kindness. His forehead is high, broad and full, giving the impression of great intellectual power. The wonderful thing about the Master's physical personality is his eyes. When I return to 'Akká the first of June, I shall endeavor to more closely examine and describe those wonderful eyes; at this writing I must confess my inability, and to tell what it is about them that makes them so remarkable. Whether they are black or blue or grey, or a combination of colors, I cannot say. In fact, they seemed to change even as I looked at them and into them, as I did more than once. Of this however, I am quite certain, that I cannot think of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, nor say my prayers, without seeing those indescribable eyes, and more than once since left 'Akká they have looked their love at me in my dreams.

But one tires of physicalities. The important matter is to try to realize the fragrances of the Spirit that are being wafted from that White spot and from that pure heart. Truly, there is that at 'Akká Which cannot be seen with the physical eye, heard with the physical ear, nor understood with the intellect; a something which the heart can feel and the soul alone apprehend and which cannot be reduced to the physical symbols we call words.

When the Master speaks a something is set in vibration over and above the physical words, a something Which is Spirit and Life, and Which bestows Spirit and Life; and it would seem that the outer words are merely a means of contact, or a physical medium of connection between the soul and this Spirit of Life which is imparted to the soul. That which the soul receptive receives from the words is far more than the mere outer form of the words would seem to warrant. For instance, I asked the Master for the answer to a question which had troubled me for a year or more. He answered me in a few words, without apparently any particular effort at explanation, yet his simple statement conveyed to me immediately an understanding of the whole matter that perfectly satisfied. Perhaps the same words spoken by another would have made no impression, for his answer was a simple statement without proof. Uttered by him, however, they seemed to change the whole current of my thought, create a new consciousness in me, and supply me with the power of comprehension, so that a matter which had puzzled me for more than a year was cleared up in an instant. I trust this will convey to you my meaning, that the real dower at 'Akká is the power of love and knowledge, purely spiritual in its manifestation, a matter of the heart and of the soul, and has no connection Whatever with physical miracles and phenomena.

To realize who ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is, to understand his relation to Bahá’u’lláh and to Christ, to comprehend that he needs no other glorification, commendation or exaltation than that he is ‘Abdu’l-Baba, to know Why it is that he commands that no other name or title should be given him, and that by no explanation or interpretation can the Station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá be made any more glorious than it is, one must be able, with the spiritual eye, to see the things of the Spirit. If we are to be content, as he is content, with his simple designation as the Servant of Bahá, and have no desire to refer to him by any other title, like him we must realize that we are nothing, and that God is all; must eliminate the ego, surrender the self and allow God to do His work in us, instead of imagining that we have any power to accomplish it within ourselves. To be able to apprehend the Station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is to apprehend, at least in part, the great truth of renunciation, of absolute surrender to God. Surrender to God! How easy to say, but how difficult to really understand and do! It means to be conscious of our nothingness, and to open our souls and let the fragrances of the Spirit blow through them; to feel that God in us is doing our seeing, our willing, our thinking, and relieving us of the responsibility. It is to understand that He is the Great Burden Bearer on whose shoulders is the government of all things. Here is a vicarious atonement worth having, a vicarious atonement which brings rest and peace and real salvation. Who are we and What can we accomplish? It is true that the station of man is very high, but it is high because of his capacity to receive from God. The breeze of the Spirit blows by the rocks and by the trees and by the animals, but they are unconscious of it. Man, however, has the power not only to become conscious of it, but to be the instrument of it in the enlightenment of mankind and the vivification of the world. And this is a matter of simple faith. When we realize that we are nothing and know nothing and stand humbly before God, we will be clothed upon by the Spirit. Adam and Eve tried to make for themselves garments of fig leaves. Useless. God gave them coats of skin. Jesus said, “Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not, and yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.” “If then, God so clothe the grass, which is today in the field and tomorrow, is cast into the oven; how much more will He clothe ye, O ye of little faith?” With all our toiling and spinning and fretting, the best that we can do is to clothe ourselves with mere garments of fig leaves, with mere symbols to hide our ignorance. But those Who have found the secret of turning to God in perfect self-surrender and sure faith, receive a spiritual garment so beautiful that the toiling and spinning of the metaphysical schools, with their product of so called knowledge, becomes a useless trouble and a weariness of the flesh. The secret of real spiritual power is the renunciation of the self and dependence upon God. This spirit of renunciation and of absolute submission and surrender to God, is the spirit in Which one is bathed at ‘Akká. The lesson of complete reliance upon God, for all guidance and for all knowledge is the great lesson we receive there, and this is the secret of the love that radiates from there for when we submit to God we realize His love in us and radiate it from us. The Master has said that. When we “receive the confirmation of the Holy Spirit we need no other teacher” but we cannot get that confirmation until we learn to rely on the Spirit wholly.

I trust that all, may learn this great lesson, and, cutting themselves from all outer personalities, lean entirely upon the Inner Reality of which the Prophets are the authoritative and confirmed outer Manifestation. To be free from personality we must be free from our own personality. Once we have attained this freedom, other personalities will cease to trouble us. Escaping our own personality, we must find refuge in the Personality of God, for God has His Personality as we have ours, and to try to escape it is to go to the other extreme of the exaltation of the ego and to commit spiritual suicide.

We are all well. With Bahá'í love and greetings, Your brother in El-Bahá, { .sig .noid }

Table Talks of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Live so as to be in peace with all your environments. To be happy is to serve GOD and serve yourself from the world. Radical Love everywhere, you will then become Love. Goodness was ever flowing from Christ, because He was one with the Father. Outwardly I am a prisoner, considered as one, but no one is as free. I rejoice evermore, much do I prefer to be absolutely free, at one with GOD, fearing nothing, wanting, desiring nothing, but that shall know the fullness of GOD, than to possess the material wealth of the world. To be free and yet to possess [??] [??] heart bound to the world and a slave to self, must not, cannot we compare with being a so-called prisoner, yet possessing supreme happiness, perfectly sound in mind and body and in loving relation to the universal order.

It is possible to overcome the world, the flesh and all evil by walking constantly in the path of GOD, by burying all negation, weakness, fear, selfishness and all doubt under mountain or positive, intense living Truth. Few attain this station.

The more obstacles one has to overcome, the more difficulties one meets successfully, the stronger will be. Never become discouraged.

To be weak is not necessarily to be unwilling to be strong. Rejoice, be glad if in the Cause or GOD you are made to suffer. To be misrepresented to be misunderstood for the sake of GOD is of no consequence. All sincere followers of GOD are misjudged and have been.

“Beware when all men speak well of you is true now if one is conscious of error in ones life.

Certainly one may belong to a church, be a member of a Christian Society and continue to call one's self a Bahá'í, because the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh in no way conflict with the teachings of Christ.

They are in perfect harmony. One accepts the true teachings of true disciples of GOD. It is not necessary to label one's self.

One may call one's self a Bahá'í, and in no way live the life, on the other hand one may live the life, and never be known as a Bahá'í. It is not so much by what name you are called, but what you are in your heart. Are you loving and serving GOD? Love and service are the greatest requisites of a good life. Endeavor in every possible way to do some favour, some service for someone else, do this daily, no matter how small or trivial the act of kindness may be. Even a smile counts for much.

I am the most humble servant of GOD. I would rather be a doormat, door-keeper in the house of GOD than to be the ruler of nations. Christ said unto His Disciples “ Why callest thou me good? There is none good save the Father.” – “Be ye therefore, perfect” Jesus said unto him: “Follow me, and leave the dead to bury their own dead” and “For all things are yours, whether Paul, or Appollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come: all are yours, and ye are Christ’s and Christ is GODS.” Prayer is communion, aspiration, soul contact with GOD. Every prayer for the best is eternally answered on GOD’S part, but not to us unless we come into at-onement.

“All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for believe that ye have received them.”

If ruling desire binds use to GOD, we shall receive what is GOD like. I link myself there and not to dust. If one prays to be whole, on GOD’S part the answer is eternally complete. We must fulfil the conditions to expect GOD to fulfil His promises. To pray is to lift the soul into unison with the Eternal Goodness. Wholeness is the natural result of abiding in GOD.

Science is systematized Truth. The laws of spiritual science are as exact as those of mathematics.

Every hour of positive, high affirmation of the ideal perfection of mind and body tends directly to actualize such conditions. There is no more uncertainty about its trend than there is about our nearing an object if we walk towards it.

The universal order speaks only of wholeness and harmony. We should never speak of faults and weaknesses of others: we are, as yet, imperfect. We must concentrate on the good qualities of others. Virtues are to be found in every person, if sought. Accusations against others are wrong; should there be lacking evidence and proof, woe unto the Accusation. Especially must one be kind, loving and charitable towards another in the household of Faith and seek to serve someone in the Cause of GOD.

The higher should control the lower. The body becomes not only service able, but beautiful, if it occupies a secondary place. Spiritual victory must be achieved and old things become new. Desire and aspirations are laws of growth. Demand brings supply. Every soul is invested with a divine dignity, and should reign in its own kingdom. Everyone should deny the rule of the seen, the sensuous and the material.

There are invisible threads which connect us with every object which makes up our environment. Vibrations are ever pausing over these connections, backward and forward, and it is for us to control their purpose and quality. We receive in turn the kind we send out, love for love, antagonism for antagonism. Love gilds every object upon which we project it, and its sheen is reflected back in rays of golden light. Love thinketh no evil. By projecting thought only of the good we create a harmonious environment. The fact that ye are GOD'S children must rule our consciousness until like the setting sun, it dissipates the fogs and mists of ancestral inharmony. The divine heredity overlaps all inherited human ills, Things which we hold in our consciousness soon become our possession. The imperfection of today is the steppingstone for tomorrow. Life is richer, love stronger truth more beautiful, nature fairer, music sweeter, art diviner, than we have ever dreamed. GOD is infinitely better than we can imagine. We must look upward, we are pressing on towards the Supreme Ideal, which includes wholeness on every plane for the individual and the race. Paul declared "I die daily" This is to grow spiritually. It is an elimination of the base, the earthy, the sensual.

I am not bound by the chains of appetite, passion, impulse, custom, creed, fashion, necessities, politics, traditionalism or the animal nature. I am in absolute perfect freedom. My body maybe in restraint, I am kept in 'Akká by law, but my spiritual self is free. We must welcome Truth from whatever source it may come." Where the spirit of GOD is there is liberty."The scripture says: "For the law of the spirit of the life Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and death."

I am glad you can go to India. You will see many believers in the Cause of GOD. May the blessings of Bahá'u'lláh be upon you all. Rejoice that the West and the East are growing closer together. You, a handmaiden in GOD'S Cause from the New World, have been permitted to see and speak with your Brothers and sisters of the Old World. When you reach India you will meet with many believers from various castes, creeds and sections, speaking different tongues. They may not be able to speak with you in English, nor may you understand their native tongues, but you will be in no sense a stranger you will all be as one large family.

I send to believers in the East greetings from the household, and may many rich and abundant blessing attend your stay in the Orient and wherever you may be.

Whenever and wherever an opportunity presents itself favorably to speak of the Truth of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, I enjoin you, not to allow or permit that opportunity to pass by. But we must never at any time create strife by thrusting the teachings upon unwilling listeners, nor must we argue, we must live the life. You will be surrounded and enveloped by love, for brothers and sisters in the spirit are much nearer and dearer than those in the flesh. What matters it if the physical father and mother are not here? I am thy father, thy mother, thy sister, thy brother. I have many children. I am the same to all. Every true Bahá'í is all to another believer. Although I cannot be with you in body, remember this. I am always with you in spirit, my spirit shall go with you and be with you all the way.

I am glad of what you tell me concerning the kindness and love of name of the believers whom you mention. I ..... has been in the household for months at a time and is much loved by us all. I thank you for the greetings and love. I pray GOD she will ever be your faithful friend and help you know the Love of GOD. I am glad he has help you, I beg GOD to bind you yet closer, - by this way we know that ye are my disciples if you love one another.

“It is a great blessing and privilege to live here. Here are living true followers of GOD. I am glad L_____ carried the spirit and you partake. I beg GOD to make you mutually helpful. None of your own being real believers of GOD, as much as L_____ follows GOD, make her a very close friend, this will be wise. I pray and beseech GOD to make her an instrument to increase His Kingdom. It is a wonderful priceless been, to be a vessel carrying food from GOD. It cannot be bought with gold. Believers of GOD may have many difficulties which they will overcome if the will serve truly. I am glad you have not become disheartened and discouraged. My heart swells with joy that you know GOD in your heart and are trying to follow Him. You must point the way and be a guide that others may find the path leading to never ending peace and happiness.”

Thank you for bringing me greetings from Mr. and Mrs. L_____ I am glad to hear of their hospitality and kindness to those in the Cause. This is as it should be. We must daily see to do some service to believers. I send them love and salutations.

Faith is absolutely essential. We must believe or we will never move. Doubt and unbelief and in stagnation and death. Positive belief, even if mixed by error, leads by degrees towards Truth. Humanity is one. We must love and not love for ourselves, but for the race. If we rise, we help to lift all about us, and if we fall, we drag others down. Our highest privilege and office is to be channels through which the divine life shall flow out to invigorate and inspire. If the soul currents do not course from within outwards, they sing in a deadly vortex. Giving out our ministration is the highest and greatest law. Love sent out never returns void.

I am sorry that it is so that you may not visit the Tomb or go out for exercise. I fear you feel somewhat a prisoner here. These are difficult times for believers to come. Had you not been on your way to India. I would not have granted you permission to come just at this time. We are glad of your stay here, and wish that we might have you and all believers everywhere all the time. I grant you permission now to return to ‘Akká on your return from India, or at a future time, when it will be permissible for you to see more of the place in which we are happy to live. There is no change in anything. I thank it may have been ordained that you came just now and were closeted as closely that you might become more familiar with the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh and more in touch with His children. I grant you permission now as we are hard workers here and have much correspondence, and while I may not be able to write you often, I am always with you in spirit.

Various Impressions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

... simplicity which any child could comprehend; yet his symbols and metaphors, drawn always from Nature, embodied that essence of wisdom and truth which baffles the learned and great.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá always answered all questions, however trivial, with the utmost courtesy and responded genially to every subject of conversation; yet we noticed that he gave the most commonplace subject a higher significance, and transformed material things into spiritual realities. If anyone mentioned that the food was delicious, he would say, “That is because your heart is full of love; when the heart is filled with love everything seems beautiful and delightful to us.”

A writer in 1907 [ed. Agnew] told of the table talks at 'Akká. 1907 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of the Persian dishes, which he said are simple but he hoped the spiritual dishes may be powerful. “The strength or power of the physical food is only for one night, but the power of the spiritual food strengthens and sustains us throughout eternity.

Often he spoke of the simple dishes, “This kind of food is not Persian. It is European, except that there is one Persian dish rice. At first there were no potatoes in Persia. This is something new with the Persians – imported from Europe. At first the Persians did not take kindly to the potato, saying it was an apple of Europe because of their fanaticism and because of the French name, pomme de terre. But now whenever they mention names all became glad and happy. How different it is that it has become so. See and realize the power of Bahá'u'lláh, what he has done.”

During dinner 'Abdu'l-Bahá followed the Persian custom and ate entirely with his fingers. He said, “In the East there are many peoples who never use a knife and fork. To eat with their fingers is the custom among them just as the Western nations have their own particular customs. We must each view with respect the customs of the other.” Then he referred to the food spiritual which requires neither knife nor fork, but brings peace and content.

“I notice you do not say Grace or thanksgiving before meals as is the custom in our country, Mrs. L—, a pilgrim, said to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, who replied that his heart was always in a state of thanksgiving, and so often a Grace is said with the lips merely, while the hearts are far from thanksgiving.

Later he revealed this Grace for American Bahá'ís, now in general use: "O My God, Make Thy Beauty to be my food and let Thy Presence be my drink: let my trust be in Thy will, and my deeds according to Thy command: let my service be acceptable to Thee, and my action a praise to Thee: let my help come only from Thee, and ordain my home to be Thy Mansion, boundless and holy.

"Thou art the Precious, the Everpresent, the Loving." In the Master's home the children chanted the 'Holy Tablets' each morning early, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá drank his tea and sat looking out of the window.

The families had three meals a day, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá as a rule ate only one, and that very simple. On some occasions, if regime, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was visibly in the greatest spiritual strength and power, in strong contrast with the fear and terror of his followers. This situation was shortly followed by the downfall of the government that for forty years had held 'Abdu'l-Bahá a prisoner.

'Abdu'l-Bahá describes the schemes of the committee of investigation sent from Constantinople by the old despotic government under Sulṭán 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd to make away with him and to destroy the Cause.

4 - Last Days of the Imprisonment

To a journalist in London in September, 1911, 'Abdu'l-Bahá told the story of his last days of imprisonment, about "One year before the Turkish Sulṭán 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd was dethroned, he sent an extremely overbearing, treacherous and insulting committee of investigation. The chairman was one of the governor's staff, Arif Bey, and with him were three army commanders varying in rank.

"Immediately upon his arrival, Arif Bey proceeded to denounce me and tried to get proof strong enough to warrant sending me to Fezan, or throwing me into the sea. Fezan is a Caravan station on the boundary of Tripoli where, there are no houses and no water. It is a month's journey by camel route from 'Akká.

"The committee twice sent for me to hear what I had to say in my own defence and twice I sent back word: 'I know your purpose I have nothing to say.'

"This so infuriated Arif Bey that he declared he would return to Constantinople and bring an order from the Sulṭán to have me hanged at the gate of 'Akká, He and his committee set sail with their report containing the following accusations: 'Abdu'l-Bahá is establishing a new nation of which he is to be the king; 'Abdu'l-Bahá is uplifting the banner of a new religion; 'Abdu'l-Bahá has built or caused to be built fortifications in Haifa, a neighboring village, and is buying up all the surrounding lands.'"

An Italian ship about this time was sent by order of the Italian Consul, in order that 'Abdu'l-Bahá might escape. It waited three days in the harbor, and the Bahá'ís implored him to go, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá said 'The Báb did not run away; Bahá'u'lláh did not run away; I shall not run away.'

It was shortly after this that the Young Turks became supreme, and all political prisoners of the Ottoman Empire were set free. 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd went into prison as 'Abdu'l-Bahá came out, and Arif Bey was shot with three bullets, the general was exiled, the next in rank died, and the third escaped to Cairo where he was befriended by Bahá'ís.

In 1903, many pilgrims from various parts of Persia, India, and America came over to Egypt, where they remained for two months expecting to receive permission to come to 'Akká; but on account of the restless and agitated condition of the city, 'Abdu'l-Bahá sent them word to return to their respective countries.

One remarkable event that took place in the time of the trouble, however, was the performance of the marriage ceremony uniting Mírzá Anayát'u'lláh and Zola Khánúm. Mírzá Anayát'u'lláh was a brother of Mírzá Amín and Zia Khánúm was descendant the "King of the Martyrs" on the mother's side and of the "Beloved of the Martyrs" on the father's side. This marriage was contemplated; and the Master performed it on a night when nothing but disaster was expected. He said, "When in trouble we shall have our marriage, for in time of trouble do we Bahá'ís have our peace."

Several months later things had so changed as to make the previous time seem to have been in a former decade. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was free. The utmost liberty existed.

In a letter from Haifa, July [?], 1908, a Persian writer states: "Let me give you, O Friends, the greatest news of this day, the most glorious tidings now current in the Holy Land. I refer to an official proclamation Issued in Constantinople by the will of His Majesty, the Sultán, 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, that the Crown has granted the Ottoman Empire a constitution and that all the exiles and prisoners in 'Akká, as well as in other fortresses and penal towns are free. How incredible this sounds to the ears of those who for years have been here! And yet such was the burden of an official telegraphic message sent from Stamboul, or Constantinople, to the Governor, the Mulasherif of 'Akká.

"How does this seem to you? Yesterday a few of the old exiles of 'Akká, Muḥammadan gentlemen, formerly well known officials in the Turkish regime and who for their desire for constitutionalism were in prison, were now free. They came to Haifa and sailed for their respective homes. They were such a happy group.

"The Beloved, 'Abdu'l-Bahá (roohi fedah!), went to the Ridván for the first time after seven years' confinement. My dear father was at 'Akká yesterday and he was in the Lord's company. And such a great joy it was we are expecting hopefully the presence of the Beloved here in a few days."

When the new Sultán liberated the prisoners from the dungeon, he ordered them not to leave 'Akká. Their conduct had been so perfect that for more than forty years no judge had to intervene for them in any legal disputes.

Of the new Sultán, the Master said: “His Imperial Majesty, the Sultán ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd than, hath exercised the utmost justice toward ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. All the friends must pray from their hearts in behalf of their Imperial Majesties the Padeshah of the Ottomans and the Sháh of Persia.

5 – ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has New Freedom

After his release from confinement in the fortress of ‘Akká, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá made few changes in his daily life, but many more of his followers could visit him than formerly, consequently his duties and labors increased. He gave up his residence in ‘Akká, and lived for some months in the neighboring town of Haifa.

Someone had said to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “When the revolution comes in Turkey suppose you will leave these parts and go out into the world.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá called attention to the canary bird in a cage across the room. “That canary,” he said, “knows no other home than the cage. If you open the door will fly out. He’ll fly around the room, but he will return to his cage.

Like the bird ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left his prison cage for a time, but eventually he returned to the Holy Land.

On January 26, 1909 the Military General, the mayor, the judges, and prominent men of ‘Akká came to his house for a banquet. Such a thing had never occurred before although separately each had honoured him and even, sought his advice and counsels.

Bahá’í pilgrims were not permitted to go around the town freely but must observe great privacy in coming in, and every precaution was necessary still to avoid the ever-alert spies and guards.

In 1910 it was reported that the Ottoman officials had opened two large Gateways through the thick, solid and ancient walls of the old fort of ‘Akká. Both led out on the green plain of Bahjí, where the Holy Tomb is located. One of these gateways is situated back of the old house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, where one often walked, during the time of his confinement, to the fortress. Official men, architects and masons came from Constantinople for the express purpose of planning a beautiful city outside of the old prison walls, attributed to the influence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

“You knew it doesn’t make any difference what happens to one in the physical world,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, in 1920, “I was a prisoner in a Turkish prison for forty years.” Then he told how he slept upon the ground or upon the stone floor, how he was starved and chained and put into dungeons. “And yet,” he said, every day when I awoke in the morning I praised God that another day was before me in which I could serve Him in His prison. And every night when I lay down on the stone floor of the prison I thanked God that He had allowed me to serve His Kingdom one more day in His prison.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was anxious that in every possible way the believers in the East and the West should unite, that communication should increase and that an interchange of ideas should ensue in order that all might profit thereby and be helped.

6 – Pilgrims’ Visits after his Release

A pilgrim visitor, Mrs. Brittingham in 1909 recorded, “Day and night he is busy. Night after night while we were there, and he had met with and blessed us around his table (material and spiritual), he went from us to the public reception room to meet the various men of importance of ‘Akká who visited him, and Whom he frequently also entertained. While we were there, five Zoroastrians from India and several Egyptian pilgrims came. On Fridays and on Sundays (the Musl’im and the Christian holy days) many visit him through the day. On Friday morning we saw that wonderful sight of the poor and needy about his door, fed and cared for and. Comforted.

Dr. Moody wrote in the same year, “Mírzá Munír Morza Mahram, the aged cousin of The Báb and three vietny[?] Zoroastrians were among the friends who welcomed us in the courtyard.

Monever Khánúm came to us very soon and chatted with us for three-quarters of an hour. She asked for any of the former pilgrims and said that all were eager to hear of the progress of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár (Temple) in America. In appearance she was just what I had pictured. Her wonderful eyes, her smile, were beautiful. So did Rúḥá Khánúm’s eyes seem to look into your heart also. The Greatest Holy Leaf (sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) powerfully impressed one.”

It is the time of the fast of Ramaḍán and most of the household were keeping it, but dinner as served for us, a heap of fragrant jasmine blossoms lying beside each plate. We had this meal by ourselves.”

Of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá she said, “He seemed to float out of the room. His carriage was superb, the stately majesty of simplicity and naturalness. The light of the eyes and the love expressed in the face were so brilliant that it was only by favor of a flood of tears that I could continue to look into them.”

“When I told him of the thirty lost supplications, regretting the disappointment to each of the dear friends who had written,” Dr. Moody continued, “with a loving smile he said: “Tell them it is just the same as if they were all received. They are all accepted and you are favored to have been their messenger. Again I spoke of all the love that was sent and which I now laid at his dear feet. He answered: “You are a worthy messenger, and he arose and placed His hands on my shoulders and drew me to his side. I asked if I could come again in the future, and he replied, ‘Yes, and I only send you away so soon because the Black Sea gets cold and stormy soon and it is for your good that you are to go tomorrow, since the steamer leaves next day, but you will never be separated from me.”

Another woman pilgrim reported in 1909, “There were present the Greatest Holy Leaf, the Mother Monever Khánum, Zia Khánum, and Túba Khánum, and one by one the grandchildren came in until at last I had met and kissed and loved all the little ones, nine in all. It was a wonderful gathering to me. When T. arose from the floor I sat upon the divan, and dear Monever Khánum sat with her arm around me as I held Botha Khánum's beautiful little baby boy.

Monever Khánum asked if I had made the white waist that I wore and I told her that I was like most of my Bahá'í sisters at home as I made my own clothes, did my own house work, etc., and yet we were all working hard for the Cause."

"The mother said: 'That is the life of a true Bahá'í, always busy. When we love the Blessed Perfection and turn our faces to him every act may become worship. When you do your housework, your cooking and cleaning, you are making a comfortable and pleasant home. Bahá'u'lláh had said that the home must be clean and orderly to be harmonious. To sit and read the Words all day and let the home duties go is contrary to the Blessed Perfection's commands. A few words held in the heart daily, and loving service, doing, each duty well, is best. Emma[?] religious sects of the East think they cannot worship God unless they are alone in the silence – they must concentrate. They are dreamers and not doers. But Bahá'u'lláh says we must be able to enter into the Holy Temple in our hearts where all is still at all times and under all circumstances, amid discord and confusion. When we are doing our simple duties it is then that the Holy Spirit can teach us if we have only the Love of God in our hearts."

The visitor told them of the conditions under which she had written most of her poems and songs, when in the midst of house work, especially when washing dishes (that which she liked least to do).

The mother said: 'That is as Bahá'u'lláh commands. The East has much to learn from the West. It must learn this great lesson, that true worship is as well as prayers and praise. Each organ of our body must be in order and perform its functions, must be properly used if we would have a healthy body. So it is with the spiritual faculties, they must be all developed."

In 1910 Dr. wrote:

"Two nights before 'Abdu'l-Bahá left, I witnessed for the first time in my life what the Divine Wrath is. I could understand how the Psalmist could sing, "Who can stand in the Day of His Wrath?" One of the Náqíqín had been actively trying to poison the minds of the Believers and had openly boasted of great services he rendered to the Blessed Perfection. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of this his voice became like thunder and his face like lightning, and I trembled and felt that the pillars of the world must be shaken. We have heard how the meek and gentle Christ spoke in His Wrath and denounced the Pharisees. So did. 'Abdu'l-Bahá speak of this traitor to the Cause. 'How dare he speak of serving the Blessed Perfection,' 'Abdu'l-Bahá cried, 'That Holy One Who served us, Who lay in chains in a dungeon for us, Who was crucified every day of His life for us when I was a child I entered the dungeon – how dark and terrible it was and how the chains cut into the Blessed neck.’ ”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said these last words with a sob in his voice that made our hearts break. Then he continued in a voice of thunder. “If the Blessed Perfection were present could this man stand before Him and say that he had served Him? The Blessed Perfection would have driven him from His presence at once serve Him! If we sacrifice a thousand lives in his path it is not enough.”

7 – ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Goes to Egypt

About two years after the revolution in Turkey which brought his freedom from prison confinement in ‘Akká, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in November, 1910, went down Into Egypt. Some friends of the Cause saw a prophetic fulfilment in this journey: “Out of Egypt have I ...

Some of the letters have been received but there has not yet been time to answer them; while, on the other hand, some of them are lost in the mail. Whatever has been received, its answer depends upon time and opportunity.

But concerning the articles:- these articles must be revised and corrected by those souls who know the history of the Cause: if they approve their circulation, undoubtedly it will lead to the rapid promotion of the Cause. For this Servant has no time whatsoever to revise these articles. Regarding tile despatch of letters and their early acknowledgement, a new and complete system is organized. God willing, it will become perfected and put in execution.

4 - Second Personal Visit in 1907

Knowing that some recent pilgrims had remained nine days in 'Akká, had rather set my heart upon a visit of the same length. Reaching Haifa I was told that on account of the trouble conditions surrounding 'Abdu'l-Bahá I would be able to remain with Him but a few hours, and that even this short visit could be arranged for with much difficult. At first the thought of so short a visit was a keen distress and disappointment. Upon second thought, however, I realized that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was above material conditions, althouh seemingly held by them; that in reality He was free and master of the situation and wan planning for the best; and that even under these conditions I would be able to get all that my soul needed at that time.

Whether or not one benefitted by meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá depended upon the real or soul contact. It was the open, unprejudiced and seeking souls who united with the soul of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When this spiritual contact was effected, through turning to Him In spirit and serving In His Cause, the personal .visit to Him was not essential for enlightenment; for which spiritual connection between the soul of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, who was the heart of the Bahá’í Cause, and the believers, the members of the body of the Cause were one with Him. Through this unity His divine wisdom and love went forth to all His followers.

Although this my second visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was very short, I would not have wished it otherwise. Again I left Him In great joy, with my soul overflowing with the love of the Kingdom which He so freely radiated. The one great lesson - which He taught me at that time, as I recall it, was dispelling negative fear - with positive assurance. The natural tendency of many people is to close the door of the heart to others, and to shut themselves away from people. This becomes a habit, and one which causes much distress and suffering, because humanity is one whole and its health and proper functioning depends upon a free and frank interchange of thought and good feeling free from repression and constraint. Rather through his manner and the way in which He received and treated me than from anything which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to me. I saw clearly that the way to serve Him in the Cause was never to remain aloof from people, but literally to attack humanity with a good spirit of X01.10 and grace. I saw that it was because of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá freedom from constraint, and His fearlessness and friendly way of approaching people, His frank expression of love, faith and assurance, that He was able to reach the souls of men and Impart to them His courage and wisdom and to break down the barriers of separation.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá entered into the lives of all about Him. Through this contact He undoubtedly suffered much, nevertheless He was enabled thus to reach the people and to minister to them. his life was a lesson to all, for in His method one saw the way In which the Bahá’ís must live in order to do their work among men.

5 – Oriental Bahá’í Hospitality

“Are you all well? Are you all happy?” was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s favorite greeting. He placed great significance on being well in spirit and correspondingly so in body, and always happy, under all circumstances. He said, “The East and the West are becoming one and showing the signs of Unity and Love. The hopes of Bahá’u’lláh are that there be no more separation or discord, for ye are all the waves, of one sea the birds of one heaven and mirrors of the same bounty.”

In a tablet of 1907 He wrote to a believer:

“‘Abdu’l-Bahá has the Glad tidings of the kingdom of Abhá. His happiness has no sorrow in its trail, and His life is not followed by any death. To Him, prison is a court; to Him a tomb is a spacious palace; to Him a wail is the apex of Heaven; and to Him manacles and chains are the throne of nether.

“If at times He becomes sad it Is not an account of afflictions and adversities, but that grief is produced from a word or an act which is against the exhortations and behests of the Blessed Perfection.

“For instance: I hope that the believers of God may become the cause of the Unity and agreement of the human realm, and suffer other nations and communities of the world to enter under the shade of the Canopy of Oneness. Now when the new reaches me that the slightest differences have crept in among the believers of God, I become sad and heartbroken.

The point is this Afflictions or hardships, ordeals or trials, do not make me weak or faint, nor do they, in the slightest degree, make me sad or unhappy.”

Another pilgrim of 1907 left this account of her visit “in the Home of Peace” as she termed it.

“Outside the sea is raging and the wind howling, which it has done since we came – and it is as if this were to show us the perfect contrast of Serenity and Gentleness In the spiritual, atmosphere of The Master’s Home.”

“Our Beloved Master holds in this home an absolute reign of Love and Peace, and those who visit here can but realize more and more that they must help in sending out over the different countries to which they return the rays of that love, kindness and courtesy.

“I, myself, felt so much awe when first entering His presence that I was unable to ask the many things which I had intended; but the questions in my mind have been answered by Him in His talks to us all together without My having asked them. This has been the experience of many besides myself. His explanation and knowledge seem to flow endlessly as water from a fountain, and if one leaves ‘Akká with one spiritual tiger and thirst unsatisfied it will be from the unworthiness of one’s own soul to receive and not from any limitation of his power of explanation or enlightenment.

“I would wish all pilgrims who come here to look for Divine virtue and example and not for any supernatural experiences or astonishing visible signs, and to remember that in looking for the extraordinary or supernatural, the clouds of the human body will most surely veil such from their sight and prevent their eyes from being opened to the true essence of the Light and Teaching which is to last into the far future, whereas the presence and form visible to our eyes will be taken from us.

“Among the several talks which the Master gave us in the five days of our visit, I will close with the one He gave yesterday on the subject of the opposition and rejection of the Prophets.

“Moses prophesied and taught the people Truths which they scorned and rejected, whereas it was His Truth which lasted and was fulfilled and their words which were proven false and worthless. In the time of Jesus Christ, His Words were fulfilled and are now honored, and the words and thoughts of those who mocked have been exposed and judged. Thus it is in the Days of Bahá'u'lláh, and the opposition of those who now scorn and reject will be proved worthless and His Word honored throughout the ages.

“There are ladies from ‘Ishqábád (Russia) here who have taken a journey of twenty-two days to come. One lives in ‘Ishqábád, in a room belonging, to the New Temple, and serves the believers who come to visit.

“Looking from Haifa on that beautiful view of ‘Akká in the dim distance, we, who can enjoy the beauties of Mount Carmel and all the lovely scenery on our journey home and have the good things of the world and freedom to use them, may well realize and remember that The Beloved Master who with kindness and limitless love receives one in His home, is a prisoner and exile for the sake of the great Teaching and Truth He has come to bring to the world and has not passed through the gates of ‘Akká for three years, though He has come to bring the true freedom to all Nations.”

Some visitors in 1907 thought to prolong their visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá by proposing every day a different name. One day they said they wished to dine with Him in the name of the Council Board of Chicago, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied “Not only in remembrance of the Council Board but also of all the believers. And when you go to the Holy Tomb you must remember all the believers.” He said that if He would go to America to meet them, His enemies would say He had fled away, and in the spirit the believers are always with Him. Then He said in English “Very well,” and was so happy that He repeated it in French, “Tres bien,” in Italian “Molto Bono,” and in Turkish, Persian, and Arabic.

“The need itself attracts generosity,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said. “To be thirsty shows that there is water.” A metaphysical statement.

“When I was in Tīhrán I met the Bahá’ís in a garden, where a large number of Muslim Bahá’ís were gathered to greet us. Here we heard the story of how they believed because of their own prophecies which foretold the coming of the Lord in these latter days and the establishment of His Kingdom.

It has been my privilege to travel among and associate with the Bahá’ís in many foreign countries and I can testify to the spiritual qualities, trustfulness and genuine hospitality manifested in their lives.

At a meeting in Persia a Jew, a Christian, a Zoroastrian and a Muḥammadan were present and remaining for the night, shared the same bed. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Consider what the Dower of the Covenant has accomplished. It was an absolute impossibility for a Zoroastrian to unite with a Jew, a Siyyid, and a Mullá and for these to unite with a Christian was an impossibility; but the power of the Covenant has even so gathered them that they are accounted as one spirit. Although the bodies are numerous, the spirit is one.”

6 – Third Visit Preceding ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Liberation

My next visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was during the climax of His troubles and difficulties, just previous to the fall of the of despotic Ottoman power and the re-establishment of the constitutional government in the midsummer of 1908. Upon arriving in Haifa I found that some recent American Pilgrims had not been able to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but had returned to America happy in having seen Him from a distance as He walked upon an elevated balcony on His house within the fortifications of ‘Akká. Four Arabs recent converts to the faith, had for several months been confined in the prison fortress on account of their belief. Others of the Bahá’ís, in order to avoid pending trouble, had by the Master’s advice sought temporary refuge in Egypt; while those remaining in ,Syria were all but panic stricken by the trouble and persecutions which were daily descending upon the Bahá’í community from the hands of the unscrupulous government officials. During the five days I welted in Haifa, before it was possible to proceed to ‘Akká, the troublous condition was to some extent ameliorated by the liberating from the prison of ‘Akká of four recent converts to the faith, who had for several months, been confined there because of their allegiance to the Cause. About this time a special guard placed before the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to watch its inmates was by order of the governor removed, so that matters began to take on a less troubled aspect.

Notwithstanding these changes for the better, I had to be very careful in entering and leaving the city.

After I had waited several days in Haifa, word came from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for me to go to ‘Akká and proceed to the house of a certain Persian, one of the oldest and most faithful of the believers. In the guise of a native Syrian, wearing fez and ata, with the assistance of one of the oriental Bahá’ís, entered the prison city, passing through the guarded gates along with a small crowd of comers and goers without being halted.

Once established in the .privacy of the house of the Persian friend, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, having the freedom of the city within the fortification, came to see me several times. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house being watched by spies, I did not go there, but spent the two days and two nights of my visit within the confines of the house of Áqá Siyyid Taghl Afnán, the venerable Bahá’í (known as the Great Afnán) under whose direction the arrangements for the building of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár in Ishgabad were made and executed. here ‘Abdu’l-Bahá care to see me twice each day.

The eldest living relative of The Báb, known as the Great Afnán, remained a Bábí or Bahá’í and lived at Haifa. His name was Áqá-Siyyid-Taqí-Afnán. He was a first cousin of The Báb, and was the son of Hájí-Mírzá-Siyyid-Muḥammad, the brother of The Báb’s mother. The Afnán was six or seven years younger than The Báb. The Temple at ‘Ishqábád, in Russia, was afterward built under the personal direction of the Afnán. He was deceased in 1911. His tomb is now at Haifa.

A convert of only thirty-one days service In the Cause whom I met was particularly kind to us. In speaking of the Bahá'ís in Persia, and their relations with those in the West, this believer struck the keynote when he said that in this country that Bahá'ís had suffered such long and strenuous persecution and trouble, that they had become tired and heartsick, and needed the association and more support of the friends of the West. How often we thought of the reverse conditions existing in the Test, where we are in need of this spirit, which the Oriental Bahá'ís have received through suffering.

Although under the most severe physical difficulties, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was visibly in the greatest spiritual strength and power. In strong contrast with the fear and terror of His followers for His safety, impossible to describe, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stood forth in the greatest Joy- of soul and tranquillity of spirit. He radiated calmness and assurance and through his strength the community of the friends was saved from despair. The situation was dramatic in the extreme. It was shortly followed by the tragic downfall of the government that for forty years had held 'Abdu'l-Bahá a prisoner.

7 – Troubled Conditions preceding, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Release

In a letter written about conditions in Syria just previous to the declaration of the Constitution; we re:

“Conditions in Turkey have been upset for years and up to very recent times they have been becoming more and more terrible. Within the past few months things were so bad that even our beloved brothers near the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá were in the throes of terror and confusion. Even the peace of the kingdom was threatened. One concrete example gives a glimpse of what Turkey was:

“The Governor General of all Syria whose quarters were in Beirut, made a trip through the various cities and provinces of that country for the purpose of extorting Baksheesh (money) from the people. The various governors and high officials knowing that they were expected to give him large sums of money immediately began to extort the saris from those under them and so on and on until the poorest of the poor were much oppressed. The country was in a panic. Everyone was fearful, suspicious, and in a state of terror.

“'Abdu'l-Bahá, Himself, was approached and threatened but He have no 'Baksheesh' He sent word to the Governor General that He was 'Abdu'l-Bahá and that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was wholly independent of him, of his exaltation or his oppression. If he imprisoned 'Abdu'l-Bahá, if he killed 'Abdu'l-Bahá, or if he gave liberty to 'Abdu'l-Bahá he would not be adding to or taking from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá was 'Abdu'l-Bahá under all conditions and circumstances. This message of the Master's He, Himself, told me.”

A great change took place in conditions in the Holy City. While I was there in Juno, all was in the greatest trouble; yet during my stay of nine days in Haifa the foreshadowings of better conditions were becoming manifest. It was several weeks after that the troubles, which for so many years had been hanging over the Holy Land, were dispelled almost in the twinkling of an eye. Unexpected to the world the Constitution of Turkey was declared and within twenty-four hours all was changed. It is hard to realize what this change really is. It is as if Turkey had awakened from a horrible nightmare and now ‘ she is rejoicing that it is all past.

I feel that this change is the greatest psychological – phenomenon of the world’s history. The very character of the Sultán’s subjects is changed. Instead of being fearful and suspicious, in a day these characteristics have been changed to their opposites.

Several times I visited Constantinople before the Constitution. The corruption and intrigue there was horrible. On a sensitive person it produced an effect which cannot be described in words - that of being in the presence of a most diabolical enemy which one could not see nor locate, but only sense. Such was the condition which held the Ottoman government from the highest to the lowest of its subjects. None will ever know the history of the crimes which resulted from this condition for they are not recorded in this world’s writing.

Thus conditions in Turkey have been for years, and we to very recent times they have been becoming more and more terrible. Within the past few months things were so bad that even our Beloved brothers near the Holy Presence were in the throes of terror and confusion. Even the peace of the kingdom in Syria was threatened.

The twenty-ninth and thirtieth days after the constitution was declared I spent in Stamboul. I could not believe it to be the same place nor the same people. All of the old horror had passed away and was replaced by real joy. Quite openly visited some of our Bahá’í brothers there and found them rejoicing with the rest of the people.

Verily this is the day of the resurrection and the power of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá (Who is the first Point of this new Dispensation) is now becoming visible to the world in general.

The Holy Cause in Persia is on the verge of a great move towards rapid growth. Its roots are well rooted and are firm. The steadfastness, unity and love of the Believers there is something which we in America little realize. At the same time the Friends there lack our energy, force and “go ahead.” need what they have to give us and they need at we have for them. The power of the Cause in both the East and the West will only become evident as the Unity between the East and the West is increased.

While in Stamboul I called on Prince Mírzá Ridá Khán, the Persian Ambassador to Turkey. He was Persia’s delegate to the first congress of Peace at The Hague. He has written a poem, the “Most Great Peace.” I arranged with him that we might publish this in America and publish it in both English and Persian, and send it to the East and West as well. Needless to say he was very pleased.

Also, I have with me a wonderful Tablet just revealed to the Believers of the world, both East and West, which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wishes spread. He said it would be well to print it in the two languages, English and Persian.

Shortly after the Turkish revolution of 1908, I was in Beirut and the joy of the Bahá’ís was a pleasure to see when in Beirut they first learned of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s freedom. With the going into force of the constitution, all of the political prisoners throughout the realm were liberated.

8 – Visits in 1909 and

Several months later I was again permitted to travel in Syria and visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Although it had not been long in point of time since my previous visit, yet the conditions surrounding ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had so changed as to take the previous time seem, by comparison, to have been on some former decade. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was free! The utmost liberty existed. ‘Akká had ceased to be a penal colony and the gates were no longer guarded but wide open to the world.

The Bahá’ís had not yet recovered from their first ecstasy of joy over the freedom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, yet through all this manifest jubilation He was conducting His work as usual. It was then that I realized, to the extent of my capacity, how far above this world’s conditions ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stood. Not discouraged by criticism, persecution, calamity; not elated by applause, commendation or good fortune, He was apart from the ever changing world of human affairs, upon a firm rock: the spiritual foundation of the Kingdom. By virtue of this severance from all save God he was enabled to change the interest of the people from the world’s thought, and from materiality to spirituality, and to create in men’s souls the fire of God’s love.

Almost two years after the great change in Turkey I again went to Syria. Low that which previously I had allowed to pass unnoticed was to be my chief lesson. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s mental grasp of things and the manner in which He dealt with them in proportion to their importance were all of the deepest interest to me.

I recall kneeling before the Master as I was leaving Him on one of my pilgrimages, kneeling to the earth, and His placing and resting his hands on my shoulders. And I recall my starting to move several times, and He held me down tightly until thought my knees would break upon the marble floor. And after He had held me thus for some time He bade me rise and I parted from Him.

(Eventually want to write a lot of very intimate things not intended for circulation, but for record, pertaining to A. B.) {ed}

The fatuousness of remarks by some of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visitors is illustrated in this story – a rather exceptional example, however, for it was seldom that either man or woman met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá without being at once more deeply affected than the youth in this cases.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá looked below the surface. In many respects .end under many conditions ye was very conventional, but He was not on the conventional plane at all. The conventions of the Orient are extremely rigid. One does not notice it at first, but after a while one discovers, and then one is very often shocked by little, things one sees and does that do not mean anything at all. The older (Persian and Western) Bahá'ís all showed 'Abdu'l-Bahá the greatest veneration and respect. They would dislike even to speak in His presence until He opened up the conversation. One of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's interpreter was telling the story of a certain young American lad who blew in one day to see the Master. He came unannounced. His steamer was in port. He had heard the message in this country. He blew in to the house at Akira while 'Abdu'l-Bahá was still living in the fortress. He asked if he could see the Master.

'Abdu'l-Bahá came in. A number of Orientals were in the room. 'Abdu'l-Bahá began to speak some words of welcome to be translated by the interpreter. The young man said, "Tell Him I am very glad to see Him." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "I am very glad to see you. This boy was just bubbling over. The young man said, "Tell Him I heard of his Cause in the West, and I believe and I want to devote myself to His service." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said "Very good," and then started to say something in Persian.

The young man took his watch out and pried off the back. He said, "I am very much in love with a girl and here's her photograph."

The interpreter demurred a little bit at translating this because in the Orient they do not usually speak of these things before strangers, but only among immediate members of the family. The Master asked the interpreter to translate it, and he did so. The Master looked at the photograph. The young fellow said, "I pray that she may become a worker in your Cause." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "She will be accepted. Her service will be acceptable."

The young man said, to the interpreter, "Ask Him if He doesn't think she is very beautiful?"

The interpreter simply could not interpret that before all those people, but the Master Insisted upon knowing, and then he said, "Yes, she is very beautiful. She has the smile of the Kingdom on her face." The young man was very pleased. 'Abdu'l-Bahá started to say something again. Then the young man opened the other side of his watch and said, "Well, I am in a great hurry. My ship is sailing. Tell Him Good-bye."

The old Hadgis there were simply paralyzed. But the Master said, afterward, "I look below the surface. That young man's heart is very pure. I wish that I had more friends of that type."

FOREWORD

To visit {{pv}} 'Akká — this was the ardent desire of every early American Bahá'í. Not a few braved the long and difficult journey to that prison-city of the Ottoman Empire, half a world away. They did not speak of meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá; their journey was to “attain the presence of the Master.” Some 108 persons are officially listed in The Bahá'í Centenary as having made the pilgrimage by 1912. Probably there were more. But the vast majority of Western Bahá'ís had not seen 'Abdu'lBahá before his historic tour of Europe and America in 1911-1912.

And so, from the time of the first Western pilgrimage sponsored by Phoebe Hearst in 1898-1899, it became the custom for returning pilgrims to recreate their experiences for their fellow believers. Members of the Hearst party returned with recordings of the voices of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and his sister, Bahíyyih Khánum, the Greatest Holy Leaf; they brought back photographs of 'Abdu'lBahá and the other members of the Household; they reverently displayed relics related in some way to the person of their Master; they gave numerous talks about their experiences. Several of them also left written accounts of the trip.{{piv}}

Thus began the genre of Bahá'í literature that has come to be known as pilgrim's notes. These consisted, for the most part, of the spoken words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as they were translated by members of His household and recorded by the visitors. More than twenty were published as booklets during the lifetime of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Others were published in Star of the West. Dozens more were circulated as typed pages. These accounts were used much like scripture in the early American Bahá'í community.

It is not hard to see why — comparing these with the books of the Bible, the scriptures familiar to most of the Western Bahá' is. Authentic, firsthand accounts of their Master, in the minds of these early believers, must have ranked with the accounts of Christ in the Gospels. Of course, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's station is not equal to that of Christ, but this was by no means clear to all of the early believers: 'Abdu'l-Bahá found Himself repeatedly denying that He was the Return of Christ in His Tablets to America until the end of His life.

Bahá'is have come to understand that pilgrim's notes cannot be relied upon as sources for the Bahá'í teachings. With the exception of those that have been reviewed and approved by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself — and there are notable exceptions, such as Some Answered Questions — they do not have the status of Bahá'í scripture. {{pvi}} They are of historical interest, but the original motives for their publication are not as compelling today. Nonetheless, for Bahá' is, such accounts must certainly rank above some biblical chronicles.

There are, however, a few notes from this era which are not only of interest to historians and collectors. These, in addition to giving imperfect records of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's words, also contain accounts of the pilgrims' interactions with Him and describe the day to day activities of His guests. They allow us, to a limited extent, to experience what it was like to stand in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

In Galilee by Thornton Chase, and In Wonderland by Arthur Agnew, are among a few pilgrim's notes — such as those of Juliet Thompson and May Maxwell — which give well written descriptive accounts of their time in 'Akká. This booklet is also distinguished by the high quality photographs of the Holy Land not found in most similar publications. The two essays were combined under a single cover by the Bahá'í Publishing Society because they recount the story of the same pilgrimage.

Arthur Agnew's notes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's words during the visit were published separately under the title Table Talks at 'Akká in 1907. His short appreciation (pp. 75-84) was entitled In Spirit and In Truth when the book was first published in 1908. This was changed to In Wonderland the 1921 edition, and the latter title has been retained in this facsimile reprint. This edition reflects the old spellings of Bahá'í terms used before a standard system of transliteration was adopted under Shoghi Effendi. {{pvii}}

The believers on pilgrimage with Arthur Agnew and Thornton Chase were: Carl Scheffler; Mary Agnew, Arthur's wife; and their son Rúḥu'lláh, named by the Master after the young martyr Varqá. All of the adults were active and prominent members of the Chicago Bahá'í community who had become Bahá'ís through the classes given by Ibrahim Kheiralla in the 1890s. Agnew and Chase had been elected to the Chicago Board of Council, a precursor of the Local Spiritual Assembly, when it was first formed in 1900. Scheffler, only seventeen years old at that time, began his service on the Board a few years later when it was known as the Chicago House of Justice. All three belonged to the group of Bahá'í men who met regularly for lunch at Kimball's, in downtown Chicago, to discuss the Faith.

Thornton Chase, the author of this account, was the most distinguished of the pilgrims. Having declared his belief in Bahá'u'lláh in 1894, he was one of the first four Americans to accept the Faith, and the only one to remain loyal to 'Abdu'l-Bahá after Kheiralla's defection in 1900. For this reason, the Master designated him "the first American believer" and gave him the surname Thabit (steadfast).

Chase had been invited to join the Hearst party in 1898, but was unable to get time off from his job at the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company. <sup>{pix}</sup>"I am heart broken," he wrote, "to learn that you are going ... and it is impossible for me to join you."<sup>[1]</sup> Unable to be present in person, he asked the others to carry a supplication to 'Abdu'l-Bahá so that he might receive a written reply especially for himself. This request was granted. Early in the following year, Chase became one of the first American Bahá'is to receive a Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

It was not until 1907—nearly nine years later — that Chase found it possible to make the journey to the Holy Land. It was not a good season for pilgrimage. The schemings of Covenant-breakers had recently resulted in greater restrictions on 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and the presence of Western disciples was always a danger to Him. Earlier in 1907, some American Bahá'is had gotten as far as Haifa, only to learn that conditions made it impossible for them to visit the Master in 'Akká. Chase's party was allowed to cross the bay to 'Akká, but their visit was cut short unexpectedly when the governor in Beirut was notified by telegram of their arrival.

Chase was devastated by this misfortune. His companion, Carl Scheffler, recalled:

Mr. Chase was so moved by this departure that he spoke no word during the entire journey and not until he again entered the hospice of the Little Child in Haifa were his tears dried.<sup>[3]</sup>

He was only reconciled to this sudden separation by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's promise that he would see Him again in the near future. <sup>{ppx}</sup> This second meeting, however, was to take place on another plane. In 1912, Chase's untimely death prevented him from seeing the Master during His visit to America. In October of that year, 'Abdu'l-Bahá traveled to Los Angeles specifically for the purpose of making a pilgrimage to the grave of Thornton Chase, where he extolled him in the highest terms.

Chase spent only four days with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká. And during this time, as he recalled, "the opportunity did not appear for any more than a few minutes privately with our Lord.”<sup>[5]</sup> The pilgrims saw Him mostly at mealtimes. The rest of the time was spent with other members of the Household. Their names are found here as frequently as that of the Master: Mírzá Asadu’lláh, whom Chase had met when he came to Chicago, Hájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí, the famous Bahá’í teacher; Mírzá Muḥammad-Qulí, the faithful half brother of Bahá’u’lláh; Mírzá Munír and Mírzá Nuru’Din, sons of the famous Bahá’í scribe Zaynu’lMuqarrabin. There was also Shoghi Effendi, then a boy, the future Guardian of the Bahá’í Faith. If ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not always present, His overpowering spirit can nonetheless be sensed throughout the narrative.

More important, after all, than the amount of time a pilgrim spent with the Master was the quality of that time — a matter conditioned on spiritual capacity. Some had stayed for weeks, even months, in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, but few were attracted to Him as Thornton Chase was. <sup>{{pxi}}</sup> “How the heart responds to the least word from that Center of the Covenant,” he wrote.<sup>[6]</sup> Of Chase, Scheffler recalls:

In the presence of the Master he seemed completely melted and overcome by the love of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and the love and kindness of the believers. Not all the experiences in that Holy Household were purely pleasurable, for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his kindly manner corrected many concepts that, in spite of a broad vision and deep understanding, still were wrong. That ‘Abdu’l-Bahá loved him dearly was obvious, and his response was that of a loving and trusting son.<sup>[7]</sup>

The Master Himself recalled that during his short stay in ‘Akká, Chase “became free from the troubles of this world.”<sup>[8]</sup>

For this Bahá’í, only a few hours in the presence of the Master had to suffice. They did. His short visit inspired him to dedicate the remaining years of his life to the service of the Bahá’í Cause. It is hoped that the reprint of this account of those precious moments may do the same for a new generation of believers.

In Galilee

Thornton Chase

“Nevertheless the  $\{\{p3\}\}$  dimness shall not be such as was in her vexation, when at the first he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali and afterward did more grievously afflict her by the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, in Galilee of the nations.”

“The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.” Isaiah 9:1, 2.

“The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose.”

“It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing: the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God.”

“And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness.” Isaiah 35:1, 2, 8.

“Out of Asher his bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties.” Gen. 49:20.

“And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me.” Isaiah 65:10.

And I will give her her vineyards from thence and the Valley of Achor for a door of hope: and she shall sing there as in the days of her youth, as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt.” Hosea 2:15.  $\{\{p5\}\}$

On April 8th, 1907, a bright, cool day, our little party, Mr. Agnew with wife and boy, Mr. Scheffler and I, gathered on the deck of the Khedivial steamer “Assuan,” lying off the ancient port of Jaffa in Syria. Around us were other Americans, tourists, teachers, and missionaries bound for Haifa and some for Beirut about 70 miles north from Haifa, where a Presbyterian college is located. There were also Turkish officers and Egyptian Beys, the latter in European dress with red fezzes, and a number of Franciscan monks with close cropped heads, dressed in the typical brown hooded robes and sandals. On the lower deck, where they had slept rolled up in blankets through the night, were the steerage passengers, crowded groups of Arab and Turkish men, women and children in native costumes.

After noon we left our anchorage and sailed northward, over the blue Mediterranean, from Jaffa toward Carmel, skirting the broken, rocky edge of the Syrian Coast with its background of green slopes and distant hills.  $\{\{p6\}\}$  Our hearts were so affected with thankfulness to God and with the beauty and import of that Land of Promise that we spoke but little to each other and in subdued tones. Our tongues were bound in golden silence, our eyes searched the ancient scenes and looked keenly to the north for the first glimpse of Mount Carmel and 'Akká and we longed for the approaching goal of our pilgrimage. Gradually the bold front of the mountain swelled up from the coastline, and a little after, when the lowering sun slanted its brightness across the waters, the white walls of the little fortress of 'Akká rose from the ocean and gleamed afar like a marble island in a turquoise sea. You can be sure that our eyes looked long and steadily at the little cluster of white as we came nearer and nearer to that "Door of Hope." Haifa was not to be seen, as it nestles within the elbow of Carmel on its northern side, until the ship had passed by the mountain and turned inward toward the town.

We arrived off Haifa at 5 P.M. As the steamer anchored, a fleet of boats came racing toward the ship. They represented different landing Companies, the Hamburg-American, Clark's, Cook's, etc. Each was manned by eight to ten swarthy, sturdy, red-fezzed boatmen handling as many long, heavy, square-handled oars. The race was in earnest, all eager for passengers and backsheesh. {{p7}} As they came nearer, at a signal from the leader of the crew, each rower placed one bare foot on the cross seat before him, leaped up as high as he could, pulled back his oar with a long, powerful sweep, sinking down to his seat, and then sprang up again for another mighty pull, accompanying each effort with a quick, strong call of encouragement: "Haley! Haley! Haley! Haaa! Saleh!" It was an exciting welcome: the crews rising and sinking, the boats lifting through the waves and almost in collision, the stirring cries keeping time and becoming louder and more intense as they approached.

"Cook's" arrived first and took our party to the landing place. When entering the boat the passenger has to submit entirely to the crew. One goes down the slippery steps on the ship's side to the little hanging platform and as the light boat rises on a wave to meet it, one or two of the Arab sailors seizes him (or her) in his arms, holds him as the boat sinks and bears him to a seat. The process is repeated at the landing place where each person is lifted by strong arms from the boat as it rises to the dock, so we entered Palestine. {{p8}}

A crowd of people was on the pier and as we went up toward the street, a familiar face appeared and one of us exclaimed: "There's Mírzá Asadu'lláh! As we hurried to Cook's carriage I managed to touch his hand in passing and received a pressure of recognition, but no further attention."

HAIFA.

We were taken to the Catholic "Hospice of the Little Child," conducted by German Sisters, where we had spacious rooms, plainly furnished and scrupulously clean. Over the door of each room was an inscription dedicating it to one of the Saints. Mr. Scheffler and I had the room of "St. John." In it were two neat beds, plain chairs, washbowls, and matting on the stone floors. In the dining room all the guests sat at one long table. The food was plain and wholesome. Mírzá Assadu'llah, with Mírzá Mohsin and Mírzá Jallal, called in the evening and we were happy to meet them. Others were in the reception room who understood both English and Arabic and they were listening intently, curious to learn what acquaintance or business the Americans had with the Persians. They would not have understood that only the love of our hearts drew us together. We learned that word of our arrival would be sent the following day and arrangements made for going to 'Akká as soon as convenient. We were rejoiced that we should soon enter the presence of the renowned teacher whom we love to call "The Master." {{p9}} He, however, asks us not to so call him, as he says the titles "Master" and "Lord" belonged to Jesus and he wishes to be called by his proper and perfect title — 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God. He asks each one of the friends to first learn this station of his clearly, that he may know in his heart the meaning of 'Abdu'l-Bahá!

We slept well that first night in Syria. In the morning we went up the hill to Mírzá Asadu'lláh's home, passing through the German Colony. This Colony was established in Haifa in 1843 in expectation of the second coming of Christ, which they, claimed was prophesied to occur soon after that time on Mount Carmel. Over the doors of school and church and of many houses are inscriptions signifying their expectation, such as "Der Herr ist Nahe" (The Lord is near), etc. Yet, they know not that the prophecy has been fulfilled and that the Lord has indeed been at their very doors. {{p10}}

Mírzá Asadu'lláh and Mírzá Mohsin welcomed us warmly. They inquired after the friends in America, naming many of them. They asked concerning the growth and condition of the great Cause and rejoiced at any news of love and unity in service among the friends. Mírzá Mohsin interpreted.

THE HOLY LAND.

The view was fine of the city below and of the Tomb of the Báb high up on the mountain side above. We could scarcely appreciate the sacredness of that historic ground, but as we looked up to the Tomb and thought of its meaning, of the wonderful lives of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh, of their sufferings and apparent defeat at the hands of oppressors, and of the victories which are now following the Word of Truth for which they suffered, we began to realize that we had indeed entered the border of the "Holy Land," the land that Abraham knew, where Melchizedek dwelt, where Elijah prophesied and sacrificed on Carmel unto the Lord whose fire descended upon his altar and put to shame the hosts of Baal. It was on the top of Carmel that Elijah bowed himself down upon the earth and put his face between his knees before the Lord, and there, "at the seventh time,"

... "Behold, there ariseth a cloud out of the sea, as small as a man's hand." "And it came to pass in a little while, that the heaven grew black with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain." {{p11}}
How prophetic becomes this history in the light of present events!

There Jesus walked and taught. Capernaum is near, Nazareth twelve miles away and it is but a short distance to the Sea of Galilee where the fishers drew their nets and left them at the command — “Come! Follow me! and I will make you fishers of men.” This was the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, by the way of the sea, which was covered with darkness until that Light shone forth upon it. And now again it is plunged in gross darkness, all heedless of the Light which has again arisen upon it, of the Glory that is within it, which is even now flaming forth from its ancient prison to the farthest bounds of mankind, the Light which is “the same yesterday, today and forever” and which shall illumine the darkness of ignorance and awaken man to the Dawning Day of Service, Love and Peace.

The afternoon following our arrival in Haifa, I was writing at a table on the little veranda of the Hospice, looking toward ‘Akká nine miles away, when a beautiful thing appeared. The day had been showery and about four o’clock a splendid double rainbow shone forth. It seemed to rest on the eastern part of Haifa where the gate opens out to the “Way of the Sea”; its further end was directly at the gate of ‘Akká and the western sun shone brightly on the glistening city just beyond. The long, inward curving shore line of the blue sea with its white breakers {{p12}} swept in under the rainbow, and beneath its glorious arch the distant Lebanon hills showed their purple sides and snow capped ranges. For over half an hour that vision of beauty remained. PEACE! There was its sign, declared of old. There was the ancient symbol of the creative Holy Spirit brooding over that Place of Promise, and I seemed to see beneath its arc of glory temples of silver with domes of gold, gates of pearl and all precious stones, and I realized that — “The city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine upon it, for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb.”

“And he said unto me, Son of Man, this is the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel forever.” “And the name of the city from that day shall be, The Lord is there.”

MOUNT CARMEL.

The next day, according to arrangement, Mr. and Mrs. Agnew went to ‘Akká while Mr. Scheffler and I moved to the Hotel Pross on the top of Mount Carmel, where we were met by Mr. Snyder, a German minister and missionary who keeps it. We found him a kindly host, quiet and simple. Everything was thoroughly clean and comfortable. Several English and American women tourists were there, school {{p13}} teachers, and some missionaries returning from India. They were resting before going to Nazareth, Damascus and Beirut.

In the evening a lady told of her trip that day to ‘Akká. She said the house of “The New Prophet” was pointed out and some one suggested that she might like to meet him. She assented, and one went into his garden and asked permission for the meeting, which was granted. He was a man of striking and attractive appearance and met her most graciously and presented her with a rose he was carrying. Through an interpreter she asked him several questions, which he answered in a courteous and gentle manner, and she could see no difference in what he said from the teachings of Jesus.

Considerable conversation ensued and one lady said she had heard that Americans sometimes came all the way there expressly to visit him and receive his teachings and she wondered how they could be such fools. She also supposed they brought much money to him. Mr. Scheffler and I sat there longing to open our mouths and loosen our tongues, but beyond asking some simple questions, we remained silent. One asked the lady what she had done with the rose. She replied that she had pressed it and intended to keep it as a souvenir.

In the afternoon we wandered over to the headland that rises boldly from the sea. Roadsides and fields were painted with blossoms, and we delighted in their variety, colors and fragrance. {{p14}} There were myriads of flowers, daisies, forget-me-nots, sweet peas, lilies, roses, and the flaming red poppies everywhere. We gathered them as we went, only to drop some as we found others more beautiful. We were happy as children, wandering over the hills and talking of things most dear to our hearts. When we returned to the hotel we filled every available dish with flowers and pressed what we could in our diaries.

THE TOMB OF THE BÁB.

The next day we walked to the Tomb of the BáB. We went on the smooth, broad road along the ridge until we came to the top of the trail which goes almost directly down the side, the same on which we had seen donkeys loaded with wood picking their way the day before. It was very steep and all of loose, crumbling stones. {{p15}}

The sides of the mountain are terraced and cultivated everywhere. The larger loose stones are gathered into walls; the rich reddish brown soil and smaller stones are leveled or gently sloped from the foot of one wall to the top of another, thus making steps from ten to twenty or thirty feet wide, in which are fig and olive trees, grapes and vegetables. Men and women were loosening the soil with mattocks.

After going down about 1,000 feet we came to the road and found a neat carriage way between walls leading from the main roadway to the tomb. It is a square of brownish yellow limestone with white iron paneled doors, simple in architecture and with little outside ornament. A considerable space was cut out from the side of the mountain and leveled around the tomb. A portion of it is a stone surface in which is the mouth of a large cistern for water. Another portion is a flower garden, beyond which is the house of the caretaker, a Persian {{p16}} Bahá'í. He lives there with his wife and baby and has an Arab assistant.

When we came onto the stone platform we saw no one, but in a few minutes the Arab appeared, came over to us and said “‘Akká” and “‘Abbás Effendi.” We smiled and nodded assent. He went to the garden and brought a flower to each of us. Then the caretaker, Rahmatu'llah, came from the house with his little baby boy and greeted us. He brought out chairs and I asked him to sit with the baby for a picture. He excused himself, went into the house and after a few minutes appeared dressed in his best clothes, a long, black coat hiding the flowing costume in which I wished to photograph him. But the picture was never taken, for just then two Persians appeared, who had come up the trail from below. They greeted him joyfully {{p16}} with the “Greatest Name,” embracing him, and then, as we also repeated that Name, they took us in their arms with expressions of great gladness and praises to God.

They were Muḥammad-‘Alí Yazdí and Ḥájí Muḥammad Schushtari of Cairo with his seven year old boy. They could speak no English, but they had a message for us which was that “Cooks” would come for us the next morning to take us to ‘Akká. Although we understood their meaning, it was further assured by the Persian who went into the house to consult his wife, who must have known some English, for he returned saying — “Tomorrow morning, go ‘Akká.”

Then the door of the tomb was opened and we were invited to enter. It is simple and beautiful, although it is not finished. It is divided into three large compartments, a center and two sides, and these into sections named after notable Bábís and Bahá’ís. The floor of the center is slightly raised. The roof is in arches, those of the sides being at right angles to the arches of the center. We bowed in silence for a few minutes, then withdrew and bade our friends adieu, while they exclaimed again and again — “Koosh amadeed! Koosh amadeed!” — the Persian expression for “You are welcome!” As we left the road and began to climb the trail we looked back and saw them going into the little grove of ten cypress trees in a circle on the hillside just above the tomb. It is said that Bahá’u’lláh used often to sit in that grove which commands a {{p18}} beautiful view of the sea and the Valley of ‘Akká.

When we had gone up the trail some distance and reached the end of our first breath, we rested and noticed a lithe young Arab hurrying up from below. When he reached us we found that he had a note from Cook’s, saying that they would call for us the next morning, at any hour we would name, to take us to ‘Akká. The messenger was on his way to the hotel and finding us on the way saved him a long climb but lost him no backsheesh. Then we hastened up the mountain with joy in our hearts and our feet lightened by the glad anticipations for the next day.

THE WAY OF THE SEA.

April 12th greeted us with a beautiful morning. The great day had arrived, the day for which we had looked and longed. We were really going to ‘Akká. We started at 7 o’clock in the open carriage with three horses abreast. That ride on the good, hard road along the mountain crest, then down the rocky sides, by walled terraces, farms and groves, was a delight. We understood some of the reasons why Carmel was called the Mountain of Beauty. We breathed the sweet air and watched the play of color in sunlight and shadow as floating clouds moved over the long slopes and rolling hills. Snow turbaned Hermon and the encircling purple robed steeps of Lebanon stood in silent guard over the valleys beneath. Each wind and turn {{p19}} of the road changed the view. Far below the azure sea glistened, and long, white rolls of surf chased one another up the sandy beach. In hazy distance a faint cluster of white marked the walls of the city of our desire. All else was but the setting for that gem of divine choosing, for it is the “Chosen Land.”

We stopped a few minutes at Cook’s, then drove down through Haifa, halting a little at Mírzá Hádí’s store, then through the market square to the eastern gate, a narrow curved archway in the wall, and out onto the beach. After a little we came near to a drove of camels that were being loaded with rough blocks of building stone where they had camped the night before, and there Mírzá Asadu’lláh joined us.

Then began the nine mile drive along the beautiful curve of the Mediterranean shore, most of the way in the water where the sand is hard and the surf plays “tag” with the carriage wheels, while the horse hoofs clatter and splash a quick tattoo through the gliding water. Higher up the beach are mounds of loose sand {{p20}} with long, wiry bunch grasses and occasional tall date palms. When we crossed the two rivers that run into the sea, we rode out forty or fifty yards from the shore so as to follow the sand bars formed by the breakers as they meet the outflowing rivers. Sometimes the water was up to the box of the carriage and the horses had to strain to pull us through. We passed carriages coming from ‘Akká, pack-trains of asses and camels, flocks of little, black, lop-eared goats, foot travelers, fishing boats and fishermen standing far out in the surf, casting their round nets as their fathers have done for decades of centuries. Ever before us was the walled city, rising clearer and larger from the water by which it is nearly surrounded.

It is ancient beyond the knowledge of man, perhaps the oldest city in the world. Its depths have not been explored, but ruin has followed ruin, and city after city, none knows how many, has been built on the remains of the past. It has ever been a point of vantage and of strife and is renowned for its desperate sieges and defenses. {{p21}} There are still remnants of the ruins of Alexander (“Balas”), king of Syria 150 years before Christ. The Genoese captured it in 1104 and Saladin drove them out in 1187, only to be overcome by the last victorious assault of the Christian Crusaders under Creur de Lion in 1191. There Napoleon was brought to bay in 1799 and forced to abandon his dream of Oriental conquest by that “grain of sand” as he called it. It was taken by storm in 1832 by Ibrahim Páshá, who in turn was overthrown by the British, Austrian and Turkish allies in 1840. It has witnessed many scenes of war and siege, of hunger and thirst, of torture and death. Still do the soldiers patrol its walls, it may be destined yet again to bear the shock of battle. It is a tomb of warriors, a whited sepulcher full within of dead men’s bones, but from that tomb shall arise in this millennial dawn the Spirit of Peace, going forth to a glorious victory over the hearts of men.

How wonderful is the work of God! The seed must needs be buried in the dark dungeon of earth before it can bring forth the living tree; the Word must be hidden in the crypts of death, in the tomb of lowliness and rejection, surrounded by the darkness of ignorance and clay of prejudice ere it can send forth the Truth that makes men free, the Light that illumines their souls, the Love that ripens the fruits of righteousness, holiness and beauty in the Kingdom of God. {{p22}}

THE PRISON CITY.

When within a half mile of the city lying on the point of land out in the sea, we left the beach and entered a roadway between fine shade trees, leading to the gate in the wall. We passed through the gate into a market place filled with men and animals, and through the inner gate curving under the second wall, and so into the prison city. Mírzá Asadu'lláh had left us, and we went on with Cook's driver as tourists do who visit 'Akká; yet we were probably recognized as Americans and as we entered the city, we were greeted with a shower of stones which rattled harmlessly against the carriage. Possibly they were thrown in a spirit of mischief. A rabble of youths and boys ran after us all the way across the city to the entrance of the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. There the driver got down from his seat and drove them away. Our progress had been slow as the three horses filled the ways and crowded the people against the walls, and the turns in the alley like streets were sharp and narrow and made with difficulty.

We did not know we had reached our destination until we saw a Persian gentleman, and then another and another, step out at the entrance and smile at us. We alighted and they conducted us through the arched, red brick entrance to an open court, across it to a long flight of stone steps, broken and ancient, leading to the highest story and into a small walled court open to the {{p223}} sky, where was the upper chamber assigned to us, which adjoined the room of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The buildings are all of stone, whitewashed and plastered, and it bears the aspect of a prison.

Our windows looked out over the garden and tent of 'Abdu'l-Bahá on the sea side of the house. That garden is bounded on one side by the house of the Governor, which overlooks it, and on another by the inner wall of fortification. A few feet beyond that is the outer wall upon the sea, and between these two are the guns and soldiers constantly on guard. A sentry house stands at one corner of the wall and garden, from which the sentry can see the grounds and the tent where {{p24}} 'Abdu'l-Bahá meets transient visitors and the officials who often call on him. Thus, all his acts outside of the house itself are visible to the Governor from his windows and to the men on guard. Perhaps that is one reason why the officials so often become his friends. No one, with humanity, justice, or mercy in his heart, could watch 'Abdu'l-Bahá long without admiring and loving him for the beautiful qualities constantly displayed.

Five days we remained within those walls, prisoners with Him who dwells in that "Greatest Prison." It is a prison of peace, of love and service. No wish, no desire is there save the good of mankind, the peace of the world, the acknowledgment of the Fatherhood of God and the mutual rights of men as His creatures, His {{p25}} children. Indeed, the real prison, the suffocating atmosphere, the separation from all true heart desires, the bond of world conditions, is outside of those stone walls, while within them is the freedom and pure aura of the Spirit of God. All troubles, tumults, worries or anxieties for worldly things are barred out there.

Over the head of each one of the exiles in that prison hangs constantly the sword of Damocles, suspended by a hair, and the coming of any American or English pilgrim sets that hair to vibrating. This is not because of enmity from the Government, which shows a just and generous spirit, but because the enemies to the Cause of God are always trying to incite troubles and suspicions. While we were there a message was sent to the Government, by certain of the opposers, complaining of our coming and stay and trying to falsely attach political significance to it; therefore it was deemed best that we should leave. After that, further efforts were made to bring troubles upon the friends. This illustrates the volcanic condition there and the serious causes, ever present, for mortal fears and anxieties; yet there is the abode of peace, happiness, content, assurance and supreme faith. Even were that awful sword to fall and sever the Head from the body, faith would only be strengthened and service be multiplied, so perfect is the assurance and certainty that this is the Work of God, destined to victory over the heart of mankind, and the accomplishment {{p26}} of the peaceful Kingdom of God in the spirits of men over the whole world.

While there and now I realize the meaning of Mr. Winterburn's expression that — "The world seemed miles and centuries away." Worldly matters indeed press with keen intrusion on that family and those sweet friends in the prison of 'Akká, and they cause anxieties, too, sometimes, but so mighty there is the Spirit of God, so absorbing are the considerations of spiritual things, so uplifting those considerations, so overwhelming is the ocean of the Word, that all other matters slink away, out of sight, and Man stands erect in the bracing air of the Spirit with its life-giving strength.

In a Tablet He has said: "Set all desires aside, leave worldly matters, devote thyself to God, be filled with the Spirit, guide the people to safety, and perfume the nostrils with the holy fragrances which emanate from the Kingdom of EL-ABHÁ."

"By the life of Bahá He who is filled with the love of Bahá and forgets all things, the Holy Spirit will be heard from his lips, and the Spirit of Life will fill his heart, the lights of the Sign will shine forth from his face, and words will issue from his mouth in strands of pearls, and all sickness and disease will be healed by the laying on of his hands."

THE WELCOME.

Mírzá Munír and Mírzá Noure-Din (sons of the famous and learned Jinábí Zain), and {{p27}} Mírzá Ḥusayn Afnán, a student at the Beirut college, all English speakers, were with us during the few minutes until the arrival of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Some one said, “The Master !” — and he came into the room with a free, striding step, welcomed us in a clear, ringing voice — “Mahrhabba! Mahrhabba!” (Welcome Welcome!) — and embraced us with kisses as would a father his son, or as would brothers after a long absence. It is no wonder that some have thought that the Master loved them more than all others, because he hesitates not to express his love and he truly loves all humanity in each one. He is the great Humanitarian and each friend is to him the representative of all mankind.

He bade us be seated on the little divan; he sat on the high, narrow bed at one side of the room, drew up one foot under him, asked after our health, our trip, bade us be happy, and expressed his happiness that we had safely arrived. Then, after a few minutes, he again grasped our hands and abruptly left us. The friends also went out and left us alone. We looked at each other. I think we had not spoken at all except to answer “yes” or “no.” We could not. We knew not what to say. But our hearts were full of joyful tears, because we were “at home.” His welcoming spirit banished strangeness, as though we had always known him. It was as if, after long journeyings, weariness, trials and searchings, we had at last reached home. The world of wanderings was left at the outer gate, we {{p28}} had entered into peace, joy, love, home. Those were moments of deep happiness; yet I could not fully realize the great blessedness or that meeting, which was the goal of my hope; but now its remembrance has become my joy and the treasure of my heart. I was filled with wonder at his simplicity, with admiration for his strength and dignity and love for his tenderness; these, mingled with delight and thankfulness, possessed me.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.

I have been asked to describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but hesitate to do so. It is not his personality that he wishes the friends to consider. Yet so many long to know even a little of the appearance of this one whom they love, not having seen, that I will try to tell of him as he appeared to me. I saw a strikingly handsome man, tall and kingly. He wore a white fez with the small turban-kerchief wound around. This, the symbol of wisdom and learning among Muḥammadans, was the only outward insignia of his station. A long, dark coat or cloak was worn over a dove colored undercoat. He is not thin or anemic, but has the appearance of strong health. Although of medium height he is commanding in appearance and I can never think of him as less than six feet tall. His bright, fair face, light brown in complexion, was framed in ‘silvery white beard and mustache. Usually his hair, or much of it, was tucked up under the fez. His {{p29}} nose was large, straight and strong. The mouth was rather full and very gentle. Deep under the broad forehead, and shaded by white, thick eyebrows, shone the wondrous eyes, large, prominent, brilliant, penetrating and kind. Around the dark pupil and brown iris is that wonderful blue circle which sometimes makes the eyes look a perfect blue. Any description of them is only an attempt, no more. In repose the face expressed a dignity, intelligence and nobility which none would dare to disrespect. Conscious power and authority were there enthroned. He assumed nothing; his powers were natural, his sincerity thorough, his affection pure. His smile charmed and attracted friends to him.

He had the stride and freedom of a king — or shepherd. My impression of him was that of a lion, a kingly, masterful Man of the most sweet and generous disposition. I had formed an idea of Jesus as very meek, humble, lowly, gentle, quiet, soft and sweet, and I looked for such another one. I have revised my idea of Jesus and now, as I read his Words, I see in that one of the past a Man of Authority, whose words were clear and forceful, penetrating the hearts as with a two-edged sword. I found in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá a man, strong, powerful, without a thought as to any act, as free and unstilted as a father with his family or a boy with playmates. Yet each movement, his walk, his greeting, his sitting down and rising up were eloquent of power, full of dignity, freedom and ability. {{p30}}

In his presence, all are small and they are conscious of this. They show a deference to him that could not be excelled before the most absolute monarch, hesitating to approach him unbidden, humbly bowing when he passes, and halting afar off when coming into his presence. This was not of his doing or will, but purely from their recognition of the Spiritual Power proceeding from him and through their intense love and respect for him. He seemed utterly unconscious of their deference. He extends love to everyone; he draws near to them; he invites them; he loves to serve them, even in little things. He demands no awe, no reverence, no separation, but is an elder Brother of affection and sweetness. He is gentle but not weak; sweet and powerful; humble and mighty; no bar or restraint is there, but winsome love and attraction. His work accomplished daily is very great, and yet much time is given to social and official affairs. He is abrupt in manner, the abruptness of power, but most courteous and charming. There is no aloofness in him; he invites all to be prisoners of love and fellow-servers of humanity with him. He spoke in brief, pithy expressions, intoned in medium pitch with a clear vibrant voice. No words were wasted. He said:

“The Bounty of God is flowing. The Power of the Kingdom of God will overcome all. It will not be long before the great result will appear.” “The Blessed Beauty has put in our hands the lamp of teachings. {{p31}} By this Light the world will be illumined.” “America will be enlightened very much, and from there light will be sent to other places.” “I hope that the East and the West will become one, also the North and the South, and that all differences shall be removed.” “The Power of the Word of God will accomplish this.”

THE MID-DAY MEAL.

Within an hour we were called to the noon meal. The Master again welcomed us and motioned each to his seat at the table. There were twelve — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Mírzá Muḥammad Gholi (the beautiful brother of Bahá’u’lláh Mírzá Mohsin (son-in-law of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá), Mírzá Asadu’lláh, Mizra Munír and Mírzá Núri’-d-Dín (interpreters), Shogi Afnán (grandson of the Master), Mr. Agnew, wife and son, Mr. Scheffler and this servant. All stood in respect until the Host sat. Food was first offered him, but he refused until all were served when he took some also. Then looking around the table and noting that none were eating, he said: “Bismillah!” (In the Name of God), signifying that we should eat. That one expression, accompanied with his brilliant smile, was a blessing.

After the first course was ended and the plates removed, he spoke of our meeting there together in affection, joy and harmony, saying that it was by the power of the Word of God. There {{p32}} might be other meetings of people from different parts of the earth, but they were not like this where we were drawn together by the fires of love in our hearts. Then he talked of the necessity of decomposition of all things before a recomposition could take place, and said that it was the power of the Word of God which decomposed the self of man in order that he might be recreated.

Mr. Scheffler and I looked at each other, because, that very morning, while riding down Mt. Carmel nine miles away, we had noted the crumbling rock and rich soil, and had spoken {{p33}} the thought that came to us — that the rock had to be tested, disintegrated and decomposed into soil before its chemical values could be released and transmuted into the higher kingdom of plant life. And there, at noon of the same day, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá brought forth the same subject and gave us his beautiful instructions upon it. It has been often remarked that he answers the thoughts of the friends before they are expressed to him.

Another course of delicious Persian food was served by Bashi, the young East Indian from Bombay who came and offered his life as a servant in that household, and then again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá uttered words of wisdom and instruction. Then came the dessert, and, after a few words more, he arose, and all arose and stood in respectful deference as he left us to go to his tent in the garden to supply other souls with the food of their need.

This meal’s experience was repeated daily, sometimes twice, at noon and evening. From our room window we often saw him walking in the garden, meeting people, and when he could get away for a few minutes from other cares, he would come up to our room and talk with us. Each conversation started with some simple reference to a natural thing, the weather, food, a stone, tree, water, the prison, a garden or a bird, our coming, or some little act of service, and this base would be woven into a parable and teaching of wisdom and simplicity, showing the oneness of all Spiritual Truth, and adapting it always {{p33}} to the life, both of the individual and of mankind. All of his words are directed toward helping men to live. Unless questions of metaphysics, dogmas and doctrines be introduced, he seldom mentions them. He speaks easily, clearly, in brief phrases, each of which is a gem. Whatever the lesson may be it always culminates in some teaching of unity, for the whole purpose of this greatest Revelation is Unity, the teaching of the Oneness of God, the oneness of His Manifestors, the oneness of man, the oneness of the universe; and all this oneness is the expression of love. It is love manifest, love that unites, binds all together, that permeates all existence and draws it into oneness with its Creator who is love itself.

“O son of man! My oneness is my design. I have designed it for thee; therefore clothe thyself with it. Thus thou mayest be a star of my omnipresence forever.” H.W. 65

UNIVERSAL LOVE.

All difference, all lack of harmony, all disunity in the universe is due to lack of love, or to changing universal love into individual love, putting self-interest in the place of the welfare of the whole. But in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is never a trace of self-interest. Each thought, each word of his is for the universal love, the divinity of man in his oneness with mankind. He speaks not from {{p35}} the self, but from the Spirit; yet his speech is that of the man, simple, direct, as of a father to his son. “Are you well?” “Are you happy?” This would be an oft repeated greeting. “You have come in a good time.” “Since you have come the weather has been beautiful.” Such simple remarks as these would prelude an instructive discourse of ten or fifteen minutes, or possibly three or four minutes. We took no note of time.

About half past nine in the evening he came to Mr. Agnew’s room where we were gathered. He was very tired, and, after greeting us, he sat on the divan and called Mr. Scheffler and this servant to sit on either side. He took our hands and for fifteen minutes or more he held them in his, often grasping them with a rapid, strong, vibrating grip while he talked. He said he had been sorely tried that day by strangers, but that for the sake of love he had been most kind to them, as we must ever be, showing the greatest kindness to those who opposed. He said he was now happy in the company of friends, and then he talked again of decomposition and composition, showing that one accompanied disunion, disagreement and separation and caused death, but the other brought unification and life. Then abruptly he arose and left us, going to his room, and we also retired for our first night’s sleep in the prison city of ‘Akká, in that house where had lived the Great Manifestation of God, the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, with saints and martyrs {{p36}} in the holy Cause. In the adjoining room rested the Servant of God, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the faithful, patient Establisher of the New Kingdom of Heaven in the hearts of men. For a while we listened to the sentry on duty at the guarded wall by the sea, chanting his sacred supplications in darkness — and then we slept.

DAWN IN ‘AKKÁ.

It seemed not an hour when I was awakened by a clear, high voice proclaiming between the earth and heaven the Oneness of God, chanting the Qur’án from the high balcony of the nearby minaret. The long, sweet, quivering tones rang through the silent air, invoking worship from the faithful. The bell-like notes invited the dawn, the first ray of which may have been visible from the tower height as it heralded the victory of light over the dark and sleeping world.

Soon, a voice farther away declared another watchman calling the sleepers to awake and greet the morn. The sweet, vibrant chants continued until day looked in at our window, and the birds chirped and fluttered around the open court, singing their songs of welcome to the light. We, too, with joyful hearts praised God for His great Light of Revelation and Truth.

What wonder that the Moslem cannot be swerved from his worship and loyalty to the One God and to His great prophet Muḥammad. His first, baby lisps were praises and affirmations of Him from the sacred Qur’án; his first consciousness {{p37}} in every day of his life is the voice of man proclaiming: “There is no God but God, and Muḥammad is His Prophet!” That holy, basic principle is inculcated “Line upon line, precept upon precept” at each awakening from sleep, at each beginning of active life, and declared five times in each day from his cradle to his grave. It becomes a part of him; from its established throne in his brain it repels all suggestion of a triune God, and makes his life, whatever it may be in other respects, a fortress against unfaith.

It was Sunday, and soon the jangle of chimes sounded from the Syrian Church, calling the Christians to early Mass. The morning was beautiful, fresh and still, and the tones of opposing mosque and church sounded only of peace. Alas, that religion should ever bring aught else between God’s children! But the military cornet’s call told us of the fortified city and of the soldier ready for attack or defense for the greed of man and “In the Name of God.” Across the garden the blue sea sparkled with little ripples and washed the base of the rampart wall a few yards away. An old, rusty cannon lay on the rock in the corner bastion, telling of war long past, and the guard with his musket walked by the narrow gateway between the corner and the court. In the distance the dark blue mound of Carmel was crowned with rosy mists. All nature spoke of peace, and only man of strife. {{p38}}

At 7 o’clock, I saw M. Asadu’lláh Kishani sweeping the rough and broken stone flight of outside steps as carefully as though they were of alabaster; another of the friends was dipping from the well and watering the plants of the garden, and others were attending to the needs of the kitchen. The care, earnestness and pleasure with which these things were done showed the spirit of love in the service. Indeed, it is evident there that service is esteemed a privilege and is a cause of happiness. About 7:30 we had breakfast, bread and honey in the comb, boiled eggs and tea. Only our party of Americans was there.

Afterwards, from our window overlooking the garden, we saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Mírzá Asadu’lláh walking back and forth on the paths, sometimes stopping and conversing earnestly. I could not but think of a lion pacing in his cage, and a great sympathy and longing to serve him arose in me. Later a soldier came, carrying his gun, delivered a message and went away. An old man with a cane came to the garden gate, about fifty feet from where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sat in the tent. He bowed low with his hand on his heart, talked a while at that distance and then, with deepest respect, moved backward through the gate and away.

During the days ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had but little time to himself. Visitors, tourists and officials came and went constantly. One afternoon came three black robed Catholic nuns, one portly woman with a black robe and no head-dress, and several ladies unveiled, with olive complexions. {{p39}} They were directed to the tent by the Master from his room window and he met them there later. Some of them spoke French and some English. One exclaimed: “Oh Madame, look there!” The children, Shoghi, Rúhí and others were playing about the fountain and altogether it was quite a party.

THE SABBATH VISIT.

That was a Sabbath long to be remembered by us. About ten o’clock we were offered the great privilege of visiting the picture of the Manifestation, Bahá’u’lláh. How often has imagination tried to outline his face; how eagerly have those been questioned who had looked upon him; how earnestly has the wish been that the knowledge of him and the pilgrimage to his presence might have been made in his day.

The picture is a large photograph taken of him during the later years of his life. It is a majestic face, that of a strong, powerful, stern man, yet filled with an indescribable sweetness. Even in the photograph the majestic power shows through the lines of light and shade. I will not attempt to describe it, nor the solemnity and influence of that visit. No word was spoken. It was a time for silence. I will simply quote the writing of one who saw him in life! {{p40}}

“The face of him on whom I gazed I can never forget, though I cannot describe it. Those piercing eyes seemed to read one’s very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow; while the deep lines on the forehead and face implied an age which the jet-black hair and beard flowing down in indistinguishable luxuriance almost to the waist seemed to belie. No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before one who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain.” (Edward G. Browne, M. A., M. B., Cambridge, England, in Introduction to “The Episode of the Báb”)

Soon after we returned to our room ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came and again expressed his precious love to us, saying that he was happy that we had seen the picture. He said: “This is a blessed prison, the Holy Land, and you have seen the picture of the Blessed Perfection, and also ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and we love you. You must be very glad and we are very glad. I hope the influence of this great thing will appear, and that, when you return to America, by you the Americans will be made happy. The talks I give you are like the seed which they cultivate in the ground. I hope that it will grow, and when it grows up that it will be very good.”

Looking out of the window, he said: “Some of the trees in the garden have new leaves and are very beautiful, and also man, when he comes to have leaves and fruit, it is very good. Man is like the ground or earth. He is the dust, {{p41}} and in this dust, by the bounty of God, grow up so many kinds of flowers, and from him will appear many wonderful things.” He then asked one of those present what he would do when he returned to America, and then added: “It is said in the Bible that when Messiah comes he will come with many angels and with trumpets. We hope you will be that voice of the trumpet when you go to America.”

LESSONS OF HUMILITY.

One forenoon Mírzá Asadu’lláh came to the room and talked of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s teaching of decomposition, showing its great importance. Then came Mizra Ḥaydar-‘Alí, old and wise, beautiful, smiling, happy, a man who has suffered captivity, slavery, imprisonment and chains, everything but death, for the Cause. He talked of the spiritual embryo and its growth, its five stations and the five possessions of each religion, viz.: a prophet, a book, a law, a nation and miracles. The real birth of spiritual knowledge comes when it is perceived that these essentials pertain alike to all of the great religions, and that they all originated from the Command of God. Is it not true that in this birth lies the realization of the Fatherhood of God, the spiritual brotherhood of man, and the foundation of Universal Peace?

Those two wise old men, Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí and Mírzá Asadu’lláh, were like children in {{p42}} their happy, simple ways and evident affection. Each called the other his father, exalting the other’s wisdom above his own. Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí gave each of us some sugar plums from his pocket, but overlooked Mírzá Asadu’lláh who sat besides him on the divan, whereupon Mírzá Asadu’lláh said he thought his father did not treat his son very well. Although these men have reached a maturity of knowledge far beyond our perception, yet Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí said: “Now, seeing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá you realize, each by himself. You see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and we also see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. You see and we see. As we tell you, so you must tell us also what you see. You have reached maturity as you have advanced one foot. Still we must be humble and say to others, ‘Tell us.’”

He likened us to children in the Truth, just beginning to walk, and said: “In the New Testament it is related that Christ received children and said — ‘These are the children of the Kingdom because their hearts are pure and they speak what learned men cannot speak.’ In the first degree, all are as children of the Kingdom. The difference between you and us is that we came sooner than you and our faults are more, because I could not do what I ought to do during this time. I know, and I express myself, but you come newly; all Bahá'ís are one person; now you try to spread the Cause so that God may forgive our laziness."

Everywhere among the friends, {{p43}} at 'Akká, Haifa, Port Sa'íd, Alexandria and Cairo, we were given lessons of humility, simple, loving service, unselfishness and happiness in living the life of the Kingdom. There is no ostentation or striving for effect, but courtesies and offerings, a flower, a cup of tea, a bit of candy, carrying a parcel or doing some service, are blended with such a simple, affectionate spirit that they charm and attract and are in harmony with that wonderful, spiritual aura of peace and love which pervades all meetings of the friends in the Orient.

INCIDENTS.

One morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá came to our room, asked how we were and how we had rested. His face was wonderfully clear and shining, fresh like water. {{p44}} He invited us to come into his room adjoining. It was small and plainly furnished with iron bed, table and divan. He gave each of us a photograph of the Castle of Maku in Persia where the Báb had been confined. At my request he took my large fountain pen and wrote on the back of each picture — "A gift from 'Abdu'l-Bahá." Then, looking at the pen, he said: "The battle ax must fit the hand of the wielder."

Mírzá Asadu'lláh suggested one day that we say to 'Abdu'l-Bahá that we would like to have that dinner a commemoration of the House of Spirituality; then the next day's meal in memory of the New York Council Board; and then each following day — of one of the associations or bodies of believers; then of each of the friends singly, and thus we would be enabled to stay there indefinitely, commemorating the friends. So, at dinner, he told the Master that we wished to hold that meal in commemoration of the House of Spirituality. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied — "Yes! and of all in America." Thus, our scheme was completed in one day — but he went on and gave us an instruction of the unity of all, and said that as one is a representative of many in a parliament or congress, and as all are waves of one sea, so it seemed to him a reality that all the American believers were there present with him at the table. He said he would like to see the faces of them all, but that all were {{p45}} with him in spirit and it was not necessary that the faces should be seen.

The last day there the ladies of the household came and talked with us through an open doorway. They told us how, owing to the customs of the country, they were like caged birds, unable to fly abroad and sing the praises of God; that they could only work within the walls and beseech God with their prayers for the success and spreading of His Word throughout the world. They asked us to carry the message of their condition, their love, their hopes and prayers, to their sisters in America and ask them to so strive and work that they might accomplish not only their own duty in the Cause of God but also that of the helpless ones in the Orient.

Always there arises this idea of the oneness of mankind. If one fails to accomplish what he should do, is prevented or unable, then it becomes the duty of others to do so much more than their own duty that there may be no loss because of the lack of others. {{p46}} In other words, that the duty of all is the duty of each, and that each is responsible for the results of all, just as one member of the body should do its utmost to assist and to atone for the failure of any other member. This is true vicarious atonement, arising from the innate oneness of the human race.

A HEAVENLY ATMOSPHERE.

At 'Akká nothing in appearance is marvelous; all is simple, direct, natural, without effort or preparation. Yet the effect is deep, strong and wonderful, because all that is said or done is an expression of complete assurance in the Truth of God, entire reliance upon His Guidance, devotion to His will and love for His service. This certainty of rightness, this abnegation of self in favor of God and His will as expressed through His Messengers and Servants, causes a simplicity and power which penetrates the hearts and kindles in them quenchless flames of love, service and unity, the triune, heavenly oneness, which shall make man at one with God, with the universe and with himself. These are the subjects of interest with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. These are the matters which cause the fragrant, spiritual atmosphere, the breathing of which brings heaven on earth.

In his presence, faith in God, in the power of good, in the victory of the Spirit, became confirmed. Confidence was supreme in the impregnable certainty of the Cause of God. The {{p47}} feeling possessed us that the Day of God's triumph was shining, that we were admitted as humble factors in his work of gladness, and that the might of man's bondage to the tyranny of self was being illumined by the Glory of God. Fear and trembling vanished; prayer and praise sang joyously within us. In his presence we realized that we were at the threshold of the Kingdom of God, and that the Spiritual fragrance of the Court of Nearness to Him poured forth through that door of selfless service to purge and purify the dense atmosphere of mankind. {{p48}}

I took a picture of the old, stone steps leading to that "upper chamber." After our return to Chicago I showed it to Mr. Scheffler; he said, "Those are the steps up to heaven" — and he was right. Heaven is a condition, and it exists there. To this servant it was as if he were immersed in an ocean of fragrance and peace; as if one were breathing a rich atmosphere, and drowned in a fragrant ether which penetrated through and through to the centers of beings. This atmosphere is a reality. It has been mentioned by many, and it is not an imagination, nor is it due to excitement or enthusiasm. It is a cognizable fact which enters the life and remains with him who strives to do the will of God. The presence of {{p49}}

the Holy Spirit as a perceptible, soul — tangible actuality cannot be denied. It is there at 'Akká in force; it is felt by everyone in some degree, even by opposers and strangers. It is a great shield of protection which defends the Cause of God forever, even though that defense may not always be in accord with the desires of the faithful. God's ways are not our ways.

The whole thought was of spiritual things, conditions and progress. The unity and brotherhood of men and peoples was the frequent consideration, always from a spiritual point of view. This talking and thinking constantly of heavenly things causes great delight. Peace, love and longing for service possessed us. {{p50}}

Nothing visible caused that happiness within those walls; it is simply and truly the presence there of the Holy Spirit of God in overwhelming power. This sweet aroma of the Spirit radiates from that fountain of love for humanity, which pours forth so freely, so impersonally, so universally for ever soul that is wanting love. They come from every land, from every religion, from all kinds of training, each with his little cup or larger bowl, seeking answer to his quest; pilgrims from all over the world coming to that Center of the Covenant of Love, a man outwardly like themselves. And, after a week, a day, or an hour, they return to their distant homes, all filled with love, most of their questions unasked and forgotten, curious no longer, but satisfied and overflowing with love to the human race and a great longing to bear the Word of Revelation to their friends, and to serve every creature of God without regard to family, race or religion. The inexpressible happiness of the Spirit possesses each one of them, and he wants the whole world to have it. {{p51}}

THE NEW HEAVEN AND EARTH.

The most visible effect of that power is in the lives of the believers everywhere, the pilgrims from every land, and the children. Such children I have never seen, so courteous, unselfish, thoughtful for others, unobtrusive, intelligent, and swiftly self-denying in the little things that children love, such as toys, candies, fruit, etc. Wherever there were believers we found courteous, gentle, loving, earnest people, looking only for opportunities to serve one another. This effect upon the lives of all in those countries, who come in contact with this Revelation, no matter from what nation, religion or clime, proves its {{p52}} universal and mighty power. And this is exactly its claim, that it is for the removal of differences and bringing the whole world into a unity of Faith, Love and Service. It is accomplishing this among all peoples, and if it shall so transform the few, it demonstrates its power, and thus it shall go on changing the hearts and lives of all who come under its influence, until all the world shall be as one great family dwelling in its heavenly — earthly home.

Herein is the oneness' of mankind demonstrated—that all these varieties of men, each with different views, different methods of thought, different conceptions of religion, and opposing {{p53}} tendencies, after one draught at this Fountain of Instruction in the tenets of Love, fall upon each other's necks, embrace with tears of joy, and go their ways like children of one family, new born into the Kingdom of Heaven. All the differences are forgotten and are seen at their true value as of no importance compared to the great truth, the Oneness and Fatherhood of God, the oneness and brotherhood of men. Each one of them becomes a missionary of peace. The heart of each has enlarged to embrace the whole world, even his enemies; each sends his thoughts of good will and good wish to other peoples than he called his own. "His own" is forgotten in his desire for the good of the whole; yet he neglects not those near to him, for to them he can give service, and by service he must express his love.

Has such a condition as this been ever witnessed in the world before? While each nation was confined within its own boundary lines, each state a law unto itself, each religion a barbarism to all but its little circle of adherents, men could not meet together, could not know each other, and much less could they learn to love the stranger and the enemy. These conditions of acquaintance, of knowledge, of respect and of love have been made possible in this age through the wonderful inventions, the advances in means of transportation, the rapid conveyance of information, the uses of steam and electricity, and those discoveries, all of the last half century, which have leveled the mountains, raised the valleys {{p54}} and made the whole earth a highway for the dissemination of knowledge, wherein no "wayfarer" needs to err.

These conditions could not be until the coming of that "Day of God" which was promised by God's prophets age after age, "That Day" wherein the old earth and heaven should pass away like a scroll that is read and finished, and a new earth should be created in order that a new heaven should be also created thereon. How blind is he who cannot see the hand of more than man in all these wonders.

THE SERVANT OF GOD.

'Abdu'l-Bahá is a grand man, broad, universal in thought, standing above the world and looking down upon it in its weakness and poverty with a boundless love and an intense longing to lift it up from its wretchedness, to make it conscious of the rich bounties of God, which are so freely offered in this wonderful time, to remove the differences to bring all men, all peoples, all religions into true manhood and religion, for in reality there is but one manhood and one religion. He stands there erect, with extended arms, the Master of the Feast, calling with a loud, clear voice to all mankind: "Come! Come! Come! Now is the time! Now is the accepted time! Come and drink of this sweet Water which is pouring in torrents upon all parts of the world!" {{p55}}

And, as each hungry pilgrim comes to that prison house, that banquet hall of heavenly gifts, he takes him in his arms and draws him to his breast with such sincerity and enthusiasm of love that the petty cares, thoughts and ambitions of the world vanish away, and one is at peace and in happiness because he has reached home and found love there. Father, mother, brother, all are welcoming, greeting and embracing the wanderer in that simple, natural welcome of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. One wishes that the embrace might not end, it is so joyful, so comforting. Truly, I think it never does end. It opens a door of love which shall never be closed. The home of the heart is there.

