Dr Finkelstein: ‘Throughout all of Europe, a meeting similar to this, with such depth of love and spirituality, is never seen. Even among members of the same family, such affection is not experienced. We have much to learn from the East, especially culture, humanity and spirituality. In its place, we can offer science, technology and industry.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes, indeed. The relationship between the East and the West must be like that, otherwise it is of no benefit. . . . the Germans were very kind to us. I am well pleased with the Germans. The spiritual future of Germany is very glorious. The word “German” in Persian means “Our kinsmen”. I was happier in Germany than anywhere else.’ [180–2]

At night, the German visitors stayed in Abu-Sinan; the following day they had lunch with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and then returned to Haifa. At the time of his departure, Dr Finkelstein said to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, ‘These two days in your august presence were the sweetest time of my life.’ [182]

1 March 1915

In Abu-Sinan, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá instructed Dr Mu’ayyad to travel in his carriage to Haifa and visit Hájí Mírzá Haydar-‘Alí, and then to return the following day. At dusk, Dr Mu’ayyad was summoned to his presence. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke about Dr Finkelstein and the other guests, remarking:

Consider what an immense love and devotion governs our relationship and how devotedly we cherish them. They have no prejudice; they eat everything, unlike the Jews in this land. The Jews in America have similar traits and listen attentively. [183]

That night, in the home of Shaykh Salih, “Abdu’l-Bahá remarked:

Piety is the mother of all goodly characters, and its absence is the mother of all evil . . . One time in ‘Akká, fifty Christians were imprisoned. Their [Muslim] gaoler would beat and torture them, considering this a meritorious deed before God. Through [inflicting] various injuries, he would also exact money from the prisoners, and when they did not pay, would beat them even more severely, claiming, This is jihad!’ Eventually one of them came to me. I complained to the governor, Though the prisoners are Christians, such treatment is unwarranted. If any Muslim wishes to wage jihad, let him go to the battlefield and war against the Russians. Otherwise, what is the point of beating defenseless prisoners?’ The governor summoned the gaoler and ordered that he receive fifty strokes of the cane. Eventually, the situation of the gaoler deteriorated so that he would come to me, asking for alms for his needy wife and children. He became a beggar. [183–4]

2 March 1915

Dr Mu’ayyad was summoned to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s presence early in the morning and had tea with him. He remarked, When you go to Haifa [today], give my greetings to that Egyptian youth and tell him that his letter was received. However, for his protection, I will not reply, as they search all the papers closely. Through divine bounties, without need for paper and pen, our spiritual communion will be everlasting.’ He added: I use hyssop. Is it used in modern medicine?’ Mu’ayyad responded: I do not know its chemical composition.’ “Abdu’l-Bahá said:

It has a diuretic effect, and therefore it is beneficial. It is also very useful for curing shortness of breath. It has an indirect influence. The root of corn and cherry bark are also diuretic. But all healing resides with God. These are all instruments.

For healing, two causes are necessary: physical and spiritual. For a material remedy, physicians and medicine are needed. And for the spiritual cure, confirmations and divine healing are required.

Similarly for commerce, two causes have been decreed. The material cause is having capital and expertise, and the spiritual cause requires divine confirmation. If the material means are not available, then all efforts are squandered. And should the divine confirmations accompany a deed, then its benefits will be immense and universal. If both are present, then it will be light upon light. Otherwise, efforts will be wasted. Confirmation and divine affirmation must surround all undertakings – this is true even in war . . . [186]

3 March 1915

Shaykh Yusuf and Mírzá Tarazu’llah, son of Mírzá Maḥmúd Kashi, came to meet with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Abu-Sinan and reported, The governor is preparing for defensive measures and predicts that warships will bombard the city’. “Abdu’l-Bahá remarked:

In these days, it is time for calmness and dignity; it is time for confidence and assurance. We must rely upon God. Be most vigilant, so that you do not grow perturbed and perplexed. They say that [one day] when Napoleon was writing a letter, an enemy artillery shell exploded near his tent and dirt fell over the letter. He was not perturbed in the least, and paused for a minute to say, ‘I am thankful to our foes for helping me in my work. I was going to pour some sand over this letter to dry the ink, but now our enemy has helped, so that I can finish this task and issue the command for attack.' With that, he ordered his men into the field with trumpet blasts. It so happened that they were victorious.

May God provide means for our succor. At present the situation is very troublesome. Some things can be tolerated, but others cannot. For instance, when we arrived in 'Akká, the situation was very difficult. We were imprisoned, and two of our friends passed away. No money was available for their burial. There was one small carpet which we sold for a few qurush and gave to the Imám Jum'ih, who placed those two in a ditch and scattered a little dirt over them. We had to feed one hundred and fifty people.

Thinking about troubles is more difficult than the actual experience. How wonderful it would have been if human beings were like the birds of the air, which are carefree and never save for their next meal. I hope that soon God will fling open His gate of mercy upon His servants. It has been very difficult for people. Before my journey to America, I knew two or three hundred of the poor. But now, save for a handful, they have perished. [190–1]

Dear Friends:

Today about 11 o'clock the Beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came out of the house and I followed Him on His walk. It was a perfect day, the City of ‘Akká was bathed in the war rays of the sun, and something filled my heart and whispered the words, “It is good to be here”.

Recently the news of the war has set a train of thought in the minds of the people; the Turkish government has sent spies all over the country to find out what the people are thinking and doing. Thus suspicion and mistrust are eating away the very heart of confidence and mutual relationship from amongst the inhabitants.

It was apropos of the above conditions that the Beloved spoke as follows:

“Suspicion, like unto the hot blast of mid-summer, withers the roots of the sweet and delicate flowers of trust and confidence.

It extinguishes the light of love and spreads the darkness of surmise and doubts. It blights the immortal plants of faith and reliance, and increases the germs of destruction and ruin,

It is worse than the venom of serpent and more harmful than the armies of locusts.

The poison of an adder kills the body, but the virus of suspicion destroys the spirit.

It has been demonstrated by eminent biologists that a single bacterium, after twenty-four hours of self-production and generation, would reach the total number of 16, 776, 216 bacteria. This is true in a higher degree of the germs of suspicion, for the generative energy is most marked and its power of fecundity well pronounced. The numerous colony of our bacteria had at least one bacterium for their primal ancestor, but suspicion cannot even claim as much. It is always uncertain origin; it sulks in the darkness. It cannot show its genealogical tree, its genesis is never established. It jumps into the midst of a company, nobody knows from where, and immediately it starts flying around in the dust of doubt and hesitation.

The individual members of the company feel a strange and unexplainable sensation creeping over their souls and benumbing their finer spiritual sensibilities.

They look at each other with different eyes; they begin to suspect one another and shun each other's association.

Extract from a letter written to Frau Consul Schwarz by Mírzá A. S. Bahadur.

On the 13rd, of December (G915) r. Shonki, Nab. bani his grandson and I, left here and after thirty hours of continuous journey we were honored in the Holy Presence* I kissed His feet, but in doing so I had the feeling that I was doing so in behalf of all the dear German brethern.

I offered to Him the letters I had received wish my mail for Him, with the translations, He read them thvou and was most delighted. Then, turning to a great Bahá'í teacher who has lately come from home to visit Him, said: Take these, and read them and see how pure and sincere they are. That friend asked if he could copy the translations. He granted per nission to him, Then the Master went on praising them saying: T There are many on the battleifields performing their au. ties, loyally 66 their. Government, to their country and also their duty to GOD. Eveh on the battlefield they are in viting and leading their fellow en to the Kingdom of GOD. Really their characters are admirable.

I spoke about my father, Consul Bchwarz, that he had „sent for sotto spiritual literature to study and teach his co.officers, He said: Yes, I know, he is very active, steadfast and sincere and aided by divine confirmations.

I was in the Holy Presence for four days, Some letters came from America, I translated and presented them to lam, After having read them He turned to me and said: The letters which come from the German friends give me the greatest joy because the stifling air of violation of the Covenant of GOD has not permeated into that country, They are pure and unstained. I have often said that their progress will be great and rapid after this war is over*

Then I asked for a few Tablets of which one might be common for all. I accepted, At noon being called, to take tea with Him, I was going to have the Tablets when unfortunately some intruder came and occupied the time till sunset; when we were obliged to bid farewell to Him and come and join our lessons, On my departure He said: Write answers to the letters of the dear German friends and tell them that I am well, Although material communication is cut off and no proper and sufficient correspondence, yet they are always in heart, I am almost always thinking of them and asking for the Blessings of the Blessed Beauty upon them all. They are the chosen people of GOD. So do not be sorry over the present troubles, They are like the waves of the stormy ocean, The waves shall soon cease to rise and again calmness shall be noticed, Trust in GOD and feel comfortable,

Dear friends,

This morning we were delighted to be called into the Presence of Abdul Baha. This was the second time that I found myself in his room in the house in which the Holy Family lives. From its windows all the surrounding country mountains and valleys are seen-thus bringing before the eyes a most charming view. Behind one of these windows, on the Divan the Beloved was sitting. He sent also for Sheik Saleh- the ground old man of Abon Senan. For one hour we were thus enjoying the showers of his spiritual blessings and our ears were charmed with the music of his voice. Because Mirza Badi Effendi and Doctor Ḥabíbu’lláhallah were going to leave for Haifa to return tomorrow he sent with them a loving message to the Egyptian young man whom he meet in Acca:- "Give him my greeting. Tell him that nowadays correspondence is impossible. Letters of the simplest kind are dangerous to be mailed. Notwithstanding this, the hearts communicate with each other with perfect spirituality. Ideal correspondence cannot be stopped. The feelings and susceptibilities annihilate space and bring the souls together.

Then he spoke about the present sad conditions of the country. The wisdom of all these events will become apparent in the future. The plan of God will emerge out of these confusions little by little. We must patiently wait for the end and not be disturbed by these means. Speaking about healing he said:- "Healing is of two kinds, the physical and spiritual. The physical healing is made possible through medicines, but the spiritual healing is granted by God." Then he spoke about Russo-Japanese war and the extraordinary victory achieved by Japan. He related certain phases of war which are too well known to the historians and need not be recorded here.

At eleven o'clock Mirza Jalal and Rouha Khansin and two of his children accompanied by our two brother left for Haifa.

Then the Master after having a long walk stopped at the door {{p20}} of the Bahai school and entered the room. All the children got up from their seats and stood reverently while the Beloved was looking kindly at each. Speaking to Mirza Moner who is also a teacher said:-" These are my children. They are my dear sons and daughters. I am very thankful to both the teachers because they are exerting themselves very faithfully in their education.

In the afternoon he was downstairs. The Orthodox priest and another Young man called on him and for an hour or more he entertained them with local stories of brigands and ruffians who infested the streets of Haifa and Acca in former years and the methods used by the authorities to arrest them. There was a small meeting in the evening. The Master came down but did not speak. He asked Mirza Moner to chant the Holy communes, thus breathing into us a new spirit of life and Joy.

I may share with you the translation of the following small supplication revealed by Abdul Baha for the children:- "O Thou Incomparable God! Grant Thou an asylum to this weak O Thou Almighty. Although we are perishable plants, we belong to thy rose garden. Although we are leafless and blossomless tress, still we are of Thy orchard. Therefore nurture Thou this plant with the Showers of the Clouds of Providence and water it with the rain of Thy Mercy. Awaken him, make him intelligent, suffer him to become worthy being, confer Thou upon him eternal Life and establish him in Thy Kingdom."

The friend in Abon Senan send you Bahai greeting and wish to be remembered to you under all circumstances. Although we do not hear from you yet our hearts are one in the love of Baha. The flowers of the Kingdom of Abba perfume the souls and the stars of past memory shine as brilliantly. Nothing can break the bond of unity between believers. In the course of this human life we may not meet each other but we know the spirit of God is protecting all, guiding all and inspiring all. Let us all turn our faces towards the center of reality and there we will find an eternal presence.

Dear friends,

Spiritual solitude, a deep and reverent searching into the things of God a whole-minded concentration the development of the latent abilities of the soul the down pouring of supernal strength and Grace, the gathering up of the power of life and light, the inner illumination, the emerging out of solitude and entering upon a vast arena of ideal, intellectual and physical activities in the service and for the progress of mankind have been more or less, the gradual steps in the enfoldment of the divine life of every divine Man. Far away from the hustling and bustling of mankind they stand and work waiting patiently for their destined time; so that they may come out and occupy themselves in the service of their fellowmen. These are the most extraordinary beings, whose bodies, brains and hearts seem to have been created out of other texture than mortal clay. They are in every sense the accredited Ambassadors of the Most High sent to the warring nations to settle their disputes and extinguish the fire of their chronic differences. As such their authority is supreme, forming the supreme Court of Justice for the people of the world. If we look into the nature of their laws and precepts we clearly see they were intended for the protection of mankind and not for their destruction, they were revealed for the advancement of real civilization and not the fostering of anarchy, they were proclaimed as antidotes and not as poisons to undermine the constitutions of humanity. If in certain instances the latter has been the result, we owe it principally either to the misguided zeal or the ignorant interpretation of their narrow-minded followers who prefer sectarianism privileges to the radiant bliss of celestial brotherhood, the dim light of the candle to the world illuminating rays of the sun. The primary teachings of these good men were truly intended for all mankind and each in his own age and cycle stood as the prototype of all goodness, all justice and all mercy. Whatever is asserted to the contrary they had no love of preference or distinction. They did not come to establish their own claims because that was not necessary - but they came to educate the people and teach them how to love God and each other and live will and peace as the members of one family.

Taking up to the premises laid down in the first part of this letter and looking for a moment into the recorded history of the prophets of God- we see that Moses left his people in the wilderness and ascended the Sinaitic Mountain, there to speak with Jehovah and receive the Tablets of Decalogue, engraved upon them with the fingers of 'I am that I am', those simple eternal laws which have been considered the very corner stone of civic and moral life. When Gautama evinced that preoccupation with the sufferings of all sentient beings he left his palace, wife and son and all the pomps of royalty of a throne- in order to retire under the Bodhi druma.' [the tree of intelligence] There he sat for weeks plunged in profound meditation on the cause of things, fighting with Mara or the Prince of darkness till at last he emerged into that state of inner enlightenment and mystic illumination in which he understood, according to the Buddhist historians, the cause of sufferings and consequently its cure. It was after this spiritual enfoldment that Siddhartha became The Buddha-'The Awakened, The Enlightened.' The solution of his problem or in other word, the worlds problem having been vouch safe, he spent the last forty years of his life travelling and preaching his gospel. His Holiness Christ spent forty days in the wilderness, preparing himself for his world wide mission of love and light. Satan took him on the top of the mountain showed him the Kingdoms and principalities of this earth and offered them to him if he would fall on the ground and worship him. But Jesus resisted this temptation and at the end of forty days came out amongst his fellowmen and started his Ministry and the announcement of the Kingdom of God and the ringing message of life, life more abundantly.' Before Mohammad reached his fortieth year he sought the solitude of a Cavern on Mount Hera, about three leagues North of Mecca, where he would remain days and nights together, engaged in prayer and meditation. Here his fervent and enthusiastic spirit labored with conceptions too great for mortal thought. Here he became convinced of the gross idolatry of the Arabs and his divine heart was inspired with the idea of religious reform. In this state of solitary and mental abstraction he spend many months, especially the month of Ramzan, sacred to all the Arabs.

At last the hour of inner illumination and heavenly annunciation arrived and a flood of spiritual light encircled him. His understanding was instantly brightened with celestial splendor and he also left his Cave and commenced his God-given work amongst the Arabs, purging his country from the evil practice of polytheism and heinous customs and raising the Flag of the Oneness of God. On October 14th, 1853, Baha Ollah and his family were exiled from Teheran to Bagdad. He was then 37 years old. A year after his arrival in Bagdad he retired for prayer and contemplation to the Mountains of Kurdestan. In the vicinity of Soleymanich he lived in a cave for two years. Here he thought over his future Cause, laid its foundation upon the firm rock of his capacious heart and prepared himself for the great universal work which was going to usher in the age of brotherhood. Here in the evenings he would sing out his pains and sorrows and all the shepherd in the surrounding hills, attracted by the rich symphonies of his life, gathered to listen to his melodious voice. Here he immersed himself in the sea of Universal Love, walked in the rose garden of universal Peace, basked in the sunshine of Universal Truth, perfumed his inner being with the flowers of Universal Ideals communed uninterruptedly with the Universal Intelligence, drank deep from the Fountain of Universal Beauty and feasted his soul at the hangout of Universal Mind. Then having been fully equipped with these sharp weapons of realities and his heart enkindles and illumined with the Fire of the Holy Spirit he left his retirement and came out into the world of men to help and assist them not only with His Laws but with His Majestic Presence. The rest of His divine Life was spent in the education and enlightenment of the world, whole undergoing for the sake of His Principle calamities and banishments, till at the early dawn, on the 28th of May 1892, he ascended to the Supreme Horizon, while having in the Mansion of Bahajee, outside of Acca.

After the ascension of the Blessed Perfection Abdul Baha, the Centre of His Covenant, retired for about 40 days to the Cave of Elijah {{p24}} and communed with the spirit of prophesy. Alone and in the solitude of the sacred cave he prayed and reinforced himself from the centre of all-power. Here he dreamed of the general promotion of the Teaching of His Kingly Father and here he evolved out of those Teachings his matchless addresses and talks now extant in every part of the world.

Similarly the Bahais who have received the essences of the teachings and wisdom of the past prophets and are anxious to serve mankind must of a necessity acquire this illumination, receive this spiritual baptism and gain this initial admission.

This mystic enlightenment is not a matter of training or education; it is a pure Gift bestowed by the almighty upon whomsoever He willeth. But our task is to purify the vessels of our hearts, to clear the dust off the surface of our souls, to cleanse the interior chambers of our minds and forget self and its enticements. In other word, if we have no ability or capability we must create it by a process of refinement, consisting of prayer, supplication, contemplation, meditation and activity, and trust in the Illuminator of the hearts knowing full well that He will never disappoint His suppliant servants standing at His Door. He has reserved our hearts for the thrones of His Presence but we have invited the strangers in. He comes to take his place but finding another he returns to His Supreme Abode. He pays us calls at the early dawn but discovers us in deep slumber upon the couch of negligence; then swifter than the nightingale, he flies back to the rose-bush of eternity.

Today we did not see the Beloved. It was a windy day and therefore did not come out. In the afternoon Mirza Badi and Doctor Halubillah returned from Haifa and brought us the good news of the recovery of Haji Mirza Haydor Ali. In the evening there was a meeting and the Master was present. He said:-“One hour in the life of Haji is a rare jewel.” Then he urged the friends to show firmness and steadfastness in the face of the present difficulties and let not outward circumstances disturb their

Dear friends,

Real faith is the cornerstone of all the great accomplishments and without it nothing succeeds. We must have faith in God and faith in ourselves. After a small army have overcome a superior force, because they have had faith in their general and faith in the power of their arms. Faith is the soul of a nation; now and then through the negligence or ignorance of the people it may sleep but it will never die. An internal or external shaking will awaken it out of its slumber and give to it extraordinary activity in all directions. The more our faith the greater our power of endurance. A faithless wight is a weak person. Faith is an eternal miracle and the power to forget the present turmoil and agnosticism and look into the future, pregnant with peace and trust in God. Faith is the unerring seer, the wise knower and the logical thinker. A person without the power of Faith can never achieve greatness nor reach the pinnacle of the mountain of confidence. Faith is the cool water of Life that allays the thirst of atheism. Faith is the radiant orb that illumines the dark corners of the heart. Faith is an imperishable rose that perfumes the nostrils of those who inhale it. The true life of man is the life of faith. With its assistance he will become enabled to surmount every difficulty to weather every storm, to accept serenely every test and attain to the highest point of assurance. One grain of faith is more precious than all the jewels of the earth. Real Faith is the solvent of all the problems and the guide of every erring one. Faith is the paradise of contentment, the Abode of Peace, the asylum of security, the home of truth, the fountain of salvation, the singing bird of joy, and the harbinger of good-tidings! If we have faith we have everything if we are animated by the spirit of faith we are alive, if we turn our faces toward the Beauty of faith we will be confirmed and if we fill our hearts with the graces of faith we will become invulnerable.

This morning I found the Beloved downstairs and he was speaking with a clergyman on the power of faith. I have tried to embody the spirit of his remarks in the above words. Then he spoke on botany and scientific agriculture, giving innumerable examples how to sow wheat, barley, potatoes and beans. Fertilization of the soil was another topic that interested several farmers who were present. When the meeting was at an end he arose from his seat and invited others to take a walk with him through the beautiful, green country. They all followed him but I returned to my Cabin to speak with you quietly with pen and paper. The rest of the day I was working with few interruptions. From nine to 12 Doctor Ḥabību'llāh-allah is in the room to receive the sick ones and minister to their physical pains and sufferings. While I sit in the corner of the room I am forced eye-witness of the patients and their manifold sicknesses. This morning a woman came in whose left eye was blinded, the right eye very sore and the nose flattened, When our Doctor asked her the cause of this disfigurement, she told him a pathetic story: Her husband being a cruel and brutish man because she had forgotten to feed the chicken one afternoon, had kicked her in the left eye which was totally blinded, brought the force of his fist against the right eye which was quite destroyed and pushed her forward from above the stairs, thus falling on the ground downward, causing the flat nose. Oh! my blood boiled in my veins when I heard this story! Who could listen to such dreadful story and look into the face of this poor, bewailing woman and not be shaken to the core of his being. Such are the beastly qualities of some of these savage men who are disgracing the virgin purity, delicacy and beauty of woman! And the worst of all was that poor girl could complain to no one nor carry her heart-rendering case to any court nor ask redress from any person. This is one of many such instances that comes daily within our notice and our good Doctor tries his level best to bind the wounds and recover the shattered, depressed souls.

In the evening we had a large meeting and the Beloved relates a fascinating story which I will relate for your benefit in

May 1, 1915 Home of Abdul Baha Mount Carmel Haifa, Syria

Dear friends!

The blue horizon of the kindling azure was begemmed with the golden rays of the dawn of the sun, heralding the coming of the incense- breathing morn and putting an end to the palpable obscure of the night. I had awakened quite as early and was in the paradise of eternal joy, so still and peaceful was the sacred place. My heart was in silent communion and prayer with the source of all good and my mind was busy with the thoughts of far- off friends who are longing day and night to approach the throne of the glorious Master and receive his spiritual benediction. Although the word has become a pandemonium of harsh and discordant voices and the sound of trumpet and the clash of arms are deafening the ears of all the inhabitants of the globe, yet here, in this sweet garden we have peace, because the Prince of Peace lives amongst us. Because he possesses our hearts and we possess his love we do not feel the need of anything. His love has made us rich; his faith has glorified us; around his heavenly table we have sat and we are satiated; from the many-fountain [unreadable] spring of his knowledge we have quaffed and we have allayed our thirst, the ruby wine of his sincerity we have drank from the goblet of severance and thereby we are intoxicated; the beauty of his face we have beheld and have become his soul-sacrificing slaves; the effect of his words we have felt and thus we are hastening toward the arena of martyrdom; the wisdom of his utterances we have felt and hence we are living under the shade of the tree of obedience to his command; the tenderness of his affection we have experienced and therefore we are devoted to his Cause. The sun of his mercy has illumined the consciences of those who have turn toward him and sought spiritual light and guidance just this phenomenal sun bestows light and life to all the created beings. With him for our support we are invulnerable. His celestial majesty will transform our earthly degradation and his supernal station will raise us out of the dark well of debasement.

While I was weaving together the silken threads of the above thoughts I heard the footstep of the Beloved and I turned and bowed down. "Ah!" he asked. "What art thou doing so early in the garden?" "I was praying." "For what?" "I begged Baha Ollah to make the heart of each individual like unto this holy garden." "I will also pray for this," A stiff breeze was blowing and therefore he said: "Those who are advanced in age must not expose their bodies to the cold and cutting wind. This frigid wind causes the indisposition of the physical body bent the frosty gale of passion and self-undermines the foundation of the spiritual health of mankind. Under all circumstances we must protect our ideal and astral bodies from one of the Persian poets the translation of which is as follows: "I trained myself and at last it became the means of my undoing. I did not know all this time that I was training my own implacable foe." He said: "It is very true, Self is not only one's own enemy but rather the enemy of God and humanity alike."

About ten o'clock I went out and found him sitting in the store of Mirza Amayetullah. He had just returned from paying a visit to the German Consul. He beckoned to me and bade me to be seated. A young boy passed by followed by a little, white bleating lamb. Evidently this simple scene evoked in him the pleasant memories of childhood for he smiled and said: - "How the children love the small innocent lambs! especially when they ran after them, filling their ears with baa..aa..aa baa..aa..aa... Because their nature is so simple the children love all kind of animals and stories relating to them as well as to inanimate objects. I remember an incident of my childhood which will bear out this matter. I was then very, very young, probably 3 or 4 yrs. At the time the Blessed Perfection lived in Teheran. In our street, close by to our house lived one of the Farrashes of the palace. He was a bird fancier and in a peculiar manner, all his own he had tamed a number of nightingales which followed him everywhere, sitting on his head and shoulders and while he walked in the streets they marbled melodiously. He had cut a piece of the lower bills of the poor birds; - so that they could not pick up the grains and were forced to eat out of his hand. Often he used to come to our garden with the nightingales perched on his head. As a child I was delighted with the strange spectacle.

The birds flew away and sat on the branches of the trees singing. Then suddenly the man whistled and they returned back swiftly, roosting on his head, shoulders and hands. This sight especially pleased me and I clapped my hands with glee as I watched them. Here the Beloved laughed very heartily and clapped his hands with such joy as though he was again witnessing the sight of long years ago.

In the evening we all gathered in the holy Presence and speaking about faithfulness he said: "Man must be loyal and faithful to his superior. An unloyal person is dispossessed of every fair virtue. Those who have entered beneath the shade of the tree of the Blessed Perfection and live in accord with this good-pleasure are the faithful servants of the Cause of God. They are the standard bearers of the principles of rectitude and integrity."

During the last few days there has been a talk of the return of the Holy Family and the believers from Bou Senan. Four days ago the Master gave them permission and naturally this has made them very happy, because they did not feel quite themselves when he was away from them. today the first party arrived and were present in the meeting. They reported that the Sheiks and the Druises were much [unreadable] over the sudden departure of believers and were actually weeping on account of the separation. They had counted on us that we were to continue to stay at least for one year and could not make out the reason why the Master gave the word of return. No doubt each one of the believers according to his intellectual and spiritual training can recount his experiences in the small Arab village on the top of the hill and the simple peasants will narrate many stories about the goodness and benevolence of the Lord. If we do ever meet in this world I shall relate to you what I have witnessed of the glorious deeds of the Beloved. These letters represent but a dim and faint picture of the heroic and dramatic actions of the one round whom all names revolve." However much we may strive to paint the picture in a life-like manner still it lacks life, motion, energy. The same rule is applied to the translation of his words. One must know and appreciate the subtle beauty, the pictorial eloquence, the poetic imagery, the lofty style, the magnetic diction, the spiritual allusions of the Persians Bahai literature and then he will realize that our translations no matter how perfect, how faithful, how correct are only glimmering shadows of the originals.

Dear friends!

We were the guests of the Beloved, because this was the last day of the season of Rizwan. All over the world the friends are feasting in the verdant country and green gardens, singing songs, chanting sacred verses, speaking out the glad tidings of the kingdom and filling their hearts with the exhaustless joy of a new life. We also feasted on the slope of Mount Carmel, in the Presence of the Master and in the companionship of the saints of the Lord and in our prayers remembered those who were absent. This morning the Beloved descended the stairs of the house into the garden greeting us with his smileful Marhaba, and then told us to go to the Pilgrims Home and wait for his arrival. Joyfully I ascended the Mountain and found Aga Mohamad Hassan and others very busy preparing the roast meat and eggplants. I went over to my Bahai Nest and in anticipation of flying back to it I put everything in order. Now that the Holy Family are coming back I will surely be given leave to return to my old charming mountain Cabin. What sweet days I have spent in it and whether the same spiritual pleasure will be given me in the future, only time will reveal! The supreme object of my life consists in being in the neighborhood of the Adored One and in serving him serve the believers of God. About ten o'clock he arrived with his three sons-in-law and entered the Pilgrim's Home. All the friends arose from their seats and in their respectful silence they expressed their love and affection for him. He gave a short talk about the governmental restrictions by which Baha Ollah was surrounded in the first two years of his arrival in Acca and the subsequent relaxation of the same rules by the same despotic authorities. Then he retired to another room-thus letting the meeting to descend to a lower tone of intimate and heart to heart intercourse which would be impossible when he is present; because so long as the sun of his countenance is shining in the congregation no one would care to receive lights from lesser and smaller satellites. Soon the long table in the central hall was prepared and the Lord was informed that everything was ready. He came out and asked everyone to be seated.