It is the home of the universal love, not that of the individual alone. He is no respecter of persons. His own personality in the eyes of others is naught to him, nor does he care for the personality of others. It is not love for the individual one, but the Love of the Spirit for humanity. Each visitor is only one of the waves of that great ocean of mankind, and is a type, a representative of the whole. When the Servant of God embraces one, He embraces all in that one.

THE LAW OF LOVE.

This law of love was wonderfully proved when the Persian, Jewish and Zoroastrian pilgrims came to visit us, one, two and three at a time, many of them, and also two old friends who {{p56}} had been with Bahá’u’lláh in Baghdád in the early days of trial, and Mírzá Esmu’llah, a sweet old man and learned teacher. All showed the same beautiful spirit of affection and happiness. Although we were from widely separated religions, countries and races, yet we sobbed with joy as we were clasped in each other’s arms. It seemed as if the millennium had actually arrived, that mankind had lost all differences, that Love had conquered the world, and that we were standing within the threshold of heaven and in the presence of God. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not personally present at those meetings, but the Spirit of God, the Spirit of Love, the Spirit of Peace, was there. The tears of those lovers of God flowed with gladness, their eyes shone, their faces beamed, their courtesy was unsurpassed, their sincerity manifest, their devotion to the Cause of God supreme. They clearly see in such meetings of pilgrims from different lands the beginning of fulfillment of the prophecies relating to the spreading over the whole world of the knowledge of the One God, Creator and Father of all. This coming together of representatives of several religions in loving embrace with tears of joy is a certain and marvelous proof of the truth and power of this Bahá’í Revelation.

All bowed when they entered the room after removing their shoes, and placed their hands on their hearts and foreheads, exclaiming — Alhamdu Lellah!” (Praise be to God!) and other words of thankfulness. Then they opened their {{p57}} arms for embraces and expressions of love. None sat until requested, and not then until the host was seated. After talking for a while through interpreters, they again embraced and bade us an affectionate and ardent farewell, and went backward with deep respect to the door where they put on their shoes. It should be noted that this meeting was an event of a lifetime; that in Persia they had been told that there were no American Bahá’í believers, that the tales of them were false, and, when they actually met four such believers, three men and one woman, there in the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, their gladness overflowed in most sincere expressions of affection and unity.

Mírzá Esmu'llah spoke of the rapid spread of of the Cause, beyond his hope or expectation, and of the wonderful inventions since the advent of Bahá'u'lláh, all due to the breeze of the Holy Spirit, which was blowing and bringing the Springtime of the New Day to the world. A bright, intelligent, young Jew from Hamadán, Persia, said that at the request of his parents he had just visited old Jerusalem during Holy Week, and from there he went to Bethlehem where he "sat down and wept" for the things his people had done to Messiah in the old days. This was the effect upon him of the Bahá'í teachings concerning Jesus. He was asked what he found at Jerusalem. He replied: "The city was there, but the owner was gone. I came to 'Akká and found the owner of the city here." He {{p57}} said that in Hamadán were over six hundred Jew-Bahá'ís who were known, and there were others not known openly.

The millennium in very truth was in those gatherings. It has arrived. It has drawn the people of the earth together in the bonds of love to God and love to man. The differences between peoples and religions have not been argued away, not changed by debate, not removed by law nor by war, but they have been dissolved in the fires of love, and have disappeared like mists before the morning sun of Godly knowledge. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." When man rises above those differences in the atmosphere of Spiritual Truth, his humanity, his sympathy, his human affection, spring forth and blossom in the land of the spirit, so that greed and ambitions are forgotten, and only love remains. This is the elixir of Unity; this is the solvent that shall melt the hearts of men and bring that "Most Great Peace," which Bahá'u'lláh said "must come." When the spirits of men actually come into contact with the Spirit of this Day, this greatest Revelation from God, this spirit of self-abnegating service to mankind, they simply melt and unite, and all other matters and things pass into the realm of the unimportant.

UNITY, LOVE AND SERVICE.

A great lesson impressed upon us at 'Akká was the waste of time and strength in observing and {{p589}} struggling with the little things, the annoyances, the actions or efforts of opposers, the disagreeables which crowd against us in life. Rather should we look only at the good, strengthen and encourage the good, sure in confidence that the worthless will fade away and that it is powerless against the valuable. To look at things in a larger way than some of us have done; to take our point of view from the mountain of the Holy Spirit, and, with full reliance thereon, to devote ourselves to those things which are its servants. Resolved into daily life, this means to overcome evil with good, to heed not personal desires and ambitions, but rather endeavor to serve others, make our lives useful, to serve the good in others and veil the evil in them; to judge not, but, looking keenly for the good, to encourage that good by wise and loving service.

Service is the key to unity, and it is the one great theme of the Teacher of 'Akká. Without unity nothing can be accomplished. As the unity of the world is the aim and purpose of this Bahá'í Revelation, that unity must begin at home; unity of the few, the assembly, many assemblies, the country. many countries, the world. As the family is the symbol of the home and its peaceful unity, so must the Bahá'í assemblage be the type and foundation of the whole. And unity which is confined to the society or assembly alone is not unity, it must be open armed unity, seeking oneness of will, of purpose and of work with all other groups and assemblies. Each individual {{p60}} strengthens his individuality, not by maintaining it alone, but, on the contrary, by joining himself, his powers and abilities with others. Thus, his own efficiency is enlarged and multiplied by cohesion with others. As a single letter is of small worth compared to its value in a word and greater value in a sentence, so the individual man must enter into combination with all that he possibly can for the strengthening of the Cause of God and humanity, and this means the increased worth of himself.

This in reality is the Message of Bahá'u'lláh in this Day — Unity, Love and Service in the Name of God; service in love, service to the friends and to all; living with such sweetness, usefulness, happiness and cheerfulness that the life of itself attracts the notice of others and draws them to the beauty of such living; service to everyone around, no discrimination in service, but simply a great desire to be of use in every possible waking moment to some one of God's creatures.

Some money was offered to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He took the gold in his hand, held it for a moment and then passed it back, saying: "Give this to the poor, the very, very poor. Do not discriminate in favor of anyone sect or people, but give to all." His instruction concerning that money is the teaching for our lives. The poorer, the more needy, more helpless, more ignorant, the more bitter or hateful one is, the more shall we serve that one with goodness, sweetness, patience, forbearance, {{p61}} helpfulness and love. This is the teaching today of Bahá'u'lláh and of his blessed Son.

Every instruction of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is of value for living. His simple words are, as he says, seeds which, if they be sown in the heart and cultivated there, grow into beautiful trees of knowledge and wisdom. As one ponders, they develop new meanings and inner significances which are pregnant with power; and they are all thoroughly practical in their application to life. He ascribes everything to the "Power of the Word of God," and his only desire is that God's Will and God's Word may spread and conquer the hearts of men. **

THE FEAST OF FELLOWSHIP.

The last evening before we left 'Akká, 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked us to meet all the friends at supper and to speak to them as Mr. MacNutt and Mr. Harris had done when there. About forty gathered in the large upper balcony room at nine o'clock. 'Abdu'l-Bahá excused himself from visitors in the tent and came to us. He took a napkin from a plate at the table and handing it to one, said: "Bia inja" (Come here). Then he gave a napkin to another, and so on to all, placing each guest where he desired him to be. It was a beautiful example of host ship and personal attention.

When all were seated he walked up and down and around the long table, teaching us of the {{p62}} bounty of God and its victory over the hearts of men — words of heavenly encouragement — after which he withdrew to his visitors awaiting him in the tent. His words were as follows:

“Christ said that he was the heavenly bread which was sent down from heaven, and this ‘bread means the heavenly table. I hope tonight that heavenly blessings may descend upon you, that you may be born again, a new spirit, a new power, a new life. God’s abundance and favors are boundless, without end, and the blessings of Bahá’u’lláh are like a boundless ocean. One wave of the ocean of his blessings will cover (drown) all the mountains of the world. Now these waves are rolling upon your heads. I hope you will be drowned in these waves. You will get endless, boundless blessings and bounties.”

“This material world is very dark, and this handful of dust is very narrow. I hope that the doors of divine worlds may be opened before your faces, that you may soar up in a space whose {{p63}} light is eternal; enter a garden whose fruits are everlasting; become the center of human virtues and the appearances of divine perfections; your hearts be adorned with the commemoration of God; your faces illumined with the light of the love of God; that your ears may hear the melodies of sanctity; your spirits may be gladdened with divine glad-tidings; your tongues may move in praising God; in short, that you may attain to such a station as to be called the children of the Kingdom.”

The courses served were of delicious foods, ending with sweet confections and oranges. The Persian pilgrims, ten or more, were on the left of the long table, wearing red fezzes. Aged men with white fezzes, green and white turbans, flowing robes, full beards, faces of dignity, sweetness and rare intelligence, bordered the table. Many of them were old believers who had passed through the fires of persecution and several were closely related to some of the martyrs. A finer, more dignified or as notable an assemblage would be hard to find. Some of their names will be remembered when those of kings are forgotten. There were children also at the table, but only one woman, Mrs. Agnew, although the ladies of the household were doubtless present, seeing and hearing though not in sight.

After the meal Mr. Agnew, Mr. Scheffler and this servant spoke as requested. The utmost attention was paid by all, even those “grave and {{p64}} reverend seniors” before whom we were as little children in knowledge. Then, sweet old Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí came near the head of the table, and, sitting next to Mírzá Asadu’lláh, talked wisely and pleasantly for a few moments. Then all arose, embraced each other and us, and retired to their quarters.

THE WORLD’S MATURITY.

There are no apparent miracles at ‘Akká, but the great miracle is the spreading of the Word and the knowledge of the Bahá’í Revelation over the world from that prison spot, that apparently helpless source, during the last fifteen years. It is marvelous. It appears everywhere. It is being accepted by advancing souls of every race and religion. It is attracting attention from journals and magazines of many countries, Russia, India, Persia, France, England and America. All the powers of nature are working with it. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Hitherto the world has been as a child at the breast, able to receive and manifest but little of the powers of the Spirit. Now it is entering the age of its maturity, and it is possible for the divine teachings, confirmations, bounties and Spiritual Laws of God to appear perfectly because now there is capacity.”

In olden times, it was said by God that the sign of the true prophet should be that what he said should come to pass. Truly this is the sign of today. The words of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, and those of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá penetrate {{p65}} the hearts of men to the core. They do not return void to Him who sent them forth. They affect the lives; they uplift the souls; they give new birth to the spirits of men; they draw all together in the One Name of God; they cause Godly characteristics to take the place of animal qualities; they bring love, peace, union, harmony, service, happiness and joy in place of hatred, strife, oppression and greed.

The words uttered within those prison walls have gone forth through all the world carrying the gifts of God to the hearts of men. Are these things of God? Can an evil tree bear such fruit? Can the helpless, the powerless, the prisoners, the despised, the oppressed, manifest such power, such strength, such victories, save by the might of the All-Glorious One? Praise be to His Holy Name!

Moreover, the world in every part, in each plane of life, in science, art, invention, discovery, in thought and ideal, in word and deed, is carrying out daily with increasing and rapid growth the very conditions that the Blessed Messenger of God declared should be. Was this a Prophet, a Man of God? One needs but to take His Words, the “Hidden Words” and live them, he will know for himself, “and not by the knowledge of another.” He that doeth the works shall know whether they be of God. {{p66}}

THE PARTING.

In the forenoon of the last day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called each one of us separately to his reception room for a private interview and definite instruction. He said he wished for us to remain longer, but, on account of threatening troubles, it was better that we should go. Certain messages and communications were given to him by us, which he took and marked for later consideration. He bade us carry his message of love and happiness to the friends, and urged the utmost importance of unity and harmony of all believers. With such unity the Cause of God would prosper and spread rapidly; without it there could be no progress. He hoped that he should hear of our work in America. At the last meal he spoke of the building of the Temple in this country and said it was of very great importance, and should become a means of blessed association and unity among the friends.

I did not say good-bye. Soon after the noon meal ‘Abdu’l-Bahá met me in the little upper court. He embraced this servant, and, moving away a few feet, he turned, looked steadily and pronounced a promise that is a precious memory and hope. Then he went into the apartments of the household. A little later we were called to go. We descended the old, stone stairway, with friends watching us from the grated windows, crossed the lower court, passed through the archway and out to the carriage awaiting us. {{p67}}

As we entered the world again it was with a sort of chill as when one steps from a warm room into a cold night air. Curious eyes watched us as we rode again through the city, the cramped streets and crooked ways, to the outer gate where we waited for the third horse of the team. There we were surrounded by vendors and beggars calling out the names of the loved one we had left, evidently hoping thus to extract money from us. We had descended from a realm of happiness, peace and light to an underworld of greed and strife. Never before had we so perceived the ignorance and animalism which possesses men, and at first we shrank from them, but when we noted their condition, their sickness, their burdens and griefs, a longing tenderness welled up in our hearts toward them and to all creatures, a great wish to pour out on them the fragrances of peace, good-will and love, to lift them up from darkness to light, from ignorance to knowledge, from hell to heaven — and to serve them, even to the extinction of self. The contrast between the {{p68}} world and that “Prison” we had left was so strong that it intensified the consciousness of that heavenly condition in which we had dwelt during those blessed days and nights.

THE TOMB AND THE RIḌVÁN.

When we had left the city, Mírzá Munír, the faithful interpreter, joined us, and we drove two miles to the Garden of Bahjí and visited the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. There we removed our shoes and entered that consecrated place with melting hearts. In the large, outer room or court were beautiful rugs, vases and flowers, and a central garden railed around. A little breeze came through the open windows and caused the many glass prisms, pendent from lamps and chandeliers, to jangle sweetly together. It was {{p69}} a soft chiming in the silence, fitting and beautiful. Each one alone entered the inner chamber of the tomb, and remained as long as possible, communing with God and remembering the friends far away before the Presence which unmistakably was there. Again we were constrained to silence, for each soul was occupied with his God. It was the culmination of our pilgrimage.

From there we drove a short distance to the Garden of the Ridván, met the old gardener, Mírzá Abu'l Kasim, took tea with him under the spreading mulberry trees (the “tent without poles or covering”), and rested by the seat which was “over land and water” where the Great Manifestation used to sit. We saw his plain room in the house at the end of the garden, and {{p70}} noted how tenderly everything was preserved and cared for. We sympathized with Mírzá Abu'l Kasim in his pride and love for that Garden of his Lord. The thoughts and emotions of years were crowded for us into that one day. We were overwhelmed with love, praise and thankfulness. Through all the nine mile drive to Haifa we scarcely spoke, for words disturbed the oceans in our souls. Like tired and happy children we went again to the “Hospice of the Little Child.”

On my return to America I found the friends eager to hear my impressions of ‘Akká and especially of ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, and I have tried to tell somewhat of them in this and other writings; but the certain, clear and correct expression of him {{p71}} is that which he declares in his own words, viz.: that he is ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of Glory — that is, the Servant of God; that he has no station, no purpose, no claim, no wish, no existence except that of ‘Abdu'l-Bahá. He asks most earnestly that no one shall ascribe to him any mission or station other than that of the Servant of God. Those who really desire to obey his will and comply with his wish, rather than to uphold their own imaginations, will do literally as he has requested.

In truth, no title can be nobler than this; no glory is greater than service; no station higher than that of sacrifice; no honor greater than to be the instrument of the Spirit. He who serves God is truly in the image of God, and he who sacrifices himself for love of man is the Exemplar of the Love of God. It is enough that ‘Abdu'l-Bahá is the Example and Leader of all mankind in service, sacrifice, love and peace, fulfilling before all the Law of the Kingdom as declared by the Great Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh.

In Wonderland

Arthur S. Agnew

We lived in wonderland {{p75}} at ‘Akká. Had we been children visiting in some royal palace, with furnishings richer than our expectations or beyond even our imaginations, the wonder would not have been greater. While in reality we were living in a prison and for a week we had not left our room except to go into the dining room adjoining or into the little walled-in court scarcely larger than our room — all on the upper story.

Our room was clean and neat but very plain and simple. There was a straw matting over the stone floor and over this in the center under the little table was thrown a Persian rug. On either side of the room was a single iron bedstead and along the end of the room was a low divan covered with white muslin. In one corner on the plain, board walls were some hooks for hanging clothes and in the other stood an iron wash stand with towels. The center table held, each day, a fresh and beautiful bouquet of flowers and at night a lamp was lit and placed upon it. {{p76}}

The walls, the floor, the stairs were stone, worn by age and chipped and broken by the elements.

Such were the physical surroundings, yet when we left, the commonplace things of the world seemed strange to us; it seemed as if we had left our home and were going out into a strange country, and yet withal a feeling of security and peace possessed us. We wished to be silent. It was an inner consciousness. And of this wonder we were not entirely outwardly aware until we noted in each other's eyes the dreamy look of preoccupation, to be suddenly aroused to find that we in thought were back in 'Akká, to find that some great change had taken place within us, that we had been living in a land of spiritual wonder, that our souls were astonished at the power of the spirit of God. And in this wonderland our souls expanded and a great realization and longing for the things of God possessed us. As a tulip, wet with dew, opens its cup in the glory of the sunbeam, so our souls were opened in that fragrant atmosphere of spirit to an understanding of the power and love of God.

In that love our souls were bathed, refreshed, enkindled. It was sweet, fragrant, charming, delightful. These are only words, but if it is charming, it is charming; if it is delightful, how can it be more so? Yet these are mere words used to describe that ecstatic state when human spirit meets the spirit of Love Divine tuned to its comprehension, words used to describe that which {{p77}} must forever remain indescribable — the realization in our hearts of the surrounding presence of Divine Faith and Love.

When one enters the peace of that glorious home, all the world is left outside. Through all the friends at 'Akká, and there are some forty persons in that household, there flows the happy, joyous, fragrant spirit of love. It seems in all of them without distinction and creates an atmosphere powerful in the extreme. It is an evidence of the Spirit's power. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit." It is a forecast of what the whole world shall be.

But while it seems in all of these dear souls without distinction, it really is in them only by reflection of the spirit in 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The burden of it all devolves on him. In him is the decision, the responsibility; he is the center, all others reflect the spirit which they find in him.

And he tells us he is the servant and reflector of the spirit of Bahá'u'lláh, that it was in Him the Great Light shown: Bahá'u'lláh, the Great Manifestation! And I knew this to be true.

We looked upon the photograph of Bahá'u'lláh. It is the face of one in whom the human spirit had been “driven to the wall;” the face of one who had “found his beloved in the garden” of his heart; in whom a wondrous power was evident, not to oppose but to submit, and submitting to conquer the opposers. There can be no doubt of the source of that wondrous power which sits upon that brow as on a throne of majesty, which rises up, unbidden as a maiden’s blush, upon that face with rarest beauty. {{p78}} It is the Blessed Beauty, the Blessed Perfection. It is the face of him in whom no wish nor desire is found save the will of God. It is the Face of God — the lights of all the attributes of God play over it.

Whatever may be the reasoning of my mind regarding this most profound experience of my life, however I may explain it to myself, seeking to give a reason for the faith within me, and however foolish it may seem to others, the fact remains that in a moment — with feelings of awe and reverence and realizations of the majesty and greatness of that Face of God — I bowed myself prostrate upon the floor and laid my spirit, soul and self upon the altar of His Love. Something in that Face demanded of me obedience and something in my heart obeyed with joy and gladness.

When next we looked upon the face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, we saw therein reflected the light of knowledge and of power which made the face of Bahá'u'lláh so beautiful. I realize now, that ere my mind gave up itself and bowed before the majesty of Bahá'u'lláh in that moment it recognized in the lines of face and brow the evidence of majesty, power and knowledge — not such as when the tyrant of the human will spurs on the jaded brain to search for thoughts and flounder in expression — but welling up, as from a spring eternal, the Holy Spirit flows in joy and gladness, in holiness and glory, a never ending flood of knowledge, light and love for all mankind. {{p79}}

And now in unity with the Holy Spirit which manifested in Bahá'u'lláh stands ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Branch, through whom flows the same lifegiving Spirit to build this great edifice of love in the hearts of men.

And how we knew this I cannot tell. I cannot analyze it. The Holy Spirit is above the grasp of man. It lifts man up to its own height of realization and perception of truth, establishing in him Its confirmation and assurance but It does not allow man to draw It down to his limitation, that he may express It in his words, or confine It in a creed or dogma.

One evening, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came into the room to answer our questions. We wrote down the answers beside the questions which friends had given us to ask, in the note book kept for that purpose. His words were full of advice and exhortation. When this was finished, he said: “Now lay aside your note book and let us visit together.” He sat upon the divan, asked me to sit beside him, placed his arm around my shoulders (as a father would a child), laid my head over against his forehead and opened his lips in words of love and encouragement. He spoke freely with great power and feeling. There was no barrier {{p80}} between him and me save the barrier of my own limitation. The ocean of love was flowing, the cup of my heart was full and could take no more. This was the only barrier between him and me. I could not touch him, though his hand lay lovingly upon my shoulder. I had nothing to offer, but he offered the fellowship of the Kingdom — offered it all, everything, freely — I might take so much as I was able. He would have exchanged places with me, but I was not able, I had not the capacity — over me rolled great billows of love — enough for all humanity.

But that evening the eye of my soul saw another vision and a glimpse into another world whose power is unequalled, which accomplishes its purpose without warfare or strife, without causing unhappiness or destruction, which is above opposition, to which the intellect cannot reach, which loses nothing of its attraction because it is the same for all, one atom of which is sufficient for all creatures while the rolling ocean of its power envelops all humanity and must accomplish the end for which He hath ordained it. It is the Love of God.

In that atmosphere the One who created me laid His loving hand upon the heartstrings, struck the inner chord of my being and within my soul the song must sing. It is the song of the redeemer, the song the sower sings as he goes forth to sow, and the song the reaper sings when he gathers in the golden grain. It is the song of existence, the song of life, the song of joy, the song of triumph.

I realize my utter lack of power to express in words this wonderful spirit. I have tried it with some of my most intimate, close and sympathetic friends {{p81}} and have not been able to carry its message, and to my own self I must admit my failure for when I attempt to describe this wonderful spirit, my words do not describe it to myself. I can only find the expression of this spirit in the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This glorious attainment God has reserved for His messengers that they may lay their hearts open before the world, that through the conquering power of self-surrender the living sacrifice may overcome the world, and men come to know of unity and love.

At times when reading the Book of Íqán (Certainty) the spirit of light, joy and gladness has come over me, which I have not been able to ascribe to any word or sentence or to anyone idea or thought. It has seemed like a radiance arising from the Book, from the Certainty of Truth. We lived continually in this radiant atmosphere at 'Akká. Did it arise from a perception of the Certainty of Truth above the operation of the mind to follow? The subtle spirit of Love Divine, all love excelling, in which we lived at 'Akká, to which the depth of our natures responded and called it the Love and Presence of God, this spirit is in the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, finds expression therein, can be taken from them by the pure in heart, is creative of all the high qualities and powers of perfect living and pure thinking, creates within the heart a tenderness and power to love, to serve, {{p79}} to sympathize, to help, to forget the self, to grow more charitable, more kind, more willing servants, to surrender our own human will in the dawning consciousness of the knowledge of the will of God; gives us knowledge and the strength to do His will, gives us the idea and the power to execute it.

The very atmosphere of ‘Akká, within that home made holy by the presence of Bahá’u’lláh, is charged with a wonderful spirit. All things there are affected by it. It enters into every action and every word.

Words which emanate from that White Spot are charged with the Holy Spirit. The Word of God has always been the same. The innersignificance, the great reality deposited in the words from the lips of the Prophets and Manifestations of God has always been the same reality, whether in Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Muḥammad, the Báb, or Bahá’u’lláh; but now, It has come for the establishment of the Kingdom, to bring love and unity among mankind. The power of the sunlight is always the same, though in the spring it brings out the delicate blossoms and in the autumn it produces the bountiful harvest.

And now it is the “harvest time” and the seeds sown in all the previous dispensations are bearing fruit. The words of Jesus through the spread of the Gospel have proclaimed unto every nation the coming of the Kingdom, as a witness unto them; and now, from that prison town of ‘Akká, {{p83}} in the shelter of the Holy Mount Carmel trodden by the feet of all the Prophets, is going forth today a living message laden with a Wonderful Spirit, proclaiming the Kingdom, taking away the barriers from the hearts of men, that all mankind may live together as one family in unity and love.

I cannot say that my ideals were realized in the Holy Presence in that White Spot; in truth, it was quite different from my anticipation. The first meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was like being shaken severely and made to stand up squarely upon my feet; shaken, that is from my preconceived ideas and stood up squarely to lift my head into the sunlight of the Truth of God and take a deep breath of the true atmosphere of the Spirit of God. We met not our ideals but the will of God. His ideas are not our ideas. It is well when we can set aside the ideals born of our own imagination, limited to our imperfect grasp of Truth and take for our own the ideals set before us by one who has the perfect knowledge with which God endows His Manifestation. May all the sincere and earnest people of the world come into oneness of ideal in unity with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Center of the Covenant, as he is in unity and oneness of ideal with Bahá’u’lláh, the Manifestation of God.

It is not possible for everyone to make the visit to ‘Akká. Were it possible ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wishes he might meet every loving soul in the world. But everyone may meet the Spirit enclosed within {{p81}} the words; and we met not a man in ‘Akká but the Holy Spirit radiant, vibrant in a man, and those who cannot make the visit may find the Holy Spirit radiant, vibrant in the words “concealed within the tents” of His utterance; and those who have sought and found therein the “pearl of greatest price,” who have found the “treasure hidden in the field” will not exchange it for all the world.

APRIL 10, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

I have been wishing that such a day might come. Thank God that such a day has come in which we see each other. Today the greatest happiness to me is the meeting of the friends.

The believers are my soldiers. Through them will ‘Abdu’l-Bahá triumph and gain the victory over the cities of the hearts of people. They are like wings for me, and the Cause for which we serve is very great. To-day has many troubles, labors, much difficulty, great tests and trials, but the end is good.

Though the way is a long distance, yet the Kingdom of God is very great.

The Blessed Beauty has put in our hands the lamp of teachings. By this light the world will be illuminated. But all the people of the world seek to put it out, all endeavor to put it out. And these lights are the lights of the Kingdom and nobody can put them out (quench them). Before long they will illuminate all the world because these lights are illuminated by the light and wisdom of God; and the effulgence of them is the teaching of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH.

His Holiness Christ was the light of the Kingdom of God and the disciples were lights that were illuminated through him. All the `{{p4}}` people of the world wished to put them out, to quench them, but they could not.

Day by day the light of those lamps increased and now it is the same case; all the powers of the world gathered together cannot quench this light. You know Nero, the Roman Emperor, could not put out that light — such a man as Nero could not — but by and by he himself was quenched — while they became more and more illuminated. And I hope that now you may also become divine lights and that if all the people of the world gather to put them out they would not be able. America will be enlightened very much and from there (that place) lights will be sent to all places. Therefore, I hope that from America teachers may go to other places — to China, Japan, India and to Europe and other countries.

It is very important that those places be firmly united — Chicago, New York and Washington.

APRIL 10 (EVENING MEAL)

These dishes are Persian dishes. Although the Persian dishes are simple, I hope the spiritual dishes may be powerful. The principal food is the spiritual food, which is called the supper of the Lord. The strength or power of the physical food is only for one night, but the power of the spiritual food strengthens and sustains us throughout eternity. From the physical strength the result will be slight, but from the spiritual food the greatest results will be produced. Physical power when it touches a thing will have effect upon it, but the spiritual power in order to have effect does not require direct contact. For instance, while this spiritual power is in the East, its effect is felt in the West.

For instance, Christ appeared in the East, but the effect of the Holy Spirit manifested in the West. When Christ appeared in the East his cause did not spread so much in the East as in the West, so I hope as this Greatest Manifestation has appeared in the East, its greatest influence shall be in the West. Between the material things and spiritual things there is connection. The more the body is healthful the greater will be the power of the spirit in man; the power of the intellect, the power of the memory, the power of reflection shall be more powerful. This world is like the body. The Cause of God, the Confirmation of the Holy Spirit, the Divine Bounties, the Spiritual Power are like the Spirit.

The physical body of man when in the condition of seed has not the capacity, has not the power to show forth spiritual powers in that condition perfectly. When it is born its capacity will be more and its spiritual power will be more. When the time for it to be at the breast is over the power of the spirit will be more powerful. When it reaches maturity then the spiritual power will appear perfect. So the perfection of the body is the means for the expression of the power of the spirit.

Therefore, when we look at the world we see that the physical matters, material things, have made a great development and made a great advance. It cannot be compared with the past centuries or any other of the former centuries. The past centuries are in great beauty and appearance, civilization is advanced, science is also, industries and discoveries have reached the highest station. The physical world has made a great advance, in such manner that it is going to reach the station of maturity. But in the former centuries it was like a babe at the breasts. But as the longer the body has lived, the stronger the spiritual power, likewise as the physical world has made a great advance and is near to reach maturity, so it is with the Cause of God, and the Holy Spirit will appear with great power and the Word of God will have a great effect.

All the prophets and especially Christ wished to deliver the world, they wanted to establish the great peace and spread perfect love among the people, that the whole world become like unto an ocean and the people like unto waves, that all may become waves of the same sea and through this the uniting of the world may appear. But this world had not this capacity in ancient times because it was like the babe at the breasts, and because this is the time of maturity it is possible that the divine teachings, exhortations, confirmations, bounties and spiritual laws of God may appear perfectly because there is capacity now.

I hope that the East and the West will become {{p7}} one, also the North and the South and differences will be removed.

How lovely it is that you from the West and we from the East should Sit around one table. This is impossible through the physical powers, but the power of the Word of God gathers us together.

APRIL 11, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

In the Persian language they call America the new world. This is a very good name. This new Revelation will be the cause of America becoming a new world. It will gain a new life. His Holiness Christ said that man must gain a new birth, and I hope that all parts of America will be born. America surpassed all Europe in this Cause while Europe is nearer.

The Kingdom of God is like unto the sun. It sends the rays on all things. This globe of earth is illuminated by it. In every country where there is no cloud the sun reflects and where there is a cloud all of the sun of the country is concealed. Thank God that the atmosphere (weather) of America is clear and that the rays of the Sun of Truth are reflecting. Those who have sight can see the light but the blind will deny, but when through the heat of the sun the trees grow, the blind will also touch it and feel it. Therefore, such signs will be seen that all will testify.

Now the season is the spiritual season and the material season of spring. If you look over the {{p8}} mountains and plains, everywhere you see how beautiful and splendid it is, and from the spiritual spring of the Kingdom before long you will see spiritual faces shining so brightly.

But there will come a day of trial and people will be occupied in blaming others and will say rough things. They will hate and curse you; what they did to us they will do to you. Thus the people will accuse you and say many things against you, but I am sure you will show steadfastness. For the sake of Christ the people hated very much the disciples and injured them. They accused them and hated them and they rose up and executed them. But now the people will only hurt you with their tongues. You must show steadfastness and firmness perfectly and as a consequence the accusation will become salutation and all tongues will praise you.

APRIL 12, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

(Mr. Chase and Mr. Scheffler came) {ed}

To-day is a beautiful day. I have been longing to see such a day. I am very happy. My happiness is from the point that it is the power of God which has gathered us together, that while before we were far apart now we are together.

Were it not for the power of the Word of God such a meeting were impossible. We are all gathered together in love. While it is possible for different nations to arrange a meeting together still their hearts are not united. But such a meeting {{p9}} as this, of different nations united in heart, is from the power of the Word of God. And you are the representatives of all the believers in America. It is as if all are here. For the love of God is like an ocean, the believers its waves. All are the waves of one sea. Therefore, each is the representative of all. There is one ray, one reflection, from the sun but through various windows it reflects into the room. The light is one light and the Kingdom is one and all the believers are children of the same Kingdom. All are the letters of one book, the flowers of one garden, and the pearls of one sea. Therefore, today it seems to me as if all the believers were present. The believers of Persia are longing to see the believers of America.

For a long time Mr. Chase could not come, until the time came when he could come with others. You have come in a good time. It is the season of spring.

The philosophers of Europe and America have an idea that unity may be settled among the people and they have tried very much. They have conceived this idea and have written many books concerning this matter, but they have not been able and the result was contrary, for differences and opposition were raised up more than before.

In olden times if a war took place there would be gathered by each party about one hundred thousand men and during one year perhaps seven or eight thousand would be killed. But {{p10}} now in this age in the war between Russia and Japan about one and a half million were called to arms and one third of that number were lost, and a half million were wounded or sick. Such a war has never before occurred.

Therefore, we say that what the philosophers tried is without result, useless. But the power of the Word of God will unite East and West. The philosophers wished to promulgate their idea but they had not the power to render it effective. They were only ideas and thoughts and nothing else. But the power of God gives the idea to the people and also the power to execute it.

When we look upon the existence we find that all things, all existence, is composed of many elements. For instance, this flower is composed of different elements. These elements have found unity with each other. What is the result? As dust it was nothing, but after it was composed it became a flower.

If there should not be decomposition, composition would not be. For instance, take several things. Until the different things are separately decomposed the composition and union is impossible. For example, if you wish the dust and stone and wood to be mixed perfectly with each other, it is impossible unless each be decomposed into its salts; when we have dissolved them then we can compose them. For instance, in a pharmacy they first dissolve the medicines, then bring them together and then they give a firm {{p11}} union. Before dissolution composition is impossible.

Therefore the Word of God decomposes the selfishness of people, their evil habits, their bad morals, and afterward composes them. If such a thing does not happen, perfect union cannot be attained. Therefore philosophers failed to do these things.

For instance, the power of the Word takes away the ideas of the nations — as with the Jews, the Christians and Muḥammadans — and gives them and other nations a new idea through which they become united. Therefore, the different nations become one.

For instance, Christ appeared; the Jews believed in him; the Romans, Greeks, Anglo-Saxons believed in him. So he gathered all again and made them one, made them Christians. The religions that were before Christianity were abolished. This was done through the Word of God. It cannot be done through the power of the philosophers.

APRIL 12, 1907, (LATE IN THE EVENING)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked about the House of Spirituality and was told the twelve members were as one person. He said:

It must be so. Twelve thousand men must be one. Everything will be obtained by unity and harmony, and the very greatest thing by division will disappear, will be annihilated. The appearance of prophets is for the sake of unity and {{p12}} harmony. The manifestation of Christ was for the sake of unity and the manifestation of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH was for the same sake, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá himself has had many trials and troubles for the same sake, to cause the people to unite. There must be established the unification of mankind.

I admire and praise this night. This is a good night. To-day I met some people who were very difficult to meet, but for the sake of love I had to bear it, only for the sake of love and tenderness, and I became very tired from the meeting but I had to bear it. It is my happiness to be with you, but when I meet with strangers, then there is trouble and difficulty for me; but you have to bear them as I bear them. Whatever you see from strangers, if they oppose you and injure you, you have to bear it and be patient. As much as they injure you and hate you, you have to show your kindness to them. You have to treat them as friends. It must be so. If they give you poison, you have to give them honey; if they wound you, you have to plaster their wounds. So I hope that love may be established in this world, that all hatred and rancour may pass away.

When we look upon the existence, we see there is decomposition and composition. Composition is the means and cause of life and decomposition is the cause of death. Now several elements are Composed and united and form this flower, and so several elements are composed and the body is formed, and so with everything. By this it {{p13}} is known and understood that all unification and composition is the cause of life in all stations-in the mineral, vegetable, animal and human stations. The lowest station is the station of the mineral. If unification is not found, the several molecules will not be gathered and composed.

For instance, in this wood there are molecules. These molecules are gathered together and composed, then wood will be found. All substance gets its life from unification and composition and when separation takes place among these molecules, death is certain. Now we understand that in all existence composition is the cause of life and that variation and disagreement is the cause of death.

APRIL 13, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked if we were at rest and in peace. He said:

This is a prison and in prison one cannot find rest. Whatever it may be, this is a prison and you will stay some days in this prison with us and you will be counted as prisoners. In fact, you are my companions in servitude to the world, and you are in prison as I am, and in everything we are partners.

All of man’s body is body, all are parts of the body, the hands, the head, the feet, etc., but God has chosen and specified the mind of man, and so the power of intellect in the mind of man has made it to be peculiar. Also, the globe of the world, all is alike, all are lands, there is no {{p14}} difference, but God has preferred this land for the manifestation or appearance of prophets. Abraham was in Haran, but at last he was brought to this place, and the King of Peace, the teacher of Abraham, was here. Moses was here in these surroundings. The prophets of Israel all were here. Jesus Christ was also from here and Muḥammad emigrated to this place, and this new Revelation also came to this place; although He originated in Persia, the Blessed Perfection came to this place. God has given this Holy Spot a special blessing, when He gives all the teachings from this place, and the revelations have appeared, and the Holy Tomb is here, and the Great Prison is here. Therefore you must thank God that you have come to such a place and you are counted as if you are from here.

People who are under the shade of the Kingdom, they are from the Kingdom although they are from various places. Although ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is from Persia, he is from the Kingdom and you are also from the Holy Land, and for all these blessings you must thank God very much and praise Him. The rule is that whenever a man wants to do something he has first to think about it, then to decide, then to perform it. For instance, those who are intending to discover the North Pole; first they think for that end, they consider it, the difficulty they are about to undertake, and they imagine the things necessary to discover it and {{p15}} the labors they have to bear. After meditating, then they decide to do it. After that they will travel to go and perform it. The discovery of the Pole, although it is important, yet in proportion to the Cause of God it is as nothing. How much trouble and labor people suffer to discover the Pole and how much trouble and hardship they endure for its sake. They sacrifice their lives and endanger themselves for it. How many ships went to discover it and no news came back from them. How many were broken by the frost, and how many wise men lost their lives in this way. Still now they form a party and go again, that perhaps they may discover it.

But now we are intending to discover the Pole of the Kingdom. First of all we must meditate about it and think of the hardships, troubles and calamities, then we must decide and begin to perform. We see that people give up their wealth and many things, to discover the North Pole, with great devotion. How much more we must make our devotion for the discovery of the Pole of the Kingdom. The reward for them is only in the mention of their names, viz.: that so and so went to discover such a place; but our reward is to be a servant of the Kingdom, everlasting life, heavenly enlightenment, immortality. Now we see how these people endeavor, but they have not discovered it, but thank God that we without much labor succeed. It is evident how great is His favor upon us.

His Holiness Christ arranged a supper and {{p16}} called it the Lord's supper. He called it so be-cause on that night he gave teachings to his disciples. He did not intend by the supper the food which was served, but rather the heavenly table which was his teachings. The Blessed Beauty has prepared the Lord's supper for us in all His Holy Tablets. He has prepared so much that there is no end to it, and I pray now that today our dinner may be a heavenly dinner because it was in the utmost fragrance and love.

APRIL 13, 1907 (EVENING MEAL)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá has written a Tablet specially for the purpose, that should anyone ask about his station, it is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and no more, that all men may be in unity with each other. There should be no variation. He is always thinking of unity, that all should be one. This is for the sake that there should be harmony among the believers.

The believers of America now must endeavor that capacity and ability may be gained in America, because the most important thing is ability and capacity. If there should be no capacity nor ability the abundance and bounties have no effect. What bounty is greater than the rays of the sun, what bounty is greater than the showers of rain and the breeze of spring, but the barren ground will not bring forth any benefit, and there will nothing grow in the land that is full of thorns. From the heat of the sun and the showers of rain and the blowing of the {{p17}} winds, nothing will grow in the barren desert. These abundances have effect and result when the land is good and clear. Therefore, it is evident that capacity and ability are most important things.

The divine kingdom is like a beautiful garden but if the people who enter into that garden be blind they cannot realize anything from the beauty of the flowers, and if they should be deaf they cannot hear the melodies of the nightingale of that garden, and if they have caught cold they cannot smell the fragrances of the flowers. What is the reason? It is because the deaf and blind have not the capacity and ability to feel these things. It is as if they had not entered into that garden. And so it is with the divine kingdom of God. Its stores are open — those who have capacity can get the benefit, and if they have not capacity they will get no benefit at all. Therefore, we must try and endeavor to get ability.

The most important of all forms of ability and capacity is unification. If union and harmony should not be attained we cannot get the benefit from the kingdom, as some blind persons sitting in front of the rays of the sun, or a number of deaf people listening to the melodies of the birds, or a number of people with bad colds in their heads entering into a flower garden — they can sense nothing. Therefore, I hope that you, when you return to Chicago and New York, you will try and endeavor as far as you can to cause unity and harmony among the believers. {{p18}}

This kind of food is not Persian. It is European, except that there is one Persian dish — the sweetened rice. At first there were no potatoes in Persia. This is something new with the Persians-imported from Europe. At first the Persians did not take kindly to the potato, saying it was an apple of Europe, because of their fanaticism. But now whenever they mention your names all become glad and happy. How different it is that it has become so. See and realize the power of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH, what he has done.

If you go into Persia you will see many more things. Really the believers of Persia love you very much.

There is a Sentence in the New Testament where Christ says he will not eat of the grape again until he eats thereof in His Father's Kingdom. What do the great and learned men think Concerning this sentence? There is no grape in the Kingdom. This a symbol and sign of the Word of God. The intoxication of this wine is such that it will be seen. The English people are notable for their much drinking, but we hope our intoxication will surpass them. Their intoxication is from the outward wine and our intoxication is from the wine of the love of God. After they drink, giddiness will result, but our wine is a wine of everlasting exhilaration. {{p19}}

APRIL 15, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

Mírzá Asadu'lláh said to the Master that we wished to take dinner in the name of the Council Board of Chicago.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: Not only in remembrance of the Council Board but also of all the believers. And when you go to visit the Holy Tomb you must remember all the believers.

In Europe and America there is a meeting of the parliament. In this parliament there are men, each of them represents many men. A single man is like ten thousand men. It seems in fact as if ten thousand or twenty thousand men are present in that meeting. His word is the word of all and what he accepts all of them accept.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá considers that you are representatives of all the believers in America. You are the representatives of all. In reality and in fact it seems as if all are present and all are dining with him.

If a light is ignited in a meeting it is the same as if all lights were illuminated. Because light is one thing. Although the candlesticks are many yet the light is one. All are believers of the light, the truth and reality, and in the light of truth there is no separation, and all are the rays of one sun, therefore each of you represents all. Let us suppose a beloved one and a thousand lovers. The lovers are one, their forms one, yet all are different, but to the beloved one all are the face of the lover, therefore all are one. {{p20}}

The beloved of God although they are far away in body, in reality, in spirit, they are present. They exist here, though they are not present. If spiritual meeting were not possible I would go to meet all the believers in America, because I am anxious to meet them, but the people would say he has fled away from the prison, but if he goes and comes back again he would say I have been over and met the believers and I have come back again. I have been to the meeting and met Mr. Scheffler, Mr. Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Agnew. (‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in English, “Very well,” and was so happy he said it in French, “Trés bien,” in Italian “Multo Bono,” and in Turkish, Persian and Arabic)."

See how good this meeting is that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá speaks in different languages. He praises this meeting. Could anyone believe that we would gather so together in such a meeting, but the love of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH has gathered us.

The need itself attracts generosity. To be thirsty shows that there is water.

APRIL 15,1907 (EVENING MEAL)

It is a good gathering. Thank God that believers are gathered around this table from every part, with utmost sincerity, unity and friendship. I beg of God that as we are gathered in this contingent world round this table, we may also be gathered in the world of the Kingdom and be united. {{p21}}

I hope that the gathering together of the believers may be the source of the unity and harmony of the people of the world. That this physical table may be a symbol of the heavenly table. Christ said that he was the heavenly bread which was sent down from heaven, and this bread means the heavenly table. I hope tonight that heavenly blessings may descend upon you. That you may be born again a new spirit, a new power, a new life. God’s abundances and favors are boundless, without end, and the blessings of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH are like a boundless ocean. One wave of the ocean of His blessings will cover (drown) all the mountains of the world. Now these waves are rolling upon your head. I hope you will be drowned in these waves, that you will get endless, boundless, blessings and bounties.

This material world is very dark, and this handful of dust is very narrow. I hope that the doors of divine worlds may be opened before your faces, that you may soar up in a space whose lights are eternal, enter a garden whose fruits are everlasting, become the center of human virtues and the appearances of divine perfections, that your hearts be adorned with the commemoration of God, your faces illumined with the light of the love of God, your ears may hear the melodies of sanctity, your spirits may be gladdened with divine glad tidings, your tongues may move in praising God; in short, that you {{p22}} may attain to such a station as to be called the Children of the Kingdom.

[The foregoing was delivered at the meeting of the Persian and American believers, 9 to 11 o'clock, in the evening of April 15, 1907, on the balcony of the house.] {ed}

APRIL 16, 1907 (MIDDAY MEAL)

Concerning the Temple, the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, it is a very important matter. The most important thing now in America is the building of the Temple. You and your friends must endeavor in this matter. This building will be the cause of confirmation of the believers. It has a great effect because it is the beginning of the foundation. After centuries it is not so important as it is now, but now it is very important. At first they build the Temple and worship in it and grow. In past centuries they could not build it so outwardly. This building will be the cause of unity and prosperity of the cause. The unity comes. From every part the believers will assist. This is a heavenly society. And also it will be the cause of strength. The believers will get blessing and bounties. It cannot be compared with the church of the old time. You have only to begin; everything will be all right. If you cannot build a large building, let it be a smaller one.

Take this message to the House of Spirituality and to the believers. You must announce this matter, that you are going to begin the {{p23}} building of this building. Build it wherever it may be best. It is not necessary that it be built in the center of the city where the lands are expensive. Let it be built where the lands are cheaper. The Temple must be built in such a place that around it may be built gardens and flowers. If possible near the lake, it is much better.

Now, each of you must be a volume for the believers. Had 'Abdu'l-Bahá time, he would write for each of the believers a Tablet, but you know that he has not the time. You have witnessed with your own eyes that he has not the time. There are two kinds of letters, one the silent letter and one the spoken letter. I hope you are the spoken letters. You will be the means of mentioning the happiness of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. You must give forth such pleasure and happiness that 'Abdu'l-Bahá may hear the noise of their rejoicing.

As now you are going back to America from here you have a special and particular strength, a particular power, strength and confirmation of the Holy Spirit and the heavenly hosts will help you.

Alláh'u'Abhá!

To the dear Friends in Chicago: {.greet}

Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá. (God Is the Most Glorious!) {.greet}

Aseyeh has been in the Garden of God, has “seen the beautiful flowers” “inhaled the fragrance (of the love of God),” “tasted the sweet fruits” and has come ‘Away “with a bouquet of beautiful flowers.”

I will give you the illustration just as it was given to us by the Master.

On the last night of our glorious visit of six wonderful days, we were gathered in a room where were assembled the Master, His sister (the Greatest Holy Leaf), the daughters, the Zoroastrian women and others. The Master said to Miss Moore: “What will you tell Lua when you return?” She said: “Everything that has happened.” I said that we had kept an account of every word and it would be to us like diamonds; that it was beautiful to read accounts of others’ visits, but this was our own. He said that He hoped we would be as books. When a person goes to a garden and returns with a bunch of flowers, that tells the story: that he has been in the garden, inhaled the fragrance, seen the beautiful flowers, tasted the sweet fruits and returns with the flowers, we would take with us a bouquet of beautiful flowers which would be our book.

The bouquet gathered in that garden is indeed beautiful and I hope to distribute flowers from it to all whom my life touches during the coming years.

I will give you a few separate, tiny flowers: in answer to the question “Is it possible to help those of our relatives and friends who have passed on before hearing of the Revelation” He wires, by earnestly praying that they might be admitted to the Kingdom.” And to the question “How can we best, help our relatives to see the light of this Revelation?” He said: “By praying God to the in His own way.”

At another time, He said: “One must not look at one’s self, for the more he does this, the more he sees his faults and feels guilty and useless. But when he looks at God, he feels God is near to him, and feels God’s Power, Greatness, if we Bounty and Love at ourselves, we see only our weakness.

Again: All are not expected to be teachers. To work in the home, so that another may go forth to teach, is "service."

When asked by one how she might serve, the Master said "By being kind and loving, and serving the believers and unbelievers; and by praying earnestly, is serving in the Cause." one believers in trying to have meetings have been successful, and others, not so. He said "Those who start meetings, if their intentions are good, it is a great service." This is an encouragement, - to know that the effort was acceptable.

I showed the Master my Tablets and the neat way in which they were gotten up by a friend and asked: "Now that you have seen me, do you mean all the beautiful things you said in these Tablets?" He said: "Part is what you are and part is what I hope you will be."

On first seeing them He was surprised at the large number (17) and asked if He had written all those to me! Then in explanation, to account for so many, He said: "She would write and write to me and I answered the letters." Before leaving 'Akká I asked if should continue to write at length and open my heart, or would there be an understanding so that this would be unnecessary. He wild: "Write, but write briefly, and I will understand the rest."

One evening a question was asked about the Omnipotence of God. Did God create us in order that He might express or manifest Himself? Is He not dependent upon us at all? The answer was: "Man is dependent God is independent. Man is weak. God is strong. Man is ignorant. God is wise. Man's capacity is limited. God is all-powerful, unlimited. The sun has two risings. It appears to rise but really does not (it is the earth that changes). It shines regardless of the earth. If there were no earth, it would shine just the same (though by means of the earth the wonderful effect of the sun in producing life is beautiful). So, God is, and although He expresses Himself through man, still if He had not created man, He would Be just the same. God is Omnipotent."

After this talk He asked as to sing for Him.

Miss Anderson, Miss Moore and I chanted as best we could, seated in oriental fashion on the floor, in a row. Two of the daughters were present, Monovar and Zeah. Monovar, the youngest daughter (22), is most beautiful. She has a dignity and a spirit of humility and a gentle sweetness which is unusual. She seems to me to be the Master in miniature. She did all our translating.

June, Washington, D. C.

The Master enjoyed my chants and asked me often to sing. He told Miss Moore to learn Persian and to learn the chant I had sung, so I taught it to her and we sang together to Him. During one morning's visit from Him I was so happy my joy just doubled over the Master laughed aloud, as He did many times during our stay. He was able to be to us a loving father, a companion and friend, and we could enjoy ourselves socially because we did not continually keep Him answering questions, at which time He would at once assume a different attitude and a distance would come between us and one would then feel His Kingship, His Greatness, the unlimited depths of His Wisdom. He is indeed as a “well of living water surprisingly up into everlasting life,” and knowledge and wisdom come from His lips as does water from a fountain, giving life to every thirsty and all who will may come and take the water of life freely.

For the most of the time during our six day at ‘Akká we dined with the daughters Miss Edith Sanderson of Paris was also there. A visiting Páshá from Damascus, who had lost his position, prevented, our dining with the Master, for this Páshá is not a believer, though he loves the Master and comes to see Him for a week at a time.

It is strange how those people who live near the Master recognize that He is extraordinary; they come to Him for counsel and enjoy being in His presence, and yet they seem to be veiled. They are so near to the Light they are dazzled and cannot appreciate it, while we who are far away and maybe never have seen Him personally, have been blessed with a discerning spiritual sight, and we see the Light which is shining, to the uttermost parts of the earth, quickening all mankind into spiritual life, causing an awakening such as will soon move the hearts of all and change this selfish world. Into a veritable paradise of love, peace, harmony and joy. Praise God that yet His unworthy children are permitted to, in a small sense realize the meaning and Import of this Great Day of God, in which the Gateway to God, the Glory of God, and the Servant or God have appeared and manifested the Spirit - “Me Word made flesh and dwelling among us.”

Let us be still and know that “He is God!” Let us drink in of that Spirit till our cup runs over, that all who touch our limes may be refreshed.

When Miss Moore knew we had to leave the next day, she cried. The Master lovingly said: “Don’t cry! You must be very happy. If anyone in these days could see in their dreams one of Christ’s disciples, they would be very happy. How much more should you be happy when you have seen the real disciple and can profit by the bounties of this Age when the Blessed Perfection has been on this earth.”

Here, as on all occasions, we see the humility of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He is continually referring to the greatness of Bahá’u’lláh, while He refers to Himself as the Disciple, the Servant.

A person Who is not yet a believer but was seeking was mentioned, and the Master, after commending him because he was seeking, said to tell him: “The more you think about this Truth the more you will know, and those who do not seek for the Light and Knowledge of God in this Day will be very sorry.”

Miss Moore asked if it were possible for the spirits of the departed to materialize through a medium. He said: “No, just the spirit never returns from the Kingdom.” Then holding His arm up above before the mirror, He said: “But as you see my reflection in the mirror, you see their reflection, but it is only the reflection. In the mirror you see my arm move, but my arm is not in the mirror.”

Because of the Páshá’s being there we had only three meals with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá – the last days – after the Páshá left. To make up for this, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would come to our room and thus we had even more interviews because they were more personal. He would sit on the little corner divan with Miss Moore and me – one on either side – and often would hold our hands in His. On the evening of May 3rd, Miss Moore and I were walking in the long hall and He sent, by Monovar, for us to go to our room, - that He was coming to see us. He came and we sat on the divan. He asked if we had been on the roof (where we went each evening at sunset to get the fresh air and exercise). The Master said that He hoped a change would be seen and that we would be in quite another condition when we left ‘Akká and returned to America. We would be renewed. We had been like an extinguished lamp, but we would be as a lighted lamp. We had been standing, we would fly. We had been dead, we would be alive. We had been asleep, - we would be awake.

I said that at times I felt a strong desire to pray for Him and asked if I might. (Not that He – to whom “all power in heaven and in earth” is given – needed the prayer of a tiny creature, but because I felt His great burdens and hoped that I might possibly help to lift them a little.) He said: “Yes, very good...” “Hay, hay, az Khoda talab!” (Oh, Oh, ask from God!) this is a line of His favourite chant that I sang, a chant by Bahá’u’lláh. He never asked for His own chant. It was Bahá’u’lláh’s He loved.

And now I know you will be interested to hear that I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá (through Monovar) if He would give me two stones of His selection, one for the corner stone and one for the key-stone of the entrance archway of the first Bahá’í Temple in America. It was after we had said “good-bye” and all preparations were made for leaving that He sent the stone by Monovar, with the message that it might be cut two for the corner and key-stones. It is about a foot square and two inches thick and can be cut in two sectionally to make each piece a foot square and one Inch ‘hick. These stones may be fitted into larger stones. At my request, the Greatest Holy Leaf (sister to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) put her hand on It in blessing and said she “would pray that the Temple would be completed during the years when our Lord was on this earth.” I prayed for this later at the tomb of Bahá’u’lláh; also that soon the Master might be permitted to visit the tomb. He has not had this privilege, but has been confined to the city for five years.

So, my dear friends, God is good, and whenever the time comes for the laying of that precious corner stone, I shall send it to whatever spot He sanctions. This white marble block was among those which came from India, to be used in building the tomb of the Báb. This was left over and has been in the Master’s house since then.

I know you will rejoice with me to think the corner stone was given us directly by the Center of the Covenant. God be praised! You may imagine how jealously I guarded it as each move was made in – the homeward trip.

The Master ate dinner with us, the last day. From His own plate He dished a little to us three – Misses Sanderson, Moore and myself. He said “He was eating the last meal with us. “‘Was glad we were all in such perfect union and harmony.” After the meal He said “good-bye” to Miss Moore in her room, then to me in my room, then to Miss Sanderson who was in the hall. After He started down the hall, I called after Him “Yá el-Abhá!” He Turned around and said: “I hope to hear your. ‘Yá Bahá’u’l-Abhá!’ from America.”

Now, just a word to tell how the Cause is growing. I returned by way of Paris and London. On May 23rd we had a celebration of the Declaration of the Báb at Miss Barney’s home in Paris and thirty five friends were present, al I alert and interested. On Friday night we met at Mr. Dreyfus’ home. In London we had a meeting at Mr. Sprague’s when twenty two were present. I was there in time for London’s “Peace Sunday.” In the morning, alas! I heard a talk by a noted speaker, calling the people to come to the front, and, if necessary fight on to the bitter end! In the evening, I heard from a Unitarian pulpit Bahá’u’lláh’s proclamation of Peace, given by Mr. Sydney Sprague, who had been invited by the minister of that church to speak of the Bahá’í Revelation. That evening was beautiful. A spirit of harmony prevailed and Mr. Sprague has been invited to speak there again in the fall. Thus, even conservative England is waking up . The preaching of the “New Theology” there is preparing the ground for the Message of Bahá. Every week during the past season Mr. Sprague has been invited to speak somewhere and he has lectured to all the different Theosophical Lodges in London, to the Ethical Societies and Humanitarian Leagues, to the Labor church, to the Guild of clergymen of the Church of England, and at Oxford University where a number of learned men are interested. Mr. Plato Drakoulis, editor of a Greek Review and Professor of Greek in the University, is deeply interested. He has named his “Joy” (in Greek) and says that there his friends met and they held “the first Bahá’í Congress.”

To hear of these things is a great encouragement to those whose... (incomplete)

An Epistle to the Bahá'í World

Translator's Preface {{p2}}

A few days ago the following command was received in the blessed handwriting of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Center of the Covenant of God:

“O Ameen Faríd! Translate the epistle of Mírzá Badí'u'lláh and soon print and publish it.”

(signed) “‘Abdu'l-Bahá ‘Abbás.” {sig}

For the enlightenment of the Bahá'í friends in the English speaking lands, this humble translator will write what follows: After the ascension of the Heavenly Father (Bahá'u'lláh) — glory be to Him! — when the book of His Covenant became known among the Bahá'ís, all who were faithful obeyed His will and turned to 'Abdu'l — Bahá, the Center of His Covenant, for guidance in the Kingdom of Abhá. Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí disobeyed the command of the Father, and the author of this booklet, Mírzá Badí'u'lláh, sided with him. About four years ago Mírzá Badí'u'lláh returned to the Center of the Covenant ('Abdu'l-Bahá) and published, on February 4th, 1903, a confession which will be cited as an introduction to this epistle.

This epistle was written by him to set forth the reasons for his “return” and to inform the sincere seekers after the Truth concerning the attitude, the conduct and the actions of Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí. The original Persian manuscript of the author, with his seal upon it, is preserved in Egypt, where the booklet has been printed and published throughout the Orient.

Translation of the Confession

Written and Signed by Badí'u'lláh

He is El-Abhá! {greet}

Praise be to God the Unique, the Incomparable, who has aided and assisted me through His great bounty and absolute mercy while in this great and glorious prison in this holy and luminous land! He hath revealed and manifested to me the reality of that which had long since been hidden. He has helped me to grasp the firm support of His Covenant and Testament, and has strengthened me to become firm and steadfast under the protection of the standard of the Blessed Perfection. Exalted is His Name! Majesty and glory be to Him!

O ye beloved of God, who have turned unto the horizon of the Kingdom of God! Know that this servant, while writing this brief confession, testifies with heart and tongue that all that has occurred, since the departure of the Adored One (Bahá'u'lláh), through the Náqíqín, has been a violation of the Covenant, a transgression of the Testament of the Almighty God, an opposition to the texts of the Books of the “Conclusive Proof” and a contradiction of the absolute will of the Lord of Lords.

The intentions and intrigues of the violators (Náqíqín) were concealed from this servant until the powerful hand of God rent the veils asunder and removed the coverings. That which was misunderstood and misapprehended by me is now clear and manifest to me and has caused me to turn my face to the appointed station, {{p4}} ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — May the life of all existent beings be a sacrifice to Him! — and to be sheltered under the shadow of the Divine Covenant. Now — Praise be to God! — this servant is severed and detached from all else save Him and is united with and following Him.

I hope the friends of God will pray and supplicate God to assist me that I may render Him an acceptable service and may God — Glory to His Name! — assist the others, as He has assisted me, to return unto His Covenant and Testament, forsaking enmity and hatred that they might be delivered from their great abasement and be sheltered under the shadow of the Holy Tree. but, alas! they are hindered by their designs and prevented by their egotism.

O beloved of God! — May the Glory of God, El-Abhá, be upon you! — It behooves all of us as servants to speak with one accord in the Cause of God, saying, we believe, we confess, and we are firm in Thy Covenant.

In brief, this servant has understood their intentions and realized that their only thought is contradiction and their only purpose is to confuse and mislead the weak ones and to confound the single minded. Therefore, I have entirely turned away from them and have taken firm hold upon the Covenant of God. I have forsaken “the left hand” of error and sought “the right hand” of perfect assurance.

“When the Sea of Meeting sinks and the Book of Origin is achieved to the end, turn your face unto to Him whom God hath willed. He who branched from this Pre-existent Root.” “By this verse is intended the Greatest Branch. thus have We revealed the command as a grace from Our presence, and I am the Gracious, the Beneficent.” [Bahá'u'lláh] {{p5}}

I supplicate to God to aid me to manifest such firmness as will amaze the minds, and I humbly beseech Him to awaken the others also and to forgive their sins. For the favors of God and the compassion of the Center of the Covenant are boundless. “Verily, this is not difficult with God.”

Mírzá Agha Jan wrote something before his death. Now the Náqídíns have recently added certain passages to it, have interpolated it and are intending to publish that spurious copy. Let it be known that even Mírzá Agha Jan, in his last days, having learned their designs, repented and endeavored to return to the Covenant. Now they have lately written a false writing in his name, which bears many signatures. Note ye that we (those who have returned to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) do not sanction and are quit of the contents thereof.

Praise and glory be upon ye and upon those who love ye for the sake of God and listen to your words in the Cause of God.

Upon ye be greetings and praise.

The Epistle

He is El-Abhá! (The Most Glorious) {sit}

O ye assisted hosts of Abhá, who are turning unto the Horizon of the Covenant of the Lord of the Kingdom!

Praise be to God! The banners of the Cause of God are waving in the center of the world, and the holy hearts of those who are firm and steadfast are attracted and happy. The fragrance of the Supreme Word is diffused throughout all regions and climes and the lights of the Sun of Reality are shining in all countries. Through the confirmed power of the Center of the Covenant, who is inspired by God, the life-refreshing proclamation of faith is being heard from the Occident; the heart-attracting voice of certainty is raised from the Orient; the people of the North commemorate the most wonderful Name of Abhá, and the people of the South are made happy by the praise and glory of the Supreme Lord.

The universe is perfumed through the scented fragrance of the Covenant, and the essences of existence are enlightened through the radiance of the Sun of the horizons. The Lamp of the Cause of God is clear and shining in the world, and the light of His Will is bright and gleaming in the assemblages of the people. The boundless Bounties are enveloping the world, and the Mercy of God is extended to all regions. The Power of the Lord of Glory is become manifest in the temple of “him who branched from the Ancient Root,” [‘Abdu’l-Bahá] and {{p7}} the Divine favors are shown forth through the Holy Being of the Chosen One.

It is time for joy and happiness. It is the period of ecstasy and gladness. It is the day of zeal and attraction. The Expounder of the Book of the Lord of Lords is present, and the light of the Promulgator of the Cause of God is radiant from the horizon of the world. the table of happiness is spread; the means of joy and gladness prepared; the eternal blessings are surrounding all.

In these days it behooves these servants to strengthen the loins of endeavor in the utmost of unity, concord, love and accord, and win the goal of eternal happiness. We should follow the Path of the Covenant, bear unto the souls the glad tidings of the Kingdom, and guide them to the shade of the blessed Tree of God, the Sadrat el-Montaha. We should all abide under the canopy of the Testament, and, if need be, sacrifice possessions and life in the path of the Supreme One. We should close our eyes to the world and its belongings, and with our eyes to the world and its belongings, and with our powers latent and manifest we should promulgate the Word and spread the Cause. Thus may we be accounted as the people of faithfulness in the supreme Kingdom and Glorious Horizon.

With smiling faces, free minds, attracted hearts and pure souls may we approach the Holy Threshold and become blessed with His good pleasure. May we with loud and cheerful voices proclaim the glad tidings, and bless the hearing of those who are far and near with the blessed Word — Alláh-u-Abhá!

The intention of this servant of the Sublime Threshold in writing this paper is to elucidate briefly that which has occurred in these days and in those days of the past, and to reveal to the pure minds of the beloved of the past, and to reveal to the pure minds of the beloved of God that which will tend to make them confident and assured. Thus they may remain firm in the Covenant and be protected from breaking it. They may look forward to the {{p8}} utterances of the Supreme Pen, and with all power, endeavor, firmness and constancy, observe this blessed verse:

“When the Ocean of Meeting sinks and the Book of Origin is achieved to the end, turn unto Him who is chosen by God, who is branched from this pre — existent Root” (i.e., after the departure of Bahá’u’lláh, all Bahá’is must look to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for heavenly guidance).

O ye friends of God! — May my spirit be a sacrifice for your love! — This servant had the intention some time ago to bring about that which would take away dissension and replace it with love and unity. Thus hatred and jealousy, which are contrary to the Divine Law, might be effaced that all may abandon the people of the “left” the violators of the Covenant, and unite with those of the “right” who are firm to the Center of the Covenant. So the unpleasant odor of this dissension which was the cause of dispersing the people, disturbing the minds and saddening the hearts, might disappear, and the fragrance of love and harmony prevail. That, through the decisive command of the Testament of God, and turning to “Him whom God hath willed,” the sun of unity may dawn from the horizons of the hearts, the Supreme Collective Word become freed from the oppression of discord, the table of hate (spread in the name of religion) be rolled as a scroll, and the sun of the Blessed verse: “Make not the means of order the cause of disorder” — the cause of unity the cause of disunity” — dawn and enlighten the eyes.

That which prompted the intention was as follows: {noid}

Previous to the late imprisonment there appeared actions and conduct by Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí, which were diametrically opposed to trustworthiness, the true spirit of religion and the commands of God. This servant awaited opportunity in order to investigate certain matters which they had attributed to His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá {{p9}} — May my life be a sacrifice for His beloved! Thus truth might become distinguished from falsity, and the real intentions of Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí become evident. Opportunity did not afford until in this prison, which in reality is a paradise to me, my desires were fulfilled and God directed me to my object.

One day I attained the honor of visiting His Holiness, “Him whom God hath willed,” (‘Abdu’l-Bahá) and heard from His blessed tongue all that which proved the untruth of the statements made regarding Him (by the Náqíḍín). Later I directed my steps to the house and conversed with Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí, and pleaded with him to forsake all personalities and to follow what he commanded, hoping that he might cease opposing the Cause of God and disturbing His believers. The more I pleaded with him, the more he refused and the prouder he appeared. He said nothing save words and expressions indicative of hatred, jealousy and enmity against the confirmed Center of the Covenant. He further tried to conceal the matter from those connected with him and from outsiders, and to throw suspicions whereby my object might remain hidden.

Having observed these actions, behaviors, words and deeds, this servant utterly despaired and closed his eyes to him. After the lapse of some time I discovered that he had composed untrue statements, and by hints and symbolic writing endeavored to keep people ignorant of his intentions, and claimed that he was oppressed and persecuted, while the fact was that day and night he remained at home and was engaged in cursing and execrating the Center of the Covenant. He has written an announcement, wherein he made statements of his being wronged and his holding to the law. For the purpose of casting suspicions, he has written certain expressions, all of which are void of truth and far from the reality. {{p10}}

Since brevity must be considered, I shall write the full details of his announcement and his papers, which he is yet engaged in writing, at a future time. After a while these falsities and bad conditions attained such magnitude that I was compelled to resolve to ask the Government to transfer me from this prison to that of Rodos [Rhodes], so that I might be free from hearing that which harmed me physically and spiritually. Thus I wrote a petition to the Porte at Constantinople, and also a formal application to the Valiyet, but when I met the Center of the Covenant, His advice changed my desire.

In those days the Honorable Ḥájí Mírzá Ḥasan Khurasání — Upon him be the Glory of God! — arrived and visited the Holy Threshold. He met this servant several times and asked to go once more and see Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí and advise him to return to the Center of the Covenant, hoping that he might, for the love of God’s Cause and obedience to His Commands, lose sight of personality and follow that which is commanded. He said that, should Muḥammad-‘Alí return, the object would be attained; otherwise this servant should announce his own return to His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — May my life be a sacrifice to Him! — Knowing as I did his personal feelings, enmity and jealousy. I thought my effort would prove fruitless. However, I investigated the matter and I heard the same statements and old ideas. Therefore I severed myself entirely from him and published the announcement [confession given above] of my return. Thus I joined with His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and cut myself from all else save Him.

Later, one day, in company with His Holiness, the blessed twig, Ḥájí Mírzá Seyyid ‘Alí — Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh-el-Abhá! — I met Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí and performed that which was my religious duty and due to love. I besought him to unite me and attain {{p11}} the great blessing. Hearing useless words, which referred to nothing but personality, I arose and went directly to the household of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. According to his old rule and custom, Muḥammad-‘Alí wrote a paper in behalf of the few who have turned away from the Center of the Covenant and addressed it to the twig (Afnán H.M. Seyyid ‘Alí) in order to mix statements, disturb the minds and throw suspicions upon hearts of the simple, he requested a meeting with us. Presently I sent a message that we were always ready, whenever it might be, to manifest the word of Truth and disprove that which is far from it.

His Honor Afnán (i.e. Ḥájí Seyyid ‘Alí) conveyed the message to him (Muḥammad-‘Alí). He held to other pretexts and prepared another form of suspicion, which he endeavored to instill into the minds by his peculiar ways. Whatever he says or writes, or whatever he spreads, results in naught but manifest loss.

To awaken and inform the beloved of God, it is necessary to write concerning some of the pretexts which have been used by them (the Náqíḍín) and thereby they have raised the cry of being wronged. Thus may the truth of the matter be clearly demonstrated to the pure minds.

One of the questions is that of stealing the traces and interpolating the verses (the writings of Bahá’u’lláh) and also that of concealing certain commandments from the beloved of God. This they have done in effort to prove their having been wronged and the difficulties which prevent their turning to (or acknowledging) the Center of the Covenant. They mourn and lament their state, although all that has been said of them by some souls is truth itself and the facts of the matter.

Now this servant will forget all he has heard from other souls concerning the matter and will only write that which he has seen with his own eyes and heard {{p12}} from their own tongues (i.e. of Muḥammad-‘Alí and his followers). thus may the truth of the matter be clear to all.

O ye beloved of God! The question of stealing the traces (writings) is as follows: during the days of the illness of the worshipped Countenance (Bahá'u'lláh) — the illness which preceded His departure — one day He summoned this servant to His Presence and gave him the keys to His blessed depository and chests, which were in His room, and ordered that the locks should be renewed. According to His command, this servant sent for Muḥammad Kaani and had him renew the locks, which he did, and Mírzá 'Alí Ridá brought the locks and helped to affix them in their places. We locked the doors and presented the keys to Him and He said, "Keep them." He also ordered that the key to my own depository in my room be renewed, and this was done. Likewise, during those blessed days, His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá was summoned (by Bahá'u'lláh) was commanded by Him to gather together all His blessed writings and traces. This command (indicative of what was to come) produced such a feeling (in 'Abdu'l-Bahá) that his tears descended like unto rain, and, while his body was trembling and his heart aching, he was obeying the command, gathering together the important manuscripts. He placed them all in the two large trunks which had always held the important Tablets and writings, when Bahá'u'lláh went to 'Akká, Haifa and Kassre. These had always been in the blessed room as a trust of His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá, for they were given him by Bahá'u'lláh.

When the night for the great ordeal arrived, the sea of meeting sunk, the lamentation of the Supreme Concourse raised, the earthquake of the pillars of the horizons occurred, and the radiant Sun of Beauty passed behind the veils of Glory. It was the time for the washing of the blessed body. Water was brought, and they {{p13}} were prepared for the blessed purpose, when Mírzá Muḥammad-'Alí said: "now there will be much water spilled in this room, and, in order to prevent these trunks being affected by dampness, let me help you carry them to another room." He had them deposited in the room of this servant with the help of Mírzá Majduddín.

Three days after this event Mírzá Muḥammad-'Alí said to me: "The Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) — Exalted is His Station! — said: 'We have written something and it is in Our depository.' which I would like to see." He took the keys from this servant for that purpose. Later I saw that, through Mírzá Majduddín, 'Alí Ridá, his sister, and the mother of Mírzá Shua'u'llah, he (Muḥammad-'Alí) carried the blessed trusts (the writings of Bahá'u'lláh) by way of the window and the gallery of the Bahjí to his own place. He took away all the traces of the Supreme Pen and the special Tablets revealed for the beloved of God. When this servant reproached him, and endeavored to reclaim them, he spoke so much that should I attempt to write it here, Mathnaví "becomes seventy pounds of paper" (an expression meaning that the matter is most voluminous).

Among other things he said to me that the preservation of the blessed writings was referred to him by a blessed command, that he possessed a Tablet from the Supreme Pen to that effect. He did not even allow this servant to read the writings. By various means he endeavored to insinuate to this servant that His Holiness the Greatest Branch was against the Blessed Law, that if the blessed writings fell into his hands they would be effaced and no name of the Blessed Beauty would remain in the world.

Another question concerns the interpolation. It is as follows: For a long time, by means of allusions and hints, symbols and signs, he gave me to understand that {{p14}} he possessed a Tablet from the Supreme Pen concerning His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which, he said, if he should reveal, the name of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would be effaced. He spoke of this on numerous occasions to some members of the family. Some time elapsed, during which some souls inquired of me concerning the Tablet in question, and I asked him for it, but every time he offered me an excuse and sought a pretext to avoid it. Finally, prior to the imprisonment in the most great prison of Abhá, one day he took out of a drawer a blessed Tablet from the Supreme Pen, wherein were mentioned the deeds, the actions, the oppression of Mírzá Yaḥyá (Subh-i—Azal), mentioning him often as “My brother,” which he gave me to read. I read it and remarked: “This has no connection with these days.” (It refers to the former days.) He said: I have permission from the Blessed Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh) to use my pen in the blessed writings (interpolate) for the protection of the Cause. Now, since some souls have exaggerated (the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) and the Master claims Divinity, I will erase the word ‘My brother’ and insert in its place ‘My Greatest Branch,’ which I will show to people in order to check his influence.”

I was entirely dazed, but said nothing to him, waiting to see if he really dared to do such a thing. A few moments passed and I saw him take up the Tablet, erase “My brother” and replace it with “My Greatest Branch.” Having seen this, I immediately said: “This deed is a great sin and a breach of trust. If you show this Tablet, this servant will divulge the whole account, will point out the interpolation, and this will cause all the writings in your possession to be considered unreliable. Hereafter whatsoever of the writings traced by the Supreme Pen you may show me, I will not accept as authentic until I have carefully compared the manuscript with the original handwriting which is elsewhere preserved, and have examined the same with a magnifying glass.” {{p15}}

Upon hearing these words he was very much disturbed, promised and made a covenant that he would not show the Tablet to any one, and, further, he requested this servant not to reveal the matter.

From that day this servant entirely lost confidence in him and did not trust him in matters which concerned the Cause and the conscience. He continually sought opportunities for the investigation and scrutiny of the remaining questions for which he (Muḥammad-‘Alí) had discussed and insinuated since the departure of the Blessed Perfection. He first referred to the manuscripts compiled by him (Muḥammad-‘Alí), and discovered that all the verses revealed by Bahá’u’lláh concerning the people of Bayán and the souls who, subsequent to the martyrdom of His Holiness the Supreme (the Báb) — May the spirit of all else be a ransom to Him! — had claimed Divinity, the station of Manifestation, the degree of successorship, or that of Mirror-ness, were transposed and applied to the days following the ascension of the worshipped Countenance (Bahá’u’lláh). In this wise and by this means they endeavored to perturb the minds and hinder the souls from turning (to the blessed Center of the Covenant). If this servant attempted to write the full account of these matters, the work will be endless. However, to the possessors of wisdom and intelligence, who are informed of past events, the reading of the said verses will suffice.

The blessed Tablet, so often cited in their pamphlets, will be sufficient. This is the Tablet which was revealed on the occasion of His exodus from Adrianople. It is as follows:

“O Salmán! At the time of leaving Irak, the Tongue of God informed some (of the followers) of the fact that the Sameri (This refers to idolatry as was practiced among the Israelites) would appear, the goat would {{p16}} bleat, and the bats (literally, birds of night) would move after the setting of the Sun,” etc.

In response to the inquiry of a person concerning this blessed Tablet, He has said: “As to what thou hast asked concerning that whereof We informed the servants at the time of leaving Irak, to wit, that when the Sun disappears the birds of night will move, the standards of Sameri will be hoisted, etc., verily, the birds of night did move in those days, and the Sameri did call, and blessed is he who knew and was of the knowing. Then We informed them of the goat. Verily, all We have told them appeared, and must have appeared, for thus did the Pen of Power and Glory reveal.”

Now this blessed Tablet, which makes mention of the goat, Sameri, and the birds of night, through excessive animosity and hatred they attributed to these days. They are so thoughtless regarding the meanness and baseness of this sort of transposition. Likewise, the numerous Tablets and Writings (revealed by Bahá'u'lláh) for the promotion of the Word of God and the preservation of the Cause of God, concerning the harmfulness of dissensions, divisions and disagreements, have all been used to promote their own selfish desires, and used as means for instilling enmity and hatred (in the minds) against ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Notwithstanding this, they account themselves of the people of faithfulness and style themselves “Unitarians.”

A blessed Tablet was shown me (by Muḥammad-‘Alí), which had no beginning or end, revealed by the Supreme Pen. He asked me to unite the separate fragments and frame it — that is, to place them on a board and thus join the two fragments. He said: “These two (fragments) are of one blessed Tablet, revealed on two pages.” This servant, considering the matter to contain a project, did not acquiesce in this work, and said: “This servant will not interfere in these affairs. If you wish to paste them, do it yourself.” Finding him urging {{p17}} and encouraging this servant to the work in a great degree, he was more certain that the two fragments did not belong together, but that he wished them joined to affect the meaning of the word “Covenant” which occurred in them. He said: “I have spoken of this to Agha Jamál and he has commended it.” This servant remarked that whoever wishes may commend this, but it will not induce me to interfere with any such matter or entangle in like affairs. When he became disappointed in this servant he made no further revelation regarding these things.

As to the imprisonment (the last confinement of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his brothers to ‘Akká), it is as follows: A certain day he said, while in the Kassre (Bahjí), that His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — May the spirit of existence be a sacrifice unto Him! — negotiated with Constantinople regarding the removal of the Blessed Station (the sacred remains of Bahá’u’lláh) to Mt. Carmel. In this matter, he said, we must make our plans. This servant having observed those actions from him and having decided not to interfere in such matters made no remark.

However, he made arrangements to send Mírzá Majduddín, with a present and letter in Persian text, to Nazim Páshá, the Governor of Damascus, to seek his aid in this affair. After hearing of this arrangement, this servant remarked that the said Governor being a man of politics, if certain matters were communicated to him, he would doubtless convey the same in a petition to the Sulṭán and cause suspicion in the court, producing harmful results, and thus bring calamity to all. This servant, during the same days, conveyed this matter to His Honor, the twig (a relative of the Báb), Hájí Mírzá Seyyid ‘Alí — Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh el — Abhá! Notwithstanding all this, he sent Mírzá Majduddín, with presents, a letter and verbal suggestions and instructions to Damascus. He met the said Nazim Páshá, and, {{p18}} according to his own words spoken to this servant in Haifa, all that he could he told the Governor, concerning the building on Mt. Carmel (the Tomb of the Báb), the coming and going of the American friends and the gatherings and meetings in ‘Akká. In order to get all this information, the Páshá showed him the utmost kindness and assured him of his help.

Mírzá Majduddín returned, and, only a few days later, a telegram, transmitted in symbolic code, from the Royal Porte (Constantinople) arrived, the purport of which was the imprisonment of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l — Bahá, of this servant and of them (Muḥammad-‘Alí, et al.). As soon as I heard this news I told them that it was the fruit and the result of the trip of Mírzá Majduddín.

Although they have been the cause of this great matter, yet every day they arranged a new fiction and spread it here and abroad. Once they said a Christian gentleman, among the friends of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l — Bahá, who resides in Egypt, had spoken publicly of the Cause, in a church, without caution and wisdom, and this had caused the imprisonment. At another time they said that his Honor Mírzá Abu’lFaḍl — Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh! — had composed a book and published it, and, this having fallen into the hands of the doctors of Azhar (University) had caused this misfortune. In short, they have done all they could, secretly and publicly. “They scheme and God schemes. Verily, God is the best schemer.”

In those days a certain person came from Damascus to ‘Akká and told some of the souls among the outsiders that the cause of the imprisonment of His Holiness ‘Abbás Effendi was Nazim Páshá, the Governor of Damascus. The strangest of this, that, after imprisonment, Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí wrote a letter to Nazim Páshá for the purpose of his own deliverance, and the person who transcribed the letter into Turkish is now {{p19}} present in ‘Akká. The said Páshá, however, did not answer a word in reply to the first or second letter.

Now, O ye beloved of God! I ask you, by your Lord El-Abhá, is it possible for me to remain with them (Muḥammad-‘Alí and his people) after witnessing these deeds and actions which are opposed to the decisive texts of God and are against the honesty and integrity recognized among all sects and peoples and after I have learned the falsity of the things they attributed to the Center of the Covenant of God? Is it lawful, according to any Divine law, for me to be connected with Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí? No, verily, by my Lord El-Abhá! Nay, rather, to him is a lawful command and a wise and solid counsel. As He (Bahá’u’lláh) has said: “If ye sense any odor of jealousy and envy from any soul in the Cause of God, keep aloof from him.” Is he who manifests such actions and deeds an enemy or a friend, an interested or disinterested person?

Notwithstanding all this, this servant, in the spirit of supplication and humility, hopes and begs of God, the Almighty, to guide then unto the shade of the blessed Word of the Covenant and Testament, to treat them with absolute mercy and to aid and to confirm them in that which is befitting. Verily, He is Near, the Answerer.

As to the ways by which they cast their suspicions, it is necessary that they be outlined briefly, in order to inform and awaken the souls. (This refers to the way by which they try to affect the mind of a newcomer to them and to estrange him from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — May my life be a sacrifice to Him! — Translator) Thus may no one be caught in the trap of the polytheism of their doubts and become deprived of the eternal blessing of God. The first thing they do is to appear most obedient to the Divine Laws and night and day engage themselves in the writings of the verses to such a degree that the newcomer imagines that they are absolutely evanescent and absorbed entirely in servitude, having no thought or purpose {{p20}} save the Blessed Cause and the Blessed Verses. After a while they give vent to certain mentions and insinuations in order to hinder the listener from turning to the firm command of the Covenant of God. That is to say, they begin to interpret and misconstrue some of the verses, and some they interpolate and transpose with perfect delicacy, giving one to understand they are wronged. They convey all that which tends to instill enmity and hate in the new-comer’s heart against His Holiness, “Him whom God hath willed” — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Later, they encourage him by various means to say evil things against ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and they, themselves, outwardly voice the Verses of Bahá’u’lláh. “The Tongue is for the mention of good; stain it not with evil sayings.” On the other hand, they make light of the important command of “Turn your faces to Him whom God hath willed,” which is the greatest command of God. They give much importance to insignificant, petty matters.

If the subject be correctly considered, after the ascension of the Adored Countenance (Bahá’u’lláh) the decisive command which holds the first degree of importance, which is incumbent upon all, is the one mentioned above. Second in importance are the other commands of the book of God. For instance, if a person commits a murder he has committed a crime, the harmful result of which will concern him; but if he disobeys the word of the Covenant of God (disobeys ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) and causes dissension in the Law of God, the harmful result of it will touch the Cause itself (humanity at large). In this wise he will be absolutely nonexistent and in evident loss. The fundamental basis of unity and concord rests upon the gathering of all under the shadow of one Word. This is the Oneness and Singleness mentioned in so many Tablets by the Supreme Pen. Now, what Word is greater than the Word of {{p21}} “Turn to (‘Abdu’l-Bahá) after the ascension (Turn to Him who is chosen by God, who is branched from the Pre-existent Root. By this verse is intended the Greatest Branch (‘Abdu’l-Bahá). From the KitábAhdi. — Translator) — and what command is greater than that? But, alas! that selfish motives and passionate desires have proved the greatest hindrance to the divine, eternal happiness. They further give the newcomer to understand that His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá claims a station higher than that of the Ancient Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh) — Magnified is His Station! — that He wishes to efface the ordinances and laws of the Blessed Perfection and to rule independently, establishing a new law and code. As witness to this matter they cite the saying of such souls as are distant from His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and who entertain extraordinary enmity and jealousy; likewise, they offer poems and certain pamphlets which contain sentiments differing from the true belief of the Center of the Covenant and the hopes of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Soon, through the power of the pen and utterances of the Center of the Covenant, the horizon of realities and meanings will become illumined and that which is the desire of the heart and life of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — that is, absolute servitude at the Holy threshold, will be established and proved.

As to the dissension in the Cause, which is shaking the pillars of the Divine Law and causing conflagration of the fire of religious hatred and enmity, they consider it a religious duty — nay, the basis of the Holy Laws. If a person mention a word agreeing with the texts of the Books of God against dissension and concerning the necessity of unity, they consider him a polytheist and call him rejected and raise the voice of “where is the law!” Yet the Laws of God all concern unity under one Word, and the original purpose of the Divine collective Manifestation is for the solidarity of all sects and peoples of the world. {{p22}}

In most of the Blessed Tablets this point has been explained and elucidated, as, for example, in one of the Tablets Bahá’u’lláh says: “O people of Bahá! Strengthen the loins of endeavor, perchance religious strife and quarrel may be removed and erased from among the people of the world. for the love of God and His servants, arise to serve this Cause. Religious animosity and hatred is a world — consuming fire and the extinction thereof is most difficult unless the Hand of Divine Power rescue the people from this awful ordeal.”

Likewise He says: { .noid }

“In the Name of God, the Unique! O people of the world! After the removal of the veil some people held fast to verses. We revealed verses. Some took hold of proofs (evidences); We manifested them; and certain souls turned to commandments, and We revealed the greatest proofs thereof. Whatever they said was performed and whatever they wished was granted. The purpose of all that was manifested was that the ears might become ready for hearing this Supreme Word, and that is this: O people of the earth! Make not the religion of God a cause of enmity. If this Word take root in the world, all will find themselves free and at peace. Say, verily, by the life of God! the tenet of God and His religion hath come for unity and concord, not for dissensions and disagreements. To this bears witness the Mother Book, and the people hear not! The glory which is shining from the horizon of the Heaven of My Kingdom be upon thee and upon them who have left superstitions, holding to the lights of certainty.”

Now they have forsaken these firm commandments and for selfish motives they have held to the sayings of this and that one, and are enkindling the fire of animosity in the breasts and hearts. It is for this reason that Bahá'u'lláh says in the Book of the Covenant: “O ye My Branches! In existence is hidden latent a great power and perfect strength. Turn to it and consider {{p23}} that which is conducive to its unity and not to that which is its apparent disagreement.” Likewise, He says: “O servants! Do not make the means of order the means of disorder, and the cause of unity the cause of discord.”

O people of equity! It is meet and behooving for them to withhold vision from the Great Power and direct it to the sayings of the souls; to make the cause of order in the world that of dispersion; and to prefer personal interests over the Divine Laws? Although they are in the utmost degree of jealousy and hatred, they consider themselves abiders by the Holy Law. By all means they endeavor to extinguish the light of the Divine Covenant, and consider the Testament of the Son of the World a toy for children. Night and day they work for the destruction of the edifice of the Supreme Word and the foundation of the Holy Cause of Abhá. No, verily, by Him whose hands hold the reins of the Cause! Rather it is meet and behooving that when they heard the verses of the Book of the Covenant they should have said: “We believe and are assured.” They should have considered themselves evanescent and absorbed in the command of the Testament of God. They should have arisen with all power and strength in obedience to His holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and should have strengthened the loins of service among the people. but, alas! as the author of Mathnaví says: “When personal interest appears, man’s accomplishments will be concealed and the veils of the heart will blind the eyes.”

If personal interests were to be forsaken by them, if they would turn to the Center of the Covenant of God and would perceive the power of Divine evidence which emanates from His tongue, they would see clearly that all that is not the mention of absolute servitude is outside of His verbal commands and writings of His pen. Although He is the Center of the Covenant of the Blessed Perfection, in the degrees of utterance, he holds himself the servant of the beloved of God, and has no {{p24}} desire save the promulgation of the Word of God, the promotion of the Cause of God, the diffusion of the fragrances of God and the education of souls. The greatest proof of this is the boundless writings of His pen. Among them is an utterance which emanated from His blessed tongue recently and copies of which have gone to all regions. This will be cited here in order to manifest to all that outside of the mention of servitude and the station of servitude, there is no other mention in that station:

“Through His Honor Agha Ghulum ‘Alí — Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh! — to the beloved of God. (Upon them be Bahá’u’lláh-el-Abhá!) {.greet}

He is God! {.sit}

“O my God! O my God! Thou knowest, verily, that my heart is replete with the love of Thy beloved ones, my spirit is attached to the spirit of Thy chosen ones, my breast is dilated with the mention of Thy trustworthy ones, and my reality is attracted by the mention of Thy servants. The ecstasy of their love has taken such hold of me that Thou caused me to open my tongue in their praises. I pray Thee with my heart, my spirit and my tongue, and supplicate Thee to cause Thy heavenly table and merciful blessing to descend upon them, to lay upon them the Hem of Thy Garment, to fill for them the chalice of Thy Grace, to cast upon them the glance of Thy Mercy, to submerge them in the seas of Thy Bounty, to specialize them with the glory of Thy Bestowal, to choose them for the promotion of Thy word, and to perfect for them Thy Benefit. Thus may the Lights of Thy Oneness shine in their hearts, the breeze of Life pass through the garden of their minds by Thy bounty and generosity; the verses of Thy knowledge be imprinted upon the mirrors of their hearts; their eyes may become bright with the witness of the manifestations of Thy bounty; their tongues may utter Thy wonderful mysteries; their souls may be assured by the comprehension of Thy signs, and the bounties of Thy Names and Attributes may envelop them.

“O Lord! O Lord! Aid them in Thy service, confirm them in Thy servitude, make them the signs of Thy Oneness, the banners of Thy Glory, the trees of the garden of Thy Love, the words of the book of Thy Knowledge, the lamps of Thy Guidance, the stars of the horizon of Thy Bounty, the waves of the sea of Thy Oneness, the meteors of the altitude of Thy Grandeur, the lights of the Sun of Thy Manifestation, the myrtles of the meadows of Thy Mercy, the fountains of Thy Mysteries, and the evidences of Thy guidance. Verily, Thou art the Powerful, the Giver, the Confirmer, the Almighty, and the Generous.

“O ye beloved of God and the helpers of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! When the Sun of Reality became concealed (refers to the departure of Bahá’u’lláh from the mortal to the immortal realm. — Translator.) behind the veils of glory and the Orb of the universe disappeared from the dawning pit of evidence and arose in the Invisible World and conferred successive bounties upon the contingent world from the Unseen Realm, the bats began to move and spread out their wings in a race. They imagined that they could interrupt the glorious bounties of that Beautiful Face, extinguish the shining rays of the Sun of Reality, put out the ignited fire and destroy the praised Light. For they supposed that on account of the ascension of His Holiness the Beloved, the Divine Foundation would be demolished, the edifice of God would be destroyed and the Blessed Tree uprooted. 'Evil was that which they imagined and vain was that which they supposed, and ye see them today in manifest loss.' For, according to what is heard, in certain regions, the enemies hearing the news of the {{p26}} great ordeal (the departure of Bahá'u'lláh), feasted and rejoiced, celebrated festivals, burned incense, served sweets and flowers, lit the candles, mixed honey and wine and played lutes and harps. That night until morn they spent in feasting and rejoicing in gladness and happiness. But they were ignorant of the fact that the Light of this Sun has no end, the torrent of that plain is free from interruption, the Light of that Blessed Orb is eternal, the Merciful One is established upon the Throne of Sovereignty, and the Throne is permanent. Nay, rather, the human temple (the body), like the clouds, hinders the visions from the Light of the Sun. It is for this reason that the Gospel records the statement that when the promised One comes He will come upon the clouds, and when the respective clouds pass away, then shall the disk of this Sun appear and the penetrating Light thereof spread. Thus, in a little while the great glad tidings spread throughout the world and the pillars thereof trembled; the East shouted with joy and the West reverberated the Blessed voice; the Most Radiant Sun of the Beauty of Reality appeared from the invisible zodiac and shone upon the Center of the world; the veil of concealment and mystery fell; the fire of the love of God burned in the hearts; the beloved of God radiated as a candle, and, like unto the witnesses of love, they became known in the assembly. From every region the melody of joy was raised and the voice of 'O our God! Verily, we have heard Thy Voice from all countries,' was raised; the Word of God was promoted; the fragrances of God spread, the fame of the Truth enveloped the world; the call of 'Am I not your Lord?' reached the ear of the far and near; the Cause of God became greater; the edifice of the Law of God loftier; all the nations were impressed and the enemies of the Blessed Beauty became fearful and at loss. When they noticed that the ascension of His Holiness the Desired One (Bahá'u'lláh) — May my spirit be a sacrifice to His {{p27}} beloved! — became the cause of the promotion of His blessed Cause and the flame of the burning fire became greater and every confident believer took a firmer stand — therefore the dawning of the Light caused the opposing nations a great loss, and, likewise, the blessing of God adorned the Royal throne of Persia with the coronation of a just Sháh. With the power of God that perfect Crown Head became kind to the oppressed sect. This, also, was a confirmation from His Holiness the Almighty God. Likewise, certain holy souls among the beloved of God arose with faithfulness to sacrifice self in the pathway of the Beauty of Abhá; they left their own rest and peace and turned to the horizon of Oneness; they became callers to the Covenant and held the chalice of the Testament in their hands and gave the world the ecstasy thereof; they spread the fragrances of God, conveyed the Cause of God and guided many souls.

"Praise be to God that the confirmations of the Beauty of Abhá arrived successively and the victory of the Supreme Concourse shed a light as that of the early dawn, the Hosts of the Supreme Concourse descended as unto the waves and the zealous armies of gladness of the Kingdom of Abhá, with perfect power and strength, conquered and upbuilt the domains of the hearts. These hosts were the Divine inspirations and these armies were the waves of the Divine seas. They conferred eternal life upon dead souls and attacked the countries of the heart, giving them life and spirit, for they are the hosts of life and the army of salvation. May God increase them in power, glory, strength and number.

“Therefore, O ye beloved of God, this is the time when ye should arise, and, in thanksgiving for this bounty, do that which is your duty: Abide by the Law of God, pray to the Divine Threshold in the Mashrek — el-Azkar, supplicate and implore, praise and glorify Him; fast in the month of fasting and keep watch during its nights. {{p28}}

All this should be done in perfect wisdom and not in a manner which may cause the uproar and tumult of the ignorant.

“I have one request to make of all the beloved of God, and that is the desire of my life — that they all praise me in the absolute servitude of the Holy Threshold without interpretation. They must not praise ‘Abdu’l — Bahá except according to the expressions and words which have emanated from the pen of this Servant. They must never exceed that, but must content themselves therewith. Verily, my praise, my quality, my attribute, my name, my title, my entity, my reality, my essence and my manifestation is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and I have no other station than this. Certainly the beloved of God will accept this request from this Servant who makes it in the utmost lowliness and humility, and will make happy this sad heart and will confer a new life upon this weak body. Thus may ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, through hearing this great glad tidings and attaining this Supreme bounty, rejoice and attain Divine happiness and gladness.

(Signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás {sig}

But, as the Náqidín (the violators of the Covenant of Bahá’u’lláh) have no God save passion and no object save personal interest; if they see a hundred thousand traces of the power of God, they will increase their enmity and jealousy; they will not under any consideration observe the honor of the Cause and that of the beloved of God, and will never be awakened or warned. “God has sealed their hearts, their hearing and their sight.”

In short — Praise be to God! — the souls who are turning to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá all believe in the Great Manifestation of God, and, through His Sublime commands, are turning to the established Center and the evident Station. And, after the commands of the Blessed Beauty — Exalted is His Station! — obedience to the commands of {{p29}} His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is considered by them a duty, a cause of spreading the fragrances of God and the means of promulgating the Laws of the ancient Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh).

Consider how great is the utterance of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that inhabitants of America, notwithstanding the long distance and the difference in the tastes and customs, have been so attracted and enkindled as to cause the amazement of intellects. In these days one of the believers and assured maid-servants from that land, known as the maid-servant of God, Lua (Mrs. Getsinger), is present in this blessed spot. She is enkindled and attracted beyond description and sheds tears night and day, seeking permission from His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to go to Persia and quaff the cup of martyrdom. With all this they (Muḥammad-‘Alí and his people) mourn and cry, saying, the Cause of God has vanished. What Cause of God is among them and what trace thereof is in their hands?

O Lord! Thou knowest and bearest witness that this servant seeks only Thy Will and hopeth only for the promotion of Thy Word, and, with perfect endeavor and steadfastness, is arising to serve the Center of the Covenant, looking and turning to Him. He begs the ocean of Thy generosity to guide them, also, to the straight path and to help them obey that which they have been commanded. Thus may that which rejoices the hearts of the enemies of Thy religion and law be removed from among them, and the hearts of those who hold fast to the hem of Thy Covenant and Testament be made happy and joyous. Verily, Thou art the Able and the Powerful!

El-Abhá be upon the people of faithfulness who have turned to the horizon of the Covenant of the Lord of the creatures.

August 12th, 1907. {.date}

Dear Bahá’í Friend: {.greet}

Since attaining to the visit of the “Master” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, now one month ago, I have had it in my heart to write to the Believers in America but because of the unrest of travel and of meeting people this is the first moment when conditions have been favorable to letter writing.

After some delays and trials of travel Mr. Phelps and I reached Acre on July 12th. We had arrived at Haifa on the previous day where we received word to go over to Acre for the day. Some trouble had recently manifested itself on the part of the Government authorities, so probably this was the reason that we did not remain over night in Acre. During that days visit we met the Master several times, and delivered to him the letters and messages which we brought, from the friends on the other side of the water. I was permitted to mention your name to him, together with those of some other friends and he said — “Give my love and Greeting to each of these”. To the Believers in general our Lord sent his love and glad tidings of Joy and Peace, saying that it was through joy and love and peace, that the followers of the Blessed Perfection must meet and overcome the world. The more people oppose us, the more gentle, long suffering and loving we should be towards them. Between the Believers themselves, nothing but the most perfect accord, union and love should exist. They should sacrifice themselves for one another. This is conducive to unity and steadfastness which are the foundation of the well being of the Holy Cause.

The Master also wished me to tell the Believers how impossible it is for him to answer each letter sent to him, or even to answer one in ten, so great are the demands upon his time. He said that the Friends were always in his prayers and thoughts and that in spirit he was with them always.

Although we were with the Master but a few brief hours, our souls were rejoiced and filled to overflowing with that love which he alone can impart.

In this day the greatest {{p2}} blessing and bounty of God, is to realize the exalted station of Our Lord ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Exalted through his humility, servitude and daily martyrdom in the Path of God.

He alone is making the way of the Kingdom possible to us. Without him as our leader we would indeed be lost. Let us lose no time in offering ourselves, our likes and dislikes and our all in his path.

This Cause will only flourish through its followers giving themselves heart and soul in the Holy Work. If we fail God will raise up others to do His Work, so let our united prayer be to stand united and steadfast in His Service.

On the second day after our first visit to the Holy City we again spent a few hours in the Masters house, and then with no desire in our hearts save that of going back into our fields of work we left His Presence.

On returning to Haifa Mr. Phelps sailed immediately for Port Sa’id and America, while two days later I sailed for Beirut from whence I came to Paris, and will later visit London in accord with the Master’s instructions. God willing I will return to America the latter part of September.

On leaving Acre after our first visit we stopped to worship at the Holy Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. You have heard our pilgrims speak of worshiping at this Holy spot. It is an experience which finds no expression in words. While worshiping I made a supplication for you the blessing of which I already feel in myself, in that thereby we have been brought nearer together.

Greetings in the Holy Name. {.sig}

Knock, and It Shall Be Opened Unto You

1907

by Roy Wilhelm

He that is Greatest Among You shall be Your Servant (Matt. 23:11)
{.noid}

IN THE PENAL FORTRESS of ‘Akká, {{p3}} in Palestine, on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, the Tideless Sea, there is a prisoner and an exile. His name is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which means, the Servant of God. Behold, my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.[^1]

[^7] Isaiah 42: 1-2

It was in this Holy Land that Jesus of Nazareth traveled nineteen hundred years ago, preaching and teaching in the streets of the cities the simple Truth of God. It is true that only a few ignorant fishermen were able to comprehend His Message.

That which most impresses the pilgrim to {{p4}} the Most Great Prison, at ‘Akká. is the spirit of sacrifice. Nowhere have I witnessed such love, such perfect harmony. The desire of those in that prison is to serve one another.

In our western liberty it is difficult to realize the bitter antagonism and hatred which exists in the East between the followers of the several great religious systems. For example, a Jew and a Muḥammadan would refuse to sit at meat together; A Hindu to draw water from a well of either. Yet in the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we found Christians, Jews, Muḥammadans, Zoroastrians;, Hindus, blending together as children of one God, living in perfect love and harmony.