He did not sit himself but continued to serve, fill the plates with more meat and walking around. The soup of Haji Mirza Haydor Ali had too much fat in it and he took it to the kitchen himself and made it thinner. He looked after his food as a tender mother looks after the diet of her child. Then he placed his hands on my shoulders and stood a long time reclining on my back. "Dost thou like this food?" he asked. While he was walking around the table he delivered the following talk for the benefit of a number of young Bahais:- "All the Bahai Children must learn a trade or manual profession. This must be aside from their literacy education. The study of foreign languages, such as English, French, German etc. must be coupled with the study of an art, craft or profession." "Bonjour", "Bonsoir", "Comment ca va", "au revoir" are not the sole insignia of an educated person. Do not be satisfied with a superficial smuttering of a language. If you learn it, learn it thoroughly, scientifically. Even the Arab porters in the street speak as much and more, but they go hungry because they have not been taught a trade. Learn to do something in this world, no matter how small it may be. It is better to be a good carpenter, a fine shoemaker, a skillful physician, an accomplished engineer, an excellent gardener, a brilliant artist, a superior teacher, an inspired writer than to be an angel in heaven with nothing to do but to sing hallelujah and play on a golden harp. The mothers who have nursed and trained you have a great claim on your productive income and the girls whom you expect to marry desire to see in you the examples of manly honor and useful activities. Do not waste your energy over that which is not practicable. Let me repeat again this fundamental rule that every Bahai Child without any exception must be taught in some kind of trade or craft; so that if he should travel around the world he may not become a burden on the shoulders of other communities and wherever he may go the people may apply for his talent. This will guard him against all future poverty, misery and wants. This is the explicit command of the Blessed Perfection and all mankind must abide by it. I desire for you that which would become conducive to the exaltation of your over station and the increase of your moral and intellectual stamina. Now I have grown old and my hairs have become white and hoary. I advice ye, o youths of Baha! Learn {{p18}} the arts, study the sciences, acquire the practical methods of knowledges, trades and professions, learn the most useful crafts of the age; -thus you may be honored amongst men and respected by all the people. Be ye the fruit-bearing trees of the garden of Abha, the shining lamps in the gathering of the friends, the fragrant flowers of the meadows of the world and the efficient members of the body polity. Be ye original, invent your thoughts and deeds. Do not let the sphere of your ideals be contracted. Be not imitators. Seek the radiant path of Divine glory. Be ye attracted and enkindled. Do not sit idle, trust in God and walk in the spiral road of progress. Be ye full of dynamic motion and let the rhythm of your life be perfect. Be ye the embodiments of animation and the rolling ball of good cheer and stirring joy. In this century of light precede all others in sympathy, in philanthropic actions, in physical and intellectual culture and in association with the rest of mankind. Do not let the pool of your thoughts become stagnant. Open the shutters of your mind and air its secret chambers. Refresh and renew the growing temples of your characters by the blowing breezes of the sunlit ideals. Adorn yourselves with the gems of rare and world, enlightening actions, sing like unto the stars, sweep along like unto a mighty river and let not the tributaries of your beings be frozen by the cold blast of the winter of disappointment and hopelessness.

Pour down like unto the rain, weep like unto the cloud, laugh like unto the roses. Be inquisitive and learn every good things. Once you have finished the course of your discipline, strike in the new, untrodden paths of life. Go forward. Learn the law of self-control: Bring under your own dominion the lower appetites of human nature. Practice that which you teach, Unravel those mysteries of the universe which are conducive to the welfare of humanity. Stand firm on your own ground without the borrowed staff of another man. No one will help you if you do not help yourselves and your fellowmen. Work and its reward will come to you. Work and wait for the results. Work and its traces will immortalize your name. Work and when final success comes the world will [unreadable].

After this talk the Beloved went over to the house of Aga Abbas Goli to have his siesta and the friends forming various groups gave themselves up to the spiritual enjoyment of the moment. Two hours passed in this happy and delightful association and then the scene was shifted to the reception room of Megham. [The tomb of the Bab] Here another meeting was held, full of the glow of the spirit and radiance. Soon the glorious King appeared amongst us and some on the throne of Celestial Majesty. Haji Mirza Haydor Ali was not there and looking around inquiringly he asked: "Where is Haji? Send someone for him. I love him. With his presence a meeting will become truly spiritual. The individuals of the world of humanity are in different degrees. They are like unto the candlesticks. There is a candlestick whose candle sheds light and illumination; another candlestick is holding a candle but not yet ignited; a third has not a candle and is for a mere show; A fourth has had a candle but now it has burned out and is forever extinct. Similarly there are some enkindled souls whose very presence in a meeting changes its atmosphere, suffering the people to become truly spiritual, turning their faces toward God; others like unto the black smoke, darken the horizon of the minds. Thus in whatever meeting I enter and find Haji Mirza Haydor Ali I obtain joy and fragrance. My counsel to you is: Never let the candle of your heart become extinct. Strive to increase its light. Add to it the oil of wisdom. Illumine everyone with its rays. A candlestick without the candle! Ah me! A body without life, a sun without light, a pearl without lustre, a sheaf without wheat, a garden without vegetation and a mine without gold."

Then he led the service by chanting aloud the visiting Tablet. This last part of our unwritten program coming to an end six military officers headed by the Commander called on him and they were entertained for one hour. Then Mofti and three Mullahs arrived and the Master through his lofty conversation instructed them. He with his guests rode down in the carriage and we descended the mountain, our memories enriched by the matchless experiences of another never to be forgotten day. The cup of our joy was filled to overflowing when in the evening we sat around the table in the presence of the Lord and partook of his.

Dear friends!

This morning Doctor Finkelstein, the Director of the Jewish technical Institute called on the Beloved. He received him in the garden and they sat in the glorious sunshine. For more than one hour they talked together on many subjects, too numerous to be recorded in these pages. I will however mention the salient pots of only a few topics. The bottles fought between the Turks and the forces of the Allied powers of Europe in Gallipoli were considered in detail and the rather non-committal opinion was expressed that we have to wait and watch for the final results. The facts that more than forty war- ships are “knocking” at the gate of Dardanelles and the Russian fleet is “knocking” loudly from the Bosphorus on the black sea and that according to the current report from England and France have landed “400, 000” soldiers in the neighborhood of the sea of Marmora were reviewed. All these reports are of course based on the “Depeches communiqués par l’Agence Turque”. For the last few months the regular channels of communication have been so completely blocked that we have not received one single page of European Newspaper Doctor Finkelstein related the history of the thirty years as well as the seven years wars in Germany and the rapid progress in the invention of modern armaments. Then the Master spoke on the question of Universal Peace, the barbarism of war and the sweetness of international understanding. He wondered at the ruthless cruelty of man and hoped the day will come when all the nations of the world will discuss and settle their dispute in the Parliament of humanity. Being the servants of god, the sheep of one flock, the pages of book, the letters of one word, the leaves of one tree, the petals of one rose, the members of one family, why did they shed each other’s brothers, why did they cover vast fields with the mutilated bodies of their brothers, why did they violate the laws of mankind, why did they relapse into the primal stage of savagery? They are not men, they are hundred thousand times worse thou the murdered and infuriated bulls in a Spanish Arena.

Then asking the Doctor how old he is and finding he is 33 years old, but still unmarried, he advised him to marry as soon as it well be possible for him. He said: “Buy a piece of land on the top of the Mountain and build for yourself a lovely [unreadable] house. Then marry a strong, vigorous, athletic girl like thyself. Marriage is as holy and divine Covenant, and young men, in order to partake of the responsibilities of life, must enter into this sacred compact of physical and spiritual relationship. They must bring into their new lives pure bodies, pure thoughts and pure motives. This is the richest settlement on the port of the young man and the most priceless dowry by the young girl. Through the inculcation of a thorough knowledge of hygiene humanity must be freed from all manner of diseases and ailments. The parents must teach their children the laws of life and how to avoid evils and temptations. Thus may they grow into healthy and robust manhood and womanhood. This is indeed the most glorious heritage they can hand down to posterity. Generally the offsprings of marriages between the age of 25 and 40 became hale, muscular, able-bodied and braving; provided the contracting parties have been free from diseases and certain weaknesses of the body. Every couple must bring into their new home that quality of love and devotion which is solid and permanent. Their attachment must not be based upon the foundation of changing, personal attraction but founded on the deeper laws of spiritual co-operation and good fellowship. As the years roll on their respect and fondness for each other must increase. Hand in hand they must go on and on, learning new things, revealing the subtle tenderness of wedded life, unfolding the rich meaning of the ideal family and diffusing the sweet fragrances of mutual association. It is an axiomatic fact that all the lasting and beneficial reforms must commence with the family. Both the father and mother must contribute their share to the idealization and sanctification of the hearth. This the cornerstone of national greatness."

In the evening we were in his presence only for a few minutes. A propose question he said: Only through the power of the Holy Spirit the Cause of Universal Peace will be established in the world. There must be divine executive power to bring the self seeking government the terms of universal brotherhood and conciliation. Nothing else [unreadable]

Dear friends!

Three of the Zoroastrian Bahai farmers who were here with us for the last few days were ushered into the presence of the Beloved this morning and because they were going to return to Adassiah he gave them the following talk. "Convey my sincere greeting to all the friends. Tell them: Teach the Cause of God through your deeds and actions. This is God's real benediction and blessing. Live in such a way that when they observe your manners, behaviors, morals and conducts they may exclaim: these are not men and women but the angel of the Lord. Be ye kind to all mankind. Let mercy be the stimulus of all your dealings with the people. Do not look at their shortcomings. Win the heart through love and charity. Set them aglow with the Fire of the Love of God. The joy of that soul is indescribable if the fragrances of spirituality waft from the garden of his being. This divine happiness is not followed by any sorrow nor this heavenly spring is terminated by the sultry days of summer. I am very hopeful that you may ignite in Adassiah the bright candle of guidance."

Then he asked me to follow him on a tour of visits. On the way he spoke about the collection of the Western and Eastern newspapers dealing with the cause and containing articles about his trips. I told him that I have made such a partial collection when in America and it has been kept up even after my departure. He said "This is most important. To collect the opinion of the Western world concerning the Bahai Movement will render invaluable service to the future generations. When I send thee back to America this will be one of thy works...Many months have elapsed and we have received no news from the believers in the United States." I said. "I hope the means of transportation will soon be established and then you will be enabled to go to Port Said to read the accumulated correspondence of the past months." "Why should we go there? We will ask Ahmad Yazdi to mail it to Haifa," "what I have been thinking of late" he said is this: After this war I would like to send 2063 energetic, well-informed Bahais to America: - so that they may travel {{p23}} and teach the Cause as I have done it. Whom do you have in mind?" I said "Badi Effendi will be an excellent member of such a party. He is a graduate of the American college in Beirut, he speaks the English language quite fluently, he has a good voice and informed of the teachings of the Cause and a sign of the mercy of the Almighty. He must be an embodiment of exhilaration and an announcer and liver of the glad-tidings of the Kingdom. Then all his words and deeds will tend toward the glorification of the Cause and the promotion of the Principle...Although I need thee with myself I may send thee as a member of this party. Then it will be the time of displaying the utmost exertion and proclaiming the dynamic message of the revelation." By this time we reached the store of Mirza Anayetullah and he sat there and talked with him for a few minutes. He stopped on his way at the Pharmacie, next to the Ottoman Bank, sat there for half an hour and conversed with the proprietor. Then ascending the stairs of the Bank he spoke with the Manager and other officer and went with them over same financial transactions. From the Bank we hired a carriage and called on the Mofti and stopped with him for about one hour. Here the conversation turned on the lives and manners of the Turkish Judges and the Master related several humorous stories to illustrate his talk and at the same time entertain those who were present. Bidding farewell to the Mofti and his guests we walked to the Persian tea-house, built near the custom house. Here several Sheiks gathered around him, tea was brought for them and the conversation turned on Mohamadan theology and its futile, unproductive theories. Then we walked to a wheat store near the Mosque and the Master sat there till one hour afternoon. Geammagam, the judge and other officers successively called on him and with each and all he spoke. It was like a court where all the people; high and low, rich and poor received the blessings of the ideal King. many miserable {{p24}} women applied for relief and did not go away empty-handed. While he was sitting in the wheat-store he wrote a letter to the Commander interceding for a partially blind man who was been forced into the rank of the army and the dispatched a telegram to Jerusalem to Zakki Bay, the Commander who was with us last year in Hammeh to come to Haifa and be his guest.

In the afternoon while he was entertaining a number of officers in the garden, the greatest Holy Leaf with three of the maids arrived from Abou Senan and we were all very happy to welcome her back in our midst. Twenty camels loaded with the household utensils and furniture and beds knelt at the gate of the garden. During the last few months these things were taken to Abou Senan little by little but now they have brought them back all at once. The long line of 20 camels made an interesting sight. When the work of unloading was finished the camel drivers were asked to come in and have their dinner.

Before sunset the Master took me out for another walk. All the way he was silent and on our return he asked me to speak. I said: - : “Now that the holy Family has come back, if it is Thy will I may go up in the evenings.” He replied: “Go up! Why? No one has taken thy place. Thou art living downstairs. Thou art in my home. Thou must stay with me. Thou dost know all my moods. Now thou art a part of me. Whenever I like to take a walk I take thee with me, because thou dost not expect me to talk. I desire to have thee near me. No. Do not go up. Live in my house.” This touching invitation of my Beloved gave me supreme happiness. What a glorious privilege to have the home of Truth” for one’s abode; to walk in this paradise of flowers, this heaven of peace, this dwelling place of the angels! O Lord Confer on me the faculty of appreciation, the deeper sense of realization, the true perception of this divine honor! Ah! I am so worth less, so useless, so utterly incapable! O God! Give me the strength of thy Power, the Consolation of thy Eternal Presence, O My Master! I weep over my own ignorance, inability and wretchedness! Who am I, what am I? I am less than nothing. I am ashamed. Oh I am so ashamed and I feel my life has been a sad failure from beginning to end.

Dear friends!

This afternoon our two brothers Mirza Badi and Doctor Haluliolla arrived from Abou Senan and the Beloved received them in his sleeping room overlooking the flowery garden. Mirza Hadi served us the ruby tea and the Monarch of the spiritual world thus addressed: “I have chosen you for the service of the Cause of God. I desire that in all the realms of life you may adorn your temple with radiant qualities and strive in the promotion of the word of God. Who been experienced by former generations and understood by the great men of this century that all the strivings and accomplishments of humanity on the physical plane are like the mosaic pictures traced on the surface of water which are effaced immediately afterwards. Consider the enraged and infuriated conditions of the present wild nations of the world who are pursuing the gloomy path of slaughter and destruction. What extraordinary effort what colossal self- sacrifice! Cheaply are they throwing away their possessions and lives. Already millions of souls have crimsoned the earth with their blood and mountains of corps have been piled up. Thousands upon thousands of these men have been Commanders generals and high officers who had spent their whole lives in the study of military science and naval tactics and who in one moment have become the targets of the infernal bullets of death. Truly I say all their efforts are fruitless. The utmost is this: - The names of the military leaders of each one of these nations will be recorded in history as warlords, patriots, defenders of the country's rites, protectors of the laws of civilization, heroes etc. But those souls who have striven in the promotion of the word of God, and sacrificed their lives in the Divine Path, their triumphs will be eternal and will not be subject to change and mutation. The victories of these warring governments are temporal and ephemeral, while the victories of the servants of God are everlasting. Whenever a person starts on a journey he must put forth his entire stock of energy in order to reach the goal. He must arise in the fulfillment of all the requirements of the path {{p26}} and be not discouraged at the sight of dangers and obstacles, otherwise no results will be forthcoming. For example, if a person is occupied in the diffusion of the Fragrances of God and consecrating his time to the Cause of the Blessed Perfection, he must be severed in reality and not in word; he must be attracted, he must be magnanimous, he must be in constant motion, he must be exhilarated. If he is lacking in anyone of these essential qualities, glorious outcomes will not be obtained. How often it has happened that the effect of the services of many years has been entirely nullified by the commitment of a small mistake, intentional or non-intentional. I will pray for you and supplicate and beseech at the Threshold of the Kingdom of Abha to suffer to become perfect from every standpoint."