Each of these systems proclaims that it is striving to promote the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. To accomplish this end, the Christians have sent out many missionaries into the East, and from the systems of the East have come missionaries into the West. Each has seen the realization of its dream only through the triumph of its own over all the other systems, but during all the centuries none has succeeded in consuming another. It is estimated that the three foremost in point {{p5}} of numbers stand about as follows [^7] : Buddhists, 550,000,000; Christians, 500,000,000; Muḥammadans, 350,000,000. Like the Christians, all the other have divided and subdivided into many branches, some of them as antagonistic as the systems themselves.

[^7] These populations reflect the situation c. 1908. At present, the numbers would be: Buddhists, 309,626,100; Christians: 1,644,396,500; Muslims: 860,388,300. (The World Almanac and Book of Facts 1989) –Ed.

At the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in ‘Akká. we met many of these peoples, but they had lost all trace of the discord and hatred which has been inbred and cultivated for centuries, and now they are as members of one Household. They sacrifice their lives for one another. To what shall we attribute this miracle of unity?

At Port Sa’id, Egypt, a resident Bahá’í came to the steamer with a boat to carry us ashore. After the formalities of the Custom House, we were driven to our hotel, where we remained two days awaiting the arrival of a Russian steamer for Haifa, Syria, the regular steamer being obliged to omit its trip on account of a Sirocco (hot wind and sand storm) which {{p6}} came from the desert and visited Port Sa'id the day after our arrival, virtually suspending traffic on both land and water for about twelve hours. The evening of the second day, four of our American friends returning from 'Akká arrived in Port Sa'id, and we had a most interesting meeting with the resident believers. We had heard much of the love and kindness shown by the Oriental brothers to the pilgrims from the West — after our visit to Port Sa'id we understood.

The following evening, April 20th, we sailed on the Russian ship for Haifa. It was still quite rough as a result of the Sirocco. The next morning at eight-thirty we reached Jaffa, the port of Jerusalem, where the unloading of cargo caused a delay. At one o'clock, we left for Haifa and the little vessel was pushed to its fullest capacity in the hope that it might make port before sunset, which would enable the passengers to land. Fortunately, we arrived just in time, and at six-thirty dropped anchor a mile from shore. Owing to the shallowness of the water, passengers are landed in small boats, and this is easy only under the most favorable weather conditions. Although the storm had subsided, there was till some sea {{p7}} running, which made the landing difficult, particularly as it was dark when we reached shore. We were not delayed by the inspection of our baggage and so immediately took a carriage to the Hotel Carmel, which we reached after ten minutes drive.

Our friend at Port Sa'id had given us letters to two merchants in Haifa, but the messenger we dispatched to them returned with the information that both had gone to 'Akká. We had the address of another believer, whose son we knew in this country, and we then sent to him, but it was so late that he did not receive our message until the following morning. He came quite early to the hotel, and his warm welcome made us feel that close relationship into which this Revelation brings all people

In the afternoon, we went to his home and later visited the Tomb of the Báb,[^7] which is about a mile above Haifa on Mt. Carmel and which overlooks the city and the bay. The Tomb faces 'Akká. which place one can plainly see on a clear day

[^7] Now known to Bahá'ís as the Shrine of the Báb — ED.

I preceded the other a half hour in order to {{p8}} make some photographs before the sun was too low. Upon reaching the Tomb I found only one room open and within were several Persians sitting about a table. They did not understand English, but by tapping my camera and making signs I made my wishes known and received permission to take some pictures.

I saw upon the finger of one of them, a venerable man with flowing white beard, a ring such as is worn by many of the believers.[^7] As he was close to me, I whispered in his ear in Arabic the universal Bahá'í greeting;[^7] he immediately cried it aloud, and as he grasped me in his arms and kissed me on both cheeks, the tears came into his eyes. Then they all crowded round, pressing my hands, and I knew that I was among friends. In the meeting of the West with the East is fulfilled the prophecies of the Books.

[^7] The symbol engraved on the Bahá'í ringstone is: -ED.

[^7] Alláh-u-Abhá! (God is most glorious!) — ED.

The following morning, our friend received permission for us to proceed to 'Akká, and we engaged a high-bodied carriage for the drive of ten miles, as two streams had to be forded. {{p10}}

The smooth hard sand at the edge of the Mediterranean is the road, and as we drove along, the waves would frequently wash up against the horses' feet. The little horses knew that the sand was hardest at the water's edge, and they followed the waves as they washed up and receded, traveling in scallops, as it were. It is a low sandy coast, and the outline is broken only by an occasional clump of date palms and tall cactus plants. We passed here and there an Arab on horseback, usually a long rifle pointing above his shoulder; also a number of natives with their flowing garments girded up into their belts to give greater freedom and to offer less resistance to the wind, which at times blew with considerable force. Above the water line the sand seemed to be constantly shifting into irregular mounds, some of them as much as fifteen or twenty feet in height

It was after two o'clock when we entered the gate of the prison city, and we were rapidly driven through narrow winding streets, the driver cracking his long whip to warn people at the turnings, and in about five minutes we stopped at a house the entrance to which was an arch having a heavy swinging door. The {{p11}} word Welcome greeted our ears, our baggage was removed from the carriage, and we were assisted to the ground and conducted through the entrance so quickly that we did not at once realize we had reached the Most Great Prison, the end of our seven thousand miles' journey. We passed through a courtyard and up a long flight of stone steps into an upper court from which we were ushered through a dining room into a large square room facing the Mediterranean and overlooking the three crumbling walls that remain of the once strong fortification. Here the welcome was repeated, and we now realized that we were the guests of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The young man who had been our escort, after inquiring if we were well and if we had had a pleasant journey, informed us that this would be our room and said he would leave us that we might rest

In about an hour the young man returned with the announcement: The Master is coming

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá crossed the threshold He uttered the words, Welcome! Welcome!. He then led us to a divan which extended the full length of the room, and bade us be seated beside Him. Taqíng my mother's hand in His {{p12}} own and putting His arm around me, He spoke in Persian, addressing us through an interpreter, repeating the greeting, Welcome! Very Welcome! I have been waiting long for your coming. It is with God's help that you have reached 'Akká. Many leave their homes to come to 'Akká but do not arrive. This is a good day; this is a good season of the year because it is Spring. The Cause of God is like a tree — its fruit is love. How are the believers?

We answered: They are well and are becoming more united

He then said: This news is the cause of my happiness, for the more they are united the more they will receive God's confirmation. They must love one another. Each must devote and sacrifice himself and what he has for the other. I, myself, sacrifice my life for all. You represent all the American believers. In you I see all the American believers. Your faces are shining. I have been waiting long for your coming. Thank God that you came.

We replied: We do thank God and hope to become worthy

And He answered: You will become more worthy

We remained in 'Akká six days, and each {{p14}} day other pilgrims came to our room. Some of them related incidents of their personal experience with Bahá'u'lláh, and concerning the early days of the Revelation. One, a Persian, told us he had been striving to come to 'Akká for twenty-two years, but had been deterred by the threats of his brother to announce that he was a Bahá'í.[^7] He said that his only thought was for his wife and children, but that the yearning to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá had finally become so strong that he could no longer defer making the pilgrimage. To our inquiry as to what he thought might result upon his return, he replied, That remains with God

[^7] Four years ago;, one hundred and seventy Bahá'ís were martyred in his city during a period of four days. —R.W. This refers to the persecution of the Bahá'ís of Yazd in 1903. — ED

Our room fronted upon a little garden in which was a fountain, and nearby a tent in which 'Abdu'l-Bahá receives many of those who come to see Him. So intense are the hatreds between the followers of the different religious systems that it is unusual for a man to be well spoken of outside his own system, but {{p16}} 'Abdu'l-Bahá is regarded by all classes as a man of such wisdom and justice that it is to Him that they come for explanations of their religious Books, for the adjustment of their business quarrels, and even for the settlement of family difficulties. The inquirer will be told that 'Abbaas Effendi ('Abdu'l-Bahá) makes no distinction; that He helps Jew, Muḥammadan, and Christian alike.

Neither 'Abdu'l-Bahá nor His Father, Bahá'u'lláh, were ever taught the learning of men. Yet scientific men from different parts of the world go to question and inquire of 'Abdu'l-Bahá about many and various matters. Learned men, priests of the different systems, and even those in authority go to consult with Him; all regard Him as their friends and adviser.

Friday mornings at seven there is another picture. Near the tent in the garden one may see an assemblage of the abject poor — the lame, the halt, and the blind — seldom less than a hundred. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá passes among them He will be seen to give to each a small coin, and to add a word of sympathy or cheer; often an inquiry about those at home; frequently he sends a share to an absent one. It is a sorry procession as they file slowly away, but they all {{p17}} look forward to this weekly visit, and indeed it is said that this is the chief means of sustenance for some of them. Almost any morning, early, He may be seen making the round of the city, calling upon the feeble and the sick; many dingy abodes are brightened by His presence.

In ‘Akká the little birds fly right into the rooms. The door of the dining room was usually open, and we frequently saw them eating crumbs from the table. The evening meal is at nine, after the custom of the Persians, and it is then that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá talks and teaches. The following is the substance of what He said to us during one meal:

Since the beginning of the world up to the present time, whenever a Manifestation or a Holy One appeared, all stood against Him, disgracefully treated Him, rejected and opposed Him, persecuted His followers, plundered their possessions, and at last sentenced Him to death, saying ‘This man (the Manifestation) is the cause of corrupting our laws and of destroying our religion.

They called Jesus a liar. But, notwithstanding all these afflictions which fell upon Him, He won the victory and subdued all to His Command; His spiritual authority prevailed in the {{p18}} world, and the deniers and those who contradicted Him failed and were frustrated. Though but few persons accepted and were converted in the Day of each one of the Manifestations, yet these few surpassed and overcame great multitudes. During the time of Christ only a few souls believed in Him, but they were so powerful in spirit that none of the learned men among the Israelites could resist and stand against them, and afterward their light illumined the world, their call was raised abroad, their stars twinkled in heaven, their diadem became resplendent, and they are shining with great brilliancy.

When Christ passed away, He had eleven disciples. The greatest among them was Peter, and he denied Christ three times, but when Bahá’u’lláh departed He had a hundred thousand believers who were calling out ‘Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá while they were under swords and daggers, and in these late years many men and women in Yazd were killed by inches without uttering a single cry or complaint, but rather called out the Greatest Name. From these incidents we may judge the future of this Revelation. {{p19}}

During our last meal, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá broke a quantity of bread into His bowl, then asking for the plates of the pilgrims, He gave to each of us a portion. When the meal was finished, He said: I have given you to eat from My bowl — now distribute My Bread among the people.

When we left ‘Akká, we drove to the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, about two miles beyond the city. It is a small stone building of simplest construction, in a little garden of flowers. The gardener filled our arms with roses and carnations.

From here, we visited the beautiful garden of Ridván, where Bahá'u'lláh so often went, sometimes remaining days at a time. As we were leaving, Abu'l-Qazim, the gardener, followed us across the little bridge and gave us some beautiful flowers, after which he climbed up on the wheel of the carriage and gave me a parting embrace. The Ridván is in reality an island, and on both sides flow streams of clear water.

At unexpected places along the road we were surprised to again see the good faces of those we thought we had left behind, and once more they bade us good-bye.

Three days later, we left Haifa by steamer {{p21}} for Jaffa, from where we traveled fifty-four miles by narrow-gauge railroad up to Jerusalem. During the two days there we visited both Bethlehem and the Mount of Olives. We then returned to Jaffa for steamer to Port Sa'id and went at once to Cairo, where we remained a week visiting the friends. We found here also that love and kindness which everywhere characterizes the Bahá'ís of the Orient. From Cairo we went to Alexandria, where we took a steamer for Naples.

'Abdu'l-Bahá had told us that He would be glad if we could arrange to visit the friends in Paris and London on our way home. Therefore, after traveling through Italy and Switzerland, we went to Paris, where we remained a week and attended several interesting meetings. We also were in London a week, and there met our American friends who were returning from India, where for several months they had been teaching in this Cause.

This is the account of our journey by land and water to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but the true Journey and the real Meeting is of the spirit, for only that cup which one carries there is filled.

The only claim of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Station {{p22}} of Servitude. As to His personality, He commands us to see the Light, not the Lamp

Blessed are those who know Ro {sig}

A recent letter from Ḥaydar-'Alí, an old man of seventy-four years, whom we met and who was exiled and imprisoned for twelve years, two of them in chains, for his belief in this Revelation, has as its closing paragraph the following:

May God speed the day when the limitations of personalities, prejudices of boundaries, and distinctions of the East, West, North, and South be entirely removed and all of us become true Bahá'ís.
{{p23}}

Memories of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

1908: 1910: 1912: 1913

by Stanwood Cobb

I FIRST MET ‘Abdu’l-Bahá vicariously, so to speak, and it was this meeting that brought me into the Bahá’í Faith in the summer of 1906. It happened that being in the vicinity of Green Acre [^7] that summer I made a pilgrimage there to see what it was all about. My curiosity had been aroused by weekly articles in the Boston Transcript. At this time, I was studying for the Unitarian ministry at the Harvard Divinity School

[^7] The Green Acre conferences at Eliot, Maine, established by Sarah Farmer during 1894, in the aftermath of the Chicago World’s Parliament of Religions, were devoted to the tolerant study of comparative religions and progressive ideas. After 1900, when Miss Farmer became a believer, Bahá’í teachers were included among the speakers. —ED.

It was a warm Sunday afternoon in August. The big tent on Green Acre’s lower level, {{p26}} where the lecture hall now is located, was filled to capacity to hear some famous sculptor from New York. I was not greatly interested in his lecture. It was not for the sake of art that I had come, but for the sake of religion.

At the end of the lecture I went up to speak to Sarah Farmer — who had been presiding in her own ineffable way, shedding a warm spiritual glow upon the whole affair. As I had previously met her in Cambridge at the home of Mrs. Ole Bull, I ventured to recall myself to her.

Miss Farmer took my hand in hers and cordially held it while she looked into my eyes and asked, Have you heard of the Persian Revelation

No, I answered

Well, go to that lady in the white headdress and ask her to tell you about it. I know by your eyes that you are ready for it.

What had she seen in my eyes? I do not know. But what she had read there proved true. For within half an hour from that moment I became a confirmed Bahá’í and have remained so ever since

But it is of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that I am writing, and not of myself. How did it happen that {{p27}} ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, seven thousand miles away and a prisoner in ‘Akká, could at such a distance confirm me with such immediacy into the Bahá’í Faith?

It happened in this way. The path had been prepared, so to speak. For in reviewing books for the Boston Transcript which dealt with the prevailing and rapidly increasing flaws in our present civilization, and the need of a better world order, I had begun to debate deeply with myself on this matter of such great universal concern.

It is true, I thought, that a new and better pattern of civilization needs to be devised. But even if such a pattern — an ideal pattern — were conceived, who could put it over? Could I, as a clergyman, hope to convert all my congregation to it? Much less could I hope to convert the whole country. And no human being could by any conceivable power of vision and of personality bring all humanity into such a kingdom of perfection.

I still vividly remember how I was taking a long walk in the beautiful suburb of Chestnut Hill, around the reservoir, when the solution of this problem flashed into my mind. Someone must appear with more than human authority, {{p28}} in order to win the allegiance of the whole world to an ideal pattern for humanity.

This was my general frame of mind when Mary Lucas, the woman in white — a singer just back from visiting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — took me under an apple tree on the sloping lawn and proceeded to unfold to me the Persian Revelation. Her exposition was very simple. It consisted of only these four words: Our Lord has come!

The moment Mary Lucas uttered those words I felt, This is it! How did it happen that I felt that way? The woman in white had not discoursed to me upon the spiritual character and greatness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, nor upon the principles of the Bahá’í Faith. How great is the power of speech, when one simple utterance could sweep me — mind, heart, and soul — into that Faith!

But it was more than these four words that empowered Mary Lucas so to usher me into the Cause. It was more than speech itself. It was a unique spiritual vibration which Mary Lucas had brought from ‘Akká that convinced me. And it was the strange cosmic dynamism with which her words were charged that moved my soul. {{p29}}

If ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself had stood under that apple tree and addressed me, I could not have been more convinced. For what is distance on the plane of spirit? Mary Lucas had brought the spirit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with her. I felt it, and I was convinced. Especially as my own soul had already sought out and found the answer to the world’s dire need: Someone must appear with more than human authority.

So that was my first meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — strangely vicarious, perhaps predestined. The second meeting — with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in person while He was still a prisoner in ‘Akká — took place in the following way. In February of 1908, I had the great privilege of visiting Him in company with Lua Getsinger, famous in the annals of Bahá’í history.

I accidentally (or was it by destiny?) ran into Lua on the steps of Shepard Hotel in Cairo, where I had gone for a few days of travel during the midyear holidays of Robert College (Constantinople), in which at that time I was teacher of English and Latin. {{p30}}

What are you doing here? asked Lua in great surprise

What are you doing here? I asked, in equal surprise

It seems that Lua was on a pilgrimage to ‘Akká, and she urged me to leave off my travels in Egypt and join her. I explained that I had written ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for permission to visit, but had been answered that at that time it was not advisable. But I have standing permission to take anyone with me, urged Lua. But I have arranged a trip up the Nile with my friend

What is a trip up the Nile compared with the privilege of visiting the Master

Lua’s logic was convincing and her ardor compelling. Twenty-four hours later saw me ensconced in a room adjoining ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s in the historic prison of ‘Akká, in reality a large compound enclosed within walls

My first meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was bewildering. We were ushered into a long study, lighted by large French windows at the farther end. I saw a large desk there, but no person sitting at it. Only a radiance of light. As we approached {{p31}} the end of the room, a majestic figure in Oriental garb became evident to me. It was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Lua Getsinger, with the devotion of a Mary Magdalene, fell to her knees and fervently kissed His robe. But what was I to do? I am not one who can act insincerely. Should I merely shake hands with Him? As I stood in hesitation ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, fully realizing my predicament, saved me from it by taking me in His arms and embracing me.

You are welcome! He said

Every evening at dinner ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, who did not eat at that time, helped to serve us. He went around from guest to guest, putting more food upon the plates. This is the height of Oriental hospitality, to serve an honoured guest with one’s own hands.

When the meal was over, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would give us a brief talk on spiritual themes. I regret that I have not a memory sufficient to recall all that He said. But I do recall two of these message of spiritual wisdom

It is not enough to wish to do good. The wish should be followed by action. What would you think of a mother who said, ‘How I love {{p32}} you, my babe! — yet did not give it milk? or of a penniless man, who said, ‘I am going to found a great university!

On another occasion, He spoke of the need for loving patience in the face of aggravating behavior on the part of others. One might say, ‘Well, I will endure such-and-such a person so long as he is endurable. But Bahá’ís must endure people even when they are unendurable.

Three extraordinary qualities which characterized all of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s utterances were to be found in these two brief conversations: His supreme logic; His delightful sense of humor; and the inspiring buoyancy with which He gave forth solemn pronouncements.

For instance, when He said, But Bahá'ís must endure people even when they are are unendurable, he did not look at us solemnly as if appointing us to an arduous and difficult task. Rather, He beamed upon us delightfully, as if to suggest what a joy to us it would be to act in this way!

I want to emphasize this important point—the joyousness with which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá always depicted the spiritual life as He enjoined it upon us. And why not? Is man’s spiritual life {{p34}} not in reality more joyous than any other kind of life that he can lead?

This philosophy of joy was the keynote of all of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s teaching. Are you happy? was His frequent greeting to His visitors Be happy!

Those who were unhappy (and who of us are not at times!) would weep at this. And ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would smile as if to say, Yes, weep on. Beyond the tears is sunshine

And sometimes He would wipe away with His own hands the tears from their wet cheeks, and they would leave His presence transfigured.

On the occasion of this visit I had been under a severe strain at Robert College, due to disciplinary troubles. That was one of the reasons for my diversionary trip to Egypt. Also, I had been slowly recovering in previous years from a nervous depression due to over work at Dartmouth, and also at the Harvard Divinity School. At times I would feel so depressed that I should have been glad to have found a hole in the ground, crawled into it, and pulled the hole in after me. I understood at such times the Hindu craving for extinction. {{p35}}

‘Abdu’l-Bahá came into my room one morning without His translator. He sat beside me and took one of my hands in both of His and held it for a minute or two. He had not at any time inquired as to my health. He knew. From that moment on I found myself permanently relieved of these depressive moods. No matter how hard the going, I have always since then been glad to be alive.

At last, all too soon, the time came to go. The three days assigned for our visit had come to an end. I shall never forget how Lua Getsinger sobbed as if her heart would break as she slowly descended the long flight of steps, looking back frequently at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Who stood benignly at the top.

Needless to say, the ensuing spring at Robert College was one of the most glorious {{p36}} periods of my life. Never had the birds sung so sweetly, the flowers and shrubs bloomed so exquisitely, the golden sunshine seemed so intoxicating. As for my disciplinary troubles at the college, they vanished like mist which the sunshine dispels. My pupils, some of whom had been carrying knives and revolvers, loved me again and more than ever. Such was the magic power that I brought from ‘Akká.

Again it was my privilege to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the summer of 1910, and this time at His own invitation. I was given the privilege of spending a week there, in the Persian guest house on the slopes of Mt. Carmel. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at this time was living in Haifa in the home built for Him by Mrs. Jackson, having been freed from His imprisonment by the Young Turks in the summer of 1908. The oppressive and cruel governor who had in vain sought graft from Him and had threatened to send Him to the malign dungeons of Tunis, had himself met the fate he had designed for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — the fate of death, and at the hands {{p37}} of the Young Turks. And ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was enjoying, for the first time since His boyhood, the luxury of freedom.

He seemed to me more noble in countenance, more regal in bearing, more potent in the power of His presence than ever before. Every evening at sunset He met with the pilgrims, assembled in a large room, and gave a spiritual discourse.

One afternoon, I found the pilgrims waiting outside at the gate for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He had been making a call upon the Turkish consul and was expected soon. After a few moments we saw His carriage stop at the foot of the short hill, where He got out in order to walk the rest of the way for the sake of exercise. All of the Persian pilgrims stood in their customary reverential attitude, awaiting His approach with bowed heads and arms crossed upon their breasts. I alone, as an American, took the privilege of watching Him as He approached, enjoying the majesty of His movements and the nobility of His whole appearance. But as He neared me, I involuntarily also bowed my head. Some power emanating from Him seemed to obligate this attitude. So had Professor E.G. Browne, the only Occidental ever to visit Bahá’u’lláh {{p38}} felt obligated to bow his head in the presence of the Prophet. [^8]

[^8] Professor Browne was not the only Westerner ever to visit Bahá’u’lláh, but he wrote the famous pen portrait which includes the following description of his first meeting with Him: No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before one who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain! — ED.

This power emanating from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not expressed for the purpose of producing submission. It was a power which He never expressed to non-Bahá’ís. Let us say, rather, that it was a privilege He gave us, of seeing a little behind the veil; of experiencing the direct effect of that Cosmic Power which in this early period of our development seems supernormal, however normal it may become to us at some distant future stage of our soul’s development.

No, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá never put forth any of His spiritual power to dazzle, persuade, or overawe sceptics or unbelievers. Of this fact I shall later give a vivid instance

On the day I arrived at Haifa I was ill with a dysentery which I had picked up in the course {{p39}} of my travels. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent His own physician to me, and visited me Himself. He said, I would that I could take your illness upon myself. I have never forgotten this. I felt, I knew, that in making this remark ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not speaking in mere terms of sympathy. He meant just what He said.

Such is the great love of the Kingdom, of which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke so often and so much. This is a love which is difficult, almost impossible, for us to acquire — though we may seek to approximate its perfection. It is more than sympathy, more than empathy. It is sacrificial love.

Looking back, it seems strange that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not employ His healing power directly upon me, as He had done on the occasion of my previous visit. He left me to the care of His physician and to the prescribed medications. It took three days for me to get on my feet again.

Why did He not restore me directly to health by means of spiritual healing? There is some deep spiritual lesson here. It was not ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s province to go about healing physical diseases. It was His mission to expound the Teachings and express the spiritual potency of {{p40}} the world’s Divine Physician. Physical events and conditions are of less importance in our lives than the development of our spiritual nature.

In regard to health in general, I will quote here a statement which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had made to me on my previous visit: that health is the expression of equilibrium; that the body is composed of certain elements, and that when these elements are in the right proportion, health results; and that if there is any lack or preponderance in these elements, sickness results.

Thus, fifty years ago, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave in a simple statement to me all the truths which the new science of biochemistry is now discovering. But there is still another cause of illness, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went on to say. Illness may be caused by nervous factors. Anything that shocks us or affects our nerves may also affect our health.

All that has been written up to this point is a sort of introduction to the recording of my memories of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on the occasion of His visit to this country in 1912. The purpose {{p41}} of this introduction is to show what sort of a personage it was that on April 11, 1912, landed at the port of New York for an extended visit and lecture tour in this country.

Here was an Oriental in Oriental garb, a man who had been prisoner most of His life, a character whose life was for the most part lived on a spiritual plane so lofty as to be almost beyond our comprehension. How did this Servant of God meet, fit into, and adjust to the objective, dynamic, and materialistic life of America?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. upon landing in New York and being surrounded by alert and inquisitive reporters, was perfectly at home. And why not? Is there any limit to the power of spirit? Was not ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s universal spirit as capable of dealing with the fast-vibrating technological Occident as it had been in dealing with the mystic and more spiritual Orient? We shall see, as this narrative continues, how

He was all things to all men; protean in His universality; thoroughly at home in every environment.

This majestic figure — in tarboosh, turban, and flowing robes — drew the newspaper men into His aura and immediately won their favor

What do you think of America? He was asked. {{p42}}

I like it. Americans are optimistic. If you ask them how they are they say ‘All right!’ If you ask them how things are going, they say, ‘All right!’ This cheerful attitude is good.

And so ‘Abdu’l-Bahá won reporters’ hearts and continued to do so throughout His stay in America. He never seemed to them, or was described by them, as a strange or exotic personality. He always received favorable and constructive notices from the press.

For eight months, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá traveled over the United States from coast to coast, giving addresses in churches, universities, and lecture halls. Several of these addresses I was privileged to attend. As I look back on these occasions, I recall more vividly His platform presence than the contents of His addresses, which of course have all been published. [^9] [^9] See The Promulgation of Universal Peace (Chicago: Bahá’í Publishing Committee, 1922-25), Second Edition (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1982).—ED.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not, as a lecturer, stand still. His movements were very dynamic. He paced back and forth on the platform as He gave forth His spiritual utterances. I felt that the general atmosphere and the effect of His {{p44}} words were enhanced rather than diminished by the presence of a translator. For the techniques of translation gave ‘Abdu’l-Bahá a certain spiritual dignity, such as could not have been attained by a straight address in the language of His hearers.

The situation was as follows: ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would make a statement of a length within the power of the translator to render; then He would stand and smile as the translation was given, or He would nod His head to affirm important points. In other words, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not stand passive during the period of translation. He constantly illumined this translation with the dynamic power of His own spiritual personality.

And when He spoke, the Persian words — so beautiful and strong — boomed forth almost as musically as in operatic recitatives. While He spoke He was in constant and majestic motion. To hear Him was an experience unequaled in any other kind of platform delivery. It was a work of art, as well as a spiritual service. First would come this spiritual flow of thought musically expressed in a foreign tongue. Then, as the translator set forth its meaning to us, we {{p45}} had the added pleasure of watching ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s response to the art of the translator. It was, all in all, a highly colorful and dramatic procedure.

The substance of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s talks, here and in London and Paris, have been published and are available for study.<sup>[10]</sup> One can perceive in all of these addresses and discussions a peculiar adaptation to the Occidental mentality and way of thinking. They are, to sum it up in one word, supremely logical

It was the Greeks who taught the world how to think in logical terms, and they thereby laid the foundation for all Western thought and science. From the Greeks we have learned how to begin at A in order to get to Z — or as in Greek, from Alpha to Omega.

The Orientals do not think in just this way. Their mentality has never submitted to the Greek discipline. Their minds are more mystical, more immediate in perception. They do not have to begin at A in order to comprehend <sup>{p46}</sup> the station of Z. Through spiritual sensitivity, through rapid intuitional processes, they can often gain an immediate awareness or comprehension of the ultimate — of the Omega itself.

All Oriental seers and prophets speak oracularly. One sentence, one paragraph will contain a wealth which a lifetime of thought cannot exhaust. Christ spoke this way. Bahá’u’lláh spoke this way.

But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, for the sake of the Western world, adopted the Greek mode of presentation, carefully elaborating His theses and developing them from known to admissible premises. In no place is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ever obscure or recondite. If He wishes to present a great spiritual truth, He takes it up at an initial point where its truth will be acknowledged by all, and then develops it into a larger presentation such as can expand our very minds and souls.

And so, whatever else ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was and in the future will be realized to be, it is recognizable even today that He was God’s special gift to the Occident. He translated the oracular teachings of Bahá’u’lláh into a language and form easily comprehensible to the West. So <sup>{p48}</sup> that no one, having available these lucid pronouncements of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, can say that the Bahá’í Faith is hard to understand. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has set forth its Teachings with all the lucidity of daylight and the warmth of sunlight.

Regarding the countless personal interviews which the Master gave to Bahá’ís and nonBahá’ís alike, volumes could be written. I will tell here only of the interviews which I personally was privileged to have.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in Boston, I seized this opportunity to take my father in to see Him, from our home in the suburb of Newton. Father at that time was a venerable Boston artist seventy-five years of age — an earnestly religious man, devout, spiritual, and prayerful. He was sympathetic to my adherence to the Bahá’í Cause, but he had said, Son, I am too old to change. While I was in Constantinople, Father had at my request attended some of the Bahá’í meetings in Boston; and now he was glad to have this opportunity to visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

But what was my consternation to perceive that Father was taking the conversation into his own hands! It was an occurrence which I never shall forget. Father for some half-hour {{p49}} proceeded to lay down the law to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, or let us say, to enlighten Him on spiritual themes. Or to be more exact, let us say that Father took this opportunity to express to the loving, listening ear of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the spiritual philosophy which had guided him in life.

I sat there quite shocked. But I didn’t need to be. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá plainly was not shocked at this reversal of the customary role — He now to be the listener and His visitor the discourses. He sat there smiling, saying little, enveloping us with His love. And at the end, Father came away feeling that he had had a wonderful interview. What a lesson in humility this was, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá thus exemplified! There are so many times when we can help others best just by being good listeners.

The last interview I had in this country with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in Washington. Strange, that I do not recall what He said. My heart was too full to take any notes! I only can recall how He embraced me at the end, kissed me, and said three times: Be on fire with the love of the Kingdom!

What is this love of the Kingdom? That is what humanity must henceforward spend a {{p51}} few thousand years to discover and apply to life. Did ‘Abdu’l-Bahá mean the love for the Kingdom or the kind of love that prevails in the Higher Kingdom? Or did He mean both these loves?

Here in these nine words ‘Abdu’l-Bahá summed up the gist of all His teaching; which was that love, applied by means of the Holy Spirit, is the one thing that will solve all problems of man, both as an individual and as a collective society.

The most important interview I had with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in Paris in the spring of 1913. I was one of the staff of Porter Sargent’s Travel School for Boys. On my first visit He inquired about the school and asked me what I taught. I told Him that I taught English, Latin, algebra and geometry. He gazed intently at me with His luminous eyes and said, Do you teach the spiritual things?

This question embarrassed me. I did not know how to explain to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that the {{p53}} necessity of preparing the boys for college entrance exams dominated the nature of the curriculum. So I simply answered: No, there is not time for that.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá made no comment on this answer. But He did not need to. Out of my own mouth I had condemned myself and modern education. No time for spiritual things! That, of course, is just what is wrong with our modern materialistic civilization. It has no time to give for spiritual things.

But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s question and His silent response indicated that from His viewpoint spiritual things should come first. And why not? The material world, as the expression of man's spirit, is subordinate to the spiritual world. Therefore, education should begin with that which is primary and causal; and not with that which, as the creation of man, is secondary to his creative spirit and to the Creative Spirit of the cosmos.

'Abdu'l-Bahá kindly invited me to bring Porter Sargent and the pupils to see Him. Mr. Sargent gladly accepted the invitation, and four of the boys did. The others had excuses, like those people in the Bible who were invited to the wedding feast but did not go. One boy {{p54}} had to buy a pair of shoes, another had planned to take afternoon tea at a restaurant where a gypsy orchestra furnished music, et cetera. How many of life's important opportunities thus pass us by, through our own unperceptiveness or neglect!

I was deeply interested and concerned to see what impression 'Abdu'l-Bahá would make on the owner of the school. Porter Sargent, ten years my senior, was a confirmed and positive atheist. He had been a biologist, and was suffering from that spiritual myopia which so often afflicts this type of scientist. But he was an idealist, a humanitarian, a man of great vision for humanity, and somewhat of a genius.

In one intimate discussion with me on the nature of existence, during a long hike we took together on the sunny island of Capri, he had outlined to me his concept of life and the universe.

What do you think of it? he asked me, with some eagerness. Perhaps this was the first occasion on which he had so fully expounded his philosophy of life

It is splendid! I said. But it only covers half of existence

What is the other half? {{p56}}

Spirit

But this other half did not exist for Porter Sargent. Idealist that he was, creative-minded, somewhat of a poet — I felt sad that not one ray of spirit could penetrate the pride of his intellect.

So when this golden opportunity came of an interview with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, I had great hopes. Now, in this intimate meeting with the Master, I thought, Sargent will be forced to realize the existence of spirit. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's spiritual potency will at last penetrate his shell of skepticism.

And so, when we came out from the hotel after a half-hour conference with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, I eagerly asked, Well, what do you think of Him

I have never forgotten my shattering disappointment at the answer. He's a dear, kind, tired old man.

I was chagrined. But this experience taught me two spiritual lessons. The first was that skepticism must solve its own problems, in its own way. The second truth, even more important, was that Spirit never forces itself upon the individual. It must be invited.

Theologians have frequently made the observation that God could easily force us to reverence {{p57}} and stand in awe of Him, if He wished. But He does not wish to win man's reverence and awe and love by any forceful way. The initiative must come from man himself.

And so, in the case of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, I noticed upon many occasions that He never expressed spiritual power for the purpose of dazzling people, or of winning them to a spiritual allegiance for which they were not inwardly prepared. The greater the receptivity of the individual, the greater was the revelation of spiritual potency which 'Abdu'l-Bahá displayed.

Thus Juliet Thompson, who painted 'Abdu'l-Bahá's portrait, has testified to the glorious revelations of Himself which her Subject at times made to her. In similar vein have testified the Kinneys, with whom 'Abdu'l-Bahá spent several weeks. And May Maxwell once told me that she had received, upon one sacred occasion in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, such a revelation of Him that she would never attempt to describe it.

But materially-minded people, 'Abdu'l-Bahá met upon their own plane, as He did Porter Sargent. And as I also saw Him do in Washington with the Turkish ambassador, on the occasion of Mrs. Parson's reception. This being a {{p58}} social affair, 'Abdu'l-Bahá did not play the part of the Master, but the part of a guest amenable to the situation. And anyone who had looked into the large reception room, as I did, and had seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá sitting in a corner and exchanging funny stories with the ambassador, would have seen in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's facial expressions no trace of spiritual power. For He was not here primarily for spiritual purposes, but to play a social part.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was indeed all things to all men. He was protean. If some were prepared only to see Him as the Old Man of the Sea, such He was to them. But if they were prepared to see Him as more than this, the degree of their receptivity was proportionately blessed.

In all my interviews with 'Abdu'l-Bahá I had an extraordinary feeling of receiving truth from a higher plane than that of the mere intellect. Man's intellect is an organ of discrimination, an instrument for analysis and attack. As we listen to other people more learned than ourselves, we are pleased to get information, {{p59}} but we consciously reserve the right of judgment. Some of the things said to us we accept immediately; some with reservations; and some we inwardly oppose. No matter how wise or how learned the teacher, we reserve the right of our own judgment.

But with 'Abdu'l-Bahá it was different. I accepted always His statements with humility and with total conviction; not because of any assumption of authority, but because I always felt in the depths of my soul that what He said was truth. It always rang true, so to speak. Let us say, as it was said of another great leader of men, that He spoke with authority.

In the course of His lectures here and abroad 'Abdu'l-Bahá discoursed on many subjects. Where did He get His wide knowledge of things and of affairs? He had had but one year of schooling at the age of seven. He had been a prisoner all His life. He had few books, no scholarly library, no encyclopedias.

Yet at Schenectady, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was being shown around the General Electric Works by Steinmetz, this wizard of electricity was observed to be eagerly absorbing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s elucidation of electricity. The Rev. Moore, Unitarian clergyman who was present {{p60}} at the time, testified to me: Steinmetz’s jaw seemed to drop open as he drank in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s talk.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, do You know everything? Saffa Kinney is said to have asked

No, I do not know everything. But when I need to know something, it is pictured before Me.

And so, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, on the occasion of His tour of the General Electric Works, knew more about electricity than did Steinmetz.

Shoghi Effendi has said that intuition is a power of the soul. It was this power that was always available to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and available in its totality. He has spoken many times of this immediate knowledge — this knowledge attained without the means of books or other humans, this strange intuitive power which to some degree is available to us all.

And often, in closing an interview after answering some abstruse question, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would say: Time does not permit of further answer. But meditate on this, and truth will come to you.

And so — although ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is no longer {{p61}} with us to answer our questions — the power of the Holy Spirit so strong in Him is still available to us to guide, to fortify, to heal

I have tried to describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as I saw and knew Him. But how can anyone give an adequate description of this personality that, like St. Paul, was all things to all men?

The Persian doctor who attended Him from 1914 till His death, when recently asked at a meeting in Milwaukee to describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, replied that this was very difficult to do; because ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed Himself differently at different times, meeting every occasion as the occasion demanded.

If one were asked to describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in a single word, that word would be: protean. This unusual adjective is derived from the name of a minor deity in Greek mythology who had the magic power to assume any form he wished. And so ‘Abdu’l-Bahá could be on one occasion all love; on another occasion supreme wisdom; and on other rare occasions, expressing a power that seemed cosmic. {{p62}}

And since love, wisdom, and power are the three principles upon which the Cosmos is run; and since ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was designated as our exemplar, it follows that these qualities should be developed in us all, as we grow spiritually toward the attainment of our full stature as citizens of that Kingdom of God destined to be the consummation of our planetary existence.

What was the secret of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s power? He suggests the answer in His own words

The human body is in need of material force, but the spirit has need of the Holy Spirit. If it is aided by the bounty of the Holy Spirit it will attain great power; it will discover realities; it will be informed of the mysteries. The power of the Holy Spirit is here for all. The captive of the Holy Spirit is exempt from every captivity

The teachings of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh are the breaths of the Holy Spirit which create man anew.

Whatever was and still is the reality of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá it is evident from the events of His life that He was endowed with a cosmic power for the fulfillment of His mission. Every unexpected circumstance, every event in the midst of the Occidental civilization so foreign to His {{p63}} own background, He met not only successfully but also with a power that won all hearts.

His directives to Bahá’ís always focused on the need of divine aid — the aid of Spirit — in order to exemplify and propagate the Bahá’í Faith and lay the foundations for that New World Order laid down by Bahá’u’lláh for the establishment of a spiritually motivated world civilization.

To those who would like to pursue further the marvelous details of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life we recommend Portals to Freedom by Howard Ives,<sup>[11]</sup> a Unitarian clergyman prior to his conversion to Bahá’í. We had the pleasure of meeting Ives in New York in 1910, when he was at the beginning of his search for spiritual reality.

Cobb, I’d like you to meet a young clergyman who is becoming interested in Bahá’í, said my friend Montfort Mills to me one day. Can you have lunch with us tomorrow

I was glad to accept this invitation and to {{p64}} meet an earnest seeker. I do not recall our conversation at the lunch table. But it was evident that Ives was seriously searching.

This meeting with Ives resulted on my part in a memorable friendship with a man who was destined ultimately to celebrate the personality and teachings of one who in 1912, became his Teacher and Master.

In his vivid narrative Howard Ives reports many loving meetings and interviews with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The impression of this spiritual leader which remained a constant in Ives’ recollections is expressed by him in the following words: What ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said impressed me with the force of the impact of Divine Truth.

There was not a question in my mind of the authority with which He spoke.

A Week In ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Home

1920

by Genevieve L. Coy

We have beheld the King in His Beauty; we {p67} have seen the land that is very far off. [12] {.noid}

SEPTEMBER 1, 1920. Our party of four American pilgrims [13] had left Cairo on the evening of August 31st. Three of the Egyptian Bahá’ís had come to the train to bid us farewell, and to give us messages to take to Haifa. One of the group was an Armenian, who brought a basket of fruit for the Master. Another was Mírzá Tawfiq, a young man of twenty-one or — two years of age, who is a student in the college in Beirut. He interpreted for us often during our five days in Cairo, and also served as a most pleasant and helpful guide in some of our trips about the city. The third person to bid us Godspeed was Muḥammad-Taquí Iṣfahání, in whose {p67} home we had spent some of our happiest hours in Cairo. He speaks no English, but he gave us many sweet thoughts, through Mírzá Tawfiq’s interpretations, and his smile was a benediction.

[13] The four pilgrims who made this glorious journey together were Mable Paine, Sylvia Paine, Cora Grey, and Genevieve Coy. — G.L.C.

We loved him so much that we could not have borne parting from him had it not been that the goal of our journey was Haifa and the Master! His parting gift to us was a tray of delicious pastry and a lovely bouquet of roses. Through all the next day’s ride the flowers kept fresh, and on the day after that there were two or three buds that were fresh enough to be given to the Master, when Mírzá Muḥammad Taquí’s message of love was told him. The Master wore them in his girdle all the rest of that day, and said that he always was happy when he thought of the loving heart of the Bahá’í who had given us the flowers.

When we woke on the morning of September 1st, the train was running through the desert country of southern Palestine. For mile after mile the rolling sand dunes stretched into the distance. Long lines of camels were passed; and occasionally acres of date palms, loaded with green dates, showed where a little moisture was held in the sand below the dry surface. For hours we looked out of the window, {p69} watching, with an intense fascination, those long miles of desert. Someone in our party said that she could quite understand why the children of Israel murmured in the wilderness, if that was the kind of country that they had to travel through! We wondered whether Joseph and Mary, and the infant Jesus, had traveled so hard a road when they went down into Egypt. But later, in Haifa, we were told that the tradition of the country says that they went to the port at the foot of Mt. Carmel, and from there continued their journey to Egypt by boat.

During the middle of the day, the train passed from the desert into the pasture land. That is as different from our green American meadows as one can imagine. The pastures are brown and dry, and we wondered how the many herds of goat and sheep that we saw could find enough food to keep them alive. We saw almost no cows, and in Haifa we found that it is very difficult to obtain milk; we did not see any butter while we were in Palestine. Instead of butter, a white, salty cheese made from goat's milk is served.

In the afternoon we rode through the beautiful valley near Jaffa, with its thousands and thousands of fruit trees. The fields have to be {{p70}} irrigated, but when that is done they blossom abundantly, and the trees are loaded with oranges and lemons, which were green at that season of the year. A little farther north is the valley of Sharon, and we tried to remember some of the beautiful words of the Old Testament with regard to that valley. The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God. [^14]

[^14] Isaiah 35:1-2 — ED.

The last part of the journey was very beautiful. The train ran close to the edge of the seashore, and we saw the sun drop down through fleecy clouds and sink in the blue waters of the Mediterranean. On the right, a low range of hills rose — rocky, and sparsely covered with vegetation. Beyond them appeared line after line of hills, until, far in the distance, high blue mountains towered into the sky. We thought that they must be the Lebanons, and we wondered whether we should soon see the valley of {{p71}} 'Akká. After a time, the lowest range of hills rose so close that all the others were blotted out. Cora suggested that perhaps the termination of this range was Mt. Carmel, and so it proved to be, for suddenly we rounded a point of land, and Haifa appeared to the east, with Mt. Carmel above.

Haifa lies on a narrow plain at the foot of the mountain, but there are buildings scattered part way up the slope. A long white road traverses the length of the hill, and reaches the top near its western extremity. I looked for the Tomb of the Báb, but I am not sure whether I saw it then. The train runs through a considerable part of the town, before reaching the station, and our eyes were very eager in their search for the various places of which we had heard so much. Suddenly, I remembered that we should now be able to see 'Akká across the bay, and hurrying to the other side of the car, I looked out — and across the water I glimpsed the city of the Lord, the door of hope. We were so happy to be so near our journey's end — we were so full of expectation, that it seemed as if the train would never reach the station. But at last we did pull up in front of it!

Cora went out to look for a porter, and I was {{p73}} ready to pass baggage out of the window to her. But almost immediately a hand was reached in to shake mine, and we were welcomed by a young man, whom we later learned was Rúhí Effendi, one of the Master's grandsons. Soon a familiar figure appeared in the car, Fujita, whom we had last seen in New York. He helped pass out bundles, and soon we were all on the platform with our numerous parcels and bags beside us. We shook hands with several young men, Bahá'ís from the Master's household, and then we four American pilgrims were in the auto, with the driver, Rúhí Effendi, and some of our baggage. Sa'id Effendi, who had just arrived from Alexandria, Fujita and the other friends waited for the car to return for them.

The car ran through several streets, going steadily upwards — and I was too happy and too far from ordinary speech to be able to say a word. Suddenly we turned a corner, and after going less than a hundred yards the car stopped. I recognized the Pilgrim House, from the picture of it in The Light of the World.<sup>[15]</sup> On the {{p75}} other side of the road was the wall of the Master's garden, and rising above it, the little room, like a watchtower, in which the Master often stays.

During our ride from the station, Rúhí Effendi told us that the Master was staying on the mountain for a few days, to rest from the many demands made on his time when he is in his house in the town. We would not see him until the next day. Perhaps we were disappointed for a moment, but here one knows that all the Master does is wisely done. And next morning, we were sure that it was well that we should have time to rest, and drink in the exquisite peace of the place, before meeting Him.

At the door of the Pilgrim House, we were met by two Americans, Mrs. Hoagg and Malcolm McGillavrey. Malcolm had been in Haifa a week, but Mrs. Hoagg had been there since early in the summer. She acted as hostess for the Pilgrim House; she showed us to our rooms — one for Cora and me, another for Mabel and Sylvia. Simple, clean, and filled with a faint fragrance as of incense, is our place of rest, the place the Master has provided for those who come from the West. Every hour I wonder more at the love and kindness which has so provided for our comfort! Whenever we sit {{p76}} down to a meal, I think, This is the meal the Master has given us! The material food has come now, but the spiritual food had reached us in America!

Fujita cares for the house; he gets the breakfast; he serves the lunch, the food for which is brought over from the Master's house; he washes the dishes, he cleans the lamps, he is always busy in serving us. In the evening, he helps wait on table at dinner in the Master's house. The other boy who serves at dinner is Khusraw, who came from Burma when he was very young, to serve the Master.

After our arrival at the Pilgrim House, we sat on the porch for a while. The night was beautiful — a full moon, and yet the stars were very bright. At about half past seven, Mrs. Hoagg took us over to the Master's house to meet the ladies of the household. We entered a gate that is covered with a luxuriant growth of vines, and walked under an arbor to the entrance of the house. It was hard to believe that we were really there! We had seen pictures of the house often, and it was so very like the pictures! (That is true of everything here. The pictures we have seen have been very good, I think, for one recognizes places and people immediately.) {{p77}}

We went up a rather long, broad flight of steps, turned to the left, and were in a high-ceilinged room of moderate size. There were many chairs and divans against the wall, and at the end of the room was a big wicker chair which one knew at once was the Master's. Immediately, the ladies came in. They greeted us with the Greatest Name, they inquired about our health, our journey, about the believers in America. Rúhí Effendi translated for those who did not speak English. There were present the Holy Mother,[^16] the Greatest Holy Leaf,[^17] two of the daughters,[^18] Tuba Khánúm, and Ruhha Khánúm; two or three young girls, granddaughters of the Master — and Fu'ad, the adorable four-year-old grandson, whose picture I had seen in Mr. Latimer's notebook.

[^16] Munírih Khánúm, the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

[^17] Bahíyyih Khánúm, the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

[^18] That is, of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

The Holy Mother spoke about Bahá'u'lláh's commands about education. The two daughters talked with us about the friends in America. Little Fu'ad ran in and out on a very sturdy pair of legs. I cannot remember much of what was said. We knew that we were very welcome. We knew that we were at home as never {{p78}} before! I could not but try to realize that these were the women who had been for years prisoners in 'Akká, who had undergone unspeakable hardships — these women with smiling faces who welcomed us so cordially.

After a time, how long I cannot tell, someone came and announced dinner. The ladies said good-night, for they do not come to the table where the men pilgrims are.[^19] We were taken out into a big, big room which had a long table down the center. Many men came filing in and seated themselves. There were probably twenty or thirty at the table. Later, we learned that five religions and six or seven nationalities were represented. Christians, Muḥammadans, Buddhists, Zoroastrians, Jews — were met in love and unity at the table of our Master. Egyptian, Persian, Arab, Burmese, Japanese, American, Parsee, Turk — and perhaps other nationalities were infinitely happy because they had found the joy that passeth understanding — because they were the guests of {{p79}} 'Abdu'l-Bahá! One does not remember words here, but the atmosphere of joy and peace is unforgettable

[^19] Of necessity, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family observed the Muslim customs of veiling and social separation of the sexes during this time. Western women were not bound by these customs, of course. — ED.

As we were leaving the house, Rúhí Effendi, who had just come down from the mountain, brought word that the Master would either come down, or send for us the next day

At the Pilgrim House, we sat out on the porch in the moonlight and talked until almost ten o’clock — and then went to our rooms to pass our first night in the Holy Land! I slept peacefully, and the night was all the more beautiful because I woke several times for a few minutes of happy realization that we were at last in Haifa, in the land of heart’s desire!

SEPTEMBER 2, 1920. To waken in the Pilgrim House in Haifa is a very, very happy experience! From our west windows we could catch a glimpse of the Tomb of the Báb, and how eagerly we looked up at it, knowing that there the Master was dwelling; there was the memorial to the wonderful young herald of our Faith, the Supreme Báb. {{p80}}

Breakfast in the Pilgrim House comes at seven o’clock. It is a simple, friendly meal. The food consisted of tea, toast, poached eggs, honey, and cheese. And the lovely companionship of the friends! There were the seven of us who slept in the House, and Sa’íd Effendi and Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh always came in and had breakfast with us. Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh came down from the mountain each morning, bringing handfuls of jasmine blossoms from the garden of the Tomb, and these he strewed on the table. They were a lovely reminder of the spiritual fragrance of that spot!

After breakfast on that morning I was sitting in our room praying. Cora was writing at the table, the door into the living room was open and the various sounds of the household drifted in to us. I was having a very happy time reading some of the prayers in the little prayerbook, and also in praying for the friends who were not there with us. I found myself bathed in a wonderful atmosphere of love and peace. It was like nothing I had ever experienced! It was not supernatural in the sense of seeming queer or strange. It was simply an all-pervading peace and calm that seemed to fill my whole heart and spirit. I seemed to be at one with all the {{p81}} beauty and joy and light in the universe. Thus, I think, some ray of love from the Master’s thought prepared me for meeting him that day.

At lunch, Rúhí Effendi brought word that we were to go up to the Tomb at about four in the afternoon, to see the Master! After lunch we all went and rested for an hour and a half. That is part of the day’s program always. At three o’clock came tea, another invariable occurrence.

As the hour drew near when we were to go up the Mountain of the Lord, to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I remembered one evening we had spent with Juliet Thompson not long before we had left New York. She had said with deep earnestness, When you are in the Master’s presence, do not be self-conscious if you can help it. Do not be afraid. There is nothing to fear. He is all love and kindness. Pray, pray, all the way on your journey, that your hearts may be freed from all self-consciousness. Go to him, freely, gladly!

I had tried to remember that, I had prayed for purity of heart that I might learn the lessons the Master will teach those who are ready to learn. And yet as we rode up the steep road toward the Tomb, there was a strange mixture {{p82}} of love and dread and longing in my heart. The way seemed very long! And yet it was very beautiful. We saw the valley of ‘Akká, with the river Kishon winding through it down to the sea. Across the bay, ‘Akká shone brightly in the afternoon sunlight — that White Spot which so many, many pilgrims have sought because the Glory of God had lived there.

Finally, we turned off from the main road, and the carriage drove down a steep incline toward the musafir-khanik — the Persian Hospice for men. There we alighted and Mrs. Hoagg led us along a wide path, which is bordered with cypress trees on one side and with fig trees on the other. We passed the house of the caretaker, with the little room on top where the Master sometimes sleeps when He is on the mountain, and walked around to the front of the Tomb.

In front of the Tomb of the Báb, we found perhaps thirty of the men pilgrims sitting. One of the most majestic was a tall man, dressed in a long black robe — one of the Bahá’í teachers from ‘Ishqabád. And with all his dignity, he had the most beautiful laughter-wrinkles around his eyes! One soon realized the cause of the latter, for he smiled almost all the time! {{p83}}

We were shown to seats in front of the Tomb, on the edge of the beautiful garden of the terrace. We were told that the Master would come soon. During the last few days, I had prayed so much for the ability to learn to to serve the many children of the Father. I had found myself trying to imagine what the Master’s presence would be like — and then had tried “not to do that for fear I would be hindering my realization of his actual presence! And so I had tried to go to him with only the thought of the love of God in my heart.

Suddenly, all of the believers rose and faced the East. Then, from around the corner of the Tomb came the Master with two of the young men walking a little behind him. He came slowly toward us, and said, Welcome, welcome! in English; and then, Sit down, sit down! Sylvia sat next him; then Mabel Paine, myself, Cora, and Mrs. Hoagg. The other friends were beyond her, in two rows.

When the Master had walked toward us, it seemed to me that I had seen him come just that way at some previous time. He seemed to be so beautifully familiar to me! I suppose it must have seemed so because of the pictures I have seen of him, and the stories I have heard {{p84}} other pilgrims tell. It was a moment that one would prolong if one could, that one would never forget!

The Master began to speak in Persian, and Rúhí Effendi translated into English. He asked several questions; he talked of principles of living. Sometimes he would be silent for several minutes, with his eyes looking far, far away. It is very difficult to remember much of what he said. Indeed, it was almost difficult to listen!

I wished only to look and look at the beauty of his face! For that was what impressed me first — the exquisite beauty of the Master. It was like the most beautiful pictures we have of him, with life and color added. His is a face of living silver — the wonderful silver of hair and beard, and the blue of his eyes. The side face is majestic and sweet and loving. It was that which we saw most of the time. The full face is more dignified; to me it seemed more awe-inspiring. And yet, when he smiled, it was most exquisitely friendly, and human!

But he looked very, very tired. And one of the secretaries had said in the morning that he looked more rested than when he had gone up to the Tomb a few days before. It hurt poignantly that any face of such beauty should be {{p86}} so weary. We had brought letters from friends in America to give to him, but when we saw the weariness of his face, we could not bear to add at all to the burdens he has to carry.

And yet the weariness was not, I think, a weariness of spirit. I cannot tell why I felt that way — partly because he can reach, as no one else can, the infinite sources of spiritual strength.

I had no desire to speak to the Master; there was nothing that I could say. I do not know what happened in my mind and heart. There was no shock, no surprise, no sadness, no thought of my own faulty past. But I came to understand that for one who has been long in his presence, there can be no desire except to serve him; that one's life would be happy only as one pleased him; that one would be sad only as one grieved him. I felt then that I had begun to learn — that the will to serve was becoming greater, as I had prayed that it might. Having seen the Master but once, I could make no promise to myself that that longing would carry me through and beyond all my selfish habits of the past. But I knew that to be in his presence would mean that I must love him, that I must do his will. {{p87}}

After a time, perhaps half an hour, some English visitors came; the Master begged to be excused; we rose and watched him until he disappeared from sight. Afterward we walked about the garden at the front of the Tomb. We saw the big reservoir for rain water, built into the terrace, which supplies water for the garden and for many of the people of the neighborhood. Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh brought us figs from one of the trees in the garden. We looked across the beautiful blue waters of the bay, to 'Akká, shining in the distance. We caught a suggestion of luxuriant growth of trees, and were told that it marked the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. The sun sank behind the mountain, and finally Mrs. Hoagg said it was time for us to be going down, but that first we might see the interior of the Tomb.

The caretaker opened a door at the southwest corner of the Tomb, and spread a piece of matting in front of it. Mrs. Hoagg went with us to show us the custom used in entering the Tomb. We removed our shoes, and then the caretaker poured rosewater on our hands, from a little glass cruet. We followed Mrs. Hoagg into the first room. It was perhaps fifteen feet square, and the floor was covered with a beautiful {{p88}} dark Persian carpet. There was no furniture of any kind. Directly in line with the outer door was a second door that led into an inner room. That was also covered with beautiful rugs. Standing on the floor were exquisite glass vases with candles burning in them. They were in groups, perhaps of three, and they gave the impression of flowers of living flame. I think there must have been other objects, a few, in the room. But the whole impression was one of exquisite beauty, simplicity, and peace. The inner room was raised several inches above the outer, and the raised threshold was covered with an embroidered cloth.

Mrs. Hoagg walked slowly up to the threshold, knelt there a moment in prayer, and then came back to a corner of the room. Cora followed her, and then came my turn. I had heard of the custom of prostrating oneself at the threshold of the Tomb, and I had wondered whether it would not seem stilted and formal. But it did not in the least! Perhaps it was the dignity and majesty of the Tomb, perhaps it was because we had been with the Master so recently. I was filled with a feeling of humility, with a longing to be evanescent at His threshold, {{p89}} and the kneeling in prayer seemed the most natural thing in the world! After that moment at the threshold, I walked to the back of the room while Sylvia and Mabel in turn went forward. We knelt in prayer a long time. I cannot guess what was in the hearts of the others, but my own was filled with a great longing to lose my old selfish self, and to acquire the unselfishness of service. It was a wonderful time. I thought of that radiant youth called the Báb, who had given everything, friends, family, life itself, to prepare the way of the Lord. I thought of the Master and the years of imprisonment and hardship that he had spent in the service of the Blessed Beauty. For the first time since coming to Haifa, I was almost ready to weep — not from sorrow, but from the sense of the greatness of the power of God.

No thought of death entered my mind while I was there. It was not a place of mourning! When I thought of the Báb, it was to be happy that one so pure of heart had lived and served. The only grief was for my own faults and failures; and the future, with the hope of service, was much more vivid than the past!

Finally Mrs. Hoagg, Cora, and I had left the {{p90}} Tomb. Mabel and Sylvia had not yet come out. We were about to put on our shoes, when suddenly the Master came around the corner! He smiled at us, and took up the cruet of rosewater. He held it out toward us, and I realized in a few moments that he wished to pour some on our hands. But I did not dream of going into the Tomb again, and so I did not realize what he meant! So he poured some on his own hands, put some on his face, and again held out the rosewater, giving us a glorious smile as he did so. That time we understood that he was waiting to anoint our hands, and we gladly held them out for the fragrant drops.

Mrs. Hoagg whispered, We will go in again — and just then the men believers came in a long line from the front of the Tomb. The Master anointed the hands of each, and they passed into the Tomb. Each knelt at the inner threshold a moment, until all had risen, and stood in a circle about the room. Then the Master spoke to Rūhí Effendi, who began to chant a long prayer, one of the Prayers of Visitation.[^20] His chanting was the sweetest, the most melodious {{p91}} of any I have ever heard. After the prayer the believers knelt at the threshold, and then passed quietly out. We four Americans were the last to leave, and as soon as we had left the Tomb, Mrs. Hoagg came to say that the Master was waiting to say good-bye to us. He stood at the northeast corner of the Tomb, and as we passed he shook hands with each of us, adding a caress for Sylvia. We turned and watched him as he walked back to the Tomb, waiting for the last glimpse! Then we walked down the mountain in the gathering dusk, and we were very happy. On the way down, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh told us interesting stories of the spread of the Cause in Persia, of the self-sacrifice and patience of the believers in trying to bring others to see the Light of this day.

[^20] See Tablets of Visitation in Bahá'í Prayers (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1982) pp. 230-35 — Ed.

Of the Master's talk on that first afternoon, I can remember the following. He said that we were very welcome, and inquired whether we were well. Then almost immediately he asked about Mr. Vail. Mrs. Paine said, He sends his love and longing. He wishes to do the Master's will.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: Mr. Vail is a good man, a sincere man. He is very illumined. {{p92}}

CORA GRAY: It is through his teaching that we are here

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: You must be very grateful to him. He has been the cause of your life. He has educated you. He has no aim save to serve the Kingdom.

Some people are ready for education. They are like the fertile ground. Some have not capacity, they are like the barren or salty ground. His Holiness Christ has told a story of the seed that fell on stony ground and so it could not grow. Other seeds fell in the shallow earth, and they soon withered away. But some fell on the good fertile earth, and grew and produced fruit.[^21] So it is with my words. Some fall on hearts that have no capacity; they do not take effect at all. Those people do not understand. Others hear and seem to understand, but they forget my words and do not live in accordance with them. But others have great capacity; they hear my words; they understand; they live accordingly.

[^21] Cf. Matt. 13:18-23 and Mk. 4.11-20. — ED

Have you seen Jinab-i Faḍl [^22] in America? {{p93}}

[^22] Mírzá Asadu'lláh Mazandarani, known as Jinab-i Faḍl, or as Faḍl-i Mazandarani. —ED

CORA GRAY: Yes, twice, just before we left New York

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: He is a very pure-hearted man. He is a real Bahá’í. He is confirmed in service. He who is confirmed is confirmed in all things. Of the Persians who have gone to America only two have been fully confirmed Bahá’ís — his honor, Abu’l-Faḍl, and his honor, Faḍl. They are both very good.

Then the Master told the story of Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl and the English ladies who insisted on seeing him! Finally, when they had knocked very persistently and continuously, Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl became tired of hearing it, so he went to the door, and said, Abu’l-Faḍl is not here. Up to this point in the story, the Master had been speaking in Persian or Arabic, and Rúḥí Effendi had been interpreting, but when the Master came to this part, he spoke in English, very distinctly, and then repeated it, Abu’l-Faḍl is not here! and then he smiled the most adorable smile!

When we first saw the Master, he asked whether we had had any troubles or difficulties on the way. Cora replied that if we had had any, we had now forgotten all of them.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: There is a Persian poet {{p94}} who says that when one has attained to the goal of one’s journey, the end of one’s search, he forgets all that has happened on the way

Cora said that the friends in Alexandria and Cairo had been so kind to us, and had helped us so much ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That is the duty of any Bahá’í. He is greater who serves most. That is the way to progress. Some flowers have color and no fragrance. Some have both fragrance and color, some have neither. So it is with the hearts of men.

SEPTEMBER 3, 1920. On September 3rd, we did not see the Master at all, for he was still up on Mt. Carmel. I was very, very happy, with a calm peace. During the morning I wrote in my diary. In the afternoon, we had tea with the ladies at the Master’s house. Someone told Mrs. Paine to sit in the big wicker chair at the end of the room, and she was happy to sit in the Master’s chair. I talked to Tuba Khánum for a time, mostly about education. Her daughter, Suraya, {{p95}} is to go to Cairo, to the Protestant School for Girls this year, and Tuba Khánum was saying how much they disliked to have to send their children away from home. But the schools in Haifa are not advanced enough for study beyond the age of fourteen or fifteen. She said, We like to have our children at home in the evening in order that we may give them some spiritual teaching ourselves. I could faintly imagine the loss to those children from separation from the lovely daughters of the Master! Tuba Khánum said that the previous year Suraya had been in a girl’s school in Beirut. She had been eager to go, for evidently life is a very restricted affair for a girl in Haifa! But this fall Suraya was not quite so eager to go to Cairo. Perhaps she had begun to realize how different her home in the Master’s household is from the ordinary places of living

We told the ladies that we hoped some of their children would come to America to study. But of course they think that a very long way from home to send them. Shoghi Effendi is now in England, just ready to enter Oxford, and Rúhángíz, his sister, is to enter some college for girls there. {{p96}}

Tuba Khánum, and, on another day, Rúhá Khánum, spoke of their hope of the founding of a Bahá'í School on Mt. Carmel. They are so sweetly appreciative and kind; they act as though the person to whom they are talking had all beautiful characteristics — and one longs to arise to meet that faith with deeds! Tuba Khánum made me feel that way, when in speaking of a future Bahá'í school on Mt. Carmel, she said, When such a school is founded I hope you may come and teach in it. What could be more wonderful! But one would have to live the life perfectly in order to be worthy to teach in such a school.

After a time Mrs. Paine told me to come over to sit in the wicker chair. That brought me near dear Rúhá Khánum and the Holy Mother. They talked to me about education. The Holy Mother said that when I was teaching my classes I could show forth Bahá'í love and kindness, even though I could not directly give the Bahá'í teachings. Besides, she said, there were many of the Bahá'í teachings that I could mention in class, even though I did not label them Bahá'í.

The Holy Mother is very, very sweet. She is quiet, calm, giving one the impression that no {{p97}} disturbance ever ruffles the evenness of her life. Her voice is low, and yet assured. There is a sweet reasonableness in it that seems to say, Why be impatient? All will be well in God's good time! She makes me think of the verse in the Hidden Words, Be contented with what we have ordained for they sake. This is for thy good if thou are content with it.[^23] The Holy Mother is content with His will. She was not in the group of prisoners who were exiled to 'Akká in 1868, but came from Persia with her brother. The journey was very hard. Much of the time she had to sleep at night in the same room with several men, and therefore she had to wear a veil at night, as well as in the daytime.[^24] Imagine the faith and courage of a young woman, who would come all that journey of months, through wild countries, in order that she might enter the Prison City, and marry — a Prisoner! When she reached 'Akká, the Bahá'ís had been removed from the barracks, and {{p98}} were living in a small house, one we saw when we visited 'Akká. One can only faintly imagine the warmth of the greeting she must have received when she came to be the wife of the beloved Greatest Branch! At that time the Master must have been twenty-seven or twenty-eight years old. We know that even then he was the comfort and joy of the whole Bahá'í colony!

[^23] The Hidden Words, Arabic, No. 18. Shoghi Effendi's translation reads: ...be content with what We have ordained for they sake, for this is that which profiteth thee, if therewith thou dost content thyself. — ED

[^24] Cf. Munírih Khánum: Memoirs and Letters (Los Angeles, Kalimát Press, 1986) pp. 26-44.—ED.

One of the ladies apologized because they had not been over to the Pilgrim House to call on us, for they had been unusually busy. There is much to be done in that big household, and in addition, two or three of the children had been quite ill. I think it was Rúḥá Khánum who was saying that they wanted to see more of us, and she continued, One should go and call on one's guests — and yet we do not! Then she smiled and said, But you are not our guests! You are members of our family! What sweeter hospitality could one desire!

I have mentioned the big wicker chair at the end of the room. However, I never saw the Master sit in it! Whenever we saw him in that room, he sat in a corner on one of the divans — always in the same place

I think it was this same afternoon that the ladies took us out and showed us the garden. {{p99}} The whole plot of ground upon which the house stands is from one-third to one-half an acre in size, and all of it is a beautifully cared for garden, except for the parts where buildings actually stand. (There is nothing comparable in it to our American lawns of grass!)

The garden has all been made since 1911 or 1912, by one faithful Bahá'í who loves to serve the Master in that way. I think many of the seeds, cuttings, etc., have been sent by Bahá'ís from various parts of the world. The result of the gardener's work is a lovely place. Flowers, fruits, and vegetables of many varieties grow there. We saw peaches, lemons, and pomegranates hanging on the trees. The pomegranates were just ripening and one of the ladies picked some for us to taste. There were two varieties, a sweet kind, that everyone likes, and a rather sour kind which reminded us of our red currants. Cora and I liked its sharp tartness, but most of the others did not care for it. The pomegranates are a beautiful fruit, with their dozens and dozens of bright red drops, crowded together within the reddish-yellow rind.

The Greatest Holy Leaf walked about several of the garden paths, looking at all the plants and trees. Some one told us that that was the {{p101}} first time in months that she had been in the garden! Apparently the ladies seldom go into the garden, because there are always men about who do not belong to the immediate family! And the Master says it is still not the time for the Bahá'í women in Haifa to go contrary to the custom of the country with regard to veiling when strange men are about. The ladies are longing for the time to come when they can lay aside the warm black veil!

To return to the garden: Several of the paths have trellises over them, with vines which make them very lovely. Above the main gateway there is a big bougainvillea plant which was covered with many blossoms when we were there. Beneath one of the arbors, against the house, and just below the Master's window, was a garden bench, where the friends often sat and talked. Cora and I went over there and sat for an hour two or three times, drinking in the beauty and peace. I had heard much of the Master's garden, and I was so happy to see it with my own eyes!

At dinner that Friday evening, the friends were very merry. There was a constant chatter, laughter, and teasing! Mírzá Badí' (who is interpreter for the English governor) sat next {{p102}} to Mrs. Hoagg, and they carried on a gay conversation. He has the nicest face, and his eyes twinkle with fun all the time!

We had watermelon for dessert. When the Master is not there to give the signal for leaving the table, it is the custom for all to watch until every one has finished eating; then all rise at once. But that evening, Malcolm and Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh lingered over their watermelon longer than the others! — I think Mrs. Hoagg and Mírzá Badí' were responsible for flashing a signal down the table that we should rise and leave them there! So some twenty-three people rose and looked on while Malcolm and Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh finished their watermelon, while everyone laughed at them! We were all like the simplest children who had played a prank on two playmates!

All day Friday we had been wondering when the Master would come down from the mountain. We were eager for him to come because we knew that we should see more of him then. And yet, remembering how tired he had looked, I could not help but wish he might stay longer in the quiet peace near the Tomb, in the hope that he might become more rested. {{p103}}

All that day I had been very happy and content not to see him, but as the evening came on I began to long to see his beautiful face again! And so I could not help but be happy when we heard that he was coming down the next morning — that Isfandiyar was to go up for him sometime between six and seven! And so I went to sleep in our quiet room in the Pilgrim House, rejoicing that on the morrow we should see him again.

SEPTEMBER 4, 1920. On Saturday morning, Cora and I rose in the darkness of 4:30 A.M., dressed, and by 5:15 we were on our way up the mountain toward the Tomb of the Báḅ. That early hour was a bit too late, for even then we found the climb warm, and the sun rose before we had reached the Tomb. We stopped to watch its glorious arising from behind the Lebanon hills. There were enough clouds to make a really beautiful sunrise. The valley of 'Akká was radiant, and the river winding through it gleamed silver! It looked, in its {{p104}} outward physical seeming, a door of hope! We continued up the hillside to the Tomb. As we passed the caretaker's house, he saw us, and by a gesture, asked whether we wished to enter his house. Perhaps he thought we had come up to see the Master, whom we knew was either in the house or at the Tomb. But we motioned toward the Tomb. He smiled, and preceding us, opened the west door into the room where we had been on Thursday. Then he quietly departed.

The candles were not lighted and the central room was not quite so beautiful on that account. But a soft light filtered in through the doors — and the exquisite peace filled our hearts. We stayed for perhaps an hour, in meditation and prayer.

It must have been after seven when we went out into the garden. We walked about a bit, and then Rúḥí Effendi and Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh came out to wish us good-morning. On the previous evening we had told Rúhí Effendi that we were going up to the Tomb early in the morning. But when he saw us there, he said, You really came! I didn't think you would! Americans never get up early! At which we laughed much! Rúhí Effendi's English is very good, but {{p105}} sometimes a phrase or some slang expression is used which he does not understand. He looks courteously questioning, half surprised, and waits for some one to explain!

The two young men talked to us for a few minutes, and then asked whether we would like to see the circle of cypress trees where Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. Of course we wanted to see them, and so Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh went with us, while Rúhí Effendi went to the caretaker's house. I wondered whether the Master had already gone down the mountain, and decided that he probably had, because it was after seven.

Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh led us up a path, onto a terrace back of the Tomb, and there we saw the circle of cypress trees. There are ten of them, planted quite close together so that their boughs interlace, forming an almost solid wall. They are on a bit of ground which is raised about three feet from the surrounding field, and is held up by a stone wall. We went up into the circle of ground between the trees. Above our heads was a small circle of blue sky. The ground was brown with needles from the trees. I thought of the Blessed Beauty, and was glad that at one time in His storm-tossed life He had {{p107}} been able to withdraw to that quiet green spot. But we had been there only a few minutes, when Rúhí Effendi came toward us, calling that the Master wished to see us! And we went on eager feet, following Rúhí Effendi to 'Abbás Qulí's house. [^25]

Cora was ahead of me, and she told me afterward that when she entered the room where the Master was sitting on a divan, she was not sure what to do! He bade her welcome, but still she stood in the doorway! Then he rose, held out his hands, and motioned her to a chair. She went and sat down. Just then I came in, and the Master motioned me to a chair beside Cora. I cannot remember whether he shook hands with us or not. (Usually he shook hands with us when we left him, but not when we came into his presence.) Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh and Rúhí Effendi sat by the door, and a tall Persian or Turkish man sat near us.

The room we were in had a north window, which looked out over the Bay of 'Akká. Like all the windows in the eastern houses, it had several iron bars across it to keep out intruders. The house is high on the hillside, and there was {{p108}} a wonderful view across the bay. The Master sat on a divan in front of the window, and occasionally arranged some letters and other small objects, which he finally put into a small handbag. As he did this, he talked to us. He said, This location here by the Tomb is very beautiful.

We said, Yes, we enjoy it greatly

Then he talked to us a little about the Báb

He said, After the Báb was martyred, his body was kept in Persia for several years. It was never kept in the same place for more than a few years. Not many of the friends, even, knew where it was at any one time. After a long time it was brought here to Haifa, and placed in the Tomb on Mt. Carmel.

Cora asked how long ago it was brought here. I think the Master's reply was, about twenty-four or twenty-five years ago

Cora asked Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh to say that we hoped that the Master was feeling more rested

He replied, no, he was not rested, but that did not matter. And his expression implied that physical weariness was a matter of small concern.

'Abbás-Qulí brought to the Master a little tray with a teapot full of what looked like tea. The Master poured out some and drank it, explaining {{p109}} that it was a kind of herb drink. Then 'Abbás-Qulí brought us tea in the lovely little Persian glasses. Afterward, he came in with a tray full of things to eat and placed it on a chair in front of us. The Master told us to eat. He says you must eat your breakfast here, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh interpreted. We did not really want to eat — when we could be looking at the Master — but at his command we ate a little. The tray had on it ripe figs, ripe olives, honey, and slices of white bread — and the latter were the only slices of white bread we saw on our whole journey! I ate one or two figs, and a few olives. After a time the tray was passed to the tall Oriental next to us. Thus we had breakfast with the Master at the Tomb of the Báb! As we ate he was silent, looking out of the window upon the sea of 'Akká. His beautiful profile was outlined against the window; his gaze seemed to dwell on distant 'Akká — and I could not but think of those long years of imprisonment that he had spent in barred 'Akká. Some slight vision of all he had suffered swept over me. I knew then, beyond all question, that I had found him as the Master. My spirit knelt in humility at his feet.

After a while, he gave the bag he had been arranging to Rúhí Effendi, and said that he was {{p110}} ready to go down the mountain. We followed him from the house to where Isfandiyar was waiting with the carriage. We had expected to walk down the mountain, but after the Master had ascended to the middle seat, he motioned to us to get in the back seat. And so Cora and I rode down Mt. Carmel with the Lord of our hearts. No word was said, but we were very happy. At the gate of his house he alighted, and, saluting us with uplifted hand, he left us and entered his home!

At the Pilgrim House we found Ru'hi Effendi and Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh, who had walked down and were there before us. Then we ate the breakfast that Fujita had prepared!

SEPTEMBER 5, 1920. This morning, all of us had finished breakfast at about 7:45 and were sitting at the table talking. No, Mírzá Muḥammad-Sa'id had not finished; he had just come in and was waiting for Fujita to bring him some tea.

Suddenly, Mrs. Hoagg said, The Master is coming! She had seen him pass the window! We all rose, just as he entered the door. He came in like a ray of light and life. He {{p112}} sat down at the end of the table, bade us be seated; told Fujita to give Sa'id Effendi his breakfast. But Sa'id Effendi did not eat! He drank the tea Fujita brought, because, as he said later — that was not so hard to do, but he could not eat toast and eggs while the Master was speaking! We quite understood his feeling, as we remembered our experience at the Tomb yesterday morning!

The Master said that he hoped we were well and very happy. Then he asked again if we were well

Mrs. Paine said, We are all very well except Sylvia, who was a little ill in the night, but that is not serious ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: I hope she will soon be well.

Sylvia smiled and nodded and the Master said, That will soon pass away and you will be well again. Then he continued, Your food and rooms are very simple here, but your purpose in coming here makes them seem good to you. When a man is good, all things about him are good. When a man is bad, all things about him are bad. It is necessary that man be very good.

After a pause the Master said, You have {{p113}} come here, and every day you try to improve. You try to improve more each day. You must become pure in heart. Then when you return to America, you must carry spirituality and inspiration with you. You must be like Jacob, who inhaled the fragrance of the garment of Joseph from a distance. But more than that, you must be one who carries the garment, who spreads the fragrances of the Spirit.

Turning to Mrs. Hoagg, the Master told her to take us to church this morning. Then he continued by saying, The purpose of going to the church should be to worship. Turn your hearts to God and worship Him. One can worship God anywhere, in a church, in a mosque, in all places. But here I hope that you will go to the church.

Then he rose, smiled on us, said Goodbye, and walked from the room, and down the steps. We went to the door, and watched him till he disappeared behind the wall.

I think that neither Cora nor myself had said a word all the time he was with us. I do not know how she felt, but for me, there simply was nothing that I could say. To be in his presence, to look on the beauty of his face, to listen to his voice, was all I wished to do. I do not {{p114}} know how or why, but in his presence, all life is lifted higher; it acquires freshness and beauty

Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh translated the Master’s words in this talk.

Following the Master’s request we attended the little Episcopal chapel which is near the Pilgrim House. After our return from there, we called on Ru’ha Khánum for almost an hour, and such a happy time as we had! Her house is just next the Master's, so that she can easily help entertain the Master's guests, and yet look after her own household. She and her two sisters talked with us often, giving us wonderful stories about the Cause and instructing us in many ways. That day she told us about the Master's life, during the Great War; [^26] how he gave food, money and encouragement to all those who sought his help, no matter what their race or religion. The people of the household lived on the simplest food in order that they might have food to share with the hundreds who came begging for bread. She told us, too, how few letters and papers came from the friends all over the world, and how they {{p115}} longed for news of the welfare of the Bahá'ís in the different countries.

[^26] World War I. — ED.

That afternoon after tea, we went over to the Master's house and talked with the ladies for a short time. Then word came that the carriage was ready to take us up the mountain, for the regular Sunday afternoon meeting. Tuba Khánum, and one of her sons, Suhayl, went with us. In front of the Tomb many of the friends were gathered; more than forty, I think. For a time we talked with the people near us. Then Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh brought out the large guest book, and asked us to write in it our names, addresses, the date of our arrival in Haifa, and some word of greeting. Cora wrote, The valley of Achor shall be unto them for a door of hope. Mrs. Paine wrote, Beautiful beyond compare is Mount Carmel, the joy of the whole earth. And I added the sentence from the Hidden Words which I love so much, Lift up thy heart with delight. [^27] On that {{p116}} mountain one learns so much about why one should lift up one's heart with delight.

[^27] Probably, "The Hidden Words, Arabic, No. 62 Shoghi Effendi's translation reads: Lift up thy head from slumber, for the Sun hath risen to the zenith, haply it may shine upon thee with the light of beauty. — ED.

In a short time the Master came from around the eastern corner of the Tomb, followed by little Fu'ad. The Master was radiantly beautiful. He wore a dove-colored overcoat or wrap, for the wind was cool on the mountainside. Fu'ad was dressed in a stiffly starched white dress, and made a staunch little bodyguard for the Master. (Someone told us that one night Fu'ad went up to the Master after supper and said, You go to bed now and rest. I will take my gun and lie across the threshold. If any thieves come, I will scare them away!)

The Master gave us the talk about Elijah, which Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh took down in Persian, and later translated into English, so that we might have a copy of it. At the Tomb that day Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh interpreted for us.

As always the beauty of the Master's face, its power and majesty, held my attention so that it was difficult to listen to what he said. After the talk, the door at the west end of the Tomb was opened, and we all filed past the Master, who anointed our hands with rosewater. Never again will we be able to inhale that special rose fragrance, without the memory {{p117}} of that western entrance and the Master at the door, coming to our minds!

The candles were burning in the glass vases; there was utter stillness except when the Tablet was being chanted; and, as on the previous afternoon, my heart was won by the peace and glory of the place. While the tall, black-robed Bahá'í from 'Ishqabád chanted the prayer of Visitation in Persian, the Master stood in the doorway, and the room was filled with a divine radiance of Love. At the threshold of that Tomb one may lay all burdens down. Life becomes simple and straight because one feels surrounded with Divine Love.

After the meeting in the Tomb the carriage took us back down to the Pilgrim House, and then returned to bring the Master. Cora and I watched for his return for a long time, while the quick twilight faded into darkness. Soon above us, on the mountain, there shone out the light in front of the Tomb, which is lighted every night unless there is very brilliant moonlight. At last, the carriage drew up before the door of the Master's house, and we caught a glimpse of white as he swept down from the high seat, and we heard the murmur of his greeting to the men who were sitting in front of {{p118}} the gate, waiting for the call to go into dinner. So do all the pilgrims linger near his house, hoping that they may but glimpse his face as he passes by them.

That night at dinner, the Master said, I hope the health of the friends is good. Today you went to visit the shrine (the Tomb of the Báb). Are you happy? His smile, his care for our happiness and comfort, would have made anyone happy, and our smiles of reply must have been bright enough to show him a little of how happy we were!

For dessert that night we had grapes, although on every other night we had had watermelon. While we were eating the grapes, he said, His Holiness Christ once was eating grapes. He said, ' I will not eat of the fruit of the vine again until I eat it with you in the Kingdom,[^28] But the grape of the Kingdom is other than these grapes. In the Kingdom there is no bread like this. Now also, I say to you all, we will eat together of the divine bounties, God willing, in the Kingdom — that is, divine food, heavenly food. Its taste is everlasting, Its sustenance is everlasting. God willing, there we all together will eat of that heavenly food. {{p119}}

SEPTEMBER 6, 1920. On Sunday afternoon the Master said to us, Tomorrow, I am sending you to 'Akká! and his smile was light itself.

We left the Pilgrim House at about 8:00 A.M. Diya'iyyih Khánum, Mihrangiz, Riyaz, of the Master's household, and Isfandiyar, called for us. Mrs. Hoagg and we four people added five more to the group. With joy in our hearts we began the two hours' drive to 'Akká. Down through the narrow streets we rode, and then eastward past the railway station. We passed through a grove of tall palm trees, and down to the shore. At last! that beautiful way of the sea, toward the Holy City. 'Akká! How often we had read of the journey along the white sand, where the horses' hoofs play in and out of the water, as they follow the hard-packed sand at the sea's very edge. We watched the waves rush up and then back, sweeping with them tiny sea animals. We passed trains of camels and donkeys, all on the universal highway not made with hands.

We thought of all the happy, longing pilgrims who have gone to 'Akká that same {{p120}} way. Doubly happy were we that our Master was living safely in his own house in Haifa, and not as a prisoner in 'Akká!

Always ahead of us was a glimpse of 'Akká, which shone more clearly as our three horses trotted along the shore. To the East, the hills of Lebanon were purple in the distance.

As we neared 'Akká, Mrs. Hoagg pointed out the walls, the gate, the cemetery where some of the Bahá'ís of that group of exiles are buried. Finally Diya'iyyih Khánun pointed out the tower of the barracks.

Outside the gate we halted, for one of our horses had lost a shoe. The blacksmith was sitting under a tree, with his tools about him. But at Isfandiyar's request he came and put on the needed shoe. While we waited, we looked at the high wall of the city, which showed how much a prison city it had been. The walls were high and thick; the gate was small, and beyond the outer wall was a second inner wall. A long train of camels passed us, going into the city, and one tiny donkey, heavily loaded, came out! People in oriental garb drifted by us, and glanced at us curiously, but not in unfriendly fashion. I remembered the showers of stones from small boys with which the Bahá'í pilgrims to 'Akká {{p121}} used to be greeted, and I meditated on the changes that time brings!

We entered the gate, passed between the two walls for a distance, and on into the town. Isfandiyar stopped the horses at the foot of a long flight of steps. It was the way to the barracks. At the head of the stairway a soldier met us, and conducted us about, for the barracks are now occupied by a few soldiers. This man looked like an Arab, but he was under British orders, I think. He led us through many winding passages, showing us several places in which we had no special interest. But finally he led the way to the tower on the west side of the court, the tower where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned for two long years. Diya'iyyih Khánun told us of the various places associated with Bahá'í history. She showed us the room where Bahá'u'lláh had lived, the window from which He had looked out upon the plain of 'Akká. She showed us the rooms where the immediate family had lived, and the roof from which the Purest Branch [^29] fell. The rooms were small, {{p123}} rude; a sad exchange for the royal palaces of Persia, as far as physical comfort was concerned. Yet joy was there, because they might suffer hardship in the service of God. To have been there in the days of Bahá'u'lláh — for that privilege one might have been able to bear much!

[^29] 'Abdu'l-Bahá's younger brother, Mírzá Mihdí, who fell to his death through a skylight in 1870, while imprisoned in 'Akká with his family. — ED.

Afterwards we crossed the large court, and saw the pool, or reservoir, in the center, from which the exiles obtained the slimy water which was their only drink during the first twenty-four hours of their imprisonment! On the south side of the court we saw the room where most of the exiles were imprisoned. They are like rather wide and long corridors. At present they are quite well lighted, but Mrs. Hoagg said that the British have changed them a great deal, and have let in much more light. When she first saw them, they were very dark and gloomy. And in the days of the Turkish rule, they must have been very dirty, unwholesome and dark. Here amid all manner of privations and sufferings, the band of exiles praised God for having led them to believe in His greatest and newest Manifestation. As we walked about the barracks, Diya'iyyih Khánum told us stories of those early days, making them live again, for our instruction. {{p124}}

After we left the barracks, a few moments' drive brought us to another house [^30] where the Bahá'ís had been imprisoned. Bahá'í families live in it now, and they welcomed us with sweet kindness. We saw the little room where Bahá'u'lláh lived for seven years. In an adjoining house, which now seems to be a part of the first house, the holy family lived for many years more. There Bahá'u'lláh's room has been left as it was when He used it. The windows overlook the sea; to the south there is a view of distant Haifa; to the north, the plain of 'Akká. I think Bahá'u'lláh practically never left the house while they lived there. We hear of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's caring for the physical needs of the friends, as well as it could be done under the very difficult conditions; engaging in trade that he might have money with which to equip a bath; in all ways constantly serving his father!

[^30] The House of 'Abbúd. —ED.

It was to the smaller of these two houses that the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá came from Persia. I am not sure, but I think that some of the daughters were born there

In the family of Bahá'ís who care for these two houses, we met a woman, Sakinih Sulţán, {{p125}} whose husband, at the age of twenty, was a martyr in Persia! When we were there she was probably over fifty years of age. A few years ago, her daughter died leaving a baby boy, Labib, for whom she is now caring.

Whenever one is with these Bahá'ís who have been intimately associated with Bahá'u'lláh or 'Abdu'l-Bahá, one marvels at the spirit of service and self-sacrifice they show. We longed to acquire in its fullness that attitude of evanescent service

It was after eleven when we left the city of 'Akká behind us, and drive toward the Riḍván. We went north of the city wall, toward the east. By strange track-like roads we drove, past gardens walled with cactus plants. It was perhaps a mile and a half or two miles before we came to the Garden — the Riḍván. Just before we reached it we turned to the south, and the road followed a little stream. We passed a water wheel, turned by a small donkey, and later we saw the water he had pumped, as it fell from a fountain in the garden.

At the gate we left the carriage, and Isfandiyyar unharnessed the horses that they might have a well-earned rest

How I had longed to see the Riḍván at {{p127}} ‘Akká! That spot between the two rivers, that garden on an island! It is a place of beauty and peace. Tall palm trees, pomegranate trees loaded with ripe fruit, beautiful vines bearing many-colored blossoms — all add to the beauty of the Riḍván. From the fountain, streams of water run to the north, south, east, and west, watering the plants.

But the place of most wonderful associations is the spot on the side of the stream, where the two great mulberry trees form the tent not made with hands, over land and water. there in the later days, the Blessed Beauty used to sit beneath the trees. It is a place of rest and peace. The troublous word seems very far away. Love and peace are in the wind, in the soft rustling of leaves, and the murmur of the water.

Our lunch was spread on a rug beneath one of the mulberry trees. We ate of the persian foods from the Master’s household, of the fruits from the Riḍván. We were utterly content to sit in that heavenly place and watch Riyaz, and another small boy who had come with us from ‘Akká, sail boats down the tiny stream from the fountain.

After lunch, we all rested for an hour or more, after which we had tea. It was too sweet a place to leave, but the hours were passing, and the supreme goal of our day was still ahead of us — the visit to the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. And so we left the Riḍván, with the prayer in our hearts that we might come again to that lovely garden of our Lord.

We drove to the north, across the rolling ‘Akká plain, till the Bahjí appeared before us. Here Bahá’u’lláh lived after He left ‘Akká. still technically a prisoner, but permitted to live among trees and flowers, instead of being shut in by the dark prison walls. At the Bahjí we turned westward, and soon rounded the corner of a long, low building, where the caretaker of the Tomb lives, Siyyid Abu’l-Qazim. There we alighted, and Diya’iyyih Khánum indicated a small gate into the garden. Slowly, with wonder in our hearts, we followed the path through the garden to the door of the Tomb. In the little outer room we removed our shoes. A short flight of steps brought us into the large room of the Tomb.

We found ourselves in a large room with a garden in the center. At the west end were several windows, and floods of light poured down {{p131}} upon us from the glass windows in the roof. In the northwest corner of the room, a curtained door led into the Tomb itself.

Diya’iyyih Khánum drew aside the curtain, but the door was closed. We knelt in the space before the door, and Diya’iyyih Khánum chanted the Prayer of Visitation. I tried to remember the words of the Tablet of Bahá’u’lláh, Cause me to drink of the cup of evanescence, clothe me in its mantle and immerse me in its sea,[<sup>31</sup>] but my mind seemed almost a blank. I remembered the promise that the prayer one prays in all sincerity at the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh shall be answered. With my whole heart I prayed for evanescence at His Threshold, and for the power to serve His Cause. Then I prayed for various people I knew, who were in need of a vision of the greatness of God's love. And then for the Bahá'í friends in America....

[^31] Shoghi Effendi's translation reads: Give me to drink from the chalice of selflessness,; with its robe clothe me, and in its ocean immerse me. Bahá'í Prayers (1982), p. 235. — ED.

And how I longed to enter that closed door, into the Tomb itself! I remembered that ... {{p132}} and... had been inside and that they had been somewhat surprised at being led in, for they knew that people were not always permitted to enter there. I realized how very far short I fell of the purity of heart of that party of pilgrims. I knew that the Master gives to each one what he most needs. And so it was as though the Master said to me, You have not yet learned enough to appreciate the atmosphere of that inner room. Live the life; serve the Cause; achieve purity of heart. Then perhaps if you return here, the rewards of the pure in heart will be yours! And with my whole mind and spirit I pledged myself to the accomplishment of that task.

We were in prayer at the threshold of the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh for a long time. Finally, Diya'iyyih Khánúm went out toward the outer door. We followed her, ready to leave that place of light. But she returned, went to the front of the room, and opened the curtained door. I do not know why she did it; perhaps Mrs. Hoagg reminded her that it was our visit to the Tomb. But I am sure that in some way, the Master's will entered into it. When I fully accepted his will for me as my guide, acquiesced, then my desire was granted. {{p134}}

The heavy curtains at some of the windows were pulled back, and the setting sun poured a radiant glory of light into the room. His resting-place shall be glorious — with torrents of physical light, as well as with spiritual glory. I do not know how long we knelt there. Time's passing ceased for us. My very breathing was a dedication of myself to our glorious leader, Bahá'u'lláh.

Our drive home was a silent one. I think we were all rather weary, physically, from our long day. But the spiritual significance of all we had seen filled us with so much to think about, that we had no desire for speech.

The sun set in the blue waters of the Mediterranean, in a majesty of color. Darkness came down and shut us in on that crescent sea shore. The horses sped along through the darkness, toward the distant lights of Haifa. We were eager to be again in the Master's presence.

We reached Haifa a short time before the dinner hour, weary, but happy. At dinner that evening the Master said, Did you have a happy day in 'Akká? And we replied, Oh, yes, it is a day we shall always remember

He replied, You must always remember it! It must be like images cut in tablets of stone

That evening, as he bade us good-night, after {{p136}} dinner, he said in his dear, measured English,

Go — and rest! Go — and Rest!

By the Master's love for us, we know something of the love of Bahá'u'lláh. And from the love of Bahá'u'lláh we know of the Love of the Infinite Father, whose voice comes to us through the Supreme Pen: I knew My Love in thee, therefore I created thee; upon thee I laid My Image, and to thee revealed My Beauty. I loved thy creation, therefore I created thee. Wherefore love Me that I may acknowledge thee and in the Spirit of Life confirm thee.[<sup>32</sup>]

[<sup>32</sup>] The Hidden Words, Arabic, Nos. 3 and 4. Shoghi Effendi's translations read:...I knew My love for thee; therefore I created thee, have engraved on thee Mine image and revealed to thee My beauty and I loved thy creation, hence I created thee. Wherefore, do thou love ;Me, that I may name they name and fill thy soul with the spirit of life. — ED.

SEPTEMBER 8, 1920. On the morning of September 8th, I went alone to the Tomb of the Báb at sunrise. Cora had not been sleeping well, and so she did not feel like rising at 4:30 {{p137}} that day. But I woke, dressed and was almost to the Tomb before the sun rose. When his full splendor began to loom above the horizon, I sat down on a stone in the field below the musafir khanih (Pilgrim's House), and watch the lord of day cast his first light across the valley of 'Akká.

After a time I went on up to the Tomb, passing along the path with its beautiful cypress trees. At the Tomb I entered the room on the east side and stayed there in prayer and meditation for almost an hour. The tall Bahá'í from 'Ishqabád came in and knelt in prayer for some time, and then chanted. After he had gone, a younger man whom I did not know came in and chanted very softly and sweetly. He went out and I was alone for some time. The folds of the long veil I wore fell about my face and shoulders, and seemed to shut me in with God. His radiant Presence was very near.

I tried to fill my heart with the exquisite beauty and peace of that heavenly place, for I knew that was my last morning on the mountain. I knew that many and many would be the times that I would long to be kneeling at that Threshold.

Finally, I knew that it was time to be going {{p138}} down the mountain. Just as I was leaving the Tomb, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh came in. I went out into the garden, and walked about a bit, drinking the beauty of flowers, hills, water, and sky. Soon Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh came out and bade me good-morning. Then he suggested that we gather jasmine blossoms to take down to the Pilgrim House. So we pulled off dozens of the fragrant flowers, and filled our pockets and handkerchiefs with them. Later we strewed them on the breakfast table. Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh said that he used to fill a basket full of blossoms, stripping the bushes each morning. He took the basket to the Master, who scattered them everywhere he went.

About 7:00 A.M., we started down the mountain. Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh had a stone bruise on his heel, and was wearing a loose slipper and carrying a cane; but never once did I hear him complain about it. Instead, he talked of how the Master works with no thought of physical fatigue. He works all day long, interviewing callers, etc. He goes to bed possibly by 9:00 or 9:30. but often he is up again at midnight, chanting and praying. Then he may correct Tablets for a while, and then sleep two or three hours more. And at perhaps 6:00 A.M. he rises for the {{p139}} day's work! Apparently, he averages not more than four to six hours of sleep a night! So his whole life is given to the service of mankind.

Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh said, The real Bahá'í activity is not to stay here in the light of the Master's love. It is to go out into the world and spread his message of service. Be happy that you are going out to work for him.

But at another time he said, Pray for us who live here in the Master's household. We have many temptations to guard against. We must never become impatient or give way to any depression. Not long ago when the Master was speaking to us, he said, 'You must be an example to all who come here. In you they must see what a real Bahá'í should be. So we need your prayers that we may live up to that work.

We had thought of the great joy of being a member of the Master's family, but then we began to realize that only those of great unselfishness may be his helpers there in Haifa.

On that beautiful morning, we entered the Pilgrim House before breakfast was quite ready, and strewed the jasmine blossoms over the table

The Master came in after breakfast, and stayed only a few minutes. He smiled at us all, {{p140}} and we were very happy to be near him. He asked especially about Mrs. George's health. He said a few words to her, smiled at all of us, and then rose and left us. We all went to the door and watched him as he disappeared through our gate.

After breakfast, we went over into the Master's garden, and waited for an opportunity to talk with him for a few moments. After a while Rúḥá Khánum called Mabel and Sylvia in to see him. While they were gone we stood talking with Mrs. Hoagg and some of the young men. I shall not forget the look on Mrs. Hoagg's face when she spoke of the Master's longing for unity among the friends. His only happiness is to know of the increase of unity among the believers, and of their spreading the Cause. His face always becomes sad if he hears of any contention or lack of harmony. If people in America could see the Master, could realize how he works, they would never do anything to sadden him, she said. When one is in the Master's presence it seems utterly impossible that one should every do anything that would sadden, or make any heavier the load of work he carries! In the light of his holy presence, all desire dies save the desire to be like him. {{p142}} translated for us. We gave the Master the letters we had brought from American friends. We asked him to bless the ringstones and rosaries we had bought at Mírzá ‘Ináyatu’lláh’s shop. He took them in his hands, said a few words that must have been a prayer, kissed them, and handed them back to us. And so we brought back to America Bahá’í ringstones made doubly precious by his touch of love.

The Master said that he was sorry not to have seen us more, but that he had been very busy while we were there. But, he continued, it is not the length of time that one spends here that is important. Some people stay a short time, and then go and do great service. Other people are here a long time, and they learn nothing. There is some wood that is very dry; it catches fire quickly and burns well. There is other wood that is so wet that it will not burn even though you should try for a whole day. There is no result but smoke. It will not blaze, it will not keep any one warm; it will not even cook anything! As he said the latter he smiled. But when Rúhá Khánum translated it, Cora laughed out loud. That seemed to de {{p143}} light the Master, for he laughed very heartily with the most unaffected enjoyment.

Cora asked how one should teach the Bahá’í Movement to our United States southerners, among whom race prejudice is so strong. He said, Go slowly at first. Be kind and courageous and patient. Live the Bahá’í life among these people. Do not mind if they oppose you. Their prejudice is so strong. It is like a religion. But when they become Bahá’ís they will be very good and sincere ones. But at first teach the principles and be kind to them. The rest will follow in time.

After this, we went and talked with some of the ladies of the household. Soon the Master called for Mabel and Sylvia, and gave Sylvia a Bahá’í name, Badiyyih, which means something new and wonderful. We were not present when he gave her the name, but Mabel said that he walked up and down the room, radiating power and love.

When Sylvia came back with her new name, the Holy Mother brought out a box of candy, in honor of Sylvia’s nameday. The candy was white with a little chocolate center. Bringing it out in Sylvia’s honor was one of the sweetest, kindest acts of simple thoughtfulness that we {{p144}} saw in Haifa. Needless to say, Sylvia Badi’iyyih Paine was a very happy girl that day.

It was on that morning that the Greatest Holy Leaf showed us the pictures of Bahá’u’lláh and the Báb. We had already seen pictures of the Báb, and so I think most of our attention was centered on the photograph of Bahá’u’lláh. The pictured face was of dignity, power and majesty. But the feeling of the power, the glory, the supreme Reality of Bahá’u’lláh which came to me in Haifa, did not come from seeing His photograph. That Reality is living and vibrant in the unselfish lives of the friends; it makes radiant the atmosphere of the Tomb on Mt. Carmel and the Tomb at Bahjí; it shines from the Master’s eyes.

Later in the morning, Cora and I were sitting on a bench in the garden, just below the window of the Master's writing room. Occasionally his voice floated down to us, as he dictated or talked with a caller. Once he came out of the house, and walked to the corner of the garden, where some masonry was being done. Soon he returned, and his voice was again heard from his room. Such brief glimpses made us very happy, for he radiates such life that one is {{p145}} lifted toward supreme joy just to know he is near. In his Essence he is so detached from earthly things, he is so different from all human beings one has ever seen, he is Love incarnate.

Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh came and talked with us for a while, and told us stories about the European Bahá'ís whom he had visited not long ago. Other friends passed and stopped for a word. It was a perfect morning and we were sorry when the lunch hour called us back to the Pilgrim House.

After dinner that evening, Rúḥá Khánum took us to receive the Master's farewell. I can remember very little of what he said. He told us that his love and thoughts and prayers would go with us. He sent his love and greetings to all the Bahá'ís in America.

I knew that I should not see him again, but I felt no sadness or grief. His love was too great: it poured in a radiant flood about me, and held me suspended in a priceless moment, when time stood still, and I lived in eternity. His eyes were glorious stars of light and love. No words can express their beauty.

He shook hands with us in parting. When he said good-bye to Sylvia, he smiled down at her {{p146}} and said, Sylvia! — Badiyyih Khánum! — Miss Badiyyih! — and his voice was filled with the most affectionate and sweet laughter!

Thus we left the Master's house, that wonderful home, of which he has said, My home is the home of peace. My home is the home of joy and delight. My home is the home of laughter and exultation. Whoever enters through the portals of this home must go out with gladsome heart.

Next morning, before daybreak, we ate our last meal in the Pilgrim House and said farewell to our happy housemates there. Sa'íd Effendi, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh, Rúḥí Effendi, and faithful Isfandiyar and his horses, took us to the train which left at 6:00 A.M. We had a half-hour's talk with the young men before the train pulled out — but of that time I remember clearly one thing. Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh turned to us as he said good-bye, and added, Be good! Be good! The he smiled and said, You know what I mean! And no one who had seen the members of the Master's household for a week could fail to know that to be good is love and service and the spreading of the ideals that the Master teaches. {{p148}}

In the Hidden Words Bahá'u'lláh has said, If thou run with all immensity and speed through the space of heaven, thou shalt find no rest save in obedience to Our Command and in devotion before Our Face [^33] In Haifa one learns, as never before, the meaning of that sentence. The will to obey, a longing for devotion, are born in one's heart and spirit.

[^33] The Hidden Words, Arabic, No. 40. Shoghi Effendi's translation reads:

Wert thou to speed through the immensity of space and traverse the expanse of heaven, yet thou wouldst find no rest save in submission to Our command and humbleness before Our Face. — ED.

Since we left the Master's home, the days and weeks and months fly past, and are filled with many duties; many calls to help in the work of the world. But the beauty of the Master's face is with us. In the light of His Holy Presence all desires die save the desire to be like Him

Feb. 27, 1907.

We reached Haifa on Monday evening, having taken ship at Alexandria Saturday afternoon.

The trip from Port Sa'íd was very, very beautiful and the sea was perfectly calm. As we neared Mt.

Carmel the sun shone so beautifully on the point, making a picture never to be forgotten. Fresh verdure and new life began to be manifest, and, after landing, Cook's man drove us to the Carmel House and there we breathed the most delicious air of quiet and peace, our hearts praising God that He had, in His Mercy, permitted us to come to the New Holy City, the New Jerusalem, to the King of Kings, enthroned in the hearts but imprisoned as far as the material world goes.

We remained two nights and a day in Haifa and the weather was most favorable for seeing the beauties of Haifa. The same day of our arrival the Holy Mother had driven into Haifa to see Rhooah Itharrain who is living, for the present, in Madame Jackson's new house. The two sons-in-law of The Master care to the hotel for us to bring us to see the ladies and Mírzá Asadu'lláh. We were almost beside ourselves with the joy of realizing that actually and truly we were in Haifa, with 'Akká just across the bay ever in sight, and, further, to have the great privilege of seeing the Holy Mother and the daughter, was almost more than the capacity of the limited heart could endure. We went back to the hotel after a-half hour's visit with these holy souls. The moon was all but full and the entire setting seemed like heaven itself. We fell asleep on our pillows perfectly intoxicated with the realization that at last we were to visit the One whose Holy Utterances we had been feeding our souls upon for the past eight years. Sleep was very sweet that night, and, upon arising the next morning, we looked out of our bedroom windows to see 'Akká across the blue sea and Camel's point bathed in the new morning's sunshine – a veritable landscape dream almost too beautiful to belong to earth.

During the forenoon our traveling companion, whom we had met for the first time at Port Sa'íd, was kind enough to chaperon Arna, taking a carriage drive while I looked after certain packages and letters for the friends in Haifa. They had but just left MR and turned the corner when Mírzá Ameen's brother came to the hotel to escort us to Mírzá Asadu'lláh's home. I had to go alone because I did not know where to find Madame Scaramucei and Arna. Mírzá Assadtu'llah, his wife, two sons and a daughter greeted me with great warmth, asking many questions about the friends in America and the progress of the Temple. The work which Chicago had been doing was clearly explained to him and he said it was well we had made it an American movement and he hoped it would be built by the believers of the world. He commended our wisdom in referring the location to The Master. The Holy Mother and the daughter Rhooah came to call, also a sister of the Holy Mother, who lives in Haifa. Coffee and cookies were served, and, after quite a visit, I went back to the hotel and found Arna and the Bahá'í sister had returned and were wondering where I could be.

At half past two we went to Madame Jackson's home, which is called the home of 'Abbás Effendi, to meet Rhooah Khánúm who had invited us to drive with her to the Holy Tomb of the Báb on the side of Mt. Carmel.

The blessed Master's carriage drove up for us and our hearts almost beat aloud to realize we were to drive in his carriage, with his beautiful daughter, to that Holy Tomb of the Báb, which every believer in the world knows about. Not only is its architecture very remarkable, but its location is positively commanding, built upon the solid rock of the great mountain, very high up from the sea and looking down the main avenue of Haifa, which leads direct to the sea; a stone pier or landing having been built a few years ago for the Emperor of Germany, who visited the Holy Land, entering by way of Haifa because here is a large German settlement that originally came to Hs.ifa because they had reckoned from prophecies that this is the part of the Holy Land from which the Voice of God will be proclaimed at the second coming of Christ.

A great interest existed in our hearts to see thoroughly this wonderful Tomb, and it had grown out of the work we had been doing for our Temple. After seeing its massive walls and solid masonry, we did not wonder that the Turkish Government had conceived the idea that The Master was building a great military fort. This Tomb is built to last for at least. 8000 years, and one can quite believe it will after seeing it. There is quite a flower garden in front of this building and the wife of the keeper gathered a lovely bunch of red roses and brought them as a gift to us and later she came with a handful of violets. After Rhooah Khánúm had explained the inner rooms – three in breadth, and, when complete, three in depth, we came out of the building to find this dear little keeper's wife had placed four chairs in front of the building and was waiting to serve us a cup of Persian tea, and we sat in that wonderful place, looking over to 'Akká and down to Elijah's cave and the enormous sweep of the bay, and we knew there was nowhere else on earth such a place. The Mercies of God, in this His Greatest Day, are so overwhelming that they are like a consuming fire. All of this had come to us in two days and we had not yet been to 'Akká. I said to our companion Bahá'í sister: "What must it be in the days before us if we have only touched, as it were, the hem of the garment?"

Another perfect moonlight night and a delicious sleep brought us to this morning. We had not received the word from 'Akká to come, but were expecting it. We were dressing for breakfast when a knock was heard at our door, and, upon opening, Mírzá Ameen's brother was seen, bringing to us the glad tidings that we might take Cook's carriage and go to the house of The Master this morning. After selecting the necessary clothing and packing our suit cases, leaving our trunks with Cook, we hired a sort of omnibus carriage with three horses to pull us, and started from Haifa at 10 o'clock.

The ride to 'Akká has been described by several pilgrims, but must be frank to say no mortal can possibly picture it to himself; he must actually take it to get any idea of its beauty. After getting through the narrow streets of old Haifa, we drove to the shores of the sea. The entire drive is on the sandy beach and nearly all the time the driver would be driving partly in the sea because it was firmer and easier for the horses. Twice on the way we had to drive out into the sea in order to ford two streams which are not bridged, the water coming almost into the wagon bed. One little word which The Master had said to Mrs. Lucas, when she made the same pilgrimage, kept our hearts in perfect peace, and that word was this: "Love knows no fear."

To an American, with everything so open and free about our cities, the entrance into 'Akká is something grewsome indeed and had we not known who was within its walls and under the shelter of whose roof we were to be domiciled, we would have fled with terror. A prison city which is truly named "The Greatest Prison."

We were greeted at the entrance by The Master's son-in-law and another believer and kindly escorted to our room and our luggage placed there for us. We were left alone for a few minutes. Then a messenger rapped and inquired if Monevrea Khánúm might come to see us. We freshened ourselves up after the long, windy drive and were happy to greet The Master's youngest daughter. She came to us so sweetly with those wonderful soulful bright eyes, bearing in her hand three beautiful roses plucked and sent to us by The Master with his welcome.

In a few minutes more The Master himself came into our room and we met him at the door, kissing his hand as he entered. He is absolutely nothing like the picture in America. Once, when first I came into the knowledge of the Revelation, I dreamed of attaining the great meeting and of bringing one of my daughters. The personage I saw in my dream was not like the picture, so for several years I had fancied it must be Bahá'u'lláh. Today, when The Master entered, there was the One whom I had seen in vision, and, also, I had brought one of my girls, and it is Arna. He came in so naturally and easily, bringing us again a handful of hyacinths, purple and pink. He spoke many words of welcome to us and said it made him so happy to see the east and the west becoming so united; that the time was, and not long since, that an Occidental was greatly hated by the Orientals, but now, through the power of the Word of God, which alone can thus unite the hearts, the east and west were loving each other very much, and he hoped it would increase day by day.

He said each believer has a certain time when he should make the desired visit, each having a certain work to do for the progress of the Cause. He hoped all would eventually attain to the meeting. After a few such explanations, he left us and the young daughter and another Persian believer's wife (the brother of Aḥmad and. Muḥammad Yazdí) joined us and talked with us until dinner was announced. When this sister came to us she brought us each a beautiful tangerine sent to us by The Master. How we longed to be able to keep these flowers and this fruit for our brothers and sisters in America, who are thinking of us these precious days spent in the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá!

At dinner, which was served for us in the small dining room into which our room opens, The Master took each by the hand, giving us seats, placing Arna on his right as his guest of honor. The meal was served in courses by a Japanese believer who is serving as a servant in The Master's home. The Master would take a bite or two and then give us beautiful lessons. He spoke of the difficulties the first Christians had in visiting John the Baptist while in prison. They were greatly persecuted and ridiculed for it. Then he showed how good and really necessary were these tests. As an illustration, he compared a ship on the sea, tossed about by the wind, and the wares, laden with cargo. No one on that ship, perhaps, is even comfortable, but the ship, nevertheless, brought food to the people and thus was the cause of life. So man must have the winds and waves of test in order that life be brought to the people. As no food could be had unless the wind and waves brought it, so no spiritual food can be had without the first workers in the Cause suffer tests. One point he particularly made was that in Jesus' time the people came to test Jesus, but they did not know that He came to test them instead of their testing Him.

At six o'clock yesterday afternoon

The Master came to our room to call on us and gave us very beautiful teachings and then said sore of the officials of 'Akká had come to call on him, so he could not take tea with us. We saw no more of him until this morning. Monevah Khánum came for us at 7:30 to come to the early morning gathering of the family, when tea is served and all chant from the Holy Utterances. A very dear little boy, the son of Ḥusayn Yazdí, only about six years old, chanted so sweetly. He came in so noiselessly, kneeling near the door, and sat with hands folded, listening until The Master requested him to chant. Then The Master praised him greatly and called him to come to him and gave him a handful of flowers. After visiting with the women of the household, the Greatest Holy Leaf, the mother and four daughters and two Russian pilgrims from 'Ishqábád, for half an hour or so, we went to breakfast with Monevah Khánum.

In the course of an hour The Master sent for me to come to him and bring with me the letters and photographs which I had brought from America. Monevah Khán took me to a room into which I had not been and, there he was waiting for me. I gave him the numerous letters and then the photographs which he enjoyed immeasurably and said they were a most acceptable present to him. The roll of names for the Temple lay beside me, wrapped in a piece of wrapping paper, and before I had gotten to it to give it to him, he said that was for the Mashrek-el-Askar, - showing how well he knows everything. After I had explained the long list of names to him, he patted me on the back and said I had done well and ever after this I was to be his daughter just as if I were Monevah Khánum, his own daughter. His satisfaction at the work we have done toward the Temple seemed to fill him with great joy. I asked him about the location and he said it must be built away from the stores and business portion of the city. Then the lay of the city was explained to him and the question was asked whether it was advisable to locate back from the business portion or on the lake side and he replied the lake shore would be more beautiful for the location, as it must be in a very beautiful place. We must have as large a piece of land as we could get. Then he went into another room and brought to me a ground plan and said it must be like that. First the building, with nine sides, in the middle; then a circular court about that; leading from this circle was to be nine avenues; between each a garden, and in the middle of each garden a fountain of water. He said it would take much to build the Temple, but we must have meetings about the work, labor hard and pray to God and He would bless our efforts. The question of the design of the architecture of the building was asked and r. Remey's kind Offer to help us in this was mentioned. He said several must consult together and not simply one person's plans accepted. He said the Temple was the greatest matter today for the upbuilding of the Cause. When asked w7nat was the means of bringing the greatest unity among the believers, he said:

First, the character of the teachers, and

Second, the work for the Temple.

The teachers must so live that their deeds would teach the people even if they did not teach by word of mouth. The teachers are of the first importance; .their lives must be examples.

The Master gave glorious promises for the Chicago believers. He said very great souls should come from our Assembly, teachers who would not only light America, but other countries like China and Japan and the whole world. He said he was pleased with the work in Chicago – it was “khaili khoob.”

Our third day at ‘Akká March 1, 1907.

We arose very early this morning to join The Master's family in their meeting. After the chanting was finished and each one had been served to a cup of tea, we went back to our rooms. The Master had some Syrian bread and a little cheese served him and a cup of tea. This was his entire breakfast. We were served a nice breakfast about 8 o'clock and when nearly through eating, Monevah Khánum came to us to know if we desired to see The Master giving to the poor, as was his custom every Friday morning. When we went to our windows which overlook a big court yard, there we saw between two and three hundred men, women and children gathered. Such a mottled crowd one can see only in these parts. There were blind, cripples and very feeble persons, the poorest clad collection of people that the earth almost contains. One man had his clothing made of a patched quilt, an old woman had gunny sacking for a cloak; children were so ragged that their clothing would scarcely stay on them.

Two or three of the men believers were with The Master and the people were required to arrange themselves orderly about two sides of the court and The Master began near the gate, giving into the hand of each some piece of money and then each was required to pass out. It was a sight never to be forgotten to see The Master going from one to another, saying some word of praise or kindness to encourage each. With some he would stop to inquire into their health and he would pat them on the back, – these poor, dirty looking creatures, – and once in a while we would see him send someone away empty handed and he would reprimand them for their laziness. How clear and musical his voice sounded as he went from one to another, giving and praising! The men accompanying him kept order in great kindness, but firmness, and saw that each passed on as soon as he had received from The Master. Where, O where on this globe can one duplicate such a scene as is enacted every Friday morning in the court yard of The Master of ‘Akká, who is a state prisoner to the Turkish government and has lived in prison cities since he was nine years of age!

It is the Muḥammadan Sunday and we have heard all day from the Moslem minarets the loud chanting of the Musselmen. But – saw we any one gathering the poor, the lame, the blind and halt in his own court yard and giving to them freely of what God had bestowed upon him and living with the bare necessities himself? If this is not the resurrection of the pure spirit of the humble Nazarene of 1900 years ago, then we need not look elsewhere, for its every appearance stamps it as such. Even the condition and costumes of the beggars bespeak the return.

After this crowd had been given to, I chanced to pass by The Master’s door and I saw he was lying on his bed, very tired, but he saw me and would have his daughter bring me in and he said: “These are my friends; my friends. Some of them are my enemies, but they think I do not know it, because they appear friendly, and to them am very kind, for one must love his enemies and do good to them.” The Master explained that there really was not work for the poor of ‘Akká, only two avenues being open for them to earn, one by fishing and the other by carrying heavy loads. Yesterday, and for two or three days, the sea has raged madly so that no fishing could be done, and it requires great strength to carry heavy loads. He knows the impostors and will not encourage mendicancy, and as he passes them he rebukes them for laziness and idleness and tells them where they can go to obtain work. He said humanity was one great whole and they must help and sympathize with each other and develop the laws of attraction between the hearts. He said, “Look at this great universe with the sun, moon and planets all revolving in harmony; it is because of the great laws of attraction holding and binding them. Man must work to increase this love for his kind.”

The work done by the Chicago Assembly of Teaching in providing the Bahá’í home for Mrs. Holcomb’s three grandchildren was described to The Master and he was greatly delighted, saying in English and with much force, “beautiful! beautiful!” He said to look after the orphans was one of the very first works for the believers.

The orphans are God’s children and a great test upon the people. I asked him if the grandmother should keep the children with her and he said while they were small and then the believers should take them into their homes, train, educate them and teach them the Revelation. I explained that the Temple movement of this winter seemed to be brought about by our arising to help these orphans, and he smiled and said yes, God blesses us for doing good works every time.

After this he excused himself to attend to a large pile of Tablets he had been writing. Not one moment of the day is wasted by this Mighty Man of God.

At 12:30 he came for us to come to dinner with him. He had been to the Muḥammadan Mosque in the meantime. At the meal the explanation of the cloven tongues of fire descending upon the disciple after the crucifixion, and their being able to speak all tongues, was asked. The son-in-law took it down and Monevah will see that it is correct and give it to me for the believers.

I asked The Master if the fruit was the mystery of the tree that bore it and he said no, it was the mystery of the earth; that there was a germ or little forms of life in the soil, which was acted upon by the water and fed by the earth, and this was taken up by the roots, the trees having a circulation. The leaves expose the sap of the tree to the sun and this colors the fruit. A tree will bear fruit if the leaves are cut off, but it will be poor and colorless.

During the afternoon the Greatest Holy Leaf and the oldest daughter came to call on us in our room which is very large and pleasant, with windows overlooking the sea. We asked her to tell us a little of her experiences in the life time of the Blessed Perfection. She was only six years old when their exile began and she said her mother had the greatest suffering, for she had little children. Then they were exiled to ‘Akká, seventy seven were put onto a steamer that was so dirty that it made them all very ill. They were given no food for four days and slept on deck. Only The Master and the Blessed Perfection could summon up courage to sit down and rest. The others were so distressed by the filth that they walked up and down the boat all the time. After four days they reached a city and two or three of the men were allowed to go in and buy some food. One believer was very ill and they wished to cook a little broth for him, but the captain of the boat would not allow even that, so they had to go without. When they landed they were taken in small boats to ‘Akká and all the seventy seven were put into a small prison, the door locked on them and no food provided for the, . The Greatest Holy Leaf said in the midst of such fearful calamities they were so happy to be in ‘Akká, even in prison with no food, just because they were not separated from the Blessed Perfection. The women were not prisoners, but went into exile and imprisonment in order to be with Bahá'u'lláh and. 'Abdu'l-Bahá – that was more than food or comfort.

After a short visit, the Greatest Holy Leaf left us and said she would come often if only she could speak English with us. Someone came in a few moments later and brought Madame Scaramucei and me, each, a little bottle of attar of roses from the Greatest Holy Leaf.

The older daughter remained for a little visit with us and told us of poor Nabíl. He loved Bahá'u'lláh so much that, after His departure, he said he could not stay in this world. For three months he was so disconsolate. At last he wrote a beautiful poem, telling all that was in his heart, and gave it to a believer to give to The Master, but thin believer forgot to give it right away. All that night the family heard someone walking about the Holy Tomb and chanting prayers. The next morning he went to the sea, and, leaving his clothing on shore, drowned himself. No one knew of it and they searched for him all over the mountains and around. Then his clothing was found and in four days his body was washed up and it was identified. When the poem was read by The Master, it was found in it that he could not stay on earth any longer – he loved and yearned so for Bahá'u'lláh.

One of the daughters dressed Arna as a Persian woman and took her down into the streets of 'Akká and up into the pinnacle of the Mosque where the men go to pray and chant. Madame Scaramucei had a call from The Master, but it was such a busy day he did not come to us. After supper the women of the family' were gathered in their parlor and desired us to join them. Thus there The Master came in and said we were blessed indeed to be able to come to 'Akká. There are two kinds of visits, - one the person comes very thirsty and the water will taste very sweet to him; the other will be that the person is not thirsty and the water will be bitter. The latter visit would much better not be made. We could not now realize what our visit meant; it was like a seed, which would sprout and grow later and bear fruits that would endure throughout eternity.

Saturday, March 2, 1907

Arising early I went into the living room where The Master meets with his family every morning, between six and seven o'clock. The widow of one of the martyr's sits on the floor, in the Persian style, and makes and serves the tea every morning. Her husband was one of three brothers who were imprisoned for this Cause. They came and took them to prison and for days they had no news about them. One day they heard a great noise in the street, and, looking out, they saw three heads placed on long poles and being carried through the streets, and when in front of their home they tossed these heads into their mother's room. She wiped them off with water and then threw them back, saying: "What I have given to God I will not take back." This woman who makes the tea, had been married only one year to one of these brothers. Having lost all of her relatives through the persecutions, and Persian women having no openings for self-support, The Master took her into his household. That a wonderful household this is - over forty people living here in one home, some black, some white, Arabic, Persian, Japanese, Italian, Russian and now English and American! Not a loud command has been heard and not one word of dispute; not one word of fault finding. Everyone goes about as if on tip toes. Then they enter your room their slippers are left before the door and they come in with stocking feet and remain standing until you invite them to sit down. All the family and the servants gather in this one room every morning and chant the Holy Utterances and drink a cup of Persian tea. After this we go to our various rooms, and for the guests a breakfast is served later. The two little Arabic girls who are serving in The Master's home, and are being educated by him, came in about ten o'clock and had an English lesson from Arna. They are trained to do housework and also go to school to an Italian teacher The Master hires to teach the children of his household.

At the table the question of the meaning of Babel and the confounding of tongues was asked and The Master said it meant the confusion of ideas, each one having his own idea and this brought destruction. Also, the meaning of Babylon was asked and The Master said Babylon signified the old religions, as Jerusalem signified the New Dispensation. A comparison of the words in English, similar to many Persian words, was made by The Master and he said the Persians were the old Aryan race starting beyond the Oxim sea(?). As they increased they pushed west to Persia, then to Constantinople; from there over Europe and then to America. The origin of the North American Indian was asked and The Master said they came from the eastern side of Asia when the land between western America and Asia (Siberia) was connected. There has been much more land than there is now.

When The Master came to call on us about six o'clock in the evening, Madame Scaramucci asked him if she might remain his guest until Monday. He replied yes - he would love to keep us for a month, but that the present Governor of 'Akká is not his friend and it - was better that we remain a short time. He said we would better all depart together, as we had come together (Madame Scaramucci, my daughter Arna and myself). Then he said there were two kinds of visits, - one the temporal which sooner or later must terminate, and the other the spiritual which never terminates throughout eternity. Once he had a guest for eleven years. Although that was a long visit, yet it finally came to an end. The temporal visit has no effect unless it be the spiritual also.

A lesson on the seeing of a halo about The Master.

The Master said there were four kinds of light; the light from the lamp was one; but because the face of a man does not give out light as the lamp does, is man less than the lamp or greater? Some worms give off a light - is man or the worm greater? Man does not give out such a light, but man has the kingdom of the mind and it is the light of this kingdom which some see when they love a person very much, and they mistake it for a material light when it is not. This comes from the emotional nature and is an imagination. Then there is the Light of the Holy Spirit possessed by God's Chosen Ones. The minds of men cannot comprehend this Light thus they martyr those who come with this Light. But time proves that their Light was the true Light and the light of the minds of the men of their time was limited. They comprehend the past, present and future and see things as they will be when accomplished. St. John, on the Isle of Patmos, seeing into the future, foretold what would come to pass in this present Day. There is no time to this Light – it knows all things.

Dearest Aimes: {.greet}

One month ago our hearts were being torn asunder because we had to leave the Presence of our Lord 'Abdu'l-Bahá. We had spent six memorable days under His blessed roof as His guests, and each day we loved it more and more until, when the six days were up, it just seemed as if we could not say goodbye and go away from the kind, loving Master, whose very footsteps and tones of voice we had learned to listen for on the atoms pavement of the court upon which our roost opened. It is a remarkable thing how all these little things weave a golden network of love about the heart, and you forget the world and all its burdens and cares, and think only of the beautiful Master and His Holy Words, every one carrying a marvelous lesson with it which expands and expands in meaning as you apply its heavenly significance to the objects of life. We felt our littleness all the time while there, not because we were made to feel this but because in the Presence of so great a Light our capacity dwindled to a mere atom. Our Lord only tells us how good we are, and how we have served the Cause, and how much He thinks of us because we are sincere and faithful; but all the time you feel your lips are sealed for some reason.

The life lived and not preached in what creates the wonderful atmosphere of that Home. It is natural and normal and easy. No one ever criticises or finds fault with anyone - they only see the good in everyone, even those who have made the prison life for them.

When we landed in Naples we found, a letter from Mr. True, telling us that the Agnews would sail on the Republic, March 16th. We looked up their arrival and planned to surprise them by being there. The ship was two days late and all kinds of reports came to us of her having broken down at sea and I don't know what all. Anyway, early Easter Sunday morning the proprietor of war hotel notified us the Republic was in and we must hurry down. We jumped into a cab and went flying to the boat landing and there we had the surprise of our lives. Instead of just the Agnew family, we found also Charlie Scheffler and Mr. Chase. None of them knew we were in the town either, so the surprise was equally great to both sides. After a few delays all secured rooms at our hotel and we were one happy family. I tell you, Aimee, we see each other's faults tremendously when working closely together; but after a little separation these faults fade away and the noble qualities shine brighter and brighter. It was just as if the members of the party were one soul that we met that Easter Sunday in Southern Italy on the beautiful blue Bay of Naples. Our joy was unbounded. Even Arna was aflame as much as anyone else. Her joy was intense. We had a very long and wondrously beautiful street car ride overlooking that bay which is world-famed for its beauty. At the end of the car line we walked some distance to point of broad views up and down the coast and here we found a restaurant and all had coffee lemonade and cake o fulfilled literally Jesus' injunction: "Ye must become as little children. We ate cake and drank lemonade like a lot of boys and girls, every few minutes exclaiming isn't this too good to be true, that five of us from our home Assembly sat together there, some going to the Blessed Master and some returning from the Holy Visit! You can picture the feelings of us all. We spent the day delightfully together, had dinner at 7:30 in the evening. After the little boy had been put to bed and was fast asleep, we all met in Mrs. Agnew's room and it was nearly twelve o'clock before we adjourned to our various apartments. Arna had bought some fancy cakes and about eleven o'clock we made these disappear quickly. Need I tell you what we were talking about till so late that night! It was 'Akká and the Master and the wonderful believers we had met along the line and the people on the ship we had spoken to of the Glad Tiding.

Next morning, Monday, April 1st, all got up early to see Arna and me to the depot, for we felt we must be on our way to reach Paris and tendon in title for two meeting in each city before sailing home.

When we asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá about returning, He told us to come through Egypt and Italy and Paris and London. To be as a refreshing breeze to the believers in whatever place we found them.

We are travelling hurriedly through Italy and hope to reach Paris in about a week. Arna is enjoying Rome greatly. We go to Venice on Saturday morning.

I have a terrible cold on my lungs and it being a rainy day, I have remained in the hotel this afternoon while Arna is out sight-seeing with one of Cook's personally conducted parties. I was with them this morning. I have the thought of Honore Jaxon so many times here in Rome – of how he would enjoy the ancient ruins and their wonderful architecture.

We sail for Boston April 26th, by the White Star boat, the Arabic. About the middle or last of May, God willing, I hope to see all the loved faces of the Chicago Assembly.

Love to each and every one. {.sig}

Questions

Question: What is the significance of the word “He is God” which appears as the heading of every tablet and letter? {.question}

Answer: This is a usage of the people of the East; it is of Islám. Their purpose is that in every matter the commencement should be in the Name of God (i. e., everything we do must begin with the Name of God). As to its observance in the divine tablets, the purport is this: The reality of the Divine Entity is holy above comprehension, beyond definition, and far from the reach of imagination, for that which is imagined is finite, of man, and thereto man is infinite; and certainly the infinite is greater than the finite. Therefore, it is made evident that what is imagined is a creation and not the Creator, for the Essence of Divinity is beyond human imagination.

Now all people worship an imagination, for they have created a God in the realm of imagination and him they worship. If you ask a soul, {{p4}} when he is praying, who art thou worshiping? He will say, God. Which God? The God of my conception. When, in truth, what he imagines is not God. Hence, all people are worshipers of imaginations and ideals. Consequently, there is no pathway or escape for man except the Holy Manifestations, for, as we said the Essence of Divinity is pure, is holy and cannot be brought into the world of ideas. That which can be brought to ideation are the Holy and Divine Manifestations. Further than this, man has no other point for concentration. If he exceed that bound, it will be an imagination.

Therefore, the purpose of the word “He is God” is this: That visible Majesty (the prophet) is the Promised Beauty of the Sun of Reality, the Manifestation of the mysteries of Divinity and Deity, the Revealer of the mysteries of the Merciful, the Origin of the signs of singleness. And I begin with His Blessed Name.

Question: What is the meaning of the disciples having spoken in all tongues? {.question}

Answer: The disciples taught in the language of the Kingdom. That language (or tongue) is the equivalent of all languages, for the Word of the Kingdom is an expression of heavenly significances and heavenly mysteries. Whosoever attains it, to him the realities and mysteries of creation are clear. The heavenly significances are the comprehensive reality of all tongues. Therefore, the Holy Spirit having delivered to the disciples the tongue of the Kingdom, they become conversant with the tongues of all nations. With whomsoever among the nations and peoples of the world they conversed, they proved to be co-linguists. Moreover, the known and taught languages of the present exceed a thousand tongues in number. Had the disciples known the literal languages, they should have, at least, transcribed the Gospel in the tongue of some one of the nations, while as a matter of fact it was written only in the Hebraic and the Greek. The Gospel was not even written in the Roman tongue which was at that time an official language, since the government was in the hands of the Romans. As the disciples were not proficient in the Roman tongues they did not write the Gospel therein. {{p5}}

When His Holiness Abraham was ordained, when he established the Law of God, promulgated the new teachings and expounded the Divine mysteries, the tribes of Athur and Chaldea were wont to say: This is mere imagination and a story, a concept in the realm of thought which will not be realized in the outside world. They even said: It is sheer ignorance. They considered themselves the people of intellect and discernment.

It was only a short time after when it became evident that what His Holiness Abraham was saying was reality itself and their thoughts imagination, for in a short period the teachings of Abraham were established outwardly, the Holy Land was dedicated to his posterity, the foundation of the Law of God was laid; His Holiness Isaac and Jacob stepped into the plane of existence; His Holiness Joseph became the dear one of Egypt; His Holiness Ishmael was blessed and enlightened Mt. Paran.

Moses, the Interlocutor, appeared and in the desert of Sinai he witnessed the burning fire of God in the most verdant tree; he rescued the Israelites from the oppression and bondage of the Copts and led them to the Holy Land through the blessings of his teachings and law, which were suitable and agreeable to that period, and thus a great nation was organized.

With this perfect example (experience) before the people, it became evident that they had committed a mistake. Notwithstanding this they did not learn the lesson or heed the counsel. Nay, rather, when His Holiness Moses came, the people again sinned (lit., made a mistake), for the people of Pharaoh called the teachings and the law of His Holiness Moses illusion and of no importance. They considered their own thoughts reality.

Nevertheless in a short time it became clear and evident that what His Holiness Moses said was reality because it came to pass; the Law of God was fully established and became the cause of the honor and progress of all the Israelites. But the thoughts and conceptions of the Copts, the people of Pharaoh, were sheer imagination.

In sooth this was the second experience (lit., trial) and yet the people did not accept the warning and did not awaken, but rather remained in ignorance and negligence until His Holiness Christ with a smiling face and an eloquent tongue appeared, diffused the fragrances of the rose-garden of mysteries and conferred the bounty of the Holy Spirit. People, notwithstanding the two trials they had before and the mistakes they had made, still said that the teachings of the glorious Gospel were illusions, thoughts and an imagination without foundation. They said it was void of philosophy; baseless thoughts. They thought they were wise, that they had intelligence, knew wisdom and were in possession of the quintessence of politics. {{p6}}

Before long it was evident that they had again made a mistake, for what Christ said was reality was true; they were heavenly thoughts, Divine teachings, while the thoughts of the tribes and peoples were baseless imaginations. This was the third mistake. The trial was repeated in the appearance of His Holiness the Apostle (Muḥammad) and His Holiness the Supreme (the Báb).

Now the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) has appeared. The merciful teachings and counsels have become evident. The summons to the oneness and unity of the world of humanity raised, the banner of the Kingdom of Peace unfurled, and the tent of concord and love among all the human race pitched in the center of the world, inviting all to it, and yet there are some ignorant ones who imagine that this Divine doctrine is without foundation and their own conceptions are lofty ideals. But soon it will be clear that what He has said is correct, solid and effective and the thoughts of all others devoid of significance. {{p7}}

Question: What is the significance of “mystery” referred to in the blessed tablets? {.question}

Answer: Mystery signifies the subjects and questions which are far beyond the minds and comprehensions of the people. When a perfect personage unveils and expounds them, fair souls comprehend them. Therefore the reality of the Manifestation of Christ was, in the cycle of Moses, a mystery of Divine Mysteries, which afterward became revealed in the Manifestation of Christ.

Question: What Divine wisdom is there in fasting? {.question}

Answer: The Divine wisdom in fasting is manifold. Among them is this: As during those days (i. e. the period of fasting which the followers afterward observe) the Manifestation of the Sun of Reality, through Divine inspiration, is engaged in the Descent of Verses, the instituting of Divine Law and the arrangement of Teachings, through excessive occupation and intense attraction there remains no condition or time for eating and drinking. For example, when His Holiness Moses went to Mount Tur (Sinai) and there engaged in instituting the Law of God, he fasted forty days. For the purpose of awakening and admonishing the people of Israel, fasting was enjoined upon them.

Likewise His Holiness Christ in the beginning of instituting the Spiritual Law, the systematizing of the Teachings and the arrangement of counsels, for forty days abstained from eating and drinking. In the beginning the disciples and Christians fasted. Later the assemblages of the chief Christians changed fasting into Lenten observances. {{p8}}

Likewise the Qur'án having descended in the month Ramazan, fasting during that month became a duty. In like manner His Holiness the Supreme (the Báb), in the beginning of the Manifestation, through the excessive effect of descending Verses, passed days in which his nourishment was reduced to tea only.

Likewise, the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh), when busy with instituting the Divine Teachings and during the days when the Verses (the Word of God) descended continuously through the great effect of the Verses and the throbbing of the heart, took no food except the least amount.

The purpose is this: In order to follow the Divine Manifestations and for the purpose of admonition and the commemoration of their state, it became incumbent upon the people to fast during those days.

The Christians, as was written, formerly fasted fully. For every sincere soul who has a beloved longs to experience that state in which his beloved is. If his beloved is in a state of sorrow, he desires sorrow; if in a state of joy he desires joy; if in a state of rest, he desires rest; if in a state of trouble, he desires trouble.

Now since in those days His Holiness the Supreme (the Báb) fasted many days, and the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) took but little food or drink, and some days Christ did not eat, it became necessary that the friends should follow that example. For thus saith He in the Tablet of Visitation: "They, the believers, have followed that which they were commanded, for love of Thee." This is one wisdom of the wisdoms of fasting. {{p9}}

The second wisdom is this: Fasting is the cause of awakening man. The heart becomes tender and the spirituality of man increases. This is produced by the fact that man's thoughts will be confined to the commemoration of God, and through this awakening and stimulation surely ideal advancements follow.

Third wisdom: Fasting is of two kinds, material and spiritual. The material fasting is abstaining from food or drink, that is, from the appetites of the body. But spiritual, ideal fasting is this, that man abstain from selfish passions, from negligence and from satanic animal traits. Therefore material fasting is a token of the spiritual fasting. That is: O God! as I am fasting from the appetites of the body and not occupied with eating and drinking, even so purify and make holy my heart and my life from aught else save Thy Love, and protect and preserve my soul from self-passions and animal traits. Thus may the spirit associate with the Fragrances of Holiness and fast from everything else save Thy mention. {{p10}}

We reached Haifa on Monday evening, having taken ship at Alexandria Saturday afternoon. The trip from Port Sa'id was beautiful and the sea was perfectly calm. As we neared Mt. Carmel the sun shone on the point, making a picture never to be forgotten. Fresh verdure and new life was beginning to be manifest. After landing, Cook's man drove us to the Carmel House and there we breathed the most delicious air of quiet and peace, our hearts praising God that He had, in His Mercy, permitted us to come to the New Holy City, the New Jerusalem, to the King of Kings, enthroned in the hearts but imprisoned as far as the material world goes.

We remained two nights and a day in Haifa and the weather was most favorable for seeing the beauties of Haifa. The same day of our arrival the Master's wife had driven into Haifa to see Rhooah Khánúm who is living, for the present, in Madame Jackson's new house. The two sons-in-law of The Master came to the hotel for us to bring us to see the ladies and Mírzá Asadu'lláh. We were almost beside ourselves with the joy of realizing that actually and truly we were in Haifa, with 'Akká just across the bay ever in sight, and, further, to have the great privilege of seeing the Master's wife and the daughter, was almost more than the capacity of the limited heart could endure. We went back to the hotel after a half hour's visit with these holy souls. The moon was all but full and the entire setting seemed like heaven itself. We fell asleep on our pillows perfectly intoxicated with the realization that at last we were to visit the One upon whose Holy Utterances we had been feeding our souls for the past eight years. Sleep was very sweet that night and upon arising the next morning we looked out of our bedroom windows to see 'Akká across the blue sea and Carmel's point bathed in the new morning's sunshine- -a veritable landscape dream almost too beautiful to belong to earth. {{p11}}

During the forenoon our traveling companion, Madame Scaramucci, whom we had met for the first time at Port Sa'id, took a carriage drive with my daughter Arna while I looked after certain packages and letters for the friends in Haifa. They had but just left me and turned the corner when Mírzá Ameen's brother came to the hotel to escort us to Mírzá Asadu'lláh's home. I had to go alone because I did not know where to find Madame Scaramucci and Arna.

Mírzá Asadu'lláh, his wife, two sons and a daughter greeted me with great warmth, asking many questions about the friends in America and the progress of the Temple. The work which Chicago had been doing was clearly explained to him and he said it was well we had made it an American movement and he hoped it would be built by the believers of the world. He commended our wisdom in referring the location to the Master. The Master's wife and the daughter Rhooah came to call, also a sister of the Master's wife who lives in Haifa. Coffee and cookies were served, and after quite a visit, I went back to the hotel and found Arna and the Bahá'í sister had returned and were wondering where I could be. {{p12}}

THE TOMB OF THE BÁB

At half past two we went to Madame Jacksons' home, which is called the home of 'Abbás Effendi, to meet Rhooah Khánúm who had invited us to drive with her to the Holy Tomb of the Báb on the side of Mt. Carmel.

The blessed Master's carriage drove up for us and our hearts almost beat aloud to realize we were to drive in his carriage, with his beautiful daughter, to that Holy Tomb of the Báb, which every believer in the world knows about. Not only is its architecture remarkable, but its location is positively commanding, built upon the solid rock of the great mountain, very high up from the sea and looking down the main avenue of Haifa, which leads direct to the sea. A stone pier or landing was built a few years ago at Haifa for the Emperor of Germany, who visited the Holy Land, entering by way of Haifa because there is a large German settlement here. {{p13}}

These Germans originally came to Haifa because they had reckoned from prophecies that this is the part of the Holy Land from which the Voice of God would be proclaimed at the second coming of Christ. A great interest existed in our hearts to see thoroughly this wonderful Tomb, and this desire had grown out of the work we had been doing for the Temple in America. After seeing its massive walls and solid masonry, we did not wonder that the Turkish Government might believe that the Master was building a great military fort. This Tomb is built to last for thousands of years, and one can quite believe it will after seeing it. There is a flower garden in front of this building and the wife of the keeper gathered a lovely bunch of red roses and brought them as a gift to us and later she came with a handful of violets. After Rhooah Khánum had explained the inner rooms — three in breadth, and, when complete, three in depth — we came out of the building to find this keeper's dear little wife had placed four chairs in front of the building and was waiting to serve us a cup of Persian tea, and we sat in that wonderful place, looking over to 'Akká and down to Elijah's cave and the wide sweep of the bay, and we knew there was nowhere else on earth another such a place. The Mercies of God, in this His Greatest Day, are so overwhelming that they are like a consuming fire. All of this had come to us in two days and we had not yet been to 'Akká. I said to our Bahá'í sister companion:

“What must it be in the days before us if we have only touched, as it were, the hem of the garment?” {{p14}}

THE TOMB OF THE BÁB THE RIDE TO 'AKKÁ

Another perfect moonlight night and a delicious sleep brought us to this morning. We had not received the word from 'Akká to come, but were expecting it. We were dressing for breakfast when a knock was heard at our door, and upon opening, Mírzá Ameen's brother was seen, bringing to us the glad tidings that we might take Cook's carriage and go to the house of the Master that morning. After selecting the necessary clothing and packing our suit-cases, leaving our trunks with Cook, we hired a sort of omnibus carriage with three horses to pull us, and started from Haifa at 10 o'clock.

The ride to 'Akká has been described by several pilgrims, but I must be frank to say no mortal can possibly from any description picture it to himself; he must actually take it to get any idea of its beauty. After passing through the narrow streets of old Haifa, we drove to the shore of the sea. The entire drive is on the sandy beach and nearly all of the time we were driving partly in the sea because the sand there was firmer and easier for the horses. Twice on the way we had to drive well out into the sea in order to pass the mouths of two streams which empty into the sea, the water coming almost into the wagon bed. One little word which the Master had said to Mrs. Lucas, when she made the same pilgrimage, kept our hearts in perfect peace, and that word was this: "Love knows no fear."

To an American, with everything so open and free about our cities, the entrance into 'Akká is something gruesome indeed and had we not known who was within its walls and under the shelter of whose roof we were to be domiciled, we would have fled with terror. It is a prison city which is truly named "The Greatest Prison." {{p15}}

THE MEETING WITH 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

We were greeted at the entrance by the Master's son-in-law and another believer and kindly escorted to our room and our luggage placed there for us. We were left alone for a few minutes. Then a messenger rapped and inquired if Monevah Khánum might come to see us. We freshened ourselves up after the long, windy drive and were happy to greet the Master's youngest daughter. She came to us so sweetly with those wonderful soulful bright eyes, bearing in her hand three beautiful roses plucked and sent to us by the Master with his welcome.

In a few minutes more the Master himself came into our room and we met him at the door, kissing his hand as he entered. His appearance is absolutely nothing like the picture in America. Once, when first I came into the knowledge of the Revelation, I dreamed of attaining the great meeting and of bringing one of my daughters. The personage I saw in my dream was not like the picture, so for several years I had fancied it must be Bahá'u'lláh. Today, when the Master entered, there was the One whom I had seen in vision, and also I had brought one of my girls, and it is Arna. He came in so naturally and easily, bringing us a handful of hyacinths, purple and pink. He spoke many words of welcome to us and said it made him so happy to see the east and the west becoming so united; that the time was, and not long since, that an Occidental was greatly hated by the Orientals, but now, through the power of the Word of God which alone can thus unite the hearts, the east and the west were loving each other very much, and he hoped it would increase day by day. {{p16}}

He said each believer has a certain time when he should make the desired visit, each having a certain work to do for the progress of the Cause. He hoped all would eventually attain to the meeting. After a few such explanations, he left us and the young daughter and another Persian believer's wife (the brother of Ahmad and Muḥammad Yazdí) joined us and talked with us until dinner was announced. When this sister came to us she brought us each a beautiful tangerine sent to us by the Master. How we longed to be able to keep these flowers and this fruit for our brothers and sisters in America, who are thinking of us these precious days spent in the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! {{p17}}

At dinner, which was served for us in the small dining room into which our room opens, the Master took each by the hand, giving us seats, placing Arna on his right as his guest of honor. The meal was served in courses by a Burmanese believer who is serving in the Master’s home. The Master would take a bite or two and then give us beautiful lessons. He spoke of the difficulties the first Christians had in visiting John the Baptist while in prison. They were greatly persecuted and ridiculed for it. Then he showed how good and really necessary were these tests. As an illustration he compared a ship on the sea, tossed about by the wind and the waves, laden with cargo. No one on that ship, perhaps, is even comfortable, but the ship, nevertheless, brought food to the people and thus was the cause of life. So man must have the winds and waves of test in order that life be brought to the people. As no food could be had unless the wind and waves brought it, so no spiritual food can be had without the first workers in the Cause suffer tests. One point he particularly made was that in Jesus’ time the people came to test Jesus, but they did not know that He came to test them instead of their testing Him.

OUR SECOND DAY IN ‘AKKÁ

At six o’clock yesterday afternoon the Master came to our room to call on us and gave us very beautiful teachings and then said some of the officials of ‘Akká had come to call on him, so he could not take tea with us. We saw no more of him until this morning. Monevah Khánum came for us at 7:30 to come to the early morning gathering of the family, when tea is served and all chant from the Holy Utterances. A very dear little boy, the son of Ḥusayn Yazdí, only about six years old, chanted so sweetly. He came in so noiselessly, kneeling near the door, and sat with hands folded, listening until the Master requested him to chant. Then the Master praised him greatly and called him to come to him and gave him a handful of flowers. After visiting with the women of the household, the Master’s sister, the mother and four daughters and two Russian pilgrims from ‘Ishqabád for half an hour or so, we went to breakfast with Monevah Khánum. {{p18}}

THE TEMPLE IN AMERICA

In the course of an hour the Master sent for me to come to him and bring with me the letters and photographs which I had brought from America. Monevah Khánum took me to a room into which I had not been and there he was waiting for me. I gave him the numerous letters and then the photographs which he enjoyed greatly and said they were a most acceptable present to him. The roll of names for the Temple lay beside me, wrapped in a piece of wrapping paper, and before I had gotten to it to give it to him, he said that was for the Mashrek-el-Askar. {{p19}}

After I had explained the long list of names to him, he patted me on the back and said I had done well and ever after this I was to be his daughter just as if I were Monevah Khánum, his own daughter. His satisfaction at the work we have done toward the Temple seemed to fill him with great joy. I asked him about the location and he said it must be built away from the stores and business portion of the city. Then the lay of the city was explained to him and the question was asked whether it was advisable to locate back from the business portion or on the lake side and he replied the lake shore would be more beautiful for the location, as it must be in a very beautiful place. We must have as large a piece of land as we could get. Then he went into another room and brought to me a ground plan and said it must be like that. First the building, with nine sides, in the middle; then a circular court about that; leading from this circle were to be nine avenues; between each a garden, and in the middle of each garden a fountain of water. He said it would take much to build the Temple, but we must have meetings about the work, labor hard and pray to God and He would bless our efforts. The question of the design of the architecture of the building was asked and Mr. Remey's kind offer to help us in this was mentioned. He said several must consult together and not simply one person's plans accepted. He said the Temple was the greatest matter today for the upbuilding of the Cause. {{p20}}

When asked what was the means of bringing the greatest unity among the believers, he said:

First, the character of the teachers, and

Second, the work for the Temple.

The teachers must so live that their deeds would teach the people even if they did not teach by word of mouth. The teachers are of the first importance; their lives must be examples.

The Master gave glorious promises for the Chicago believers. He said very great souls should come from our Assembly, teachers who would not only enlighten America but other countries like China and Japan and the whole world. He said he was pleased with the work in Chicago — it was “khaili khoob.”

OUR THIRD DAY AT ‘AKKÁ, MARCH 1, 1907

We arose very early this morning to join the Master's family in their meeting. After the chanting was finished and each one had been served a cup of tea, we went back to our rooms. The Master had some Syrian bread and a little cheese served him and a cup of tea. This was his entire breakfast. We were served a nice breakfast about 8 o'clock and when nearly through eating Monevah Khánum came to us to know if we desired to see the Master giving to the poor, as was his custom every Friday morning. When we went to our windows which overlook a big court yard, we saw between two and three hundred men, women and children gathered. Such a motley crowd one can see {{p23}} only in these parts. There were blind, lame, cripples and very feeble persons, the poorest clad collection of people almost that the earth contains. One man had his clothing made of a patched quilt, an old woman had gunny sacking for a cloak; children were so ragged that their clothing would scarcely stay on them.

Two or three of the men believers were with the Master. The people were required to arrange themselves orderly about two sides of the court and the Master began near the gate giving into the hand of each some piece of money and then each was required to pass out. It was a sight never to be forgotten to see the Master going from one to another, saying some word of praise or kindness to encourage each. With some he would stop to inquire into their health and he would pat them on the back, these poor, dirty-looking creatures, and once in a while we would see him send some one away empty handed and he would reprimand him for his laziness. How clear and musical his voice sounded as he went from one to another, giving and praising! The men accompanying him kept order in great kindness, but firmness, and saw that each passed on as soon as he had received from the Master. Where, O where on this globe can one duplicate such a scene as is enacted every Friday morning in the court yard of the Master of 'Akká, who. is himself a state prisoner to the Turkish government and has lived in prison or in exile since he was nine years of age! {{p24}}

It is the Muḥammadan Sabbath and we have heard all day from the Moslem minarets the loud chanting of the Musselmen. But saw we any one gathering the poor, the lame, the blind and halt in his own court yard and giving to them freely of what God had bestowed upon him and living with the bare necessities himself? If this is not the resurrection of the pure spirit of the humble Nazarene of 1900 years ago, then we need not look elsewhere, for its every appearance stamps it as such. Even the condition and costumes of the beggars bespeak the return.

After this crowd had departed, I chanced to pass by the Master's door and I saw he was lying on his bed, very tired, but he saw me and would have his daughter bring me in and he said: "These are my friends; my friends. Some of them are my enemies, but they think I do not know it, because they appear friendly, and to them I am very kind, for one must love his enemies and do good to them." The Master explained that there really was not work for the poor of 'Akká, only two avenues being open for them to earn, one by fishing and the other by carrying heavy loads. Yesterday, and for two or three days, the sea has raged madly so that no fishing could be done, and it requires great strength to carry heavy loads. He knows the impostors and will not encourage mendicancy, and as he passes them he rebukes them for laziness and idleness and tells them where they can go to obtain work. He said humanity was one great {{p25}} whole and they must help and sympathize with each other and develop the laws of attraction between the hearts. He said, "Look at this great universe with the sun, moon and planets all revolving in harmony; it is because of the great laws of attraction holding and binding them. Man must work to increase this love for his kind."

The work done by the Chicago Assembly of Teaching in providing the Bahá'í home for Mrs. Holcomb's three grandchildren was described to the Master and he was greatly delighted, saying in English and with much force, "Beautiful! Beautiful!" He said to look after the orphans was one of the very first works for the believers. The orphans are God's children and a great test to the people. I asked him if the grandmother should keep the children with her and he said while they were small, and then the believers should take them into their homes, train, educate them and teach them the Revelation. I explained that the Temple movement of this winter seemed to be brought about by our arising to help these orphans, and he smiled and said yes, God blesses us for doing good works every time.

After this he excused himself to attend to a large pile of Tablets he had been writing. Not one moment of the day is wasted by this Mighty Man of God.

At 12:30 he came for us to come to dinner with him. He had been to the Muḥammadan Mosque in the meantime. At the meal the {{p26}} explanation of the cloven tongues of fire descending upon the disciples after the crucifixion, and their being able to speak all tongues, was asked. The son-in-law took it down and Monevah will see that it is correct and give it to me for the believers.

I asked the Master if the fruit was the mystery of the tree that bore it and he said no, it was the mystery of the earth; that there was a germ or little forms of life in the soil, which was acted upon by the water and fed by the earth, and this was taken up by the roots, the trees having a circulation. The leaves expose the sap of the tree to the sun and this colors the fruit. A tree will bear fruit if the leaves are cut off, but it will be poor and colorless.

During the afternoon the Master's sister and the oldest daughter came to call on us in our room which is very large and pleasant, with windows overlooking the sea. We asked her to tell us a little of her experiences in the lifetime of the Blessed Perfection. She was only six years old when their exile began and she said her mother had the greatest suffering, for she had little children. When they were exiled to 'Akká, seventy-seven were put onto a steamer that was so dirty that it made them all very ill. They were given no food for four days and slept on deck. Only the Master and the Blessed Perfection could summon up courage to sit down and rest. The others were so distressed by the filth that they walked up and down the boat all the {{p27}} time. After four days they reached a city and two or three of the men were allowed to go in and buy some food. One believer was very ill and they wished to cook a little broth for him, but the captain of the boat would not allow even that, so they had to go without. When they landed they were taken in small boats to 'Akká and all the seventy-seven were put into a small prison, the door locked on them and no food provided for them. The Master's sister said in the midst of such fearful calamities they were so happy to be in 'Akká, even in prison with no food, just because they were not separated from the Blessed Perfection. The women were not prisoners but went into exile and imprisonment in order to be with Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá — that was more than food or comfort.

After a short visit the Master's sister left us and said she would come often if only she could speak English with us. Some one came in a few moments later and brought Madame Scaramucci and me each a little bottle of attar of roses from the Master's sister.

The older daughter remained for a little visit with us and told us of poor Nabíl. He loved Bahá'u'lláh so much that, after His departure, he said he could not stay in this world. For three months he was so disconsolate. At last he wrote a beautiful poem, telling all that was in his heart, and gave it to a believer to give to the Master, but this believer forgot to give it right away. All that night the family heard some one {{p28}} walking about the Holy Tomb and chanting prayers. The next morning he went to the sea, and leaving his clothes on shore, drowned himself. No one knew of it and they searched for him all over the mountains and around. Then his clothing was found and in four days his body was washed up and it was identified. When the poem was read by the Master, it was learned that he had decided he could stay on earth no longer—he loved and yearned so for Bahá'u'lláh.

One of the daughters dressed Arna as a Persian women and took her down in the streets of 'Akká and up into the pinnacle of the Mosque where the men go to pray and chant. Madame Scaramucci had a call from the Master, but it was such a busy day he did not come to us. After supper the women of the family were gathered in their parlor and desired us to join them. While there the Master came in and said we were blessed indeed to be able to come to 'Akká. There are two kinds of visits, one in which the person comes very thirsty and the water will taste very sweet to him; the other in which the person is not thirsty and the water-will be bitter. The latter visit would much better not be made. We could not now realize what our visit meant; it was like a seed which would sprout and grow later and bear fruits that would endure throughout eternity. {{p29}}

Arising early I went into the living room where the Master meets with his family every morning, between six and seven o'clock. The widow of one of the martyrs sits on the floor in the Persian style and makes and serves the tea every morning. Her husband was one of three brothers who were imprisoned for this Cause. For days they had no news about them. One day they heard a great noise in the street and looking out they saw three heads placed on long poles and being carried through the streets, and when in front of their home they tossed these heads into their mother's room. She wiped them off with water and then threw them back saying, "What I have given to God I will not take back." This woman who made the tea had been married only one year to one of these brothers. Having lost all of her relatives through the persecution, and Persian women having no openings for self-support, the Master took her into his household. What a wonderful household this is — over forty people living here in one home, some black, some white, Arabic, Persian, Burmanese, Italian, Russian and now English and American! Not a loud command is heard and not one word of dispute; not one word of fault finding. Every one goes about as if on tip toes. When they enter your room their slippers are left before the door and they come in with stocking feet and remain standing until you invite {{p30}} them to sit down. All the family and the servants gather in this one room every morning and chant the Holy Utterances and drink a cup of Persian tea. After this we go to our various rooms, and for the guests a breakfast is served later. The two little Arabic girls who are serving in the Master's home, and are being educated by him, came in about ten o'clock and had an English lesson from Arna. They are trained to do housework and also go to school to an Italian teacher whom the Master hires to teach the children of his household.

At the table the question of the meaning of Babel and the confounding of tongues was asked and the Master said it meant the confusion of ideas, each one having his own idea and this brought destruction. Also, the meaning of Babylon was asked and the Master said Babylon signified the old religions, as Jerusalem signified the New Dispensation. A comparison of the words in English similar to many Persian words was made by the Master and he said the Persians were the old Aryan race starting beyond the Euxine Sea. As they increased they pushed west to Persia, then to Constantinople; from there over Europe and then to America. The origin of the North American Indian was asked and the Master said they came from the eastern side of Asia when the land between western America and Asia (Siberia) was connected. There has been much more land than there is now. {{p31}}

When the Master came to call on us about six o'clock in the evening, Madame Scaramucci asked him if she might remain his guest until Monday. He replied yes-he would love to keep us for a month, but that the present Governor of 'Akká is not his friend and it was better that we remain a short time. He said we would better all depart together, as we had come together (Madame Scaramucci, my daughter Arna and myself) . Then he said there were two kinds of visits, one the temporal which sooner or later must terminate, and the other the spiritual which never terminates throughout eternity. Once he had a guest for eleven years. Although that was a long visit, yet it finally came to an end. The temporal visit has no effect unless it be the spiritual also.

A LESSON ON THE SEEING OF A HALO ABOUT THE MASTER

The Master said there were four kinds of light; the light from the lamp was one; but because the face of a man does not give out light as the lamp does, is man less than the lamp or greater? Some worms give off a light — is man or the worm greater? Man does not give out such a light, but man has the kingdom of the mind and it is the light of this kingdom which some see when they love a person very much, and they mistake it for a material light when it is not. This comes from the emotional nature and is an imagination.

Then there is the Light of the {{p32}} Holy Spirit possessed by God's Chosen Ones. The minds of men cannot comprehend this Light — thus they martyr those who come with this Light. But time proves that their Light was the true Light and that the light of the minds of the men of their time was limited. They comprehend the past, present and future and see things as they will be when accomplished. St. John, on the Isle of Patmos, seeing into the future, foretold what would come to pass in this present Day. There is no time to this Light — it knows all things.

Impressions formed from a visit to 'Akká.

Edwin W. Woodcock

When I first heard of what {{p1}} is commonly called the New Religion, as practiced by the followers of Bahá'u'lláh, a Persian Prophet, and Who call themselves Bahá'ís, I was not much impressed or interested, as I believed it to be another religions cult springing up in this country, like many others of mushroom growth, which for a time create a mild sensation among a select few, and then gradually fade away into "innocuous desuetude."

I remained in this condition of mind until my brother, Perey Woodcock, made a visit to 'Akká some two years ago. It was some time after his return before I had an opportunity to hear a recital of his satisfactory experiences and talks with "The Master" and other great souls, who are held in bondage by the Turkish political authorities.

While listening to him, although still skeptical, I became greatly impressed, because I intuitively felt that undoubtedly there was a great soul manifesting there, and I was inspired with a longing desire to cone into personal contact with his personality and teachings.

Fortunately, conditions became favorable to my making a trip to Egypt and on January 5th last I sailed from New York in company with Mrs. Woodcock and Mrs. J. D. Chapman, her mother whose willing and thankful guests we were.

'Akká, at the present time, is the mecca of many pilgrims from all parts of the world, who go there to see and hear 'Abbás Effendi Whom they lovingly call "The Master," explain his teachings of {{p2}} divine love. Being a prisoner, and subject to many physical restrictions and conditions, it can be readily understood how difficult it is for him to serve all. Yet, strange as it may appear, none are turned away empty handed. It seems to be another case of the loaves and fishes.

'Abbás Effendi is the son and spiritual successor of the great Manifestation Bahá'u'lláh, which name interpreted means "Glory of God," and. Whose coming to earth was clearly foretold in the Holy Scriptures and was further proclaimed by a forerunner called in Persian "The Báb" or "Gate," the same as the Manifestation of Christ was proclaimed by John the Baptist.

Bahá'u'lláh was born into this world through a Persian family of distinction and great wealth, in the year 1817, but, on account of the reclamation of his divine teachings, his property was confiscated and he and his family have been exiles and prisoners for fifty years. He died at ‘Akká in 1892. There he was held prisoner for many years and it was there he wrote many of the new laws and revelations whose great and beneficent influence is already being felt and manifested over the entire world. When he died he enjoined upon his son, ‘Abbás Effendi, the loving task of elucidating and spreading these divine laws and revelations, and he is doing his allotted work nobly and well. He does not want to be called “Master.” He simply desires to be known as the humble Servant of God.

To be received in his prison household, it is first naturally necessary to receive permission. Not having time to receive this much desired permission before leaving home, I started on my journey, fortified with letters of introduction to believers in {{p3}} Cairo, and buoyed up with the hope that my desires might be realized.

On arrival at Cairo I presented my letter of introduction to Hájí Hasan Khurasání who is a rich indigo merchant and a firm believer. He has thrown open his large house for the convenience and use of numerous believers who reside in Cairo and who regularly meet and receive inspiration and spiritual instruction through the reading of tablets from the pen of their beloved “Master.” We were received most royally by this band of earnest souls, composed of many different nationalities, and, although we could not understand or speak their language, they extended to us the hand of good fellowship and brotherly love, which added materially to the pleasures of our visit to the ancient city of the Pharaohs.

We were not altogether helpless or speechless amidst this interesting group, owing to the kind assistance of a young and ardent believer named Mires Husayn Rúhí who acted as our interpreter and guide, and who favored us with many other acts of disinterested kindness during the remainder of our stay in Cairo.

Mírzá Rúhí is a young Persian who has practically educated himself, has become proficient in his knowledge of the English language and is doing a great educational work in the primary schools of Egypt and in promoting the spiritual and practical teachings as elucidated by ‘Abbás Effendi. Although a young man with a family of his own to provide for, he has added to his responsibilities by adapting and educating four or five promising young boys to take their place in the world’s affairs, and serve in the great Cause. This was my first experience in the practical teachings of “The Master” and I was much impressed by the object lesson. {{p4}}

Another thing that greatly impressed me, as I learned of the different nationalities of the group referred to, and noted the beaming intelligence and love expressed in the faces of each one, was the perfect grace and harmony in their relations toward each other and strangers, and the dignity and even majesty of the bearing of each one of these dark skinned and different races of people, Whom we in the west, in our ignorance and pride, have been brought to look upon and regard practically as heathen. Surely, I thought, there must be some great silent power at work here, and if it is the result of the teachings emanating from ‘Akká, the sooner I become inspired with these teachings the better.

At this time I had the privilege of meeting Dr. de Bohn and his good wife, Edith, from Switzerland, - believers, - who had received permission to visit “The. Master” and were on their way to ‘Akká for that purpose. I had not yet received the desired permission, but, after consulting with the doctor and his wife and other of the good friends, it was decided that I should accompany them as far as Haifa, and there await an answer to my supplication which had been made on my arrival at Cairo.

We, therefore, one bright morning, took the train for Port Sa‘íd, encouraged by the presence of a host of the believers and friends who came to the station to bid us Godspeed on our journey. On arriving at Port Sa‘íd, we immediately embarked on board one of the Khedevial line of steamers and were soon thereafter joined by that good soul Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí who has done such good work in “The Master’s” service in receiving and forwarding communications, and another earnest co-worker, Mírzá Núri’d-Dín, both of whom remained with us {{p5}} until the boat sailed late in the evening.

On arrival at Jaffa the next morning, we were held up by quarantine regulations for twenty four hours, at the end of which time we proceeded on our way without further incident, arriving at Haifa late in the evening.

As we sailed along, and in full view of the Syrian coast, many Bible scenes, and incidents long forgotten, were recalled to memory, accompanied with regrets that I had not been more of a student of that great book of books, and more especially as the biblical historical Mount Carmel came into view. As we caught a glimpse of the town of Acre, or ‘Akká, we realised that the end of our journey was near, and we gazed upon this white City (White from a distance only) with mingled feelings of joy, hope and wonder. In addition to harboring the Great Soul we were in quest of, it possessed other historical interest that claimed our attention. History tells us that Acre is also called St. Jean D’Acre and is a place of the highest antiquity mentioned in the history of the Jews, Persians and Ptolemies and is renowned for its desperate sieges and defences. In the days of the crusades, it suffered one of its most daring assaults by Richard Coeur De Lion in 1191. After its capture by the Christians in that year, it remained under the control of the Knights of St. John, Who fortified it strongly and occupied it until 1291 when they were compelled to evacuate it by the Sultán of Egypt. The Turks occupied it early in the sixteenth century. In 1779, supported by Sidney Smith and a few British soldiers, they kept Bonaparte and the French army at bay for sixty days, when he raised the siege and departed. It now belongs to Turkey. It has been, and is now, used by that government as a penal colony. Here {{p6}} “The Master” finds refuge. But his history is too well known to be repeated here.

On landing, and after passing through the customs formalities at Haifa, our little party obtained accommodation at a fairly comfortable hostelry kept by a German family who took good care of us during our stay. The weather was cold and disagreeable, and I, unfortunately, became quite ill – with a complicated bronchial trouble; but, thanks to the kind nursing and attention of Dr. de Bohn and his good wife, whose kindness I can never repay nor forget, I was able, when the glad summons came, to join them at ‘Akká, in the presence of “The Master.” When I arrived I was met by some members of his household, and, shortly after being assigned to one of the guest chambers, (which is permitted through the courtesy of the Turkish authorities) he, himself, came to greet me. There were with me at this important moment Dr. de Bohn and his wife and two of the worthy interpreters who are devoting their lives to the Cause. As “The Master” neared the entrance to the room, we all arose. He almost, seemed to glide into the apartment, and, as he approached and welcomed me in his gracious manner, I gazed into his great, luminous and kindly loving eyes. He first took my hand and then instantly seemed to enfold me in a loving embrace. I seemed to immediately feel at rest and peace with all the world, although tears, which I could not repress, filled my eyes and I almost sobbed. In fact it was some minutes before I could regain control of myself. He sat down on a divan and motioned me to come and sit beside him, which I humbly and gladly did. Holding one of my hands, he entered into a general conversation, through the interpreters, of which I can remember but little, as I was trying to analyze the {{p7}} sensations of joy and gladness which seemed to possess me.

Gradually he directed his conversation to me, at the same time throwing one arm over my shoulder. As I nestled more closely against him, and as he spoke of the wondrous love of God, everything for the moment seemed clear to me, and all doubts that I may have had vanished instantly. I did, not need any verbal arguments, or assurances, to convince me that divine love was the ruling and saving force of this world. I experienced it then and there, and the desire to so live as to radiate even a slight reflection of this love to others, was newly born, and, before leaving ‘Akká, became greatly intensified. During the remainder of my stay, which was cut short owing to my illness, “The Master” gave us table talks during meals and several times came to my room where such talks were continued, and he, seemingly, to answer many unasked questions which I had in mind. There were, of course, many, many things I desired to learn, but, owing to the difficulty of communicating through a third party, was content to simply be in the presence of this great, kindly and loving soul, knowing that by research, and study of His writings, and of the writings of other scholarly, noble and developed souls, who are His followers and are devoting their lives to the propagation of divine truths, I could gain the enlightenment, in connection with these truths, that I was so desirous of obtaining.

It was my great privilege, while waiting at Haifa, to meet that great and illumined soul, Mírzá Asadu’lláh, who has recently given to us “The School of the Prophets;” and, also, while at Cairo, it was my great privilege to meet, several times, that other {{p8}} gloriously illumined soul, Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl, who, in addition to many other pearls of thoughts has given us the valuable book of “The Bahá’í Proofs.” Both of these noble men are humble but mighty disciples and followers of “The Master,” and they are earnestly and patiently paving the way for brighter and more enlightened days to come.

One evening while at ‘Akká, I, with several others, was on the roof of the prison house which shelters “The Master,” looking over the plains surrounding the walled town, gazing at the grand expanse of the blue Mediterranean, and watching for the glorious descent of the sun as it majestically sinks below the horizon. “The Master” was taking his accustomed exercise on the crumbling embankment walls. As he paced slowly back and forth, with his hands clasped behind his back, I could not help wondering what his thoughts were and why he has been compelled to endure so much physical and more poignant mental suffering. My thoughts also reverted to the physical and mental sufferings of Christ, that other great and perfectly developed soul, who, two thousand years ago, was sent to earth on a like mission to point and show the way to eternal life. We who think we suffer, and cry out with self pity, have no idea or conception of what real suffering means and the majesty of it. As “The Master” looked up and caught sight of us, he graciously waved us a salute. His face was illumined with that great love which he bears to all mankind, and, as he continued his walk I was inspired by the thought that it was my privilege, in a humble way, to follow in his footsteps and, perhaps lighten his Sufferings somewhat by living such a life as would reflect to some extent the inestimable value of his sacrifice and divine teachings.

Since leaving ‘Akká I have pondered much, and the more I think and the more familiar I become with the teachings emanating from this Manifestation, the more convinced I am that they are divine, and my determination to try to so live that I may cultivate and develop a sane and spiritual growth has been greatly strengthened.

I appreciate the fact that the first real struggle in living the higher life is with self. We are like children and we cannot attain to youth and manhood with one bound. We must constantly struggle to overcome self, and grow, and little by little we will catch glimmerings of that great light, which, if we help to radiate, will at last lead us triumphantly into the presense of, and association with, great souls.

What impressed me was the more than kingly majesty and the great simplicity of “The Master,” who is hemmed in by poverty and is restricted by every condition that ignorant humanity can ingeniously devise and contrive. Notwithstanding all these most unfavorable conditions, he is constantly enlightening and spiritually influencing the entire world through the many pilgrims from every known civilization, who are drawn to this “Door of Hope” by the mighty but invisible and irresistible power of God. These pilgrims are not ignorant and superstitious worshippers - they comprise some of the brightest and most enlightened minds of the world, and the majority of them have passed through the various and highest grades of intellectual and educational accomplishments. They come in the spirit of scepticism, bringing to bear all of their greatest guns and batteries of the accumulated learning of centuries. But when they come within the influence of that powerful, spiritual aura which seems to surround “The Master” in his lowly prison, their {{p10}} carefully prepared logical shaft of learning and arguments fall broken and harmless against the shield of divine truths presented and taught by him, and they become speedily disarmed. After two thousand years of additional experience and learning they are more confounded than were the wise men of old when the hay Nazarene pointed out to them the error of their thoughts and ways and directed them to the true paths of God’s glory and righteousness. Unlike these wise men, who heeded not the enlightenment and beneficence Of Christ’s teachings which, spreading through the ages, moulding, softening and mellowing humanity, have made possible this present day era of the Manifestation of reason and love, these pilgrims become almost instantly convinced of the divinity of the wisdom and truths expressed by “The Master.” Their hearts become filled with divine love, their intelligences become ignited with the fire of understanding, and they return to their homes and countrymen as living torch lights of God’s great love.

On my way to and from ‘Akká, at Port Sa’íd and at Cairo, it was my privilege to meet several of these pilgrims, and, on the morning sailed from Haifa, nine of them arrived there on their journey of, knowledge and enlightenment. They were from China, India, Japan and other Asiatic and European countries; and all noble specimens the many and varied civilizations.

These intelligent and inquiring souls have been for some years and are now constantly moving to and from ‘Akká in an almost continuous stream and spreading the spiritual enlightenment they receive through all of the best channels and avenues peculiar to their different national environments. It is true that this stream sometimes interrupted through the ignorant prejudice of enemies and... (incomplete)

June 8th,

The steamer Necker left the dock at 11:25 A.M. and steamed slowly down the river to Sandy Hook where the pilot was taken off. The weather is fine and agreeable today, the places of interest we passed were beautiful but not knowing what they I cannot mention anything but the Goddess of Liberty. I wrote a postal intending to mail it when the Pilot got off. I was at dinner at the time and did not notice or realize, other things taking my attention that the boat was slowing up. And when informed I went out on deck at once only to see the Pilot going down the ladder Mr. Remey was a little more fortunate, however, for he got there in time to hand his mail to him as he was climbing over the rail. Mr. Remey mailed about 50 poste cards on this occasion which the pilot put in his pocket. I may be able to mail mine at Gibraltar. I am informed that the boat stops there six hours and allows the passengers to go ashore, if they arrive there in the daytime. The sea is smooth as glass, the boat has a gentle motion up and down, but not enough to make one sick. I am getting acquainted with some of the passengers. In the cabin with me are three Italians of the better sort and who are very agreeable. They have a parrot with them and fortunately he is keeping very quiet. In the steerage there are 750 Italians. They eat in groups of six, I may get a snap shot later.

June 9th,

This is Sunday and a very quiet one the sea is smooth and everything, in general, very pleasant. I took a snap shot of the found a place on the stern for that night. Mírzá Aḥmad Yazd gave Mr. Remey a fine silk Umbrella to give to one of the believers at 'Akká and this with mine and Mr. Welle were all tied together and placed in the back of the carpenters room and being a little off our guard that night, they were stolen, Mr. Remey bought a new one while in Beirut.

There is another incident which I forgot to tell that happened at Port Sa'íd. The boatmen who were to take us to the ship got into a fight and we sat there in the boat for about ten minutes for them to get through, it certainly was amusing, after they got through punching one another they got into the boat and rowed us to the ship. Our ship left the Port at 8 o'clock that evening.

July 6th, Sat.

Our journey to Beirut was without incident with the exception of the loss of our umbrellas. As we passed 'Akká We were all lined up amidships to show our tickets, I looked wistfully to 'Akká and said the Greatest name Ninety five times while passing. The only thing I could see to single out was the dome of a Mosque. We were in sight of the shore of Syria from Jaffa to Beirut. We arrived at Beirut at four in the evening. It is a very beautiful city from the Sea. I took a picture of it as we were nearing the anchorage place. This ship is sailing the yellow flag which that we are in quarantine and the quarantine officers would not let us land that night so we had to sleep all night on the ship as I stated above but the quarantine of two days is going on just the same. The first and second class passengers were taken off that evening, that is those who wished to go ashore. In the quarantine these passengers have a little better accommodations than third and fourth class.

July 6th, Sunday:

About six o'clock in the morning they began to take us off the ship in the ship's boats to the place where we are to be quarantined. We got off in the second boat, The place is on high ground about a quarter of a mile from the ship. Well, we got ashore with our baggage and climbed up the hill to the fumigation plant This was a great experience, we had to take off all our clothes and our under clothes were wrapped up in old bags and, put into a large cylinder to be steamed for half an hour. We were given gowns to wear while this was being done. We were all huddled there together, arabs and all classes of people and you can imagine what our clothes looked like when they came out, with the dirty smell and then the scramble to find our own. I was pulling and hauling at an arab's clothes thinking they were my own, but he was stronger than me so he picked them up and took them elsewhere and then I looked a little further and found mine in a mess. I put my other clothes, on without them and after we secured a room Mr. Remey and I washed then all out. This was very fortunate that they had running water. I thought sure that the clothes I was claiming were mine, but it was hard for anyone to tell from the looks of them. The only way that I could tell was by the belt that I wore. They all smelled and looked alike. Well we got through after a fashion and were let loose to find rooms in the pest house. While all this was being done to us, Rúhí who came on the next boat with his family found Mr. Wells who we left outside to guard our baggage while we were being fumigated and he being able, to talk to them in their own language got through by giving them a tip without being fumigated.

We found Mr. Wells and Rúhí and family with the baggage waiting for us. This was the greatest joke yet to think that we had been fumigated while they escaped with a few piasters. But it was a good thing for me for reasons which are better told than put upon paper. Our quarters which I have called the pest house proved to be very clean and roomy, they were a palace compared with the ship. I think we all would have been sick if we had to stay on it very long. I have a snap shot of Mr. Remey and myself in front of the room. Dinner and supper were served in courses and everything was clean and nice, in fact we all said it was the best we had had since we left home, to our great surprise. At ten o'clock we turned in for the night. While it is very hot here in the day time it is cool at night. The atmosphere is so clear that myriads of stars can be seen every night, no clear night in winter in our country can be compared with it.

July 8th, Monday:

I arose in the morning at 4, and as I looked to the East, day was breaking over the Lebanon mountains and the first thing which met my eyes was the star and crescent. This was pleasant to the eyes. It was interesting to see the Arabs preparing their food. They were going to Mecca and they had their tents and cooking utensils with them, they gathered a few stones and placed them in a circle and made a fire with wood and charcoal, prepared potatoes and onions and meat and other things and when it was done it looked very good. The Arabs did not have rooms but slept in their tents. And at the time of prayer they would gather, together and facing Mecca would all pray in dead earnest. There was one thing that I admired in these people and that there is no one declared a fragrant because he is poor. {{p31}} One or more of these poor Arabs went up to the man in charge and he gave to the food, The poorest of the poor manifest their loyalty to the Muhammadan faith by making these pilgrimages to Mecca.

When we were released from quarantine we had all kinds of trouble our board of course was a legitimate tax, then the custom house official was to be paid, then they charged for carrying our baggage several times, then our passports were taken by the police, but such a jam and confusion at the gate, it was difficult to get through without being crushed, finally we reached the outer gate and then the men who carried our baggage from one gate to the other had the audacity to say that they would not let us leave the gate until we had paid them one-half crown apiece. Rúhí did the talking for us and finally with some delay we got away by paying what is equivalent to $1.25 a piece. Then we hired a hack and with Baghdádí one of the believers who met us, we went to the American Hotel. We secured rooms and cleaned ourselves up and then took a walk around the city. Beirut is very beautiful from the sea. Zia Baghdád treated us to ice-cream of assorted colors and tastes, there were at least six different kinds of cream in spoonfuls on the dish. This was very pleasant for it was quite warm. While eating our cream many beggars came by and some of them looked pitiful indeed, but it would not do to encourage them too much for the whole town would be after us.

July 9th, Tuesday:

This morning Mr. Wells and I took a walk through the streets and bazaars and to see about getting our transports back from the police. We first went to Cook's agency to get information about steamers leaving for Haifa and Jaffa. It was there that we learned how to get the transports. On our way back I purchased a string of beautiful ambre beads. I did not know which to choose, the pure ambre of the natural, i decided to take the later at last. We went back to the hotel and then all three went to Baghdádí's shop and met the young believers. The most of them are students at the Missionary College on the hill. Among them was Badí'u'lláh. I did not think to have my camera with me so lost an opportunity to take a picture of them. I may get it later for some of them are going with us to Haifa tomorrow, with Rúhí and his family. In the evening we were taken to Baghdádí's home to see his father who is blind or nearly so. They have a very beautiful home with a beautiful garden on one side of it They treated us to watermelon fruit tea and other dainties, and Hájí Mustafi Baghdádí, the father was very much interested in our journey to 'Akká and in the progress of the Cause in America in general. His father before him was a believer in the Bá'b. Before this we went to the wharf to see Brother Wells off for Jaffa, he left most of his baggage at Beruit and made a pack for himself and intended to travel overland to see the sights about Jerusalem, and other cities of interest to Bible students and then return to Beruit and from was to accompany Mr. Remey to Constantinople, on his return from 'Akká. That evening Mr. Remey and I took a long walk through the town about three miles I should think. Another incident I must record here before forget it, when Mr. Wells left us the Lady at the Hotel gave us another room on the upper floor, No. 19, and we had this for the rest of the time.

July 10th, Wednesday:

Nothing transpired today except to get ready to take the boat for Haifa. We have lots of company with us on our way down to Haifa. Rúhí and family, nine persons four boys from the college, all believers and ourselves. We all took third class tickets and slept on deck all night. The people here think nothing of that. It was a Russian steamer that brought us to Haifa, passing 'Akká again on the way, so near yet so far, arriving at six o'clock in the morning. The sun was just rising when the ship dropped anchor. At 6:30 I took a picture of Haifa from the ship I took a group picture of these young men in Beruit which I had hoped would be a good but It was slightly underexposed. Baghdádí took us to see the Protestant College before we left there which I should have mentioned before. I have a picture of the main building, and their catalogue and several postcards of Beruit. We engaged Cook's agent to take us of here, it cost us $1.25 a piece, we think this is the best way here for it saves the trouble and confusion you would otherwise have with the natives and then it is better in another way for we get through the custom house without having our baggage examined. Then we were taken to hotel Carmel, I have a picture of this hotel. Rúhí and family and the boys found other places to stop for they are at home here.

July 11th, Thursday;

Word was sent over to 'Akká this morning asking when we should come over and the answer came in the evening that we should come early in the morning. In the mean time I went to the Tomb of the Báb, which about half way up the mountain, and took pictures of it, these proved to be good ones here I met Núrí'd-Dín, one of the interpreters, who can speak English fluently. He was at that time preparing a Tablet to be sent to the Assembly at Washington, and asked me to look over the list of names to see if they were spelled correctly.

Núrí'd-Dín took me into one of the rooms of the Tomb Building there was a very handsome rug on the floor, as he approached it he took off his shoes before stepping upon it. I hesitated as to whether I should do the same but he invited me to proceed. So we sat down and talked for some time about our journey and the Cause in America and the conditions at 'Akká and most of all the Master. As I was sitting there one of the little children, a beautiful child, came in to greet me, she came in as with joy and then as she got nearer she drew back in a shy and hesitating way. Núrí'd-Dín encouraged her to come nearer and put out my hands to greet her she was really very cute, took her then and kissed her, then she ran out. Her name is Húrí, the Master named her. Húrí means spirit. I was shown next into the tomb chamber Here Núrí'd-Dín manifested the greatest reverence, tiptoeing quietly and slowly across the floor to the arch opposite and kissed it then turning came out. I remained at the Threshold. After I came out I took a picture of this door. Then he gathered some roses from the garden in front of the Tomb and gave them to me and as we were coming away he gave me a fine bunch of grapes. There is a vineyard, all around the Tomb. But before coming down I went up to the top of the mountain directly above the Tomb alone and took a birds eye view of Haifa showing the Tomb and the German colony, and 'Akká in the distance. I had thought that this view was spoiled, the film upon which it was taken did not roll upon the spool properly and I had to take it out while in the Master's house and I thought it had become lightstruck. When I developed it however it proved to be alright. Mr. Remey and I in the evening took a long walk and on coming back we went down by the sea and looking toward 'Akká said the Greatest Name 19 times. {{p35}}

July 12th, Friday;

At eight o'clock we started on the long [?] to 'Akká passing through the narrow, rough, irregular and [?] paved streets of Haifa, through the market place where [?] the grain which remains in the open treet, or court, day and [?] the wharf and out in the open, that is by the sea shore. [?] fair and beautiful and a little warm. During the [?] I for the most part were silent wondering what we would see or hear or say. After two hours [?] approached the grove of trees which lead to the gate of the city. On our left by the sea there were several men washing their [?] in the surf, on the other side of the grove there were about 150 camels with their owners resting or waiting to make a Journey into the interior. We entered the gate and were driven through the winding and narrow streets, and every now and then there would be an open place which was probably a market. Finally we stopped and by some of the believers coming out to receive us we knew that this was part of our journey was at an end. We went through part of the building into a court which is the garden of the Master. There was several people sitting around to the right of his court who looked at us with some curiosity. We turned to the left and went to the end where was a long flight of stone stairs. I wanted to take a picture of these stairs but was afraid to expose my camera, for I did not know whether all those people were believers or not, the light on them was just right at the time, between ten and eleven in the morning. We ascended the steps and were shown a room to the left overlooking the sea, where were two beds a bench, {{p36}} a divan, the whole length of that side of the room. I have a picture of this and the spot where the Master sat after he greeted us, a small table was in the center. We were requested by the interpreters to be seated and to make ourselves comfortable. Several believers came in and talked to us about various matters about the conditions of 'Akká and we asked about the Master's health. In about 15 minutes the Master came in and Mr. Remey nearest to the door advanced to meet Him and kneeling, the Master embraced and kissed him saying something in Persian. Then he advanced toward me and embraced and kissed me likewise, saying the same things. Then he sat down on the divan and began to talk to us through the interpreters, first saying how glad he was glad to see and inquired about the believers in America and especially in Washington? He stayed only a few minutes on this occasion and going out saying that he was very busy that day. The letters which I had from the believers in America I gave to one of the interpreters to be given to the Master later. An aged believer came in and gave us some of the teachings and explanations concerning the Cause, during this conversation I was very sleepy from the long drive so I lay down on the divan a short time to rest while this conversation was going on. In the mean time, dinner was being prepared and made ready, then when everything was ready, the Master came in and invited us to dinner. Think of me sitting at the Master's Table and sitting beside Him, a very great and rare privilege and one which I can never realize truly, it's true significance and importance. Mr. Remey sat at the head of the table, I sat next to him and the Master sat next to me, the Master's brother sat next to Mr. Remey then the interpreters and others, about twelve in all. {{p37}}

We had soup, meat, potatoes, pilau and watermelon for dinner. This dinner was the best that I had eaten anywhere since I left home, everything was seasoned so nicely and I ate heartily. The Master did not serve as was His custom but a Japanese and a little boy who are in the Master's household served instead. One of the first things the Master said was "Afflictions were bad for the body but good for the soul". In a little while I lost all my sense of strangeness and backwardness and not knowing how long our time would be I began to make my petitions. I first spoke to Him about Marian and Mrs. Barnitz. He said He would pray for them. I presented Mrs. Dixons request to visit Him with her two daughters and sons-in-law, this we granted: that is she and her daughters were given permission to come, but no men, He said. I told Him all the believers had asked us to be remembered in His presence but it would be too tedious to mention them individually. He said He would pray for them all. The table was strewn with jasmine flowers, very fragrant and a bouquet in the middle. From the piece of watermelon which the Master ate I collected 9 seeds to bring home. After dinner we lay down for a short space of time to rest, this the custom here to rest a while in the middle of the day. After this the Master came into our room and spent two hours talking to us. Mr. Remey presented all the requests of the different ones at home, the Master relying to each, it was a long list and took much of our time. Mr. Hannen had asked for string or bonds and the Master immediately gave the ones He had been using himself for him. Mr. Remey and I both received, a string each. Then the presents of each one of the believers who sent presents were presented to Him, among them was a pneumatic matter[?].

Dear Mr. Hoar: {{p1}} {.greet}

You write me that many of the friends in America are anxious to know my impressions of 'Akká and of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. How shall I write so as not to feed the fires of superstition on the one hand, or fail to do justice to the Greatness of the Subject on the other?

There are times when we find the symbols we call words entirely inadequate and when we know that in spite of all efforts to avoid it, we shall be misinterpreted and misunderstood. There are some unkind ones, who if we allow the heart to express itself freely, will accuse us of emotionalism and over credulity. And there are others who, if we restrain the heart and write of facts as facts, setting them forth in their physical aspect only; will accuse us of lack of spiritual comprehension, and almost of infidelity; however, God knows the heart, and acknowledging responsibility to Him alone, I shall endeavor to convey to all interested something of the impressions I received on my visit to 'Akká and the Beloved One in December 1906, now nearly four months ago.

To begin with, I would to God that all the people of the world could see 'Abdu'l-Bahá as I saw Him and knew Him; then indeed would war, strife and conflict cease, the fire of hell and hatred cease to burn, and Peace and Goodwill reign on earth. But if we write of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as a personality, as a man, we must describe Him as the simplest and most humble and most natural man in the world. He indulges in no poses, makes no pretensions, asserts no superiority, claims no special privileges and in no way whatever seeks to impress you with his dignity and importance. He will eat with you, walk with you, talk with you, ask about your health discuss the simplest matters with you, and answer your most trivial questions; in every sense of the word He is natural and in every sense of the word simple. The physical eye will observe no halo, see no sign of supernatural power, detect nothing in fact that might not be noticed in any really good, simple minded and naturally dignified man. We shall see one who, like all those in this world who wholly sacrifice themselves to God, the evil minded can lie about, accuse of evil and of ambition, mock at and revile. In a word, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, will appear to us so simple and so natural that we will wonder what it is that some have been able to see in Him who have set in circulation certain stories which have appealed powerfully to the imagination of many and which may easily, in time, pass into records of signs, wonders and miracle. We will find it difficult at first to realize that this simple, dignified, kindly and lovable man is the center of a spiritual power of knowledge and inspiration which is recreating the world; and is the object of a love and devotion which no man in the history of the world except Bahá’u’lláh, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Father ever received in his lifetime, and this love and devotion is not confined to his followers, but is seen in those who know nothing of the religion of which He is the center. We will see high Turkish officials (his jailers), Turkish women of high rank, and people of all classes and conditions come to consult Him on their most important matters, to seek consolation and advice from Him in their domestic troubles and to ask for his prayers. Twice a week, we will see the poor gather around Him to receive gifts from Him, their only benefactor, their only real protector, in this prison city of squalor and wretchedness; We will plainly see even with the physical eye, that there is something in this simple, unpretentious man, which causes all around Him to lean upon Him in all things, and to regard

Him with a love and a devotion which prevents His bitter enemies, (a mere handful of envious and jealous ones) from speaking ill of Him, except in the most roundabout and stealthy manner. What is it in this Man that conquers all who come in contact with Him? This man to whom all about Him go in their troubles, but who Himself, if He has any troubles never mentions them, except to rejoice over them as victories; this Man who is so universal that from Him we never hear the words. {{p2}}

As I write this or these words, tears fill my eyes and run down my cheeks, I whose heart has often seemed to him like a stone, a man hard-headed and combative by nature, accustomed to giving and receiving blows, one who has never been regarded as sentimental or emotional — I, as I recall my impressions of this Man, am obliged to confess that my heart melts like wax, that the tears blind my eyes, and that all desire for controversy and argument, except as God wills it is taken out of me. What, I repeat, is the strange Power of this Man, so simple, so natural, so unassuming, who asks for himself no special consideration, or reverence whatever, but continually points us to the things of the Spirit and to God. To tell you so as to make myself understood, is beyond any power which God has given to me, or to any man. There are some things which the heart can comprehend, but the tongue can not utter. (In a Tablet to me the Master once wrote) “Turn with thy heart to the heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the hidden mysteries will be revealed to thee”. I have obeyed this command and the mystery has been revealed to me. But I cannot express it in words, not even He can do that. The Mystery however, is no mystery at all to those who can meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá heart to heart, and this meeting can be had, and many have been had without paying a physical visit to ‘Akká. Only through the Spirit can the reality and power of this Man be apprehended. One is reminded of the words of Jesus — “No man cometh unto Me except the Father draw him”.

In spite of all I have said, however, I will try and give you an outer description of the Master. First it must be remembered, that he is 63 years old and that he has lived a life of imprisonment, of constant anxieties and of hardship. He looks His age, but no sign of physical weakness is apparent, on the contrary He impresses you as being full of strength and energy, an example of splendid manhood at that age. His hair and beard gray and the thoughtful lines on His face are in keeping with His years. His beard is not very full, but silvery white and of fine quality. His hair, which is the same color as the beard, he wears it about level with His shoulders; while the hair like the beard is inclined to thinness, there is as I remember, no sign of baldness. His nose is large, slightly aquiline and finely molded. His mouth is large and firm, but without being in the slightest degree hard, indicating a combination of firmness and kindness. His forehead is high and broad and full giving the impression of great intellectual power. But the wonderful thing about the Master's physical personality is His eyes. When I returned to 'Akká the first of June, I shall endeavor to more closely examine and describe those wonderful eyes — at this writing I must confess my inability, and to tell what it is about them that makes them so remarkable; whether they are black or blue or gray, or a combination of colors, I cannot say; in fact, fact, they seemed to change even as I looked at them and into them, as I did more than once. Of this I am quite certain, however, that I cannot think of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, nor say my prayers, without seeing these indescribable eyes, and more than once since I left 'Akká they have looked love at me in my dreams. But one tires of physicalities, the important matter is to try to realize the fragrance of the spirit that is being wafted from that exile city and from that pure heart.

Truly, there is that of 'Akká which cannot be seen with the physical eye, heard with the physical ear or understood with the intellect; a something which the heart can feel and the soul alone apprehend and which cannot be reduced to the physical symbols we call words. When the Master speaks a something is set in motion vibration over and above the physical words, a something which is spirit and life and which bestows spirit and life; and it would seem that outer words are merely a means of contact, or a physical medium of connection between the soul and this spirit and life which is imparted to the soul; that which the soul receives from the words, is far more than the mere outer form of the words would seem to warrant. For instance, I asked the Master for the answer to a question, which had troubled me for more than a year. He answered me in a few words without apparent and particular effort at explanation, yet His simple statement conveyed to me immediately an understanding of the whole matter that perfectly satisfied, perhaps the same words spoken by another would have made no impression for His answer was a simple statement without proof. Uttered by Him, however, they seemed to change the whole current of my thoughts, create a new consciousness in me, and supply me with the power of comprehension, so that a matter which had puzzled me for more than a year was cleared up in an instant. I trust this will convey to you my meaning that the real power at 'Akká is the power of Love and Knowledge purely spiritual in its manifestations, a matter of the heart and of the soul, and has no connection whatever with physical miracle and phenomena. To realize who ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is, to understand His relation to Bahá’u’lláh and to Christ, to comprehend that He needs no other glorification, commendation, or exaltation that He is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. To know why it is that He commands that no other name or title should be given Him and that by no explanation or interpretation can the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá be made more glorious than it is, one must be able with the spiritual eyes to see the things of the spirit. If we are like Him we must realize that we are nothing and that God is all — must eliminate the ego — surrender the self — and allow God to do His work in us instead of imagining that we have any power to accomplish it within ourselves. To be able to apprehend the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is to apprehend at least in part the great truth of renunciation of absolute surrender to God; how easy to say but how difficult to really understand and to do. It means to be conscious of our nothingness and to open our souls and let the Fragrance of the Spirit flow through them. To feel that God is in us is doing our seeing, our willing, our thinking and relieving us of the responsibility. It is to understand that He is the Great Burden Bearer on whose shoulders is the government of all things. Here is the vicarious atonement worth having — a vicarious atonement which brings rest and peace and real salvation. Who are we and what can we accomplish? It is true that the station of man is very high, but it is high because of his capacity to receive God. The breeze of the Spirit blows by the rocks and the trees and the animals, but they are unconscious of it. Man, however, has the power not only to become conscious of it, but to become the instrument of it in the enlightenment of mankind and of the verification of the world; and this is a matter of simple faith. When we realize that we are nothing and stand humbly before God, we will be clothed upon by the Spirit. Adam and Eve tried to make for themselves garments of fig leaves. Useless, God gave them coats of skins. Jesus said “consider the lilies, how they grow; they toil not, they spin not, and yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. If God then so clothed the grass which today is in the field and tomorrow cast into the oven, how much more will he clothe you, “O ye of little faith”, with all our toiling and spinning and fretting, the best we can do is to clothe ourselves with mere garments of fig leaves with mere symbols to hid our ignorance. But those who have found the secret of turning to God and with perfect self-surrender and sure faith, receive spiritual garment so beautiful that the toiling metaphysical schools with their product of so called knowledge becomes a useless trouble and becomes weariness of the flesh. The secret of real spiritual power is the renunciation of self and dependance upon God. This spirit of renunciation and absolute submission and surrender to God is the spirit in which one is bathed in ‘Akká. The lesson of complete reliance upon God for all guidance, and for all knowledge is the Great Lesson we receive there and this is the secret of the Love that radiates from there. For when we submit to God we realize His love in us and radiate it from us. The Master has said that when we “receive the confirmation of the Holy Spirit, we need no other teacher”; but we cannot get that confirmation until we learn to rely on the spirit wholly. I trust that all may learn this great lesson, and cutting themselves from outer personalities, lean entirely upon the inner Reality of which the Prophets are the authoritative and confirmed outer manifestation. To be free from personality, we must be free from our own personality. Once we have attained this freedom other personalities will cease to trouble us. Escaping our own personality, we must find refuge in the personality of God, for God has His personality as we have ours. And to try to escape it is to go to the other extreme of the exaltation of the Ego and to commit spiritual suicide. We are all well.

With Bahá'í love and greetings, Your brother in El Bahá, { .sig }

These are pilgrims notes. However, Mrs. Berthelin Allien would like to tell the friends, she knew both of these men. And she says she is living witness as to the complete change in character of Mr. Hooper Harris. "He was a very argumentive type person and always looking for a fight, but after his visit with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, he immediately became the most loving and gentle person you can image. It was a miracle!" { {p4} }

FOREWORD.

In the preparation of the present volume I have been deeply indebted to M. Nicolas, Secretary of the Persian Legation in Paris, who has written a biography entitled Siyyid ‘Alí-Muhammad, dit le Báb, which is indicative of profound research in both the Persian and Arabic tongues. It is, however, lacking in discrimination, as it uses the untruthful and partisan Muhammadan memorials of the Báb, as of equal authority with those written by his friends, and it is therefore necessary to cull its pages. As the book has not been translated into English, I have taken the liberty of borrowing frankly from its contents, in much that touches upon the story of the Báb and Qurratu’l-Ayn. I must also express my obligations to Gobineau’s famous monograph upon the Báb.

It would be impossible, however, to put into words the treasure of what I owe to my own visit to ‘Akká, and to the long line of travelling Americans returning from that prison city, each of whom perhaps has added a color, an outline or a bit of sunshine to the ensemble of the booklet here offered, may I hope it has caught some fragrance of sweet rich roses, of sandalwood and myrrh?

All the travelers have come back like pilgrims of a new hope, bubbling and overflowing with the ideas, impressions and suggestions drawn from their visit to this inspiring spiritual center, and their contact with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Each has illustrated the reply given by the Servant of God to the questioner who asked him: “Why do all the guests who visit you come away with shining countenances?”

He said with his beautiful smile; “I cannot tell you, but in all those upon whom I look, I see only my Father’s Face.”

CHAPTER I.

THE COMING OF THE BÁB.

Have you ever heard of ‘Abbás Effendi? He is known to his followers as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which means the Servant of God. He has been for many years a political prisoner in ‘Akká, the ancient prison city of the Turkish Sulṭán, but his name is beginning to be whispered everywhere as a symbol of the love which frees, which warms the heart and stirs the world to betterment.

‘Akká was once known as Acre, and its walls frown upon the traveler as darkly as in the day when Richard Coeur de Lion stormed them with his tumultuous crusaders; but since the restoration of the constitution in Turkey and the abdication of ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd, openings have been cut in these strong defences, and the gates are no longer closed and barred.

In the August which followed the wonderful July day that gave the turbaned people the franchise, ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd issued a strange decree, setting free every prisoner held that day within the confines of the empire, and thus ‘Abbás Effendi was liberated.

He had been confined within the walls of ‘Akká since 1868, and had been a prisoner since he was a boy of nine, and perhaps even the promulgation of the constitution would not have broken his bonds. He said to an American guest:

“Whenever I thought of freedom I could not but remember the many sufferers languishing in prison, so I was not able to pray for my own liberation, I must pray for the freedom of all, and I was made happy because at last liberty was granted to every imprisoned one as well as to myself.”

For thirty years ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has not been confined within prison walls, but simply within the limits of the town of ‘Akká, and since 1892 he has been the center of the great Bahá’íst movement that has brought light to the Orient and the Occident.

For many decades troops of pilgrims have poured into ‘Akká from all parts of the world; western merchant and Oriental dreamer have jostled one another in the streets of the prison city seeking the great message of peace and unity, of loving service that has quickened the heart of mankind from the center of oppression.

In spite of the surveillance of the suspicious Turkish police the mansion of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has sheltered countless foreign guests, and English, German, French and American pilgrims have left its generous portals to carry back to their own rushing and progressive commonwealths a sense of the splendor of life that they had never before suspected.

The house of ‘Abbás Effendi is an Oriental structure built round a court, and its situation just beside the sea wall of ‘Akká gives its upper chambers a wonderful outlook over the Mediterranean. Upon the roof is the simple apartment, furnished with the merest necessities, which the Teacher of man occupies during the greater part of the year. It frequently contains no bed, for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is continually giving away this necessity of civilized existence. It is impossible to buy a bed in ‘Akká, and so, when this lover of his kind during his morning walk finds a fever stricken sufferer tossing upon the bare ground, he straightway sends him his bed, and lies upon the hard floor himself until someone discovers his plight and provides him with a new one.

Let no one commiserate him too much in such a sacrifice, however, for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s body is of such slight import to him, that he probably sleeps as sweetly on the uncovered boards as on his narrow cot, and nothing would drive slumber from his eyes so quickly as the consciousness that another needed his couch. To understand the mission of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and its significance to the world, we must go back to the year of his birth in 1844, and to the Persian city of Shíráz, where, in that same year Muḥammad-‘Alí first cried his message into the listening air, and received his title of the Báb or Gate. He was accepted immediately by many followers, as the eagerly expected “Mahdi.” Muḥammadan tradition had lovingly preserved the holy legend of the Twelfth Imám, who had disappeared two hundred and sixty years after the coming of Muḥammad, and whose return was promised in a thousand years. The expiration of that period brought the date 1260 of the Islámic chronology, which corresponds with 1844 of our era.

In Chicago a temple is in process of erection to which funds have been contributed by all the religions of the world, and yet its building is in the hands of Americans. It is to be called the Maszhrak el Azcar, which means the Dawning Place of Prayer, and is the result of the widespread movement which the Báb initiated in 1844. As we shall see, this is a movement of unity and brotherhood, far reaching in its consequences. For years Americans have been despatching missionaries to the Orient, and pouring forth generous floods of money to Christianize the heathen. And now suddenly they have become so Christianized that they have sent a contribution of something like five thousand dollars as their portion towards this great Place of Prayer in the Occident, where they realize that the time of fulfilment has come for all that Christ taught.

The message of the Báb was for the establishment of a world religion which would unite all creeds, and teach men to realize that God is one and the same in every faith that has brought truth to the human heart. Such a teaching must have seemed dangerously heretical to the narrow and theological Muḥammadan priesthood, and therefore the devotees of this new cult, great and simple as it is, have suffered terrible persecution. But its tenets have laid a solid foundation of unity, equality, and brotherhood throughout Persia and Turkey, which has been manifested recently in the constitutional reforms of those countries. Thirty years ago also, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote a book entitled The Mysterious Forces of Civilization, which has just been translated into English, but it has circulated among his Oriental disciples from its first production, giving them ideas of rational and noble human relationships such as can only be realized under a free and constitutional government.

The western world is accustomed to regard Muḥammad as an impostor who misled his followers and taught them to persecute the Christians, but the student has discovered that Muḥammad, so far from persecuting the Christians, wrote out an oath for their protection, which he obliged his followers to sign. He revered Christ as a prophet of God, and necessarily respected the believers in the religion he founded. But Muḥammad's death was followed by the immediate degradation of his noble teaching.