This morning the Beloved asked me to follow him to the house of American Consul, built on the shore of Mediterranean, at the end of the street of the German Colony. He welcomed him into his drawing-room and after a few preliminary remarks and exchanges of courtesies the Master told him: "It has been a long time that I intended to pay you a visit, because I have heard every one praising your qualities of impartiality, fairness and justice" He answered, "I have always practiced that which I have considered my duty." The beloved said: - "This is the sign of the perfect man, He strives and exerts himself to live up in accord with the obligations of his conscience. This feeling of rectitude must be inculcated in the hearts from the earliest childhood and then the educative influence of such training will grow with the growth of the children. To do good, irrespective of all considerations must become natural to man. Although it is passable to eradicate the roots of evil habits after their incrustation in the character yet it is better to prevent their formation during the plastic age of adolescence. The Arabic proverb says: 'Education in childhood is as the art of engraving upon the stone. It will not be effaced.'...We must all time fulfill the responsibilities laid upon us by our fellowmen. His holiness Christ says, give unto Caesar what belongs to Caesar and unto God what belongs to God. We must discharge our duties towards our fellowmen and never fall short in their observances. All the divine prophets have come for the education of mankind; - so that they may become freed from the defects and vices of nature and be ushered into the world of light. The inhabitants of {{p27}} of this country not being enlightened with the light of education are deprived by the benefits of material and spiritual graces. In commerce and trade and industry they have not made any advancement whatsoever. Their children do not receive any industrial, practical training and thus when they reach the age of maturity they are as parasites.”The counsel agreed with the above remark and told him something about his own life to Palestine and from that time on settled in Haifa. After drinking coffee, we descended into his garden, walked around and bade him farewell. He asked for a time to call on the the Beloved and it was settled on after tomorrow 11 a.m.

On the way he spoke about the vicissitudes that beset the path of young men and how they should train themselves in the bitter and hard experiences of life “When I was in Bagdad I had one plain cotton overcoat which I wore constantly for more than three years.” he said. “I had drilled and hallucinated myself in the severe misfortunes of life. I withstood the physical fatigue of a longer journey and the mental anguish of the mood perplexing problem.”

During the day many people called on him and he received each and all in the reception room with the gentleness of the spirit and the true servitude of a kind father.

In the evening he had several guests for dinner, such as Gaemmagam Mafti, the military physician and other officers from Acca and Haifa. He spoke to them about some of his spiritual experiences in Europe and America and gave them the Christian Commonwealths containing the Arab Texts of his lectures. They stayed with him till very late and their cups were filled with the wine of his words. Under all circumstances he is the Master of the occasion. People listen to him and are charmed. The power of his utterance uplift them, the magic his explanations enthrall them and they go away with a [unreadable] of deep satisfactions, knowing full well that they have been in the presence of the super-cosmic man, that they have hearkened to the music of the nightingale of Reality and that they have drawn from the fountain of the Water of life.

Dear friends!

As I entered the garden this afternoon I found the Beloved alone walking under the trellis and looking at the gorgeous variegated flowers. “Come?” he beckoned to me “The Cause of God is in need of many active efficient workers and the time is soon coming when the whole responsibilities of the religion of Baha Ollah will fall on their shoulders. Thou must be one of the standard-bearers of the Cause. For more than three years thou hast lived and travelled with me day and night and I have been contemplating to send my thee away in the not distant future; -so that thou must be engaged in the service of the Vineyard. Do not forget the words that I am telling thou now. Each letter will act as a light, guiding thee and illumining thy path toward the ultimate goal. They are as follows: ‘Walk thou in my footstep. If I look to earth, do thou the same; if I gaze toward heaven, turn thou also thy eyes heavenward; if I am sitting, sit; if I am walking, walk; if I am silent, be thou silent; if I speak, speak; if I am praying, pray; if I work, work; if I love the poor, be thou also kind to them. In brief, be thou a pattern of good deeds and an example of patience, purity and forbearance. Rest thou assured that I will be always with thee. I will not be far from thee for one second, I did not bring thee with me without a good reason nor have I kept thee so long without a cause. Be thou not grieved, I am thy instructor I have educated thee in my own college. Thou art my student. Adorn thyself with my words, deeds morals, manners. See thou with my eyes. Listen thou with my ears, speak thou with my tongue, hold those with my hands and walk thou with my feet." I said: "I will always pray that I may be assisted in the fulfillment of the Master's hope...Because in Turkey, teaching is not permitted one does not gain the same spirituality and joy." He answered: "This is true; but I am not training thee for these parts; the field of thy labor is beyond these limited confines. As thou know it is very easy for us to teach and spread the Cause in this country but the government will rise immediately against us and the Blessed Tombs {{p5}} of Baha ollah and the Bab will be demolished by the hands of fanatical mob. This is one of the many reasons that we must not raise our voice in Turkey" I said: "This is the fourth year that I am serving at the threshold of the Beloved. If the result of this apprenticeship does not appear in the world of action and practical services I will be ashamed before God and His creature and as a dried tree will be only worth to be cast into fire." He said: "Praise be to God the result has become manifest and as time rolls on thou wilt be confirmed in the accomplishment of greater and greater things. On the eve of thy departure I will breathe in thee such a breath whose effect will be universal. Wait and see at that time thou will thyself stand astonished. Thou art my son and my whole aim is thy education according to my own standard. Thou observe that I do not speak in this manner with some persons who have not the capability of rendering any service to the Cause. I do not interfere with their affairs. I have left them to their own devices. They may go where they are please and come whenever they are pleased. I do not expect them to listen to my advice nor have I have any hope in their ability or mediocre attainment. They are not made of heroic staff. They are self- occupied and incapable to conceive any large and universal plan. In thee I have great hope. I am assured that thy intentions are for the promotion and protection of the Cause." I said: "My highest hope and ambition is to be the mad lover of Abdul Baha and that I may entertain no other thoughts to save him." He replied with a smiling face: "Praise be to God that thou art Praise be to God that thou art." I was upborn on the wings of ecstasy and I fall at his holy feet weeping like a child. "My Lord" I tried to say" If thy confirmations and presence accompany me in my wanderings, everything will be possible but if they leave me for one second I will be nothing and less than nothing." He raised me from the ground and with his hands dried my tears. Then he said: "I am giving thee a definite promise that just as thou hast been assisted in the past thou will be confirmed in the future. Be thou confident. No sooner is the means of transportation is established then will send thee for thou {{p6}} I was called this morning into his wonderful presence and the following Tablet was dictated for the father of

"O thou servant of God! It has been sometimes since that no epistle has been forwarded to you from this land. Innumerable hindrances have bought about the interruption of correspondence, otherwise the voice of the [unreadable] and the cooing of the Dove would not have been ceased. Now that his honor Mirza Ḥabíbu'lláhollah 'Khodabaksh' [ the gift of God ] is departing I consider it my duty to write this epistle to you. Praise be to God that he compelled his study of medicine with the utmost joy and fragrance, faith and assurance, firmness and steadfastness and preceded all the other students of college and while he was in the college itself he was at all times confirmed in the service of the Holy Threshold and from every standpoint kept the students-the sons of the believers-in the utmost state of spirituality and fragrance. After his examination he received an excellent and commendable diploma and having left the college he was for a time occupied in the service of these wanderers. Now he is returning to those parts. Undoubtedly, by looking into his sincere face and inhaling the sweet odor of his character you will become infinitely rejoiced and glad. Thank thou God that thou hast such a glorious son who is the love of God is a glowing and lighted candle and is striving with main and force in the service of the world of humanity.

Be thou not sad and broken-hearted over the martyrdom of thy happy starred young son. Although that candle was taken out of the candle stick of this nether world it was ignited in the lamp of the Kingdom and although that bird of the morn flew away from the meadow of this mound of earth yet it soared up toward the rose-garden of the Merciful and his honor Mirza Ḥabíbu'lláhollah will be like to thee unto one hundred sons.

Convey the wonderful Abha greeting to all the believers of God...In the evening the Beloved gave a long talk, interpreting one of the verses of the Koran on the effect of good and evil words and thoughts and wished all the believers correspond their inner faith with their outer confession. Then because our brother Doctor Habil was going to leave [unreadable].

Dear friends!

For half an hour this morning Doctor Ḥabíbu'lláhollah was in the presence of our Beloved, receiving his last instructions and blessings. We were waiting for him in the garden and now and then caught a stray word falling from the holy lips and brought to our ears on the wings of the viewless courier of the air. When he came out his eyes were wet but the assurances of the King had comforted and rejoiced him. Badi Effendi, Mirza Jalal and myself followed him to the carriage and bade him our last farewell. The old saying out of sight out of mind does not apply to Bahais, for their hearts are united together with the diamond bond of the Love of God and their souls have responded to the quickening vibrations of eternal friendship. As the world is their home, as they are the members of one family and as the loving Father has established the unchanging law of mutual good will and peace between them, absence or presence does not affect them materially. They believe that God is the Director of all their affairs and will guide them rightly if they turn their faces toward him. The omnipresent spirit of this Cause has so united the friends that the illusions of time and space are rent asunder and the seeming differences of remoteness and nearness are annihilated. We are in reality not separated but whether living in the East or in the West we are standing in the glorious temple of unity and singing the glad songs of thanksgiving. We are conscious of the fact that the followers of Baha do not forget each other so long as they are occupied with the mention and praise of the name of Abdul Baha. He is our common home, under the shade of his wide spreading tree do we all rest, in the boundless sea of his glory do we all swim, his in the supreme power of harmonious amalgamation. like the planets, solar system we receive our light from him, everything that we know is through his grace and inspiration. In him we are all agreed and in his celestial Court we are all unworthy servants. He is majesty, dominion and grandeur.

When we gathered tonight in the room of the Lord he said: - "Doctor habid left this morning for Persia. Truly I say he served the students in Beirut conscientiously and his highest longing is to sacrifice his life at the Holy Threshold. His character is stainless and immaculate. He is as clear as the translucene mirror. It is assured that he will be confirmed and assisted. It is indeed a matter of great wonder that God has created certain souls for the manifestation of the qualities of pure goodness. One cannot find the least trace of guile, artfulness and duplicity in them. They have no other wish save the good-pleasure of the Blessed Perfection...The lives of all the Bahai Students in Beirut have shed lustre on the name of the Cause. Although they are studying arts and sciences yet in reality they are serving the Cause of God..."

In the afternoon the Master went out alone and I thought I will ascend the mountain and visit the holy Tomb. As I reached near the Pilgrims Home I turned back my eyes to have a look at the charming scene and I saw him coming from the opposite side of the street toward the house. He stopped for a minute in front of the door and then returned. Somehow I felt in my heart that he wanted me and finding I was not in he went back. Without going any further I descended in haste as though an invisible force was driving me forward. As I entered the garden Esmael Aga told me the Master was inquiring about thee and thus my feeling was correct in this instance I hurried out toward the German Colony and found him sitting on a piece of stone and talking with several Arabs. "ha! thou hast come he said. For half an hour more be continued to talk to them and then arose from his seat. On the way we saw one dog was pursuing another, whose barking furiously."Dost thou know why this dog is barking?" he asked. I answered in the negative. "The most characteristic quality of the dog" he said

“is faithfulness to his master. The barking dog wants to teach to the other that he has been unkind to him, it would have been better if he had stayed there and demonstrated the quality of loyalty. Nothing should have separated him from his solicitous owner.”

Dear friends!

The larvae of the locusts boil up out of the earth like water. A tidal waves of tremendous fury they rise and rise to wash away the land by their irresistible force. It seems to me that Jehovah has struck with His hand the dock of the country of Syria and instead of twelve fountains of crystalline water millions of springs of larvae have gushed forth to [unreadable] the earth with a flood of terrific consequences. The government issued an order yesterday that for the next few days all the people must shut their stores and go into the country to kill as much as they can these pestiferous insects. The order is general and does not exclude any person of station and rank; even the officials, the bank officers and Gaemmagam will go out to set an example of strict obedience. The Master told us last night that all the believers including his three sons-in-law must join the national crusade against the common enemy; thus when we arose this morning we needed no further impetus and no sooner the friends were collected in the garden we ascended the mountain and pitched in the work. The lands surrounding the Pilgrims Home and the holy Tomb were assigned to us. There are two ways to do away with insects. In the first place we formed a circle and pushed them toward dry thorns, picked and put together. When they were all inside, they were lighted and burned with a match. I do not know how many millions were roasted during those few hours! Poor creatures! but they are so harmful. Are they not? The surface of the mountain looked like unto a waving, undulating sea of larvae. They could not rise above the earth but they hopped from one place to another. By noon we were all fatigued and perspiring, so we resorted to the Pilgrim's Home, ate our lunch and rested for an hour. There is another way by which these larvae are destroyed. They take a large piece of cloth in the centre of which a big hole is made. Then under this hole a sac is sown. Four persons hold in their hands the four ends and lower the edge to the ground. Then the rest go after the larvae and from {{p10}} the four directions chase them toward the cloth. It is very strange that when one of them starts on the road, all the rest follow its wake like sheep, Soldier- like they march as a regiment. It will be enough to change the course of one and the rest will follow it blindly. Now you can easily imagine that when from four sides thousands upon thousands march in an elderly manner toward the white sheet otherwise the trap- it is filled in a minute. When the cloth is groaning under its weight they raise its four ends and with one or two shaking they all slide down through the hole into the sac. This process was a continue till an hour before sunset and we felt quite satisfied with the result of our labor. Meanwhile we found out that the latter process was more advantageous than the one we followed in the morning. We had altogether a lovely pic-nic.

Every morning as I ascend the mountain and pass by the thorns and bushes and trees, thousands drop to the earth and here and there the roads are turned into a moving mass of black insects. They are generally following a downward course from the high slope to the foot of the mountain.

The authorities have decided to push this work of destruction. For this reason they have made a by law that those who would not like to go out or is busy may pay three Beshleeks and another person will be sent instead of him.

When the other day the bahai Zoroastrian farmers came over from Adassiah and reported that the army of locusts have entered their gardens and fields and eating every green thing in sight the Beloved comforted and instructed them to be resigned and submissive. "The world of humanity is suffering" he said. "And we must also take a share in this general grievances. Not one single soul is expected I am thinking of you and will protect you. Continue to stay in Adassiah. I desire that you may sow there the seeds of the Love of God and the knowledge of God and gather the spiritual harvest of truth. These locusts are your guests and may not leave your vicinity until they are satiated."