Muḥammad's daughter Fatima was a remarkable woman, devoted to the preservation of her father's cult in its spiritual integrity, her husband 'Alí became his true interpreter, and was designated by the prophet as the one who should stand in his place to keep the faith pure. But because 'Alí was an apostle of peace he was set aside, and the warlike Omar interpolated a new propaganda, which the world still misnames that of Muḥammad, in which the sword usurped the place of the divine Word.

A schism arose consequently among the religionaries of Islám. The followers of 'Alí became the Shiíte sect, and those of Omar the Sunnités. The Shiítes have always been the repository of Muḥammad's mystical teaching, they have been poets and lovers of peace, ponderers of their sacred Scriptures. The Persian Muḥammadans are all Shiíte, while the Turks on the contrary are all Sunnité, and adherents of Omar. So while the Sunnités have controlled the political machinery of the later Muḥammadanism, the Shiítes have produced its sufis, its poets and soothsayers. It is remarkable that Muḥammad should have foretold the coming of the twelve Imáms or holy men, who must keep fresh his teachings in the heart of man, and not only the date of the last one but his reappearance in the year 1260. This accounts for the excitement in regard to the rising of the Mandi* in Africa and Arabia in recent years. The Mandi is the expected Imám, whose rise would revolutionize the world and establish the kingdom of God on the earth, as his zealous converts believed. When Muḥammad-'Alí announced his identity with this Wonderful One for whom the soul of his people yearned, many accepted him immediately. The Muḥammadan Mullás demanded of him sternly: "Who are you?" He replied:

**Mandi means the Inspired or well directed one.*

"I am that One for whom you have been waiting a thousand years!"

But the Mullás refused to recognize him as the True One because they looked for a royal personage, surrounded by state and splendor, bearing many titles, and the inhabitant of purely symbolic localities. To be sure Muḥammad All fulfilled the requirements in that he was a descendant of Muḥammad wearing the green turban, and was a young man of barely twenty-five when he began to deliver his message. But the Mullás had conceived a far more worldly image of a different personage, and besides the Báb did not proclaim the doctrine they wished to hear. They demanded that he should re-enforce their authority, and strengthen their already deeply entrenched theology of degenerate Muḥammadanism.

Instead of that he announced the coming of a new day of God, when all men should become brothers, forgetting their religious differences in the kinship of one universal and loving Father. Moreover he spoke of himself as merely the herald of another who was to follow him, who was to be Bahá'u'lláh, the glory of God, or Him whom God shall manifest. This precious effulgence of the Almighty he de-scribed most lovingly as the greatest revelator of God whom the world had ever known.

He assured his followers that while he him-self would be martyred, the greater one would soon dawn upon the horizon, and that they should see him. When they asked how they might know him, the Báb replied earnestly:

“Every word of his utterance will be so thrilling that you cannot mistake him. If he recites a verse from the Qur’án you will feel in the marvel of his tone that he is the promised one. So do not yield to the conventional fear of being in the wrong, and thus sacrifice the greatest joy of human life, the joy of recognizing a Manifestation of God in his Day!”

The Shiite tradition in regard to the appearance of the Imáms or Holy men is very exact. Djaber ed ‘Abdu’lláh reports that Muḥammad himself foretold their coming, and said of the twelfth:

“This twelfth Imám is he to whom God will give the victory from the rising to the setting, and it is he who will be concealed among his sectaries and his saints. While he is hidden no one will believe in his reign, except the chosen ones to whose hearts God will give faith.”

When Djaber inquired if the Imám would be of value to his followers even in concealment, the prophet responded:

“Surely he will, I swear it by him who has made me his prophet! His faithful ones will be resplendent in his light, and his concealed reign will be as glorious to them as is the sun to other men.”

Among the traditional books of Islám the prescience of the Báb’s arrival is so constant that one wonders how anyone could have failed to recognize him, and it is plainly spoken that his falsifiers shall be found among the great Mullás or clergy. The True One is called sometimes the Gha’im, literally the One who arises. It is said of him:

“The perfection of Moses, the splendor of Jesus, and the patience of Job shall be in him, and his friends shall be abused during his time, and their heads shall be just as the heads of the Turks and Deylanites were exchanged as presents, they shall be slain and burnt, terrified with fear and appalled ; the earth shall be dyed with their blood, and lamentation and wailing shall prevail among their women; these are indeed my friends.”

Again the events of his days are definitely foretold in the prediction of the martyrdom at “Zora,” which is identified as “the city of Rey,” an ancient city near which Tīhrán is built. Thus runs the tradition which Bahá'u'lláh repeats in the Íqán: "Nast thou entered the city of Rey?" "Yes," I replied He inquired:

"Hast thou visited the cattle market?" "Yes." "Nast thou seen the black mountain upon the right hand of the road? There is Zora, where they will slay eighty men of the children of certain ones, all of whom are free from guilt."

"Who will kill them?" I questioned. He said, "The children of Persia."

And in that very spot these eighty poor creatures were tortured to death for no crime except that they accepted the revelation of the True One!

Muḥammad said of 'Alí: "I am the city of knowledge, and 'Alí is the Gate thereto, if there were no gate the city could not be entered."

So each Imám was known as a Gate, and naturally Muḥammad-'Alí gave himself this title which was perpetuated by his followers. Another element of extreme radicalism in his teaching which was necessarily obnoxious to the established faith of the clergy, was that there should be no priesthood in the new Day, but that all should teach the truth of God in the leisure permitted by ordinary avocations. In this the wealthy and powerful Mullás saw the destruction of their caste and privilege, and they could not combat too earnestly a revelation the spread of which must reduce them to the condition of the average man. The Báb also insisted upon the equality of the sexes, and taught that the seclusion of women according to the Muḥammadan law should cease, and that men must take but one wife. His followers among the women therefore took off their veils, and went about as freely as did English women, while their teaching and speaking were marked by a peculiar eloquence and power, as advocates of the new faith.

The Báb was extremely fond of symbolism, and pondered deeply on the spiritual significance of numbers and mathematical forms. The numbers 19 and 9 were especially sacred to him, and as 19 is the series of years constituting the lunar cycle, and provides a more exact chronology for the earth than the movement of the sun, he established a new chronology for his followers according to which there shall be a year of nineteen months, each containing nine-teen days.

He spoke of the awakening of which he represented the dawning point as an ellipse, which is an oblong, larger in the middle than at the ends. He called himself the first Point or Nukta of this ellipse, while the Glory of God, or Him who God shall manifest, should constitute its mighty center.

The Báb was the precursor of Bahá'u'lláh, and yet he also was heralded in his turn, for the completion of the prophesied time was recognized by Muḥammadan students, and many were looking for the twelfth Imám, the great Imám Mandi. Muḥammad-'Alí was an orphan, and was reared by his uncle who intended that he should become a merchant like himself. He received, therefore, only the very limited education which is deemed sufficient for such a business in Persia. 'When he was about nineteen years of age he was sent by his uncle on a business mission to Boushir, and from there went to Kerbelah, where are the tombs of the Imáms.

Though intended for the career of a merchant, Muḥammad-‘Alí was an exceedingly devout young man. He loved to ponder the Holy Scriptures, and was often sunk in meditation upon their hidden meanings. All traditions agree that he was of a peculiarly charming personality. He was beautiful to look upon, and possessed a gift of eloquent and magnetic speech which would have rendered him irresistible if he had been left free to teach his great truth.

At the time of his visit to Kerbelah one of the most distinguished Muḥammadan savants was delivering his lectures there to a crowd of students, and among his disciples were two who became the most noted among the early followers of the Báb himself, Mullá Sádiq, who later was known as Khurasání, and Ḥusayn Bushrú’í, afterwards called the Báb-el-bah, or Gate of the Báb. He was the first convert of the Báb.

Khurasání has told us of his initial meeting with his master. While at Kerbelah Muḥammad-‘Alí was accustomed to go to the mosque at the same hour every day, where he would stand lost in meditation for a long time. Khurasání felt strongly attracted towards him, and determined to address him. He did so upon his next visit to the mosque, but the young man put his finger on his lip, and turned away without response. Khurasání somewhat angered at this rebuff, left the place of devotion at the same time as the stranger, but resolved never to speak to him again. Muḥammad-‘Alí, however, hastened toward him as soon as they were outside the limits of the sacred edifice, and excused himself so engagingly for his apparent discourtesy that he could not fail of pardon.

The young devotee explained that while in the house of prayer he felt it wrong to allow even a vagrant thought to linger in his mind, and could not therefore indulge in conversation of mundane affairs. Khurasání there-upon invited him to come to his house the following evening when he would be honored by a visit from the holy teacher, Shaykh Kazem, and some of his most distinguished pupils. “What a joy to be present in an assembly where the most heavenly light of God will be spoken of!” Muḥammad-‘Alí replied with much delight.

Upon the following evening, however, the company had all gathered before the stranger appeared. The prayers had begun, and Mul-lah Ḥusayn Bushrú’í was discoursing upon the martyrdom of the Imám Ḥusayn when Muḥammad-‘Alí stood upon the threshold.

It is the Persian custom that all shall rise when a person of special distinction enters a room, but Shaykh Kazem was too independent to attend to such points of etiquette, and was never accustomed to notice in any fashion the entrance of belated guests. As the beautiful unknown paused upon the threshold, however, Shaykh Kazem rose, and naturally all followed his example, while a thrill ran through the assembly touching the heart of each one. Mullá Ḥusayn Bushrú’í to whom this advent was to prove of supreme importance stopped speechless for the moment, while the stranger apparently unconscious of the excitement he had caused sank modestly into a seat near the door. Shaykh Kazem begged him to station himself among the more honored guests, but the young stranger from Shíráz refused, and sat quietly until all had taken their departure. Then Khurasání insisted that he should be seated more worthily, and rising without further protest he possessed himself of the place which Shaykh Kazem had occupied.

Shortly afterward the gifted Shírází was no longer seen in Kerbelah, but he was not forgotten. He returned to Shíráz, where, in a few years, he made the amazing announcement of his mission, which he repeated at Mecca, where he went on the holy pilgrimage, but not as an orthodox Muḥammadan.

Before the death of old Shaykh Kazem he had told his chosen disciples that they would see the Imám Mandi. Some of these have re-peated the predictions of the old seer. Soulei-man Khán Qualihi suffered a horrible death as martyr for his acceptance of the Báb's teach-ing, and he said:

"The Shaykh promised me that I should see the reappearance of the Imám Mandi. 'You will be there,' he declared, 'and you will give him your faith.'"

Mullá Ḥusayn Bushrú'í demanded with insistence how the Manifestation would appear, and the Shaykh replied by quoting a verse from the sacred writings:

"I cannot speak more definitely, but the sun of truth from whatever dawning point it may rise will illumine all the horizons; and the mirrors of the hearts of those who love it well, it will adjust them in such fashion that they will receive the emanations of light and knowledge."

Before the Shaykh passed away he announced his approaching departure to his followers, and reiterated his prophecy of the coming of the True One. All broke forth into lamentation, and loudest among them was Kerim Khán. The old Shaykh fixed his eyes upon him and exclaimed:

"Dog! You do not wish that I go, and that after me the Absolute Truth shall be manifested!"

The aged Seer looking into the soul of the man whose complaints massacred the air recognized the Judas of the group, for Kerim Khán became the successor of Shaykh Kazem, the greatest of the 'Ulamá, and the most terrible persecutor of the Báb and his devoted followers. In fact, with the Vizír Aghassi, he was responsible for the murderous execution of the Báb.

The remainder of the group was prominent in the early movement of the Báb, and some of its members were numbered as those "Living Letters" who spelled the new knowledge of God into the heart of the world. After the death of Shaykh Kazem they spent forty days in Kouffa praying in the mosque, and preparing themselves for the great mission they felt was before them. Then they separated to find the Imám, who they were convinced was somewhere in Persia, and to whom they believed they would be led.

Is it not a beautiful picture, this group of praying men, gathered first about the reverend figure of the seer who warned them of the approaching wonder, and then, after his serene departure, waiting together for the confirmation they were certain would come?

They scattered at length to look for the dawning place of the light. Three of them, Bouchrouyeki, Khurasání, and Mullá ‘Alí Goher were united by a friendship which never lessened. Bouchrouychi in his wanderings reached Shíráz just at the moment when the Báb gave the first announcement of his mission:

“Come to me, all ye seekers, for the gate of divine wisdom is opened through my person.”

We can imagine how Bushrú’í fell at his feet, quite vanquished by the light in his face, by the love that radiated from him, and he became his first missionary. The Báb sent him forth to Iṣfahán, to Khurasán, and at length to Ṭihrán, bearing letters to the Sháh, and his Vizír Aghassi, and also to two very different persons, Mírzá Ḥusayn ‘Alí who should later become Bahá’u’lláh, and to Mírzá Yaḥyá, his half brother. This latter individual was known to subsequent history as Subh-y-Ezel. When Ḥusayn ‘Alí was recognized as the promised one, his half brother craving this honor for himself, claimed it, and became the founder of a schism which had no existence except on paper. Western historians have discussed his pretensions as if they had importance, and Professor Brown, of Cambridge, who wrote the Narrative of Persian Travel, and the volumes on Subh-y-Ezel, did not discover that the disciples of the latter never numbered more than sixty, most of whom were members of his own family. Brown spent a day with him in his imprisonment at Cyprus, and filled with sympathy at the tale of trouble he poured into the Englishman’s ears, Brown wrote a history in his defence. He did not reflect that the prisoner was the victim of his own vanity and held absolutely no place in the fulfilment of the Báb’s prophecy, as the followers of the Gate well knew.

Probably the True One perceived as he wrote the letters what was the destiny of each recipient, for all things seemed clear in his vision of the future. The Sháh and Vizír Aghassi threw carelessly aside the documents delivered to them announcing the dawn of a New Day in which the justice of God must reign, and Aghassi was inspired only to that bitter persecution of the True One which ended in his death.

It would be interesting to follow Mullá Bushrú’í in his progress through Persia, and his picturesque encounter with the fellow-students of Shaykh Kazem. It was a simple message that he delivered to these brothers in truth:

“I have found him, lie is in Shíráz, go and see for yourself!”

And they went! Bushrú’í was a militant personality, worthy of confidence, and his friends were in the habit of trusting him.

Innumerable stories are told of the charm and potency reflected in the personality of the True One, of his miraculous wisdom, and the swift and intuitive power which enabled him to meet and overthrow his adversaries invariably with such ease that he would have conquered the world if he had been left at liberty. As one reads one is reminded of the apocryphal tales which reveal to us perhaps the personality of Jesus Christ, and the exquisite gospel stories which picture Him in the house of the publican, or in the court of Pilate, with Martha and Mary, or on the mountain with the intimate group of those he loved.

What was it that rendered him different from all others, that would have rescued him invulnerable, and irresistible had he chosen to be so? It was the breath of God upon him, the heavenly effulgence shining into his perfect mirror, and as we read these later stories, it seems that the light is again gleaming in our dark world!

The clergy of Shíráz, enraged at the persistence of the Báb in preaching his truth, and convinced that he was ignorant and unlettered, and could not withstand them in public de-bate, arranged a grand council in the mosque of the city, where they commanded him to retract his dangerous teachings, threatening him with fearful tortures if he refused. The Báb, however, mounted the pulpit and gave a discourse so eloquent, so replete with the learning of his adversaries, so convincing in its declaration of his own claims, that the antagonists who came to shame him witnessed the conversion of their own public.

Shortly afterwards the Sháh and the Vizír Aghassi moved by the fame of this episode sent, Shaykh Yahyá to Shíráz to reduce this dangerous heretic to submission, and bring back to the court an account of his unquestionable charlatanry. Shaykh Yahyá was an honorable and really devout person, by no means so conventionally conservative in his faith as his superiors supposed. His first interview with the Báb interested him tremendously, and left him, in spite of his mission, impressed with the sincerity and illumination of this unique personage.

At length he asked the True One for a commentary upon the Surat 108 of the Qur'án. The Báb was famous for the illuminated verses which he delivered extemporaneously at the request of anyone who desired an utterance or discourse upon sacred subjects.

In this case the response was immediate and surprising. The Báb gave the commentary, and Shaykh Yahyá realized that it was one that he himself had conceived after long pondering upon this very passage. But he had never committed it to writing, or spoken of it to anyone. It was preserved alone in the treasure house of his soul.

He bowed and departed, deeply troubled. What was this man? Was he a prophet of God? Could an impostor, a charlatan possess such illumination, such insight? He pondered long, and finally decided that he would cast lots with God, so to speak, on this momentous decision. He had always been conventionally received at the house of the Báb, where a serv-ant opened the door and conducted him into the presence of the True One. He decided that on his next visit he would knock softly at the door, and if contrary to custom the Báb him-self came to admit him, took his hand, and did not relinquish it until he was led into the reception chamber, he would accept him as a Manifestation of God, as the One in fact who had been longed for a thousand years!

He prayed earnestly before he started on his momentous journey the following day. He tapped gently on the door, the Báb himself un-closed it, grasped his hand, led him into the salon, and only released his clasp when he had seated him in his chair.

Then the soul of Shaykh Yaḥyá rose within him, he embraced the True One and confessed his faith in him. The Báb rejoiced, over him with an especial happiness, for he was an enlightened man. He accepted gladly the mission the Báb laid upon him, and wrote to the Sháh and Vizír Aghassi of his conversion. As a matter of course his life in this world was completely ruined by this courageous decision, but eternity became his and he had no regrets. He suffered martyrdom soon afterward, and was not long separated from his beloved master.

CHAPTER II.

THE TEACHINGS OF THE TRUE ONE.

The Báb was not long left in peace, how-ever. His wanderings from place to place, his escapes from death were for some time marvelous. His enforced separation from his beautiful young wife added to the pathos of this tragic situation. His bridal day was scarcely over before imprisonment snatched him forever from her side. For a long time she refused to sleep in a bed, and flung herself upon the hard floor, declaring that if she could not share his incarceration, at least, she would weep through the dark hours of each night. At last, however, the True One wrote her a touching letter in which he said:

“Do you not know that when you lie upon the floor I feel all its hardness, and that when you weep my eyes also are drowned in tears?”

After that the poor lady wept no more though the sorrow of her heart never lessened for the wonderful one who had been with her for so short and blissful a moment.

At one time it was planned to destroy the Báb by secret assassination. The authorities did not dare venture upon a public execution, because the True One had won a position of such dignity, through his wisdom and beauty of character, that this did not seem to be advisable, the shock to public feeling would be too great. So the arrangement was made that his house should be entered on a certain date by a band of apparent thieves who would destroy him. After his cruel death the government would decently regret the distressing event.

The date for this catastrophe was appointed, but suddenly cholera broke out with such violence that all fled from the town. The Báb also took his departure, and as a result was protected for some time by the governor of Iṣfahán, Meu'temed ed Dowleh, who be-came a believer, and might have kept the True

One in concealment still longer, but he died suddenly, and his nephew who succeeded him was amazed to discover whom his uncle had been harboring. He demanded of Aghassi what should be done with the Báb. The Vizír was the implacable foe of the great teacher, and knowing his eloquence and charm was determined that the Sháh should not come in contact with him, so he sent him from place to place on one excuse or another.

He appeared before various councils, was insulted and questioned, but invariably astonished his persecutors by the calm, and the perfect illumination, with which he met both cruelty and inquiry. On one occasion he was asked:

“What do you mean by the Báb?”

He replied: {.noid}

“Have you not heard the statement, ‘I am the city of knowledge, and ‘Alí is its gate’?”

As these were Muḥammad’s words in regard to ‘Alí, his successor, and the Báb’s interlocutor was one of the Muḥammadan clergy, no farther comments were necessary.

Again he had been speaking with supreme inspiration, and used the words ear, eye, in the singular. Mullá Muḥammad interrupted him with the query:

“Why do you say ‘eye’ and ‘ear’ when we have two eyes and two ears?”

“Oh, my soul, that means you must listen!” was the response. “Open the ear of thy heart, and comprehend God!”

Another asked him jeeringly:

“Who was it wished you good morning, and gave you the title of Báb?”

“I am that one for whom you have waited a thousand years,” replied the True One.

“And by what can we recognize you,” proceeded the interrogator.

“By my inspired utterance,” said the prisoner with imperturbable calm.

Thereupon his investigators demanded that he should improvise upon some subject, and when he did so, they exclaimed:

“But we do not understand anything that you say!”

Then the inspired one declared: “Whence were you able to comprehend that the Qur’án is the word of God? That which you say of the Holy Scriptures, you should repeat here!”

He was condemned at length to incarceration in the fortress of Mákú. Its governor had heard much of the Báb's teachings, and had wondered at them. Wherever the True One went, in spite of his persecution, and the difficulties thrown in his way, in spite of the public scorn and vile accusations of the clergy, conversions multiplied in constant and unexplainable fashion.

'Alí Khán Mákúí had weighed the words that had been repeated to him. He sympathized heartily with the Báb's thunderings against the corruption and abuses of the age, yet he feared to put faith in him, lest he might prove an impostor.

When the Báb arrived at the fortress, which was perched upon a mountain difficult of access, he asked immediately for permission to go to the public baths. He was always immaculate in his person, and scrupulous in bathing, and in his writings are many injunctions to his followers that they resist the filthy habits of the unregenerate man. He craved at this moment the refreshment of the bath after his tedious and dusty journey.

The governor had in his stables a young horse so vicious and dangerous that no one could ride him. It was in fact perilous to approach him, and almost impossible to put saddle and bridle upon him. The idea flashed into the mind of the governor that he should offer the Báb this charger.

"If he mounts him, and reduces him to docility," reflected Alí Khán, "I shall take it as a sign from God that I am to recognize him as the Promised One whom he claims to be. If on the contrary he is thrown and killed in his struggle with the beast, the State will be easily rid of a bad man, who is only a false prophet guilty of deluding his fellow men."

It required several men to accouter the horse, and conduct him to the entrance of the bath. The attendant explained that the governor wished to save his guest the fatigue of climbing the hill, and had sent his own steed with a little escort to do him honor.

The Báb approached the creature which was rearing and prancing in rage at the compulsion that had been put upon him. The stallion paused trembling, as the Báb caressed its quivering head, and spoke to it with extreme kindness. After a moment the Báb commanded the groom to release the bridle. He mounted the beautiful animal and rode away with the utmost ease. In fact the tradition of the event recalls that the horse sweat profusely in his effort at absolute gentleness in bearing this loving burden.

A crowd of people, who had watched the result of the experiment, knowing the horse and divining the governor's intention, rushed into the bath house and secured in various receptacles the water in which the True One had bathed, while those who were too late to obtain this, wiped up the remaining moisture with towels, and preserved them as relics.

The governor, meanwhile, what must have been his feelings when he saw his prisoner approaching, his furious charger reduced to the submissive temper of a lady's pony? He fell at the feet of the True One, and confessed his faith to him, declaring that he was his faithful servant for all time. The Báb remained in the fortress for nine months in comparative freedom, receiving all who came. He wrote much, and conducted an enormous correspondence, and the sojourn must have offered a welcome respite to the hunted and persecuted saviour of his kind.

One great word which reappeared constantly in the teaching of the Báb, and which lends its color with even more positive decision to the utterances of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, is that of unity. The degenerate followers of Muḥammad, like the degenerate Christians, had become purely partisan; each considering his own religion the only true one was eager to send missionaries with sword or book to convert the world, and each was convinced that only his particular cult could save the soul. The Báb cried aloud the truth that all the sublime prophets of God are revealers of his light. Moses and Zoroaster, Christ and Muḥammad have led mankind to God, and all have been inspired by the same divine breath of the Infinite One.

Each prophet who comes builds upon the foundation of his predecessor, and brings to a greater clearness the conception of God in the human consciousness, so the latest message is necessarily the most complete, though each possesses the same essentials, and all lead to God. Thus the Báb recognized the sacred books of the world as divinely inspired. The Bible, the Qur'án, the Ríg Veda, the Zend Avesta were all a part of the golden flood of heavenly knowledge given to the world to create in the mind of man a true and reverent conception of the ethereal and loving spirit that is behind all being. So the Báb regarded his own appearance as a fulfilment of prophecies not only in the Qur'án, but in the Zend Avesta and the ancient Hindu scriptures, as well as in the Bible. He believed his mission was for the evangelization of the world, and that the coming of the wonderful day of God he heralded had been foretold by divine messengers in many languages.

His conception of God was exceedingly lofty. He revealed the Creator as pure spirit, manifested in all things, but also hidden in his unmanifested essence, which is quite beyond the comprehension of ordinary mortals. But to advance, man must arrive at a knowledge of God, and therefore the prophets or manifestations of God have lived as pure mirrors everywhere, reflecting the light of the mighty central sun. The minds of men in their turn receiving the radiance of these lovely mirrors become filled with the true conception of God, and having once accepted the vital imprint of truth, grow in grace and add their touch to the increasing stature of spiritual manhood.

Civilization is thus the result of the applied knowledge of God that the different prophets have brought to the universe, for whether or not one yields faith to them, they have been among all nations the enlighteners of the earth, the brilliant torches of progress so far in advance of their contemporaries that almost invariably they have been martyred for the truth they proclaimed.

In later ages it often happens that the independent thinker is more filled with the spirit of the original message than its theology building upholder, so that Voltaire was as deeply indebted to Christ as Calvin, and Galileo was nearer to the divine source of wisdom than the church which condemned him as a heretic.

The writings of the Báb were numerous, considering his short mission, and are, of course, the result of the leisure rising from his continued confinement. Among these the Bayán, or Clear Exposition is most remarkable, and together with the Seven Proofs is most generally read. None of his books have yet been translated into western languages, so that we are obliged to depend upon the slight transcripts that have been granted us by Arabic and Persian scholars for an opinion of them.

Besides these important volumes however, there is a mass of wonderful letters, prayers, and addresses, all illuminating and only less remarkable in character than the production of Bahá'u'lláh. Many of the Báb's letters are exceedingly vivid and eloquent, and attest not only his vital inspiration, but that sensitiveness and feeling which so endeared him to all with whom he came in contact. Here is one:

“Oh, thou who art sorrowful! I have read thy letter, and thy sorrow and thy tears have filled me with grief! But as I am today in Paradise, I obey the command of God and say: Glory to God who has protected me from torment! This God is sublime, and beyond all the qualities which men could attribute to him!

“Now thou also, even as I, glorify God, who has kept thee also from torment! In truth! Our God is he who pardons, he who is the provider! Now, oh, man, do not be distressed by anything, for thy distress affects me! Do not weep for anything, for thy tears cause mine to flow, and henceforth I can give thee no orders, for I love thee! Be now firm in obedience to God; In truth thou art firm in the friendship of God. Be patient in the misfortunes that assail thee, for what thou seest is the way of fortune. It is not extraordinary that such torments assail the friends of God, it is not strange that men gather to the name of him who is the cause of the creation of all, who is the Primitive Will himself, the name of Maha Viya. Fie upon fortune! Fie upon fortune!”

Another written at Makou to the father of A. Siyyid Husayn, is very touching. The latter was the secretary of the Báb, who was condemned to execution with his beloved master, but feigned a recantation of his faith at the last moment, according to the Báb's wish, in order to write an account of his last hours, for the consolation of the bereaved friends of the cause. The communication runs as follows:

“In truth I have read the letter which thou hast sent to thy son. May God recompense thee for thy great sorrow, and for thy great patience in this sorrow! May God increase thy patience! And as for me, because I love death, I say for you these four verses:

“Oh, Death, thou who permittest none to escape, come and deliver me also from the difficulties of this world!

Thou art, O Death, the one who has taken all my friends!

Truly it is in thee that I see the safety of all those who love me!

O Death, ever thou dost turn towards one of my friends as if someone had pointed him out to thee!"

The remainder of the epistle is filled with those tender and intimate details which one addresses only to the beloved. It had been inspired by news of the death of a son and brother, in his secretary's family, and shows how clearly the Báb felt the deprivation of each one in the family circle at the loss of this cherished member.

Some of the Báb's writings, while in the fortress of Makou, were almost pathetic in their recognition of the oppression that must follow the illumination that enveloped him, and rendered his earthly pilgrimage so difficult. He says in one passage:

"The fruit of religion is to believe in the manifestation of the Báb, and they have imprisoned him at Makou!" He says again that all had much respect for him while he remained a simple gentleman, but heaped insults and scorn upon him as soon as he became a Manifestation of God!

He reproaches the Muḥammadans that they expected the coming of the Mandi with such impatience, and imprisoned him as soon as he appeared!

In another curious passage he pities the Muḥammadans who refuse to recognize him, "because," he declares, "in your eagerness to serve God you flout and distress Him!"

He goes on, speaking of God in his own person, but not in blasphemy, as one might imagine at first. He speaks thus in that recognition of the spirit of illumination upon him which led Christ to say:

"I and the Father are one." "There is no other way to the Father save through Me."

The Báb continues: "In spite of the utterances which distill from My power, and the treasure of which rests in this person, the Báb, in spite of the utterances which issue from his lips only by My permission, behold, with no shadow of right, you have immured him on the summit of a mountain the inhabitants of which are not even worthy to quote them! Near him, that is near Me, is no one, not even one of the Letters of Life of My book. Besides his two hands, which are My hands, he has not a single attendant to light his lamp for him at night, and behold, the men of the earth have been created solely for his existence it is by his generosity that they are full of joy, and they do not give him one light!"

Again his sense of exaltation drives away the consciousness of suffering, and he says:

“All that belongs to the man of Paradise is in Paradise. This solitary chamber (in which I am) and which has not even a door, is today the greatest of the gardens of Paradise, for the tree of truth is planted there, all the atoms which compose it cry: ‘In truth there is no other God than God ! In truth I am God, and there is no other God than Me, the Master of the Universe!’ “

He says in his letter to the Sháh, which he begins with his customary exalted praise of divine unity:

“And now let me tell you a secret, this man has imprisoned in my person all the prophets, all the saints, and all that the knowledge of God has embraced, and there is no sin of any degree under which I have not groaned!”

Again he says: “As for me, I am that point of God whence all that exists has found existence. I am that face of God which dies not, I am that light which is never extinguished. He who recognizes me is accompanied by all good, he who repulses me has behind him all of evil.”

“The light of God which shone upon the mountain for Moses is my light,” he declares farther. He discusses the passage of the Qur’án in which the return of the Imám is foretold. It is the fourth verse of the thirty-second chapter, and runs:

“God conducts the affairs of the world from heaven to earth, then recalls all to himself for a day, the duration of which is a thousand years of our computation.”

This closing of the gate of knowledge was in 260 of the Muḥammadan era, when the twelfth Imám disappeared, and the Báb quotes the question of Moufazzl who demanded when the Mandi would arise, and the answer of the Imám, who replied: “He will manifest in the year 60, and his name will be a great one.”

This, of course, indicates the often repeated year of 1260, corresponding to our date of 1844, which was that of the Báb’s manifestation.

One of the most touching of these utterances is that in which he speaks of his coming successor, the Glory of God; “I am only the suggestion of what he will be,” he says, “and may the followers of my Bayán not persecute him as the followers of the Qur’án have persecuted me!”

CHAPTER III.

THE MARTYRS AND THE BÁB’S DEATH.

While the Báb was imprisoned in the fortress of Makou his faith spread tumultuously through Persia, and the blood of the martyrs poured copious floods in demonstration of the ardor with which they accepted his teachings. It is not within the purpose of this volume to describe the horrors which took place at Mázindarán, or Zanján, or even the atrocities that were inflicted upon the Bábís in general in the effort to turn them from their faith.

Bushrú'í had been sent to the province of Mázinarán, and prosecuted his missionary work there so vigorously that presently the entire community was aflame. The people took arms in defence of their faith and for a long time resisted the soldiers of the Sháh that were marched against them. Civil war raged, indeed, until at length Bushrú'í, the Bábu'l-Báb fell, and the slaughter had reached such an enormous figure that peace reigned from pure inability to struggle longer. Meanwhile it is said that no Bábí ever recanted, and the "Friends" as the followers of the Báb called themselves, sought death so fearlessly that the troopers of the Sháh could scarcely be induced to combat them. They came to be regarded as invincible, and whenever they were executed, even with the most horrible tortures, their joy and exaltation were so manifest that all who had witnessed their destruction demanded knowledge of the faith which eliminated the fear of death, and rendered so evident the presence of God.

Mullá Muḥammad-'Alí, a remarkable man in Zanján, was a leading member of the clergy there who took the title of Hujját ul Islám. He had become a paramount influence in the city, and when so much was repeated of the Báb's strange teachings, he despatched one of his followers to the True One, to discover the meaning of his existence. The messenger returned one day as Hujját was surrounded by his pupils, and bowing low delivered a letter from the Báb which he had carried in his breast. His master took it, perused it with greatest attention, then rising cried, "Alláh ou Akbar!" and seating himself again, resumed his lesson. Presently, however, his feeling became irrepressible. Starting to his feet he declared once more, "Alláh u Akbar !" and turning to his pupils exclaimed:

"It would be a shameful thing to continue to seek a proof after one has arrived at the end! To search for knowledge when one is in possession of his object is a waste of time! Close your books for the master is risen! Hear the news of it! The sun which makes our path clear has appeared! The night of ignorance and error is annihilated!"

He then cast aside his turban, called for a fresh Koulah, and when this was brought him proceeded to adjust it upon his head, while he recited in a loud voice the prayer for Friday, which must replace that of all other days when the Mandi has revealed himself.

He next expatiated upon the Báb calling himself the most humble of his slaves.

"My knowledge beside his is like a candle extinguished in the light of day," he exclaimed, "Know God by God, and the sun by his rays, for today the Sahab ez Zeman has appeared, the Sulṭán of possibilities is living!"

One can imagine that after so enthusiastic a conversion Houd jet lost no time in sharing his truth with his townspeople, and they accepted it with the same eagerness their teacher had displayed. Shortly afterwards the Báb passed near Zanján on his way to Makou, and Hujját wrote him begging for an interview, and also for permission to rescue him from his guards. The True One refused both requests, but comforted his follower with the assurance that very soon they would both meet in the other world.

The very day after the receipt of this letter Hujjât ul Islâm was seized by the Shâh's guards, and transported to Tihrán, which, for him, was the beginning of the end. He had previously attracted the attention of the Shâh, for the clergy of Zanjân had complained of his radicalism, and he had been obliged to explain his views to his royal master. At that time he had charmed the Shâh by the frank expression of his illuminated criticism upon the shortcomings of the Muḥammadan clergy, and their grasping love of money. The Shâh had sent him home on that occasion with a full pardon, but now affairs were sadly different. He had stirred a dangerous hubbub in his city over this strange heresy of the Báb, and in order to avoid absolute confinement in prison he was obliged to give the Shâh his promise that he would not escape.

This situation was relieved for Hujjât by the death of the Shâh, and by the appointment of a new governor for Zanjân. Feeling that his parole did not hold with the new government, Mullá Muḥammad-‘Alí departed for Zanjân, where he was received with a tumultuous ovation. The insurrection of Mázindarán had roused all hearts, and the Bábís everywhere were ready to join their besieged companions and fight with them for freedom of faith.

Hujjât would not permit this, and did his utmost to preserve peace, but in the tense atmosphere of the moment, it seemed impossible. An accidental brawl resulting in the serious wounding of a Muḥammadan precipitated the conflict, and the streets of Zanjân, like those of the villages in Mázindarán, ran with blood. The Shâh sent his troops against the fated city, under the leadership of Ferrouk Khán, one of his favorite princes. This brilliant young man was slain by a half insane old woman after he had been taken prisoner, and the Shâh's anger at the sacrifice gave countenance to every imaginable cruelty.

Hujjât was taken by surprise by a platoon of soldiers and killed in the house where he was sheltered with a handful of followers. Those who remained buried his body with the utmost care, that no trace of its existence might reveal the place of sepulture, but the Muḥammadans were determined to discover it, and shame the believers by its mutilation.

In the pursuit of this purpose they subjected the survivors to horrible tortures, for instance, one martyr had boiling oil poured upon his head, but his silence remained inviolate. At length a child of seven years was secured, who knew the secret, and it was drawn from him by cajolment and deceit. Then the body of Hujjât was dragged from its place of repose, paraded through the blighted city, until every abuse and ignominy had been inflicted upon it. Finally its shattered remnants were thrown to the dogs, but the courageous "friends" who had watched it all with tortured eyes, gathered them together, and preserved them as sacred relics. In the orgy of blood which resulted from this sacrifice the devoted Bábís were shot down, or bayoneted by hundreds, and it became a familiar sight to see a company of these innocent people slaughtered one by one or in mass, as the commander of the Muḥammadan troop saw fit to decide.

Meanwhile the people who looked on, and frequently took no part in the massacre, said to one another:

“But why should they murder these poor Bábís? They believe that the Imám has come. Well, we believe it is time for him to arrive, and perhaps it is true that he is here!”

So the very means taken to hinder the growth of the movement hastened its spread, and the on-lookers who did not become drunken with blood caught the ecstasy of the martyred ones, and adopted their faith.

One remarkable part of the Báb’s teaching was that death did not separate the souls of the believers from their previous scene of action, but only increased their power.

“All those who work for this great cause,” he declared, “will continue to do so whether they are in the body or out of it. If they are martyred they will attach themselves to those who can best receive their influence, and the power of these will be doubled or quadrupled by this dynamic assistance of those who have already left the scene of outward action.”

The followers of the Báb therefore watched their companions and themselves after a terrible martyrdom, convinced that their mighty struggle would receive a fresh impetus from the souls of the departed. Naturally death lost all terrors for them. They knew that in reality there is no such thing as death, and in the ecstasy of martyrdom clairvoyance and prophecy became frequent phenomena. To them the mysterious change to another plane of existence merely enhanced the intensity of life.

Meanwhile Houdj et and Bushrú’í, the Báb-el-bab, had given up their lives for the cause, and the Báb himself was executed at Tabriz, on the morning of July 8, 1850. Thus the inspired leader of the movement, and his most important disciples were gone, and it must have looked to the Persian authorities as if the strange excitement over him who claimed to be the Mandi, would come to an end. They forgot, however, how completely the True One had rested his teaching on the fact that he was merely the Herald of Him whom God shall Manifest, Bahá’u’lláh, the Glory of God.

Again and again he said, “I am a letter out of that most mighty book; a dew-drop from that limitless ocean, and when He shall appear my true nature, my mysteries, riddles, and intimations will become evident, and the embryo of this religion will develop through all the grades of its being, and ascent, attain the most comely of forms, and become endowed with the robe of Blessed be God, the Best of Creators !” The entire Bayán revolves around the prediction of “Him whom God shall Manifest” and “The Bayán and such as are believers yearn more after Him than the yearning of any lover after his beloved!”

In spite of dire persecutions visited upon the “friends” the teaching of the Báb

continued to spread with miraculous swiftness in the period before his death, and the Sháh querulously called the attention of his Vizír to this fact, saying:

“It is all the fault of Aghassi. He sent the Báb to Makou instead of bringing him here, before a tribunal, as my father wished. If that had been done, his foolishness would have been demonstrated long ago.”

The Vizír responded: “The words of kings are the kings of words!” and from that moment the execution of the Báb was decided upon, though it has been said that here as on the previous occasion the Vizír acted without the authority of his master. The Sháh wished to see the Báb, the Vizír feared his magnetic contact with the head of the state, so he was removed to the fortress of Chirik, and then, instead of being brought to Tíhrán, he was carried to Tabríz and executed.

Before this dolorous event transpired, however, the True One was paraded about the town, led shamefully in procession through the principal streets, in an endeavor to render the holiest and most illuminated being in the world an abject and criminal spectacle.

The night before his martyrdom the Báb had spent in prayer with the two devoted friends who were to be executed with him, A. Siyyid Ḥusayn, and Mullá Muḥammad Yezdi. In order that the afflicted remnant of followers might be comforted in his loss, the True One arranged with Siyyid Ḥusayn that he should appear to retract on the way to the place of punishment, and thus being reprieved, could write for the world the commands of the Beloved One, and the story of his last hours.

The Báb, six months before, had transmitted to a faithful follower a letter marked “To be opened when you have suffered a great affliction.” When the execution was made known the seal was broken and the contents revealed a prediction of the author’s execution at Tabríz on the day of the fatality.

The melancholy journey to the hill of execution was varied by attempts to win the denial of their faith by the Báb’s two companions, and Siyyid Ḥusayn apparently yielded. But he sought martyrdom later in Tíhrán, and thus proved his courage and his abiding love for the True One.

Nothing shook the determination of Mullá Muḥammad Yezdi, however. When the little party arrived at the fatal hill, his wife and children were brought to him, but he refused to listen to them, asking only that he might be shot before his beloved leader. This request, of course, was not granted, but though his executioners were not clement, a higher power was more so, as will be seen.

It may be recalled that one of the titles which the glorious re-incarnated Imám must traditionally bear was that of Sahab-ez Zeman, the Master of Time, and this had never been given the Báb. Strange to say, it became his at the moment of execution, for the mount upon which he was shot to death was called the Place of the Sahab-ez-Zeman. The unbelievers had constantly reverted to the fact that he did not claim this name, yet it must always be associated with him through the dramatic events of his passing. It is a symbol of the Twelfth Imám.

The Báb and Mullá Muḥammad were suspended to the wall by ropes, and a regiment of Christian soldiers was drawn up to fire upon them, so that a thousand bullets assailed them at once. The body of Mullá Muḥammad was riddled with shot, but he turned his head toward the True One, and asked, to the amazement of all, in a perfectly audible voice:

“Master, are you content with me?”

The True One, however, had not been touched by one of the thousand bullets. The cords that bound him to the wall were cut, but he did not receive a wound. He fell upon his feet, and stood smiling at the soldiers whose firearms had been leveled at him in vain. He made no attempt to fly, though he could easily have escaped in the shock and consternation of this miraculous moment. He seemed to say to his executioners:

“You may extinguish the Light, but not until it wishes to give place to darkness!”

At the command of the officers he was seized and bound again, but the soldiers absolutely refused to fire upon him.

“This is a divine man!” they cried. “We will do him no harm!”

The officers were obliged to march the men away, and call up a regiment of barbarians, who knew nothing of what had taken place. So at length the tragedy was accomplished, and again the True One, the Liberator, the Herald of Truth, gave his body as a sacrifice for the hearts of men!

The physical relics of the Báb were thrown into the ditch to be devoured by the dogs, but they were rescued by his faithful followers. Muḥammad Yezdi’s remnant was buried, and that of the Báb preserved in the house of Souleiman Khán in Tabríz, until a communication had been sent to Ḥusayn ‘Alí at Ṭihrán, he who later became Bahá’u’lláh. According to the latter’s directions, the case containing the body of the True One was forwarded to Ṭihrán, and was finally placed in the favorite cemetery of the Bábís, where it remained for a number of years, then Bahá’u’lláh, who was at that time a prisoner at Adrianople, sent word that the precious relic must be removed, and soon afterward the building in which it had been secreted was destroyed, so that the earthly tenement of the Báb would have been lost if it had not been safeguarded in this clairvoyant fashion. The body lies now in the simple and noble tomb on Mount Carmel, which has been erected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and the feet of many pilgrims turn thither from distant lands into which the light of the True One’s message has penetrated.

There is a glory of youth about the tragic mission of the Báb, which, from the human standpoint, is irresistible and compelling. He was but twenty-five years old when he gave his announcement that a new Day of God had dawned, a day of brotherhood and unity, when all men shall begin to love one another, a day of Manifestation, when men shall again learn to know God, “and I am the Herald of this Day!”

Courageous and loving to a supreme degree, the spirit of God upon him seemed to enhance the splendor of his youth, to intensify the accent of his consecration. He was two years younger than Jesus when he gave his life in the same sacrifice for the salvation of the world, declaring himself the precursor of that wonderful second coming so long expected. The theologians have destroyed the beauty of youth in Jesus, but its radiance will always linger upon the Báb, who will be remembered as a wonderful illumined boy going to martyrdom with a smile upon his lips!

CHAPTER IV.

Qurratu'l-'Ayn

Among the many women who accepted the new teaching with eager hearts none has won such distinction as Zarrine Tad j, Crown of Gold, known to the world as Qurratu'l-'Ayn. This title, which means Consolation of the Eyes, she was given on account of the extreme beauty and charm which were her portion. She was the daughter of Mullá Saleh Barra-kani of Casvine, a man illustrious in learning and wealth, and born of a family distinguished for the same fortunate possessions.

From her infancy Qurratu'l-'Ayn was notable for the qualities which rendered her remarkable in later years. She received such an education as only her social position rendered possible in those days, and became famous, not only for her poems, which were popularly repeated, but for her unusual learning and judgment.

Thus, though obliged to submit to the seclusion of a Muḥammadan woman she was accustomed to take part in the lessons and lectures of her learned father and uncle, and would sit in a hall with two or three hundred students, protected by a curtain. From the shelter of this veil she did not hesitate to dispute the conclusions of her accomplished relatives, and she became famous throughout Persia for her differences with the mullahs, who frequently yielded precedence to her, and adopted her opinions.

She was unique among her conservative connections for her ardent independence, and her radical views, and yet she was so loved by them all that they never dreamed of disputing her right to think as she pleased. Marriage did not alter her position, which remained supreme, and it was natural that she should early have become interested in the Proclamation of the True One. She entered into correspondence with him, and in 1848 frankly confessed her faith in him.

With her spirit and courage no half way measures were possible, and she was soon one of the most inspired and eloquent teachers of the new truth. She naturally was delighted with the declaration of the True One that the sexes are equal, and that the seclusion of women according to the Muḥammadan custom is wrong. She took off her veil therefore, and went about freely teaching the new truth, out-raging thereby all the traditions of her very honorable family.

When a woman like Qurratu'l-'Ayn became convinced of the injustice endured by the women of the faith in which she had been reared, she would stop at nothing to rouse them, and ameliorate their condition. Naturally courageous the Báb's teaching in regard to death and the other world made her long for martyrdom, and only the position of her family prevented her obtaining this crown before the execution of the Báb. She was with Bushrú'í in Mázinarán, and was closely associated with him and with Khurasání in all their work.

She became famous for her predictions in regard to the fate of various eminent public men who persecuted the Bábís, and so many of these were almost immediately fulfilled that she was looked upon as infallible in such clear seeing. Significant in this way was her prophecy of her uncle's death. Mullá Taghi Barrakani was distinguished for his literal interpretation of the sacred writings, and his adherence to the mere written word of all Muḥammadan tradition. He was especially irritated at the new freedom of his niece, and her adoption of the dangerous heresy of the Báb.

The prominent position of the Mullá rendered him at once a protection and a menace to Qurratu'l-'Ayn. After one of her teaching tours in which she had roused much comment by her independent speech and action, he brought her to her father's house, and gave her to understand that he would confine her there until he had reason to believe that she would be more prudent in her conduct. He issued his orders to the servants therefore that she should not be permitted to leave the mansion.

He sought her presence meanwhile, hoping by argument and persuasion to recall her from her dangerous course. He was doubly irritated by the calm with which she listened to his angry words, and the sweet wisdom with which she answered his objections. At length unable to restrain his fury he turned upon her, and cursed the True One, showering insult upon his name. Gazing fixedly upon the enraged man Qurratu'l-'Ayn exclaimed:

"How unfortunate you are! For I see your mouth fill with blood!"

Mullá Taghi was accustomed to rise very early, and repeat his devotions at the mosque at an hour when as a rule there was but one priest in attendance. The following morning he wended his way as usual to the place of prayer, and in the instant of crossing the threshold he was struck upon the mouth by the lance of a hidden assailant. The attack was followed up by five or six other assassins who sprang at him furiously, and did not pause until the life was beaten from the mangled body of the famous Mullá. No doubt his own injustice and tyranny were responsible for this tragic death, but as usual the strange insight of Qurratu'l-'Ayn had foreseen its coming. 'Ehe assassination removed a serious obstacle from her pathway, though she would have been the last to wish such a catastrophe.

For some years longer Qurratu'l-'Ayn pursued her own course with such brilliant results that it was said when she addressed an audience upon the Revelation of the Báb, all were immediately converted to her faith. Her eloquence and magnetic force were so pronounced that sometimes women were carried out fainting from the assemblage where she spoke, and men broke down and sobbed.

The story of her martyrdom is very touching. She was an exceedingly feminine person in spite of her power, extremely gentle, and possessed of an alluring charm that rendered her irresistible. It was at length decided to confine her in the house of Mahmond Khán, Kalanter of Casvine. Here she remained a long time, receiving numerous visits from both men and women. The latter she pleased invariably, and left upon them an indelible impression of the dignity and freedom the new religion imparted to women. In her discussions with the husbands also she talked much of the improved position of women, and al-ways found a way to refute their conservative arguments.

She maintained a certain reserve during her stay in the household, where her station was nominally that of an honored guest. She rose very early, usually before dawn, and sang her prayers in a low tone while she bathed. She was very particular as to her ablutions, often performing them at night in the fountain of the woman's court, after every one but herself had retired. She dressed as carefully as if for a reception, preferably in white, but usually saw no one until evening, unless there was a special request for her presence, and this was certain to be made if guests appeared, for no one was considered so fascinating as Qurratu'l-'Ayn.

In the course of her confinement one of the daughters of the family was married, and the wedding was a splendid affair, for which no expense was spared. Musicians and dancers had been provided for the entertainment of the company, but presently all demanded Qurratu'l-'Ayn, and as soon as she appeared the dancers were sent away as all were immediately absorbed in the conversation of this wonderful woman. The guests even forgot the sweets provided for their refreshment, of which oriental women are extremely fond. No one wished to do anything but listen to Qurratu'l-'Ayn.

Various councils were arranged for her, attended by the learned Mullás, in the hope that contact with trained masculine minds might lead her away from the religious fallacies into which she had fallen. But invariably she met logic with a better reasoning, and plead her cause so admirably that her would-be instructors were discomfited.

One day, however, she lost patience. She encountered always the same arguments of a theological school, which seemed to her awakened mind but shallow emptiness. The Báb could not be the expected Mandi because he did not bear this title or that, and finally because he did not spring from the cities of Djab ul Ka, and Dj ab ul Sa.

She responded violently that these places never existed, and were invented by traditional theology as symbols, that the ideas in regard to them were the product of morbid minds. This was undoubtedly true, and perhaps was as well known to her adversaries as to herself. Still they persisted.

At length worn out by their obstinacy she exclaimed:

“The reasonings you advance are those of an ignorant and stupid child! When will you cease these insanities and lies? When will you lift your eyes to the Sun of Truth?”

The Mullás outraged at what they considered her blasphemy withdrew immediately, and then and there decided upon her death. They could never recall her from her heresies, they could not lessen her constantly growing influence over their women, and their only safety lay in putting her out of the way. They said nothing of their decision, however, for they well knew that if the Bábís suspected for a moment that danger threatened Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, they would rescue her at any cost.

One night she left her chamber as she was accustomed to do, and bathed in the fountain of the enclosed court, which is always part of the woman’s house in an oriental residence. She was singing softly during this little ceremony and seemed very happy.

She returned to her chamber, perfumed herself, and dressed entirely in white. Then she made the tour of the house, visiting all the ladies, saying farewell to each as if she were going on a long journey. She begged them to excuse every inconvenience her stay in the mansion might have caused, and to forgive any wrong she had done while there.

They asked her in surprise, “What does this mean? Are you going to leave us?” And she replied:

“I am going on a very long journey tonight.”

She spoke with such joy, she appeared so strangely exulted that all wept at her words, for they loved her exceedingly.

While they were talking there came a knock at the street door.

“Go quickly and open!” she cried, “they are looking for me!”

It was the Kalanter himself who entered. He went directly to her chamber and said to her:

“Come Madam, they are asking for you!”

“Yes,” she responded, “I know, I know where you will take me, and what you will do to me, but beware! The day will come when your master will cause you to be slain in your turn!”

This prediction was verified shortly afterward, and is the more remarkable as the Sháh himself had ordered the execution of Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, at the instigation of the Mullás, but all had been kept a profound secret.

She went out with the Kalanter dressed as she was. Her friends did not guess where she was going, and only learned of her execution the following day.

The utmost precautions had been taken to prevent the rescue of Qurratu'l-'Ayn. The nephew of the Kalanter had been ordered to draw a cordon of police about the house of the Kalanter, and the garden of Ilkhani, though the reason for this was not explained. The inhabitants were forbidden to be upon the streets later than three hours after sundown. At four hours from this time Qurratu'l-'Ayn was removed from the house. The Kalanter put her in charge of his nephew, to whom he gave a folded paper, saying:

“You will take this woman to the garden of Ilkhani, and place her in the hands of the Serdar ‘Azíz Khán. Then bring me a receipt for her delivery.”

A horse was led forward and the victim mounted upon it was convoyed silently through the deserted streets, which would have been a scene of wild uproar if the town had dreamed the villainy that was plotting. The young escort was in constant dread of rescue, and breathed a sigh of relief when the garden was at last reached. The Serdar was awaiting him, and leaving his prisoner carefully guarded in a lower chamber, he demanded his receipt.

“You are sure that no one has seen you?” asked the Serdar.

“No one,” was the response, “Give me the receipt.”

Upon this he was informed that he was to assist in the execution of Qurratu'l-'Ayn, and could not have his receipt until this was accomplished. We are not told that the young man objected to this brutal office, and the ceremony proceeded somewhat as it had been planned.

The Serdar called a Turkish valet who had been in his service for some time. He was a fine looking fellow with a handsome face. The Serdar spoke flatteringly to him, told him he had recognized his merit, and wished to reward him. Then he gave him twenty pieces of gold, telling him to spend them as he pleased, and handed him a silk handkerchief.

“Go with this officer,” he added, “to the lower chamber. There you will find a young woman who is an infidel, and is turning the women away from the pathway that Muḥammad has marked out for them. Strangle her with this handkerchief. You will thus render a great service to God, and I will reward you generously.”

The two men descended to the room where Qurratu'l-'Ayn had been left, and found her in prayer. The valet approached her to execute the order he had received, when she turned, fixed her eyes upon him, and exclaimed:

> “Oh, young man! It would be unmanly of you to soil your hand with this murder!”

It would be impossible to explain what revolution these simple words caused in the soul of the youth, but he fled as if insane. The officer followed him, and he rushed into the presence of the Serdar, crying:

“You may do with me what you will, but I cannot carry out your orders. I will not touch this woman!”

The Serdar sent him away, and after thinking a moment, ordered up a trooper who had been put to work in the kitchen as a punishment for disorderly conduct. He poured him a stiff glass of brandy, knowing he had drunk no liquor for some weeks, assured him that he now had an opportunity to regain the good will of his master, handed him another handkerchief, and commanded him to execute Qurratu'l-'Ayn.

This time the murder was quickly accomplished, for the brutal fellow fell upon his victim without an instant's hesitation, and she made no resistance. Before the deed was fully complete, however, there was a disturbance. Fearing the ever dreaded rescue the assassins dragged the fainting but still living woman to an abandoned well in the garden. They hurled her into its depths, and hastily flung stones upon her until the place was filled up sufficiently to conceal all evidences of the vile deed that had been perpetrated.

So died one of the most charming women of the world, a martyr to her religion, but more especially to the enfranchisement of her sex. Wherever the cause of the liberation of women is championed the name of Qurratu'l-'Ayn should be recalled as the brave woman who shed her blood for the True One, but who never failed to remind her hearers that the enlightened hearts of the future must ensure the freedom of women.

What splendor of life is in the record of these exalted men and women who so easily forgot comfort and every joy the body craves for the sake of a shining ideal? The Báb remembered nothing but the message he was to give, a message that must soften the hearts of men, turn them toward God and fill them with love for their brothers. The love of God shone through him so powerfully that wherever he went, and whenever his divine word was repeated men, women, and little children trembled and listened, and then began to love so ardently that God was in their hearts, and they forgot themselves completely in their eagerness to serve the heavenly cause that meant peace on earth, and brotherhood to all mankind!

The Muḥammadans feared the Bábís. They could not conquer them, could not understand the light in their faces, the exaltation in their voices, the heavenly presence that surrounded them when they met death. We read the identical story in the history of the early Christian martyrs. They encountered death with the same joy, they were surrounded by the same Presence, they prophesied as did the Bábís the swift retribution that would over-take their persecutors.

This was to be expected, for while the Báb was the Mandi to his Muḥammadan followers, he was the Angel of the resurrection to the Christian world, the Herald of Bahá'u'lláh, and the Precursor of the Wonderful One, whose return must usher in the dawn of peace, the millennium of progress.

CHAPTER V.

THE RISE OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH.

The movement of the new faith by no means stagnated after the execution of the True One. He had warned his followers that they must look for the coming of the Glory of God, Him whom God shall manifest, within nineteen years after his own passing, and when this sad event was accomplished the hearts of the devoted ones turned more and more toward the figure of Ḥusayn 'Alí, Prince of Núr, who had been one of the first to accept the message of the Báb. The wealth and position of Ḥusayn 'Alí's family would have rendered him a note-worthy figure in any case, but his beautiful character necessitated his true prominence.

He was two years older than the Báb, being born in November, 1817, and from his infancy he had been the counsellor and the dearly beloved of his immediate environment. At the moment of the Báb's proclamation he was married, and had become the head of his family. His wife, the mother of 'Abdu'l Balm, was a very remarkable woman, to whom the orientals gave a title expressive of her supreme excellence. They called her the Lady of the Ladies of the Ladies. Three years after the execution of the Báb Ḥusayn 'Alí was imprisoned with his entire family, as a follower of the Báb, and all of his great property was confiscated. This sacrifice was demanded of the one upon whom the Glory of God was to rest, for the Saviour of his kind must always be "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

Ḥusayn 'Alí was an individual of splendid appearance. He was more than six feet in height, of magnificent figure, with wonderful blue eyes, and the fair skin and dark hair of the ancient Persian race. He would have been remarked anywhere for the simple beauty of his manhood. When added to this, the supreme gift of illumination that had been promised came upon him, surely it would have been very difficult not to believe that he was a divine messenger, bringing a new revelation to mankind.

The teaching of Bahá'u'lláh was in every case an amplification of that which the Báb had uttered, though by no means limited to the text already eloquently expressed. In fact the True One came so little in contact with his followers that they comprehended scarcely more than the bare outline of what he had actually taught.

It was in this way that they took up arms and fought for their faith and their liberty. The Báb would never have counseled such action, for his principle was that of love, and like all the great prophets, his predecessors, he was a non-resistant. Bahá'u'lláh corrected this misunderstanding among his followers, and one of his first commands was that the persecuted Bábís should lay down their arms.

“We can only conquer by love,” he insisted, “and if you cease fighting the persecution will die out.”

This promise was literally fulfilled, so that for many years before the death of Bahá’u’lláh in 1892, there was no persecution of the “friends.” The reverence of the people for the expressed wish of the Blessed Perfection as he is often lovingly termed, rendered them immediately obedient to his desire, and the following anecdote illustrates how powerful was his influence.

There was one leader among the oppressed people who had been so successful in his generalship of the outlawed religionaries, that again and again he had enabled them to evade or overcome the Sháh’s troopers. These last were constantly on the watch for him. At length a regiment of cavalry discovered the little band of persecuted outcasts in their fastness, and a hot skirmish was imminent, though the soldiers hoped to capture their prey in the end.

Meanwhile a tablet or letter from Bahá’u’lláh had just been given to the Bábí leader, in which the Holy One counselled peace and submission as the only way to bring repose to the tortured country, and success to the cause of God. The writings of Bahá’u’lláh are full of power, so that it is impossible to read them even in cold print without a profound consciousness of their inspiration. It is easy to imagine, therefore, how deeply touched an individual may have been at receiving one of these eloquent epistles, the thought of which was addressed directly to himself.

The leader in question was so stirred at the perusal of the communication sent him by his spiritual Lord that after reflecting a moment he suddenly stuck it in his sleeve, and turning, left his companions and walked toward the watching enemy. He approached the commanding officer of the hostile force, and tendered him his sword, with the request that as he gave himself up, his companions might be allowed to go free.

The captain of the troop took the sword, delighted at his easy conquest, and exclaimed:

“How is this? You are the man I most dreaded to meet, and it seems you have turned coward!”

“It is not fear of you that has made me relinquish my sword,” replied the persecuted man, “but the word of one mightier than you has conquered me!” Then drawing the letter of Bahá’u’lláh from his sleeve he extended it to the officer.

The latter read it in his turn, found it difficult to see clearly for a moment, and returning it to his prisoner, he remarked, “I cannot arrest a man so protected!”

Then springing upon his horse he led his troop away, and the little company of outcasts was safe for the moment. But the recipient of Bahá’u’lláh’s letter sought martyrdom shortly afterward as if determined to prove that he had not shrunk from that glorious destiny.

The words unity and equality were even more constantly upon the lips of Bahá'u'lláh than upon those of the Báb. Always a prisoner, he was taken first to Baghdád, then to Adrianople and Constantinople, and finally, in 1868, to the prison town of 'Akká in Syria, where he passed away in 1892. But the panorama of the world seemed ever unfolding before his eyes, and the streets of Paris, London, St. Petersburg and New York appeared more familiar to him than the walls of his prison.

The sufferings of man were constantly in his thoughts, and he taught that these sufferings must be obliterated by the establishment of justice, and the attainment of that "most great Peace" of which he dreamed. He told Professor Brown, of Cambridge, who visited him in 'Akká in 1891, that the essence of his teachings was contained in Christ's Sermon on the Mount, and in the literal interpretation of his words to his disciples. The world must put in practice every element of those divine commands, he insisted, yet two thousand years after they were spoken, the social system of the universe is planned on such opposite lines that a man is considered a crank and a fanatic who endeavors to live the life that Christ demanded of his followers!

Bahá'u'lláh is regarded by his people as bringing the fulfilment of Christ's promise to come again and establish his kingdom. They realize that the kingdom is a spiritual one, though one which must dynamically alter human conditions, and their interpretation of the "Coming" is somewhat different from that of the Christian church.

When the spirit of God rests upon a man, say the Bahá'íst Teachers, he receives the prophetic gift, he becomes a divine Messenger, and these divine Messengers appearing again and again have lifted men from barbarism, and given them a constantly more illumined conception of God. The prophet may be one who speaks only to a group of men, like Moses for instance, or a Manifestation of God, whose message is for the world, like that of Christ or Bahá'u'lláh. But it is the Breath of God upon him which renders him different from other men, and not any peculiarity of human birth.

Thus the Báb was a descendant of Muḥammad, but there had been many of the prophet's kindred before him, and not one had been illuminated until the Báb came to fulfill the prophecy of the returning Imám, and this prophecy rose not from the flesh of the Imám who spoke it, nor of Muḥammad who first voiced it, but from the spirit that rested upon both, and upon the Báb as well.

So Christ's promise to come again was uttered through the lips of Jesus, but it did not mean that the man Jesus was to walk the earth once more as the Christian world has believed. Christ was the spirit of God resting upon Jesus, which rendered him the Saviour of man. He became a Manifestation of God in the moment of that great Illumination and because of it, not because he was the son of Mary, the virgin. So the spirit of God breathing through the lips of Jesus made a definite promise to appear again as the Comforter, the Prince of this World, as an individual who once more should be the light bearer. Christian theology has familiarized us with the idea that there has never been but one Saviour of the world, whose coming was planned with the “Fall of man” and the eating of that terrible apple which caused such an acute case of indigestion not only to Adam but to all his descendants.

“Oh, Thou who man of baser Earth didst make,

And ev’n with Paradise divine the snake; For all the sin wherewith the face of man Is blackened, man’s forgiveness give—and take!”

We must always remember that this scheme of salvation is not in the least that of Christ, but that of Paul essentially, and of the early Christian theologians. It sprang from the brain of man, not from the illumination of God.

Christ came to save the world surely. He was the divine Word made flesh, but he was one of the heavenly chain that will never be complete as long as man yearns for God, and the human mind is capable of a constantly fuller and deeper conception of his divinity.

While this yearning endures the Messenger of God must appear to satisfy it, and lift us to still higher comprehension of that ethereal and infinite Deity who is our Envioner!

‘Abdu’l-Bahá says the growth of the soul is like the return of the seasons to the earth. As Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter follow one another, the seeds are planted, the soft breezes of the south woo them to blossom, the heats of Summer ripen them, the Autumn brings the harvest, and in the snows of Winter the earth is wrapped beneath the cold repose that is in reality the precursor of blossoming Spring, forever it must dawn again with bloom and fragrance.

So the soul of man does not retain the freshness and glory of inspiration which rises when the great Messenger of God proclaims his message. Then the human heart is softened. It receives the heavenly imprint, coldness and selfishness disappear for the time being, and earth offers a transient picture of heaven.

When Christ was in Judea, everyone who approached him and lingered to know him was transformed, and after his Departure the delight of his memory rendered the journeys of the disciples and the establishment of the early church a story of Paradise.

So with Muḥammad. The wisdom of his presence lifted the cloud of barbarism from his followers, and the memory of it founded that magnificent civilization of the Moors that is the marvel of history.

But the hearts of the Christians grew cold, theology replaced the words of the great Teacher, and the conduct of the Christian world today is far from that inculcated by the precept and example of the exalted Mentor.

So the heavy tyranny of succeeding rulers offered the blackest contrast to the lesson of peace and justice Muḥammad taught to his delighted listeners. It seems as one looks at the disturbance and suffering of the world as if no prophet had ever whispered love into eager ears. But the fields must always lie blanketed in snow before the brown earth is ready once more to receive the winged seeds, and only the fragrance of the breath of God, the thunder of his utterance through the lips of his prophets can melt the frost from the heart of the world, and rouse our human nature so that it casts aside once more the enshrouding folds of its cold invented theologies, and determines to live as God wills, as his message directs.

Dieu le veut, Dieu le veut! God wills it! is the ancient crusaders' cry, and it seems to thrill the world again when a Manifestation of God appears. At such a time a new law must be spoken for mankind. Its essentials are like the old one, because all religions inculcate the same principles as to love of God and man, and the relation of this life to its eternal succession. But there are differences in details, as for instance, the Jewish law permitted divorce, and Christ declared it wrong, while Bahá'u'lláh upholds it. The Old Testament prophets allowed a man to have several wives, so did Muḥammad, while Christ taught monogamy, as does Bahá'u'lláh.

In such a period of transition between the old day and the new, profound distress must always be experienced, because established truth has lost its hold upon the heart. The few have learned the new law and rejoice in it with fervor; others who are discontented with traditions of right and wrong feel at liberty to hew a pathway of their own, while the many arrogate to themselves a license in all things which is shocking to the conservative and painful to all sensitive and spiritual minds.

Such a condition accompanied the preaching of Christ's wonderful Word, a similar situation followed Muḥammad's death and the setting aside of his successor 'Alí, and a sadly exaggerated replica of the identical condition exists today.

In religion we have various new cults like that of Christian Science and the notable departure of Dr. Worcester, the separation of church and state in France, and the threat of its repetition in Spain. In governmental up-rising there are the revolutions of Turkey and Persia, the rumblings of suffering Russia, the distress of England, the threat of increasing armament in Germany, the growing struggle between capital and labor in the United States — these are only a few indications of the deep spirit of change that seems pervading all our institutions.

Most curiously in evidence perhaps are the increase of divorce, and the mad thirst for gold, for the possession of more money, both tendencies in marked contrast with the teaching of Jesus Christ, who inculcated above all things the law of brotherhood, and of unselfish, faithful love.

As creed has so largely replaced practical Christianity, so the development of pure intellectualism has generally set aside that use of spiritual intuition which holds so large a place in religious experience, and renders it vital. The thirst for money meanwhile has upset all customs of sweet and rational living. The de-sire to be very rich in the goods of this world, or to follow the example of the extremely rich has invaded all walks of life, transforming hospitality into a mere giving and receiving of entertainment, and introducing into business methods a cold indifference to the cost of human life in the output of a product which is shocking in the extreme. The gentle admonition of the Saviour:

“If a man ask thee for thy coat, give him thy cloak also,” has been so far forgotten that the maker of coats compels his employee to labor long hours in conditions inimical to life, and when we remonstrate with him, shrugs his shoulders and responds:

“Business can not consider life, it deals only with profits!”

This period of transition between the messages of two great prophets or Manifestations of God, when one is fading from the spiritual consciousness of the world, and the other has not yet pervaded it with controlling potency, has been termed by Bahá'u'lláh the day of Judgment. Christ's words to his disciples did not indicate an end of the physical universe, a destruction of the planet, but the close of a spiritual dispensation with the throes and disturbances that must necessarily attend such an epoch. It is a time of horror because it is lawless, but it is one of enormous advancement because new truth is manifesting itself in every direction.

The shocking occurrences, the pain, suffering, disdain and indifference of human life were never so noticeable as to-day, the spiritual development is beyond all parallel, and the new revelation must necessarily be one of enormous power and significance to meet a demand which has fruited from all religions. Bahá'u'lláh declared that the disturbances of this period would be manifested in the physical as well as in the mental and spiritual worlds and certainly the record of calamity in the preceding ten years is without precedent in history. There have been single catastrophes as stupendous as some of these. So the burning of plague stricken London in the seventeenth century could be mentioned in the same breath with the earthquake of San Francisco, and the destruction of Pompeii with that of Messina, but pause a moment and realize that sixteen centuries intervened between the horrors of Pompeii and London, and but three years between those of San Francisco and Messina.

We read passages in Isaiah, in Revelations and St. Matthew which seem to picture the present day in its heaping up of disastrous events, yet there are certain potential forces at work in its upheavals that would indicate a divine force working beneath the surface to attain certain permanent results. For instance, Bahá'u'lláh in many significant prophetic utterances which he gave in regard to this remarkable Day of God, called it a day of publicity, when all things must be made clear because its law is that of manifestation. No hypocrisy can therefore be successfully maintained. All dishonesty must be laid bare, all scoundrels and dishonest public servants must be tried at the bar of enlightened public opinion.

Moreover, as the new ideal is working in the world consciousness a new sensitiveness will be manifested as to the rights of the commonwealth and the individual, a new democracy will be established on a solid foundation. In many countries a republic will replace the ancient monarchy, and where the monarchy remains it must become distinctively constitutional.

“The day of the rich man is passed,” declared Bahá’u’lláh, “he does not belong to the new time.”

So two small commonwealths, those of Switzerland and New Zealand, have already rendered the accumulation of excessive wealth by the individual an impossibility. This has been accomplished by the simple imposition of a graduated tax, and with other laws of similar tenor has gone far to make these two communities ideal places of residence for human beings of all classes. Already the pensioning of old age and the income tax are being suggested every-where, showing that the tendency of advancement is altogether toward the betterment of the masses.

Perhaps the reader is reflecting “these changes are not spiritual” but in fact the message of every great prophet has produced enormous economic progress. That of Christ and of Muḥammad destroyed and founded empires, the Mosaic law created a new state, and the Word of the Báb has already manifested itself in the constitutions of Persia and Turkey.

CHAPTER VI.

THE UNITY OF MAN.

People ask, why should a prophet come to us from the Orient, surely a new teacher of truth should spring from the advanced races that are creating the civilization of the future, and from the centres of progressive thought? But in the Spring time of the soul, when again the spirit rather than the intellect alone is to control the destiny of man if a prophet or Manifestation of God came to us from Paris, London, Berlin, or New York, or from St. Petersburg maybe, we would find every explanation of his illumination in the ripened culture of the nation that produced him, and we would smile at the assertion that he might be a Sun reflecting the Splendor of God.

When, however, we perceive a great light in the darkness of the oppressed Orient, when we read in the utterances of this far away Mandi, Báb, or Manifestation of God, the very sentences that are inciting new movements of our planet elsewhere, and appearing under different phraseologies as the foundation for novel cults and philanthropies among communities which bear aloft the torch of culture, we are compelled to search more deeply for conclusions that satisfy.

We remember that the world has not always remained content with purely scientific reasonings, but as even Zola admitted, the rationalist must, in his turn, yield the middle of the road to the idealist and the illuminant. We love our

Charles Darwin, but we do not forget our Buddha and our Christ. We look for our Mandi, as we repeat the hymns of the Rig-Veda, or the Psalms of David, and the divine longing within us will not be stilled.

So when we read as the utterance of the Sulṭán's prisoner, certain wonderful words, the essence of which is thrilling in many hearts of those who never heard his name, we ponder deeply, and remember the profound conviction voiced in all ancient tradition that God shines upon his chosen ones with a glory that cannot be hidden. Bahá'u'lláh says, for instance:

“We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations, yet they deem us a stirrer of strife and sedition, worthy of bondage and banishment; we desire that all nations should become one in faith, and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled. What harm is there in this?—Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the Most Great Peace shall come, is not this that which Christ foretold? Yet do we see your kings and rulers lavishing their treasures more freely for the destruction of the human race than on that which would conduce to the happiness of mankind. These strifes and bloodshed and discord must cease, and all men be as one kindred and one family. Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country, let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind.”

Again he says: “Oh, children of men, do ye know why we have created ye from one clay? That no one should glorify himself over the other. Be ye ever mindful of how ye were created. Since we created ye all from the same substance, ye must be as one soul, walking with the same feet, eating with one mouth, and living in one land, that ye may manifest with your being, and by your deeds and actions the signs of unity, and the spirit of oneness. This is my counsel to ye, Oh, people of Light! Therefore follow it, that ye may attain the fruits of holiness from the tree of Might and Power!”

The illumination of Bahá'u'lláh to those who came in contact with him seems to have been always unquestionable. He was not like other men, as Christ was not, and all loved him without pausing to question why it was so. Thus in his imprisonment the most brutal guards were selected for his custodians that they might be immune from his charm, but invariably after they had held him in silent custody for some weeks or days, they slipped away to those who believed his message, and asked:

“Tell us what this Wonderful One teaches, for he is not like other men, and we would believe whatever he said was true.”

A very lovely story illustrates this beautiful compelling force in the Revelator, and is repeated as authentic. During one of his encampments a Muḥammadan holy man or fakir had conceived the idea that it was his duty to assassinate this sacrilegious innovator who declared that God spoke through him as he had once spoken through Muḥammad, his prophet. So he armed himself with a javelin which he could use with skill, and creeping under the side of the tent, entered the presence of the Blessed Perfection, who sat alone in meditation.

The fakir rose and poised his weapon, and just then Bahá'u'lláh lifted his head and glanced at him. The man's arm dropped and a quiver of feeling shuddered through his nerves. But he thought to himself:

“What! Am I to be stirred by the sight of a base impostor? It is my duty to slay this blasphemer, and I must do it!”

Again he lifted his arm to strike, and once more the eyes of Bahá'u'lláh rested upon him benignantly. His weapon rang upon the ground, and a deeper thrill transfixed him, but presently recalling all the power of his conviction, he stooped and regained his javelin, then taking accurate aim, he was about to launch it, when the Blessed Perfection smiled upon him!

It was too much for the poor half-crazed fakir! He fell at the feet of the Illuminated one and confessed his murderous intention, begging the prophet to slay him for his sin. Bahá'u'lláh, however, comforted him, and from that moment the poor man became an ardent believer, and never left the circle of the one who had shown him so potently the wonder and beauty of love.

The time has not yet come to write the life of Bahá'u'lláh. Perhaps it may never be written, for his work in the world had to do with the significant principle of his illumination, and not with his personality. The intention of the present sketch is merely to paint a picture which will enable the citizen of the western countries to gain some idea of the remarkable individual whose presence on our planet has already shaken so deeply the current of our contemporary history.

The effect of his contact was evidently so tonic and uplifting that all who were with him for any length of time left him in a mood of harmony and courage which rendered all things possible to them. There is a pretty story of a remarkable visit which was made to him by a group of twenty Muḥammadan Mullás, who had quarrelled over points in their theology, and could not agree. They came to lay their case before Bahá'u'lláh, knowing that all their theological learning would be as child's play to him. They remained to forget their differences in the reality of greater truth, and before they crossed his threshold loved one another.

Professor Brown, of Cambridge, describes eloquently this surpassing power in the man-hood of Bahá'u'lláh, and his words leave upon the imagination a vivid image of both the human and divine in this remarkable Messenger. Perhaps it was better, as he intimated to his guest, that his message should not spread in the western world until he had passed away, for few would have been able to remember the significant principle that the personality of the prophet is of no importance, it is the light shining through him which lifts the world. Men would have been tempted to worship Bahá'u'lláh, and forget the wonder of the Light in the charm of the mere man. In spite of this strong personality, however, everything goes to show that after Ḥusayn 'Alí was enveloped in the illumination, the material part of him disappeared. He was hence-forth the Glory of God, garmented by those noble qualities that had always been his, but visible through the beautiful body that was only human.

The story of Abdel Kerim's connection with the Blessed Perfection makes the Manifestation very real to us. It may not be strictly authentic in minor particulars, but is essentially true, and enables us to picture the life of Bahá'u'lláh, and to some extent the character of his influence. Abdel Kerim was an Egyptian merchant of considerable wealth, who had heard the story of the new Revelation, and accepted it with the ardor of his eager temperament.

After some time he felt that he could not be content without seeing the Messenger of God whose presence in the world had stirred his heart. So he wrote a letter to 'Akká, where the Manifestation then was, and begged permission to visit him. He received a strange letter in response. He was told that he might come to 'Akká, but first he must put himself in a position where he owed no man anything.

Abdel Kerim had carried on his business for many years in the customary Oriental fashion, sending his caravans across the desert laden with a precious freight of riches. He had long credits everywhere, and probably never dreamed of doing business on a cash basis. His traffic was constantly expanding, perhaps he was not too scrupulous in his dealings. We may be certain it had not occurred to him that his interest in the new Day of God would transform his methods of trafficking with his fellow man.

A successful merchant is apt to fall into the habit of considering his own advantage first. Naturally Abdel Kerim was absorbed in the conduct of his rapidly broadening trade connections, for he was a man of fifty years when this momentous influence came into his life. As the story develops we can see that it resembles in some respects the problem which Christ presented to the rich young man, but Abdel Kerim accepted without hesitation the ultimatum offered him. Before all else he wanted to see the Manifestation of God, and everything became of secondary importance in comparison with this event.

He began, therefore, to arrange his affairs with this point in view. Previously he had thought only of expansion, of increase. Now his one desire was to reach the condition where he would owe no man anything. So he began to pay off. As money came in, instead of investing it again, he paid a debt with it, until at length after five years he had attained his goal, and he did not owe a penny!

But in this careful accounting of outlay and income his business had dwindled away to nothing. His longing to see the Blessed Perfection had completely absorbed him, so that the love of wealth had died out of his heart, and at the moment of realization he had just money enough left to pay a deck passage on the steamer to Haifa, and leave in his wife's hands a sum sufficient to provide for the family expenses during his absence.

But he did not hesitate. The luxurious merchant had never before travelled except as a first-class passenger, and as he stepped across the gang plank a shawl upon his arm, which was his only protection from the weather, dropped into the water, and at that season the nights were chill! Nevertheless he went on with a light heart. Was he not near the consummation of all his hopes? His soul was alive with prayer, and he did not know the wind was chill!

Meanwhile Bahá'u'lláh warned his family that he was about to receive a most honored guest, greater than any that had yet crossed his threshold. He sent an emissary with a carriage to the dock at Haifa, which is the sea-port of 'Akká, with strict orders to bring this noble guest to him without delay. But characteristically he told the attendant nothing as to the real character of the man he was to meet. Here was such a test of faith and also discrimination as he was quite apt to impose upon those about him. It is not an easy matter to live in the household of a Blessed Perfection whose mind necessarily dwells in a world of stars!

The attendant watched carefully the disembarkation of passengers at the landing of the steamer. He was looking eagerly for an ambassador with a noble retinue, for a prince with many orders upon his breast, for a personage resplendent in broadcloth and jewels. But no such individual stepped upon the quay. In fact the passengers seemed an especially polyglot assemblage, and the emissary paid no attention to the shabby looking middle aged man, who glanced about in disappointment, as if expecting some one, and then seated himself quietly upon a bench.

Abdel Kerim had been assured that someone from the household of the Manifestation would come in search of him, though he had not written warning of his expected arrival. He had no money to pay the necessary carriage hire to 'Akká. His faith had carried him so far, but now it suddenly failed him, and he sat forlornly upon the bench, while clouds of black despair settled over him.

The emissary returned alone to 'Akká, and reported that the guest had not appeared. He thought it strange, for he knew that Bahá'u'lláh's vision was never mistaken, and he was familiar with all that transpired about him. The Blessed Perfection looked keenly at his factotum as the message was delivered, and replied:

"Ah, your eyes were not far seeing enough to recognize my princely guest. I will send 'Abbás Effendi to find him. He has clearer vision."

So 'Abbás Effendi took his way to the dock, and though the quick twilight of the Orient had fallen before he reached the spot, he knew immediately the disappointed figure huddled upon the bench. This was the royal guest his father expected!

He quickly introduced himself, explaining that the individual sent to meet the stranger, had failed to find him. Then he added:

"Do you wish to go on to 'Akká tonight, or will you wait until morning?"

It was customary for pilgrims to spend some hours in prayer and purification before entering the presence of Bahá'u'lláh, and Abdel Kerim had faithfully accomplished his duty in this regard. But sitting alone and neglected during the long afternoon, bitter thoughts had invaded his consciousness. He looked back regretfully to the fortune he had lost in preparation for what? For this day of waiting alone and penniless for a possible interview with a fictitious prophet! So events had painted themselves in his anguished soul, but in the presence of the gentle messenger who had sought him at last, suspicion vanished, and he longed for hours of prayer to wash the stain of doubt from his tormented inward self.

‘Abbás Effendi knew instinctively that his new friend would not wish to seek a hotel at his expense, so finding that he preferred to wait until morning for the journey to ‘Akká, he unbuttoned the long cloak that enveloped him, seated himself beside the pilgrim, and wrapped both in its ample folds. So they passed the night praying together, lost in that ecstasy of prayer that brings realization.

Then in the morning they turned toward ‘Akká, and Abdel Kerim going to the Blessed Perfection with a radiant heart found full reward in his lovely presence for the five lonely years of seeking that had prefaced his pilgrim-age. We may be certain also that his inward wealth became so great he quite forgot the flatness of his pocketbook!

After he had been in the household some days, Bahá'u'lláh said to his guest:

“You have suffered greatly before coming here, and I see that your heart is pure. I love you very much, tell me what you desire most, for I will grant you three wishes.”

The story here begins to partake somewhat of the fairy tale, and may contain an element of allegory, though no one who realizes the power of Bahá'u'lláh could doubt his ability to fulfill wishes. There is deep truth in the little drama.

Abdel Kerim had learned his lesson well, and could not ask for material things. He had but one desire in his soul. He wished to remain by the side of Bahá'u'lláh forever, so that even death itself should not separate him from his Beloved.

The Blessed Perfection hesitated a moment over the second half of the request, as the legend runs, for, indeed, the ardent one had asked a difficult thing. But at length he granted it all. He promised that even death should not remove this eager lover from the shining circle to which he had attained.

So Abdel Kerim removed his family to Cairo, where he carried on a business, though he spent most of his time in the household of Bahá'u'lláh at ‘Akká. In the succeeding years he made two fortunes and lost them, dying a poor man. But he lived to be nearly ninety years old, with no diminution of youth or vigor, and he was exactly the same man, whether he had just made or lost a fortune, for the possession of money was no longer of any importance of him. He would walk miles to talk with someone who was in love with God, and was seeking truth, and he was always a most loving person.

The Egyptian was naturally a man of material instincts, yet the grace of God was in him, and tradition says that his consuming desire was fulfilled. Bahá'u'lláh passed from earth some years before his ardent lover, but the veil between them did not conceal the radiance of the Departed.

Among the writings of Bahá'u'lláh the book entitled the Íqán holds a peculiar place. In it the enlightened author has explained for the student the theory of the succession of God's Prophets and their illumination which has been lightly sketched in the preceding pages. But the Íqán glitters with eloquent passages, not especially limited to the exposition of its leading motif, and the two which follow illustrate that feeling in regard to wealth in the Blessed Perfection which no doubt made him appreciate profoundly the conquest Abdel Kerim achieved over the acquisitive man in his own breast.

The first one paints a little picture of Jesus which enables one to realize what his disappointment must have been when the rich young man turned from him, and the second is a story of the Sixth Imám, such as a poet de-lights to recall.

"Thus one day Jesus the son of Mary seated himself upon a chair, and voiced his feeling through the melodies of the Holy Spirit, in such words as these:

"Oh, people! My food is from the herbs of the earth, by which I satisfy my hunger. My bed is the bare ground; during the night my lamp is the light of the moon, and I have no steed but my feet. Who upon earth is richer than I?"

"I swear by God that a hundred thousand wealths revolve around this poverty, and a hundred thousand kingdoms of glory seek after this lowliness. Should'st thou attain to a sprinkling of the ocean of these significances, thou wilt abandon the world of phenomena and existence, and sacrifice thy life around the burning lamp as does the 'bird of fire.' "A similar instance is related of His Holiness Sadik. On a certain day one of his followers complained of poverty before His Holiness. That Eternal Beauty said:

"'Thou art rich, and hast drunk from the wine of wealth.'

"The indigent one astonished at the words of that brilliant countenance, said: "

'How am I rich, when I am in need of a single coin?'

"His Holiness replied:

"'Hast thou not love for us?'

"He said: 'Yes, oh, Thou Son of the Messenger of God!'

"'Wilt thou sell it for one thousand dinars of gold?' inquired Sadik.

"He answered: 'I would not give it for the world and all that is therein!'

"His Holiness said: 'How can one be poor who possesses something which he will not exchange for the world?'"

CHAPTER VII.

THE IMPRISONMENT AT ‘AKKÁ.

One remarkable fact in the life of Bahá'u'lláh is found in his announcement of his own mission to the rulers of the world. The Báb had sent letters to the Sháh and the Sultán, proclaiming his appearance as the long expected Mandi, and Bahá'u'lláh wrote to the crowned heads of Europe and the President of the United States, saying in most dignified and stately phrase that he had come to inaugurate the “Most Great Peace,” and that he was the reappearance in the world of the Spirit of God which had been promised for this time.

Napoleon 3rd received the message with scorn, and ground it under his heel. Victoria of England laid it away respectfully, saying: “If it is true, history will reveal it.” President Grant naturally looked upon it as something quite beyond his ken, but Alexander 2d, of Russia, was so impressed by the dignity and power of the epistle that he sent an ambassador in search of its originator. He remained always afterward in communication with Bahá'u'lláh, and the books of the Manifestation were always forwarded to him upon their completion. If he had been strong enough to follow the counsels of the Blessed Perfection he would have carried to a more glorious conclusion the noble plans of his early reign. But at least he founded the policy of international peace, the recognition of which has continued to be a part of the foreign attitude of his successors. No one who has followed the recent history of this pain-racked land can fail to wish that its rulers had learned more complete lessons from the great light of Bahá'u'lláh. In the Book of Aqdas, the Spirit breathing through him cries:

“Blessed are the ignorant who seek the spring of my knowledge, and the lowly who grasp the robe of my grandeur! Blessed are the heedless who maintain my commemoration! Blessed is the spirit resurrected in my Breath, and thereby entering My Kingdom! Blessed is the soul who is shaken by my nearness, and attracted by the kingdom of my command! Blessed is the eye which has seen, and the ear which has heard, and the heart which has known the Lord the Possessor of Glory, and the kingdom of Grandeur and Might! Blessed are they who have attained! Blessed is he who is brightened by the sun of my Word! Blessed is he whose head is adorned by the crown of my Love!”

Bahá'u'lláh and his family had been placed under the suzerainty of the Sultán, and were transferred by him to his prison city of ‘Akká in 1868. The Sultán dared not execute Bahá'u'lláh, and as no prisoner had ever survived confinement in ‘Akká longer than three months, it seemed as if his detainment there would solve many difficulties.

Once immured within these dread walls the devoted people were treated with the utmost severity. Bahá'u'lláh himself was bound to the floor in a cell so small that he could neither stand erect nor stretch at length within its limits. His family, with their attendants, were herded like cattle in an open pen, and as it was the rainy season when they arrived in ‘Akká their sufferings could only be termed intolerable. Mr. Myron Phelps, in his volume entitled The Life of ‘Abbás Effendi, has written a vivid description of this painful ordeal, as it was related by the older sister of ‘Abbás Effendi.

Such gentle people could only have been subjected to these cruelties with the intention of shortening their lives, and presently all fell ill, except ‘Abbás Effendi and Bahá’u’lláh himself. ‘Abbás Effendi seems to have been always the intermediary between his family and its jailors or the public. Moved by pity for his companions he went to his father and asked what could be done to relieve the sufferings of those so dear to both, and how their anguish could be assuaged. Perhaps in that sad hour his faith failed him and he wondered if all were, indeed, to die victims of the Sultán’s vile and wicked policy. Martyrdom he would have welcomed with joy, but this process of slow and shameful extinction was hard to endure.

Bahá’u’lláh listened to his son’s impassioned words, and it would have seemed to an onlooker as if he were indeed powerless to do aught for the unfortunate victims of a dark tyranny. But the Breath of God that could have broken all bonds was upon him, the Comforter, the Sustainer!

So he wrote a wonderful little prayer and gave it to ‘Abbás Effendi, telling him to read it aloud to all who were ill, and be sure that they learned it by heart. No other steps need be taken, all would recover, and conditions would presently change.

Strangely enough health returned even as the Blessed Perfection had promised, and meanwhile the Governor of ‘Akká had not remained unaware of the sublime patience with which his unusual prisoners had borne their sufferings. He sent for ‘Abbás Effendi and after a talk with him removed the family to the military barracks of the fortress city, where, though they were by no means what we would term comfortable, they were at least assured decency and privacy.

After several years of this seclusion they were assigned a residence and allowed to live within the walls on parole, a liberty which later on was much extended by the Sultán. He was so impressed by the elevation of character manifested by Bahá’u’lláh, that, though he could not grant him freedom, as the Sultán was the spiritual head of Islám, and Bahá’u’lláh a great heretic, he established him in the royal palace outside the walls of ‘Akká, and appointed him a pension commensurate with his rank. The Blessed Perfection went freely to Haifa whenever he chose, and received everyone who came to him, so that the last ten years of his life were passed in comparative freedom.

It was at this time that Abdel Kerim entered the household of Bahá’u’lláh, and lived in close connection with him until the close of his life.

He spoke of the Blessed Perfection as exercising a singularly exhilarating effect upon all who approached him.

“I never could remain in the room with him more than twenty minutes at a time,” he confessed, “then I would be obliged to go outside and walk up and down the corridor, for awhile, until I regained by poise. The feeling I experienced was that of a happiness so extreme that it became excitement, and was unbearable.”

He described one occasion when he was in the garden with the Manifestation, and made tea for him. Then they walked up and down the garden paths together. The subject of conversation was always the same, but handled with infinite variety. They talked of the love of God, and the condition of mankind, the suffering of the world which could so easily be relieved by an increase of God’s love in men’s hearts.

The courts of all nations seemed to be revealed to the eyes of the Glory of God, and he discussed their policies with remarkable acumen, foreseeing the results of their selfish and short-sighted action. Thus he warned the pope that he would lose his temporal power, before the invasion of Victor Emanuel, who conquered Rome, and he warned Napoleon Third that the Franco-German war would result in disaster for France.

The delight of association with Bahá’u’lláh seems to have been felt by everyone who came in contact with him. There is a wonderful old man in ‘Akká who expresses this. His name is Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí, he is eighty years old, and seems to possess the youth of a boy of twenty, yet he languished for years in the prison of the Khedive of Egypt. When General Gordon entered the country, and opened the prison doors, he asked Ḥaydar-‘Alí, “What was your crime?” And the victim of fanatic intolerance replied:

“I taught religious tolerance and freedom, and unity!”

It certainly was written upon him that such had been the cause of his incarceration, and big hearted General Gordon set him free instantly. Whereupon he went straight to Persia, and began again to teach the truth, the advocacy of which had deprived him of so many years of sunlight. But having full sunlight in his heart, he was able to bear the trial without bitterness.

He is a remarkable personality endowed with the joy of a child, and the philosophic mind of a great man. When he described to the writer his single meeting with Bahá’u’lláh, his eyes filled with tears, and for the moment his voice failed him.

“It was upon the street that I saw him,” he said at length. “I was only in ‘Akká for a day, and I feared that I would not have the privilege of resting my eyes upon him. I followed him for some time trying to find courage to address him. At length I passed him, but still my courage failed me. Suddenly I paused and went toward him determined to fall at his feet. I felt as if I wanted to do nothing but kiss his blessed feet! Then he hurried to me, took me in his arms, and embraced me, speaking tender words, and repeating:

“You had to do it! You had to do it!”

Ḥaydar-‘Alí is a scholar, a thinker, what we call a gentleman, yet after more than twenty-five years of eager and progressive existence, after years of cruel imprisonment, after vivid experiences which develop manhood, and render sentimentalism impossible, words die upon his lips when he endeavors to describe the supreme moment in which the arms of the Blessed Perfection encircled him and he lay upon his breast. Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl is another unique and splendid personality who came into personal contact with Bahá'u'lláh. He had been tutor in the Sháh's family, was a man of great learning and inspiration, but had been thrown into prison for his adherence to the new faith. His sufferings were so severe that his health was permanently broken, and when he was at last set free, it was only to hear the decree of banishment pronounced upon him.

Bahá'u'lláh spoke to him with great tenderness of the trials that were before him, of the lonely years he should spend in poverty and exile, where nevertheless he would still labor for the cause of God. Then he concluded:

"I want you to remember that wherever you are, no matter how poor and how lonely you may appear to be, if you but think of me, I shall be with you instantly. In reality, you will never be alone you will never be helpless!"

Then he gave the traveler a little prayer which he had written for him, to be repeated in the moment of danger or deep distress, when he must know that God was near.

"And I never pronounced the lovely words without the sense of his presence, and immediate relief from the pressure that bound me!" declared Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl.

It is difficult for the modern man hurried, jostled, smothered in material conditions, to realize at first the significance of such stories, but surely we have all experienced the exaltation or depression which assails us in our contact with different persons. Sometimes it is a mere question of nerves and passion, but there is a tonic effect that is different. So Trelawney and Williams relate that after spending some time with the poet Shelley, they felt as if walking on air, and our own American painter, Wyatt Eaton, has described a similar result from his interview with the great artist Francois Millet, the year before the latter's death.

Eaton had dined with the family at their own simple table, and lingered until ten o'clock, unable to tear himself away from the charm of Millet's eager disquisition on subjects of art, of inspiration, of God and man. It was in 1874, Millet was at the end of his long life in which he had sought earnestly for the expression of the lofty impulse he felt within him. He was very near to God, and was irradiated by the splendor of his high relationship. He himself, in his poverty, at his frugal table, dressed in his "blue jeans," was experiencing the splendor of life, and transmitted so much of it to the young American student who had been wise enough to seek him, that after the interview was closed Eaton walked miles across the country to relieve his nervous tension. He was inexpressibly happy, but felt as if he should never sleep again, as if in fact his body had disappeared and he "walked on air."

The circle which gathered around the hearthstone of Dante Gabriel Rossetti in Chelsea experienced the same thing. They talked until morning, not knowing that the night had passed and felt no fatigue, because of the noble ideas which possessed them.

Such experiences enable us to understand in a measure the delightfully inspiring influence which Bahá'u'lláh exercised upon all who entered his environment. If an ordinary human being who has sincerely endeavored to live according to the higher law of God can rouse the spirit of others, surely one upon whom the Breath of God rests must become a potential tonic to all whom he encounters.

This tonic effect of nearness to God has, of course, been manifest in all the great religious reformers. So Savonarola won the hearts of Botticelli and Michel Angelo as a permanent possession. Even in that wealth-worshipping day of the late renaissance Angelo never forgot for a moment that the splendor of life lies in our expression of the ideal, not in any wealth of material things.

So there is a splendor of life in that moment when Savonarola refused to keep the gold that Lorenzo di Medici had laid upon the contribution plate of San Marco. It looked like a bribe, and the faithful prior knew that the poor convent was richer without it.

We can imagine the feeling of the publican when Christ sat at his table, of John, the be-loved disciple, when his head rested upon the Master's shoulder, of Mary Magdalene when she poured her precious ointment over his travel worn feet! These last are the surpassing experiences, because the great Messenger of God, the Saviour, the Manifestation is like no other. The Glory about him touches all who come near, and the contact can never be effaced nor forgotten.

One very substantial result of this divine tonic has been experienced by the people of 'Akká. Bahá'u'lláh and his family were sent there to die, but instead of that they have transformed 'Akká into a city of health and refreshment, and the dangerous, depressing elements of the climate and locality have entirely disappeared. In former days the currents of the ocean threw upon the seashore masses of unsightly and ill smelling debris; dead fish, seaweed and all the mal-odorous contents of the tidal ebb seemed to be flung there, and no flood was ever full enough to carry them off. So they lay rotting in the hot sun of the tropics, breeding fevers for the destruction of the inhabitants. The Sulṭán would permit no measures for the purification of the harbor and shore. He wished his prison city to remain as unwholesome as possible because it was intended to be a place of death. After the Glory of God had dwelt within the walls for some time there came a change. An alteration in the ocean currents became evident, the unsightly accumulation upon the shore was washed away, the offal of the region was carried far out into the purifying ocean, and the silvery strand of 'Akká was played upon only by glittering blue waters and fragrant breezes. Meanwhile a very wealthy convert one day came into the presence of Bahá'u'lláh. He was an Arabian Shaykh of enormous possessions, and he had planned to place an immense sum in the hands of the Manifestation as a symbol of his devotion. The Blessed Perfection, however, would not accept money from his followers.

One significant point in this remarkable movement has always been that its beautiful teachings are never given for money. They are regarded as the gift of God, which must be freely imparted, not sold.

Again and again the old Shaykh proffered his gift and it was refused. At length Bahá'u'lláh saw how deeply disappointed was his follower. The Shaykh was an old man, and had felt that he would die more happily if he had bestowed this money. So, as his friend was turning away in sadness, the Blessed Perfection recalled him and said:

“Do you really want to give me this money?” and when his noble guest positively fell upon his knees in affirmation, he went on:

“I cannot take money, but if you wish to make me very happy you can do this for me. The people of ‘Akká suffer for water. All the water of the valley is brackish and unwholesome, but yonder beyond the mountains,” pointing to the distant hills, “is a bottomless lake of pure mountain water. Pipe it down to the city, and bring it up in a fountain, where it will be free to all. But that will cost a great deal of money!”

Do you think any human being could have considered money in such a moment? The splendor of life surrounded the old Shaykh, and his happiness was supreme as he hurried away to perform the behest of the Messenger of God. To-day the people of ‘Akká have this delicious water piped into their houses, and the spectre of fever is still farther banished from their hearthstones.

From the moment that Bahá'u'lláh became accessible to his followers, so that even a glimpse of his radiant face would reward a toilsome journey to ‘Akká, throngs of pilgrims turned toward the prison city, eager to carry away a memory of the Glory of God, and eager also to do something to show the ardor of their faith. They soon discovered that Bahá'u'lláh would not accept gifts of value, but that he loved flowers and rare plants. So they began to carry with them seeds, slips and roots, from the flora of their own locality, especially such as were fragrant, unusual and beautiful. Tradition has it that no frail atom of a delicate shrub, wrapped in moss, and borne across the desert ever failed to live and thrive when planted at length in the grateful soil of much blessed ‘Akká.

The result has been the charming garden of the Ridván, surely one of the loveliest spots in the universe. Here are plants and flowers from Egypt, Arabia, and India, fragrant violets, crimson passion flowers, red anemones, tea roses, flowers so delicate and white they are like frost in the tropics, and blossoms that seem to weigh down the plant that bears them with their rich fragrance. Oranges ripen here, and rich deep colored roses like those of our American Beauty variety, but more sweetly odorous. The Blessed Perfection was especially fond of these magnificent blooms, and was accustomed to water their roots with his own hand.

The old gardener who tended the Ridván is still living, and has many wonderful stories to tell of his beloved master whom he served so faithfully. One of these which he is particularly fond of relating reminds us of a day when he had planned to serve tea for Bahá'u'lláh, and though a terrific storm of wind and rain arose, the Manifestation came to the garden just the same, because he would not disappoint his devoted attendant.

Another of his narrations will be less easily believed by the western reader, but it is vouched for, not only by the gardener who is an exceedingly intelligent man, but by others as well. To followers of modern cults who are accustomed to regard the outward world as "phenomenal," it will not appear in the least unreasonable.

A pest of locusts had invaded the country, and was devouring everything in its pathway. Nothing escaped the rapacious insects, and the gardener of the Riḍván marked with horror the advance of the swarm, and knew exactly on what day the creatures would strip his Paradise of verdure and fragrance. On that day Bahá'u'lláh was in the garden, and its guardian threw himself at the feet of the Blessed Perfection, begging him to save the precious bit of loveliness.

"Why should I preserve my garden when all else is destroyed?" demanded the Manifestation, "Would that be just?"

"But it is not for your sake that I ask it," implored the gardener, well knowing how to appeal to the generous heart to which he spoke. "Think of all the care I have taken, and all the labor I have spent to make it beautiful, and think of all the people who love it, and whose gifts are a part of it! Its destruction will bring pain to all these souls, and it may never be so perfect again!"

At last Bahá'u'lláh, convinced that it was right to use his power for such an end, rose and approached that side of the garden wall from which the swarm of locusts in a black cloud was already plainly visible. On they came, nearer and nearer. The Manifestation stood quietly by the wall, and presently began to address them. What wonderful loving potency vibrated in his words, his thought, his intention we do not know, but it is a fact that the mass of insects settled gently to the ground, remained as if benumbed for awhile, and not one flew over the wall. Then they began to eat voraciously, and left not a blade nor a leaf of green anywhere outside of the blooming and fragrant verdure of the Riḍván.

There is a tiny shelter in the garden where Bahá'u'lláh was accustomed to retire at times when he desired especial privacy. The chair in which he habitually sat is preserved, and visitors adorn it with flowers in memory of the Beloved One who once occupied it.

For a considerable period the inhabitants of 'Akká were not interested in the religious principles of the famous prisoners domiciled among them. They had been informed by the authorities that the confined saints were exceedingly wicked persons, that they had committed murder and other heinous crimes, and had only escaped death by the tolerance of the Sultán. The government hoped by such nefarious methods to ensure the ill treatment and cruel persecutions of the unfortunate victims in its power, and for a time the spell worked. But it is impossible for human beings to come in contact with veritable saints and not discover that they are such, and so it happened in this case.

One family was converted to the faith of Bahá'u'lláh, in rather remarkable fashion, shortly after the Blessed Perfection was released from the military barracks. The grandfather of the household had been an unusually devout and studious man, much given to poring over the holy books of his faith. As a result of long pondering he had decided that it was full time for the Manifestation of God to appear, whose coming was presaged as he believed by the tradition of the Imám's return. But he doubted whether he himself would be privileged to see him.

He spent much time with his youngest grandson who was then a lad of eight or ten years old, and told him with great solemnity that his eyes would rest upon the Manifestation of God, and that he must not miss this rare opportunity, nor fail to recognize this divinely gifted personage whom he would be so blessed as to encounter. Meanwhile the good old man passed away, the youth grew to young manhood, the family of Bahá'u'lláh came to 'Akká under its cloud of criminal accusation, and naturally the Muḥammadan did not connect the group of dangerous heretics—so called—with the holy one of his grandfather's warning.

One night he dreamed that the old man came to him and told him the Manifestation of God was in 'Akká, and he must seek him. The young gentleman was interested, and recalled his deceased relative's repeated prophecy, but he did not attach any special importance to the dream.

Presently, however, it was repeated with increased vividness. The grandfather said to him:

"You think this is only a dream, but I have come to tell you the truth, and you must believe what I say, and obey me!"

The youth was more deeply impressed this time, because the recurrence of the dream, with its added insistence, was significant. Still it did not occur to him that he should act upon it. Finally he dreamed again, this time with such detail that he could not resist the conviction of his grandfather's actual presence. The old gentleman expressed his impatience at his grandson's indifference, reminded him of the prophecy he had made before his death, assured him the Manifestation of God was none other than the famous prisoner so long confined in 'Akká and accused of impossible deeds. He described the house in which he lived, commanded the young man to go there, and added:

"They might not admit you, but I will give you the password. When you go to the door say 'Alláh o' Abhá,' and immediately it will be opened wide. You will see a man sitting at a table reading. He is the Manifestation of God."

The young man was peculiarly situated. He did not dare disobey this direct mandate of his dream, yet he felt himself a fool in consenting to its requisition. He could not venture to speak of it to any one, and he decided it would be best to test the adventure. He therefore went to the house indicated, which he knew was the house of Bahá'u'lláh, the dreaded heretic. He walked up the steps hesitatingly, and knocked with a beating heart, for he had little faith that the password given him was valid, and he had every reason to distrust the people within.

The door was opened suspiciously, and he was asked his business. In trembling tones he pronounced the words, "Alláh o' Abhá!" Instantly the door was thrown wide open, he was encircled by the arms of his questioner, and within the apartment he saw a noble looking man seated at a table, with his eyes upon a book.

He had uttered the customary greeting of the Bahá'ís, "Alláh o' Abhá," which translated from the Arabic tongue means "God the Glorious." It has been their means of identification and communication as was the sign of the fish to the Christians of an earlier Day of God, day of persecution, alas! It is called their Greatest Name, as was that of Christ to his followers, that of Jehovah to the Jews, of Om to the Hindus of an ancient period. It, of course, expresses that intimate consciousness of God's Glory which the devotees of Bahá'u'lláh claim as the added knowledge of the Deity in this new Day.

The guest so strangely admitted to the home of Bahá'u'lláh, could not leave it until he had realized the truth in his grandfather's exhortation. He and all his family became faithful believers in the wonder of the Blessed Perfection's presence in the world, and have formed a devoted nucleus of friends in the prison city.

When the time came for Bahá'u'lláh to pass away he warned those about him of his departure, and he had already made known his will in the Kitáb el Ad, or Book of the Covenant, where he designates his son 'Abdu'l-Bahá as his successor, and the Center of the Covenant, the one who shall stand as the Interpreter of his mighty Word after he has crossed the threshold.

The end of mortal life for Bahá'u'lláh was peaceful as the passing of such a soul must be when not hastened by the throes of martyrdom, and after a brief attack of fever in the Spring of 1892 he disappeared from earthly view.

The following are some portions of a very remarkable letter sent by Bahá'u'lláh to a "Friend" in Persia shortly after his great Illumination had come upon him. It may be added that the followers of Bahá'u'lláh, or Bahá'ís and Bábís are called simply "Friends" in Persia. This communication, however, was written to a personal friend of the Manifestation, who was evidently an individual of unusual enlightenment. The original Persian, which is said to possess particular beauty, has been translated by Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab. The epistle is so long that only extracts can be quoted. It begins:

"In the Name of God the Peerless!"

"Glory befits the Discoverer, who, through one shower of the ocean of his generosity, expanded the firmament of existence, begemmed it with the stars of knowledge, and summoned the people to the most high court of perception and understanding!

“This shower, which is the first Word of the Almighty, is sometimes called the Water of Life, for it quickens the dead souls in the desert of ignorance with the Spring of Intelligence. Sometimes it is called the first Emanation which appears from the Sun of Wisdom, and when it began to shine, the first movement became manifest, and known, and then phenomena stepped into the arena of existence; and these appearances were through the generosity of the In-comparable, the Wise One. He is the Knower, the Giver : He is sanctified and Holy above every statement and attribute! The seen and the unseen fail to attain the measure of His understanding. The world of being and what-ever has issued from it bears witness to this Utterance.

“Therefore it has become known that the First Bestowal of the Almighty is the Word. The receiver and acceptor of it is the understanding.

“The Word is the first instructor in the university of existence, and is the Primal Emanation of God. Whatever has appeared is through the reflection of its Light, and whatever is manifested is the appearance of its Wisdom.

“All the names originate in His Name, and the beginnings and endings of all affairs are in His Hand.

“. . . . The pulse of the world is in the hand of the Skilful Physician. He diagnoses the illness, and wisely prescribes the remedy. Every day has its own secret, and every tongue a melody. The illness of today has one cure, and that of to-morrow another. Look ye upon this day, and consider and discuss its needs. One sees that existence is afflicted with innumerable ailments compelling it to lie upon the bed of suffering. Men who are intoxicated with the wine of self-contemplation prevent the Wise Physician from reaching the patient. Thus have they caused themselves and the world to suffer. They know not the ailment, nor recognize the remedy. They take the wrong for the right, the crooked for the straight, the enemy for the friend.

“. . . . O Friends, when the Primal Word appeared in these latter days, a number of the heavenly souls heard the Melody of the Beloved and hastened toward it, while others finding that the deeds of some did not correspond with their words were prevented from the Splendors of the Sun of Knowledge.

“. . . . O ye sons of intelligence! The thin eye-lid prevents the eye from seeing the world and what is contained therein. Then think of the result when the curtain of greed covers the sight of the heart. Say, O ye people! The darkness of greed and envy obscures the light of the soul, as the cloud prevents the penetration of the sun's rays. Should one listen with the ear of intelligence to this Utterance he shall spread the wings of freedom, and soar with great joy to the Heaven of understanding.

“. . . . O people! The word must be demonstrated by the deed, for the righteous witness of the word is action. The former without the latter shall not allay the thirst of the needy, nor open the doors of sight to the blind.

“The Heavenly Wise One proclaimeth: A harsh word is like unto a sword, but gentle speech is like unto milk. The children of the world attain unto knowledge and better themselves through this. The Tongue of Wisdom says: Whosoever possesses Me not has nothing. Pass by whatever exists in this world, and find Me. I am the Sun of Perception, and the Ocean of Science. I revive the withered ones, and quicken the dead. I am that Light which illumines the Path of Insight. I am the Falcon of the land of the Almighty! I bear healing in my wings, and teach the knowledge of soaring to the Heaven of Truth.

“The Peerless Beloved says: The Way of Freedom is opened! Hasten ye! The Fountain of Knowledge is gushing! Drink ye!

Say, O Friends! The Tabernacle of Oneness is raised! Look not upon each other with the eye of strangeness! Ye are all the fruits of one tree, and the leaves of one branch. Truly, I say: Whatever lessens ignorance, and increases knowledge that has been, is, and shall be accepted by the Creator. “Say, O people! Walk ye under the shade of the Tree of Righteousness; enter ye under the protection of the Tent of Unity. Say, O thou possessor of Sight! The past is the mirror of the future: look and perceive. Perchance after the acquirement of knowledge ye may know the Friend, and attain to His good Pleasure. Today the best fruit of the Tree of Science and Knowledge is that which benefits mankind and improves his condition.

“Say! The tongue is the witness of my Faith, do not pollute it with untruthfulness. The Spirit is the treasury of my Mystery, do not deliver it into the hand of greed. It is hoped that in this Dawn the universe shall become illumined with the Sun of understanding and knowledge, so that we may attain to the good pleasure of the Beloved, and drink from the Ocean of Divine Recognition.

“. . . O Friend! We have seen the pure ground, and cast the seed of knowledge. Now it depends on the rays of the Sun whether it burns up or is caused to grow. Say, today through the greatness of the Peerless Wise One, the Sun of Knowledge has appeared from behind the covering of the Spirit, and all the birds of the meadow of Oneness are intoxicated with the wine of Understanding, and are commemorating the name of the Beloved. Happy is the one who finds this and becomes Immortal.”

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PROPHECIES IN REGARD TO THE GREAT DAY.

The Muḥammadan prophecies as to the Appearance of the Báb have already been mentioned, but it will surprise many Christian readers to know that these forewarnings are even more startling in the Old and New Testament than in the Qur’án and the traditions of the Imáms. The dates of this great arrival are as definitely given in Isaiah, in Daniel, Ezekiel and the Book of Revelations as in the Muḥammadan scriptures. Christians have believed that these prophecies refer to the destruction of the world, that this destruction shall be followed by the horror of the day of judgment, and the establishment of the Wonderful thousand of years of peace, called the Millennium. But the interpretation of these promises by the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh is more reasonable, and is already justified by fulfilment.

It may be that the reader is not interested in prophecy. As a rule the Anglo-Saxon and American child hears too much of it in youth, and when the rational life begins with more mature years, the adult individual casts the entire question aside as part of the superstition that must be outgrown.

However, as we return to the wonderful poetic trance of Isaiah, the direct psychic interpretations of Daniel, and the marvellous vision in the Book of Revelations, which has never been comprehended until our day, we are impressed by the fact that all of these sensitive seers, as well as nearly all of the ancient Hebrew prophets have had a glimpse of a lovely Play Day which was to come to the world some time. Moreover, when we see what is evidently the same vision in the words of Christ to his disciples before his departure, and also in those of Zoroaster, who came and left his golden message in the world's heart so many years before him, the question may assume a deeper interest for us, especially if we realize that Muḥammad at a later day, was clearly possessed of the same conviction that a wonderful Day was to dawn for mankind when the divine message would be so powerfully uttered, so fully explained that men would not only listen to it, but live it.

For the sad fact remains to stare us in the face that up to the present period the world has not dreamed of living according to the Word of the divine mentors who have successively honored us with their radiant Presence, who have ravished us with the joy of their short stay, and almost invariably shed their blood as a sacrifice to our hardness of heart!

The world has listened merely, but it has hardly been less rapacious, less cruel, less passionate in the presence of the divine Word spoken successively by Abraham, Moses, Brahm, Zoroaster, Buddha, Christ and Muḥammad. We enshrine the memory of each who has brought the Light, build temples to his name, and then again go roaring on after the delusions of our own glory as if the Word had never been spoken.

Nevertheless the few who attend sufficiently to bring a reflection from the splendor of life into their own existence, we enshrine also in lesser temples, or in niches where the brilliance is so evident that it might easily recall us from the darkness of our own lives.

We never forget Florence Nightingale, for instance, if we know nothing else about her, we are aware that she gave herself gladly for others. We con over the lovely life of Sir Thomas Moore, and his devotion to his ideal, in a circle where the ideal was singularly deficient. We drop happy tears upon the chronicle of St. Francis of Assisi, and sing with him his joyous song through Italian byways. We thrill at the noble ender of John Ruskin, great enough to sacrifice his inherited wealth that he might walk independently beside his unendowed brother, the common man! We love the complete unselfishness of Camille Corot, who refused to accumulate wealth because it made him so happy to share it with others. We rejoice in the beautiful comradeship of Donatello, to whom every moment of life was sweet because he lived in the world of ideas created by himself and his companions of the young Renaissance—and kept his money in a basket suspended from the ceiling from which everyone in need was free to help himself!

As we read such records, we realize that some people have lived, and have done more than listen and perhaps dream! Existence has been no grey monotonous current to them. They have loved, enjoyed, created. They have been so penetrated by divine ideals that the physical side of life has been always secondary to them.

Was it not significant that when Donatello first saw the great Christ that his friend Brunelleschi had carved, he dropped the corners of his sculptor's apron, in which he was carrying the breakfast materials gathered in the market, and walked away, saying to his companions:

“You can get your own breakfast, I have had enough!”

Can you not imagine that during the remainder of that morning Donatello was fed by celestial food? The whole creative man within, him was roused and nourished by the magnificent work of his friend, and the impulse of his genius hung before his astonished eyes the full production of his later life!

These things are life, not the piling up of millions, the selection of intricate and dazzling costumes, the serving of lunches and dinners, the speeding of automobiles. It is not that each one of us is a genius, but each one of us possesses an individuality and a capacity to live through that love and endeavor that is penetrated by the thought of God, and each in his own way comes at that manner of living when he listens to the great and simple message that has been voiced again and again by the Messengers of God.

An artist friend said recently:

“Most people are so anxious to make a living that they forget how to live, but I have always lived, and yet I have made a living.”

Another said, “It is a great privilege to earn a living by doing the thing that one loves, and I would rather earn a meagre living in that way than a princely one by the sacrifice of the ideal.”

It was this feeling that prompted in Tolstoi the impulse to sacrifice his entire fortune and live the simple life of the common man. Having the responsibilities of a large family whom he had reared in the environment of wealth and ease, he could not do so, but he would unquestionably have found happiness in the sacrifice, for the eternal life opens as we become independent of merely physical things.

“I must find immortality before death, or I may experience much difficulty in attaining it. Because to be immortal is to be absorbed in love, and in the endeavor that is not concerned in merely physical things. If I am flooded with great ideas, I am immortal, and death has disappeared.” So the physician absorbed in the life of his patients, in the processes of healing which renew life, has found immortality. The representative of the people seeking unselfishly the good of his constituents, has found it, the mother who loves and considers other children as well as her own, has found it. The agriculturist deeply engaged in the best processes for the development of his land, and also for the well-being of man and beast upon it, has found it, and to all such persons mere questions of personal comfort and aggrandizement are of slight import. They have learned to live in the larger circle, where self is not preeminent, and it is only in that circle that one begins to feel the splendor of life.

This splendor is eternal, and is not confined to the radius of our little planet, it is electric, and stings into vivid consciousness every atom of the individual being. Each truth speaker who has lived in the ages of the past has felt this, each Messenger of God has sung it, and is it not natural to suppose that looking forward into the future aeons many may have glimpsed suddenly the moment of fulfilment, the instant in the earth’s history when the ideal began at last to enter the common life, the moment when it was no longer centered in individuals, gifted and erratic, but softened all hearts, and established justice in our social system?

Ruskin was so convinced of this possibility that for years he refused to become a socialist because he insisted that human beings cannot be reformed by a system of laws. The separate man must begin to live the ideal life from his conviction of its excellence, or because he is so filled with its essence that he cannot help it. Only in later years he came to realize that perhaps those who first perceive the ideal relationships should make laws to control the individuals in whom the true vision dawns more slowly.

We know enough now-a-days of the temperament and peculiarities of those who possess the gift of clairvoyance to realize that they see what is not revealed to ordinary eyes, and we can imagine if we have not witnessed its evidence that this power is enormously enhanced from a very different source, in one upon whom the Spirit of God rests. So it would not be strange if these True Ones in all ages had looked forward, and had painted for us portions of that wonderful Day in which at last the power of God is so fully poured out upon the world that all men must begin to realize it, and live according to its law.

We find our own old Testament rich in these pre-glimpses of what seems the very day in which we are living now, with its horrors, its splendors, and its marvellous inspirations. For instance verses 3 and 4 of the second chapter of the tiny book of Nahum, paint as vivid a picture of the present day automobile as could easily be granted to a truth seer living seven hundred years before Christ.

“ . . . the chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation, and the fir trees shall be terribly shaken.

“The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall jostle one against another in the broad ways, they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings.”

Many of these old prophetic writers in ancient Hebrew are not great message givers, but they were holy men devoted to the service of their God, and possessed by the psychic vision so that their images are sometimes broken and distorted. For instance the prophet is carried away upon the mighty current of the distant future, and paints a clear picture of what results from the concurrence of celestial powers, and then without warning there comes a break in the flow of inspiration. Suddenly the seer is talking of mere tribal matters, and apparently is not conscious that both scene and time of his picture have undergone a momentous trans-formation.

Anyone who has become interested in the psychologic analysis of those possessing the psychic gift can understand this irregularity, this flaw in the plate, and the separate portions of the picture remain separately interesting and true.

So it is not a matter of indifference, nor one for gentle scoffing, when we discover that the same date for the appearance of the Mandi which the Muḥammadan tradition preserved appears repeatedly in our own scriptures. That date is the year 1260, it will be remembered, which corresponds with the year 1841 of our era, the date when the Báb first began to preach, and when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was born.

In the 7th verse of the remarkable 12th chapter of Daniel, we have the date clearly given. Daniel asks how long shall it be until the end of these wonders, and the man clothed in linen replies: a time, time, and a half. Now biblical criticism tells us that a “time” is 360 years, “times” is always recognized as two times, or 720 years, and adding the half time of 180, we have again this persistent number of 1260 years.

Biblical criticism recognizes that in this chapter Daniel is dealing with the Muḥammadan overthrow of Jerusalem, because it was at that time, and because of the conquest that the Jewish daily sacrifice in the temple was rendered impossible, and the “Abomination of desolation” was begun which shall end in this wonderful year of 1844, or 1260. Daniel is dealing with the dispensation of Muḥammad, and naturally gives the date which includes it, for necessarily the proclamation of the Báb that a new Manifestation of God had risen, brings to a close the preceding one.

Later in the chapter we find the verse to which Christ refers when his disciples asked him for the “time of the end,” or the great day of his “second coming.” In the 24th chapter of Matthew he points them to the 11th verse of the same wonderful 12th chapter of Daniel:

“And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days.”

This gives us the date of 1863, the year when Bahá'u'lláh announced his mission to the world, in fulfilment of the Báb's prophecy, but in this instance we compute not according to the conventional chronology of Islám from the hegira, but from the moment ten years before that day, when Muḥammad first told his followers of his illumination and his mission. It is significant that Christ should have referred to this verse, and that its computation should contain this additional ten years which is not recognized in the date of the Hegira. The latter marks the moment of Muḥammad's outward recognition, the former that of his own inward light. The announcement of Bahá'u'lláh in 1863 is also one of inward light, because the world has not yet accepted and established his chronology.

In the 12th chapter of Revelations we find the same date of 1260 repeated in a fashion which our biblical critics have never understood, because they have not regarded Muḥammad as a prophet of God, and have not expected to find his figure in the vision of St. John. This chapter has puzzled many critics, and has received numerous interpretations. The Christian Scientists have believed that it refers to Mrs. Eddy and her beautiful teaching, but the explanation of it offered by the Báb is the only satisfactory one.

If John the seer looked into the future, and the clearing of the spiritual vision had removed the veils from his eyes, he must surely have perceived the great interruptions and variations which the Christian dispensation would experience. As he had been close to its lovely Light, he would be especially sensitive to all connected with its long span. So the upheaval of Islám, whether we regard Muḥammad as a true prophet or not would necessarily have attracted his spiritual gaze.

The woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, and a crown of twelve stars undoubtedly refers to the movement of Muḥammad. It has been the great dominating force in the kingdom of Persia, whose symbol is the sun, and in Turkey, whose symbol is the moon, and its twelve Imáms are certainly worthy of the denomination of stars in a crown. In the progress of the chapter the irruption and dynasty of the Ommyad Turks are plainly indicated, as well as the long struggle between the followers of Christ and those of Muḥammad. The number of 1260 years is given as the length of time the woman is preserved, and this is again a reference to the dispensation of Muḥammad from the Hegira to the proclamation of the Báb in 1260 of the Islámic chronology and 1844 of our own.

In the 11th chapter of Revelations the number of 1260 is repeated in such fashion that its reference to the Muḥammadan domination of the Holy Land is unquestionable. The first and second verses are as follows:

“And there was given me a reed like unto a rod, and the angel stood, saying, ‘rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein.’

“ ‘But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not, for it is given unto the gentiles, and the Holy City shall they tread under foot forty and two months.’ “

It must be remembered that in all the mystical and prophetic numbering of the Bible and other holy books, a day stands for a year, and forty two months of thirty days each produces once more this number of 1260. When we have once begun to connect it with the dispensation of Islám we feel certain that John had in mind in these verses those long years in which the Sultáns have ruled the outer courts of Jerusalem. They have always respected the services in the Christian temples and have carefully compelled peace between the warring priests of the Greek and Catholic sects, and their spiritual domination ended with the proclamation of the Báb, which sounded the note of a new day.

During these twelve hundred and sixty years from the Hegira of Muḥammad until the great message of the Báb there was no fresh claim of illumination. They represent the unbroken rule of a prophet whose followers were hostile to the immense body of believers in Christ, and who were conquerors of the Jews as well, it seems natural therefore that such a block of time should have touched the imagination of seers in different ages, beginning with the illumination which introduced it to the world, and ending likewise with the illumination which quenched it as a dominating objective force.

Another point about the prophecies of the Bible is of special interest with regard to the Hebrew race, and the great movement of Christianity. There are two distinct lines of prophecy in the old Testament, one referring to the overthrow and scattering of the Jews, and their refusal to listen to the voice of God, and many others which recount in organ tones of glorious rejoicing the victory of the oppressed, the triumph of the humiliated ones, and the glorification of God in the Holy places.

Now the Jews in the time of Christ were looking for the Messiah as the Muḥammadan students were expecting the return of the Imám in the Day of the Báb. But they did not truly understand their own scriptures. For instance, the 53d chapter of Isaiah should have given them pause. It so clearly records the suffering, persecution and death of Jesus Christ that it seems as if it must have been intercalated after the tragic story of his illumination and agony had been completed. Yet we know it is an integral portion of the ancient book of Isaiah.

Surely if the Jewish High Priests had known this chapter they would have sat reverently at the feet of the Saviour, recognizing him as the first who came in fulfilment of the great prophecy. But their minds were occupied only with visions of triumph, with the advent of a king crowned in his glory, for so they interpreted the wonderful chapters in Ezekiel, Isaiah and the other old Hebrew prophets, who fall into an ecstasy when picturing this marvellous Play Day of man which is to come, and on the verge of which we seem to stand even now.

In this day the Jews shall be restored to their former glory, and the “Abomination of desolation” shall end. As has been said it is illuminating that Christ should have referred to the verse in Daniel marking the beginning and end of this suffering. It is evident that he saw perfectly his own place in the great scheme, and knew that the story would complete itself only when the glory descended the second time, and more fully. The Jews have ignored the two distinct lines of prophecy, and the Christians as well.

The Jews declared that Christ did not fulfil all the ancient predictions, and truly he did not, for it was only his function to carry out what belonged to himself. The Jews therefore still expect the Messiah, whose coming will complete the traditional imageries of their race. They know that the time is here, and they recognize its fulfilment in the advent of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh with delightful quickness.

Meanwhile the Christian critics have applied both lines of prophecy to Christ, assuming, according to the theology they have created, that he is the only Saviour, misunderstanding his own frank statement of his return, and of its meaning. The theologians forget always that Jesus was the man, that Christ was the Glory, the Breath of God resting upon him, and that when he spoke of return it was the Glory that promised to visit mankind again. No one can ponder the ancient Hebrew scriptures with the clue of the two distinct currents referring to events evidently wide apart, without feeling that if there was an actual vision of the future in these strange picturings, we are in the moment of the second great dispensation which brings the fulfilment of the first.

One needs only to compare the 53d chapter of Isaiah with the 65th to feel certain that the latter reveals to us the consequences of the events foretold in the former. The first verses of the 65th chapter paint the condition of the Jews after they refused to accept their prophet. Then in the 8th verse begins the prophecy of the succeeding Manifestation which shall create "a new heaven and a new earth," but the promise is that the scattered and sorrowing people shall rejoice in this second kingdom, though it is not of their making. The allusion to the "valley of Achor" is only one of a number among the old Testament prophecies which paint very clearly this positive location where the Manifestation was confined for so many years, and where 'Abdu'l-Bahá in his turn has received all the nations of the world. Achor is necessarily Acre or 'Akká, the ancient city at the foot of Mt. Carmel, which has a long history among the generations of men.

Thousands of the Jews have recognized the relation of the two lines of foretelling in their sacred writings, and in knowing Bahá'u'lláh as the Messiah promised so gloriously, they see immediately the mistake their people made in denying Christ, and hasten to give their adherence to him also, and thus they realize at last the joy of comprehending the great mission of Christ to the world.

Another point of unquestionable import in regard to these strange prophecies of the Hebrew seers is the place given to the Branch in the dawning of the Day of Peace, of which Isaiah always sings the song.

For instance in Zechariah 6:12, the verse runs:

“ . . . Behold the man whose name is the Branch, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord.”

Again in Isaiah 4:2, “In that day shall the Branch of the Lord be beautiful, and glorious, and the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and comely, for them that are escaped out of Israel.”

These citations might be multiplied, but they are all of the same character, and it is unnecessary. They have been referred to Christ by biblical critics but this reference has never seemed correct. Christ was not called “the Branch” and he did not inaugurate a day of peace. The passages of the Old Testament where the Branch is alluded to always describe him as presiding in that wonderful Play Day when wars have ceased, when men have learned the lesson of love and mutual service, and when joy reigns because selfishness has died out of the world’s heart. The 8th chapter of Zechariah is one of those which speaks very definitely of the wonders of this day as fulfilling Jewish prophecy so clearly that everyone will recognize it.

Christ of course died in shameful obscurity, and his beautiful teaching has lived in our consciousness as an ideal which some time we must carry out. Bahá’u’lláh said, “I am the Realizer!” and he went on to explain that in spite of the heavenly monition which Christ gave, men could not live according to its law until another Manifestation of God had come and brought the power to do so.

The word “realization” seems constantly on the lips of the world today, applied in every direction, and will presently bid our armaments exchange their Dread-noughts for air ships, and command the inciting of Krupp guns into statues for the peace makers. Even in the United States we are growing weary of the rich man and are comprehending that laws preventing the excessive accumulation of wealth are necessary for the preservation of the commonwealth. The rapidly increasing feeling of brotherhood everywhere will soon render war impossible, and the ruler of aggressive spirit can no longer compel the courage and faith of the common man.

Bahá’u’lláh spoke of himself always as the “Tree of Life.” He gave this explanation of the symbol of the tree of life in the Garden of Eden. The Manifestation of God is the Tree of Life, he declared, for it is he whose mission it is to give the bread of life to mankind, and explain the wonder of the world’s creation, and man’s relation to God. When he selected his oldest son as his interpreter, he called him the greatest Branch from the Tree of Life, using the term unquestionably in its spiritual significance, and always spoke of him as “the Branch.”

The Day of God when the prophet voices his message is always illumined by three figures, the precursor, or herald, the Messenger, or Manifestation, and the interpreter, or we might say, the Illuminator, the Illumination, and the Illuminated One.

Thus John the Baptist foretold the coming of Christ, Christ spoke the Message, and Peter was his interpreter. In the day of Moses the coming of the Liberator was foretold by various wise men. Moses led the people out of bondage, and Joshua completed their emancipation. Muḥammad's appearance was announced successively by four wise men. Rouz-bih, surnamed Salman, had the honor of serving them. When death came to one he sent Rouz-bih to the other, until the turn of the fourth arrived. When death claimed this one, he said to the attendant:

“Oh Rouz-bih, after preparing me for the tomb, and burying me, go thou to Hijaz where the Muḥammadic Sun will rise. To thee be glad tidings of the meeting of his Holiness!”

Muḥammad delivered the law, and appointed ‘Alí to have charge of it after his passing. In our day the Báb cried aloud the reappearance of the Word in Bahá'u'lláh, and spoke with such power that no precursor ever so prepared the way for the luminous Advent. Bahá'u'lláh gave the message with a fullness and glory that has never been previously attained. He appointed ‘Abdu'l-Bahá “the Branch” as his interpreter, and the one who should bring peace to the world.

There is a very significant point in Christ's warning to his disciples of that wonderful time when the spirit should descend again and bring the fulfilment of the law which the gentle teacher had so lovingly propounded. He said, in that day many will come saying, “I am Christ,” but do not listen to them, beware of them all, for I am not in them!

One of the peculiar features of the last half century has been the number of cults which have risen about a figure who has sincerely believed himself to be the reincarnated Christ, and our insane asylums are filled with the unfortunate lunatics who cherish the same delusion. These characters have appeared everywhere, and apparently have spoken every language.

But the great Revelator of this day has never made this claim. On the contrary the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, and Abdu'l-Bahá explain for the first time in fullness what Christ was, what the manifestation of God always must be, what constitutes the Day of God, and why the Day must always dawn again and again, because man's heart is human, and the divine lesson grows cold within it.

No one can read the words of Christ to his disciples, and the 14th, 15th, and 16th chapters of John without realizing that the illumination upon Jesus spoke of the time when it should descend again to revive the world through the lips of another divine one. Christ said as he sat at the table with his consecrated ones:

“I shall not break bread again until I eat it at my Father's table,” and now we know that his prophetic vision painted before him the marvellous Day when the two illuminated ones should descend to verify Christ's own loving symbol of the Sonship of man, and the Fatherhood of God.

He says again, “Many things I would say unto you, but ye cannot bear them, but he that comes after me, he will say them.” No one knew better than Christ how much he left unsaid in his short, unwritten, oral message, yet he gave the people all they could comprehend, and the fruit of his message, lying in their hearts has prepared them for much more. So today the prophets of the fulfilment in their imprisonment have written wonderful volumes of explanation and interpretation upon that great law of God his Messengers have revealed and we must apply. Bahá'u'lláh says in the Íqán, if the wisdom of God made known by his prophets were estimated according to the letters in the alphabet all that has been previously revealed would not represent more than the first two letters, while the present day in its fullness has given all of the remainder!

In the Kitáb-el Aqdas Bahá'u'lláh has laid down the outline on which our future social democracy shall be reared. They are the lines of advancement upon which the world is working everywhere now. In the Íqán, as has been previously said, he explains that wonder of the successive Manifestations of God which have enlightened the world. In the Hidden Words he speaks in inspired paragraphs uttered by the spirit which possessed him. In the Seven Valleys which, like the Igham, was written in one night in answer to a question propounded to him, he tells how the soul finds God, through what different states man passes in his search for the divine elixir. But these words are but a bald statement of this exquisite little book with its heavenly contents.

Bahá'u'lláh has written many volumes, of which comparatively few have yet been translated. Those which have already reached the western world are astonishing not only in their literary beauty, but in the power they possess to rouse the soul and fill the student with power to live. They are like a reincarnation and amplification of the words of Christ and Muḥammad, and of course that is exactly what they are. Besides these numerous volumes of Bahá'u'lláh we have the productions from the inspired pen of the Báb, and the remarkable letters or "tablets" of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, which already would fill many pages of print, and the volume Some Answered Questions, which was written by Miss Barney after a year's residence in 'Akká, during which time she asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá in regard to those spiritual points which had troubled the minds of western believers. The book is full of light, and may be only one of many we may have from the pen of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Christ alluded to the future Manifestation under different names. He called him the Comforter, and the Christian critics have interpreted this as indicating the breathing of the Holy Spirit upon the hearts of men, which surely is a beautiful idea. But Christ speaks of the Comforter definitely as an individual. He says:

"But when the Comforter shall come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth, he shall testify of me."

This has been particularly illustrated in Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l Baba, who though born under the Dispensation of Muḥammad have so testified of Christ that they have won his recognition from the Muḥammadan and Jewish worlds which previously either ignored him entirely, or refused to place him in the lofty station which was his.

Again Christ mentions the coming of one as the "Prince of this World." In the 30th verse of the 14th chapter of John, he says:

“Hereafter I will not talk much with you: for the Prince of this world cometh and hath nothing in me.”

In this passage ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says Christ’s reference is distinctly to Bahá’u’lláh, who came as a Manifestation of God, with no reflection of the personality of Jesus Christ. That is why Christ says “he has nothing in me.” It is a new personality upon whom the Divine Glory rests.

In the 11th verse of the 12th chapter of Matthew in response to his disciples’ inquiries, he says:

“ . . . . Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things.”

He adds that Elias is already come “and they knew him not,” but it is evident that in his first remark he is not thinking of John, but of the Báb, that second Elias, for he truly did “restore all things,” winning an acceptance, and breaking the power of tradition as John the Baptist had not done. The Báb opened the minds of his generation to the truth so that the recognition of Bahá’u’lláh was a comparatively easy matter to thousands.

In the 27th verse of the 16th chapter of Matthew Christ says:

“For the Son of Man shall come in the Glory of his Father, with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his work.”

Does this not seem again like a curiously definite allusion to the wonderful Manifestation of to-day, when after “Elias” or the Báb has made his proclamation the Glory of God has rested upon these two illuminated ones who were literally father and son? The Son of man saw all things, the veils had disappeared from before his eyes, and clear outlines of the great events in distant ages were revealed to him.

CHAPTER IX.

THE INSPIRING PRESENCE OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.

To many persons in the world the name of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá or ‘Abbás Effendi is like a delightful volume open for perusal. The number of believers in his faith is very great and includes devotees from all the religions of the world, who in recognizing this wonderful Revelation of today have for the first time comprehended fully the meaning of the cult in which they were born and bred. So in the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá one meets Muḥammadan and Braham, Buddhist and Zoroastrian, Shintoist, Christian and Jew, Theosophist and Christian Scientist, all rejoicing in one another, and in the fresh and living understanding of questions human and divine which has come to them through the illumination of their union in the great Revelation that unites all worshippers and seekers for Truth.

In the Oriental countries and Russia there are at least twelve million who acclaim ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as their spiritual centre, and in the western world there are growing organizations of the movement in most of the principal cities. In Berlin, Paris, London, New York, Chicago, Kansas City, Denver, Boston, San Francisco, Los Angeles one finds vigorous centres of agitation. Washington, D. C., has a large Assembly, and in New York, Chicago, and Washington there are Bahá’í publishing houses, devoted to the translation and publication of the writings of the Revelators, and of everything connected with the propagation of the cult. The literature is issued in cheap though always attractive form, and sold at a cost which merely covers the expense of paper and printing, with the idea of bringing it within the reach of the thinnest pocketbook. No commercial feeling has touched the movement as yet, all its teachings are given with absolute freedom, there are no lessons to be paid for, and no college of teachers can demand a high price for services rendered.

Many travellers have visited ‘Akká, and have been entertained in the delightfully simple household of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but the record is yet to be made of one who has paid his board while there, or left a sum of money in the hand of his host or the “butler” at his departure. Yet each carries away with him a gift of inspiration, an impetus toward nobler living which it seems impossible to duplicate elsewhere in the visible world.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is a man of medium height and slender figure, with an independent carriage, which gives an impression of greater stature than he actually possesses. He has a large and fine head, his brow is broad and high, his eyes wide apart, and of unusual size. They are unusual in other respects also, for they have a white line around the iris, from which the light seems to pour forth in his moments of excitement and happiness, rendering his face fairly luminous. The color of the eyes alters in singular fashion, being sometimes brown, again blue or gray, but always beautiful. The nose is aquiline, strong and intellectual, the mouth of good size, but delicate and exceedingly mobile, the chin oval, but full of power.

The countenance is that of an inspired idealist, but one who can compass also true practical knowledge. It is at once powerful and benignant, and one feels always an electric force about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which is both irresistible and loving. It is quite unlike that of magnetism, and has in it nothing of a hypnotic character. In fact, association with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has the effect of rousing the will and intelligence to a marked degree.

Like Bahá’u’lláh he is deeply interested in the progress of the world, and seems perfectly familiar with all that occurs outside of ‘Akká, though he has not left that city of his long confinement. His conversation, whether dealing with great questions or with individuals is always singularly luminous, and marked by brilliancy and eloquence of expression. In all his speech there is never a word that savors of “cant,” and he speaks of the “love of God” with such earnestness and fervor, that one realizes he is talking life, and that this is religion. One little utterance of this sort the author has never forgotten because it was spoken to herself on the occasion of her visit to ‘Akká. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had been alluding to the restrictions of the life in ‘Akká, and went on to say:

“But we are all happy because we have the love of God in our hearts. When the heart is full of the love of God it loses consciousness of the body. Then pain is as pleasure, then darkness is as light! If such a one is shut in a prison there are no walls for him, no solitude, he knows not a prison!

“So the martyrs who have suffered for their faith, their hearts are so full of the love of God, their ears so penetrated by his songs of gladness, that they scarcely feel the blows inflicted upon them. It is as if the blow did not reach them, as if the sword could not cut them!

“That is what has preserved us here,” he added after a moment. “It is as if all the world is here in us—there is no world outside of our prison!”

It would be impossible to reproduce the tone of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s voice when he said: “He knows not a prison!” It rang with such sweetness and happiness that it seemed as if all the violins and flutes of earth, in the hands of the most perfect masters had combined to produce that sound. Yet the speaker had been a prisoner since he was nine years old, and was still a prisoner when he uttered the words.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá speaks Persian as a rule, though he converses freely in all the Oriental languages and is beginning to use those of the western world now that police restriction is lightened. He has half-a-dozen interpreters and translators in the household usually, and his youngest daughter, who speaks English exceedingly well, frequently acts as his intermediary with western women.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is married and has four daughters, three of whom are married, but all live in the house with him, and have preferred to share his confinement. The sons-in-law do business in Haifa, coming back and forth at will. The wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is a particularly sweet and motherly woman of very noble character. Another remarkable member of the circle is Behiah Khánun, who is called the Greatest Holy Leaf, an oriental title hardly comprehensible to western ears. She is the elder sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and has refused marriage because she could enjoy more complete freedom in the home of her brother than in an outside environment governed by Muḥammadan law. There is a deeper reason of course, for no one who has been privileged to live in the radius of a Messenger of God could ever prefer to leave it, and the Greatest Holy Leaf is an exceedingly gifted and sensitive person. She is tall and slender with wonderful blue eyes, in which all the sorrows and joys of the world seem to be mirrored, and a countenance which is fairly electric in its quick changes.

The ladies of the family are admirable housewives. They make all their own simple wearing apparel, by the aid of a sewing machine from the western world. They oversee the production of the kitchen for their many guests and are thoroughly hygienic in the cleanliness of their environment. They typify the modern saint, the conception of whom obliges us to revolutionize our entire spiritual cosmogony. A fashionable woman of the western world, as helpless as are some of these artificial dames, and as eager for spiritual culture, was caught in the gentle household without a trunk, and so handsomely garbed that she felt disgraced in the presence of the lovely simplicity that reigns there. The Greatest Holy Leaf thereupon made her a print dress with her own beautiful hands, which was a model for grace and adjustment. The western woman is still puzzling perhaps over the problem of how such profound spirituality can be associated with such excellent practical skill and sense, but in reality they are always found side by side.

This principle is one we see constantly illustrated in this household. It helps us to realize that we must no longer look for a man of God in seclusion, and as a recluse. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá declares that the seeker finds God most truly if he seeks him as a citizen of the world, working with his brothers for the betterment of mankind.

We have learned that a Messenger of God must be a “man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief,” otherwise how could he know so well the sorrows of the world? But this man of sorrows must have learned the law of happiness, so that he radiates it upon all who approach him, and this is certainly true of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Melancholy could not reside under the same roof with him, and all who go to him find that they are learning lessons in regard to the necessity and the meaning of happiness which they never previously dreamed of, and it is a happiness not dependent at all upon the things of this world.

Although ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is a poor man his charities are manifold. He provides for many widows of the martyrs who have given their lives for the faith in recent years, and educates their children. Every Friday morning also he spends with the poor of ‘Akká, who gather in the large courtyard of the house and tell him their troubles, sure of a sympathetic hearing. ‘Akká has been simply a prison city so many years that there are no means of livelihood there for the very poor, so that much helpless poverty exists. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is not content to give merely money, however. He is well acquainted with all upon whom he bestows his gifts, and never fails to add the cheering and illuminating word, so that it is a suggestive spectacle to see his providing for his poor. It may be added that the poverty-stricken unfortunates who come thus to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are all Muḥammadans. They are of the people who have persecuted him during his entire life. No follower of Bahá’u’lláh is allowed to accept or demand charity. The Blessed Perfection said to his devotees:

“If you are in need call upon the bounty of God, and you will be relieved immediately, for God is rich, He is the Provider!”

Neither ‘Abdu’l-Bahá nor his family ever spend a penny upon luxury, because they are so deeply aware of the suffering they would like to relieve. The dress of the Center of the Covenant is always of the simplest, and a story is familiar which relates how the dear Holy Mother, as the wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is termed, schemed subtly to provide a more expensive coat for the man of God than the one he usually wore. She felt that when he entertained the Governor of ‘Akká he should be garbed in a handsomer coat, and trusting to that unconsciousness of himself which is one of his characteristics, she planned to order a more costly garment from the tailor, and substitute it on the important morning for the one habitually worn. She believed that he would never know the difference. He is punctilious in cleanliness but that is all.

However, upon the morning in question ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went searching through the house in great excitement. “Where is my coat?

Where is my coat?” he cried, “someone has left me a coat which is not mine!”

The Holy Mother appeared and tried in vain to explain away the presence of the expensive coat. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was completely unreasonable upon the question of clothes.

“But think of this !” he exclaimed, “For the price of this coat you can buy five such as I ordinarily use, and do you think I would spend so much money upon a coat which only I shall wear? If you think I need a new one, very well, but send this back and have the tailor make me for this price five such as I usually have. Then you see, I shall not only have a new one, but I shall also have four to give to others!”

A little story of a friend’s experience reveals somewhat of the influence which contact with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá exercises upon character. She was a woman of fashionable rearing, full of noble theories, but a trifle inexperienced in their application because she had seen little of the world outside of her own particularly gentle circle. She had a beautiful little boy not quite a year old, to whom she gave all the devotion of a young mother. It happened one day she stood in the court of the house with the infant in her arms, when a Muḥammadan beggar woman wandered in. She was an unusually wretched specimen of her filthy class, and she approached the pretty American lady, sure of a generous “douceur” and attempted to caress the beautiful child.

Poor Mrs. A. had a sudden vision of all the most contagious and dreadful diseases which the unfortunate creature might transmit to her sweet baby, and fled swiftly to an inner room. She watched her assailant, however, fearing she might be followed, and meanwhile ‘Abdu’l-Bahá passed through the court. He paused to speak to the distressing woman, gave her some money and rested his hand caressingly upon her shoulder while he spoke to her. There are lepers among the waiting throng who come to him on Fridays, but he never seems to make any difference in his loving contact with them.

The woman was evidently grateful for the kindness of the “heretic” and said as she turned away, “I will pray for you!” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá bowed his head in thanks and went on evidently unconscious that he had done anything remarkable, but Mrs. A. stood looking, her eyes full of tears.

“He is the nearest to God of any man in the world!” she said to herself, “yet he thanked that rag of humanity for her prayers, and I would not even let her touch my baby!"

Then all at once, as she stood there the class feeling fell away from her, she knew suddenly the meaning of brotherhood, and it has not left her since. She ran after the woman to try and catch her, but she had disappeared swiftly. Since then, however, she has found many others.

There are certain virtues which 'Abdu'l-Bahá is always insisting upon in his talks with others, and they are the same as those that Jesus counselled. We must not criticise, we must forgive, we must serve others. As an illustration of the humility he inculcates, and the nobility of service 'Abdu'l-Bahá always insists upon serving those who sit at his table, upon all occasions of any formality. He seems to say:

"If you would be stately, be above all things humble."

He has said so much upon this theme of service and "living the life" that his followers have gathered some of these precious words into a little leaflet which has gone far and wide. It is headed:

"By these things shall ye know the faithful servant of God."

"To live the life. To be no cause of grief to anyone.

"To love each other very much.

"To be kind to all people, and to love them with a pure spirit.

"Should opposition or injury be done to us, we must bear it, and be as kind as ever we can be, and through it all we must love the people. Should calamity exist in the greatest degree, we must rejoice, for these things are the gifts and favors of God.

"To be silent concerning the faults of others, to pray for them, and help them, through kind-ness, to correct their faults.

"To look always at the good and not at the bad. If a man has ten good qualities and one bad one, we must look at the ten and forget the one. And if a man has ten bad qualities, and one good one, we must look at the one and forget the ten.

"To never allow ourselves to speak one unkind word about another, even though that other be our enemy.

"To rebuke those who speak to us about the faults of others.

"All of our deeds must be done in kindness.

"To be occupied in spreading the Teachings for only thorough obedience to this command 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said will we receive the power and confirmation of the Spirit; and that whosoever is granted this power and confirmation of the Spirit is under the Favor of God, but otherwise he is as a lamp without light. 'Abdu'l-Bahá also said that, "every seed cast in this great and magnificent period will be cultivated by God, and produce plants, through the abundance of the clouds of his mercy.”

“To cut our hearts from ourselves and from the world.

“To be humble.

“To be servants of each other, and to know that we are less than anyone else.

“To be as one soul in many bodies; for the more we love each other the nearer we are to God ; but our love, our unity, our obedience must be not by confession but of reality.

“To act with cautiousness and wisdom.

“To be truthful.

“To be hospitable.

“To be reverent.

“To be a cause of healing for every sick one ; a comforter for every sorrowing one; a pleasant water for every thirsty one ; a heavenly table for every hungry one; a guide for every seeker ; a light for every lamp; rain for cultivation ; a star to every Horizon; a Herald to every yearning one for the Kingdom of God.”

In illustration of the admonition against criticism ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is very fond of telling an apocryphal story of Jesus Christ. It runs something like this:

One day as the Saviour was walking in the country with his disciples, they passed the car-case of a dead dog, in an advanced state of decay. Each one expressed in different fashion his disgust at the spectacle. One commented upon the dreadful odor, another upon the swollen and disgusting flesh, etc., etc. Jesus said nothing of all these things, but approaching the creature took a stick and poked out its jaw from the mass of decaying substance.

“See,” He remarked suddenly, “how white and brilliant are the dog’s teeth!”

This shows us, comments ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that we can always find some good point to enlarge upon, even among the most distressing and wicked people. We can call attention to the dog’s teeth!

In illustration of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s long patience under injuries, a patience which must always be loving and cheerful as he insists, the persecution of an old Muḥammadan fakir is recalled. He was fanatically religious and also exceedingly poor. He stood always at the door of the Mosque, and never lost an opportunity to abuse and curse ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, whom he regarded as a dangerous and pestiferous heretic. The Servant of God pitied his misery, and every morning sent him a basket of food, which was sufficient to last him for the day. Every morning when the tempting basket was presented to him, the fakir virtuously kicked it into the ditch, and cursed ‘Abdu’l-Bahá anew. This went on for twenty-three years, until at last one morning when the attendant brought the basket of food and placed it gently beside him, the contumacy of the old fakir disappeared. He burst into tears, he seized the basket of food, ran with it to the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and would have prostrated himself if he had been permitted, exclaiming:

“Oh forgive me for all my wickedness, and let me serve you, for I know that God is in you! Only God could show such kindness!”

One of the peculiarities of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is his dislike for forms and ceremonies, and his distaste of all that savors of officialism. The love and reverence of those about him is so extreme that if it were not for this pronounced determination of the opposite character they would long since have constituted him a high priest in his own world at least. Not long since an unusually large and dignified company of pilgrims had arrived at ‘Akká, and it was planned to receive them in the beautiful garden of the Riḍván. It is the custom of the country to wash, the hands always before any important ceremony, before prayers, before eating, etc. It is a Muḥammadan custom, and these little formalities of the people ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is always careful not to disdain.

Upon this occasion, however, the friends had arranged a very charming and, as they thought, effective ceremony at the reception of the pilgrims. They sent a beautiful boy in advance of the company, bearing a highly polished pewter bowl, a handsome bronze pitcher, and a clean damask towel, scented with attar of rose. The intention was that the Servant of God should make a noble function of the simple ablution of his hands, and all would enjoy it, and reverence him the more. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá saw the procession coming, however, and divined immediately what was in the air. There was a trough with a pipe for watering the flowers at the end of the garden, and a much soiled towel hung there for the convenience of anyone who needed to wash the hands. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ran hastily to the trough, performed a most informal cleansing and then rushed back to love the dusty pilgrims, and pass them most hospitably the beautiful pewter bowl, and the rose scented towel. So there was no function except the spiritual meeting which he always delights in, and he had the pleasure of seeing others enjoy the pretty bowl, the clear water, and the fragrant towel.

The tenor of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life is broken by many wonderful occurrences which the world calls “miracles,” but their producer himself declares that miracles do not exist. There are laws of which we have hardly begun to understand the application and use, like the law of the 4th dimension, and things previously unheard of and impossible may be accomplished by new knowledge or illumination in such directions.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is not a “healer” and declares that his own mission is to the soul of man, and not to the body, yet many who have suffered illness in his house have been healed, sometimes in dramatic and astonishing fashion. One instance in particular illustrates this: An American lady was on her way to ‘Akká, and while waiting at Haifa with her little family, was taken violently ill with typhoid fever. Everything was done for her that nurses and physicians could compass, but nothing touched the disease, which appeared in its most virulent phase, and seemingly must “run its course.”

One day during the afternoon the daughters of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to see the American lady, and distressed at her suffering, they said as they left:

“Have no fear. We will tell our Lord (for so they spoke of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) and at twelve o’clock tonight you will be relieved.”

During the afternoon and evening there was no alteration in the invalid’s condition, and anxiety constantly deepened, but suddenly at midnight the patient turned to her husband and exclaimed, “I feel better ! So much better!”

“What time is it?” he cried instantly, and it was five minutes after twelve.

She fell asleep almost immediately, and rose the next morning as well as she had ever been.

Meanwhile all who have gone to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in illness have received instructions which have resulted sometimes in physical healing, always in spiritual restoration. There are numberless instances of his clear seeing, but he uses such power only when it is necessary to save a soul, or help another, never in phenomenal fashion. Not long since, a woman believer in the Orient was in great trouble. Her husband did not accept the truth to which she had given her heart, and moreover opposed it violently, and dilemmas and tribulations thickened upon her until she felt that if she did not go to ‘Akká and see the center of the mighty movement in which her faith rested, she could not live. So she begged her husband’s permission for the journey, and wrote to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This modern iconoclast laughed at her, and said:

“I will let you go to this man by whom you are deluded if he will perform a miracle, but he can not do it! I am perfectly safe in my promise! I will write a series of questions and lay the envelope containing them in my safe. Then I will put a blank sheet of paper in your letter. You will say nothing in explanation of its presence, and anyway you would not know what I ask! If he answers my questions, you can go to ‘Akká!”

The poor lady was helpless to oppose the trick, which she would never have countenanced, so her letter came to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá containing a blank sheet of paper. The mail at ‘Akká is so voluminous that it is always opened and arranged by one of the young secretaries and on the morning when this missive arrived the gentleman in attendance called ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s attention to it.

“How strange!” he cried. “Here is a letter containing a blank sheet of paper!”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá took it and laughed. “This is a test imposed upon me!” he explained. “Let us attend to the matter without delay!”

So he dictated a response to the unfortunate lady and then one to her husband. In the letter he spoke most lovingly to the scoffing querist, answered categorically the puzzles propounded, and opened his soul to light, so that as soon as possible he accompanied his wife to 'Akká, and became a devout and earnest believer, ensuring happiness to his wife as well as himself.

The experience of Miss Sarah Farmer, of Greenacre fame, is a similar one and well known to many persons. Miss Farmer, like the Oriental questioner, perhaps needed the revelation of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's illumination to ensure her certainty in his great mission. She had many problems to submit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and fearing she might forget something of importance in the excitement of her important interview, she spent the preceding night in pouring out her soul in a written review of her life to lay before this illuminated adviser. She then carefully wrote out fifteen questions to ask him, and laid the paper containing them in her Bible.

At five in the morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá sent for her, and I quote the words of Mírzá Raffi, the young Persian interpreter, who Englished this famous interview. Mírzá Raffi accompanied Miss Farmer to 'Akká and thus first came in contact with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, though he had accepted his teaching some time previously. She had encountered him in Cairo, and he had been delegated to attend her by Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, the famous teacher who had instructed her in the faith.

In her perturbation caused by this early summons, Miss Farmer had left all her documents so anxiously tabulated, on the table of the chamber she vacated to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When she was seated in his presence he turned to Mírzá Raffi and said:

"Tell Miss Farmer that this is the answer to her first question," and went on with an explanation.

Mírzá Raffi had not heard any question, and hesitated in his translation, whereupon 'Abbás Effendi repeated with an insistence which could not be set aside, his previous statement, adding, "she will understand!" Then the interpreter translated the words addressed to him. The succeeding question was next discussed, and so on to the end of the list which was reposing quietly in the Bible of the deserted upper apartment. The written order was adhered to, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to his questioner with such exaltation that she was amazed. He went on to allude to many subjects confided to her paper, but not placed in his hands. It was not merely that he knew the words inscribed, but that he lifted their burden from her soul, and all her being was stirred. She burst into tears at length, strange tears of ecstatic happiness, and went to her room to recover the composure which had been shaken by these surprising and illuminating events.

Such instances might be multiplied, for this heavenly gift of breaking the bonds of the flesh in those who come to him is experienced by many guests of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It is the wakening which for the first time gives true life, so that after it has been felt the previous existence seems like death, and this awakening is the most precious result of contact with the Servant of God. Necessarily one does not need the journey to 'Akká to experience it, for the gift and the contact are spiritual. As a result of transformation of tendencies, an enlightenment of temperament must follow, which will be evidenced in the life of the individual.

Perhaps the character of this is illustrated by the blessing which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote for a musician who was recently in ‘Akká:

“O God!

“Make this servant melodious, attuned with the airs of the Supreme Concourse, and confer upon him a thrilling and resounding voice, like the nightingale of hidden meanings in the Divine Rose Garden.”

CHAPTER X.

THE SPIRITUAL TEACHINGS OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.

It is rather a remarkable thing that the three great leaders of the Bahá’ist movement with their pure spiritual principles should all have been married men. The ascetic celibacy of Jesus Christ, the open resignation of the married state by Gotama Buddha, together with the attitude of the early church in regard to woman, and the celibate tendency of most spiritual societies has created a feeling more or less freely expressed that the single state is better for holy living than that of sex union. The result has been a somewhat morbid condition of the human mind upon this absorbing question of sex. It was evident that men and women needed to do more thinking as to its true status, and familiarity with this wide-spread religious upheaval begun by the True One in 1844 must certainly have such an effect.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá says no one need fear marriage for the law of sex is a part of the divine arrangement in this phenomenal outer world, and its rational and righteous use fits every human being better for the sphere to which he or she belongs. The abused law brings dire consequences which he must suffer who has become subject to them, but the abuse proves nothing against the value of the law itself.

Our traditional image of a Messenger of God is created largely by the asceticism of the early church, which in its eagerness to be detached from the world fled from it into the wilderness. So the holy men like beloved Saint Francis of Assissi feared the charm of women, feared all the beauty and loveliness of the universe, so that they flew from it as from an enchantress. St. Francis was happy, however, he was too near his Saviour not to have learned that lesson, and if he had walked the pathways of Judea with Christ in his short and painful pilgrimage he would no doubt have seen him laugh with his disciples many times, and he would have caught the same wonderful light in his eyes as that which now and then illuminates the countenance of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When we realize what it means to be near to God, we understand that an individual so blessed cannot always have tears in the eyes!

For many years ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has carried on an enormous correspondence, touching all portions of the globe, and nothing is more wonderful than to see him dictating his letters to a corps of stenographers. Perhaps the guest who witnesses this strange spectacle has visited the ancient French city of Tours, where, on the edge of the town, the eternal hills preserve a series of cells hollowed out of the rocks by human hands. In these cells dwelt St. Martin with his little band of faithful followers. He came from Rome in the fourth century of our era, and it was by his scholarly hand that the rock was dug out to afford him a most cheer-less habitation. But he deserted ease and culture to convert the barbarians to Christianity, and we can be certain he was happy in his work. We see here the holes which the Saint had scooped from the stone to hold his rosary, and prayer book, we see the stone slab where he slept, and all the lonely seclusion in which he labored for the salvation of the "heathen" in that primitive day.

Utterly selfless he was, and forgetful of all but the glorious message entrusted to him. His miracles were always those of love. Once when he had given away even the garments he wore, and his nakedness was only covered by a cloak, a beggar asked him for that, and he instantly tore it in two portions, presenting the beggar, we may be sure, with the larger half! Is it strange after such examples of courage and deprivation that we should think of a divine man ever as a lonely celibate?

But the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá offers a brilliant example of the same virtues, and has been spent constantly in a crowded center, so that he has no hours of solitude except those he snatches from an almost necessary slumber, after he has sought the little chamber at the top of his house.

His correspondence is carried on in a large room in the lower story where five or six stenographers await him. 'Abdu'l-Bahá seldom dictates one letter at a time. As a rule his stenographers sit in a line. He begins at one end with the paragraph of a letter destined perhaps for America, pauses at the next, and begins one for Persia, pauses again with some words for a believer in Turkey, and so on down the succession of busy paragraphers. More surprising than all he frequently carries on a lively conversation while in the act of dictating. He addresses a guest who is watching the performance, and discusses the Cause in America, maybe, while he is writing to the survivor of Persian massacres. The dictation is always in the oriental languages of the individuals to whom the tablets are addressed, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá will spring from Turkish to Aramaic, then into Persian or Arabic without an instant's hesitation, but if he is sending to a western country, he speaks in swift Persian and the stenographer translates the epistle which reaches its consignee in both languages.

Meanwhile the missives are despatched, and each one is so psychologically attuned to the person to whom it is written that it would seem as if it could only be indited by someone familiar with every detail of the recipient's life and soul. Yet in all probability 'Abdu'l-Bahá has received merely a formal expression of faith from his correspondent. The letter has been filed away in a cabinet with thousands of others, and on the morning it was answered, 'Abdu'l-Bahá took it out from the mass of papers, and despatched his reply because he felt that the psychologic moment had arrived when the stranger so far away needed the vital touch of his dynamic spirit.

The writer has read countless letters of this sort, so wonderful in their tenderness, penetration and insight, that it would seem as if they could only be dictated after profound meditation upon the subject or individual involved. Yet all are written in the swift, apparently careless, fashion described, but when the happy recipient peruses his own, he knows that there was no carelessness in its composition. Each missive is a shred of illumination from the great Messenger, and could not fail of its fine intent.

A proof of this illumination is seen in the enormous spread of this remarkable movement in spite of the persecution and imprisonment of all its leaders. The cause has grown from the simple power of the Divine Word from their lips. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says this is the final test of the reality of the True One. Healing and miracles of various sorts are always connected with the appearance of a Manifestation of God, but none except such a Manifestation speaks the Divine Word, and once spoken it is whispered from lip to lip in spite of all the obstacles which blind humanity heaps against its progress.

So the Word of Christ, not a syllable of it written, dropped into the ears of the ignorant fishermen about him, and after centuries it has transformed civilization. Likewise the Word of Muḥammad preserved in the eloquent sentences of the Qur’án reappeared in the splendid efflorescence of Moorish culture which was blighted and slain by the iron hand of Spanish theology.

No barriers could have been reared higher than those which have been piled against the extension of the Báb’s message, and that of Bahá’u’lláh. In the beginning the martyrdom of the Báb’s followers must have distanced the sufferings of the early Christians. Then for a time persecution ceased, and did not break forth afresh until after the death of Bahá’u’lláh. Once more it appeared however, incited by the narrowness and jealousy of the Muḥammadan clergy, and the agonies of the believers were frightful almost up to the moment when the adoption of the Persian constitution seemed to promise hope to the tortured ones.

Even then the plotting against the “friends” went on. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with that clear sight which apparently nothing escapes warned his devoted adherents that the Mullás were planning to gain the ear of the Sháh, and they realized too late the truth of his prediction. Meanwhile the direful calamity of the new Sháh’s reactionary policy proved in the end a blessing for the Bahá’ís, because the thorough shaking up of the nation laid bare the secret scheming of the Mullás, and put the people on their guard.

This same reactionary Sháh, while in the height of his quarrel with the people, wrote to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asking him what he saw as the result of the trouble, and what course of action he would recommend. Whereupon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent the Sháh a remarkable letter in which he assured him that in this day of the Manifestation of God, tyranny can no longer be tolerated, that if he would preserve the liberties of his people and restore the constitution he might look forward to a long and glorious reign, but if he persisted in his reactionary policy, disaster must overtake him, and he would be forced to abdicate. This advice, of course, the Sháh refused to follow, and the prognostication of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was speedily fulfilled.

Among the many martyrs who have been tortured to death in Persia because they believed in the new day, the name of the youth Badi‘ will always be remembered. At the time that Bahá’u’lláh sent his letters of announcement to the crowned heads of Europe, he prepared such a paper for the Sháh of Persia, and asked who would carry it. He frankly said that the mission was one of death, for the bearer of this great message would not be allowed to escape with his life. A number of young men clamored eagerly for the honor, but Badi‘ was permitted to go. He had seemed rather dull and unresponsive, though he had given his faith to the resplendent cause. Now he begged so ardently for the privilege of the perilous adventure that it was granted him.

He delivered the packet into the hand of the Sháh as he had been commissioned to do, was promptly seized and thrown into prison, whence he was led forth only to his death. He was tortured by the laying of white hot bricks on his palpitating body, but instead of shrieking with the pain, he gave every evidence of joy in the progress of the execution, seized the bricks himself and applied them to his burning and smoking flesh while he sang songs and laughed aloud as if he were experiencing the most exquisite pleasure. The ecstasy of his death was such that his name is mentioned with tears of mystical joy by those who chronicle his history, and many were led to embrace the faith for which he died by his endurance of the tortures heaped upon him.

In fact this has been the constant result of the martyrdoms, the Friends of God have suffered and the Muḥammadans acknowledge that they live up to their title. The only fault of a martyr lies in the fact that he is a “friend.” Ḥaydar-‘Alí has witnessed the execution of many martyrs and declares that the Presence of God is so manifest in the joy of their departure that numbers of the attending crowd disperse but to seek out the Bahá’ís and learn the meaning of a faith that can so eliminate the horror of death!

He tells of a young man, who, when his valuables were taken from him secreted five pounds in gold, or twenty-five dollars, sewing the coins into his coat so that they could be easily extracted. It is customary in Persia to present such a gift to the man who gives away the bride in the marriage ceremony. As he stepped upon the place of death, he turned to the executioner, and proffered him the gold, saying, in clear and happy tones:

“Accept this gift, because you are taking me to my bride!”

Another youth as he went up the stairs to the gallows, remarked to the headsman: “I will give you something before I die!”

The functionary made a jeering response, for it is the rule to strip the victim of all money and jewels before leading him to execution. When the young man's turn came the executioner struck him with the axe but did not entirely decapitate him. Instantly he caught two handfuls of blood and extended them to his death dealer, crying in a perfectly audible voice which all could distinguish:

"I said I would make you a gift! Here it is!"

Ḥaydar-ʿAlí has written a touching history of the recent martyrdoms in Persia which were suffered in 1903. These have been instigated by the greed of provincial officials, and the bigotry of the Muḥammadan clergy. The Mullás are powerful and wealthy men enraged at the rapid spread of the faith which will wipe out their official existence. They are eager, therefore, to continue the persecution of the Friends of God, and whenever they can find the governor of a province whose cupidity can be roused, they paint before his cruel and greedy eyes a flaming picture of the wealth that may be his through confiscation alone, if he will persecute the Bahá'ís. The latter are often found among the wealthy class, and it is these who are the first victims as a rule.

Then when the thirst for blood has been roused the lowest elements of the population rush into loot and riot, and before order can be restored numbers have been slain. Frequently the governor is in secret alliance with the rioters, because after the men have been murdered, and sometimes women and children also, he appropriates to himself the property that should have provided for their defenseless families.

The household of ʿAbdu'l-Bahá is the refuge of these afflicted people, and the Servant of God always sees that the children are educated and the mourning wives comforted. The Friends of God have learned very positively the habit of sharing with one another, and they never seem to prize money except for what it will do to increase the well being of the world.

The following extract from a beautiful chant written by ʿAbdu'l-Bahá in honor of a recent martyr reveals the feeling with which these agonies are regarded.

"Blessed is the pure blood which was shed on the perfumed soil, and which was poured out in the path of the forgiving Lord! Blessed is thy body which was burned by the hand of every transgressor! Blessed is thy throat which was cut by the poniard of every traitor! Blessed is thy breast which was stricken by the oppressors' darts! Blessed is thy heart which was wounded by a sharp sword! Blessed art thou, for thou hast showed forth all happiness and joy when thou wast being paraded in the streets of the people of arrogance, and the wicked ones were clapping their hands and oppressing thee with innumerable blows and wounds, while thou wert clapping thy hands with them. O, thou manifest of light! And wert warbling melodies, whereby the people of the Kingdom of El-Abhá were moved and breasts were dilated with joy."

During the life of Bahá'u'lláh he gave the name of Zeal) or 'Wolf to one of the prominent Muḥammadan Mullás, and that of Ebn Zeab or 'Wolf's Son to his descendant, though this man had not then displayed the qualities of his father. It was the latter who inaugurated the atrocities of Iṣfahán. Though he is popularly called Ebn Zeab, his name is Shaykh Taqí. He forged a telegram from the prime minister of Persia, of which he had four hundred flaming copies posted on the walls of Iṣfahán, one night. It read:

“Shaykh Taqí must protect the religion of Islám!” and as he well knew it acted as an incitement to the persecution of the Friends of God, especially as the town was filled with rumors of rioting against the Bahá’ís in the neighboring city of Rasht.

The first victim was one of the most honored citizens of the locality. He was a refuge to the poor and suffering and beloved by everyone. He was literally chopped to pieces by the mob. With his last breath he cried out: “You have done me no harm!

You are only transmitting me to my Lord!”

The devoted people took refuge in the Russian consulate, which was the only place open to them, and there they remained until a letter from the governor was read to them, begging them to return to their homes and assuring them of protection. Thereupon they ventured forth, but the mob was awaiting them, fell upon them with merciless rage, and seventy people were killed outright, besides hundreds who were wounded and maltreated.

In Yezd the rioting was incited again by a Mullá, who recited as an urge to massacre the bloody tale of what had been done in Rasht and Iṣfahán.

It is a strange and rather distressing psycho-logical fact that the non-resistance of the Bahá’ís which at first acted as a deterrent from persecution, has seemed in later years to appeal only to the basest motives of the commonwealth, and serve as an incentive to abuse. The persecutor seems to say:

“I may as well get what I can out of the Friends of God, as they will not resist I can take my fill of slaughter and spoil!”

The first victim at Yezd was a little child of eleven years, whose father was a tin smith and kept a shop of that description. He was frankly a “friend.” The teacher of the school where the child was instructed secretly suggested to the pupils that they attack the innocent boy, and when he ran to his superior for protection, the latter commanded him to curse his religion and deny it. This the child refused to do, showing remarkable courage and self control. He said:

“I am only a school boy, knowing nothing of the reality of things! How can I stain my lips with a curse?”

Whereupon the inhuman monster who was his instructor set upon the child with the swarm of pupils. They beat him with sticks, slashed him with their pen knives, bored into his tender flesh with awls, pierced him with needles until he died. During the frightful ordeal of this slow anguish, which, as may be seen was quite unofficial, the boy kept repeating: “Oh, Most Glorious God! Oh, My Supreme Beloved!” and not a complaint escaped his childish lips. After the orgy of sacrifice was over, the teacher himself, and the pupils who assisted in the massacre expressed their amazement at the superhuman fortitude of the little one.

While the teacher had been taking his pleasure with the son, the rioting crowd invaded the shop of the tin smith, destroyed his property, beat his wife, tormented his babies, and carried away the unfortunate man himself, amused with the tortures they inflicted upon him.

Arrived at a butcher shop they seized the meat axes, and proceeded to chop him with these, until just before life was extinct he was rescued by a trooper of the governor who came along, and carried him bleeding and senseless to the governor's court. Meanwhile the crowd had beaten to death in the same way the uncle of the tin smith, and discovering that three members of one family had thus been slaughtered, these cruel men tied the helpless bodies together, and dragged them about the town as honorable trophies of victory. They seemed to feel a morbid and rabid delight in thus prolonging the sensations of blood-shed which had been roused by the murders.

It would be easy to multiply such examples, for about a hundred and seventy people were massacred in this horror of Yezd, but western readers cannot endure even the recapitulation of such agonies, though they sit quietly through commercial tragedies which are but another phase of power in ecstasy.

The courage of the victims who died had been nourished by such food as that given in Bahá'u'lláh's letter to Zeab, the Wolf, father of Shaykh Taqí:

"Hast thou imagined we are afraid of thy cruelty? Know ye, and be assured, from the first day that the sound of the Supreme Pen arose, we gave up our lives, our souls, our children in the Path of God, the Supreme, the Great! And ever this fact we boast in glory among all creatures, and the Supreme Concourse, and to this, what bath befallen us in this straight Path beareth witness. In truth, hearts are melted, bodies are crucified, blood is shed, while the eyes are gazing toward the horizon of the bounty of their Lord, the Seer and the Omniscient! With the increase of calamity, the people of Bahá grow in love. And to their sincerity bears witness that which the Merciful one has revealed in the Qur'án, saying: 'If ye be sincere, seek death!'

"Which one is better, he who conceals himself to preserve his life, or he who sacrifices his life in the Path of God? Be just, and not of those who are lost in the wilderness of falsehood. Verily they are intoxicated with the wine of His Divine Love to such an extent that the guns of the world cannot prevent them, nor the swords of the nations hinder them from turning to the ocean of the gifts of their Lord, the Tender, the Generous. By the Truth of God! Calamity has not weakened me, nor have the objections of the ulemas enfeebled me. I declared, and am declaring in the face of all the world: Verily the gates of Bounty are opened, the Sun of Justice has appeared with evident signs and clear proofs from the Pen of God, the Omnipotent, the Self Existent!"

Again he says:

“Blessed is he who has suffered hardships for my name’s sake, and was not prevented by the world from entering my Court! Blessed is he who enters my Kingdom, perceiving the dominion of my power and Might, drinking from the sea of my Utterances, being informed of my Command, and what is concealed in the Treasury of my Words, and who has shown forth from the Horizon of Significances my Commemoration, and my Praise! Verily he is from me, and upon him be my mercy, my bounty, my favor and my benediction!”

As the devoted ones were slaughtered some cried out:

“Is there no one to witness how I offer up my life?” and others said: “We have found the Glory, for whose Glory we pay the price of our blood!”

One greeted his assassin with “Good Bye! May God preserve you!” and received his death blow upon the mouth while the sentence was half uttered.

A tall handsome youth exclaimed as he saw himself surrounded by fiercest enemies:

“Oh, tonight is my wedding, and I am to obtain the beloved of my heart! And the desire of my soul!”

We cannot but be reminded of Christ’s words:

“Blessed are they who are persecuted for Righteousness’ sake, for their’s is the Kingdom of Heaven.

“Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.”

“Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my name’s sake.”

“Rejoice and be exceeding glad for great is your reward in Heaven, for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you!”

These bloody persecutions are more incomprehensible, more inexcusable when one realizes how well known is the beautiful life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá throughout Persia and the Orient, and how wide is his reputation for noble character and illumination. The letter of the deposed Sháh illustrates this, for though he is a narrow Muḥammadan he could not resist calling for the help of this one to whom every one appeals in his most dire straits.

So much has been written as to the teaching and inculcation of ideas by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, his own expression has already become so manifold in many directions through his beautiful and illuminating letters or “tablets,” as they are called by the believers, that one is almost over-whelmed by the wealth of detail and the difficulty of selection in this direction. The book of Miss Barney, Some Answered Questions is exceedingly satisfactory. Miss Barney lived a year in ‘Akká, in order to have constant access to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and receive the answers to such questions as western inquirers generally ask as to modern phases of religious truth.

The volume covers a wide field, and is full of suggestive and inspiring nuggets of wisdom. No one can ever read the chapter in which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá explains the nature of God, and afterwards cherish the notion that the Bahá’ist conception of God is that of a personality. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá makes it very clear that God is the divine spirit penetrating, permeating and controlling everything. He is both manifest and unmanifest, in his essence far removed from human comprehension, but revealed always through that lovely and luminous succession of Messengers or Manifestations who have lifted the mind of man to the gradually refining and broadening apprehension of the Divine which it is capable of today.

Many readers might completely misunderstand the expression of Bahá’u’lláh and of the Báb who frequently speak of themselves as God. For instance Bahá’u’lláh often utters ecstatic phrases like:

“Blessed is the eye which is enlightened by my Beauty! Blessed is the ear which hears my melodies! Blessed is the affrighted one who hastens to the shelter of My Name! Blessed is the thirsty one who seeks the nectar of My Benedictions!”

Or he says in the Hidden Words:

“Oh, Son of Man!

“Let thy satisfaction be in Myself, and not in those who are inferior to Me, and seek not help from any beside me, for nothing beside Me will ever satisfy thee.”

“Oh, Son of Existence

“My Bowl thou art, and My Light is in thee ; Therefore be enlightened by it, and seek not any beside Me, for I have created thee rich, and bestowed abundantly Grace upon thee.”

We forget that John said “No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him.”

Christ himself said, John, 3, 34, “For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God; for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto him.”

It is thus the language of God which comes to us through his Messenger, but that does not mean that the Messenger is a personal God. He is the Wonderful One upon whom the Spirit rests, and the Spirit using his lips utters the Truth of God.

In his reality God is the Environer, we cannot escape him, says ‘Abdu’l Baba, because He is in all, the manifest, and supremely the unmanifest, the invisible, the marvellous!

In speaking of immortality, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá uses the beautiful symbol of a bird in the cage. It is accustomed to its confinement, where food and drink are always provided, perhaps it does not know its limitation. But suddenly the door is opened, it is outside! It is free! It can spread its wings, and fly where it will. What joy in comparison with its former state!

Such is the soul with regard to this life and the next, he declares, and in the beauty of the illustration we perceive also its significance, for if the bird has been lamed by the life of the cage, if it can no longer fly nor seek its food, it will suffer in the first hours of the freedom it has attained. It behooves us therefore to keep our wings in order, that we may be ready to fly when the door is opened.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá has been asked innumerable questions in regard to spiritual things, and some of his answers are very beautiful. For instance a lady once demanded of him:

“Are the gifts of clairvoyance, and clairaudience true, and can we attain them?”

He said thoughtfully:

“I think we should learn to live in the body as if it were a glass case, through which we can look clearly on all sides. But we must remember that we cannot see through glass unless it is clean, and no one can dust his own case but himself.”

At another time he was confronted with an inquiry as to the reality of spiritual healing, and gave a most illuminating analysis of the different modes of restoration; physical healing, which we must seek through the physician, mental and spiritual healing. He said we must not despise the physician, for he is often ‘the messenger of God for our restoration. Moreover the wisdom of God has distributed healing agencies through the physical world in mineral and plant life, which it is the gift of the wise physician to discover. He said that the remarkable discoveries in the physical conquest of disease in recent years were a part of the world’s advancement under its new law, also that we are learning so much of the restorative and upbuilding elements in food, that in the future we shall know how to keep the body in its natural condition of health merely through the use of proper food.

Mental healing, he went on to explain, is excellent, and illustrates the influence of one mind upon another, though the suggestion is not necessarily audible. This inaudible suggestion, he declared, is often confounded with spiritual healing, but it is very different. In spiritual healing the soul attains to union with God, and the healing is perfect. This may be an individual experience, or one person may lift another, through the power of exaltation and prayer, into the divine atmosphere. Then as the body is filled with light through the elevation of the spirit, every imperfection disappears. This is the only perfect and permanent healing, he added, all else is a means of cure, but in the spiritual healing, the soul is purified, and through that purification the body is completely restored.

A beautiful extract from one of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s letters intensifies his interpretation of spiritual and mental healing. He speaks very strongly in this communication of the gifts of the spirit, of the difference between the outward and inward voice, etc. Then he says:

“Then know thou that the power of the Word of God is effective, both in the spirit and the body, and the influence of the Spirit of God is predominant over the material as well as the essential and spiritual. And that verily God is powerful in all things, and that the utterances have exoteric and esoteric meaning, and neither their outward prevents their inward, nor their inward their outward meaning.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá has been asked many times in regard to the existence of evil, and his reply seems to have brought consternation to those who prefer to see power resting in the material rather than the spiritual universe. Here is a portion of one little discussion of this very broad subject:

“The darkness spoken of in the Bible as being created by God, signifies that verily God has not caused light to shine there! inasmuch as when there is no light there is darkness ; when there is no sight there will be blindness ; when there is no life there will be death ; when there is no riches there will be poverty ; when there is no knowledge there will be ignorance.

“Consequently it is proven by indisputable argument and clear explanation that verily evils are non-existent, but people have not understood the meaning of the verses of the Bible.”

Another letter is evidently written in response to some queries as to the study of psychic phenomena, and is illuminating in various directions. He says:

“As to him whom thou hast mentioned in thy letter: It behooveth him to seek only the divine bounties, and subjects which lead to the real knowledge of the invisible world of God, through the mediation of the Holy Spirit. Then he will perceive the reality of the triune powers in man, through his innate perception. For verily the signs of these triune powers which exist in mankind are spirit, mind and soul. The spirit is the power of life; the mind is the power which apprehends the reality of things ; and the soul is an intermediary between the Supreme Concourse (the spiritual world) and the lower concourse (material world). The soul has two phases—the higher aspires to the kingdom of El Bella, and the lights of the mind shine forth from that kingdom into its higher sphere. The other phase inclines to the lower concourse of the material world, and its lowest, sphere is enveloped in the darkness of ignorance ; but when light is poured upon this phase, and if this phase of the soul is capable of receiving it, then “truth hath come and falsehood vanishes, for falsehood is of short duration.” Otherwise darkness will surround it from all directions, and it will be deprived of association with the Supreme Concourse, and will remain in the lowest depths.

“As to the ‘voice.’ There are two kinds of voices, one is the physical voice, and it is expressed by atmospheric vibrations which affect the nerves of the ear. The other is the Breath of the Merciful, and this is a call which is continually heard from the Supreme Concourse, and cheers the pure and holy souls. May it be beneficial to those who have heard the Call!”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá teaches that what he terms the Supreme Concourse is that mighty galaxy of intelligences which we have crudely named Heaven. It is the union of angels or powers which are the agents of the Divine One for the ruling of the universe, and is the center of illumined spirits. To that center we may all be united, for its “call” is ringing ever within us, ringing with an especial clearness in the Day of the Manifestation of God. The soul may choose its own guides, as the passage indicates, which has just been quoted, and happy is the one who has clarified into that higher phase where the divine signals are both visible and audible.

A very remarkable tablet or letter was received several years ago by Mrs. and Mr. Dealy, of Alabama, and was addressed especially to the little congregation of the faith which they had founded. It is an admirable illustration of that eloquence which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sometimes makes use of, and is full of significant allusions. It is as follows:

“When the darkness of ignorance and the heedlessness concerning the Realm of Eternity and bereavement from the True One had encircled the universe, then the resplendent Luminary dawned, and the Brilliant Light illumined the horizon of the East. Hence the Sun of Reality shone forth, scattering the sparkling Lights of the Kingdom to the East and to the West. Those who had the seeing eyes, found the Most Great Glad Tidings, began to cry the Call, ‘Oh, Blessed are we!’ ‘Oh, Blessed are we!’ and have beheld the reality of things themselves, have discovered the Mysteries of the Kingdom, were released from superstition and doubts, perceived the lights of Truth, and became so intoxicated with the Cup of the Love of God, that wholly forgetting the world and themselves while dancing, they ran with utmost joy and ecstasy to the city of martyrdom, sacrificing their minds and their lives upon the Altar of Love.

“But those who were blinded became astonished, and on account of these joyous acclamations were bewildered and began to cry, ‘Where is the Light?’ and said, ‘We do not behold any light, we do not see any Rising Sun! It is void of any truth! This is pure imagination!’

“However they have hastened bat-like to the darkness below the ground, and according to their own thoughts they have found a little comfort and tranquillity. Nevertheless it is yet the early dawn, and the strength of the heats, and the rays of the Sun of Truth have not yet made their torrid and complete impression. When it reaches the midst of Heaven, the heat will interpenetrate with such great intensity that it will move and spur to the greatest velocity even the insects below the earth. Although they are not able to behold the light, yet the penetration of the heat will move and agitate all of them.

“Consequently, Oh ye Friends of God, be ye thankful that in the Day of the Effulgence ye have turned your faces to the Orb of the regions and beheld the Lights. Ye have received a portion from the rays of Truth, and are endowed with a share from the everlasting outpouring. Therefore ye must not rest one minute, but thank Him for this Bestowal.

“Be not seated and silent! Diffuse the Glad Tidings of the Kingdom far and wide to the ears, promulgate the Word of God, and put into practice the Advices and Covenants of God. That is, arise ye with such qualities and attributes that ye may continually bestow life to the body of the world, and nurse the infants of the universe, up to the station of maturity and perfection. Enkindle with all your might, in every meeting the Light of the Love of God, gladden and cheer every heart with the utmost loving kindness, show forth your love to the strangers just as you show it forth to your relatives. If a soul is seeking to quarrel, ask ye for reconciliation; if he blame ye, praise ; if he give you a deadly poison, bestow ye an all-healing antidote; if he create death, administer ye eternal Life ; if he becomes a thorn, change ye into roses and hyacinths. Perchance through such deeds and words this darkened world will become illuminated, this terrestrial universe will become transformed into a Heavenly Realm, and this Satanic prison a Divine Court ; warfare and bloodshed be annihilated, and love and faithfulness hoist the Tent of Unity upon the apex of the world.

“These are the results of the Divine Advices and Exhortations, and the epitome of the teachings of the Bahá’í Cycle.”

This beautiful letter has also been translated by Aḥmad Sohrab, of Washington, and is both lovely and wonderful in its expression and contents. We must always miss the peculiar beauty of the Persian tongue, but a trace of it has crept into the Englishing of this splendid message.

Naturally there is something in the spoken word of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in the radiance of his face, and the richness of his voice, which is beyond any written utterance, no matter how noble that may be. The people to whom his words are spoken never forget them, and repeated and repeated again, they always seem to carry a trace of the original fragrance that surrounded them when first dropped into the listening ear.

Mrs. C. was a believer who went to ‘Akká some years ago. She was one of a fashionable and wealthy circle in New York, and had learned of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá while travelling abroad. She had lived a conventional, and rather unsatisfied life. She had been a sincere Episcopalian, but never was able to gain much comfort from her religion, though she earnestly sought this joy. She had lost health from inanition more than any real illness, and had become accustomed to a half melancholy state from which she hardly sought to rouse herself.

She grasped the message of Truth from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with an eagerness that carried her almost immediately to the prison city. Once there, she was interested in everything, but especially in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

She had formed a habit of spiritual concentration or devotion which caused her some distress. She spent half an hour after she rose each morning, in thinking of her duties during the day, and how she should fulfil them, and another half hour before retiring at night, in mourning because she had not consistently carried out her morning’s plans. She believed this was worship, and was over conscientious as to her duties, which were always spelled in capitals. If anyone had assured her it was her duty to be happy, she would probably have been stricken with horror.

In the household of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the family meets in the Holy Mother’s large living room at a very early hour every morning, and tea is served in delicate cups and saucers of glass. While the company is quietly disposing of this simple refreshment, the youngest members of the family chant the holy words in low musical tones. It is a very inspiring commencement of the day, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá frequently talks with such fervor and gladness that all are rejoiced as they separate for their various tasks.

Mrs. C. observed that the Servant of God always greeted her with the same words, “Be Happy!” She watched the other members of the party, and assured herself that he addressed them all differently, but never failed to say to her, “Be Happy!”

She was troubled about it, and at length she begged Monever Khánum the daughter of the household to ask her father for the reason of this exclusive admonition. When the question was propounded to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá he turned to Mrs. C. with his peculiarly illuminating smile, and replied:

“I tell you to be happy because we cannot know the spiritual life unless we are happy!”

Then Mrs. C.’s dismay was complete, and her diffidence vanished with the fullness of her despair.

“But tell me, what is the spiritual life?” she cried, “I have heard ever since I was born about the spiritual life, and no one could ever explain to me what it is !”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá looked at his questioner again with that wonderful smile of his, and said gently “Characterize thyself with the characteristics of God, and thou shalt know the spiritual life!”

That was all, but it was enough. Mrs. C. began to query, “What did he mean? What are the characteristics of God? They must be the great attributes, of course, Love, Beauty, Generosity, Justice,” and so on in beautiful succession.

All day long her mind was flooded with the divine puzzle, and all day long she was happy. She did not give a thought to her duties, and yet when she arrived at the moment of her evening’s reckoning, she could not remember that she had left them undone.

At last she began to understand. If she was absorbed in Heavenly ideals, they would translate themselves into deeds necessarily, and her days and nights would be full of light. From that moment she never quite forgot the divine admonition that had been granted her:

“Characterize thyself with the characteristics of God!”

And she learned to know the spiritual life.

Mrs. C. had another beautiful moment with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which meant much to her. Just before she left the household he came into her room to say farewell, and seating himself by the window looked off upon the sea in silence for so long a time that his guest began to wonder if he had forgotten her presence.

Then at length he turned to her and said, with that eager speech that is one of his peculiarities:

“Mrs. C. when you go back to New York talk to people about the love of God. People in the world do not talk enough about God. Their conversation is filled with trivialities, and they forget the most momentous subjects. Yet if you speak to them of God they are happy, and presently they open their hearts to you. Often you can not mention this glorious Revelation, for their prejudice would interfere, and they would not listen. But you will find that you can always talk to them about the love of God.”

Then he went away, and Mrs. C. sat a long time in the gathering darkness, while the glory of the sun descended upon the glittering waters of the Mediterranean. The fragrant shadows seemed to echo softly with the last words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

“You will find that you can always talk to them about the love of God.”

‘AKKÁ, SYRIA {.noid}

March 2, 1907. {.date}

To C. M. R., WASHINGTON, D. C. {.greet}

MY DEAR BROTHER IN THE CAUSE OF EL ABHÁ: {.greet}

Since I have had the great honor and privilege of being received in the home of The Master I endeavor to fulfill your request to write a few words to describe to a few believers in Washington some of the experiences during these few days in the Home of Peace.

Outside the sea. is raging and the wind howling, which it has done since we came – and it is as if this were to show us the perfect contrast of Serenity and Gentleness in the spiritual atmosphere of The Master’s Home.

Our Beloved Master holds in this home an absolute reign of Love and Peace, and those who visit here can but realize more and more that they must help in sending out over the different countries to which they return the rays of that love, kindness and courtesy.

I, myself, felt so much awe when first entering his presence that I was unable to ask the many things which I had intended; but the questions in my mind have been answered by him in his talks to us all together without my having asked them. This has been the experience of many beside myself. His explanation and knowledge seem to flow endlessly as water from a fountain, and if one leaves ‘Akká with one spiritual hunger and thirst unsatisfied it will be from the unworthiness of one’s own soul to receive and not from any limitation of his power of explanation or enlightenment.

I would wish all pilgrims who come here to look for Divine virtue and example and not for any supernatural experiences or astonishing visible signs, and to remember that in looking for the extraordinary or supernatural, the clouds of the human body will most surely veil such from their sight and prevent their eyes from being opened to the true essence of the Light and Teaching which is to last into the far future, whereas the presence and form visible to our eyes will be taken from us.

Among the several talks which The Master gave us in the five days of our visit, I will close with the one he gave yesterday on the subject of the opposition and rejection of the Prophets.

Moses prophesied and taught the people Truths which they scorned and rejected, whereas it was His Truth which lasted and was fulfilled and their words which were proven false and worthless. In the time of Jesus Christ, His Words were fulfilled and are now honored, and the words and thoughts of those who mocked have been exposed and judged. Thus it is in the Days of Bahá'u'lláh, and the opposition of those who now scorn and reject will be proved worthless and His Word honored throughout the ages.

There are ladies from Ashkabad (Russia) here who have taken a journey of 22 days to come. One lives in Ashkabad, in a room belonging to the New Temple, and serves the believers who come to visit.

Haifa, March 6.—

Looking from here on that beautiful view of 'Akká in the dim distance, we, who can enjoy the beauties of Mount Carmel and all the beautiful scenery on our journey home and have the good things of the world and freedom to use them, may well realize and remember that The Beloved Master who with kindness and limitless love receives one in his home, is a prisoner and exile for the sake of the Great Teaching and Truth he has come to bring to the world and has not passed through the gates of 'Akká for three years, though he has come to bring the true Freedom to all Nations.

I am very sorry that I can express in so poor a way my impression of this wonderful week spent with the Holy Household whose kindness has been perfectly limitless.

I am your sister gratefully, in the Holy Cause, { .sig }

To his honor, Mírzá Aḥmad {.greet}

Upon him be Bahá'u'lláh-El-Abhá! {.sit}

HE IS GOD! {.sit}

O thou who art firm in the Covenant! {.sit}

Thou hast written regarding the articles and papers which are written by the believers of God, and the forwarding them to this land for correction. This Servant, on account of the multitude of works and occupations, has no time whatever to attend to this matter. If these articles are read in the Spiritual Assembly (of each city in America) and the printing and, spreading of them is advised and approved by the Assembly, it is acceptable. This permission is granted that these souls do not become disappointed, and be engaged in the composition and printing of instructive papers. Chase will arrive here soon and we will discuss with him regarding this matter.

Say to Mr. Remey, - if he writes any article and the spiritual Assembly of Washington do approve its circulation, its spreading will lead to good result.

His honor, Aḥmad Yazdí has not displayed the slightest shortcoming and omission in forwarding the letters and papers to this land. Know ye this of a certainty. Some of the letters have been received but there has not yet been time to answer them; while on the other hand, some of them are lost in the mail. Whatever has been received, its answer depends upon time and opportunity.

But concerning the articles: - these articles must be revised and corrected by those souls who know the history of the Cause. If they approve their circulation, undoubtedly it will lead to the rapid promotion of the Cause. For this Servant has no time whatsoever to revise these articles. Regarding the despatch of letters and their early acknowledgement, a new and complete system is organized. God willing, it will be perfected and put in execution.

Some Words of Gratitude

Mrs Arthur Agnew

March 14th, 1907

Some Words of Gratitude to God For the Blessings Which Came From a Visit to the Home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

On March 14th, 1907, {{p1}} Mr. Chase, Mr. Scheffler, Mr. Agnew, Rúhu’lláh and myself left Chicago for Boston enroute for a visit to the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. On the 15th of March we sailed from Boston on the steamer “Republic” and reached Naples on March 31st (Easter Sunday). To our surprise we found upon reaching Naples that both Mrs. True and Arna were there, they having just come from ‘Akká.

On April 3rd at noon we sailed from Naples to Alexandria on the steamer “Oceana”, reaching Alexandria April 6th, and left the following morning by train to Port Sa’id. We then went immediately to the steamer which brought us to Haifa in the following evening. After meeting Mírzá Asadu’lláh in Haifa, we learned that we were to go to ‘Akká the next morning. On April 10th, Wednesday at noon, we reached the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Perhaps everyone who is contemplating a trip to ‘Akká has had some imagined idea concerning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the home, surroundings, etc., and because it is imagined, it is sure to be different, possibly, contrary.

We have the photographs in America of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá taken when a youth – his hair looks dark, also his eyes and his features somewhat sharp. But when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came into our room shortly after our arrival, we saw an elderly gentleman with white hair, blue eyes, and a face full of love and tenderness, which far exceeded our expectations, and which bore no likeness to our photograph. {{p2}}

And how could a face full of the expression of Spiritual Life ever be photographed on paper and do credit to GOD’S Love. Impossible! It is to be demonstrated in the Life, both by the Everlasting Words and by His Deeds.

It was really not these outward signs of a physical man that we were to discover and become acquainted with, while in ‘Akká; it was a spirit which before we left, so enveloped us that we discovered we had breathed from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Life a new life, and by coming in contact with His Spirit had inhaled a new spirit.

The Spiritual Face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a face which was and will be through all ages to come, one of perfect patience, perfect resignation, and perfect humility before the Throne of GOD’S endowments. This Spiritual Face in ‘Akká is that Face severed from all else save GOD.

In that city of ‘Akká in the Life and Heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dwells that wonderful Spirit of GOD’S power that makes the heart of man move by It’s flow, for from this Point comes the WORD OF GOD to the world to create within men Eternal Life.

How could one hear a beautiful musical composition without becoming charmed; the impression is perfect, it will remain with the senses a long time. If this is so with sound, how much greater will it be with a spirit whose soul is listening for a note from the Real Musician who sings but the Words of GOD.

It is from these spiritual Words spoken in ‘Akká by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, when personally spoken to man – drives deep into his heart, and changes him from his old self into a something new – which in itself is unexplainable. When one leaves ‘Akká, if the soil of that heart has been touched with the love of GOD, he cannot but feel as though something has occurred; and in wonderment he looks around within his thoughts at it all. {{p3}}

Truly it is the Power of GOD in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which drives home to the very heart, that makes the individual a child of that home (or call it spirit) and the spirit becomes inseparable from It’s Power if that child will remain in that Home in prayer in service. The Road leading to the Home of is reached only in ‘Akká, for there He has made to come forth His Life, His Love and His service. If we love GOD and wish not to become the “Prodigal Son” we will cling to Him by obedience to His Words, and like that Spiritual Face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, we too will do as He does, and be as He is, for sake of GOD, because this is GOD’S Wish and Will for us.

When tasting this Spiritual Food in the Revealed Word of GOD, then witnessing the Life in how could one wish to wander away from It’s Protecting Shelter; for there is shelter, love, protection and Wisdom from a Loving Father unto every creature of the world. His Love is demonstrated not to the personality of the man, but because the man loves the whole world.

The WORD OF GOD is the Book of Life; it is the Tree of His Knowledge; it is the Sun of Truth whose brightness makes the heart of man wipe away Wall traces of sorrow, as man imprints the Words of GOD in his own heart, and shows the world that the King has really come. Has It not made the heart glad, full of the Love for GOD, the joy for a world made by Him. Is not, the cause of creation itself from these very facts? This wonderful spiritual example in ‘Akká sees but GOD, lives but God’s Life, speaks but for GOD; and His Wish is that a likewise.

We see Him entertaining at tea people who are rested only in the world. One day several officials spent the entire day with Him, and He told us how difficult had been the day. {{p4}}

One morning as we looked out of our bedroom window in the garden where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, has his tent, we saw a bride and groom dressed in their wedding garments. They had come for some little Words of Love and comfort from the lips of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. In the afternoon of this day, we again looked down in the garden and saw a small crowd of Catholic Sisters. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was up stairs in His room when we heard Him call out to them; and with faces smiling, we heard them call back to Him and shortly He was down among them. And such are lessons in ‘Akká of tender patience and endurance.

We certainly bore witness to GOD’S service, to that patience, to His Love; and under all conditions we realized it was from that Tree of Life, from that Real Garden whose flowers are only purity, only holy and above the power of any human man’s hand to destroy; for it is of GOD – GODLY. Here are ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Words of which we have witnessed It’s Reality.

“The Tree of Life which is full of blossoms, leaves and fruits, the shade thereof is peace to the soul, and a rest to the consciousness. Whosoever be under this Tree will certainly partake of fruit. But shade trees are many in the forest, which though fresh and verdant, are never-the-less fruitless.”

On Tuesday, April 16th, we were to leave ‘Akká by the wish of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; and in His loving Words were these: “If you go now it will make it easier and possible for those coming after you to come.”

When we left ‘Akká and arrived in Haifa, we began to see a few of those who were “Coming after us,” for we met in Haifa Miss Edith Sanderson from Paris, who arrived in Haifa the morning after we came. {{p5}}

When we reached Port Sa’íd we met Mr. Roy Wilhelm and his dear Mother of New York City, and then we went on to Cairo where we again met Mrs. Allen and Miss Moore (Lua Gettsinger’s sister) both of Washington; all on their journey to that which we had just left: - of love, of spiritual heat, of spiritual fire and the greatest mercy that GOD has bestowed upon the soul of man.

May GOD in His mercy grant to all the people of the world His Words of LIFE, that they may take them into their lives to live, place them on their lips to breathe and help them to become reflectors of this Great Light.

We ourselves can get no revelation, for the REVELATOR has come. It is by the drinking in of His Words of Life that we acquire Knowledge, that we get Faith, and that we get Love for GOD; and it is enough to make us rich through all Eternity.

WORDS of Bahá’u’lláh: “O nightingale of Paradise, the Branch of Life is waving to and fro. It is time for thee to sing thy harmony and to give unto the world the joy of Love.”

Pilgrimage Compilation

Thornton Chase

14 March 1907

Thornton's desire to go on pilgrimage and meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá was frustrated by his company's unwillingness to grant him an extended leave of absence. But he never stopped dreaming. He noted in a letter to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1905 that "ten years ago, before any American had found Thee, I hoped then to visit Thee." His company's refusal to grant him time off in 1898 was a temporary setback; by May 1904, he had convinced Union Mutual to give him the time, once conditions in the prison city of 'Akká were right.

[^] Thornton Chase to 'Abdu'l-Bahá (copy), 21 April 1905, TC.

However, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was experiencing very difficult years. A commission of the Turkish government was attempting to convince the Sultán to exile 'Abdu'l-Bahá to a remote oasis in the Sahara, where he would be further cut off from visitors and communication with his followers. Visitors to 'Akká, especially from the Occident, could jeopardize the little freedom that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had. Consequently 'Abdu'l-Bahá granted permission to very few Americans to visit. When Thornton asked for permission in the Spring of 1905, at first his request was granted. Thornton wrote a friend who was a United States Senator and requested a letter of introduction to the governor of 'Akká, in case such a document would facilitate his visit. But apparently 'Abdu'l-Bahá had to cancel the pilgrimage because of the conditions in ‘Akká. In the Spring of 1906, Chase again acquired permission and even booked a berth on a transatlantic ship, but had to cancel it because his company refused to give him the vacation time.

In December 1906, writing to a Persian friend, ‘Alí Kuli Khán, Thornton complained that he could not go on pilgrimage during the upcoming Spring. At that time a close friend, Arthur Agnew, his wife, Mamie Agnew, and their infant son, Rúḥu’lláh, were going on pilgrimage. So were Corinne True and two of her daughters, who also were Chicago Bahá’ís. Apparently Thornton had again asked his company for vacation time, and they had refused to give it. But later, for some reason, they relented. Joyously, Thornton prepared for the trip to ‘Akká.

[^ ] Thornton Chase to ‘Alí Kuli Khán (copy), 19 December 1906, 5, TC.

Accompanying him was Carl Scheffler, a man in his mid-twenties, who was something of a protégé of Chase. Chase, Scheffler, and the Agnews left Chicago together on 14 March 1907, on a train bound for Boston. After attending a Bahá’í meeting there, they boarded the SS Republic on Saturday, 16 March. After stops in Porto Delgata (the Azores), Madeira, Gibraltar, and Algiers, they reached Naples on Easter Sunday, 31 March. All the places fascinated Carl, and his letters home speak of hiking around the cities with Thornton Chase.

Carl Scheffler’s letters were copied into a book, apparently by his cousin, Sophie Loeding, and the book is in the possession of Mrs. Betty deAraujo, Scheffler’s daughter. Thornton Chase’s own account of the voyage exists as an untitled typescript that begins “In the houses or under them,” TS, TC.

In Naples the pilgrimage party met Corinne True and her daughters, who were on their way home and who described their pilgrimage for the travelers to ‘Akká. After five days of visiting Naples and vicinity — the Agnews even went to see Pompeii — Chase, Scheffler, and the Agnews boarded the German ship SS Oceana for Alexandria. From there, the Khedival steamer Assuan took them to Palestine. Thornton describes their anticipation, as they approached Haifa:

[^ ] Apparently the party left Naples on 4 April; on that day Carl Scheffler wrote a letter to the “Dear Folks” at home from on board the Oceana (photocopy of letter in author’s personal papers).

Our hearts were so affected with thankfulness to God and with the beauty and import of that Land of Promise that we spoke but little to each other and in subdued tones. Our tongues were bound in golden silence, our eyes searched the ancient scenes and looked keenly to the north for the first glimpse of Mount Carmel and ‘Akká and we longed for the approaching goal of our pilgrimage.