When we gathered tonight in the presence of the Beloved of our hearts and told him what we have done during the day he said: - "There are two kinds of afflictions the first is human, the second is divine. Human affliction can be coped with and eradicated by human agencies and methods but when an affliction is brought down upon mankind, occasioned by their utter heedlessness and negligences the displaying of all their available forces will not be crowned with the least success. Under such exceptional circumstances they must gather in their temple of worship and praise their hands toward heaven, begging and smoking God to shower upon them His benedictions and turn the tide of trials away from them. With heartfelt contrition and humiliation they must invoke and beseech Him to forgive them and overlook their sins and rebellions...These heedless people merit the descent of the terrible wrath of God. They are not at all entitled to His Love. Even what they have and are enjoying has been and is through His limitless Mercy. On the otherhand if we look upon this God's catastrophe from another standpoint it is Mercy itself, for it may become the cause of their wakefulness and mindfulness. But if this much-desired spiritual regeneration is not obtained, then it is indeed God's wrath. For example, the student commits a mistake, the teacher punishes him. Now if this correction will become conducive to his improvement, then indeed it is identical with mercy and kindness but if on the contrary it adds to his unawareness, obtusely and doltishness, it is a heavy and grievous chastisement. Therefore God has never and will never be anything else but Clement, Merciful and Kind. From whatever standpoint we may approach the creator and the sustainer we find Him the Mainspring of Mercy. In short you must know that God is the source of heavenly goodness and the Giver of life and light. Thus it is written in the book of Psalms chapter 9th: "The Lord shall endure forever: he hath prepared the thrones for judgment. And he shall judge the world in righteousness; he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble. And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee."

Dear friends!

Before translating another long, soul-uplifting talk given by our Beloved for my benefit and that of the Bahai world I would like to share with you a short supplication which he dictated early this morning in his own room: -

"O God! O God! Thou seest me cast on the ground of humility and lowliness supplicating the Kingdom of thy Singleness, wandering in the wilderness of abasement and agitation, beseeching the supernal Realm of Thy oneness and flowing from my eyes the torrent of tears. O Lord! I am roaming in the desert of deprivation and seeking the meeting of Thy Countenance. How long. O God! How long hast thou consigned me to the desert of oblivion and dost thou not call me to the pain of bereavement and wandering in the plain of remoteness and oblivion my bones are broken up, my flesh is dissolved, my powers are disintegrated, my limbs are trembling and my organs are slackened. O Lord! destine for me the Cup of the most great Martyrdom and ascension to the Neighborhood of Thy Mercy, O thou Creator of earth and heavens! Verily Thou art the Giver, the Self- Sufficient, the Self- subsistent, the generous and the Beneficent!"

When he finished dictating he closed his eyes, immersed in a sea of contemplation. For more than five minutes he was silent. Then as suddenly he got up from his seat in the corner of the sofa and began to walk. His present vibrating animation was just the opposite of his still calmness a few moments ago. Now he was possessed by a stirring, overwhelming spirit. He looked at me and I saw his eyes were blazing like living fire, the veins of his temple filled and throbbing and the lines of his forehead becoming more prominent, just as unconsciously he took off his turban and his white locks fell his snow- white patriarchal beard gave an unearthly majesty to his whole being. His former tranquil and composed face was now completely changed and the signs of the gathering of a storm of divine emotions and sentiments became visible. I stood in my place stock still {{p13}} transfixed with awe and wonder. I thought something was forthcoming but I did not know what. Erect and sovereign- like he stood near the window, then he wheeled around as quickly and with a flushing countenance and earnest expression he said: "I have sent for thee this morning to speak to thee on a confidential matter. The covenant-breakers have again concocted another device, whereby they may terminate my life and the enemies of the Cause of God may suspend me on a cross. Through one of the prominent inhabitants of Jerusalem whose name I did not mention, Mirza Mohamad Ali has forwarded to Jamal Pasha a long list of new accusations and calumnies against me, charging me with the corruption of the morals of the youths of Islam and undermining the religion of Mohamad and that furthermore there are many Christians who believe I am the return of Christ and that I teach secretly I have actually descended from heaven and many other such baseless allegations. Jamal Pasha in turn has expressed his ideas concerning this subject in a public meeting before many civilians and officials that if in reality [unreadable] Effendi is disseminating such pernicious doctrines and is holding such poisonous views, God willing I shall hang him on a pillory. My aim however is to render him a kind service, because if he believes that he has come down from heaven, he will be glad to return to heaven. Now he may put into execution his threat, for he has already hanged several very prominent Christians and Mohamadans in Jaffa, Lebanon and Damascus. According to the reports he is a merciless and pitiless man. When Mirza Mohamad Ali hears about the above words of Jamal Pasha he sends to him the Tent of the Blessed Perfection- thus he may carry to his menace and fulfill his promise... He is spending all his time and energy in devising means for my destruction. He imagines vainly that if I am out of this world, people will gather around him and pay him homage and respect. He does not realize that I am day and night longing and praying for the station of martyrdom! What greater happiness than this! What mercy more glorious than this! I am ready and expectant to drink from this celestial chalice of God's Bestowals!

"In brief, I am telling thee this matter in confidence. I have not spoken about with others for they will become confused and sad and its {{p14}} present divulgence may bring in a long [unreadable] other complications. I am telling thee this so that thou mayst know that I am encircled with an impending danger- thus if anything should happen thou mayst convey my message to all the believers and it is this: The friends of God, including thyself, must not be shaken by any test. As the lofty mountains you must stand firm in the Cause of God, as the tempestuous sea you must never become calm and still. As the brilliant star you must ever shine and gleam. As the sweet flowers you must always diffuse the Fragrances of divine civilization. As the warbling nightingales sing ye throughout all the seasons. As the coal fountains gush ye forth with the waters of spiritual explanations. As the verdant meadow be ye not scorched by the blowing of the hot winds of opposition. As the sun wander through your course and be not wearied of well-doing. As the real guides of humanity, illumine the ignorant with the light of wisdom, to raise the lovely, inspire with noble ideals the despondent and lead the erring ones into the path of truth. Live ye in accord with the good pleasure of God. Arise ye with an irresistible force in the promotion of the teachings. Like unto the sanctified apostles of Christ summon ye the people to the kingdom of God and invite them to walk in the Road of heavenly prosperity and success. Let not any hindrance or obstacle dampen your enthusiasm. Set [unreadable] the hearts with the free of joy and exhilaration. Adorn the temple of the world with the garment of new creation.

I have trained and educated you for this. Your reserved powers are needed for such a day. Beware, beware lest Luke warmness overtake you, indifference master you, negligence take hold you and listlessness overwhelm you. You must nurse, water and take care of the Blessed tree of the Cause of God: -so that it may grow and develop; its branches giving shade to the people of the East and of the West: Seek ye no other pleasure, long ye for no other delight; be ye filled to overflowing with the love of Baha Ollah; promulgate ye the traces of his grandeur and dominion, be ye attached to his caused advance ye toward His Beauty and receive Bounty {{p15}} from His inexhaustible storehouse. The tree of the Cause must be watered by you: - so that it may bring forth leaves blossoms and fruits. If you do not arise in the accomplishment of this service who will then arise? To whom should I look forward? Whom can I trust with this pearl of great price? Who will uphold the name of Baha Ollah? Who will make me happy in the Kingdom of my Father? Who will carry away this ball from the field of self-sacrifice? Who will give up his rest and comfort for the promotion of the Cause? Who will raise his voice in the vast congregations of humanity? Ah me! Who, who will turn his face toward heaven and pray: Thy Kingdom come. Thy will be done and not mine?"

Oh the pity and the feeling of suffering with which his face was painted at this juncture! My heart was melted at his loneliness and his deep concern for the future of the glorious Cause for the establishment of which the Bab of the Blessed perfection and himself have undergone all manners of persecutions! In the face of this heart rending appeal who is so pusillanimous and mean-spirited as to prefer his own interests of the Cause? Who will be the coward as to shrink from the most annihilating danger? Who will be as chicken-hearted as to shun the common misfortunes of an active, consecrated life of service?

After the above talk he went out to call on Zakki Boy and they returned together. They sat in the garden and the Beloved read to him the account of the International Bahai Congress held in San Francisco as well as his talks at the headquarter of Salvation Army in London and the one given after attending the presentation of Eager Heart.

At noon about ten men including Gaemmagam, [unreadable] President of the Bank, Zakki Boy and other officers were his guests and they sat around his table and partook of the material food prepared for them.

Both in the afternoon and evening he gave long talks that I refrain from translating for the present, because this letter has become already long.

Dear friends!

This afternoon my Beloved sent for me to accompany him to the house of the Persian Counsel. On the way I asked him for a Manuscript book containing the account of the martyrdom of the Bahai in Yazd. Wearily he answered: "All the Bahai books are being preserved in boxes and in these days I have no inclination of opening them. In former years month after month I worked from sunrise till midnight and I did not feel the effect of it, but now it is different. For the last few weeks I have been thinking of my possible attainment to the greatest station of martyrdom- perchance the end of my life may be diffused with the fragrance of this musk and that I may quaff this goblet of the most exhilarating wine. I am placing myself on the plane of perennial spiritual prayerfulness, so that if it comes it may find me ready, resigned and in a state of submission. I am also thinking, dreaming, cogitating what will become of the future of the Cause when I am not in this world, where are the souls who shall meet and solve the perplexing, crucial problems that shall constantly arise, of what materials are they made, how will they bring together the contending, antagonistic parties? I am hourly supplicating and entreating at the Threshold of the Blessed Perfection to appraise such spiritually- minded souls for the promotion of the principles of His Cause, men and women endowed with extraordinary powers, angelic strength and world- subduing resolutions. I desire them to dedicate their whole beings to the service of the Lord of hosts. According to the ultimate wish of my heart and soul should they go forth and teach the glad- tidings of the Kingdom of Abha. While my body lives in Haifa my mind is searching throughout the world to see whether there are such capable servants. For this work I am daily instructing thee; for the carrying out of this divine behest I am training thee. In the realms of thought thou must consecrate thy entire life to the proclamation of the word of God. Thou must abide in the station of renunciation and self-sacrifice. Under all conditions {{p17}} thou must show firmness, steadfastness and stability. Encourage and incite others in the execution of those affairs which will become conducive to the glorification of the Cause."

By the time we reached the house of the Persian Consul the Beloved had given me a long talk, embodying personal advice and exhortations, part of which I have translated for my own strength and reinforcement in the future. We found him at home and the rather interesting intelligence was given us that the Italian Parliament will be opened tomorrow to decide whether Italy should declare war against Austria and indirectly Germany or not. The consensus of opinion is that Italy will also join the rank of the warring nations but everyone is waiting with suspense anxiety.

When the Beloved came out this morning to take his customary walk in the garden haji Mirza Haydor Ali was standing near a tree. The Lord of Love approached him with beaming face and while the words of inquiry about his health were on his lips he took him passionately into his arms and kissed his face and beard again and again. Oh" Mirza! Oh Mirza" he said "Thou dost not know how much I love thee!" I cannot describe to you the feeling of happiness which except over the old man, his back bent with years in the service of the Cause. This was indeed a heavenly reward, the like of which he did not expect to receive even from the kings of earth.

After a few minutes several little boys and girls came at the door and clamored for money. He went toward the gate and informed them that for the present his pocket was empty. They did not want to believe and insisted on their demand. The Master was in a kindly mood, so taking out his handkerchief and rosary, he asked them to come forward and search through his pockets. All of a sudden they were dancing and laughing around him, forcing their small, little hands into his pockets but finding nothing the live them out. Then they thought his bag contained money and insisted on him to open it. He complied with their request and lo! there was not even one Mataleek. The children did not mind it and went away happy and contented. Altogether it was a lovely picture that will never be forgotten.

Dear friend!

In the Tablet of the Blessed Perfection that I translated on April 29th, he mentions the name of Nabeel whose voice was heard from Nazareth and who was one of those earliest pilgrims who could not enter Acca and meet the glorious Manifestation in the prison Barsak. About the history of this remarkable Bahai the Beloved said: - "His real name was Mirza Mohamad Ali Gaini. He was a man of great spirituality and wit. Long before the appearance of the Bab from Shiraz, he and the son of Mir Assadollah Khan, the brother of Mir Alam Khan, the Ameer of Gain, were brought to Teheran. The government held them as hostages, because they were in a state of rebellion and revolution against the established authority. Together they lived in the capital under the secret eye of the police. Nothing however could be detected from their words and actions that they harbored in their minds any revolutionary plan- and thus the restrictions and precautions with which they were hedged in were temporarily removed. One night the Blessed Perfection invited these two men to His residence and showing them much kindness, consoled them with His utterances. From that time on Mirza Mohamad Ali became the devoted friend of Baha Ollah and under all circumstances expressed for Him his respect and love. Later on His Holiness the Bab proclaimed his mission to the world and then the Blessed Perfection exposed his Cause and became the staunch supporter of his principles. When Mirza Mohamad Ali heard about the appearance and execution of the Bab and the manifestation of the Sun of Reality under the title of Him Whom God shall manifest, he became a believer without asking a single question. He would often state that he was a believer in Baha Ollah before He declared Himself, for at the night that he was invited to his house he observed in His general appearance the grandeur and spiritual authority of the Lord. Through His elevated discourse he would say He cheered and brightened us, saying. Be not unhappy, be not sad, ere long you will become free and return to your town with honor at that time we entertained no hope of liberty, for our enemies {{p19}} had woven the iron webs of accusations all around us. But all of a sudden the authorities sent for us and informed us that we are free, that his imperial majesty the Shah was very gracious toward us to go wherever we were pleased. In short during those days Baha Ollah told us many things in the course of conversation, all of which came to pass. Hence from his manner behavior and morals one could easily see that He was an individual distinct from other members of humanity.

In short, this Mirza Mohamad Ali was at the time living in Khorassan and associating with the erudite philosopher and Bahai thinker Aga Mohamad Nabeel, well - known in the Bahai world for his deep learning and eloquence.[In another letter I will translate the story of the life of this second Nabeel as related by the Master.] Through their public teaching of the Bahai Cause they become famous and the ignorant mob arose in their persecutions. Realizing how impossible it was to live in such fanatical communities both of them journeyed to Teheran and here also their open way of spreading the teachings made them odious in the sight of the public. Mirza Mohamad Ali could not tarry any longer and decided to leave the capital. Going through a series of startling difficulties and sorrow and travelling on foot, he at last reached behind the gate of Acca. It was in the first year of our arrival and thus we were imprisoned behind the thick walls of the military barrack. Seeing how utterly impossible it was to enter the town he went to Nazareth and passed his days in selling needles and his nights in prayer and supplication but he behaved with such an independence of spirit that all the Nazarenes thought he was a wealthy man. Meanwhile I was watching for the opportunity to send for him and when it was offered I took it by the forelock. Secretly and with the utmost precautions I brought him to the prison and all his troubles were compensated the moment he stood in the presence of the Blessed Beauty and hearkened to His life-giving words. After a number of days he was permitted to return {{p20}} to Nazareth and engage in business, at that time he was accompanied by his two sons, Mirza Ali Akblor and Aga Galam Hassen, the latter of whom is now living in Ramleh, Alexandria.

"When the freedom of the tower was granted us he used to come and go oftentimes on one of his trips, he came to me and said: 'Sir! I desire to enter into a partnership with you. You invest the capital be seven piastres and half with this I shall buy needles and in selling them make a world of [unreadable] I laughed over his modest demand for such an insignificant capital [about 0.30 cents] and his expectation of making a world of profit.' I gave him the required sum and he went away. Buying several packages of needles he started on his road toward Nazareth, now he used to exchange needles for one egg and when the eggs were collected he sold sixty or fifty of them for one Beshleek. [Ten cents] Out of the profit of this prosperous business he made living.

"After a few months he came back to Acca and I asked him for my share of profit of our partnership. 'I hope thy expectation of making a world of interest is realized. Come now my friend, and let me have my share. Thou must have become as rich as Croesus! He laughed and was full of joviality and good humor. 'O my Lord! We are ruined our very capital is gone. I don't think I am a good business man! I asked him with amused amazement: 'How is that? What didst thou to demolish our house of fortune? He answered: 'One day I got sick and could not go around peddling my needles for eggs, but toward the afternoon I felt better and thought I will leave my lodging and do at least a little business. It was a little dark and my eyes could not see very clearly, hence I gave four needles instead of three for one egg. Oh this was the beginning of our business collapse! The women communicative as they always are informed each other immediately that this Persian peddler is a rich merchant that all along I have been cheating them, that today I have given them four instead of 3 needles for one egg and that if they boycott my ware I will raise the number of needles to five. For several days they did not buy anything {{p21}} from me and thus I was forced to give them fine needles for one egg. This combination of feminine determination drove a dagger into the very heart of my profit- making ambition and reduced my income. After a time I saw with astonished disgust that the capital is gone and now I have come back to you with another proposition of commercial partnership which in a short space of time will make both of us quite rich! While talking in this half serious, half- joking manner he laughed all the time. He was in the highest station of joy, fragrance and attraction as though established on the golden throne of Sovereignty."

This morning I was sitting alone in my room and was speaking with you with my pen and heart when I heard the distinct sound of the feet of the Beloved and his resonant voice calling out my name reached the ears. Before I had time to get up he was in carrying in his hand a dish of mulberries. "This is from the garden of Rizwan. Abdul Gasem has seen it for me and I have brought this plate for thee. Dost thou like it. Then he asked me to follow him through the garden and see the apricot and prune trees of Esmael Aga."I love to look at the trees while they are adorned with their fruits and not much when they are devoid of them. A fruit- laden tree is like unto a man who has accomplished many good deeds and performed many selfless services." Walking around the garden he pointed out to me the fruits with the injunction that they must not be plucked. Now and then he felt them with his hands and every time I thought he will pluck a few and give them to me but he did nothing of the kind. He guessed my thought, for he said: "Will not the mulberries be sufficient for today? "He told Esmael Aga that he should not let the children enter that port of the garden for with one attack they will put an end to all the ripened and unripen fruits.

In the afternoon he had a ride in the landew with Zakki Bay and Doctor Ali Reza and with Badi Effendi and Mirza Anayetullah we called on Doctor Finkelstein whose face and hands were slightly burned by the explosion of powder.

In the evening The Beloved gave a very short talk on the ephemeral qualities of all things and the unchangeability of the eternal essence of God.

May 21, 1915 Home of Abdul Baha Mount Carmel, Haifa Syria

Dear friends!

While the landeau was driven toward Elijah's cave this afternoon I asked three questions from the Beloved. As they were general in tone and scope you "will it help the promotion of the Bahai principles and the establishment of Universal Peace if at the termination of this war an International Bahai Conference could be formed in London?"

"Yes. We must wait and see how the results of the mighty events which a taking place in these days will shape themselves into concrete facts and how far the Western nations will soar toward the bright heaven of human brotherhood! This old world of ours is undergoing undreamed changes and revolution. It is in a transitional state, shedding off its old skin and taking unto itself new ligments and building up new tissues. The happy and healthy children of a new order of public opinion are being born, the ethical laws of the world are in the process of a radical reformation and an entirely new code of statutes will be legistated for the international relations and final consolidation of the modern and ancients nations. No human mind can conceive the startling changes which God has in store for His chastened children."It seems to me that the present war is rather intensifying the root of enmity and hatred between the nations because so much blood is being shed and all the pacific agencies have failed in their mission. Have they another power through which they may eradicate the basis of this new evil?"

"It is now demonstrated that all their existent powers have contributed something toward the realization of this world war, even their so-called christian religion has been made pliable instrument for the promotion of war purposes. Hence it is evident that they have no other executive power strong enough to remove the accumulated load of their new-created rancours. The only power that is left is the Power of the Bahai Movement which is impartial and entirely spiritual. This is the only highway through which they can marshal their armies of Peace. When they turn their faces {{p23}} toward this Point their hearts will be illuminated with a new light, their complicated relations will be readjusted and their problems solved. For this reason I have said that after this war there must needs be many Bahai teachers, equipped and ready to go out into the world and explain to the sorrow-stricken nations the self-evident benefits of peace. The whole world will then be in a listening attitude and willing to forget the past and strike a new road of mutual helpfulness and co-opearation." "Supposing there were a few Bahai members in the national parliaments and Senates of the nations, would they have been able to promote in a practical manner the Cause of Universal Peace?"

"Yes. It would have had a market effect. God willing this excellent idea will become realized, for such representatives and Senators would concentrate all their energies and influence on the side of Peace and conciliation. Their public utterances in the national councils will be listened to respectively and their sincere strivings crowned with success. By the delivery of eloquent speeches they will attract the attention of the world to the insanity of war adherents-thus organizing a strong, virile wisely-propelled public opinion capable to stem the furious tide of any uprising and changing the current of blind evil forces into the channel of world solidarity and inter-racial brotherliness. Such Bahai members having drank from the pure fountain of the Universal Teachings of Baha-Ollah, are in reality cosmopolitan in spirit, mind and soul and have arisen above the stultifying limit of nationality and patriotism. They exert all their moral, religious and intellectual powers for the progress of the world and the perfection of mankind. God will assist and confirm them in all their undertakings. Of a truth they are the harbingers of roseate daven of the sun of world's amity and friendship. Their words and deeds will exert a decided influence on the decisions of their governments. They will become enabled on the decisions of their governments. They will become enabled not only to usher in the era of the United States of Europe but the infinitely more important measure will be brought into fruition under their wise and statesmanlike leadership and that is- the organization of the United- States of the world. If there has been possible {{p24}} in the past the formation of a United States of America, the next nature step will be the constitution of a United States of Europe, each state autonomous within its boundary, inter-dependent and working for the common prosperity, general advancement, expansion of commerce, diffusion of learning, the welfare of the whole communities, the socialization of industries and the improvements of arts of the human society."

Our landeau stopped a few minutes under the olive grove and he spoke about the deposition of Gaemmagam," Such the course of human events yesterday he was the governor of Haifa and did practically as he pleased. Today he is shorn of all his autocratic powers and cannot oppress the poor people." On our return he alighted from the carriage at the police station and talked a few minutes with the commissioner. Then he walked to the hotel Carmel and several military officers arose from their seats on the veranda and welcomed him in their midst. Here also tarried for a quarter of an hour and when we reached home the commander of the garrison in Acca was awaiting him. He welcomed him and took him by the arms. In a second they disappeared in the house. Thus for about three hours we were with the Lord, [unreadable] in the sunshine of his countenance and receiving the sweet manna of his blessings.

At noon I partook of the material food at his table. There were a few more guests and he spoke to them on a variety of interesting subjects. In the morning he took Badi Effendi through the garden and showed him the fruits hanging on the branches and tempting the beholder. In the evening Haji Mirza Haydor Ali asked him to dictate to me half an hour a day the detailed history of the life of the Blessed Perfection as a priceless heritage for future generations. He did not answer him but simply said: "The signs of greatness and majesty was apparent in Baha Ollah at every stage of his miraculous life and those who entered His presence went away impressed with His supernatural learning and intelligence."

Dear friends!

The restless spirit revolts against the monotonous environment and lifeless surroundings but the angel of mercy exhorts to patience and endurance. The mind longs after busy scenes and unremitting labors but the beautiful seraph reminds it of the spiritual reward given to those who suffer and wait. Man yearns for the things of this world but the cherub of the Most High desires his separation from them. The new fledgeling wishes to break the cage which guards it against the storms of tests and hurricanes of trials but the tender mother gives persuasive talks and anxious advice. The soul cries out against the lack of the spirituality of those with whom he consorts and aspires for the association of the high minded and the noble but the kind mentor teaches him to look inward and commune with the ideals of the invisible friends. Do not leave the real, in order to chase after an imaginary phantasm. Be thou a loyal soldier and stuck behind thine own gun. Fire out thy spiritual and intellectual balls into the camp of enemy. Aim high thy projectiles so that it may burst through the air by the impelling force of the spirit. Let the missiles shot from thy fire arms set on fire the houses of superstitions and the abodes of prejudices. Be not afraid that thou hast become an automaton machine. This will never be, for the Lord is protecting thee under the shadow of His Spirit and causing the outflowing of pure water from the never-failing fountains of thy mind and heart. Hast thou not learned enough that the pleasures of this world shall pass away, while the joy of the kingdom is eternal? the youthful beauty will be followed by white hairs and old age but the beauty of lordly services and the youthfulness of pristine ideals shall remain forever the same? Hence, give up thy heart to the adored beloved of faithful reality and clasp in thy arms the virgin bride of celestial attribute. Be happy with what God has been gracious enough to bestow on thee and let thy days be one uninterrupted song of thanksgiving. Worry not over thy future. The One who has taken care of thee in the past, will also take care of thee in the time to come.

This morning the Beloved of the world was walking along the avenues of the verdant garden and with a pruning-shears was cutting off the superfluous branches of a number of roses bushes. He wore his long, flowing cream-white Persian overcoat and he looked very majestic as he trimmed the trees and moved slowly from this to the other end of the garden. Who could doubt for a moment that he is the real spiritual gardener of the world of humanity who pulls up withered trees and plants in their stead new and young saplings, full of the sure promises of blossoms and fruits.

One of the believers asked: - "Although it is assured that the life of this world is transitory and attachment to it is not praise worthy yet in many sacred Tablet the Blessed Perfection and the Master himself have lamented and bemoaned the physical deaths of those who have journeyed to the abode of eternal Peace. What is the wisdom of this?"

The Master answered: "The physical body has also a shore. When I was in America a number of Christians came to me and asked a most subtle and difficult questions. It was this: 'While the apostles longed with perfect resignation and radiant acquiescence for the station of martyrdom and many of them and thousands of later converts sacrificed their lives with joy and happiness, how is it that his holiness Jesus Christ, just before his crucifixion prayed to His Father to take away this cup from him, saying: 'The spirit is truly ready, but the flesh is weak? (St. Mark chap 14. v. 38). I told them, you may go first to your own ministers and clergy and ask this question from them, for they look upon the Easterners as heathens, unbaptized, unconfirmed, unregenerated and unordained while they consider themselves as the heirs and joint-heirs of the Kingdom of God and well-informed of the mysteries of Holy writ, hence they are not willing to accept our interpretation quite readily.' They went away and returned after a few days that the Ministers answers did not agree with each other nor did they satisfy them. I [unreadable]. The answer to your question is very simple and given in a few words: The body or the flesh was 'sorrowful and very heavy' (Math chap 26th ) because it loathed to be separated from the companionship of such divine, celestial Spirit and be returned to clay and dust. This was the secret of its weakness, sorrow and heaviness."

Before noon the landau was prepared and he took a ride with Zakki Bay and with him called on a number of officials. In the afternoon several Arab and Turkish gentlemen paid him short visits and he received them in the garden. Which he talked with them Khosro served tea and cigarettes.

Tonight the friends of God gathered in the reception room and listened to the words of their Master. He said in part: "I found the Jews very crest fallen today, because on slight excuses the government has exiled of their prominent leaders. The new rigorous laws of the naturalization weigh heavily on them. They are actually accused of planning secretly to establish a visible kingdom in Palestine. The Orthodox Jews according to the literal interpretation of a number of passages in the Old Testament, of course were holding such a belief but the growing literacy and intellectual party, having cast away the enthusiasms born out of ignorance, discredit the whole proposition as nothing else but a dream. They think it is no more than a wild fancy on the part of the Jews to ever harbor the idea of founding the Solomonic Sovereignty in Jerusalem. Firstly, the economic and social status of the Jews in different parts of the world precludes the idea of bringing all of them together. Secondly, the Christians and Mohamadans who claim equal shares in the sacred spots of the holy land will never permit them to so much as draw the plan of such a kingdom. Thirdly, the European Powers who have vital and permanent interests in Syria will do everything to extirpate the growth of such a national feeling amongst the Jews, one of Turkish officers had asked a Jewish woman in Damascus, what did the Israelites think about the organization of a kingdom in Palestine and she had answered that this was the cornerstone of their belief. This confession has been much made of, although the whole belief has been known to everyone from time immemorial. Much importance has been given to it at this special hour because it is serving the peculiar and sinister purposes of those who are in authority. This has been made also the reason for the banishment and imprisonment of their leaders. If the Turkish government is so anxious to pressure her integrity, would it not be better to protect her domains from the aggression of Russia, England and France and leave these poor Jews and their Messianic dream of concrete Sovereignty to themselves?"

Dear friends!

This morning the Beloved called Badi Effendi and this servant and we walked behind him through the street of the German Colony as far as the Hotel Carmel. His words were as follows: - "A Bahai must conform all his great and small affairs in accord with the good pleasure of the Blessed Perfection. This is the unerring criterion. For example if he takes one step forward or one step backward, he must first think whether this will be according to the good-pleasure of Baha Ollah or whether such a step will be considered as a service or not. If he sees that his forward step will not contribute something to the promotion of the Cause, it will be better for him to stand still. The people of the world are thinking of by, and for themselves. They are promoting their own selfish interests and serving their own small causes. Each soul is attached to his own hobby and beating on his own drum and soaring in the atmosphere of his own desire. If they speak they have some known or unknown objectives point in view, if they walk they wish to reach the goal of some personal ambition, if they eat and sleep they desire to be strengthened in order to advance their own ideas. In brief all their movements are dictated by obedience to self. They live, move and feel like unto the animals, self-centered, self-occupied, seeing nothing, believing in nothing beyond their five senses. But the morning-spring of the actions and deeds of the believers of God must be the good-pleasure of Baha Ollah. All their services and thoughts must be for the sake of God. If they sleep they must sleep with the idea of being refreshed; - so that when they arise next morning they may serve the Cause with greater efficiency and strength. If they eat they must eat with the object of building up new life-force, in order that they may move and walk in the Celestial Highway. The life of such Bahais with these lofty purposes will bear great fruits; otherwise no results will be gathered from all their strivings and efforts. They will spend a few profitless years and then there will be nothing for them left in the end same regret, deprivation and remorse."

When we reached near Hotel Carmel he pointed out to us a fig-tree and said: - "If this fig-tree does not bear fruits, the gardener will tear it from the root and cast it into fire. Similarly if the trees of the world of humanity do not produce fruits, the hand of Divine Power will pull them out of His garden and throw them away. The friends of God must be the fruit-bearing trees of the Orchard of the Lord. Their manners and behaviors must be an example for those who have not been fortunate enough to come under the benign influence of the Bahai dispensation. The Cause is great and universal and it will be ever in need of equally great and universally-minded followers."