[^] Thornton Chase, In Galilee (Los Angeles: Kalimát Press, 1985) 5-6.

They arrived in Haifa at 5 P.M. on 8 April and went to the Catholic-run “Hospice of the Little Child” for accommodations. That evening Mírzá Asadu’lláh, whom Thornton had not seen since 1902, visited his old friend. Plans were made for the trip to ‘Akká. Two days later the Agnews went to ‘Akká, while Chase and Scheffler waited in Haifa. That evening an American woman staying at their hotel and who was not a Bahá’í told the other guests of her trip to ‘Akká and her brief visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

She said the house of “The New Prophet” was pointed out and some one suggested that she might like to meet him. She assented, and one went into his garden and asked permission for the meeting, which was granted. He was a man of striking and attractive appearance and met her most graciously and presented her with a rose he was carrying. Through an interpreter she asked him several questions, which he answered in a courteous and gentle manner, and she could see no difference in what he said from the teachings of Jesus.

Considerable conversation ensued and one lady said she had heard that Americans sometimes came all the way there expressly to visit him and receive his teachings and she wondered how they could be such fools. . . . Mr. Scheffler and I sat there longing to open our mouths and loosen our tongues, but beyond asking some simple questions, we remained silent.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 13.

This was Chase and Scheffler’s first experience of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the Holy Land.

On their fourth day in Haifa, the two men went up Mount Carmel to visit the Tomb of the Báb. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had begun construction of the tomb in 1898, when Kheiralla was on pilgrimage; by 1907 the basic, unadorned structure — a square of brownish yellow limestone — had been completed. The Persian caretaker did not speak any English, but when they said Alláh-u-Abhá to him he embraced them. He unlocked the tomb for them to enter and pray. Some Persians visited the tomb, and using gestures and a few simple words, conveyed the message to Chase and Scheffler that the next day they would travel to ‘Akká.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 14-17.

A carriage stopped at their hotel the next morning, 12 April 1907, at seven. No road had yet been built to ‘Akká, but the beach served the purpose well:

Then began the nine mile drive along the beautiful curve of the Mediterranean shore, most of the way in the water where the sand is hard and the surf plays “tag” with the carriage wheels, while the horse hoofs clatter and splash a quick tattoo through the gliding water. . . . When we crossed the two rivers that run into the sea, we rode out forty or fifty yards from the shore so as to follow the sand bars formed by the breakers as they meet the outflowing rivers. Sometimes the water was up to the box of the carriage and the horses had to strain to pull us through. We passed carriages coming from 'Akká, pack-trains of asses and camels, flocks of little, black, lop-eared goats, foot travelers, fishing boats and fishermen standing far out in the surf. . . . Ever before us was the walled city, rising clearer and larger from the water by which it is nearly surrounded.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 19-20.

The carriage finally reached the city and entered it. The streets were so narrow that the three horses filled them from side to side. The carriage took them right to the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, where Chase and Scheffler entered and were shown to their room. A few minutes later, the moment of meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá finally arrived:

Some one said "The Master!" — and he came into the room with a free, striding step, welcoming us in a clear, ringing voice — "Marhabá! Marhabá!" (Welcome! Welcome!) — and embraced us with kisses as would a father his son, or as would brothers after a long absence. It is no wonder that some have thought the Master loved them more than all others, because he hesitates not to express his love and he truly loves all humanity in each one. He is the great Humanitarian and each friend is to him the representative of all mankind.

He bade us be seated on the little divan; he sat on the high, narrow bed at one side of the room, drew up one foot under him, asked after our health, our trip, bade us be happy, and expressed his happiness that we had safely arrived. Then, after a few minutes, he again grasped our hands and abruptly left us. I think we had not spoken at all except to answer "yes" or "no." We could not. We knew not what to say. But our hearts were full of joyful tears, because we were "at home." His welcoming spirit banished strangeness, as though we had always known him. . . . Those were moments of deep happiness; yet I could not fully realize the great blessedness of that meeting, which was the goal of my hope; but now its remembrance has become my joy and the treasure of my heart. I was filled with wonder at his simplicity, with admiration for his strength and dignity and love for his tenderness; these, mingled with delight and thankfulness, possessed me.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 27-28.

This was the beginning of Thornton's spiritual adventure. His account of it, In Galilee, is one of the most articulate descriptions of a visit to ‘Akká ever written. It provides a detailed portrait of his experiences:

Five days we remained within those walls, prisoners with Him who dwells in that “Greatest Prison.” It is a prison of peace, of love and service. No wish, no desire is there save the good of mankind, the peace of the world, the acknowledgement of the Fatherhood of God and the mutual rights of men as His creatures, His children. Indeed, the real prison, the suffocating atmosphere, the separation from all true heart desires, the bond of world conditions, is outside those stone walls, while within them is the freedom and pure aura of the Spirit of God. All troubles, tumults, worries or anxieties for worldly things are barred out there.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 24-25.

In spite of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s confinement to the prison city, he was a very busy man, with a constant stream of visitors. Thornton Chase’s window overlooked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s courtyard, and from there he was able to watch ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. A government sentry house that always contained an armed guard also had a full view of the garden and its surroundings:

. . . we saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Mírzá Asadu’lláh walking back and forth on the paths, sometimes stopping and conversing earnestly. I could not but think of a lion pacing his cage. . . . Later a soldier came, carrying his gun, delivered a message and went away. An old man with a cane came to the garden gate, about fifty feet from where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sat in the tent. He bowed low with his hand on his heart, talked a while at that distance and then, with deepest respect, moved backward through the gate and away. . . . Visitors, tourists and officials came and went constantly. One afternoon came three black robed Catholic nuns, one portly woman with a black robe and no head-dress, and several ladies unveiled, with olive complexions. They were directed to the tent of the Master from his room window and he met them there later.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 38-39.

Chase and Scheffler had several personal audiences with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He would often visit their room unexpectedly, especially just before bedtime. He would always begin by inquiring about the pilgrim’s health and happiness and then give “an instructive discourse of ten or fifteen minutes, or possibly three or four minutes. We took no note of time.” In addition, most pilgrims saw Him at lunch and supper. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá usually gave a short talk at the meal table, which constituted the primary opportunity for pilgrims to take notes. Thornton Chase described the talks thus:

[^] Chase, In Galilee 35.

Each conversation started with some simple reference to a natural thing, the weather, food, a stone, tree, water, the prison, a garden or a bird, our coming, or some little act of service, and this base would be woven into a parable and teaching of wisdom and simplicity, showing the oneness of all Spiritual Truth, and adapting it always to the life, both of the individual and of mankind. All of his words are directed toward helping men to live. Unless questions of metaphysics, dogmas and doctrines be introduced, he seldom mentions them. He speaks easily, clearly, in brief phrases, each of which is a gem. Whatever the lesson may be it always culminates in some sort of teaching of unity.

[^] In Galilee 33-34. Interestingly, Chase never published his notes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s talks with him, although a typescript of them exists in TC.

Mírzá Asadu’lláh and Hájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí visited the pilgrims daily as well to give them instruction, usually by amplifying a talk given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Yet Thornton does not describe the content of the lessons in his notes, as much as their cumulative effect:

At ‘Akká nothing in appearance is marvelous; all is simple, direct, natural, without effort or preparation. Yet the effect is deep, strong and wonderful, because all that is said or done is an expression of complete assurance in the Truth of God, entire reliance upon His Guidance, devotion to His will and love for His service. This certainty of rightness, this abnegation of self in favor of God and His will as expressed through His Messengers and Servants, causes a simplicity and power which penetrates the hearts and kindles in them quenchless flames of love, service and unity.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 46.

Thornton found the same lesson taught to him by all the Bahá’ís he met:

Everywhere among the friends, at ‘Akká, Haifa, Port Sa’íd, Alexandria and Cairo, we were given lessons of humility, simple, loving service, unselfishness and happiness in living the life of the Kingdom. There is no ostentation or striving for effect, but courtesies and offerings, a flower, a cup of tea, a bit of candy, carrying a parcel or doing some service, are blended with such a simple, affectionate spirit that they charm and attract.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 42-43.

Elsewhere in his account of his pilgrimage, Thornton notes that “wherever there were believers we found courteous, gentle, loving, earnest people, looking only for opportunities to serve one another.”

[^] Chase, In Galilee 51.

Thornton’s notes are filled with several references to the children of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s household and especially to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s oldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi. He found that even the children were examples:

The most visible effect of that power [of love] is in the lives of the believers everywhere, the pilgrims from every land, and the children. Such children I have never seen, so courteous, unselfish, thoughtful for others, unobtrusive, intelligent, and swiftly self-denying in the little things that children love, such as toys, candies, fruit, etc.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 51.

In 1902, in a letter to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Thornton had expressed his longing to see the face of Bahá’u’lláh. While on pilgrimage he was able to see a photograph of Bahá’u’lláh, taken in 1868:

How often has imagination tried to outline his face; how eagerly have those been questioned who had looked upon him; how earnestly has the wish been that the knowledge of him and the pilgrimage to his presence might have been made in his day.

The picture is a large photograph taken of him during the later years of his life. It is a majestic face, that of a strong, powerful, stern man, yet filled with an indescribable sweetness. Even in the photograph the majestic power shows through the lines of light and shade. . . . No word was spoken. It was a time for silence.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 39.

In the same 1902 letter to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Thornton had expressed his desire for certainty that Bahá’u’lláh was indeed God’s manifestation for this day. While on pilgrimage, he apparently achieved that certitude:

In his [‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s] presence, faith in God, in the power of the good, in the victory of the Spirit, became confirmed. Confidence was supreme in the impregnable certainty of the Cause of God. The feeling possessed us that the Day of God’s triumph was shining, that we were admitted as humble factors in his work of gladness, and that the might of man’s bondage to the tyranny of self was being illumined by the Glory of God. Fear and trembling vanished; prayer and praise sang joyously within us.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 46-47.

Undoubtedly the lesson of the pilgrimage, for Thornton, was unity, love, and service. The account of his pilgrimage is filled with many gemlike descriptions of these qualities and their importance. Many could be quoted, but one seems to serve as a summary of his experience:

Service is the key to unity, and Unity is the one great theme of the Teacher of ‘Akká. Without unity nothing is accomplished. . . . Unity of the few, the assembly [Bahá’í community], many assemblies, the country, many countries, the world. . . . And unity which is confined to the society or assembly alone is not unity; it must be open armed unity, seeking oneness of will, of purpose and of work with all other groups and assemblies. Each individual strengthens his individuality, not by maintaining it alone, but, on the contrary, by joining himself, his powers and abilities with others. Thus his own efficiency is enlarged and multiplied by cohesion with others. . . .

This in reality is the Message of Bahá'u'lláh in this Day — Unity, Love and Service in the Name of God; service in love, service to the friends and to all; living with such sweetness, usefulness, happiness and cheerfulness that the life itself attracts notice of others and draws them to the beauty of such living; service to every one around, no discrimination in service, but simply a great desire to be of use in every possible waking moment to some one of God's creatures.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 59-60.

Thornton was beginning to articulate his conception of the Bahá'í Faith, a conception radically simple yet radically different from any approach that Americans usually took, even to this day: that the Bahá'í Faith is a way of living, or, simply, living itself. The teachings themselves, often given as principles or formulae of thought, are unimportant except to the extent they are internalized and lived by believers. This was why 'Abdu'l-Bahá rarely gave formal instruction, beyond simple comments on how one should be. As Thornton summarized Bahá'í pilgrimage:

They come from every land, from every religion, from all kinds of training, each with his little cup or larger bowl, seeking answer to his quest. . . . And, after a week, a day, or an hour, they return to their distant homes, all filled with love, most of their questions unasked and forgotten, curious no longer, but satisfied and overflowing with love to the human race and a great longing to bear the Word of Revelation to their friends, and to serve every creature of God, without regard to family, race or religion.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 50.

Particularly important was Thornton's observation that pilgrims often forgot to ask 'Abdu'l-Bahá their questions. His notes of his visit to 'Akká make no mention of questions that Thornton asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá and very few words spoken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Only once did Chase, Agnew, and Scheffler ask questions; they had brought questions concerning the business of the Chicago House of Spirituality and the Bahá'í Publishing Society.

During one of their last evenings in 'Akká, 'Abdu'l-Bahá held a supper for forty Persian and American pilgrims and asked Chase, Agnew, and Scheffler to speak briefly. It was one of the few opportunities for Persian and American Bahá'í pilgrims to mingle; the Persians were delighted to meet their coreligionists from the West and listened to them with “utmost attention.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá passed among his guests, seating each one personally, giving them napkins, and serving them.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 63.

On the last day of the pilgrimage, the women of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s household met the American men — something that would have been impossible in most Middle Eastern homes in 1907. They asked the men to carry their love, hopes, and prayers to their sisters in America and to express their desire that the Bahá’í women of the West “so strive and work that they might accomplish not only their own duty in the Cause of God but also that of the helpless ones in the Orient.”

[^] Chase, In Galilee 45.

The time to leave ‘Akká had come. Thornton did not want ever to leave, and he was scheduled to remain a few days longer. Enemies of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, however, had informed the governor that Americans were staying at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, placing the household in danger. Each pilgrim met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá privately and briefly for a few final words. Thornton described his meeting as follows:

Soon after the noon meal ‘Abdu’l-Bahá met me in the little upper court. He embraced this servant, and, moving away a few feet, he turned, looked steadily and pronounced a promise that is a precious memory and hope. Then he went into the apartments of the household.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 66.

Apparently ‘Abdu’l-Bahá promised Thornton that they would meet again. As he descended the stairs to leave the house, Thornton told Carl Scheffler that “the Master has assured me that I will return to this place soon. This reconciles me to this unbearable departure.” The return, however, was not to take place physically.

[^] Carl Scheffler, “Thornton Chase: First American Bahá’í,” World Order 11.5 (August, 1945):157.

The pilgrims were then taken two miles by carriage to Bahjí, where Bahá’u’lláh’s tomb was located. Each one entered the inner chamber alone and prayed as long as possible there. Thornton described the visit as the “culmination” of the pilgrimage. Then they traveled to the garden of Riván, a Bahá’í property that Bahá’u’lláh had often visited to enjoy the trees and the stream. Finally, they returned to their hotel. Thornton noted that “through all the nine mile drive to Haifa we scarcely spoke,” and Scheffler says that Thornton’s tears did not finally dry until they reached the “Hospice of the Little Child,” where they stayed overnight.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 68-70; Scheffler, “Thornton Chase” 157.

The pilgrimage, now over, was to exert a profound effect on Thornton for the rest of his life. An experience that occurred when he was leaving ‘Akká demonstrated the extent to which Thornton had been transformed by his pilgrimage. He noted that as they left the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and “entered the world again,” “it was with a sort of chill as when one steps from a warm room into a cold night air.” The carriage, pulled by two horses, carried them through the crooked streets of ‘Akká and out through the city gate. There they stopped so that a third horse could be added to the team. While waiting, we were surrounded by vendors and beggars calling out the names of the loved ones we had left, evidently hoping thus to extract money from us. We had descended from a realm of happiness, peace and light to an underworld of greed and strife. Never before had we so perceived the ignorance and animalism which possesses men, and at first we shrank from them, but when we noted their condition, their sickness, their burdens and griefs, a longing tenderness welled up in our hearts toward them and to all creatures, a great wish to pour out on them the fragrances of peace, good-will and love, to lift them up from darkness to light, from ignorance to knowledge, from hell to heaven — and to serve them, even to the extinction of self.

[^] Chase, In Galilee 67.

Thornton’s transformation had gone so far that he yearned for death in his service of others. In a letter to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in 1902, he had written of his longing desire to surrender his will completely to the will of God. In this act of dedication to others, perhaps, he had achieved that goal.

Nor was this transformation temporary. Eighteen months later, in a book he wrote, Thornton emphasized the primacy of service; he even identified it with love:

. . . the love of mankind is an affection for the welfare and highest good of each and of all, recognizing that all are children of one Father and brothers of one family. It may cause but little emotion, but it demands service. Each member of humanity becomes a type of the whole, and love, that is, service, goes out unsparingly to all without regard to kinship or recompense. If there be any preference, it is for the poor, the needy, the helpless, because the essence of love is to exalt the low and feed the hungry.

[^] Thornton Chase, Bahá’í Revelation (Chicago: Bahá’í Publishing Society, 1909) 155-56.

Thornton’s statements are remarkable when one considers the racial prejudice that was taken for granted in his society, not only against blacks but also against Orientals and even Eastern Europeans. Thornton elaborated further about service:

We cannot serve God: He needs no creatures’ service. Neither can we serve ourselves alone, because such selfishness results in death, not life. But we can serve others. We can train ourselves to grow in strength and ability to serve humanity, that is — our neighbor, the ones near to us and around us as well as those far away, excluding none from our service. That is God’s service, for two reasons — because it is obeying his Command, and because it is the God-like in man that we serve. . . . Each human being has something of the “image of God” in him, and it is a blessing to us if we be able to serve that God-like quality and aid it to shine forth.

[^] Chase, Bahá’í Revelation 148-49.

Bahá’u’lláh, in his description of spiritual growth as a series of valleys, notes that after the valleys of search, love, and knowledge come those of unity, contentment, wonderment, and true poverty and absolute nothingness. The valley of knowledge he calls the “last plane of limitation.” Before his pilgrimage, the evidence suggests that Thornton had traversed at least the first three valleys; now, perhaps, he entered the remaining four. He reached the station of seeing “in himself neither name nor fame nor rank, but findeth his own praise in praising God.” He had tasted of “dying from self and the living in God, the being poor in self and rich in the Desired One.” This was the lasting legacy of his five days with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Thornton returned home, rededicated to serve the Bahá’í Faith. He redoubled his efforts to initiate the construction of a Bahá’í Temple in Chicago; he, Agnew, and Scheffler had spent a few moments discussing the project with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá during their last day in ‘Akká. The experience transformed Thornton’s view of individuals; his personal correspondence after the pilgrimage breathes a depth of love, devotion, and care for others that was absent previously. More important, the pilgrimage reawakened the creativity of Thornton’s pen. While in ‘Akká ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had picked up Thornton’s large fountain pen and commented that “the battle axe must fit the hand of the wielder.” With his return, Thornton picked up his pen to write two books, several essays, and, again, poems, all dedicated to his Lord.

Our First Morning in 'Akká.

We met the Ladies of the Holy Household assembled in the Tea Room, and with them two widows of martyrs to the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. Greetings and messages of love from the friends at home were given with joy; then we heard a firm, quick step approaching the Tea-Room. No need to tell us who! Instantly all arose, and there in the open doorway we first beheld 'Abdu'l-Bahá, smiling a Heavenly welcome. Entering, he gave to each of us a hearty grasp of his hand, saying in English "Good Morning!" With a motion of his hand inviting all to be seated; inquiring as to our health; had we enjoyed restful sleep, expressing the hope that our journey may have been made with comfort. 'Abdu'l-Bahá then, turning to Miss Alma Knobloch, asked: "How are the German Believers?" She replied: "They are united and harmonious and are very firm." 'Abdu'l-Bahá then said: "Many great souls will arise in Germany to spread the Teachings to a great extent. I have sent Tablets to the Believers and the Assembly, and also to you. I have prayed for them. In the time to come you will be very happy to think of them. It will give you great joy and pleasure." Turning to Mrs. Ida Finch, he asked: "How are the Believers in Seattle?" Mrs. Finch replied: "They are very faithful. Some of us are united, but not all." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "I hope when you return to America you will carry to them the power of uniting all." He then inquired of Miss Fanny Knobloch the condition of the Washington Believers. "They are well and they love each other very dearly," was her reply. After this, messages sent by the various Friends were given, and many precious messages for them received in return. {{p2}}

Nov. 7th, 1908. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Talk while at Table. (Noon)

Directed to Miss Alma Knobloch.

A good foundation is laid in Germany. The believers must be firmly founded in the principles of morality and honesty. First: truthfulness; no one should ever tell a lie! Second: Honesty in all their transactions. Third: Forbearance is necessary. Fourth: they must observe the utmost kindness, so that all may consider themselves servants of each other, and be truthful and honest to all mankind. Fifth: they must not disappoint anyone, but constantly endeavor to become more spiritual. If they live up to these commandments the confirmation of the Spirit will surely reach them. The Spirit will descend and they will surely progress. If you make Stuttgart a strong center, it will be of great benefit for other cities, for they can refer to it. If a great tree in the forest is ablaze it will set others on fire; if you plant a palm its roots spread in every direction. If you would like to go to other cities it is approved. I pray for you all. I ask God's blessings to descend upon you. May each one of you be as the light from a lamp to enlighten an assembly. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was told of the new Bahá'í Home, which was being built by Mr. A. Eckstein and was requested to reveal a name for it. He asked, "Shall it be in German or Persian." The latter was desired. "Anjomani Rahmani" (i.e.), Merciful Assembly, was the name given. . . . Question by Miss Fanny, "shall Alma return to Stuttgart?" "Why not? Yes, she has been confirmed in her work there by the Holy Spirit, why should she go elsewhere? When a tree in the forest is ablaze others will be ignited."

Nov. 7th, (Evening).

'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Originally the Persian, German and English were one tongue." {{p3}}

Nov. 7th, 1908.

Copy of Notes taken in 'Akká. Given to us by Mírzá Asadu'lláh. Question asked by an Arabian Judge of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. {.noid}

"Should we come in touch with those who are naturalists, or those who do not believe in God or His Prophets, how can we prove to them their Divinity?" 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: First of all, you should not argue with them or oppose them, or they will deny even the things which they see with their eyes. For example, they will see the Light here, and they will say there is no light. One must talk to them very kindly, in order to let them know the desired object. When you ask them 'Who is the Creator of the world? What is your opinion in the matter?' They will answer: "It is quite plain and evident that there are various kinds of elements, and by being composed a being is formed." We must say, "You are right, it seems to be so, but we have heard something else, some philosophers and learned men told us as follows: 'When we look carefully at objects and things we can comprehend and understand that by the composition of some elements something is formed; this is quite evident. But there are three kinds of composition. One is accomplished by force; for instance, fire attracts water, this is made through force, that is, the elements attract each other; when they come together they form an object. This kind of composition is called innate or natural attraction, made by force. The second kind of composition is said to be done by chance, for instance, it rained by chance, the sun cast its rays by chance; therefore, vegetables grow. The third is a composition made by will, by aim; — for instance — A doctor gives a medicine which is composed of various elements, compounded by his will; knowing the ingredients of the drugs he compounds them by will.' We must look and see very carefully that we understand whether the things or objects of the world are formed through the power of attraction made by force; if {p4} it is so, then there should not be the decomposition, because the elements attracted by the other must remain together everlastingly; corruption must not take place; some realize that there are both composition and decomposition. As to the second, which was by chance, this is also not perfect, but completely invalid. How can there be movement without a mover? As to the third, that all objects in the world are made or formed by will. Then, there should be a Creator for everything, for instance, to place the eye in its own place, the ear in its proper place, etc. Such a power creates, gives life to man, and works through His will. We call this will, GOD! All the prophets believed in such a Great Being."

Nov. 7th, Evening. Mírzá Asadu'lláh.

Why did you come here, and what are you here for? Miss Fanny answered: "For help in spiritual knowledge, so that we may be able to impart this to others." "Where have you learned, or whence does your source of information come, that this is the place to gain that knowledge? Has any one of former generations given you these tidings?" "Yes the Prophets and all Spiritual teachers have foretold these days." "How were these tidings given? In a concealed manner, because the people were not able to understand, but now we are informed of these concealed meanings. From time immemorial, these tidings have been given, but according to the requirements of the time in which they were given. In this day there is no greater religion, according to number of followers, than the Buddhists. If you ask them they will testify of these tidings. All other Holy books contain the same glad tidings, but the nearer the time comes to this age the clearer they became, until the Messianic age and in the day of the Lord Christ. His disciples asked: 'When shall be the end of the days?' Jesus answered in the form of allegory; but the disciples {p15} wanted straightforward facts, and Jesus had talked of these event when there was a great concourse of people present. But when they were alone with Jesus they asked again: 'When shall these things be?' He then referred them to the twelfth chapter of Daniel. But they still desired more explicit information. He referred to the time when the abomination of desolation shall take place, which is the time of the appearance of Muḥammad; then to the appearance of the Báb, and next to the appearance of Bahá'u'lláh.<sup>[1]</sup> The passing away of the daily sacrifice was when the Muḥammadan army surrounded the Holy City. They then announced that the daily sacrifice should be discontinued. From that time to the beginning of this day is 1260 days, according to Hegira, (or years). The 1290 days after the rise of Muḥammad, dates the day when Bahá'u'lláh announced his mission to the world. It was the memorable time when Bahá'u'lláh gave the people and all the crowned heads, the message that the Promised One had come. All the days end in this day. In the year 1335 (see Dan. XII. 12), you shall see the great unfoldment. In other words, we have nine years (A. D. 1917), to witness the outcome of these events. Whatever major events were to take place in accordance with prophecy are to come now, and we will witness these great events. The climax is in the days of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; the culminating events will take place. The lion and the lamb will lie down together. All the prophetic statements of the coming of the Kingdom will take place in these days. This world has an owner, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá owns the world and all that is in it; it is His garden; and blessed are they who are in His garden to serve. They are in reality the elect, for night and day are they gathering fragrance from the spiritual flowers in the garden. They receive orders from the Head Gardener. We are thankful {{p6}} that you are all working with us in the garden. You have come to the Divine Paradise. St. John the Divine, has told us in that day there shall be no more tears or death; tears are wiped from your eyes and you will enjoy the happiness of a united household.”

[^1] For Further elucidation upon this point, see “Some Answered Questions,” by Miss Barney.

The same Evening, A Talk by Ibn Abhár.

The washing away of sins by Christ was not by blood, but by the practice of His teachings; and knowing they would not live up to them He said He would come again to finish His work. The words of the Prophets are collective, are comprehensive. He knew they would deny, but the people now are acknowledging in every line of life, by making advancement in every direction and advent. Children going to school need teachers to give lessons according to the capacity of the children, and now that we are grown up we get lessons according to our capacity. The light is always one, but the Messianic aspects are quite different.

Nov. 8th, 1908, Morning in the Tea Room.

We were called to the tea room, about seven o’clock, to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his family. A venerable Persian gentleman of the family chanted some of the words of Bahá’u’lláh. After this ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The Catholics believe that when they die they go to a place between Heaven and hell, called purgatory, to become purified, where they suffer, and then they are prepared to enter Heaven.” Looking and referring to us three pilgrims, he said: “That is your condition while here in ‘Akká, you suffer some bodily discomforts, you do not have the food you are accustomed to; troublesome and long journeys, etc. Every one who visits here should make progress. I hope you, too, will make progress day by day; each day as I see you I hope that you will have made more progress. {{p7}}

As a father who loves his children; as a teacher who loves his pupils and desires that they make progress, so I hope that you will make progress. As I love you very much, I hope that you will advance rapidly, and when you leave here you will be changed so that you may become like refreshing water to the thirsty ones, brilliant stars in the Assemblies, and firm trees in the garden of the Kingdom of God. Each one of you, like the light of a lamp, shall be the light of an Assembly.”

Nov. 8th, Sunday Afternoon.

Six Persian and Indian brothers visited us this afternoon. After greetings and exchange of love messages from the German and American believers, one of the Persian believers said: "Persia is not free. We are not able to give the Glad Tidings, so we cannot advance rapidly, but in many assemblies we number one hundred or more." Two of these believers had escaped from the martyrdom at Yazd; one of them a relative of the Báb, by name Mírzá 'Abdu'l Buassah. One, a Jewish believer from Hamadán, tells of their meetings in his home town. Hamadán is 60 miles from Tíhrán. Three-fourths of the population are believers. Presently 'Abdu'l-Kázim brought us some jasmine flowers in a cabbage leaf from the garden of the Riḍván, and he told us it was through the Love of God we were brought from our country to Syria.

Nov. 8th, 3 P.M.

We were visited by the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Munírih Khánum, who said she felt keenly the fact the she could not speak our language, so that she might be able to tell us how much she loved us. Then Miss Fanny said: "Oh, if we had but a thousandth part of your knowledge and love." Her reply was: "We are all maid-servants, and if we live according to the commands given us, we will be nearer to God. Those nearest to God are those who obey His commandments. {{p8}}

"Think! In the days of Christ, some of His relatives were far from Him, and in this day, how very far from God is Muḥammad-'Alí!" We spoke of having read so many tablets in which we were told that 'Abdu'l-Bahá shall be known only by the name of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Munírih Khánum said that Bahá'u'lláh called him Master. And every Prophet, after proclaiming His mission, adopts a name. Moses spoke of Himself as the Interlocutor; Christ of Himself as the Son of God; and 'Abdu'l-Bahá calls Himself 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God.

Nov. 8th, Evening.

Ibn Abhár, just returning from the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, told us that he had the intention of giving us a bunch of roses, but meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá he was so overjoyed that he gave them to Him. There was remaining in his hand, however, three small flowers, which were given to us. He said: "When we closely examine the things deposited in the various regions of the earth, we find that each and all are expressions of the Divine and signs of the Merciful, according to their degree of receptivity. Now we discover that in each class there is one member which attains perfection; for instance, the fruit of the earth, any one kind, there is one specimen which is perfect, in color, shape and taste, neither too acid nor too sweet. Among the jewels, precious stones, there must be one perfect gem of its kind; one ruby, one diamond, one gem which is the most perfect, most complete, entirely without flaw. Now, let us come to the most interesting kingdom, that is, mankind(r)he human kingdom. We find in this kingdom there are some who are noted for their physical beauty. Suppose you were to examine these beautiful people; we find one who surpasses the rest in beauty. Among men we find some who are famous as possessing a good temperament, and examining these we find one who {{p9}} is more perfect. Likewise in Sciences. Among those who have acquired science, there must be one who is the most scientific. We have now come to the subject of knowledge (science); this is of two kinds; it is either acquired, scholastic or immediate-untaught, innate or intuitional. When a certain soul gives expression to knowledge which was not acquired by him from a tutor or in school, that Soul is Divine and that Knowledge is Heavenly. Such a soul will claim that he is sent by God, bringing new knowledge to the world. What practical, tangible evidence have we of such a claimant? One of these evidences or proofs is power and capability, which will help Him to reveal this knowledge to the public, and to withstand opposition with steadfastness in His claims. His power must be effective, to subdue, to conquer. He must be majestic, so that through this quality the listener will be awed. He must be a magnet, to attract. His attractiveness does not mean simply to attract men, to attract only his own tongue and country, but must also attract those who oppose and are of different nations. He must have patience; in fact must possess all these qualities. Such great souls do not appear often, but from cycle to cycle they appear, and say: 'I am Divine. My qualities are divine!' When these great souls put forth their mission, those expecting them look for one from some noble family, royal lineage, great wealth. So they always lack according to this expectation. Yet His teachings last. The people being blind to His teachings always oppose and persecute Him, and usually end by crucifying Him. Every class will oppose Him with whatever means of opposition they think will be the most effective. Nevertheless, that one single soul withstands all opposition. His science creates new science. His words, new words. His life, new modes of life. His power is such in the world of God as will change the natural habits of men and transform them. By the effectiveness of His words even personal attributes are changed. If one is envious, he becomes a well-wisher. If harmful, becomes {{p10}} useful. If a liar, becomes truthful. If subject to lust and passion, he becomes the opposite of these traits. Individual characteristics are changed, and a certain love is produced in the hearts of His believers as the effect of His word. In the first station as the effect of this love He offers Himself as a target for the arrows of persecution, offers Himself to martyrdom. In the secondary station He longs to sacrifice His belongings in the way of the beloved friends who believe on Him; and in the third station, He is willing to part with all the things of earth as well as Heaven, for the sake of the people of the earth.

Nov. 8th., 'Abdu'l-Bahá at Lunch.

You are not accustomed to Persian food. America and Europe are like unto the dawn of the sun of reality, just at the beginning of the morning. But before long the Sun of Reality will give its full light, then you will realize how beautiful it will be. But now it is like the beginning of spring, when the grass comes through the ground, but when the time of blossom and fruition will come, it will be very beautiful. Just now you are living in the spring time, and you must work very hard that you become fruitful trees. The tree, no matter how green or beautiful it may be, if it is not fruitful, it is useless. So you will see many trees which are green and fresh, but produce no fruit. In the same way you see a man in the world who is very wise, learned, refined, accomplished, and diplomatic, but he is deprived of the Bounty of the Kingdom, and will not possess a share of it. But it is possible to see a man who is not accomplished or educated but who still has a share in the Bounty of the Kingdom, and when he attains to the Bounty of the Kingdom, of course he will be a fruitful tree. Notice the women who lived in the time of Christ, and who believed in Him in those days; though they had {{p11}} no share in science or learning, but as they had entered into the Kingdom of God they obtained fruit out of their existence and became fruitful trees. If one entering the Kingdom of God possesses learning and science it is well, but the essential thing, or the thing of greatest importance, is to enter into the Kingdom of God, and to be characterized by the Divine attributes, and to have the intention of doing good to the World, and to be perfectly kind to each member of the human family, and serve in promoting Universal Peace. Science and learning are good, but they are the branches, not the root.

Nov. 8th, Evening, at table., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

In former cycles people used to relate by tradition the things which happened during the time of the Prophets; for instance, the disciples explained the miracles during the time of Christ; these statements were oral. But in this great day facts are established; what Bahá’u’lláh has performed was seen by the eyes. When Bahá’u’lláh was under chains He sent tablets to the kings. He admonished Napoleon Bonaparte severely. What he said was fulfilled. Likewise, the recent movements in the capital of Persia, Tíhrán, were mentioned forty years ago. Those tablets were printed then and distributed — a matter of record forty years ago. These are not oral; even enemies cannot deny it. While in prison Bahá’u’lláh sent a tablet to ‘Abdu’l Majíd, father of the present Sháh, arraigning him severely, telling him he would be dethroned. All that was foretold has come to pass, literally. {{p12}}

Nov. 8th, Afternoon., The Words of Munírih Khánum (Wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.)

She is sorry that the people of the village do not appreciate the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but they are so far from God. She has often, in a gentle way, led up to the subject of religion, and on several occasions has asked them: “Why do you think we have been sent here?” But they had never thought about it. Today a young lady called whose parents owned the house in which formerly the family of Bahá’u’lláh lived. This lady is a Christian. Munírih Khánum asked her, “Have you ever thought why we were sent here?” The reply was, “No!” Munírih Khánum, said: “You know us, that we neither steal, nor do we kill any one.” The lady replied: “I have heard some of the natives speak of you, saying, These Persians were exiled because they have a faith, a religion, which is contrary to the religion of Persia.” ‘Munírih Khánúm then asked, “What is religion? Is it not the expression or form of worshipping God? You are a Christian, can you prove to me the truth of Christ’s teaching?” This young lady could not. She was then asked if she was certain that Christ’s teachings are true? She replied, “I do not know!” In regard to the name “Master,” the beloved Munírih Khánúm said: “The Great-Grandfather of Bahá’u’lláh was ‘Abbás, and when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was born he was given his great grandfather’s name. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his childhood and early youth showed marks of wisdom and knowledge, maturity beyond his year& “Master,” when spoken from father to son, is the same as “darling,” or “dear ;” because of love he is called “Master.” After the departure of Bahá’u’lláh, he chose the name ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and the assumption of this name is for the purpose of designating himself as the Servant of God. {{p13}}

Nov. 9th, Morning in Tea Room.

Munírih Khánúm said: “It is hard to want to tell our love and yet not be able to speak the language. It is like being thirsty and with water at hand, and yet not able to drink.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá then came into the room, while we were drinking tea, and after the usual greetings, inquired as to our health and comfort, and whether we had slept well. Mrs. Ida A. Finch then had an opportunity to speak of the question of Mrs. Corinne True, in regard to the ground of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, which was whether they should go into debt, or whether to begin building immediately. If they can afford to buy half the ground, then begin building. It requires a large piece of ground. There must be a Hospital, a College, a School for Orphans, and a Hospice. These buildings must be on one piece of ground, but separated from each other by gardens. After tea with the ladies of the household, we were requested to get ready to make the pilgrimage to the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. The widow of the man who gave his life for Mr. Sprague, with Mrs. Finch, Miss Alma, Miss Fanny Knobloch and one of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s daughters, were taken in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s carriage to the Tomb. After a short ride we arrived there. With our shoes removed we stood reverently before the door, feeling keenly our unworthiness to cross the threshold; and there we prayed for ourselves and the dear ones we had promised to remember while there. After a few moments we entered the room where the body lies, and again knelt, and prayed for worthiness and love, and endeavored again to include in our supplications, those precious ones who had not this blessed privilege. After coming away from the tomb, the residents and care-takers of the place served tea, and we had a heart to heart talk with them, with the help of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s daughter, Munírih Khánúm. Miss Fanny suddenly remembered that she had forgotten to pray for a dear one, and asked permission to {{p14}} return to the tomb, so Mrs. Finch and Miss Alma took this opportunity to return also, and, with tears streaming from our eyes, and with feelings impossible to describe, prayed once more, and wished that we might stay there forever.

Nov. 9th, 1908., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Table. Noon.

Turning to Miss Alma he said: “Are you happy? Have the people of Germany the capacity to receive? Don’t they hate you? Do they love you? If I were in their place I would put you out, for you are a rioter. The people objected to the disciples at the time of Christ, saying they had led the people astray.” In the time of Moses, Pharaoh said, “We will kill Moses, for he wishes to change our religion, and will be the cause of great damage to our land. Therefore, let us kill him soon, in order to protect our religion.” Now the people of Germany will say the same to you, that you have gone there to change their religion. In Haifa there is a colony of Germans. When they came they were very pious and sincere, but they have departed from their mission and have become very haughty. The Kingdom of God is like a tailor, and nations and sects are like pieces of cloth or materials; each nation or sect is a special material and now the real tailor is relating or connecting these materials to each other. We hope that before long there will be made a Divine robe out of these nations or materials. Again, the Lord of the Kingdom is like a gardener. He plants in the garden many flowers of various colors, puts them together like this bunch (referring to one on the table). So we are waiting and expecting to finish this bunch.

(After a pause.) {ed}

At present the gardener is working. {{p15}}

Morning Talk by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Service in the Kingdom of God will last forever. Since Christ’s time how many kings and queens have come and gone; is there any mention of some of them? But look at those women in the days of Christ, Mary Magdalen and others, they served in the cause of God, and their names are still living. Mary Magdalen was only a woman of the town, and they used to blame her very much, but after she believed in Christ see her glory! Judge by the present, how many days have passed, and we are now talking about her. What great bounty and Providence He has given His maid-servants, a glorious crown placed upon their heads, great blessings do descend upon them. If you thank God every moment, you cannot thank Him enough. Therefore when you go back from here you must go with perfect joy and give the glad tidings to every one. Just think of anyone outwardly, to be able to reach a King or a President, how happy he is! But you have found the way to God, you have entered the Kingdom of God, become maid-servants of God. If while outside the Kingdom you should think yourself the most happy creature, you are not. All the meetings in the world forever and ever will be occupied in your mention and in glorifying you, but for your love for Bahá’u’lláh you will, perhaps, be blamed, cursed, injured; but the children and descendants who follow them that blame, will glorify you, and wish to be in your place. Therefore whatever you receive from the people, you must be more happy, rejoiced, and the more enkindled because in the end the victory is yours. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá then said to Miss Alma and Fanny, after a pause: {{p16}}

“If you could see the glory in which your mother now dwells you would not care to live another day, you could not live. “I will write a Tablet for your mother, which you shall read at her grave. Through this Tablet her name will be known through all eternity.”

Nov. 10th. 1908., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Table. (Noon.)

We are having a very good meeting, very sweet and full of the Spirit. Thanks be to God that the love of Bahá’u’lláh has gathered us. Our countries are different and far from one another, and in the same way our national customs and habits are different, our languages, our opinions and thoughts are different; in every way we are very far from one another. But the influence of the word of God has gathered us, and we are here together in perfect love. Therefore, it is very interesting, delicious, and sweet — very much sweeter than this melon. You must consider how dear you were to God that He has led you to His Kingdom, and that you were chosen from the many who were called. How many clergymen, ministers have no share in this! How many men of knowledge, many philosophers, princes, and kings! All these are deprived and you have attained. God has chosen you. How dear you were to God. It was the same in the days of Christ. All the Pharisees, all the great men, all the kings, all the ministers, and all the rich people and men of importance were deprived. Peter, Paul, Mark, John, Mary Magdalen and Mary, the Mother of Jesus, such were the ones who attained to the Kingdom. Now one can realize how dear those souls were to God, that He chose them to enter and serve in His kingdom. {{p17}}

For every great cause which is to appear, God will prepare some means. For instance, when the season of Spring is at hand, before that season appears there will be snow storms, rain, thunder and a great many things will happen. This is a preparation for the coming of the Spring. If preparation should not precede, the Spring would not appear. The greater the storms, the more abundant the fall of rain, the more beautiful and splendid is the Spring. Although the former Manifestations have come from God, the means of unity for mankind was not prepared in their time. It was as though there was nothing, and conflicting conditions were still remaining in the world; there was no transportation and railways, no joining of Europe, Asia and Africa. People could not meet each other, the means were not ready. If a man should travel some distance from his country, he could not let it be known where he was. Because of this the teachings of Moses were confined to Palestine. The cause of Jesus Christ was spread over some parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, and the cause of Muḥammad over some parts of Europe, Asia and Africa; none were universal. The unity of mankind was not realized, perfect connection was not produced amongst mankind, for there was no means for this; they could not meet each other. But in the Cause of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, the greatest preparations are in evidence. The means for the unity and harmony of mankind is found in the most complete way. Communication is so easy that in a single moment the East can communicate with the West. A hundred days can be passed in a single day. Ships, in other Manifestations, could only sail near the shore, and if sometimes they did go far they would be missed and could not be traced. Now they cross the ocean. In the days of the Prophets, Christ and Muḥammad, there were many plains and deserts on which no one had traveled, now the trains can go directly and pass over them easily, and the land and sea are so connected with each other that the globe can be traversed in one month. {{p18}}

Hence the world has received the capacity for the unity of mankind. These preparations, these capacities, are all made ready for the spread of the teachings of this Great Cause; and it is possible that the teachings and instruction of Bahá'u'lláh can be given to everybody in the world; therefore, the hope is great that the tent of unity will soon be pitched, and there is great probability that war and strife will be annihilated, and it IS possible that the trades, professions and arts of the earth shall be diffused, therefore it is possible that the Teachings shall be spread throughout the world. Were it not for this preparation it would be impossible for you to have heard of this Cause in your country. This is a self-evident proof that the world has received the capacity for the Cause, and what Cause in the world is greater than this?

Nov. 10th, 1908., Evening. Ibn Abhár.

But now the Greatest Manifestation is so universal for all the world, that it will pitch the tent of Universal Peace, under which all the nations and all the religions will gather. Therefore, Bahá'u'lláh addresses the people of the world, saying: "O, ye people, of the world, the tent of Unity is raised up. Do not look at each other with the eye of difference; ye are all the leaves of one tree and the drops of one sea." The former prophets educated the tree of humanity gradually; it was first as a seed; then, a small shoot; then it gave forth branches and leaves; then it bloomed; then it gave fruit; but still it was unripe. Now is the time it will be ripened. There have been six Manifestations; the seventh is this Great Manifestation. Today 'Abdu'l-Bahá invites all to eat and partake of the fruit in the Kingdom of the Father, for He unfolds or discloses the mysteries of the teachings of His Father, which conforms to what Christ said in the words: "I will come in the Glory of my Father." From this we must {{p19}} understand that He had not been in the Glory of His Father, but that He must come again. Glory means the Unity of the world which had not been realized before; the world of humanity has the capacity to receive this great gift, and this world of dust is so improved that it can be changed into a Paradise. His Glory is now manifested among all the nations of the world. We see now that all the kings and subjects of the world are willingly desirous to be united; this is the sign of the Glory and Majesty of the Father. The Son has already come in the Glory of the Father, and He gives the fruit, or the interpretation of the Words of the Father. . Christ said that "I am the Alpha and the Omega," because the fruit is at first the seed, and again in the fruit you find the seed. Therefore, He is the Glory of His Father.

Same Evening by Ibn Abhár.

To compare the effects of this Cause with those of former ones, we will speak of Zoroaster, who was. A Prophet. He commanded his followers to make a long shirt and to place a little pocket in front in the shape of a grave. Zoroastrians believe that whatever good deeds they perform will be collected in this pocket, and in the last days they will receive their reward. While the teaching was not for this purpose, but rather that when they see it (the pocket), they remember their death, and by this would be protected from committing any bad action. They have a girdle which must be made out of seventy two threads, and it must be made out of very fine quality of wool, and this is also a token, a sign for them to remember, that as a sheep, whose parts are all of use, so they must perform actions which are all good and deal with all mankind in brotherly love, and that all their words, deeds and actions may be useful to mankind. As to the seventy-two threads, this signifies that they must associate with all different religions of the world; as to its softness, it means that they must be kind; and as to its being tied round the waist, that they must deal {{p20}} with mankind in moderation and justice These are the teachings of Zoroaster. Each Prophet left after Him some sign by which He meant some significance. But in this day we are commanded to love mankind, to be united, and this is the only means for the prosperity and improvement of humanity. Now we must stand up firmly and serve the Cause with all our might; overlook our comfort and rest in helping the people to attain to the share of the Kingdom. And Christ said: “We shall know the tree by its fruits.” By this is meant the former prophets gave up their lives in the way of the welfare of mankind; thus it will happen in the day of the Manifestation. — Therefore, the more you are under troubles; if the priest excommunicate you, or curse you, the more you must feel glad and happy and thankful, for the tree of your life has given fruit. Marriage is one of the signs in this Manifestation, to show that the Manifestation must be willing to sacrifice all in the path of God, even His family.

Nov. 11th, 1908., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Morning.

How are the Believers? Are they enkindled? Are they brilliant stars in the Assembly? Do they serve the Cause of God in Love and Harmony? In the meetings of Believers is there a real quickening, or is it cold? There is a difference. Sometimes where are people at a meeting who are like candles having no light. They have been extinguished. There are other candles which are aflame and give light to the meeting. Meetings are like gardens. There are some gardens which are fresh and fertile, having trees which have beautiful blossoms, which produce very sweet and delicious fruit. But there are gardens which are dead. What we wish for the meetings of Believers is that they shall be enkindled and enlightened. That the faces of {{p21}} the Believers shall be like sunshine, like the open rose, so that every one entering the meeting will recognize the light which they possess. It will be like a man entering a garden, and though he may have a cold and so be unable to inhale the perfume, yet he can see the full beauty and the freshness of the flowers. In the meeting the words of the Believers must be about God and the Wisdom of God, or to illustrate the proofs and signs of God. What we mean by this is that the words must be words for the enlightenment and enkindlement of others, just as we speak with love and kindness to the people of the world.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Table. Evening.

In the world of existence one must look in everything to the capacity and ability. For instance, if a man wishes to attain the art of writing, he must look to himself to see whether he has the ability or not. If a man wishes to teach, he must feel sure that he has the ability. So it is with a captain; he must first realize in himself whether he is fitted for that work or not. In short, every work depends upon capacity and ability, that is man must first see whether he has the ability for working in some profession, or not; without regarding this matter he would at last be disappointed. But in the work of the Kingdom of God, that is exceptional: In this place or station one should not consider capacity or ability; the confirmation of the Spirit will descend; because we hold that the weakest souls through the confirmation of the Holy Spirit become the most powerful. Some souls who were outwardly ignorant, through this gift become learned ones. The weakest souls become the strongest. Many times a woman has surpassed a thousand men, or, rather, through this help could withstand all the people of the world. His highness, Moses, was apparently a shepherd, but through the Divine Power, he overcame Pharaoh and his armies. Likewise, the disciples were the weakest {{p22}} souls, but through the Breath of the Holy Spirit and the assistance of the Kingdom of God, they became the strongest ones. The object which I wish to convey to you is this: you should not look at your capacity or ability, nay, rather, rely upon the confirmation of the Holy Spirit, not doubt. (after a long pause) Be confident and sure. It will help you.

Nov. 11th, 1908. A Visit from Munírih Khánum The Wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

A short Account of Events before her Birth.

Her parents had been married ten years, yet had no children. They were of the first believers at the time of the Báb. Her father and uncle went to visit the Holy Tomb of Ḥusayn in Karbala. They saw the Báb there, who was a descendant of Muḥammad. When her uncle and father were at prayer they saw a youth who was not like the others. He displayed so much devotion, and repeated some new prayers. They immediately felt a great love for Him so they followed him to see where he went, and as they followed wondered whether he was a human being or an Angel. He entered a little house, and they knocked at the door. A woman came, and they asked who he was. She said: “I do not know, except he came and hired a room.” Then they went away. But Siyyid Kázim, one of the astronomer’s pupils, and her father met the Báb there. They were sitting all together, and when the Báb came into the room they became quiet. After he sat down, he took his handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his face, and said: "The time is near for His coming. The time is near; the darkness is going away." The sun was shining through the window and resting on the Babes lap, and they thought he meant the sun. The Báb left Karbala and went to Shíráz, and they, her father and uncle, heard that some one in Shíráz was claiming that he was the Promised One from Heaven. {{p23}}

Thus they decided this was the One whom they had seen praying at the tomb. They immediately went to Shíráz without saying "good-bye" to their families. But when they arrived he had gone to Mecca; then they went to Işfahán and met the Bábu'l-Báb, and became good believers. The wives of her uncle and father were worried, and did not know where they had gone. So the sister of the Bábu'l-Báb came to them and said: "You don't know where they have gone? Come with me and I will take you to one who can tell you all about them." So she took them to the house of Qurratu'l-'Ayn, a little house, and in a little room a beautiful woman was writing. When she had finished writing she said: "You do not look very happy. The people are talking and you are troubled. Why are you sorry? For at last you must be separated. I want to tell you some news which will make you happy." So she read the letter she had written, telling the Great News, the proofs and signs in regard to the Báb. They were so affected they began to cry, fell before her and began to kiss her.

Munírih Khánum's father and uncle waited in Işfahán until the Báb came. Her parents had been married some years before, but had no children. When the Báb came to Işfahán he came to their house, and after dinner began to speak. He asked if they had any children. No, they had not. Then her father asked the Báb for a child. So the Báb gave her father some bread and said: "Give this to your wife," which he did immediately, and in eight months and nine days she was born. But before she was born her father and uncle went to Mázindarán expecting to be killed. Her father said, "If a girl is born her name is Fatima; if a boy, 'Alí." When they arrived at the gate of Mázindarán they could not enter and then they went to Badasht. Bahá'u'lláh was there, and some other believers. They were there some months; hard times and exposure caused the death of her uncle. When her father returned she was five months old. She was called "The Morsel of the Báb." {{p24}}

Nov. 11th. Table, Afternoon. Mírzá Asadu'lláh.

The Báb was of the lineage of Muḥammad the Prophet. He lost his father when a child. His uncle educated and reared him. Those who used to meet the child testified as to his character. His behavior was distinguished from others. When he reached the age of maturity he kept all the ordinances and performed them according to the Muḥammadan religion. Those who met him were amazed and marvel led at his character. He was at one time in business with his uncle. In those days there was a man called Shaykh Aḥmad of Ahsa. He was one of the most scientific and learned men. He way interpreting the Qur'án and interpreting the mysteries to his students, and in the meantime announcing to the people the coming of this advent, but without announcing it openly. He had a student, Siyyid Kázim, who was teaching the people and making them ready to receive and know that the Manifestation was at hand, because the Muḥammadans were expecting the Manifestation of the Promised One. These two gentlemen were as the precursors. This Siyyid Kázim was living in Karbala where the Imám was martyred, and buried, and he had a class of students. When the Báb went to Karbala to visit the Blessed Shrine, he used to come and attend the class. Siyyid Kázim recognized the Báb to be the Manifestation through the signs and prophecies of the Book. But he did not divulge it. He educated his pupils, but one day he told them, “I will soon have to go away.” Those around him expressed their regret and their sorrow. Then he said to them, “Don’t you wish me to go away so that the Promised One may come?” When this great Shaykh died, his students gathered together saying to one another, “Our teacher promised us that the Advent is near at hand.” At the conclusion of their consultation they decided to search for the Promised One. Each of them traveled toward a certain place or country, and promised each other that should any one {{p25}} of them find the Promised One he would announce it to his friends. Among them was Mullá Ḥusayn, from Bushruiyih, with two of his friends who came to Shíráz.

(Statement of the Bábu’l-Báb.)

“I entered Shíráz, and lodged in a certain house. When I came out for a walk, as I was walking I met a youth whose face was shining, and he was walking in a serene, sedate manner. As he came toward me he greeted and saluted me, asked after my health and wherefore did I come? Seeing I was a stranger he invited me to his house and served me with tea. Then I told the youth, ‘I have not yet found the Promised One. Then he answered, ‘What are the signs required?’ Do you realize them in me?’ I answered, ‘Yes! but I need a miracle. I want a miracle.’ He answered, ‘The miracle you received from Muḥammad was a book.’ And immediately he handed me a pamphlet, telling us, ‘Read this.’ After reading it in the same night I was converted. By and by those friends who had scattered in search of the Promised One, came together in that city, and by reading this pamphlet they were all converted — eighteen in all. Then the Báb left them and made a pilgrimage to Mecca, and commanded his followers to go abroad and teach the people. He said, “Say to the people that the Door for the Greatest Manifestation is opened.” The Báb-el-Báb was commanded to go to Ṭihrán, and the Báb promised him, “You shall receive a great gift while in Ṭihrán.” When he reached Ṭihrán he met Bahá’u’lláh, and without investigating further or having been told, he said to himself, “This is what I have been promised.” At which he was entirely transfigured. The Báb went to Mecca, and the Báb-el-Báb went to other parts to teach. On the Babes return he was arrested and sent out of the city. So we can say the Báb was taken to the Castle of Máku, in which he was confined, then to the Castle of Chihriq; then from there, after a period of close confinement, he was taken to Tabriz, where he was {{p26}} martyred. From the time of his declaration to his martyrdom was six years, just entering the seventh. The remarkable evidence of his power is in the fact that during these six consecutive years of banishment and imprisonment he revealed his great master works — the great Heavenly books. In all of these books and in his utterances to those whose great privilege it was to meet him, he prophesied the coming of “Him Whom God would Manifest,” but mostly in symbolic form, allegorically, not referring to the name openly. The expression used by him was “He whom God shall Manifest.” During this time Bahá’u’lláh was constantly engaged in the promulgation of the Cause of God; but without proclaiming Himself, or making known His station. Some, but few, among His friends, the early disciples, discovered that he was The One of whom the Báb spoke — “He Whom God shall Manifest.” Although Bahá’u’lláh was of royal lineage, and not of the scholastic or learned, the people naturally looking for this Promised One among the Divines, yet His marvelous discourses astonished the wise and learned, and they who were pure in heart saw in Him the fulfillment of their hopes. Bahá’u’lláh well prepared the people for the coming of the Great Event, namely, His Declaration, which took place in the Garden of the Ridván, outside the City of Bagdad. During twelve days He made His mission known to His disciples, and inasmuch as this great event occurred in the Garden of the Ridván, the greatest of Bahá’í feasts is called after that garden in commemorating the twelve days. Briefly, after this He was exiled to Constantinople, Adrianople and then to ‘Akká, where he wrote and sent his tablets to the crowned heads of Europe.

A Talk with Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí who was eleven years imprisoned in Khartoum.

We believe in all the divine worlds; we are always together, for spiritual matters are eternal; there is no remoteness for it. At the time when he was young any one who would have called himself a believer would have been killed. One evening he was with an assembly in a garden. They were talking about the Holy Báb, and he said to the assembly that the Báb had made a mistake. If the Báb had not made this mistake his Cause would have made great progress. When asked what it was, He was not on friendly terms with the Governor of the nation. Then one who was present said, “This mistake has been made by all the Prophets, even Jesus Christ; Moses, the same.” Then I kneeled at his feet and knew he was a Bahá’í. But I did not tell him because I knew he would go away; therefore, I kept silent, but dealt with him in love and kindness. By and by when we became friends, he began to talk about the Prophets, and in the first talk he said, “The question you asked last night, how if Jesus Christ shed His blood for the sins of the people, then why should he come again?” All the people of the world have the power of rejection; as much as a man obeys and follows the instructions of the prophets, he is saved and delivered from sin. There is no love better or more perfect than to give one’s life; because Jesus Christ proved His teaching of the truth by shedding His blood, the people of the world believed in Him. When they believed, they obeyed; the more they obeyed, the more they were delivered from sin. This is the meaning of His words: “I shed my blood for the believers of the world.” The deliverance is only by following and obeying Him. Those who followed Him were saved. Christ said: “No one can follow me unless he take up his cross.” What does this mean? Christ appeared to show the way to the Kingdom, the path or the way He went was the nearest to the kingdom; no one is able to follow Christ entirely, except he give up all material things, such as honor, wealth, etc. Then Christ promised to the one who should follow in His way, that when He should sit on the right hand of His Father, this one who has obeyed Him, will come and sit by His side. And Christ said: “I have many things to tell you, but you cannot bear it now, {{p28}} howbeit when He the Spirit of Truth is come, He will guide you into all Truth.” Then every one who believes that Christ is truthful, and follows His commands, will attain to this great day, as you have already attained. A man once told him that every one in the world desires to be honored. It is impossible that a man should do a good work and say, “This was done by another one.” Everyone has power according to his knowledge. For instance, a man who knows English perfectly can say, “I know English perfectly well,” but the one who does not know it is afraid to say he knows it perfectly well. Christ was not a learned man outwardly, and had no relation to any of the kings. He was not a rich man; He had no soldiers. He came and said: “I am the Promised One in your books.” This statement of Christ was contrary to all the beliefs of the people at that time. Notwithstanding all this, He spread His teachings. This same power we realize today. It has appeared a hundred-fold greater and more powerful. Therefore we believe the Father has come. People often asked Christ about His mission, or claim; but He did not answer. They asked: “Where do you get the power to do such miracles?” And He answered them, saying: “Was John a prophet?” The people did not answer. Then He said: “Because you do not answer Me, I cannot answer you.” A few days before His crucifixion He asked His disciples: “What do the people say concerning me?” They said: “Some say you are John, some say, a prophet, and some say, Elias.” Then Christ asked, “What do you say?” They answered: “You are the Promised One, in the Book.” Christ said, “You are right, but don’t say this to any one.” While today Bahá’u’lláh sent Tablets to the crowned heads of the world, telling them openly, “I am the Father.” Then they exiled and banished Him to ‘Akká, so that no one could meet or have communication with Him. But He spread His teachings and instructions while in prison. Is this power stronger than Christ, or not? {{p29}}

Nov. 12th, 1908., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Morning.

Be ye not grieved or sorrowful that no great wealth or property has been bestowed upon you. Look at the birds! The first thing in the morning they are very thirsty and hungry. They go to the spring, and a few drops quench their thirst; then they pick up a few seeds and are perfectly satisfied and sit upon the branches and sing the praises of God. I hope you, too, will be satisfied.

Christ says that we are like the birds. The birds have habits; one is that they are satisfied with a few grains; they have neither property nor possessions; and they are most of the time on the branches of the trees, singing their beautiful melodies. Now you should be satisfied with few worldly things, and spend most of the time in spreading the truths of the Word of God I hope while you are here you will become so filled with the love of God, and so satisfied that you will give to all a share. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá then suddenly spoke to Mrs. Finch, and said: “Can’t you influence your daughter to be a believer?” “I have tried, but she says she is not ready yet. She is surrounded by worldly things.” He said: “She can be in the world and still be a firm believer. She will become a very beautiful believer. You will help her. “ “Since coming away my husband and son have announced that they were believers; it has made me very happy.” “You will find a very happy household when you return; great rejoicing.” {{p30}}

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Noon Meal.

(A picture of Jacob wrestling with the Angel had been submitted for an explanation.) The word Angel referred to in any of the Holy books does not refer to physical bodies descending from Heaven. Angel has two meanings. One is Divine Confirmation, which has been metaphorically called Angel; hence, when the word Angel is used, Divine Forces and Confirmations are meant. The second is the following: Angels refer to human souls imbued with Divine attributes and Heavenly characteristics. They are the souls of whom the Lord has said: “We shall make men after Our likeness and image;” the purpose of the image or likeness is Divine attributes. For though outwardly of the earth, earthly, yet in reality they are of Heaven; although they are human, they are not accounted of the human, they are the Heavenly Angels, the radiant lamps, the Heavenly stars. Their Temple, or body, holds the station of the shell, while their spirits are like the pearl within. The body is like the rind, the spirit is like the kernel. The body is like the glass chimney on the lamp while the spirit is the light within. The glass is dark, and does not give light of itself, but inasmuch as the light has illuminated it, it has become an instrument of illumination. Angels referred to have earthly bodies, yet their characteristics are Heavenly, therefore they are interpreted as Angels. And His Holiness, Jacob, because of having received Heavenly confirmations, with all his power held on to that force and power. For some souls receive confirmations, but they do not appreciate it. A child receiving a priceless gem, not knowing its value, will throw it aside, or another will sell his precious stone for a very small amount. But His Holiness, Jacob, was not thus. His Holiness, Jacob, did know its value. He held on to the Hem (the Heavenly attributes), as depicted in the picture referred {{p30}}

Munírih Khánúm. The words Love and Unity have been more dwelt upon in the writings of Bahá’u’lláh than by any other prophet. In the Book of the Covenant it is noted most especially. In this tablet he says: “O, people of the world, I hope you will hold to the principles which will uphold your station.” The station of man is great if he be true to himself, and live up to it. If the friends live up to the teachings of the two pages of the Covenant, it will be sufficient.

Badi‘ the Wonderful. The Martyr. A certain man who was present when Badi‘ was told he should carry the message to the king, saw him transfigured; he became radiant. Many kings and others will envy this youth his station. The subject of the Covenant is a very important one. It is referred to in all the Holy Books; in the Brahmanist in the Zoroastrian, and more clearly found in the Old and New Testament of the Gospels and of the Qur‘án. These Covenants referred to in the Holy books, focalize in the Great Covenant of the Bahá‘í Dispensation, namely the Covenant witnessed by Bahá‘u‘lláh in His day. How have the Covenants become manifest in the days of Bahá‘u‘lláh? To illustrate this we will say that just as a certain tree, even before it bears its particular fruit, is known by its former fruit, that it is an apple or a pear, or some other fruit, and when that special fruit appears on its branch it witnesses thereto. {{p32}} Likewise the Covenants taken in former ages were identified by the one established in the Great Day of Bahá‘u‘lláh. Hence Bahá‘u‘lláh was the witness of the Covenants given in former ages by the Lord. The center of these Covenants entered into by the people of former ages with the God of Might and Power and witnessed by Bahá‘u‘lláh, is the beloved ‘Abdu‘l-Bahá. Therefore all the former statements pertaining to the Covenant including the emphatic utterances of the blessed witness, refer to the center, namely ‘Abdu‘l-Bahá. All references to the Testament of Covenant mean especially the Book of the Covenant. In this His last book, the blessed Bahá‘u‘lláh has covenanted with His branches (agsán), twigs (afnán), and the relatives, as well as all the Bahá‘ís in the world, that they must turn to the One “Whom God has willed,” that is the Center of the Covenant, ‘Abdu‘l-Bahá. This is the meaning of the Mystery of God, according to the terminology of the One who has given the Mystery of God, or He Whom God has willed; but Who, according to Himself, is known as ‘Abdu‘l-Bahá (The servant of God). He whom God has willed is the fruit of the tree. Hence Bahá‘u‘lláh is the Trunk, the branches, the root, all except the fruit, which is ‘Abdu‘l-Bahá. The coloring, the shape, the form, taste and all the attributes of the tree are in the fruit. Hence, the teachings of Bahá‘u‘lláh, the bounties of Bahá‘u‘lláh, the Manifestation of His power, His words, have been spread throughout the world by this Great Soul. The effects of His words have been realized from this Great Life. This is the meaning of the statement of Jesus Christ: “I shall come in the Glory of My Father!” {{p33}}

‘Abdu‘l-Bahá. Evening Meal. We should seek the Heavenly Kingdom. The earthly Presidency returns to dust, but the Heavenly Sovereignty is everlasting. On the material plane even a goat may become a leader and all the rest of the goats will follow him. A herd of cows, treading their way home, has a leaders and the leader is very proud, holding his head high and tossing it from side to side. But the Heavenly Sovereignty is like the Sun when all the satellites of the Solar System revolve around it. To all of them the Sun gives light, and is eternal. Both the sovereign and the citizen receive bounty. The physical or natural leader of the people is selected by the people, but the Heavenly Leader is selected by the Lord. A material leader, if a king, is mighty by the sword, and if a president, is powerful by the consensus of opinion. The Heavenly Ruler is mighty through Divine Bounty, and the election of the Holy Spirit, and through the Power of the Love of God. The organizer of earthly sovereignty is a domineering, subjugating power, while the organizer of the Eternal Sovereignty is the Love Power. The worldly sovereignty is effaced by a handful of dust, but a Divine and Heavenly Sovereignty is everlasting, effective, through the ages. The earthly sovereignty destroys many souls in the process of its organization, while the Spiritual Sovereignty bestows life in the process of its organization. Therefore, alas for the souls who do away with themselves for earthly sovereignty! {{p34}}

The only claim of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the Station {{p22}} of Servitude. As to His personality, He commands us to see the Light, not the Lamp.

Nov. 13, 1908.

This morning we were told that the pictures of the Glorious Ones of God would be shown to us. And about ten o’clock we were called by Dr. Amen U. Farid to see them. As we came to the door of the room in which they are kept as the most sacred possessions of the Holy Household, we were all impelled to remove our shoes before crossing the threshold. Approaching the pictured faces in reverent awe, we were anointed by Bahíyyih Khánum (the sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá), and as we knelt before the majestic likeness of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, and that of the Báb, we were unable to speak.

Afternoon.

Mírzá Asadu’lláh. We have become disciples, because we receive the Word direct from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. In order to make the matter easy of comprehension, we will make the following statement. We can realize the value of present events by comparison with those which have occurred in the past. Comparison is certainly a method of science established for the purpose of facilitating the understanding of things. The past foretells the future. Let us then consider the occurrences of the Christian Dispensation. We note that the Apostles of Jesus Christ have become immortal through their connection with the life of the Good Master. For example, the Apostle Paul has given us an account of the doings of his fellow disciples, and their bearing upon the Christian Life in his book called “The Acts of the Apostles.” Because that work was written by him, whenever you open it, or listen to its perusal, you cannot but remember him; therefore you can say he is present and talking to you — face to face — and the same speaking from behind the veil or curtain. The speaker is the same. So it is the Apostle Paul talking to you through his writings. In a nearer and clearer sense the Apostles have become immortal; they are intermediaries, or narrators. {{p35}}

Nov. 13th.

This afternoon, in company with Munírih Khánum, wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Diya Khánum, and her little son, and Dr. Amen U. Farid, we pilgrims were permitted the privilege of visiting the Ridván, the Island Garden of Bahá'u'lláh, in which are the two mulberry trees and the rivers on either side of the garden, made mention of in the Holy Books. The seat over the river, which had in times past been a favorite resting place of Bahá'u'lláh, was pointed out to us; upon it was standing some potted plants, so placed as to guard it that others may not sit upon it. We then walked leisurely around the garden, noting the profusion of flowers, considering the lateness of the season; in the garden are growing pomegranates, oranges, lemons, dates and many shrubs and flowering plants unknown to us; and also many flowers in bloom, and traces of others that seemed like old acquaintances. In a little while we came to the other end of the garden where there is a house. In one of its rooms Bahá'u'lláh used to rest; in a far corner a chair was standing and flowers were upon it; we shared together these flowers. We then returned to the starting point, where preparation had been made to serve tea. While the tea was brewing, we ate some delicious pomegranates, and then, to the accompaniment of music of waters from the fountain, and the gentle flow of the river, we talked upon spiritual life, and we pilgrim gave some of our personal experiences on the Cause. We remained in this sacred spot about an hour; then were conducted through some quite extensive vegetable gardens, purchased by some believers for the use of the Household. Then we entered the carriage of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in which we came to the gardens, and were once more taken to the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. We very earnestly desired this great privilege, but could not have anticipated or expected sufficient time to see it again; but so it was. On our way to the tomb we passed many venerable pilgrims coming from the same sacred spot. We ran to {{p36}} shake hands with them; we knew they were our friends though we could pronounce but few of their names, and they came from many parts, yet the light of Bahá shone in their faces. Soon we came to the house where the remains of the earthly tenement of Bahá'u'lláh lies, and where the Spiritual Power, Great and Mighty, also is felt, impressive and real. We entered from another side to that used when first we visited it. Munírih Khánum chanted a prayer in her own tongue, and we all felt that the hallowed, saintly words were said in our behalf. We knelt and prayed once more at the Throne of Grace for pardon and help, and did our feeble best for our friends and the believers in America. Then we were served tea, and after a little loving conversation with the faithful care-takers of the tomb, we silently entered the carriage, and were taken home to 'Akká.

Through the Maidservant of God! Miss Alma Knobloch,

To the beloved ones of God! Upon them be Bahá'u'lláh! {.greet}

HE IS GOD! {.sit}

O ye Daughters and Sons of the Kingdom! When the proclamation of God was exalted and spread in the East and the West and the souls became attracted to the Words of God, and heard the call with perfect devotion, joy, happiness and gladness, all the veils of doubt were torn and they were saved from imitating their fathers and ancestors; they beheld with their own eyes, and not through those of others; they heard with their own ears, and not through the ears of others, and they comprehended with their own minds, and not through the minds of others. Such souls were the Lovers of Light, and when they beheld the Morn of Reality and the Light {{p37}} of the Divine Sun, they became attracted, enkindled and believed in the Kingdom of God. They became the receivers of Benevolence and the manifestors of Light, because of the Rising Point of the Mysteries. They chanted the Verses of Righteousness, and turned unto the Kingdom of Abhá. Blessed are such souls who have recognized the Promised Beauty and have entered under the shadow of the Lord of Hosts. Such souls are today the Army of Salvation, they are the Hosts of Light, they are occupied with Heavenly Victories in the East and West, and are engaged in dominating the hearts in Asia and America. At every moment they receive assistance from the Kingdom of Abhá, and every day an Army will descend to them from the Supreme Concourse; this is why you see that when a single person will reach a country or city and begin to teach, he will at once see his words having great effect in the Holy Souls and the light of assurance and belief will shine in splendor. The call of the Kingdom is like a spirit; it produces sudden effect in the nerves, arteries, hearts and souls and regenerates the people; baptizes them with Water, Spirit and Fire; the second Birth will be produced and new people will be raised; but other souls are like those whom Christ mentioned in the Gospels, saying that they have hearts but do not comprehend, and I cured them. In short, I say that these souls were awakened and quickened by the Proclamation of God, but the others are still in ignorance, doubtful and deprived from the Sea of Life, and are deprived of the Benevolence of the Lord of Signs, have become share less from the Heavenly Beauties, portionless and remote of Heavenly blessings; they have soiled themselves with the things of this perishable world and neglected the Everlasting World and Eternal Life. They satisfied themselves with a drop and became share less from the waves of the Sea; they attracted their hearts to a ray of the sun and became remote and indifferent to the Sun of Reality. {{p38}}

It is a source of great regret that a man in this enlightened age and Divine century will become deprived from the Heavenly blessings. If a tree will not become fertile and green through these Life-giving Breezes of the Spring Season, and will not bring forth blossoms and fruit and leaves, then in what season may it become verdant and fertile and at what time will it bear fruit? Be assured, it will be forever and ever deprived and for all eternity hopeless. Now you ought to give thanks to God that you have attained to a share of the effulgence of the Sun of Reality and have had a portion from the Heavenly Grace. Having heard the Call of God, you have attained to Life through the Breezes of the Holy Spirit, and have entered into the Eternal World and received Everlasting Mercy. You have attained to such favors that you are able to shine forever, like unto the Morning Star, through Centuries and Ages. Like the Life-giving Breezes of the Paradise of Abhá, you will become the cause of Eternal Life for many people. Upon ye be Bahá-El-Abhá.

A VISITING TABLET.

Translated by Munírih Khánum. ‘Akká, Syria, November 12th, 1908.

Revealed during our stay in that Sacred Place. {{p39}} {ed}

The following is written by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s hand:

“The Believers in that City in which the Maid-Servant is buried, must all go to her Tomb and read this Visiting Tablet.

(Signed) ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS.” {sig}

Through His Honor Mírzá Aḥmad: {greet}

Visiting Tablet. Revealed for the Attracted Maid-Servant of God. Mrs. Amalie Knobloch, who has Ascended to the Kingdom of God! {greet}

HE IS GOD! {sit}

O, thou Pure Spirit, Amalie Knobloch! Although thou didst soar away from this terrestrial world, yet thou didst enter into the immeasurable, illumined Universe of the Almighty. While in this life thou didst hear the Divine Call, beheld the light of Truth, became alive by the Breaths of the Holy Spirit, tasted the sweetness of the Love of God, became the Maid-Servant of the Lord of Hosts and the object of the Bounties of His Highness the Desired one. Thou didst lead the erring ones into the {{p40}} Path of Truth and bestowed a portion of the Heavenly Food to those who are deprived. Thou didst consecrate the days of thy existence to the Service of His Highness the Clement and spent thy time in the diffusion of the Fragrances of the Paradise of Abhá. There are many souls perfumed and many spirits illumined through thy services! O, thou divine, beloved Maid-Servant! Although thou didst disappear from the mortal eyes, yet thou didst train and educate thy daughters, each of whom has arisen to serve the Kingdom like unto thee and is engaged in the guidance of souls. In the Assembly of wisdom they are the lighted candles; they sacrifice their lives in the Path of God; they are gardening in thy orchard and irrigating thy rose-garden. Happy is thy condition, for thou art enjoying Eternal Life in the Kingdom of Everlasting Glory and hast left in this world kind and loving Remembrances. Happy are those souls who visit thy luminous resting place and through thy commemoration receive and acquire spiritual Powers.

Alma and Fanny Pilgrimage

Alma Knobloch, Fanny Knobloch

Pilgrimage for a Bahá'í means making a special trip to the Holy Land, Haifa and 'Akká Israel, to the World Center of the Bahá'í Faith. Today when one goes on Pilgrimage, one spends nine days visiting all the burial sites called shrines and are considered very holy and sacred places. At present, one can visit the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, enshrined in the Mansion of Bahjí in 'Akká. One also visits the Prison in 'Akká, where Bahá'u'lláh spent two years living in a cell with many other members of His family. One also visits the beautifully domed Shrine of the Báb, which illumines the slopes of Mt. Carmel, the Holy Mountain of God. The administrative buildings that house the Universal House of Justice, the supreme administrative body of the Bahá'ís of the world and The International Teaching Center are also found within an Arc on the side of that Holy Mountain. Another very special part of a Bahá'í Pilgrimage is a visit to the Archives Building which houses many wonderful artifacts and belongings of the Holy Family and the original Writings of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, as well as the Guardian of the Faith, Shoghi Effendi. It is a sacred duty of all Bahá'ís to, if at all possible, visit these sites and make a pilgrimage at least once in their lifetime.

At the turn of the century, pilgrimages were obviously quite different than they are today. Without the modern conveniences of air travel and bus rides, the trip was extremely more cumbersome. Many accounts of early pilgrimages tell of exhausting and sometimes dangerous voyages on steamships, followed by days of further travel over dusty roads. In order to go to 'Akká to meet the Master, one had to first obtain permission to go, which is not unlike today. In those days and for many years hence, the pilgrims were met by some Persian friends and escorted to the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, where they could stay. They would usually first meet with members of the Holy Family, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wife or daughters, who would prepare them for their visit.

Today one must make his or her own way to Haifa and there are staff members who meet with large groups of pilgrims for an orientation after one has registered. The groups that went on such visits in those days were quite small and had a very intimate audience with 'Abdu'l-Bahá himself. They developed relationships with members of The Holy Family that often lasted a lifetime. 'Abdu'l-Bahá took great care to nurture and instruct these early believers so that they would return to Europe and America and spread the teachings in a way that would further the aims of His Father's Cause. Today the Universal House of Justice members meet with the whole group of pilgrims at one great meeting, but make an effort to personally greet each pilgrim with a handshake. They also have speakers who give talks on pertinent topics, in hopes that they will inspire the friends to go home and spread the Word. Another big difference is that most of the buildings one now visits were not in existence at that time. Then the pilgrims mostly went to 'Akká where 'Abdu'l-Bahá was still a prisoner and was not allowed to go far from the city. Pilgrims actually stayed in the same home where the Holy Family lived and to some extent suffered the same hardships. Today we have beautiful buildings to visit and to comfort the travelers. In either case, today or in years past, the spiritual benefits of such an experience far out-weigh any sacrifices one would encounter to complete such an endeavor.

From November 7 to 13, 1908 Fanny Knobloch along with her sister, Alma Knobloch and a good friend, Ida A. Finch (who was the daughter of the Phelps family that had been a part of their Bahá'í circle of friends from the beginning) were blessed to take part in one of these early pilgrimages. Originally their tickets had been intended for Pauline and Joseph, but because of the passing of their mother Amalie in 1908, the Hannens decided to give the tickets to Fanny and Mrs. Finch and postpone their visit for another year. Alma was already living in Germany at the time, so Fanny met her in Naples along the way. They also felt that it might help Alma to ease the pain of losing her mother, if she could spend some time with her sister Fanny and of course be with her Beloved Master.

The following account which Alma wrote later in her life has wonderful expressions of her feelings of expectation about meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Holy Family. It includes some of her preparations and a glimpse of the trip from Germany to 'Akká as well as many heartwarming stories of their times with 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the women of the Holy family.

While at Leipzig a letter coming from Fanny was received telling that our mother had passed out [died] & to meet her at Naples & join her and Mrs. Finch to visit the Beloved at 'Akká. I immediately started for Stuttgart, saw as many of the believers as possible, many petitions for 'Abdu'l-Bahá [were given], & in two days was on my way. Herr Eckstein & his sister accompanied me as far as Zurich & safely placed me on the train for Rome where I spent several most delightful days, reaching Naples a day before Fanny arrived. Here we stayed four days, taking several delightful trips of interest, of which Pompeii was one.

At last the time came to leave for Alexandria where we were met by believers who showed us so much affection and kindness simply because we were on our way to the Beloved Master. In two days our steamer left for Haifa, what joy and expectation, would we find all we expected? Our expectations were high – Perfections in a human body – His surroundings reflecting His Divinity, His followers super humans giving forth the Light & spreading the Fragrances of god's love. His family purified from all dust of the world, beautiful flowers in the Garden of the Abhá Kingdom. A heavenly Home of peace in a prison town, ‘Akká inhabited by only State prisoners of a very low life, surrounded by a high wall & soldiers guarding the entrance to the city gate. All these & many more, all of which had left their deep traces.

Reaching Haifa we were met by believers who showed the same loving kindness & giving forth the same beautiful heavenly light as the believers in Alexandria. We were made comfortable at the Hotel Carmel & later called for to visit some of the Daughters of the Master & His wife, the Holy Mother who was staying in Haifa at the time. Meeting these ladies showed clearly that true refinement consisted in purity of soul & heavenly sentiments & these ladies possessed all these qualities & more too. Real nobility & refinement, cleansed & of pure gold. The Holy Mother gave us helpful instructions & truly deserves the name “Brilliant Leaf”. One of her sayings is: “Be like a leaf that is blown by the breezes.” We met two of the Daughters, Zia & Rúhá & they fully came up to our expectations.

At last we were to start for ‘Akká. – One of the members of the Family had gone to ‘Akká to tell of our arrival & the Master sent for us. The Holy Mother & an old Persian believer who makes herself useful in the capacity of nurse & Rúhá’s little girl accompanied us on this most memorable visit. The Holy Mother telling us of her trip from Persia & her first trip to ‘Akká & being accepted in the Holy Family, & the wish of Bahá’u’lláh that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá should marry her & he finally consented being the wish of His Father.

This trip was very interesting, reaching ‘Akká just at sunset. Shortly before reaching the City Gate, a caravan of camel drivers with a number of camels had settled down for the night & the men in their accustomed religious devotions a most picturesque sight. We had passed several trails of camels leaving for the desert packed with merchandise, disappearing between date palms. Reaching the city Gate of ‘Akká, which [was] guarded by soldiers, & asked something of the men who were driving our carriage. They answered in reply, “‘Abbás Effendi” – & and we drove through the gate into that ancient city. Such narrow streets – the men stood close up to the calls & crevices of the old buildings as our carriage drove through & entered into the court yard of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, a large two story square building, porticoes all around the second story where the ladies apartments are.

We ascended the long flight of steps & were greeted by Munavvar, the youngest daughter of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá who took us to our rooms & saw that we were comfortable. Supper was served & we were told that the Master regretted not to be present at our arrival, but had an appointment with the Governor & would see us in the morning. Everything seemed most interesting & marvelous, but the keynote of our expectations was the meeting of our Beloved; would He come up to our expectations? – We had heard such wondrous & marvelous things about Him & we had placed Him high, very high on a pedestal! We arose very early & Fanny said, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá it is said walks on the roof, perhaps we will see Him.

At last we were called to the living room where the family gather in the morning, & tea is served, & prayers chanted, a heaven of peace, birds flying in & out, children of the Holy Household permitted to come in at will & leave when they felt inclined – We suddenly heard quick decided firm steps, it gave a thrill to all present – He entered the room & it was as though a darkened place had been suddenly flooded with light & perfuming fresh air – we three pilgrims arose – Fanny was the first to rush up & the most harmonious clear voice rang through the place, “ Welcome! Welcome! How are you! Are you well? Did you have a pleasant journey?” Mrs. Finch then stepped up & extended her hand & received equally the same hearty welcome. Then my turn, advancing & ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave the warm hearty, “Welcome! Welcome!” One felt an overwhelming power of Majesty & dignity – love & authoritiveness. There was no trace of doubt but that we had found our Lord & for Him we were ready at all times to give up life, soul & spirit – we had reached our goal – Heaven.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá took His accustomed seat in the corner having asked us to be seated. [I] well remember watching who would take the seat next to Him. Mrs. Finch sat down, then Fanny & I next to her – ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s personality seemed much too powerful, a search light beyond this world, & in whose presence one felt secure & sublimely happy, never had we thought [it could] be possible to attain to such real pure happiness, neither here or hereafter. It was all far beyond our highest expectations, it was beyond our comprehension & understanding. Our visions became clearer, our thoughts brighter, our feeling keener – our sense of happiness greater & we had but one thought – to become empty vessels as to be able to receive a large portion of this Divine Out-pouring. We lifted into another world, receiving boundless blessings, at the same time realizing our responsibility.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá inquired about our journey, & health & if we had rested well – inquired about the different believers & our assemblies. Fanny was asked about the Washington Assembly & the different believers. He was pleased to hear that they were in perfect harmony & unity & received the loving greetings with real pleasure. Then He inquired about the believers in Seattle. Mrs. Finch said not all were in unity, some were. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied when you return they will be in perfect unity. Then He asked me how are the believers in Stuttgart? Are they united? –My reply was that they were in perfect unity & love, they send their heartfelt love & greetings. They were very grateful for the Teachings & always had a good attendance at the weekly meetings, many group meetings were held in which the friends translate the Holy Utterances of Bahá’u’lláh & ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Also [there is] a group weekly meeting at Esslingen & Zuffenhausen.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said He had made a program for every hour of our stay. The ladies of the Household sat along one side of the room on the divan. An old venerable Persian member of the family chanted prayers & an old believer from Persia sat on the floor & served the tea from a large samovar. Birds [were] flying in through the windows & hopping on the floor picking up the grains of sugar. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had some Tablets which He looked over & corrected.

We returned to our rooms & breakfast was served in the dining room. A Chinese served the meals. The ladies called on us & assured us of their love & delight that we had come that great distance, the Holy Mother expressed her great regret not to be able to talk in our language & told of some of their experiences during their prison life in 'Akká. Monavvar translated.

Dinner was served at noon courses. Mírzá Munír Zein translated for the Master. All showed the highest respect & veneration. Fanny sat at the head of the table & Mrs. Finch on the other side of me. The Persians that took meals with us were His secretaries & distinguished guests. In the afternoon some of the old Persian believers called, telling of their life in the service of Bahá'u'lláh. During our stay there were several groups, mostly of 9 venerable old teachers who had served Bahá'u'lláh & who gave brilliant accounts of their experiences, how they had been put in prison – tortured, their eyes sparkling with mirth & telling jokes to one another, also showing the marks on their necks- remnants of torture or from the heavy iron chains that were placed around their necks & ankles with large heavy iron balls. Oftimes three were chained, placed together. Whenever one moved the other was made uncomfortable when lying down or trying to sleep each turn of the body of one or the other discomfort the other.

In the morning when we met in the living room, 'Abdu'l-Bahá greeted us & inquired of our health. He told me that He had revealed a Tablet for me. I gave Him a photograph of Herr & Frau von K, she had asked me to beg 'Abdu'l-Bahá that she might be able to meet people who would become attracted to the Cause. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that in this age it will be the women that will establish the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. He told us that in some Religions it is taught that after death we enter into a place of purification called Purgatory where souls are cleansed so as to make spiritual advancements. So too our stay here is a preparatory place, & He hopes each day we will make progress, as a gardener cares for his plants, or the doctor looks after his patients & is pleased to see the progress & advancement, as a loving father who cares for his family & looks after their welfare & is happy to see their development, so He too hopes we will make daily progress & attain spiritual capacity & make wonderful progress. This is my hope. We strained every nerve so as not to be a disappointment, knowing & fully realizing now that every thought is registered we could control our words, but had to learn to control our thoughts also.

In the morning in between the group callers, Shoghi & his little sister called, later Shoghi called alone bringing his slate & pencil. Fanny & Mrs. Finch were busy with their writings & I did my best to entertain the little visitor of about 9 years old. He would hand me his slate & say Spinglish. The letters did not please him & were quickly wiped away, numbers also – still he came and would bring his slate & hand it to me. At last [I] was able to amuse him by drawing sketches. The sun – moon – that he left on his slate, then a farm house, trees, bushes & chickens & a little boy trying to catch the chicken by the tail feathers – He placed his hand over his mouth & shook with laughter. These were not erased.

One morning while kneeling on the floor beside him Shoghi seated on the chair at the table with his slate in front of him, the door opened & there stood our Beloved Master. I quickly arose, feeling a little embarrassed. He gave a sign of pleasure & withdrew. In the morning, when we were in the living room, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá correcting some Tablets, the old Persian had chanted & we were drinking our tea. Shoghi came in & walked up to the Master & showed Him his slate & pointed to me – all smiles – he was pleased, but I did not feel as though I had done my best & felt rather ashamed at the poorly designs. There was some lesson to learn in this, which became a little clear after the Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá & Shoghi Effendi was appointed Guardian of the Cause.

One morning Shoghi & his sister came & we were just about finished with breakfast, & not using sugar. I gave them both a piece of sugar, Shoghi refused but the little girl took it, Shoghi talked to her, but the more he talked the tighter she held it. He became very earnest & finally she slowly laid the sugar and the table. Fanny asked their nurse about it & she said they had been told not to accept anything from the Pilgrims, so Shoghi was doing as instructed. Obedience.

One meal was especially enjoyed because Munavvar & her cousin, the young man who took care of the Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh, who had brought us some flowers. Munavvar translated, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed great pleasure & enjoyment. The cousin Afnán told of the severe times they had when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was expected to be taken away at any time. He was attending the American College at Beirut & a ship was the Master away. Every morning the first thing was to see if the ship was still there & the last thing at night. The nervous strain was very great on the family during those days. Officers coming to the house at all times & inspecting everything, trying to find [something] to show up against Him. They asked the Master to sign a paper to make Him a perpetual prisoner. He told them if there was no here after they could, but ‘Abdu’l Harmud would experience that for the real life is Eternal.

When the officials returned to Constantinople, some were killed, others fled & ‘Abdu’l Harmud was banished & the Young Turks set up the new government. It was shortly after we left ‘Akká that all the state prisoners were given freedom. This recalled my first prayer vision when coming into the Cause.

The visit to the Garden of Ridván was greatly enjoyed. The Holy Mother & Munavvar & also Dr. Faríd went with us. They took refreshments along & we had tea in the garden. What a glorious spot – such brilliancy of colors & variety of flowers & trees which gave refreshing shade & fruits. The fountain in the center with its four streams paved with white marble. A plant, on the bench marked the place. Also in the garden house the chair on which Bahá’u’lláh used to sit Casmin had flowers on it – such deep reverence was shown to everything connected with Bahá’u’lláh & the Master. The old gardener Casmin took such delight in showing us about & telling of the early days, when magnificent Mulberry trees are most significant, the two trees have grown into each other that one can scarcely see where the branch extends out, or in which one it has grown in, making “the canopy made without hands.” And the “Temple made without hands.” We were given flowers & fruits & leaves, the ladies told many interesting accounts concerning this garden during the early days.

There is a large truck garden adjoining the Riḍván garden – acres and acres of vegetables which are used by the Master & in His extensive household & much of it is sent to Damascus to market.

Driving over to the Shrine of the Bahá’u’lláh we passed Napoleon’s Hill from where Napoleon surveyed saying, “If it were not for this hill of sand (‘Akká) I would conquer the world.” ‘Akká did not surrender & he was compelled to retreat.

Our visit to this Shrine is far beyond words. We were received in the living room of some of the relations & tea was served. Then we passed through a court garden & entered the Shrine. It would have been needless to tell us where we were – & that it was customary to remove one’s shoes – We knew we had entered sacred grounds. We knelt down near the door & supplicated as never before for all our dear ones. The Holy Mother chanted a prayer which seemed as though heaven had opened & we heard the celestial Angels lifting us from this earth, up to a higher plane – overwhelmed by this wonderful, spiritual atmosphere. A magnificent Persian rug covered the Center of the floor around which stood different colored lamps & vases which are used at special celebrations, also beautiful candle holders.

Fanny asked to return & pray for her dear ones & I returned with her, this time only venturing to the door step. These penetrating spiritual forces must certainly vivify the souls & rejuvenate the spirit. On our way there we met some of the Persian pilgrims & Ibn Abhár gave us some of his flowers he had brought from the Holy Shrine & saved some for the Master.

On our return entering the gate of ‘Akká, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in the street & some of His disciples so it looked, stood a respectful distance. This impressive picture is indelibly inscribed upon my memory, never to be forgotten, the Majestic Royal Figure. His attitude showing His respect to the Ladies that spoke far more than words can express, and we fully appreciated having had the honor of visiting the Garden of Riḍván & the Holy Shrine with the Ladies of the Holy Household. The Ladies of the Center of the Covenant.

All three of us were overwhelmed from our afternoon’s experiences. No one spoke a word. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá excused Himself for supper, had an appointment & I for my part felt relieved & grateful, could not have stood any more of spiritual food, for we received both at table. There was a large floral center piece that had been sent to the Master. We were very quiet & soon retired, each meditating over their experiences of the day, & fully realizing that we had been placed into an entirely different environment.

The following morning in the living room when the Master greeted us [He] said, “I will reveal a Tablet for your mother through which she will be remembered throughout eternity.”

Each day was filled – different groups of Persian teachers called & gave talks on various topics, of which we took notes. Fanny & I occupied the corner room from which was a splendid view in the garden below, from where we heard ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s marvelous clear voice, speaking to the men pilgrims in His summer house. Formerly he had a tent but the inhabitants kept borrowing them & always forgot to return them, so the believers built this little arbor like house. From the other window there was a fine view on the sea. We could hear the call for prayer from the minaret, everything so harmonious & peaceful, a quietness that was restful & pureness of air, & atmosphere, no unkind thoughts ever entered the minds of the inhabitants in this home. A Heavenly Home that has been established fulfilling the prophs [sic-maybe fulfilling the proofs]. The talks ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave us at mealtime were answers to some of our questions without asking – some thoughts we perhaps had years ago.

One morning the Master told me that he would have my Tablet translated & I was happy. He also revealed another Tablet for me & had copies made of several Tablets to German believers, this was given me in a book form. He also told us that the believers in ‘Akká / Haifa were excited over the fact that the teacher from Germany was here. During the visit of one of the group visitors of Persian teachers, one of them asked, which one is the German teacher? Hígra ‘Alí [sic] to me said, “This one – she is so quiet.”

In one of the groups there was an exceptionally fine young Jewish man from Ḥamídan, Persia, who took great delight in telling us of his home, & the progress of the Cause there, his face aglow with the light of the Abhá Kingdom.

The visits of the ladies were heavenly, telling of their life & relating experiences, especially with the missionaries in ‘Akká, how they tried to win them over to their Faith. The Greatest Holy Leaf did not talk as much as the others. Rúḥá Khánúm said several times that she wished she could go out into the world & teach as we can.

One afternoon they dressed me up in a dress from one of the pilgrims from India. Early in the morning we heard a faint noise at our door & were told it was Shoghi’s little sister, with a dust pan & brush. She too wished to do something for the guests. Everything was done with such perfect ease, no rush & hurrying or excitement. Everything was done in most perfect manner, all without modern improvements & there were always so many guests.

Fanny several times asked if she could entertain the Ladies in any way, feeling so sorry that they were housed up & had no changes. So one afternoon Dr. Faríd came to us & said the Ladies would be pleased to have us spend a time with them in their apartment – the Greatest Holy Leaf’s room – We were delighted to accept the invitation. We were shown things of great interest -& then Dr. Faríd asked Fanny to show the ladies how they danced in America. She quietly responded. This looked so utterly out of place that I laughed very heartily. Finally one of the daughters said, “It seems to amuse you more than it does us.” Then we were asked to sing some popular (American) songs & also German songs. Fanny also sang a Danish song & we also sang some of the colored plantation songs.

The following afternoon we were shown the pictures of Bahá'u'lláh & the Báb by the Greatest Holy Leaf & we knew by this that our visit was drawing to an end. The Photo of Bahá'u'lláh, which is framed in an exquisite filigree silver frame is a most wonderful Face. It is fascinating – one looks and looks – finding oneself gazing, one that which words fail to express – a most powerful, majestic – kingly countenance - one could not mistake an authoritative expression on One Who knew all that was, is & will be, peerless without equal. Single and alone in His own Identity.

There were several pictures of the Báb – a magnificent face, perfect in shape & lines. One who had been preordained for His mission. We lingered long & felt we were in a hallowed place & felt very humble & grateful. Every moment of our stay seemed valuable & we were trying to take in as much as it was possible to do, realizing that everything had its value & importance, something that was meant for a lesson for us. Naturally the strain was great, we were being remodeled. One day Fanny said, “Alma, we will not cry when we have to leave will we?” “No” I answered- “We will not cry. It makes the master feel badly.”

Casmin brought us flowers from the Riḍván garden, wrapped in cabbage leaves to keep them fresh. They were beautiful.

[I left out a paragraph which was crossed out.] {.ed}

The Greatest Holy Leaf gave each of us 9 pieces of candles which had been used in Bahá'u'lláh's Shrine, some of the sand in a white silk bag, & the Most Brilliant Leaf gave us a string of pearl bead prayer beads & a silk handkerchief that is used to tie over the head. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá presented each of us 5 stones with the Greatest Name. We felt intoxicated, experiencing so much love & kindness. It was almost more than we could bear, our cup was filled to overflowing.

The morning of our leaving, 9 of the women believers of ‘Akká came to bid us good-bye & said they would pray for our success & protection at the Holy Shrine & asked for our prayers. Fanny & Mrs. Finch were ready to leave – but I longed to remain – remain always, had found the real home – but we had been told that, the Master was closer to those on the front. A king is more interested in those soldiers in the fire line, than those near him. That oftentimes those far away are very close to the master & some of those who are near are very far from Him, that we were very fortunate to have been chosen to serve the Cause. Future generations will wish they could have been in our places & will esteem us.

Fanny and Mr. Faríd started down the stairs & I lingered talking to the women believers & again saying good-bye to the door which we had often passed. Both of them looked prostrated, leaning against the side of the door. I was motioned to step into the room – there was only ‘Abdu’l-Bahá & an old Persian believer – feeling that it was the proper thing to do to remove my shoes, which I could not at that time - standing by the door gazing, letting it sink deep in my soul – not a word was spoken, but the attitude of our Beloved Master implied all.

The carriage was waiting for us. We slowly drove out, looking back - & letting the transformed prison – now a paradise & heaven – its beautiful brilliant flowers and all, leave a lasting impression. The ladies on the upper balcony almost out of sight—still feeling their presence. The carriage rolled through the gate & through the narrow streets – so narrow that the men stood up close to the houses as we drove through here & there where a group of men smoking their long tube pipes in dood [?] ways, and then through the gate of the city hall. heart pained me – we were leaving the most precious place in the world. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had told us to visit Port Sa’íd, Alexandria, Cairo, Paris, London & Stuttgart – I was to return to Stuttgart & make that a strong Center. To tell the believers in Alexandria & Cairo that the light in us was His love to them. They had begged of us to ask the Master to come & visit them, & in reply He said So God Willeth.

Sayings – ‘Akká

“We were told to spread the Glad-tidings – if we knew the value of the time we would not walk, we would run.”

“Establish unity & love among the people.”

“You may visit other cities, but first establish the Cause in Stuttgart.”

Fanny asked, “Shall Alma return to Stuttgart” Answer – “Why not? She is confirmed there. A tree when planted must take root first before it can grow – A palm tree spreads its roots well underground, then it gives shade. One tree set ablaze will ignite a whole forest.”

When asked about marrying a certain man, the Master answered, “You may if you love him, but you do not have to. Bahá’u’lláh said it is well to marry. There is no compulsion.”

Oftimes He apologized saying that we did not have the comforts, everything was so different. He hoped we were happy.

“All three of you be like a lamp in an Assembly – be firm & steadfast. The victory will be yours in the end.”

“If anyone asks you where you have been say in ‘Akká.” He gave us three grape berries at Table & laid them on our plate saying, I planted them.

Haifa

We visited the Shrine of the Báb. Two of the daughters went with us. We rode in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s carriage quite some way, then we walked up the rough slope of Mt. Carmel on sharp small stones. After reaching the Shrine it well repaid us. The view over the sea & 'Akká is most inspiring. Also the splendid view of the German Colony, the main street running a direct line to the water edge from the Shrine & a well built cemented walk built for the Prince Fredrick who never came there. The light reflecting on the water perhaps is the cause that the city, 'Akká looks like a white city.

Long we lingered at this Holy Spot –Supplicating, walking about, & the Persian man & his wife showed us the building and served tea. Reluctantly we returned walking slowly down to the carriage. Each one [was] occupied with their thoughts –the present & future. The past has left its traces. The German colony gives proof of that, having settled there in 1868 from Stuttgart & vicinity. Hoffman & Saunders as leaders.

These two brothers had made their calculations, one by proof in the Bible & the other by mathematically, that the Lord would descend at Mt. Carmel. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "When they settled there the German people were pious & good, but their success in their business has made them haughty & [they] have lost their sincerity in their religion."

The houses had inscriptions above their doors, verses from the Bible. Der Herr kommt! Bereutet euch vor für Duss Herrn, and such. This well kept portion of Haifa, with its rows of trees giving shade & the neat looking houses, with lace curtains & flowers growing at their windows, was quite a contrast to the other part of Haifa, dirty, narrow streets. No sanitary observances. Dr. Farid told us that the sun shine acts as a disinfectant. It was embarrassing to walk along the streets & the stores were small & dark.

We were invited to dinner at the home of one of the daughters, & spent an afternoon in the Persian Colony. Our visit had come to an end, far surpassed our highest expectation in every way. Our only thoughts that troubled us was would we be able to show our gratitude as we should! Will we be strong enough to carry out what is expected of us – much we received, & much will be expected.

The steamer we took for Port Sa'íd was a Turkish ship, but an English mail steamer, with many European tourists, some of them having taken the trip several times, wishing to land to visit Jerusalem, but unfavorable weather prevented them from landing, which they had expected to do at Jaffa. Passing Jaffa & watching the row boats coming to get the mail, the steamer had anchored , it recalled our experience on the steamer going to Haifa. There were several Pastors and Rabbis on deck with their note books in hand, asking a German lady just returning from Stuttgart, if it was really true that the German early settlers had come to this country with the expectation to await the return coming of the Lord? She said this was true for her parents had settled there for that purpose. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had told us that, "The German settlers thought that the Muḥammadans would not know Christ when He returns & so they would be there to take the leading positions." It was interesting to hear this lady tell about the early settlers & how they were disappointed that their calculations were not correct.

Later Fanny spoke to her & got more information. She asked where we were going & told, replied –"Have you no pastors in America that you take such a long tiring trip! WE said, "Oh yes, but there is no Teacher so Great in the world as 'Abbás Effendi." She begged Fanny to call on her on her return & tell her all about our Master. Her husband had a drugstore in Jaffa & there were many Germans living there, having had results & great financial success with their agricultural efforts.

Mr. Saunders having separated from Hoffman settled in Jerusalem & started a German settlement there. At the time of the World War there were seven prosperous German settlements in that part of Syria, under the Turkish Government.