Entering the hotel he told us to return to the house. We were made very happy in listening to his words and recording them for the benefit of those who are deprived in these days to stand in his holy presence.

At noon he gave another luncheon and his guests included the deposed Qaem-magam, Zakki Bay, the President, Secretary and Treasurer of German Bank, three generals and a few others. As the guests were rather numerous there were no seats for me around the table but from behind the door I could hear his voice and now and then observe his animating gestures.

About three P.M. Badi Effendi and myself were walking in the garden when the door of the house opened and the Beloved came out majestically and stood erect on the step. Calling out my name he said: -"Hast thou heard the news? Italy has declared war against Austria and Germany has expressed her readiness to take up arms against Italy. What dost thou think? This is another axe added to the slaughter house of humanity, another martial anthem joined to the universal carnage of mankind." I reminded him that four months ago he expressed the opinion that should Italy join this dram of fratricide, it will hasten the end of war.

The landeau was made ready and for one hour and half we had a delightful ride with the centre of the covenant. All along the way have e did not speak and although I had several questions I choose silence on this occasions.

In the evening he delivered a long historical talk, having a direct relation with the progress of the Cause throughout the world.

Dear friends!

Another occasion arose this afternoon in the Pilgrim's Home and the Beloved gave another urgent and emphatic talk on the necessity of the acquirement of trades and crafts by all the young Bahais. He said in part: "The parents must exert their utmost effort; -thus their children may learn trades and professions. The first and primal thing that is essential for every young man is a trade. This is supremely an industrial age and the man who has not specialized himself in some line will be crippled on every side and hampered on every step in his pursuit of a livelihood. No sooner the children have laid the foundation of their theoretic and primary knowledge in the school rooms they must be sent to the workshops to learn the applied and practical sciences. This is ofcourse not a universal necessity for they will be found always some well-to-do families who by providing a complete course of academic, intellectual and philosophic education for their sons and daughters will enable them to shoulder in its proper time the civic moral and spiritual responsibilities of the growing communities giving wings to the birds of ideals and raising the general tone of the mass by noble utterances and heaven-glittering thoughts.

"In this dispensation to study an art is prayer; work is considered as worship. For this reason it is said: the tradespeople are the friends of God! Reflect for a momment how blessed is art or trade that is acquirement or occupation is regarded as prayer. Through the educational laws of attention and suggestion, encourage and incite the children to characterize themselves with merciful ethics, spiritual qualities, praiseworthy deeds and moral principles. Study well their moods and feelings and through the many pleasurable enterprises direct them into inspiring channels. Do not lose an oppurtunity in cultivating in their minds a sense of the beautiful and the perfect.

"When we were imprisoned in the barrack, one day, the Blesed Perfection spoke about the necessity of industrial education of the believers of God {{p31}} and their descendents. This was before the revelation of the Book of Akdas where the command of industrial education was laid down. When I heard His word I addressed myself. What can I do to learn trade? I am the proison. I cannot go out. There are no arts and trades school in Acca. After much inquiry I found there was a mat-weaver in the town and I sent for him and stipulated with him for a certain sum to teach me his trade. He installed his simple weaving machine in one of the prison rooms and for six months I was an apprentice under the direction of my master. The first mat that I wove with my own hands I spread under the feet of the Blessed Perfection."God confirms and assists those souls who obey and follow His laws and commandments. Obedience to the divine statutes is conducive to eternal life. The very thought that he was carried out one of the principles of God will grant him joy and pure happiness; he will soar in the spiritual realms of the Almighty and advance toward the heaven of bliss.

"I am solicitous about the conditions of the friends of God and am concerned with their steady progress. I love them and wish for them unlimited development. Others do not worry themselves about it nor are they anxious. They say: Why should we bother ourselves about the conditions of those that do not concern us. But I am not so constitute I must look after your welfare and speak to you about those things which would exalt your stations.

"The mothers and fathers must not leave any stone unturned in the thorough education of their children according to their aptitudes and potentialities. Day and night they must exert themselves. One momment of negligence is culpable. If they have not receive a technical and manual education in their childhood, when they grow up they will be poor, miserable, homeless, shelterless, hopeless, walking all nights in the streets or at the best sleeping in the public lodging house and becoming imbued with the sinful and unpardonable quality of beggary and mendicancy, either directly or indirectly.

"God has created man noble, how can he degrade this station of divine nobility by begging? He has made him of the pure essence of spiritual wealth, how does he dare to alloy it by the base metal of mendicancy?

One minute of negligence on the part of the mothers may cost the children years of pains and sufferings. Manual training, technical education, industrial efficiency must be the object of every mother in raising her sons and daughters. The mothers must not spoil the children by showering upon them too many endearing words. They may better decrease the numbers of 'my darling', 'my lambkin', 'my dove', 'my sweet baby', 'my fragrant narcissus', 'light of my eyes', 'my heart', 'my beauty', many other such affectionate titles copiously indulged in by fond mothers and increase the quality of education and the quantity of instruction given to the growing minds and spirits of their children. If possible they must go over their lessons every night and help them in every way to pass through the trying and important period of adolescents. They must watch their habits and sympathetically find out and stop the source of their evil customs. As far as it lies in their powers they must not let them associate with bad and immoral companions and both b examples and advice teach them to avail [unreadable] of the friendship of the worthies and the communion of the pure.

"In short, the explicit command of Baha Ollah is that every child whether rich or poor, aristocrat or democrat, high or low must learn a trade, an art or a craft. This law must be incorporated in the constitution of every school. Supposing that a person is not in need that economically speaking he is rich, even he for the sake of obedience to the blessed command must acquire a profession. A Bahai must correlate his actions, words and affairs with the basic principles of the Blessed Perfection. If he sees that the former agrees with the latter, he may feel quite sure that he is on the right track. All our difficulties arise from the fact that our deeds do not correspond with the good pleasure of Baha Ollah. With the presence of such a condition, it is passing strange that we still hope for benefic results. Is this possible that we have sown the wind and we must inevitably reap the whirlwind. We have repeatedly experienced that those actions which have not been found approvable by the Blessed Perfection have yielded no good results and have always terminated by undesirable [unreadable] have not been warned nor have we [unreadable].

Consequently if we desire to succeed in this life we must conform all our deeds, thoughts and habits with the good-pleasure of Baha Ollah. We must suppose Him as alive and sitting in His room and we, standing in his divine Presence and if we explained to Him our aims and purposes, would He have been pleased with them or not? would He have addressed us: 'Well done! This is good?' Now the Blessed Perfection is not in our midst but we have with us His Teachings and [unreadable]tations. Therefore we must correspond thwm with those heavenly instructions and keep them ever before our minds."

This morning the Beloved was in the garden, passing a pleasant hour in trimming the trees and giving valuable hints to Esmael Aga in exterminating the harmful insects which are destroying this verdant and freshness. Then he went out to call on Zakki Bay because he is going to leave today for Jerusalem. From the hotel they walked together to the store of Mirza Anayetuallah and there they continued their warm conversation till noon. At the corner of the road they bade farewell to each other, the Master kissing his face two or three times and showering upon him his protective blessings. When we reached home he ascended the stairs and after a few minutes I heard his voice calling out to me. I ran out and after a few minutes I heard his voice calling out to me. I ran out and saw him standing near the door with a pair of his own shoes in his hand. "Come up and try these on thy feet, if they fit thou canst have them." I tried but they were too small. "I see the feet are larger than mine. Give them back to me." he said and stretch out his blessed hand to take the shoes. "My Lord! these are now mine. I would like to take them for surely they will fit other feet than mine, I will be made supremely happy and blessed to possess them as a precious relic." Pake' Ala"- very good- and retired to his room. I descended the stairs in joyful spirit and kissed and hugged the shoes many times. I shall wait meanwhile till I meet the worthy soul to wear them, not for always but only on very rare occasions.

Dear friends!

Yesterday we received a letter from Beirut containing the rather sad news of the death of Haji Mirza Hassan Khorassani in Cairo, Egypt. As you know he was very prominent Baha merchant in that city and many years ago he went to the United States for the purpose of teaching this revelation. The old believers in America and those who have visited the East and passed through Egypt remember his kingly bearings and generous hospitality. Although during the last few years he had many financial reverses yet in the palmier days of his successful career he served the Cause of God and the believers in many practical ways. When he arrived in Cairo about fifty or sixty years ago he was a poor man but by industry and application he reached to the top of the ladder, was honored amongst his compeer and his experienced advice sought on every side. In the strictest sins of the word he was a self made man, making his fortune by the dint of perseverance and acquiring a fame for honesty and fair business dealings. During the lifetime of Baha Ollah as well as after His Departure he was almost an annual pilgrim to the holy land. In those blessed days there were pilgrims from many countries of the Orient and he spread before them royal banquets and feasts around which they all gathered in the Presence of the Manifestation or His Son hearkening to their Words of Truth and Wisdom and receiving the blessings of the Holy Spirit. His large, palatial residence surrounded by a beautiful garden has ever been the meeting-ground of all the Bahais- permanent place for Friday gatherings, for special reunions- a headquarter for the carrying out of many Bahai activities. He loved to entertain the friends and he had a wonderful knack in gathering them together so that they may speak about the Cause and chant Tablets. When I first arrived in Cairo I alighted in his house and from that time on my love and admiration for him has ever been growing throughout the many evolutions of my life. When we arrived in Port Said he was there to welcome back the centre {{p35}} of the Covenant; in Ramleh we associated with him almost everyday and attended his Friday meetings and after our landing in Haifa he came and stayed for two or three months. He was a true and noble Bahai and I believe he would have sacrificed his life for the good of the Cause if the occasion has arisen. His love and veneration for the Master was beyond description. When the news was broken to the Beloved last night he was at first stoned and felt grieved. "This is a sad news" he said and became silent. After several minutes he raised his head and continued: -"Poor Haji Mirza Hassan but he is now released from the worries of the world. For him there were no more happy days. With all the financial difficulties that surrounded him he could dream of no peaceful hour. He was a man of magnanimous disposition and generous nature. He was a high-minded and honorable, liberal and disinterested and in the blessed Cause he was firm and steadfast. What a good thing is death! With it all man's suffering and troubles are brought to an end. It frees the soul from the chains of water and clay. In its court all-kings and subjects, the philosophers and the ignorant are equal. It levels all the barriers of distinctions and titles constructed by the crude hands of men during their short spans of their lives on this globe. Why should men view death with horror? Why do they paint it with a shocking and repugnant sight? Why do they shrink and recoil from its bare mention? However much man is surrounded with griefs and tribulations when he thinks that there will be a time of freedom, a time of liberty, his heart is eased and his mind tranquilized. For this reason the sanctified souls however longed for the coming of the angels of death. Like unto the birds imprisoned in the cage they yearn for the opening of the door, - so that they may wing their ways through the immensity of the blue, singing the songs of paradise and rising higher into the glorious regions of light. Now how restful and quiet has become Haji Mirza Hassan! he has hastened to the vicinity of the Lord of Grandeur has taken his abode in the neighborhood of God's Mercy. The people and their shifting concerns do not touch him anymore. His affairs are in the hands of His maker.

"Truly I say he was a disinterested man and a distinguished personage. In his lifetime he served the Cause of God and the friends of the Merciful. In Alexandria he gathered together all the believers and gave them good positions in his up-to -date Persian department store for many years; he gave work even to the Arab Bahais and kept them in a state of spiritual progressing and co-operation. Invariably and without exception the friday meetings were held in his residence. He was a magnet of attraction and the string of his purse was nevertied. During the feast and holidays he gave magnificent banquets and elaborate fetes, inviting all the friends and sympathize to help themselves at his bounteous table. his engaging personality diffused gladness, gayety and merriment amongst the company of guests.

“The large and beautiful candelabrum suspended in the reception room of the Tomb of the Bab on Mt. Carmel and the wonderfully carved table around which dozens of guests can sit are two precious souvenirs from him.”He was a liberal man; he was not stingy, he burned always like a flame, he was not extinct; he was ever active and his enthusiasm contagious, he was not passive nor cold. With a nobility of mind he worked and took care of the friends. What a pity that he died but has he not found eternal rest? did he not enter into a divine world which is sanctified beyond and above our mundane conditions? Firmly, steadfastly, believingly, assuringly he stepped into the changeless kingdom of Abha. Is not this the first of our existence? If not this, then what else?”

This morning he walked through the avenues of the garden and step by step led us into the perennial gardens of the spirit, wherein the roses never fade and the lilies do not wither. While promenading through these celestial gardens we listened to the sweet songs of the nightingales and were enraptured by the melodies of the birds of paradise. Assuredly you have had glimpses of those happy regions, you have beheld the luxurious of their imperishable flowers, you have witnessed the indescribable beauty and remarkable clearness of their surroundings. These are only the godlike experiences of a few minutes which make life worth living and inspire man with a courage and faith to rediscover [unreadable].

This afternoon the landeau was ready and he asked me to accompany him. It was driven toward the Arabian quarter of Haifa in the East. After a long ride through dirty, narrow roads it stopped in front of a house. Here was a sick-man the son of an old friend of the Beloved and the Master was in his room for half an hour, consoling him and his anxious family and prescribing [unreadable] some kind of medicine. When he came out we were still driven further to a tea house belonging to a Persian Bahai by the name Haji Farhan. The tea house is surrounded by a lovely garden- agreeen oasis in the midst of desert built on the main road- a resting place for the weary wayfarers. Here we found the seventy government laborers sent out daily too kill the locusts. They had just returned from their arduous work and were taking a rest under the shade of trees. The Master spoke to them and inquired about their health. Then he ordered Haji Farhan to entertain them with tea in his name. They needed this refreshment and were thankful for his thoughtfulness. From the tea house he walked to the home of the brothers of Zoenat Khanom -the wife of our brother Doctor Bagdadi. He visited their rooms, surveyed their garden and instructed them to plant olive trees. Then he stopped a few minutes at the house of Mirza Moneer Zain to welcome and bless the new baby girl born on the tenth of the current month. Both his wife and himself are very happy over the arrival of the new guests and he feels already the importance and responsibility of fatherhood. Then he called at the home of another friend and spoke to her about the welfare of her son. Again I found myself with him in the landeau and soon we were back in the home of Truth. The extra exertion and the heat of the day fatigued him very much and he retired to his room for a short rest before the meeting.

When I was in the landeau I asked him to give me a complete suite of his clothes to be carried to America as a priceless heirloom for posterity. He smiled and assented to my request. It will be very wonderful of the various articles of his clothes are kept in a safe deposit for future generations. There are many believers who have the different pieces of his clothes but it will be very fine if we could have them all together and in one place.

Dear friends!