We reached Port Sa'íd & were greeted & welcomed by Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí & in his store met Taqí Manshaki, a Persian with very dark skin, who told us that some of the people say it is strange how a beautiful fair lady like Lua Getsinger could have such a black child! I told him I too had some very dark skinned, large children. [I assume she means spiritual children.] Aḥmad Yazdí spoke of Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, that he was not at all good looking, but everyone loved & esteemed him. We told him that we would be very happy to have the great pleasure to see him while in Cairo. It was marvelous to see their faces, reflecting that beautiful divine light & love. Aḥmad Yazdí & some of the believers saw that we were comfortable on the train that took us to Cairo, with some directions & messages.

We were swiftly being taken through an old fruitful country with strange customs. Everywhere there were signs of past glory & greatness. Egypt with its natural resources was not the Egypt of past centuries. Reaching Cairo, word had been sent that we were coming & received a hearty welcome. A meeting was arranged for the following afternoon & joy was great to meet our beloved Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl who came when he was told of our arrival, although he was ill in bed. He asked many questions about the Cause in America & the different believers. [He] Said he would like to answer their letters but was unable to do so. We gave the believers 'Abdu'l-Bahá's message – they all long to have Him come to Cairo. "The light in us is His love to them." It was interesting to watch their faces, as one after another brightened up & their eyes shone like stars. They comprehended—but we did not.

There was much of interest to be seen in Cairo, the Pyramids, Mosques – shops & such. Museums all showed of great culture & art & science. The different types of dress were of interest, although the ladies wore narrow veils, most from below their eyes, which at times disfigured them, one could plainly observe the exquisite beauty & handsome types of oriental women, for there were many types to be seen, magnificent clothing & jewels & elegant carriage & refined movements.

Watching the building of a new addition to the museum, large blocks of red sand stones, all drawn up by human power in unison giving a muttered sound & pulling ropes that seemed to be used in great profusion.

We stopped on the island Medina, crossing the Mediterranean Sea to Marsails. Medina has an imposing harbor & the castle on the hill gave a fine view of the surroundings. An old Catholic Church with fine mosaic & clothes from the Apostles carefully protected in glass cases, also a piece of wood from the Cross of Jesus Christ.

The women in were not of the quiet gentle type – we witnessed several quarrels where they caught each other by the hair & flashed small daggers in each other.

WE compared notes on the steamer & recalled special things of interest. Mrs. Finch said she wanted to ask in regard to healing but it was all answered clearly without [asking]. I too had wished to ask for blessing in healing if that would be of advantage in establishing the Cause, but did not need to question this subject. It was plainly made [clear] to us that teaching the Words of Bahá'u'lláh & 'Abdu'l-Bahá was the principal thing. Their Teachings are the healing of the nations. To devote all our time to teaching the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

Stopped a day in Zurich but failed to see the parties we were to deliver greetings, we hastened on our journey. How delightful it was to reach Stuttgart, the city that is destined to become a great center of Light for Europe, where the Bahá'í Center is to be established.

Although the trip was only of a few months in duration, there was much to be done to again reestablish the former method that had been sanctioned by the Master & again continue to promote the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh & teach His principles & discard the newly arranged group meeting by Mrs. Stanard. This brought about my first real hardships – but knowing that 'Abdu'l-Bahá's counsels were the only way to conquest, went steady onward. He had promised us victory at the end.

Fanny only stayed about a week with me in Stuttgart then they visited Paris & London as 'Abdu'l-Bahá had requested. It was not easy to stay & my sister returned home, rich with boundless blessings. For me serious hard work was ahead of me, felt strong & courageous to combat with most anything or anyone.

Meetings were again resumed as before leaving for 'Akká, study classes were again taken up with enthusiasm & translations of the Words of Bahá'u'lláh & 'Abdu'l-Bahá in groups which meet at various home of the believers were continued. Trips to many surrounding towns were made, Esslingen, Zuffenhausen, Fellbach, Heilbronn – returning for the public meetings & the special meetings for the translation of the Teachings. Great progress was made within a short time.<sup>1</sup>

Fanny also wrote a lengthy story about her trip to 'Akká, which included stories about her stops in Naples, Messina, Port Sa'id, Alexandria and finally 'Akká. Her version is slightly different and highlights the events and impressions that were significant to her. She wrote of three American ladies and one English architect who were the only ones on board the Italian ship who spoke English. She told of visiting an elaborately decorated church in Messina after seeing the poor and suffering beggars outside the church and comments, “Surely here was demonstrated the lesson of what happens when religion has become a mere matter of form and the Spirit of God is lost.”<sup>3</sup> She also told of how, because of the danger that existed for Bahá’ís in that region, the Bahá’ís who came to meet them in Alexandria had to whisper the Greatest Name to them so they would recognize them as Bahá’ís without making a scene or letting on that they were Bahá’ís. At each stop they were met by some local Bahá’ís who assisted and acted as hosts along the way. Finally, when they reached the Bay of ‘Akká she told a rather funny story of how they were assisted ashore.

Below us were large flat-bottomed boats – Orientals making much noise – men in some of the boats loading bags upon the backs of others to carry up on deck, others at the same time carrying quantities of freight down to boats below. These boats, because of rough water, were swaying and crashing against each other. Looking down upon this noisy, picturesque scene, we wondered how we, ourselves, would ever reach one of those boats. But there had been no need to worry, for suddenly a huge oriental unceremoniously grabbed us like a bag of meal, with our heads facing forward and bodies hanging, carried us down the steps between the freight carriers and dropped us into the arms of waiting boatmen. There were eleven men in the boat to row three little women with hand baggage to shore! Again, when landing at shore, we were picked up and carried in the same manner over a pile of coal. We heaved a sigh of relief when we felt the cobblestone of the road beneath our feet.<sup>2</sup>

The following are extracts from the more formal account of Alma, Mrs. Finch and Fanny’s pilgrimage called “Flowers Culled from the Rose Garden of ‘Akká”, which is available on line. The full account has about 18 pages of notes on almost everything ‘Abdu’l–Bahá and others said while they were in His presence. It was published into a little booklet upon their return and shared with fellow Bahá’ís and friends, as were many of the accounts of pilgrimages at that time. The portions which are included contain accounts which are not included in Alma’s or Fanny’s more personal accounts. It is important to note that any pilgrim’s notes are filtered through the minds and understandings of the listener and may contain some inaccuracies. They are subjective and not authoritative.

Nov. 8, 1908, Morning in the Tea Room.

We were called to the tea room, about seven o’clock, to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his family. A venerable Persian gentleman of the family chanted some of the words of Bahá'u'lláh. After this 'Abdu'l-Bahá said:

“The Catholics believe that when they die they go to a place between Heaven and hell, called purgatory, to become purified, where they suffer, and then they are prepared to enter Heaven.” Looking and referring to us three pilgrims, he said, “That is your condition while here in ‘Akká, you suffer some bodily discomforts, you do not have the food you are accustomed to; troublesome and long journeys, etc. Everyone who visits here should make progress. I hope you, too, will make progress day by day; each day as I see you I hope that you will have made more progress. As a father who loves his children, as a teacher who loves his pupils and desires that they make progress, so I hope that you will make progress. As I love you very much, I hope that you will advance rapidly, and when you leave here you will be changed so that you may become like refreshing water to the thirsty ones, brilliant stars in the Assemblies, and firm trees in the garden of the Kingdom of God. Each one of you, like the light of a lamp, shall be the light of an Assembly.”

Nov. 8, 3 P.M.

We were visited by the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Munírih Khánum, who said she felt keenly the fact that she could not speak our language, so that she might be able to tell us how much she loved us.

Then Miss Fanny said, “Oh, if we had but a thousandth part of your knowledge and love.” Her reply was, “We are all maid-servants, and if we live according to the commands given us, we will be nearer to God. Those nearest to God are those who obey His commandments. Think! In the days of Christ, some of His relatives were far from Him, and in this day, how very far from God is Muḥammad-‘Alí [half brother of Bahá'u'lláh who was an enemy of Bahá'u'lláh]!”

We spoke of having read so many tablets in which we were told that 'Abdu'l-Bahá shall be known only by the name of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Munírih Khánum said that Bahá'u'lláh called him Master. And every Prophet, after proclaiming His mission, adopts a name. Moses spoke of Himself as the Interlocutor; Christ of Himself as the Son of God; and 'Abdu'l-Bahá calls Himself 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God.

Nov. 8th., 'Abdu'l-Bahá at Lunch.

You are not accustomed to Persian food. America and Europe are like unto the dawn of the sun of reality, just at the beginning of the morning. But before long the Sun of Reality will give its full light, then you will realize how beautiful it will be. But now it is like the beginning of spring, when the grass comes through the ground, but when the time of blossom and fruition will come, it will be very beautiful. Just now you are living in the spring time, and you must work very hard that you become fruitful trees.

The tree, no matter how green or beautiful it may be, if it is not fruitful, it is useless. So you will see many trees which are green and fresh, but produce no fruit. In the same way you see a man in the world who is very wise, learned, refined, accomplished, and diplomatic, but he is deprived of the Bounty of the Kingdom, and will not possess a share of it. But it is possible to see a man who is not accomplished or educated but who still has a share in the Bounty of the Kingdom, and when he attains to the Bounty of the Kingdom, of course he will be a fruitful tree.

Notice the women who lived in the time of Christ, and who believed in Him in those days; though they had no share in science or learning, but as they had entered into the Kingdom of God they obtained fruit out of their existence and became fruitful trees.

If one entering the Kingdom of God possesses learning and science it is well, but the essential thing, or the thing of greatest importance, is to enter into the Kingdom of God, and to be characterized by the Divine attributes, and to have the intention of doing good to the world, and to be perfectly kind to each member of the human family, and serve in promoting Universal Peace. Science and learning are good, but they are the branches, not the root.

Nov. 8th, Afternoon., The Words of Munírih Khánum

(Wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.) { .ed }

She is sorry that the people of the village do not appreciate the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but they’re so far from God. She has often, in a gentle way, led up to the subject of religion, and on several occasions has asked them: “Why do you think we have been sent here?” But they had never thought about it.

Today a young lady called whose parents owned the house in which formerly the family of Bahá’u’lláh lived. This lady is a Christian. Munírih Khánum asked her, “Have you ever thought why we were sent here?” The reply was, “No!”

Munírih Khánum, said: “You know us, that we neither steal, nor do we kill anyone.” The lady replied: “I have heard some of the natives speak of you, saying, These Persians were exiled because they have a faith, a religion, which is contrary to the religion of Persia.” Munírih Khánum then asked, “What is religion? Is it not the expression or form of worshipping God? You are a Christian, can you prove to me the truth of Christ’s teaching?” This young lady could not. She was then asked if she was certain that Christ’s teachings are true? She replied, “I do not know!”

In regard to the name “Master,” the beloved Munírih Khánum said:

“The Great-Grandfather of Bahá’u’lláh was ‘Abbás, and when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was born he was given his great-grandfather’s name. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his childhood and early youth showed marks of wisdom and knowledge, maturity beyond his years. “Master,” when spoken from father to son, is the same as “darling,” or “dear;” because of love he is called “Master.”

After the departure of Bahá’u’lláh, he chose the name ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and the assumption of this name is for the purpose of designating himself as the Servant of God.

Nov. 9th, Morning in Tea Room.

Munírih Khánum said: “It is hard to want to tell our love and yet not be able to speak the language. It is like being thirsty and with water at hand, and yet not able to drink.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá then came into the room, while we were drinking tea, and after the usual greetings, inquired as to our health and comfort, and whether we had slept well.

Mrs. Ida A. Finch then had an opportunity to speak of the question of Mrs. Corinne True, in regard to the ground of the Mashrak el Azkar, which was whether they should go into debt, or whether to begin building immediately.

If they can afford to buy half the ground, then begin building. It requires a large piece of ground. There must be a Hospital, a College, a School for Orphans, and a Hospice. These buildings must be on one piece of ground, but separated from each other by gardens.

Nov.9, 1908., ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Table. Noon.

Turning to Miss Alma he said: “Are you happy? Have the people of Germany the capacity to receive? Don’t they hate you? Do they love you? If I were in their place I would put you out, for you are a rioter. The people objected to the disciples at the time of Christ, saying they had led the people astray.”

In the time of Moses, Pharaoh said, “We will kill Moses, for he wishes to change our religion, and will be the cause of great damage to our land. Therefore, let us kill him soon, in order to protect our religion.” Now the people of Germany will say the same to you, that you have gone there to change their religion. In Haifa there is a colony of Germans. When they came they were very pious and sincere, but they have departed from their mission and have become very haughty.

The Kingdom of God is like a tailor, and nations and sects are like pieces of cloth or materials; each nation or sect is a special material and now the real tailor is relating or connecting these materials to each other. We hope that before long there will be made a Divine robe out of these nations or materials. Again, the Lord of the Kingdom is like a gardener. He plants in the garden many flowers of various colors, puts them together like this bunch (referring to one on the table). So we are waiting and expecting to finish this bunch. (After a pause.) At present the gardener is working. Omega,” because the fruit is at first the seed, and again in the fruit you find the seed. Therefore, He is the Glory of His Father.<sup>3</sup>

Thus concludes the portions of Alma and Fanny’s account of their pilgrimage in their words. The following statements are extracts from the memoriam section of The Bahá’í World, for Fanny Knobloch. It is a good summary of some of their most memorable impressions of the pilgrimage.

What joy to meet Shoghi Effendi (later to become Guardian of the Faith) and his little sister, and Bahíyyih Khánum, the Greatest Holy Leaf, as well as the other members of the Holy Household. Of Bahíyyih Khánum, she wrote, “A strange and unknown feeling possessed me while in the presence of Bahíyyih Khánum, the Greatest Holy Leaf. Possibly it can be described as a feeling of awe, a feeling very unfamiliar to me. However, later, I realized that I had been in the presence of the greatest, the most holy woman in the history of the world - the Greatest Holy Leaf! The daughter of the Manifestation of God, Bahá’u’lláh.”....

Only one who had visited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá could understand what it meant to be with Him. For nine days the three pilgrims experienced a happiness beyond expression because of their close contact with Him. When they were leaving, He said to them, “You are not weeping? Do not weep! Many friends weep because they wish to remain longer.” Miss Fanny replied, “No, we have received so many blessings and are eager to go out and share them with all who are ready to listen.”

Nodding His blessed head, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied, “The general does not love most the man in the back of the ranks. He loves most the man in front. If you knew the value of these days, you would not eat, you would not sleep, you would not walk. You would run and give to all the Glad Tidings!”

After leaving ‘Akká, the three travelers went to Cairo, Egypt, to see once more their beloved teacher, Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl, then living in that city. Upon their departure, he gave to Miss Fanny his most precious possession, his prayer beads, saying to her, “My Lord gave them to me.”

Their steamer then took them to Marseilles. From there they sped to Zurich, Switzerland, and then to Stuttgart, Germany where Miss Alma had labored for two years and continued for yet another twelve, serving the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh. The two sisters addressed a large meeting, bringing to the German friends ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s message of love.

After several days Miss Fanny then hastened to Paris, according to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s wish, then to London, to convey His greetings, and back again to America, after an absence of three months.

Upon her return to America, she shared her experiences with friends in Washington, Baltimore and New York, always working for the establishment of the Faith... 4

FOREWORD

Before there were Bahá’í books, pamphlets, periodicals — before there were, properly speaking, Bahá’í administrative institutions; before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá made His historic voyage to America; before Shoghi Effendi transmitted to the English speakers of the world his own sensitive and authoritative translations of the Writings central to the Bahá’í Faith — there were Bahá’ís in America. On what spiritual food did they subsist? Ever since the announcement had been made at the World Parliament of Religions in 1893, concerning the spiritual sanctity of Bahá’u’lláh, Americans began to explore the new Revelation. Some Persian Bahá’ís came from the Holy Land about that time to give lessons in the Bahá’í Faith in New York and Chicago. The first pilgrimage to ‘Akká and Haifa, in 1898, was followed by a steady and ever increasing stream of Americans intent on hearing the Faith expounded by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Whom Bahá’u’lláh had designated Center of the Covenant. The pilgrims, on their return to the United States and Canada, conveyed their ardor, enkindled at the feet of the Master, to their questing compatriots. They did it by word of mouth, by private letter, by widely circulated and continually copied and recopied letters, descriptions, journals, and accounts that went from hand to hand. Sometimes they published their little books and pamphlets; and, when the Bahá’í Publishing Society (predecessor of the present Bahá’í Publishing Trust) {{pviii}} was established in 1902, these travelers’ accounts constituted an important part of its output.

But infinitely more important than such publications were the Tablets, or letters, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent to the North American pilgrims. He maintained a continuous correspondence with the early believers, who welcomed the Tablets and eagerly, reverently shared them with their friends — by the same means, informal and formal, by which their personal experiences as pilgrims had been shared. The Tablets were written in Persian and were translated into English either in the Holy Land or in America by Persian believers and teachers.

One of the translators of these Tablets was the Master’s grandson, Shoghi Effendi, destined by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Will and Testament to become the Guardian of the Cause of God. There came to be, even before Shoghi Effendi's accession to the Guardianship, a strong sense of the difference between official, authoritative expressions of the thoughts of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, on the one hand, and the informal reminiscences of travelers, on the other — of travelers eager to capture the precious words uttered by the Master as He taught the pilgrims — for He always taught; at tea, at lunch, on walks, on expeditions of mercy to the poor, He taught by deeds as well as words. Every minute of the pilgrims' day was a lesson, sometimes concealed to all but the truly sensitive, sometimes apparent to the least gifted. Clearly, in the "pilgrims' notes" (as they came to be called) there was necessarily involved the fallibility of each pilgrim's memory and interpretive capacity. There was a danger that a sentence in a letter, dictated {{pix}} in response to a very particular question, might be generalized far beyond the case to which it was addressed or that an oral lesson, adapted and filtered by the needs of the hearer, become the basis of a doctrine that, emanating from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, would be seen as binding on all believers. Precisely this had happened in Islám: the Traditions, or Ḥadīths — that is, the sayings of Muḥammad as reported by His disciples — had come to represent, for the majority of Muslims, an authority second only to that of the Qur'án itself.

Bahá'u'lláh Himself had made it clear that, as Shoghi Effendi put it in a letter written on his behalf, "only those things that have been revealed in the form of Tablets have a binding power over the friends. Hearsays may be matters of interest but can in no way claim authority" (Bahá'í News, no. 125 [May 1939], 6). Shoghi Effendi was particularly vigilant in such matters and repeatedly warned the friends against accepting hearsay as binding on anyone except him who had heard the Master with his own ears. However that may be, what can be more thrilling, short of the immediate experience, than hearing or reading the account in a pilgrim's own words of his reception in the loving arms of the Master? Who can tire of the description of those penetrating eyes, that warm and merry laughter, the wise brow, the wisps of hair escaping from the confining turban? Surely pilgrims' notes are not binding on us; they cannot be adduced as proof of anything; they cannot provide the basis of a serious, critical analysis of Bahá'í teachings—though the temptation to use them so is sometimes nearly irresistible! — but the sense of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence, His quintessential courtesy, His tenderness, {{px}} His occasional severity, His powers of intellect and concentration — all these are infinitely precious to Bahá'ís, every one of whom is in love with the Master.

The account of the pilgrimage of Mrs. Helen S. Goodall and her daughter, Mrs. Ella Goodall Cooper, is among the earliest of the published descriptions of life with the Master, in His household.

Mrs. Goodall and her daughter Ella (not yet married), were attracted to the Faith at the same time. They lived, at the turn of the century, in Oakland and San Francisco, when Lua Getsinger was teaching at Mrs. Phoebe Hearst's home. It was after Mrs. Getsinger had left the region that a niece of Mrs. Hearst's and a friend of Ella's told Ella and her mother about the Prophet Who lived in the Holy Land. Both mother and daughter were so fired with the desire to know more that they went to New York City, where they received more informed instruction in the Faith than was available in San Francisco. At this time (1898) Mrs. Hearst, on the first American pilgrimage, cabled a young friend in New York City to join her in the Holy Land and to invite Ella Goodall to accompany her. Young Miss Goodall was delighted to accept and, after securing the permission of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, left for Haifa. Mrs. Goodall was not well enough at that time to undertake so arduous a journey, and so returned to California.

In the meantime, a strong nucleus of believers had formed in the Bay Area, of which Helen Goodall became one of the principal animating forces. She <sup>pxi</sup> had her chance to go on pilgrimage in 1908 with Ella (not Mrs. George Cooper, married since 1905), for a two-week sojourn in the prison home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The Master was still under government surveillance; the Young Turks’ revolution had not yet ended His imprisonment. But that Prison was a haven of beauty and freedom, compared with the world outside. The present book is, of course, the outcome of that pilgrimage.

Simple, unstudied, direct, almost without form, it consists of descriptions, anecdotes, questions put to the Master, with the answers He gave, the record of lessons given not only by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but also by that gifted teacher, Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí. There are also appendices with Tablets from the Master to Mrs. Goodall and to Mrs. Cooper. There is an almost severe economy of expression: no concern for the graceful transition, but rather an abrupt turning of attention to the next matter of concern. This lack of “style” turns out to be the best possible style: it breathes the awareness of the preciousness of the lessons learned, the value of the experiences and observations of the two pilgrims; no time is lost getting to the central thought. A sort of sober ecstasy pervades these pages — no purple prose, no effusions. The flame burns pure.

But, lest you forget — these are just pilgrims’ notes.

It would not be appropriate to recount in full the lives of these remarkable women after the pilgrimage of 1908. But the chapter in O. Z. Whitehead’s Some Early Bahá’ís of the West (“Helen Goodall and Ella Cooper,” pp. 21–34) is well worth reading for the sequel. It will suffice here to say that after services of <sup>pxii</sup> fundamental importance to the establishment of the infant Faith in the United States (not the least of which were contributed to the erection of the House of Worship in Wilmette), Mrs. Goodall died in 1922, her physical vigor having entered into a rapid decline after the passing of the Master. Mrs. Cooper was a loyal and energetic helper of the Guardian until the death of her husband, Dr. George Cooper, in July 1951; she died four days after.

INTRODUCTION

During our visit of two weeks at the “White City” we shared with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the prison life, but we were in the House of God. There one is indeed made to feel that he represents and is a part of the whole Bahá’í Kingdom, that the Divine Love poured out upon him from that Spiritual Fountain is for all the believers in the world; but also he must realize that his responsibility increases in proportion to the favors and blessings showered upon him, not only toward God the Bestower of the blessings and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá through Whom they flow, but toward all humanity; for in accepting this sweet Water of Life so freely given, it becomes incumbent upon him to give in his turn — all that his capacity will hold; and the more he is favored the greater will be the service expected of him. It is to be thus fitted for higher endeavor that the souls are permitted to make the pilgrimage, not because of their deserts.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is no respecter of persons — (His own Personality is entirely in abeyance) and to Him one believer is the same as another. His Love embraces each and all as God’s children and needy members of the human race.

In His presence, one gains some realization of the Divine Wisdom required to establish the Kingdom.

Considering that the hearts of the people must first be turned to God (and this depends upon their own {{p4}} desire and choice), and that constant training is necessary to keep the souls in the Straight Path, one understands that only the Power of God could accomplish this Great Work, and also that His chosen Instrument for the purpose must be perfect — not only in qualities, but in wisdom and judgment.

In this connection, what an inspiring thought it is to feel that the early believers have also been chosen by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to serve side by side with Him — during His Lifetime — — have been granted the inestimable privilege of becoming real pioneers in the arduous and glorious task of establishing the Kingdom of God in the hearts of men!

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s instructions were given to us each day at luncheon. Greeting us with a few words in English, He always summoned us Himself to His bountifully spread table. Besides this material and spiritual food, which we received daily from His Hand, we were privileged to learn many beautiful lessons by watching His daily life. He is indeed the living Exemplar of the truth of Bahá’u’lláh’s teaching that “Guidance hath ever been by words, but at this time it is by deeds — that is, all pure deeds must appear from the temple of man, because all are partners in words, but pure and holy deeds belong especially to Our friends.”[^]

His most simple act is full of significance, containing the seed of great teaching.

If He never spoke one word to the pilgrims, the only lesson necessary would be His daily life.

And so we have called this little book Daily Lessons, meaning the name to embrace both the direct oral {{p5}} instruction and that conveyed by the “pure and holy deeds” of every hour and moment of His Glorious Existence. {{p6}}

ARRIVAL AT ‘AKKÁ

Having first called to see Rúḥá Khánum, and Madam Asadu’lláh in Haifa, we arrived at ‘Akká at noon January 4th.

As we drove through the streets of the prison city, Mírzá Munír-i Zayn and another believer joined us and walked by the side of the carriage, but without speaking.

We were met at the gate by Mírzá Asadu’lláh and other men believers who conducted us through the inner court to the long flight of stone steps leading to the third story. At the top we were met by Madame Yazdí (Riḍvāniyyih, a niece of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá who was then visiting there), who showed us to our room. Then dear Munavvar Khánum came with her cordial greeting and announced that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would be with us in a few moments.

He came at once, the joyous ring of His voice reaching us even before we saw Him, calling, “Welcome! Welcome! I am glad you are here!” and adding to His warm, strong handclasp the greater welcome of His wonderful eyes and heavenly smile. He made us sit down with Him and immediately asked about the American believers, of those in London and Paris, and also about our California believers. When we mentioned those who had sent Him special greeting, His beautiful face beamed with happiness.

He asked about our long journey and said, “Those who go in search of the North Pole count as nothing {{p7}} the hardships endured, and although you have come here in the winter when it is cold and the way a little difficult, yet you count the journey as nothing. Those having this Visit as their goal will bear any hardship for the sake of attaining.” {{p8}}

THE HOUSEHOLD

One can only feel but never hope to describe the spiritual atmosphere which surrounds ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the members of His Holy Household. The favored visitor is so quickly enveloped in this subtle Harmony that he is conscious of living in a new element, of breathing a different air from that of the outside world, of being immersed in a perfect Ocean of Divine Love which submerges all his human selfishness for the time being, calling forth and sustaining every spiritual quality of which he is possessed. This effect is produced by the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and preserved by those holy souls who revolve around Him.

The members of the Holy Household are:

- ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.
- Bahíyyih Khánum, His sister, “The Greatest Holy Leaf.”
- Munírih Khánum, His wife, “The Brilliant Leaf.”
- Dīyá’íyyih Khánum, His eldest daughter, married to Mírzá Hádí. Their three children — Shoghi (boy), Rúḥángíz (girl), Mihrangiz (girl). Rúḥá Kahnum, Hid daughter, married to Mírzá Jalál. One child — Maryam (girl).
- Tuba Khánum, His daughter, married to Mírzá {{p9}} Muhsin. Their three children — Rúhí (boy), Thurayya (girl), Suhayl (boy).
- Munavvar Khánum, His youngest daughter, unmarried. All her time is devoted to serving ‘Abdu’l-Bahá personally, sharing the superintendence of domestic affairs with the Greatest Holy Leaf and interpreting for the American and English pilgrims.

The Holy Family is served in turn by a score of women, boys, and girls who are dependent upon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s bounty. Some of them are orphans of Persian Martyrs, to whom He offers a home; others are there by their own will, having begged for the privilege of serving. One serves at the house in Haifa, while her daughter is being educated by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and so on. All seem to realize and appreciate fully the blessing of living under the same roof with Him, and all service is cheerfully and lovingly rendered.

One might easily imagine the daily life of a family of prisoners — even a Holy Family — as sad and depressing to the visitor but, strange to say, in the “Most Great Prison” quite the reverse is the case. Although absolute regularity of living is not possible — nearly every domestic event being subject to the rise of unexpected circumstances — the calm serenity of those beautiful people is never broken. They pursue their daily tasks, render heir sweet service, make their little sacrifices, teach their children — and play with them, too — in short, carry on, under the most extraordinary circumstances, a perfect ideal of human family life. One never hears complaint of hard conditions, only a calm acceptance of God’s Will and {{p10}} Wisdom in every little happening, and a sure understanding of the future blessings which will be the fruit of their present patience, blessings for all the people of the world.

Although each individual, from the youngest servant to the Greatest Holy Leaf, is constantly on guard, no parade is made of their watchfulness. Not even the creak of a distant door or a strange footfall escapes their attentive ears, yet the visitor is never reminded that he is the cause of anxiety. When it becomes necessary to move the whole supper table suddenly into another room to escape the observation of the Turkish callers, it is done with a quiet smile and no hind of inconvenience. How obvious and easy it would be to impress the sensitive pilgrim with their daily martyrdom, and the constant strain of their precarious position. That they do just the contrary is another lesson to us!

Were it not for the close proximity of the barracks and its guards, one would never realize that he was visiting a Turkish prison.

Another delight to the visitor is the discovery of their spontaneous and charming humor. They make merry over every little jest, extracting all the laughter possible from it, and encourage one another to see the bright side of all things, thus distracting their minds from the tragic side of their existence. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself seemed to come so close to us in His playful moods. With a merry twinkle in His eye, He would ask Miss Jack how she liked being on the roll of the prisoners (she is to remain there a year to teach English).[^] When she answered that she would like to be written down as “the woman who had just found {{p11}} her freedom,” He laughed with the rest, and was highly pleased that she responded to Him in the same tone. Never have we heard more joyous laughter than in that Household.

[^] Marion Elizabeth Jack (1866–1954) taught English to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s grandchildren in ‘Akká in 1908. In response to the Tablets of the Divine Plan she taught the Faith of Bahá’u’lláh in many places in North America and pioneered to Alaska and later to Bulgaria for the last twenty-four years of her life. On her death Shoghi Effendi called her an “immortal heroine,” and a “shining example (to) pioneers (of) present and future generations. . . .” See “In Memoriam: Marion Jack,” The Bahá’í World: A Biennial International Record, Volume XII, 1950–1954, comp. National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1956), pp. 674–77. — Ed.

Every day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to our door and called us to His table, which was bountifully spread with material and spiritual food, saying in English, “Come here, come here, sit down, sit down. How are you — very well?” and when we answered, “We are very well,” He said in Persian, “Very good, very good, it makes me happy to sit at table with you, because you are the servants of Bahá’u’lláh.” We replied that He made us happy. He said, “Very good, I am glad you are here. It makes Me rejoice when I see you, for I love you very much.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s perfectly natural manner indicates the entire absence of self-consciousness, and throughout the Household there is absolute simplicity, a constant service, and all the members take a common-sense view of all things.

When emotion is shown, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says, “No, no, not that, not that; be happy, be happy,” and when one shows enthusiasm and happiness, it seems to lighten His burdens.

The pressure of life there is very great, and sometimes ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is very weary, but a quick response to His greeting, or incidents related that show the activity and steadfastness of the believers, will cause His eyes to shine instantly, and His step to become more buoyant. He listens intently to every word, no matter how trifling. {{p12}}

MORNING SERVICE

Every morning the Holy Family assembled in the Ladies' room for divine service. This was conducted very informally.

One morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá shook hands with us and, turning to the Persian ladies, said, "This looks strange to you, for this is the first time you have seen a man and a woman shake hands. After awhile all will adopt this custom."

Then He asked if the chanting sounded strange to our unaccustomed ears, especially as we could not understand the words. We answered, "Yes." He assented and added that the Persians did not like the "part" singing of the Americans when they first heard it. We told Him that, though we could not understand the words, nevertheless we felt their tremendous power.

He seemed pleased and remarked that if we could {{p13}} understand them, they would be even more powerful and wonderful to us.

We were reminded of a little incident which happened nine years before.[^] At that time there was a young Syrian girl in the Household who was teaching the Daughters English. She was a Christian and knew nothing of the Bahá'í belief, but one day as we all listened to the chanting, she suddenly burst into tears and ran from the room. They all smiled and quietly awaited her return. In a few minutes she came back, and when asked what made her cry, she shook her head and could only reply, "It was so beautiful — it was so beautiful."

[^] Ella Goodall Cooper here recalls an experience from her first pilgrimage to Haifa in 1898–99. — Ed.

The first day at luncheon, after 'Abdu'l-Bahá had partaken of the honey, He passed it to us and said, "Eat this, it will have a spiritual effect — it is the same honey that was offered in the olden time.

"Some material things have a spiritual effect. The spoken words cause a vibration which produces an effect upon the ear. This is material, but the effect is spiritual — that is, the spirit of man feels the effect — either of gladness or sadness." {{p14}}

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár

"To have it built is most important. Some material things have spiritual effect, and the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is a material thing that will have great effect upon the spirits of the people. Not only does the building of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár have an effect upon those who build it, but upon the whole world.

"In the time of Christ the believers used a room under a house where they held their meetings. Moses built the Tabernacle. Solomon built the first real Temple.

"In the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár services will be held every morning, and the words of Bahá'u'lláh only are to be read."

Mashriqu'l-Adhkár means "Dawning Point of Mention" (where God is mentioned).[^] {{p15}} [^] Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is more accurately translated "The Dawning Place of the Praise of God." See [The Universal House of Justice], "Notes and References," in Bahá'u'lláh, A Synopsis and Codification of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas: The Most Holy Book of Bahá'u'lláh, [comp. The Universal House of Justice] (Haifa: Bahá'í World Centre, 1973), p. 61. — Ed.

FEAST

One day a Feast was given for the Persian Jewish pilgrims. Miss M. Elizabeth Jack and we were invited by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to partake of this Feast.

We were conducted to the large hall that was used for these occasions. It was filled with a great variety of growing plants. The table was laden with fruits and cakes, and nine large platters of pilau, and beautifully decorated with flowers.

We were placed at the head of the table, then afterward the men-pilgrims appeared. As they came in, one by one, 'Abdu'l-Bahá graciously greeted them and poured water over their hands at a basin. Bashir, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's attendant, held the towel upon which they dried their hands. Afterward they seated themselves at the table.

'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to Mírzá Munír-i Zayn, who arose and chanted a Tablet. After he finished, 'Abdu'l-Bahá served each one generously to the pilau. He walked up and down while the pilgrims ate. When all had finished, 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained that this Feast was for the visiting Jews and said, "In this Great Day, God has manifested One Light, and to this Light are attracted these pilgrims from three great religions — Muḥammadan, Christian, and Jewish. We must all thank God for the privilege of sitting down at this table, for this gathering is a symbol of unity of the Kingdom when all nations, all creeds, all races, and {{p16}} all religions will gather in unity under one Tent, under the shade of one Tree, at one Table to partake of spiritual food."

Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá stood close behind us (three women) and said, "In the olden time, it was not possible for women to sit at table in equality with the men, but in this Day it is different, and the change has been largely brought about by the position given to women in free America.

"It is the power of Bahá'u'lláh that made it possible for these American women to sit at this Table with these pilgrims. This is to show that in the Kingdom of Abhá there will be equality established between women and men. They are equal.

"I am very happy to see you all gathered here, and I hope that the fragrances of this meeting will reach the nostrils of the believers all over the world and make them glad. Such meetings have an effect upon all the people."

After ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had finished speaking the cakes and fruit were partaken of; then the pilgrims arose, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and those who had assisted Him in serving were seated. Then, in turn, Miss Jack and we were permitted to serve Him and the others, which to us was a great privilege — a wonderful experience. {{p17}}

SACRIFICE

‘Abdu’l-Bahá began by saying that He endured all the pain and hardship of this prison life for the sake of the people, that if it were not for the people He would not stay in a prison. He said, “You should thank God that you are visiting Me in this prison instead of a palace. Most people would like to visit in a beautiful palace, but it is not often that people can visit in a prison.” We told Him we knew of many who would love to visit Him in that prison, and that we understood that His was the Great Sacrifice.

He said, “The great Sacrifice is to forget one’s self entirely — to sacrifice everything, as did Christ. People might say, ‘Why should not God forgive the people without sacrificing His Son?’

“If a king wished to forgive his subjects, would he send his son to be killed by them? Certainly not. If this would be unjust in a king, how much more unjust would it be on the part of God to send His Son to be killed. Christ came of His own will to be a sacrifice that the people might become educated and progress.

“How was He to accomplish this? Must He not give them good counsel; must He not establish new laws and give them new teachings? And if He did all these things, did He not know that the people would rise against Him, give Him great pain and trouble, and finally kill Him? But knowing all this, He was willing to be a sacrifice for the sake of the world, and through {{p18}} the voluntary act He saved all those who believed in Him.

“Christ became a sacrifice that His qualities might appear in the people.

“If God forgave sins without the sacrifice, there would still be only the human qualities in the people. The divine qualities would not appear.

“Christ said to His disciples, ‘I am in you, the Father is in Me and I am in you,’ meaning that the qualities of the Father were in Him and His qualities were in them.

“There are many explanations of sacrifice. A seed in the ground sacrifices itself — that is, it becomes nothing that the beautiful plant may appear (the qualities of the plant are latent in the seed). The tree and its beautiful branches, leaves, and fruit are manifestations of the perfection of the seed.

“Christ sacrificed Himself, as the seed, becoming as nothing. He produced millions of beautiful trees with their leaves, blossoms, and fruit. The leaves, blossoms, and fruit are manifestations of the perfections that were in the seed, so the disciples became the manifestations of the perfections that were in Christ.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá turned to us and said, “As the perfections of Christ appeared in His disciples, I hope, through the Sacrifice of Bahá’u’lláh, His perfections may appear in you.” We replied that it would require much of God’s mercy to make that possible. He answered, “If you follow His instructions, it is certain to be accomplished.”

We told Him what Mr. Chase had said, that while he was at ‘Akká he felt that the outside world was the {{p19}} real prison, while ‘Akká was the place of freedom.[^] He smiled and said that it was the freedom of the world outside that caused Him to be in prison. He said, “This prison is free because of the presence of the Spirit.”

ACCIDENTAL HAPPENINGS

Question: Are there accidental happenings, or do all events occur according to Divine plan? {.question}

Answer: God’s creation is perfect. Every part of the universe has its connection with every other part, according to a Divine system.

We compare the body of the universe with the body of man. The members of the body of man are closely connected; so, also, are the parts of the great universe. The great events which happen are due to this connection. There is day, there is night; sometimes there are eclipses, etc. — all according to the requirements of this Divine system. All the created beings are connected with each other, and all occurrences and events are indicative of the requirements of this connection and interrelation.

In the body of man, all the members and parts are interdependent; for example, the heart feels the things seen by the eye; the ear hears, and the soul is thereby moved; the nostrils inhale a sweet odor, and the whole body is delighted. This is a proof that all the parts of the body of man are interrelated. This is according to a Divine plan, and it is also evident that there is a great wisdom therein.

Even unpleasant things, such as a chill in the feet which is felt in the head, a disagreeable odor which affects the whole system, or trifles (which are endless, {{p21}} and seem to be accidental) such as a small hair appearing in an unusual place on a man’s face, should also be considered as having a place or part in this general system. Therefore, what we call an accident is the effect of the connection of all the parts, and no events transpire in vain.

Referring to the Tablet sent to Mr. Dealy previous to the flood and hurricane at Fair Oaks, Alabama: “Be not grieved if the clouds of the Violation of the Covenant are condensed in those regions.” Question: Are great calamities like this flood, the San Francisco earthquake, etc., caused by the wickedness of the people?

Answer: It belongs to the lesson of yesterday. Events like these happen because of the connection between the parts of the universe, for every small part has connection with every great part, and what affects one affects the other or all the others.

On account of this connection, the actions of man have effect. Whenever a promise is broken, it causes a commotion. For instance, suppose two nations have a disagreement. It is a difference in ideas only, and not a physical thing, not anything we can touch or see; yet this disagreement has a physical effect. It causes war, and thousands of men are cut in pieces. So, when man breaks his promise to God, in other words when he “violates the Covenant,” the effect is physical, and calamities appear.

A man may be condemned to death because he is a {{p22}} murderer, another because he is a thief, or they may be punished for many different kinds of crimes, but Jesus Christ was put to death because He wished to become a sacrifice, so there are other causes of calamity. {{p23}}

THE INCIDENT OF THE DEPARTURE OF MÍRZÁ ASADU’LLÁH FROM HAIFA AT THE TIME OF THE DISTURBANCE IN 1905

Extract from Mírzá Asadu’lláh’s letter written to the Bahá’ís at that time:

“Our Beloved Master commanded the believers to leave ‘Akká for different countries so that they might remain free, but their sorrow at parting from the Master was far greater than would have been the imprisonment. They refused to part with Him, saying they would remain and share with Him His trials. But He admonished them, saying, ‘O ye beloved of God. These people (officials) have come especially for Me, and their purpose is not yet known. It is My Will that you should depart from here and serve God wherever you go. This is the appointed time for work; it is the season of victory. If I am crucified or exiled or thrown into the ocean, ye should remain, nevertheless, firm as mountains; nay, your service should become greater and your endurance more. Lay your trust upon God; rest assured in the confirmation of Bahá’u’lláh; spread the Fragrances of God; help the people and lead them to the Light of God. This is the blessed promise of Bahá’u’lláh: “We will help him who rises to serve My Cause through a host of the Supreme Concourse and an army of near angels.”’[^]

“Following the command of the Master, they commenced preparations for their journey. The {{p24}} Master remained a mountain of firmness, a heaven of patience, and an ocean of steadfastness.

“At this time I was commanded by the Master to go to ‘Akká, and reaching there in the afternoon I met the Master and was with Him two hours alone. He gave me directions for teaching, commanding me to go within a few days to Egypt and deliver His Message to the people, telling me He would let me know the time. A few days later my son returned from a visit to the Master and said the time had arrived. On receiving this message, he informed the Master that I had no passport — a necessity in Turkey — to which He replied that I would be protected. The Governor, with his officials, were on the pier to see that no Bahá’í Persons left. As we walked down the pier, the Governor’s attention was distracted by the mails which had arrived, and we were enabled to pass to the steamer unnoticed — thus we were protected.” Question: Was this an accidental happening?

Answer: No, this was on account of all the parts of the universe having a connection and being dependent upon one another.

To study the universe, take the body of man; all the elements are in it, and its members are dependent upon one another; so, also, are the parts of the great universe. The great events which happen are due to this connection — all according to the requirements of the system.

As the great events belong to the general system, so the small things which occur belong to the same Divine system. {{p25}}

In the case of Mírzá Asadu’lláh, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “God told the Governor to turn his head.”

Referring to the disturbances at this time, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “these things must happen. The clouds will not gather moisture from the sea until the wind blows. Clouds must gather and rain fall and storms appear, or there will be no spring; then we should have no flowers, no fruit, no blessings of Spring. All the happenings in the Cause are for the future fruit.” {{p26}}

BAHÁ’Í ARGUMENT AGAINST THE BELIEF OF THE NATURALISTS REGARDING THE ESSENCE OF GOD OR THE REALITY OF CREATION

We believe in a Universal Essence or Reality, which is purified or exalted above all mention, and which cannot possibly be conceived of by the mind of man. But we can prove Its existence by Its signs which we see in the surrounding creation.

Naturalists believe in this Universal Cause, which they call universal “Nature,” and they claim that it, of necessity, brings things into existence, that this necessity is one of the requirements.

We say the Essence is the Creator of all things, and we differ from the Naturalists in attributing the kind of qualities to this Essence.

We say that the Essence is purified from all imperfections. They say it has some imperfections.

We say the Essence is conscious.

They say it is unconscious.

We say the Essence is the Knower.

They say it knows not.

We say the Essence has Will.

They say it has no will.

We say the Essence has a power of choice.

They say it creates without choice — because it must.

We prove the existence of the Universal Essence by {{p27}} qualities that are perfect. They prove the universal “Nature” by qualities that are imperfect.

They say, and try to prove that there is neither organization nor system in the world of existence, that although the works of nature are in themselves perfect (like a flower, for instance) they are not created according to plan or arrangement. For example, in a bouquet of a variety of flowers one sees that each flower, in itself, is perfect, but the arrangement of the bouquet is not according to system.

They say that because the works of nature are not systematic, the Universal Cause can have no consciousness of it.

We ask: Is it possible that perfection can exist in the branch of a tree and not exist in the root of the tree?

Is it possible that perfection shall exist in a drop of the sea and not exist in the sea itself?

Is it possible that perfection will not exist in man himself but will exist in a hair of his head, which is only a part of him?

Is it possible that man, who is a part of the whole, may have qualities of perfection which cannot be attributed to the Essence, or Reality? Or is it possible for man to be a point of perfection and that real Essence be deprived of perfection? A child could not imagine such a foolish thing.

It would also be foolish to say that the hair of a man’s head had feeling but that his heart and mind were deprived. (We take the Naturalist’s own words for this proof.)

We say that the Essence, or Reality, is purified from all words, all description, all praise; that the {{p28}} Essence would have first to be understood and then judged. But man cannot understand the Essence.

The Naturalists say, for example, that the universal “Nature” is like the ocean, and the existent beings are like the waves of that ocean. Now, can we imagine some perfections in the waves without believing the perfection also exists in the ocean itself?

Man is in the position of a little worm in a seed; the seed is in an apple; the apple is on a tree; the tree is in a garden; and the garden is under the care of a gardener.

Now, suppose that little worm should say, "I have understanding and feeling, but the gardener has not." How can this little worm, which is so far from the gardener, possibly have an idea or conception of him? How much could it know of the perfections or qualities of the gardener, so that it might be able to judge whether or not he has such and such perfections, such as consciousness, will, etc.?

The beings in this existent world are created in different conditions. There is the mineral condition, or degree, the vegetable condition, or degree, the animal condition, or degree, and the human degree.

Every higher degree comprehends or includes the lower, but the lower degree does not comprehend the higher. For example, man comprehends the kingdoms below him, but the mineral does not comprehend the three higher kingdoms.

Whatever progress the mineral kingdom may make, it can never reach a condition of knowing the power of growth; and in the same way whatever progress the vegetable kingdom may make, it can never imagine the condition of the animal kingdom; and the animal cannot imagine the human reality. {{p29}}

Though all of them are creations, the difference in degree prevents the lower from comprehending the higher.

As this is to, how can man, the phenomenal being, understand God? How can the creation understand the Creator? How can the art imagine the artist?

Man cannot understand the Reality of Divinity or know whether He has consciousness or not.

The consciousness of God is not the consciousness which we know of. As unconsciousness is an imperfection, we say that Reality has a consciousness. We say so because we want to deny the imperfections ascribed to God. But the consciousness of God is different from the consciousness of man. Man's consciousness is a quality of phenomenal beings, but the consciousness of God is the quality of an External Reality. Therefore, we cannot compare one with the other.

The consciousness of God is sanctified and purified from the consciousness of man.

As it is with the spirit of the vegetable kingdom, which cannot understand the spirit of the animal kingdom or comprehend the sense-perception of the animal kingdom (as an instance, it is impossible for an orange to comprehend the power of sight or to understand the power of hearing or the power of taste), so it is with man, the created being, in his relation to God, the uncreated Reality. It is impossible for him to understand the power of God.

That Reality which is the Essence of God cannot be conceived of by any understanding; therefore, God has created a Manifestor, and in Him is reflected that Sanctified Reality. {{p30}}

The Manifestations are points, or sources, of assistance for all people, and they are the Educators of men. They are like mirrors, and the Reality, the Essence, is like the sun. For instance, the Sun has been reflected by the Mirror of Christ and appears in it with Its Rays and Heat.

Though the Mirror is a phenomenal reality, it is the place of the Sun, or the recipient of the Sun; so, therefore, Christ said, “The Father is in Me,” meaning, The Sun has reflected upon this mirror. If the Mirror will say the Sun is in Me — this is right, is truth. But He does not mean that the Sun has come down from Its sanctified height and is dwelling in Him.

In short, we say that man is incapable of understanding the Essence of God and His qualities. Why? Because that Essence is the Highest Sanctity, and man is phenomenal. {{p31}}

ESSENCE OF THE MATERIAL CREATION

Question: Is the essence of the material creation the Spirit of God?

Answer: No, it is not the Spirit of God, but it is the Bounty of God. It is not a part of God, for it is His creation.

To illustrate: Take a lamp; its light is created by the sun but is no part of the light of the sun. The action of the sun upon the earth produced the petroleum that gives the light. Neither the petroleum nor the light is any part of the sun.

And so it is with the life, or essence, of all creation.

God has created all beings, but their life, or essence, is not the Life of the Spirit.

The Bounty of God is bestowed upon the mineral, the vegetable, animal, and man, but their life, or essence, is not the Spirit of God.

But when the spirit of man awakens to the consciousness of the Spirit of God and becomes imbued with the Light of the Sun of Truth, that Light in him is of the Spirit of God and is immortal with God. But the man who is not endowed with this Light remains as a lamp whose light may be extinguished.

Question: Suppose a man is ill and dies, not having summoned a physician. Had his time come to die, or would he with proper care have recovered? {{p32}}

Answer: There are two kinds of death. One is preordained, and the other is dependent upon many things. For example, a lamp is filled with oil, and it will burn as long as the oil will last. This is preordained. (If the lamp is filled with oil to burn five hours, it will not burn six hours.) Another lamp may be filled, but a strong wind arising may put out the light. This is the other kind of death — depending on circumstances.

It is certain that if a babe be thrown into the sea, it will die. This is not preordained death, for the child had just begun its life. Question: Then these circumstances are something dependent upon the will of man?

Yes, but God has given him that will. Question: Can any of these circumstances be changed by prayer?

Yes, prayer might prevent the strong wind from blowing out the light of the lamp — but it could never change the amount of oil in the lamp — that is preordained.

Answer: The love shown by animals is instinctive and not dependent upon their own will — that is, they are endowed with their qualities and use them in a natural way, but not by their own will. As these qualities are instinctive and not voluntary, animals will not be rewarded. Their benefits are confined to this world only.

Take a flower; it gives forth a fragrance not of its own will but because it has been naturally endowed. It has no power to withhold the fragrance, so it is compelled to give it out.

This piece of bread gives strength to the body, not by its own will, but because it must. This is of the Bounty of God; therefore, the bread has no reward.

A dog shows affection by instinct and not by will.

A rich man gives a bounty to a poor man. Should the rich man also give him a reward because he has received a bounty? It is the same with the animals. Their qualities are bestowed by God. Shall He give them reward for this Bounty?

Man is the only creature who can receive reward, because he has the power of choice — whether he will show forth love or withhold it. He has the power to choose immortal life or to reject it, while the animals have no qualities that are immortal.

For fresh air and exercise we were sometimes permitted to walk on the housetop.

The view from there was superb. Toward the west lay the blue Mediterranean, south of us was the Bay of 'Akká, Haifa, and the beautiful Mt. Carmel. To the north and east was the rolling country where the shepherds were tending their sheep as in the olden time, in the same flowing garments, and carrying their shepherds' crooks in the same old way.

From the minarets was heard the call to prayer. How we longed to shout to the muezzin that a “New {{p34}} Call” had been “vociferously raised” and to the shepherds — the “True Shepherd” hath appeared!

At table one day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked, “If the people here should not let you leave ‘Akká, what would you do — how would you feel?”

We answered, “We would stay here always and be perfectly happy.” He smiled at this and said, “Suppose they should ask you why you came here? The might say, ‘These prisoners are Persians. What have Americans and Persians to say to one another?’ ”

We answered that we should like nothing better than to mount the housetop and shout to all the people the reason of our coming. He smiled again and said, “You are shouting although you are silent, but your words will be heard in the future. The words of Christ were not heard until three hundred years after His death.

“There is a Persian story of a thief who, in order to rob a certain house, went to work to undermine the foundation. The owner of the house happened to be on the roof and looking down discovered the thief and asked what he was doing. The man replied, ‘I am trumpeting.’ ‘Trumpeting!’ exclaimed the owner, ‘Why, you are not making any noise.’ ‘Oh no,’ answered the thief, ‘you will hear the noise tomorrow!’ ” {{p35}}

EVIL THOUGHTS

Question: What is the source of evil thoughts that disturb those who do not wish to entertain them?

Answer: They come from other minds; they are reflected. One should not become a mirror for them — to reflect them; neither should one try to control them, for this is impossible; it only aggravates the difficulty, causing more to appear.

One should constantly turn the mirror of his heart squarely toward God so that the Light of the Sun of Truth may be reflected there.

This is the only cure for attacks of evil thoughts. The face of a mirror should be turned toward God, and the back of the mirror toward the evil thoughts.

Question: Are there “earthbound” souls who try to have, and do have, an influence over people, sometimes taking entire possession of their wills?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered, “There are no earthbound souls. When the souls that are not good die, they go entirely away from this earth and so cannot influence anyone. They are spiritually dead. Their thoughts can have influence only while they are alive on the earth. Caiaphas had a great influence during his life, but as soon as he died, his influence ceased. It was of this kind that Christ said, ‘Let the dead bury their dead.’ {{p36}} But the good souls are given eternal life, and sometimes God permits their thoughts to reach the earth to help the people.” {{p37}}

AUTOMATIC WRITING

Question: What is the power used in automatic writing?

Answer: This power is neither heavenly nor spiritual; neither is it an influence from disembodied spirits. It is of the human spirit — magnetism within the self of the one doing the writing.

When the thoughts have taken possession of the mind and are not consciously directed, one becomes subject to their promptings and, unconsciously, or automatically, takes a pencil and writes them down. The oftener this is done, the stronger becomes the magnetic prompting.

For instance, one may learn a lesson or poem by heart, and he repeats and repeats it so often that the thoughts take possession of him, and he will repeat it unconsciously even in his sleep. This is magnetism belonging to the human spirit.

Or he may walk many times upon a certain road, and he takes his walk so often he is able to take it unconsciously or automatically.

This power is his own magnetism.

A mother rocks and rocks her babe to sleep in a cradle, but the thought of the child’s sleep may so take possession of her mind that sometimes she is able to put him to sleep without the aid of the cradle. This effect is produced by the mother’s magnetism. {{p38}}

In regard to the automatic writing, if one will pray very earnestly, and pray sufficiently, the mind will turn against the automatic writing, and one will be freed from the effects of that power.

Pray, and pray, and not be misled by the seeming beauty of the writings.

One of us had a birthday, and ‘Abud’l–Bahá congratulated her upon being in that Sacred Spot for such an anniversary. He was asked to guess the age, and He smilingly guessed several years under the right number. She said, although He was very kind, she was bound to acknowledge a few years more, at which He quickly rejoined, “I wish to make you as young as possible so that you will have so many more years in which to live and spread this Truth.” She said that since becoming a Bahá’í, nine years ago, she had been growing younger every day. He smiled and assented, “That is so, and, in reality, you are only nine years old.”

Then He told the following story: A great king, walking in his garden one day, noticed a man, about ninety years old, planting some trees. The king asked what he was doing and the old man answered that he was planting date trees. “How long before they will bear fruit?” asked the king. “Twenty years.” “But you will not live to enjoy the fruit; why then should you plant these trees?” The old man answered, “The last generation planted trees that bore fruit for my benefit; so it is now my duty to plant for the benefit of the next generation.”

The king was pleased at this answer so gave the man {{p39}} a piece of money. The gardener fell on his knees and thanked him. The king asked, “Why do you kneel before me?” “Because, your majesty, not only have I had the pleasure, or gift, of planting these trees, but they have already borne fruit, since you give me this money.” This so pleased the king he gave the man another piece of money.

Again the old gardener knelt, saying, “Again I kneel to thank your majesty. Most trees will bear fruit only once, while these trees of mine have already borne two crops — since you give me two pieces of money.”

The king smiled and asked, “How old are you?” The man answered, “I am twelve years old.” “How can that be? You are surely a very old man.” The gardener answered, “In the day of the king your predecessor, the people were in a most unhappy state of constant warfare and trouble, so I cannot include that as a part of my life. But since your majesty came to rule, the people are happy, contented, and at peace. There, as it is but twelve years since your gracious reign began, I am only twelve years old.” This pleased the king so very much that, perforce, he gave the old man another piece of money, saying, “I shall have to leave you now, for your words please me so greatly that if I listen to you longer I shall become a pauper!”

---

One day we spoke of an active worker in this Cause, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “In this Cause, he who is active and who makes an effort will always meet with success. In worldly matters how often we see a man work hard for a lifetime and never achieve success. {{p40}} But the worker in the cause of God is like a gardener. The more attention he gives his garden, the more fruit will reward his efforts, or, like the traveler who has a great goal before him, no matter how hard the road, if he only keeps on walking and is not turned aside by discouragements, he is sure, eventually, to reach his goal.”

---

Question: Will the stations of the believers continue to be different hereafter?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered, “Yes, it will be necessarily so, for the Kingdom requires it.

“The King appoints one to be his prime minister, another to be his greatest general, another a soldier, and so on from the highest to the lowest. If all were generals or all were soldiers, there would be no kingdom.

“God created the mineral, the vegetable, the animal, and man. Had He created only man there would be no world.” {{p41}}

MEMORIAL SERVICE

One of the visiting ladies from ‘Ishqabád seemed very sad, and as a sad Bahá’í face is a rarity, we asked about her. It seemed she had lately lost both her daughters within a month’s time and was inconsolable.

When she first came, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spent much time comforting her. He told her she must take the believers for her children, and during the days in His Presence, she began to learn real content with God’s Will, which is better than resignation. Finally, He revealed some beautiful Tablets for the departed daughters and held a memorial service at which these were read. This was a service of joy and not of sorrow or regret. Only men believers took part in it, but she was able to hear it, although she was not seen. The spiritual effect this blessing had upon her was wonderful to see, and before we left, the empty place in her heart had been filled with His Love, and her face became illumined and beautiful like those of her Persian brothers and sisters.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá brought us flowers or oranges or grapefruit from the wonderful Ridván nearly every day and also gave us delicious grapes from a vine that was planted by His own hand. (This vine yields seven crops of grapes every year, and these particular grapes were the seventh yield.) {{p42}}

His constant shower of material and spiritual favors caused us to exclaim that we did not deserve so many blessings, and while we received and received everything from Him, we were unable to give Him anything in return.

He replied, simply, “that is what I am here for — to give, and not to receive.”

When we deprecated the trouble it must be to answer so many questions and to give us so much time, He replied, “Whatever is done in love is never any trouble, and — there is always time.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá entertained the Turkish officials and nonbelievers who came to call nearly every evening. When asked if this was not a great tax on His time and strength, He replied, “Bahá’u’lláh commanded us to show courtesy, kindness, and hospitality to all who come to us — whether they are believers or not.” This command ‘Abdu’l-Bahá obeyed most conscientiously. Besides showering upon them material favors, He also engaged a man to come and chant the Qur’án, which greatly pleased His Muḥammadan guests.

During the troublous time of 1905 in ‘Akká, a Syrian officer in the Turkish army who had always been friendly with the Holy Family, suddenly turned against them. He discovered a book written in English which was detrimental to this Cause. Thinking to ingratiate himself with the powers at Constantinople, he determined to send it there, first having it translated at Beirut. Of course it fell into the hands of the authorities there, who immediately concluded that, since he had the book in his possession, he must {{p43}} himself be a Bahá'í. So they promptly arrested him and sent him to Damascus. Thus he fell into his own trap. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá had no word of censure for this false friend. On the contrary, He, with the Greatest Holy Leaf, went at once to call upon the sorrowful wife, offering her money and every assistance. Here was one of our daily lessons in the practical application of these Great Teachings.

In the Words of Paradise page 54, these words appear: "A strange and wonderful instrument exists in the earth, but it is concealed from minds and souls. It is an instrument which has the power to change the atmosphere of the whole earth, and its infection causes destruction." [^]

[^] For a more accurate translation see Bahá'u'lláh, Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh Revealed after the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, comp. Research Department of the Universal House of Justice, trans. Ḥabíbu'lláh Taherzadeh et al. (Haifa, Bahá'í World Centre. 1978), p. 69. — Ed.

Question: Does this refer to an evil power such as psychic control? Is there some other power in the world beside God?

Answer: This is a deep and lengthy subject, but, briefly, there is, as we know, a power that composes and a power that decomposes.

The world of existence is constantly revolving through the changes of building up and tearing down.

When elements are attracted, something is composed, and when these same elements are repelled, that form is decomposed.

As by the will of God the power of composition exists, so, also by the will of God the power of decomposition exists.

These two are expressed in scripture by 'Israfil' the {{p44}} angel who gives life to men, and the Angel of Death who takes it away. [^] The first is the power of composition or attraction, the other the power of decomposition. They are not angels.

[^] According to Islám, on the Day of Judgment Israfil calls the dead to rise to a new life. — Ed.

There is no power exercised over the people by those evil souls that have passed away. Good is stronger than evil, and even when alive they had very little power. How much less have they after they are dead, and besides they are nowhere near this planet. {{p45}}

JOURNEY OF THE ISRAELITES

Question: Was this a physical or spiritual journey?

Answer: It was both physical and spiritual. They journeyed to the Promised Land, and geography and history both prove that this was a physical journey.

Moses viewed the Promised Land, but died before it was reached, having given over his charge to Joshua.

The crossing of the Red Sea has a spiritual meaning. It was a spiritual journey, through and above the sea of corruption and iniquity of Pharaoh and his people, or army. By the help of God, through Moses, the Israelites were able to cross this sea safely and reach the Promised Land (spiritual state), while Pharaoh and his people were drowned in their own corruption.

The Egyptian history recorded even trifling events. Had such a wonderful thing happened as the parting of the physical sea, it would also have been recorded.

Question: Christ said, "This generation (meaning dispensation) shall not pass away, till all be fulfilled." (St. Luke 21:32.) And in Ex. 20:5 it states that the sins of the fathers will be visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. Does this word generation also mean a cycle, or dispensation?

Answer: No, for the word generation has a different meaning in different places. Christ referred to the {{p46}} Christ Dispensation, or Cycle, and the other refers to the physical generation.

For example, if a man does a great injustice to another in his life, then, after his death, his son will be despised for having had such a father, and in some cases the injury might be so serious that the effect would reach to the grandson, etc., or a man may, by wrong living, fall into consumption and give that disease to his children unto the third or fourth generation.

Both physically and mentally, the sins of the fathers may be visited upon the children.

Question: What was the cause of the Greek Civilization? Did the Greeks ever have a prophet?

Answer: They had philosophers and great men, but while their civilization was full of beauty and was superior to that of the Romans, it was material — neither moral nor spiritual.

The foundation of the Roman civilization was force; consequently, a downfall was inevitable. Think of a monarch like Nero setting fire to a city and playing upon his lyre while it burned! What kind of a civilization was that?

A prophet brings a spiritual civilization, and after that is established, material progress follows.

Among the Persian pilgrims who called to see us were several Jews from Hamadán. They were new believers and full of enthusiasm. They told us it made them so happy to behold the American sisters, and {{p47}} they thanked God that they had lived to see the day with their own eyes wherein the prophecies of the Holy Books were fulfilled.

Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí — that renowned and venerable teacher — said that anow he was happy to state there was not a village in Persia, no matter how small, but what contained believers — there might be only one — or ten — or a thousand, but not even the smallest hamlet was without them.[^] We remarked the apparent affinity existing between the Persians and Americans, and the visitors said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had told them that in the future many thousands of Americans would be visiting Persia and many Persians visiting America. This thought seemed to give them all great happiness .

[^] Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí of Iṣfahán was a devoted servant of the Báb, Bahá’u’lláh, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá from the 1850s to his death in 1920. At Bahá’u’lláh’s bidding he went to Egypt to teach about the Bahá’í Faith; his efforts resulted in his being imprisoned for nearly ten years. For more than twenty-five years he was one of the foremost teachers in Persia; he staunchly defended the Covenant of Bahá’u’lláh at His passing and during ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s ministry. He spent the last of his life as companion to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and counselor to pilgrims; the Western pilgrims knew him as the Angel of Carmel. For details on his life see Adib Taherzadeh, the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh: Adrianople 1863–68 (Oxford: George Ronald, 1977), pp. 438–50. — Ed.

MIRACLES

One evening Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí gave us this little lesson in his inimitably sweet and humorous way.

“If we ask for miracles as proof of the truth of this Revelation, we produce many veils. We should first be sure that the One we believe in has said, ‘I am sent by God.’ Then if we ask Him for a miracle, for example, to turn this glass cup into gold, He will answer, ‘I am sent by God; therefore, I am not against God. God has created this cup out of glass; if I turn it into gold, I am against God.’ And not only this; if He perform one miracle to satisfy one person, He will be obliged to perform thousands to satisfy all. Or suppose He should do this for the people who live in His time, what would He have to do to convince those who came after Him? How could He do this? He would have to live forever. Or He would have to divide Himself up and wander all over the earth, knocking at every door and saying, ‘I am the Manifestation; what kind of miracles would you like to see?’

“No. Let us see if He comes to improve the condition of the people, to develop their minds and hearts and give them the knowledge of God. If He did turn the cup into gold, what benefit is there in this — what profit or help to the people! Rather He would cloud the intellect and the reason by doing such strange things. {{p49}}

“So we see that the manifestation cannot follow the desire of the people. He must bring to the world something which all the people can understand, in order that they may recognize that His cause is from God. Now what shall this something be? It is to make the people understand. We may say to a man, ‘Close your eyes that you may not see,’ and he will close them; or ‘close your ears that you may not hear,’ and he will close them; but when we say ‘close your mind that you may not understand,’ then that is impossible.

“For example, I may say that I am sure I can wrestle with and overthrow a certain man; the people may declare that I cannot do it; but I am so sure — because I know — that the more they say I cannot, the more positive I become. When a person has learned something like a parrot, as soon as he meets with real opposition he will deny what he has learned; but if in his own mind he understands the matter, then the more he is opposed, the more sure he becomes. If all the people of the world came and told us that two and two make less than four, would we be disturbed? No, because we understand this matter. When we understand Bahá’u’lláh’s Revelation as well as this, then we can stand firm and say to all the world, ‘You are wrong, for we are sure.’ This kind of understanding only flourishes by opposition.

“When the people asked Christ for a miracle, He declared, ‘An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas; for as Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale’s belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart {{p50}} of the earth.’ The spiritual meaning of these words must be clear. If Christ had performed physical miracles, He would have referred to them instead of giving such an answer; so we must conclude that the miracles were spiritual.

“By saying that He would be three days in the heart of the earth, He meant that He would be resurrected, or reappear in the third cycle or third heaven. Counting His own Dispensation as one, and the Muḥammadan cycle as two, He has reappeared in this, the third Dispensation, the Day of Bahá’u’lláh.” {{p51}}

EXILE OF BAHÁ’U’LLÁH

By Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar—‘Alí

When Bahá’u’lláh was imprisoned in Ṭihrán, the Russian Ambassador went about twenty times to the Sháh to plead in His behalf, saying, “This man has no fault. He is faultless. Why do you imprison Him?” The Sháh answered that Bahá’u’lláh must be punished because He had ordered the attack on his life (see history).[^] The Ambassador said, “That is not a reasonable supposition; for, if He had ordered such an attempt, He would have ordered a bullet put in the gun instead of merely powder and small shot.” The Sháh acknowledged this reasoning but was determined to hold Bahá’u’lláh responsible so as to have a pretext for keeping Him in prison.

[^] It is not clear to what “see history” refers; perhaps it means to see historical accounts of the August 12, 1852, attempt on the life of the Sháh. — Ed.

Again and again the Russian Ambassador went to talk with the Sháh about the matter, and at last the Sháh confessed that he was afraid of the influence of Bahá’u’lláh, and that if he should set Him free, it would create a great tumult among the people.

The Ambassador answered, “If, then, you fear Him so much, why keep Him in Tíhrán? Would it not be better to exile Him to Baghdád?” This was accordingly done, and an escort furnished of Cossack and Russian horsemen to protect Him from the Persian horsemen. From Baghdád, Bahá’u’lláh was sent to Constantinople, then to Adrianople, then to ‘Akká — by force He was sent to the place where He desired {{p52}} to be, thus fulfilling the prophecies of all the Holy Books. He came by His own Will. Had He simply appeared and declared Himself there, the opposers might have said, “Of course, He has read the prophecies and determined to appear in the Holy Land in order to mislead the people.” But we see that He used the natural instruments who thought they were sending Him there by force. This is what we may call a real miracle.

After all, did the Sháh accomplish his will, or did Bahá’u’lláh accomplish His Will? {{p53}}

KNOWING GOD THROUGH HIS MANIFESTATION OF HIMSELF

Lesson by Hájí Mírzá Haydar—‘Alí

Both animal and man have material sight, but the animal has no spiritual sight — no power to comprehend spiritual things. And the man who does not accept the revealed Light of God has no conception of the Power of this Light that changes the sight, mind, and heart of those who do accept it.

The Light of God cannot be comprehended by man excepting through His Manifestation. A Christian might search this universe over and over to find God, but he only finds Him when he touches the hem of the Garment of Christ.

In Christ (the Spirit of Truth) we find all spiritual knowledge, all love, all perfection. His perfection is beyond compare. As the ocean is one drop of water, so is His Perfection above that of the creatures. By comparison all fail to stand in His Presence.

Christ is a Mirror that shows the Essence in Its Perfection. The Essence does not descend to the Mirror, but Its Perfection can be seen in the Mirror, and whosoever loves the Reflection loves the One on High, and whosoever sacrifices himself for this Reflection sacrifices himself for God.

Now, it is certain that God is not realized except through His Manifestation. Now you have recognized {{p54}} Him, have loved Him, and you have come here to see Him. What you have seen, I have seen, and nothing more (meaning that an account of his services in the Cause, which we asked him to relate to us, were as nothing).

The gift God has bestowed upon Bahá'ís can be realized by them, but not by unbelievers. The intellectual power of the whole world cannot understand what power brought Bahá'u'lláh from Tíhrán to 'Akká.

(In a former lesson, H. M. Haydar—'Alí said, "If Bahá'u'lláh had come to 'Akká by Himself — without force — the people might say that anyone could have done the same thing and made the same claim.")

Whatever is done in this world on the material plane, is by means; but the Revelation of God is spread without material means or aid. The Kingdom of God begins here upon earth. {{p55}}

THE POWER OF GOD

Lesson by Hájí Mírzá Haydar—'Alí

Every matter, whether earthly or heavenly, physical or spiritual — which has not been manifest among men but which has at a certain time become existent — must of necessity be related to one of humankind as its originator, founder, or organizer.

First: If that matter be repugnant to the faith and reason of the world and nations but in accord with their selfish tendencies and desires, it is possible that it may be executed and gain a temporary existence among men, either through the wealth and affluence of its originator or by the means of his power and worldly influence. For people obey and recognize such an unreasonable matter, not only because the worldly power wielded by its originator compels them, but also because that matter appeals to their self-interest and cupidity, though inconsistent with their belief and higher judgment.

Second: If that matter be repugnant to reason but in conformity with faith, it is possible that it may be recognized.

This is illustrated by the doctrine of the Resurrection of Christ and His Ascent to Heaven which, though apparently against reason and science, is still believed in by many without any explanation or proof — because it is the clear, literal text of the Gospels. {{p56}}

Third: And if a matter be contrary to faith but in accord with reason and acquired learning, this can also be established for a time but continues only temporarily, as in the case with the theories of certain philosophers.

Fourth: But if a matter be considered repugnant both to reason and to faith, and be also against men's desire and self-interest, it is utterly impossible for it to be executed and established, even if it is proposed — unless there be an unseen Power to guard and protect it and to establish and promote it in the world. This has been always the case with the Divine Matters — that is the laws and missions of the Prophets and Divine Manifestations. For these Holy Personages executed their commands and promoted their cause among men, although they were alone, unaided, without any family, clan, soldiers, ammunition, or treasures with which to assist and enforce the spread of their Word.

Moreover, they were known as illiterate, unlearned, and were devoid of every worldly means of power. But they fulfilled their mission, made their Cause to triumph, and subjugated nations to their command solely through the power of the greatest Humility and Meekness.

Consequently, the Oneness of God was proven through their Oneness, and the Singleness of God was demonstrated through their Singleness, and from every one of their names and attributes the Divine Names and Attributes became manifest — for they had no worldly instruments, but the Invisible Power of God was their sole Helper, Protector, and Confirmer. {{p57}}

STORY OF BADI“

By Ḥájí Mírzá Haydar—‘Alí

This thrilling story of one of the great martyrs in this Cause emphasizes the point that when a man accepts this Truth he becomes a new creature with a new heart and a new character. Badi“ was not a particularly good boy — he was very young, and his father, a splendid believer, was somewhat troubled over Badi“'s thoughtlessness and carelessness. But when Bahá'u'lláh, declaring Himself from ‘Akká to all the rulers of the earth, chose the boy to bear His special Tablet to the Sháh of Persia, Badi“ was transformed. Although Bahá'u'lláh told him that when his journey was ended he would be killed, he accepted his mission joyfully.

Concealing the precious Tablet for the Sháh upon his person, he started on foot for Persia. Four months he walked, meeting many believers on the way, but never revealing to anyone his great secret. However, they all noticed that he often turned his face toward ‘Akká. He constantly prayed that nothing might hinder him from fulfilling his mission that he might be worthy of the promise of martyrdom. His instructions were that when he reached the capital, Tíhrán, he was to change his dress and put on a white robe to show that he had no concealed weapon, and station himself outside the gates where the Sháh would rid by with his train. Then he was to hold the Tablet high {{p58}} above his head that all might see what he held. All these things he did, and when the Sháh with his glittering suite came in sight, Badi“ raised his hand so that all could see the paper. The Sháh, remarking that he supposed it was a petition from one of his subjects, instructed a soldier to bring it to him. But Badi“ called out, “It is not a petition but a command.” Instantly the soldiers seized and surrounded him. Again he called to the Sháh, “My Lord, who sent me, told me that you would kill me.” The Sháh angrily replied, “We shall not kill you then, just to prove that your Lord does not speak the truth.” He ordered that Badi“ should be tortured with hot irons and forced to tell all he knew about the Bahá’ís. This was done, but he puzzled the soldiers so that they came to the Sháh saying, “This is a very strange man; the more we torture him, the happier he looks, and he will tell us nothing.” This story the Sháh could not believe, so ordered that Badi“’s photograph be taken during the torture. It was brought to him showing the smoke rising from the boy’s burning flesh and his face more radiant than ever. The Sháh was furious and, forgetting his promise, ordered that Badi“ should be killed at once, thus fulfilling the words of Bahá’u’lláh.

About three months later the Sháh asked to see the Tablet which had caused so much trouble, and after reading a few lines was so affected by its power that he threw it from him, exclaiming, “Take it away for if I read any more, I too shall become a Bahá’í!”

H. M. Haydar—‘Alí said: “Bahá’u’lláh endured hardships for the world. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is enduring {{p59}} hardships for the believers that they in turn may give the Light to the world.

---

Mírzá Asaduallah was visiting in ‘Akká and came to see us several times. We gave him special messages from some of the American friends, and told him howmuch the American believers loved him. He smiled, and answered that he loved them very much, for they were all his spiritual children. We also told him how many of his lessons we had copied and spread. He answered, “That is good. But now you have come yourselves to the Fountain — the Source — of all inspiration, and you must take back this Water of Life to all the believers. Here is the Treasure House, and you must fill your hands with jewels to take back to America.” We told him that was exactly what we had come for, and hoped our capacity would enable us to take much. He answered, “God also gives the capacity.

“The believers who visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and go out into the world are like the mists that gather on the bosom of the ocean; soon they will rise and spread, then condense, and shower the precious moisture, thus giving verdure and plenty to all the land.”

Mírzá Asadu’lláh talked most earnestly about the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, and wished us to tell the believers in American how very, very important it is to have it build now. He said, “Some of the people are poor and so think they cannot help. A few have enough money but thing for various reasons they cannot help. But all, each and every one who calls himself a Bahá'í and says the Greatest Name, should {{p60}} have a part in this great work, and if each believer gave only one stone, the building would be finished. It is not to be the home of the people but the Home of God; and while the people are poor, God is rich, and He has commanded that it be built and has promised to help those who arise to obey this command. This prison is now the Home of God; shall we not build in America the finest 'Home of God' possible?"

Among the pilgrims who were delighted to hear of our interest in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár at 'Ishqabád was Hájí Mírzá Muḥammad-Taquí (Afnán), an old, old man who was instrumental in having it built. He is a cousin of the Báb and uncle to Mírzá Muhsin. His work is finished, and he has come to 'Akká to end his days. (All relatives of the Báb's family are called "Afnán.")

Mírzá Jinab-i Zayn wrote the Traveler's Narrative.[^] He was a devoted follower of Bahá'u'lláh and accompanied Him to Baghdád. When Bahá'u'lláh was sent from there to Constantinople, Mírzá Jinab-i Zayn was exiled alone to Mosul, where he was obliged to stay for twelve years. At last Bahá'u'lláh called him to 'Akká, where he remained until his death — about four years ago. His native town was Najafabad, and when he returned there after an absence, he found but one believer. He taught about five thousand people. When one of his sons died, Bahá'u'lláh comforted him by saying, "You must not grieve over the death of your son; for you have given life to five thousand souls, and they are your spiritual sons." He was also given the name of Zayn, which in Arabic means "good." Two of {{p61}} his sons are now serving 'Abdu'l-Bahá as secretaries — Mírzá Munír-i Zayn and Mírzá Nuri'ddin-i Zayn. They very kindly interpreted for us when the Persian pilgrims called and when Hájí Mírzá Haydar-'Alí and Mírzá Asadu'lláh gave us instructions. Another son of Mírzá Jinab-i Zayn, Mírzá Bushra Zayn, also interpreted for us.

[^] According to H. M. Balyuzi (Edward Granville Browne and the Bahá'í Faith [London: George Ronald, 1970], p. 10n), "A manuscript copy [of A Traveler's Narrative] in the handwriting of an eminent Bahá'í, Zaynu'l-Muqarribin [Jinab-i Zayn], was given to Browne in Bahjí, 'Akká, in 1890. This book was written by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but at that time its authorship was anonymous. Browne had that manuscript published in facsimile...." Probably Mrs. Goodall and Mrs. Cooper were told that Jinab-i-Zayn wrote A Traveler's Narrative in the sense that he copied it; they may have misunderstood and thought that he had authored it. For accounts of Jinab-i Zayn's life and work see 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Memorials of the Faithful, trans. Marzieh Gail ((Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1971), pp. 150–53, and Adib Taherzadeh, the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh: Baghdád 1853–63 (Oxford: George Ronald, 1974), pp. 25–26. — Ed.

In Cairo, Ḥusayn Rúḥí took us to call upon that illumined soul, dear Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl. For some time he had been quite ill but had sufficiently recovered to be able to sit up and renew his writing. When asked about his illness, he said that he did not mind being sick, only that is prevented him from working on the book which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had commanded him to write. He said he was rejoiced to see us and to learn of the progress of the Holy Cause in our country and sent loving greetings to all the American believers. {{p62}}

INSCRIPTION ON THE GREATEST NAME STONE

“The star is a symbol of man’s body (Haykal). The Báb designed the star and wrote 360 forms of the name of Bahá’u’lláh in the center. These represented the Lights of the Perfection of God which could be contained in the body of a perfect man — Manifestation.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá designed the engraving on the stone. The center symbol means the Greatest Name. One star represents the name Báb, and the other star was used to balance the design.[^]

[^] For a detailed explanation of the Greatest Name see Adib Taherzadeh, The Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh: Baghdád 1853–63 (Oxford: George Ronald, 1974), pp. 25–26. — Ed.

Question: Do the hieroglyphics seen inside the great Pyramid refer to Bahá’u’lláh?

Answer: Maybe, but if this is so, it will be known in the future. There are prophecies in the old Persian books that were taken to India long ago by Zoroastrians when they were driven from Persia. In every old gospel, or sacred book, if it be carefully studied, reference to this Day may be found. The old Parsi books are in India, for the Parsis fled to India.

---

Question: Was Confucius a prophet?

Yes, though not so great as Buddha.

---

Question: What is the meaning of verse 52 on page 16 of The Hidden Words: {{p63}} “O Son of Man!” “My Calamity is My Providence. In appearance it is fire and vengeance; in reality it is Light and Mercy,” etc.[^]

[^] When Shoghi Effendi translated The Hidden Words, he renumbered the Arabic section. For his translation see Bahá’u’lláh, Hidden Words, p. 15, no. 51. — Ed.

Answer: These are the Words of Bahá’u’lláh referring to His persecutions and those of His Martyrs.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The form of the cross is made by two lines crossing each other at right angles. It is to be found in everything — even in this piece of cloth. It is the symbol of spiritual sacrifice.”

He said: “The present disturbances in Persia remind us of the French Revolution. In time, peace will come. Although the Bahá’ís will make no war in Persia or any other country, the flag of Bahá’u’lláh will overcome every other flag, and all rulers will do homage to it.

“You are very fortunate to have come here while there are no disturbances.” We answered that we appreciated this blessing and that in His Presence we felt we were at home. He replied, “This is your home.”

“You should be very happy to meet the Persian pilgrims in this Holy Place. California and Persia are very far apart, but the pilgrims from the furthestmost parts of the earth meet at ‘Akká by the power of the Word of God.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said He had revealed a Tablet to some Persians in which He wrote that the believers were drops of one sea, rain from one cloud, flowers of one garden, and stars of one heaven. {{p64}}

On His way home from a visit one morning, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá noticed a large hawk hovering over the garden. Another had also seen it, and that was a terrified little bird, but when the bird saw Him it flew straight to Him for protection, while the hawk sailed away.

One day at luncheon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked us if we were glad to be at ‘Akká and if we were happy. We answered that we were very happy to be there with Him but that when we thought of our faults we were unhappy. He replied emphatically, “Think not of yourselves, but think of the Bounty of God. This will always make you happy.” Then He smilingly referred to the Arabic saying regarding the peacock, that “He is contented because he never looks at his feet — which are very ugly — but always at his plumage which is very beautiful.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s approbation and encouragement — ignoring one’s faults and dwelling on one’s virtues — clear the spiritual vision so that, in His Presence, the soul becomes acutely conscious of its own unworthiness. This is God’s Way of teaching, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá daily practices the Command, “If a man have ten bad qualities and one good one, look at the one and ignore the ten.”[^]

Question: Is it necessary to arise to say the midnight prayer, or the prayer of the Dawn, or to wash the hands and face before using these?

Answer: No, the ablution is only for the obligatory daily prayer which should be said three times a day.[^]

[^] The Medium Obligatory Prayer is to be recited three times daily, in the morning, between noon and sunset, and in the evening. The Short Obligatory Prayer is to be recited once in twenty-four hours, between noon and sunset. The Long Obligatory Prayer is to be recited once in twenty-four hours. According to Shoghi Effendi, “The daily obligatory prayers are three in number... The believer is entirely free to choose any one of those three prayers but is under the obligation of reciting one of them, and in accordance with any specific directions with which they may be accompanied.” Shoghi Effendi, quoted in Bahá’u’lláh, The Báb, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Bahá’í Prayers: A Selection of the Prayers Revealed by Bahá’u’lláh, The Báb, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, rev. ed. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1970), pp. 117–28. For further details on obligatory prayers and a description of ablutions see Bahá’u’lláh, Synopsis and Codification, pp. 35–37. — Ed.

Question: Does ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wish the believers to take part in charitable or political affairs, or should they interest themselves in spiritual things only?

Answer: Any movement that is for the benefit of mankind should be joined by the Bahá’ís. If they are not asked to help, they should offer their services, especially all kinds of charitable work. They must not be exclusive but general and serve believers and unbelievers alike. They should also take the usual voter’s part in all elections.[^]

[^] According to The Universal House of Justice, “If a Bahá’í works for one political party to overcome another it is a negation of the very spirit of the Faith. Membership in any political party, therefore, necessarily entails repudiation of some or all of the principles of peace and unity proclaimed by Bahá’u’lláh. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stated: ‘Our party is God’s party — we don’t belong to any party.’” The Universal House of Justice, Messages from The Universal House of Justice 1968–1973 (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1976), p. 46. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1974), pp. 64–67, and “Membership Criteria in Non-Bahá’í Groups” in National Bahá’í Review, no. 106, (Feb. 1978), p. 5. — Ed.

PRONUNCIATION OF BAHÁ’U’LLÁH

The first a pronounced as u in but.

The second a pronounced as a in ah.

The o is a connecting letter and is now used, with the long sound, instead of

The connecting letter u that all may learn and used the same pronunciation.

Both lls following the o are sounded. Slight accent on second and last syllables.

---

Question: Was Bahá'u'lláh a descendant of Cyrus the Great?

Answer: Bahá'u'lláh was a descendant of Abraham. {{p67}}

MEETINGS

We asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá about our meetings, how they should be conducted, and we told Him we opened our services by saying the Greatest Name nine times in silence. He replied, “That is very good, that is right, for it brings those present into harmony.”

Then He said The Hidden Words should be read and often the “Tajalliyát” — the Five Holy Tablets — that this was important. The Hidden Words are words of counsel, and the “Tajalliyát” are words of instruction, and a preparation for the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. Besides these, other Tablets should be read.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that discussions and personal opinions expressed had caused inharmony and should be avoided, but that some speaking, such as accounts of the Visit by returning pilgrims, etc., always done in love, would be advisable because it was both developing and profitable. In general, it is best that speaking be not confined to one, that the appearance of leadership may be avoided.

“The object of the meetings is to produce harmony and happiness.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá highly approved of our dividing into groups for the purpose of answering questions and giving explanations after the service, at teatime. We told Him that the believers took charge of the meetings in turn and that the reading was done in turn, and He also approved of this. {{p68}}

A MESSAGE SENT BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

To the Beloved of God {greet}

Tell them I love them with all My Heart, that I always think of them and never forget them, that it makes Me happy to hear from them; and when I shall hear that they are entirely united, I shall be perfectly happy. To become harmonious is very important, for the least inharmony retards the bestowal of the great blessings that are awaiting them.

When one or two pilgrims come here, it is the same as if all the members of their assembly were present, and also the same as if all the believers in the world were here; for one or two represent the whole, and when I send My Love and Greetings to the believers through these pilgrims, it is the same as if they were here to receive them, and the Love is the same Love.

I wish the believers could know how much I love them. I would give My Life for them. {{p69}}

THE PICTURE OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH

The privilege of viewing the pictures of the Holy Báb and Bahá'u'lláh was accorded to us just before we left 'Akká.

This remarkable photograph of the Blessed Beauty is the only one in existence. How perfectly that noble Face and Form embody the Words, "The King has come! The Kingdom and Power, the Glory and Majesty are His! He is the Lord of mankind, the Ruler of the Throne and of the dust!" and at the same time express with such Power the utmost Gentleness and Love.

---

On Saturday morning, the eighteenth of January, after receiving the parting blessing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and bidding good-bye to all, from the Highest One to the least one in His Service, we drove to that most Sacred Spot, the Rawdatu'l-Mubaraká, the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh.

Outside the walls of 'Akká Mírzá Munír joined us, and at the Holy Tomb we were met by Hájí Siyyid 'Alí, the brother of Mírzá Muhsin.

As the resident believers make the pilgrimage on Friday, we had only the company of these two friends. They remained in the inner Court while we entered the Holy of Holies, alone.

That visit is indeed a glorious experience, at once both solemn and joyful. {{p70}}

As we left the heavenly Silence of that Center of Peace, some beautiful roses gathered from the outer garden were given to us, which we gratefully received and have carefully preserved.

---

From the Holy Tomb we drove to Haifa. Rúhá Khánum went with us to the Shrine on Mt. Carmel. We saw there the group of trees under which Bahá'u'lláh loved to rest. {{p71}}

SYMBOLIC PICTURE

As we slowly descended Mt. Carmel our eyes beheld a symbolic picture of wondrous beauty.

Before us spread the Bay of 'Akká. The sun had just disappeared (to our left), and it was still daylight, the glowing colors of the sky and landscape remaining.

To our right stretched the cream-colored beach; and, beyond, the dark green line of shrubs and trees followed its curve.

Still further on was the range of blue mountains, snowcapped.

The full moon of orange color had already risen above these mountains, and its golden beams reached across the bright blue Bay.

Directly opposite lay ‘Akká, the Beautiful, its forlorn, ancient buildings transfigured in that wonderful light to marble palaces, carved and jeweled — a “White City” rising from the Bay, its domes and minarets pointed with rubies.

The following Words of Bahá’u’lláh interpret the symbol: “O people of the earth! When the Sun of My Bounty sets and the Firmament of My Form is hidden, be not troubled. Arise for he helping of My Work and the advancement of My Word throughout the world. Verily, We are with you under all conditions and will help you with the Truth.”[^]

“Say, O people! {p72} “Let not trouble take possession of you when the kingdom of My Epiphany becomes concealed and the waves of the Ocean of My Utterance are hushed. “Verily, there is in My Epiphany a reason and in My Occultation another reason which none knoweth save God, the Incomparable, the All-Knowing.[^] And we shall see you from the most Glorious Horizon and will help whosoever riseth up for the helping of Our Work with hosts from the Supreme Concourse and a cohort of the Cherubim.”[^]

[^] Occultation means absence from the physical world. Shoghi Effendi translates this line as follows: “In My presence amongst you there is a wisdom, and in My absence there is yet another, inscrutable to all but God, the Incomparable, the All-Knowing.” Bahá’u’lláh, Gleanings, p. 139. — Ed.

At the time of the disappearance of the “Form” of the “Sun” (Bahá’u’lláh), the “Moon” of this Dispensation (‘Abdu’l-Bahá) had already arisen, and the Beams of the “Orb of peace and reconciliation” have encircled the globe.

As the light of the material sun remains long after it has set, so, in this Day, the Light of the Sun of God’s Manifestation remains, and the “Moon” of this Manifestation, being so high in the spiritual heaven, above the earthly states and conditions, will continue to reflect in greatest splendor the Light of the Heavenly Sun.

---

On the nineteenth of January we left the Holy Land, our spiritual Home, to enter the world again. Our hearts were full to overflowing with the gracious gifts which had been bestowed — not only upon us, but upon all the friends to whom we were bearing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s loving messages.

---

As we sailed away, gazing at ‘Akká, it presented a different appearance from its material reality. Instead {p73} of a crumbling, gray stone building, the prison, as it projected into the blue Sea, looked like an exquisite white marble “casket.”

From the worldly standpoint, it is truly a prison. From the heavenly standpoint, it is truly a “Casket” sustaining THE GEM OF MYSTERY, ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.

APPENDIX I,

TABLET TO MRS. ELLA GOODALL COOPER

Through his honor Mírzá Aḥmad and Mírzá Munír. Translated by M. A. Iṣ-fahání, Sept. 29, 1908.

To the maidservant of God, Mrs. Ella Goodall Cooper. Upon her be Bahá’u’lláh-al-Abhá!

HE IS GOD! {.sit}

Oh, thou who art attracted to the Kingdom of God!

Thy detailed letter was received. Its perusal produced the utmost happiness, for it evidenced the fact that thou hast attained to the knowledge of the reality of tests, that tests endured in the Path of God are conducive to confirmation, nay, rather, they are heavenly powers and the bounties of the realm of Might. But to the weak believers tests are trials and examination, for, on account of the weakness of their faith and assurance, they fall into difficulties and vicissitudes.

However, to those souls who are firm and steadfast, tests are the greatest favors.

Consider thou that at the time of an examination in sciences and arts, the dull and lazy pupil finds himself in calamity. But to the intelligent and sagacious student, examination in learning produces honor and infinite happiness. Alloyed gold subjected to the fire {{p78}} portrays its baseness, while the intensity of the flame enhances the beauty of pure gold. Therefore, tests to the weak souls are calamity, and to the veiled ones the cause of their disgrace and humiliation.

The point is this, that in the Path of Truth every difficulty is made plain and every trial is the matchless bounty.

Therefore, the believers of God and the maidservants of the Merciful must not relax during trial, and no disaster must deter their service in the Cause of God.

You have written that upon your return you have compiled whatever you saw and heard (at ‘Akká) and you have received the invisible assistance, that the teachings, which were like invisible seeds, have sprung to life and verdancy, spreading branches and leaves, and producing blossoms and fruits. Indeed, what you have written is true.

You have asked regarding the influence of evil spirits. Evil spirits are deprived of eternal life. How then can they exercise any influence? But as eternal life is ordained for holy spirits, therefore their influence exists in all the divine worlds.

At the time you were here, this question was accordingly answered, that after the ascension of the godly souls, great influence and widespreading bounties are destined for them, and all-encircling signs in the seen and unseen are decreed for them.

When the souls leave the bodies, they do not assume elemental bodies. Whatever man thinks regarding this is but his own imagination.

When man desires help and communication from holy souls, he puts himself in a condition of self-unconsciousness {{p79}} and becomes submerged in the sea of meditation, then a spiritual state, which is sanctified from matter and all material things, becomes visible and apparent to him. Then he thinks he beholds a form. Its appearance is like unto a vision.

Man beholds in the world of vision various images, communicates with them, and receives benefits, and in that world of vision he thinks they are physical temples and material bodies, while they are purely immaterial.

Briefly, the reality of the soul is sanctified and purified above matter and material things, but like unto the world of vision, it manifests itself in these material forms and visages. Likewise, in the psychic condition, one beholds the spirits like unto physical forms and visages.

To be brief, the holy souls have great influence and intense effect, and their influence and continuity does not depend upon physical existence and elemental composition.

Ponder ye, that during sleep the human body and the five physical senses, viz., sight, smell, taste, hearing, and touch are passive — i.e., all physical forces are inactive. Notwithstanding this, human reality has spiritual life, and the spiritual powers are penetrative; and wonderful disclosures are made in both the East and the West, and perchance one may discover some matters, which, after a long time, may become apparent in the physical world. Therefore, it has become evident that the continuity and influence of the human reality does not depend upon the physical instrumentality; nay, rather, the physical body is an instrument over which the human spirit {{p80}} spreads a luminosity. It is like unto the sun which, shining upon the mirror, causes its brilliancy, and when the reflection is withdrawn from the mirror, it becomes dark. Likewise, when the luminosity of the human spirit is withdrawn from the body, that instrument becomes useless.

To be brief, Humanity consists of the spiritual reality, and that reality is penetrative in all things, and it is that reality which discovers the invisible mysteries, and through that reality all sciences, arts, and inventions become known and manifest. Whatever thou beholdest of the works of man is but a faint ray of that reality. It encircles all things and comprehends all things.

Render thou that all these existent sciences, crafts, industries, and arts were at one time in the world of invisibility, unknown and concealed mysteries. As the spirit of man environs all things, therefore he has discovered them and brought them from the unknown world into the arena of manifestation.

Therefore, it is evident and established that the human spirit is the discoverer of things, the seer of things, and the comprehender of things.

But regarding the progress of the spirit in the world of the Kingdom after its ascension, it is wholly beyond space and time, and developments after leaving this body are spiritual and not terrestrial. It is like unto the progress of the child from the world of the fetus to the world of maturity and intelligence, from the world of ignorance to the world of knowledge, from the station of imperfection to the pinnacle of perfection.

As Divine Perfections are infinite, therefore progress of the spirit is limitless. {{p81}}

Whatever the European and American historians have written regarding His Highness Muḥammad the Messenger of God, most of it is falsehood.

Consider ye, is it possible for a person afflicted with epilepsy to establish such a great nation?

Therefore, this statement of the European historians regarding that Holy Personage is unqualified falsehood.

Reflect ye that that Illustrious Personage was born in the Sahara of Arabia among the ignorant tent dwellers, affiliating and associating with them till he grew to manhood and maturity, never studying the sciences and arts; nay, even He was apparently illiterate and uninstructed. Notwithstanding all this, He brought forth such a nation, established such a religion, and uttered such explanations regarding scientific questions, with great perspicuity, and raised such a community from the nadir of ignorance and barbarism to the zenith of civilization and prosperity! Through His influence, science, literature, philosophy, crafts, and trades made wonderful progress during the medieval ages in Andalusia and Baghdád.

Now is it possible that such an illustrious Personage be afflicted with epilepsy?

Relative to the Paradise explained by Muḥammad in the Qur'án, such utterances are spiritual and are cast into the mold of words and figures of speech; for at that time people did not possess the capacity of comprehending spiritual significances. It is similar to that reference to His Highness Christ who, addressing His disciples said, "I shall not partake of the fruit of the vine anymore until I reach the Kingdom of My Father." Now it is evident His Highness Christ did {{p82}} not mean material grapes, but it was a spiritual condition and a heavenly state which He interpreted as this fruit.

Now, whatever is revealed in the Qur'án has the same import.

Regarding the Most Great Name, Its influence, both in physical and spiritual affairs is indisputable and certain.

In the last Tablet (to the Board of Council of New York) in which I have stated, "I am not Christ and am not eternal," the meaning is this, that I am not Christ — and not the Eternal Lord! But I am ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This is its real purport. Undoubtedly, those souls who are under the shadow of the Blessed Cause, believing and assured, firm and steadfast, and living in accord with the Divine exhortations and advices, all of them are confirmed in the Everlasting Life.

Regarding the materialization of spirits through mediums: A person finding himself in a state of trance, or unconsciousness, is like one who sleeps, whatever he feels and sees he imagines to be matter and of material things, but in reality they are wholly immaterial.

O thou maidservant of God! Arouse ye the people and make them cheerful through the Glad Tidings of God, and quicken them through the Spirit of Gladness and Heavenly Rejoicing. The essence and foundation of all is to advance toward the Kingdom of Abhá and to be attracted by the Beauty of God. Whatever produces any influence in the world of existence is on account of the Love of God, which is the Spirit of Life and the cause of Salvation. {{p83}}

Convey on behalf of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wonderful Abhá Greetings to the believers and the maidservants of the merciful.

Upon thee be Bahá’ul-Abhá!

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás {{p84}} {sig}

APPENDIX II,

TABLET TO MRS. ELLA GOODALL COOPER Through Dr. Aminullah Farid. To the revered Maidservant of God, Mrs. Ella G. Cooper. Upon her be Bahá’u’lláh! HE IS GOD!

O thou who art attracted to the Kingdom of God:

Thy writing of August 19, 1905, was considered, and the contents were a source of joy.

If thou question regarding the trials and difficulties of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, that is a sea, boundless, surging, and full of storms; but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is in perfect peace and composure, and in complete joy, happiness, and tranquility; nay, it is for Him a ready banquet and an adorned feast. I hope that at the end of this feast and banquet the overflowing chalice of Martyrdom will come round to Him, and then will He be intoxicated by that wine.

But you must not look to the catastrophes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Consider power and strength, and withstand the world. For the sake of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá bear the persecution of enemies, and the blame of those who oppose. Under all conditions, My Soul and My Life shall abide with you in this world as well as the world above.

O maidservant of God! Hasten and sow the seed as {{p85}} best you can, for time passes away, and through it shall the blessing of the Kingdom appear.

Question: Are prayers answered by the Essence of God or by His Manifestation?
{{p86}}

O thou maidservant of God! The answer to prayer is through the Great Manifestation of God. But for obtaining material things, if the ignorant (of the Manifestation) supplicate and implore and pray God, it will also be effective.

O, thou maidservant of God! Although the Reality of Divinity is boundless, yet the purposes and needs of the servants are limited. The Bounty of God is like unto the rain from Heaven. The water has no limit and no form, but in every place it will take to itself a form and effect peculiar to the capacity and preparation thereof. That shapeless water when poured into a square reservoir will appear as a square. Likewise when in the hexagonal vessel or in the octagonal. Water has no geometry, no limit, and no form. But it will appear in one of the forms according to the exigencies of time and place.

Likewise the Holy Essence of God is boundless, but Its Manifestation and Bounty in the creatures is limited. Thus the prayers of certain persons concerning special matters are answered accordingly.

Question: It is claimed by some Bible students that the Valley of Achor, referred to in Hosea 2:15, does not mean the City of ‘Akká, and it is not a prophecy relating to this Manifestation. Is this another place?

O maidservant of God! It is recorded in the Bible: “Achor shall be a door of hope unto them.” This Achor is the City of ‘Akká. Whosoever interprets this otherwise is ignorant.[^]

[^ ] The Universal House of Justice in a letter dated February 20, 1978, to the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States, noted that, “There is a Tablet written by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to an individual believer in California on 19 August 1905 in which He states, ‘In the Torah it says that the Valley of Achor was made for you a door of hope; this valley is the city of ‘Akká, and this is certainly so...’. This is similar to the statement of the Guardian on page 184 of “God Passes By”, “‘Akká, itself, ... designated by Hosea as a door of hope’. ...it is thus indisputably clear that the Valley of Achor (which means Valley of trouble) in this prophecy refers to the City of ‘Akká....” — Ed.

O thou maidservant of god! I hope that thou mayest again make the pilgrimage to this Blessed Spot and attain great development.

APPENDIX III, TABLET PREDICTING THE “TESTS” OF SAN FRANCISCO

To the Maidservant of God, Mrs. Helen S. Goodall — California. Upon her be Bahá'u'lláh! HE IS GOD!

O thou who art attracted to the Fragrances of God!

Verily, I read thy latest letter, and My great love welled forth unto thee on account of its wonderful contents. Verily, it showed thy firmness in the Cause of God, and that thou wilt resist great tests in the future. Still greater tests will appear in your great city.

As to thee, make firm thy footsteps of the believers of God on this right Path, and say, verily, the test has a great power, and when its storms wax fierce, they uproot everything, even large and well-rooted trees, and they wreck great ships on the ocean.

But whoso among the maidservants of God firmly resists a great test, her face shall gleam, and her brow shall glitter in the Supreme Concourse. This is what We inform thee, so that when the test appears, thou mayst be heedful thereof and mayst remind the maidservants of God that the tests have also occurred in former dispensations, even at the time of Christ.

Christ said, “Fast, so that you may not fall into temptation.” Verily, tests withheld a great apostle {{p89}} (Judas) from the Mercy of God and made him take part in the shedding of Christ’s blood. The tests made Peter the apostle deny Christ. The tests mad the brothers of Christ deny Him. Many a just, faithful, and assured soul did not endure the power of the tests, turned backward, until they reached the lowest of the low.