The sun had already arisen and the sweet garden was a picture of peaceful calmness. The Master came down from his room - a majestic king descending from his throne of glory and authority. There were a few friends who had come to see him, thinking he will leave this morning for Acca. Looking into their faces and then gazing over the flowers he said: - "I am leaving this afternoon for Acca to spend the night of the ascension in the Blessed Tomb. For the last four or five years I have not been here and have been deprived of this spiritual bounty. In no other place do I find such rest and comfort as in Acca, in no other room do I feel so strongly the vibrations of the spirit as the room in which the Blessed Perfection lived for ever so many years. Although the weather of Acca is generally humid and nowadays quite hot, yet whenever I go there I do not like to leave the place, because it is the most great prison of the Manifestation of God." Then turning his eyes toward [unreadable] Mirza Haydor Ali and addressing the friends he said: - "You must take very good care of him. He is a blessed soul. He harbors in his mind and heart no other thoughts and ideas save the welfare of the Cause of God. Praise be to God that all the believers are thinking and dreaming of the promotion of the message. The followers of the Blessed Perfection have undergone innumerable hardships in the Divine Path. Each person according to his ability and station in life forbore much trials and ordeals for the sake of Truth. They were always surrounded with danger. They did not rest for one night nor were they secure for one day. [unreadable] did they fall into the bands of the enemies and hailed unbearable calamities. Although in the estimation of the people their moral and spiritual value is unknown yet in the sight of Baha Ollah they are very dear. How many nights did they not sleep and groaned under the weight of chains and fetters! How often did they become the object of contumely, obloquy and reproach. Many a time did they receive the crushing blow of the axe of the oppressor! In many a city their properties were confiscated {{p39}} and their belongings pillaged. Thousands were martyred and these children made captives. Consequently in the sight of the Blessed Beauty they are all very beloved and acceptable. The spiritual station of these early Bahais are not known now but it will become revealed after their departure from this life. It is like the seeds which are sown under the soil. Temporarily nothing is visible but after a while the large field will become verdant. The station of the apostles of Christ was not manifest in their own days and even for many years afterwards.”

Then he ordered Esmael Aga to prepare four vases to be carried with us to the Holy Tomb. “We are poor and we have nothing worthy to carry to that Divine Court. These flowers are also raised by thee. Praise be to God that thou art assisted in this service.”

People commenced to come and we retired to our room. Till noon they arrived and the Lord spoke with them and lifted up their loads of sorrows and troubles.

In the afternoon the carriage was ready and the Master took his seat in it. He took with himself Badi Effendi, Khosro and this servant, Mrs. [unreadable] Getsinger and a number of the family will follow us in a day or two. While we were driving along the sacred shore he spoke about the quiet scene and the charm of the sea. “The sandy desert along the beach is full of mystic stillness. Here a person is far away from the weaknesses of the flesh and out of the reach of all the human temptations. If a person could disclose and bring into the light of day the real and secret qualities of the hearts, he would observe that although these people are human in outward form and shape yet in truth they are wolves, jackals, leopards, elephants, hyenas, serpents, scorpions and tarantulas. Of the human and divine attributes they are totally deprived. Therefore a spiritual man keeps himself always out of their venomous and ferocious company and associates only with the pure in hearts and devout in contemplation.”

After a long silence he asked me to speak and I told him how entirely and completely we are secluded from the world’s current and how little do we hear about the believers of God in America.

He said: “In the United States the Cause of God is progressing. The invisible hand is working and the unseen tongue is speaking. In Germany and America the tree of the Cause is being watered and is growing day by day...”

At last we reached Acca and entered the holy home of the Manifestation. No sooner the Master entered his room than the friends and the strangers began to arrive to welcome him back after more than a month of absence. The utter desolation and apparently lifeless appearance of the town struck me with a chill of horror. The Beloved felt the same way, for as the carriage entered the gate and he looked in the pale and gaunt and ghost like faces of a few shadowy human beings he said: “Oh! What a sad, sad scene! This is the city of the dead. It has become like a cemetery, God is indeed chastening its inhabitants. The light of God shone in their midst for many years and they comprehended it not. They were blind, deaf and mute. This is indeed God’s retribution. The people are sitting in sackcloth and ashes, they are surrounded with the burning fire of the Lord’s wrath, yet they are not awakened nor are they made mindful. ‘In the city is left desolation, and the gate is smitten with destruction... all joy is darkened, the mirth of the land is gone.’ [Isaiah chap 24, v.11 12] We hope still that the ruined places shall be build up, the songs of joy be raised and the hearts be filled with the glory of the Lord.”

In the evening we had a good meeting and the Beloved spoke about Italy and her entrance in the arena of the warring nation. Then he touched on the history of the occupation of [unreadable] by England and related an incident to illustrate his theme. Now indeed all the doors are closed before our faces. The only means of communication with the outside world was the weekly or fortnight arrival of the Italian steamer and that also is brought to amends. Not that the Italian steamer brought us any letter or news or pilgrims but it afforded us only the pleasing sight and sensation that we are not totally forgotten. Farewell to all such peaceful scenes till God in His own mysterious way calms this raging storm and extinguishes this world consuming fire.

Dear friends!

Yesterday and today the heat in Acca has been something quite unbearable and of the most nerve-shattering nature. I could neither eat, sleep nor walk. It affected markedly the brightness and vivacity of the Beloved. I was limp and spiritless and the heated weather had so affected my disposition that I would have quarreled without any cause with whosoever crossed my path. This time the very atmosphere of the place is extremely depressing, the faces are joyless, the hearts are heavy, the spirits are dead; the flowers of happiness have withered away, the green leaves of mirth have sered by the apressure winds of multitude of cruelties, the birds of serenity have become silent and flown away and the sky of prosperity is beclouded. My heart moved with pity at the sight of this miserable, wretched and woe-begone humanity! I felt sad and grieved and totally powerless before this awful scene of walking and living charnel-house. Over the houses the broods the ominous spirit of ray less gloom, the eyes are palled and colorless, the heads are drooping and the hopes are sinking to the bottomless pit of despair. The blooms and flowers of this generation are blown away by the sharp sword of this calamities war, leaving behind bereft mothers and fathers. The daily exactions of a pitiless, military government have brought the starving residue of the people to the verge of open rebellion. God hath sent to them the countless legions of locusts, changing in one night the verdant gardens- the result of years of patient, arduous labor- into plain deserts. They are threatened with bombs and shells from sea and from the upper sphere. Truly they are encompassed on all sides with all the trials and calamities. Never before Syria has been afflicted with so many disasters at the same time and in the same year. The scourges of God and man are administering an unheard of punishment to the harassing people. This is indeed the year of tribulations, wars, plagues, woes, earthquakes and tremblings, the most unlucky year in the history of humanity. Day by day the fire of prejudices and hatred is kindled with greater intensity, burning thousands upon thousands.

Tonight the Master gave along spiritual talk containing the short history of one of the celebrated Baha teachers and I may share its translation with you: - "In the world of creation every cause has a magnetic focus, a centre of attraction around which revolves its powerful activities and interests. The magnetic center of the Bahai Cause which attracts unto the personality of the holder all the spiritual benedictions and privileges is steadfastness. Whosoever has gotten a firm hold of this spiritual principle, divine confirmations shall descend upon him and attainment to eternal God will be made easy. Especially when with this supreme quality is joined the practical and altruistic ability to serve and teach the Cause of Reality. This is the magnet of real attraction, otherwise the end of every success is failure, the goal of every rest is trouble, the bound of every immortality is mortality, the purpose of every glory is disgrace, the conclusion of every affluence is poverty and the termination of every union is dispersion.

"Ponder for a moment by whom this house was built and with what pride and self-assertion he walked on the face of the earth. While he was alive all the people of Acca envied his wealth and position and longed to receive one twentieth part of his comfort and riches. He walked on the earth as though he bestowed upon it a great favor. What did become of him he died and passed away as though he had never been born, named or lived. Thus it is evident that the end of that honor which is not gained in for and through the Cause of God is identical with degradation, collection is simile to scattering and the accumulation of riches will be followed destitution. Where is the sovereignty of Nasser-Eddin Shah? Where is the imperial haughtiness and arrogance of Sultan Abdul Hamid? Where is the over-bearing egoism of Ali Pasha? Where is the ministerial deceits and corruption of Mirza Aga-ssi? Where are the tactics of the commandership of Moshired Daulet? Where is the splendor and magnificence displayed Ameen-es-Sultan? Like unto the unreal ghosts that appeared upon the stage and vanished away. But had these men served at the Divine Court they would have illumined the vast majestic audience of humanity. This is no other than truth.

Similarly in the religious world there lived in Najaf Sheik Morteza {{p43}} who was the chief Pontiff of fifty million Shiites. Before there was Sheik Mohamad Hassan who became famous for his theological learning. He was revered and respected by the Mohamadan world. Likewise great muta physicians like Ay-atallah of Khorassan and Mirza Ḥabíbu'lláhollah of Shirag became well-known for their religious erudition. Above and beyond all these towered high Haji Mohamad Karim Khan of Kerman who held in his hand the scepter of temporal and spiritual powers. By virtue of his being a prince he lived as a King and having reached the position of an authoritative religion leader he wielded an overwhelming moral force. Whenever he made a pilgrimage to the holy shrine of Mashad more than one thousand knights dressed in gold and silver-plated cuirasses, bucklers etc, followed and served him. All this pomps, ostentatious and flourish have passed away as the bad dreams of a feverish brain. "Amongst the many students of Sheik Morteza there was a brilliant follow by the name of Aga Mohamad of Qavin, whose title in the Bahai world is His holiness Nabeel the Great! Having finished his theological studies in the college of Sheik Morteza he investigated and accepted this revelation. When he received his diploma from his master he came to Bagdad. Here we met him. He was in reality the flame of the love of God. He stood or sat in the presence of Baha Ollah with the utmost lowliness and humility and listened to His utterances of wisdom. One day he was thus sitting with gentle submission while the Blessed Perfection was talking to him when the door was opened and Haji Mirza Hassan Ammou, the unquestioned leader of the Mullahs of Karbala, accompanied by Lein-el-Abeddin Khan (title, Fakhrod-Doulet) entered the room. Ammou was surprised to see Nabeel sitting with such humility in the presence of Baha Ollah. Sheik Morteza had not given in his life a religious diploma to any of his students some Nabeel and through this particular distinction he had become a well known scholar for his extraordinary intellect and acumen. Therefore Ammou asked him with wonder in his eyes, what he was doing there. Nabeel answered meekly: "I am here after the same quest that he has brought you!

"From Bagdad Nabeel returned to Qavin, his native town in Persia. The Ameer of Qavin, Mir Alam Khan received him with marked respect and distinguished honor. He showered upon him much love and attention when the people observed their chief honoring Nabeel in such a whole hearted manner they all followed in his footsteps and paid him unprecedented homage. The flame of the Love of God was so enkindled in his heart that he could not keep it hidden for a long time and thus it bursted out in glowing coruscations. Truly I say he illuminated the district of Qavin and guided many souls to the fountain-head of Reality. When he became known as a standard-bearer of this revelation, the fanatical clergy arose against him and incited the mob to persecute him. Mir Alam Khan also followed the crowd and manifested the greatest opposition. The affairs reached to such a height that they finally banished him from the town and after a long and arduous journey he reached Teheran. Here he removed the turban and placed a simple lambskin hat on his head; - so that no one may recognize him and he may become better able to teach the Cause and spread the Holy Fragrances. Of a truth he was the brilliant lamp of guidance and the Celestial torch of spiritual illumination. Dangers encircled him on every side, the minions of darkness searched after him to arrest and execute him but the hand of destiny directed his steps toward Ashkhabad and Bakhara while he was engaged in the latter city in the service of the Cause he departed to the kingdom of Abha. He has composed a very eloquent book to demonstrate the validity of this dispensation. It is my hope that book will become [unreadable] long available, published and circulated.

“In short, the point is this: these great religious pontiffs like Sheik Morteza, Mirza Ḥabíbu’lláhollah, and Ayatollah [unreadable] Ayatullah Mazandrani disappeared like clouds, leaving behind no eternal trace nor any permanent landmark, no result and no fruit. Millions of Sheiks, pontiffs and {{p45}} clergymen have come into this world and each and all have disappeared from the face of the earth but the star of his holiness Nabeel will shine for eternity from the horizon of everlasting glory. Why? Because he was steadfast in the Cause of God till the end of his life, was occupied in the service of the King of heaven and was teaching the people the statutes of the Lord. Day and night he was engaged in the diffusion of the Fragrances of the Merciful. Hence it became evident that every honor which is not gained in the Cause of God will be followed by degradation, every tranquility is disrupted by confusion and the fortune is ended by misery. Indeed his holiness Nabeel was the sign of guidance. In the Cause of God he lived up to the requirement of the law of self-renunciation. He abandoned the glory of this world, forsook the affluence of position, relinquished the comfort of home, renounced the fame of ecclesiastical leadership and even parted with his life in order to become a real servant at the holy Threshold of Baha Ollah.” He was a learned and wise man. He had studied deeply the different branches of knowledge. He was a theologian, a philosopher, a Sufi and a Bahai. The eloquence and fluency of his tongue was matchless and when he began to speak he moved the hearts of men with the power of the spirit. In brief, he was a symposium of finely balanced intellectual and spiritual knowledges and his death deprived the Cause of one of his most sincere defenders.

In the morning we took our tea with the beloved and he relate to us the interesting story of Baha Ollah in prison. In the afternoon the Matosaraff, the disposed Qaemmagam of Haifa, the German Consul and several other prominent citizens called on him and he spoke to them at length about the spiritual conquests of Peace and amity and the distrupture effects of war.

The rest of the day was spent in calling and receiving the people and relieving the dire wants of a number of the utterly destitute families. Lunch and dinner were consumed around the table of the Lord.

Dear friends!

The spiritual experiences of Bahai pilgrims to the holy land will blossom into the variegated and fragrant flowers of ideality and perfection, should he or she be privileged to spend the Night of the ascension in the companionship of Abdul Baha within the sacred precinct and holy Shrine of Baha Ollah. The experience laden with the sweet odor of the paradise of spirit, renovates consciousness, strengthens the will, illuminates with the rays of ineffable light the dark paths of the brain, encircles the in accessible heights of the heart with the fluttering white wings of the doves of peace and goodwill, confers the glad-tidings of the kingdom of Love and brotherliness, fills the cup with the exhilarating ambrosia of real meekness and self-alienation, moves the mind from its centre of indifference and lethargic habits, reminds the worshippers of the necessity of greater zeal and more contagious enthusiasm in promoting the universal principles of divine Civilization, the teaches him in the languages of the angels, the urgency of a whole- hearted conservation to the service of the Cause of God and the upholding of the rights of man.

If the Blessed Beauty departed on this night to His Supreme Abode of eternity, He left amongst us His glorious Son; if He concealed His Countenance from the dazzled eyes of mankind, He disclosed the shining Face of His Centre of the Covenant; if He withdrew the consolation and comfort of His Celestial Presence, He gave us the sinless and luminous body of His laws and precepts; if the Sun of His Personality sunk below the horizon of this temporal world. It davened with greater splendor and majesty from the pure temple of His appointed Successor; if the soft, murmuring breezes of his garden were hushed, the winds of His mighty will began to blow with velocity and force from the mountains of the Mystery of God and if the Nighting of the divine spring become silent and still, the Bird taught by him stark the sleepy and heedless world with the melodious songs and joyous hymns of spiritual truths.

Passing over the many interesting incidents that transpired during the day let us go directly to the threshold of Baha Ollah and see with our own eyes what has happened on this eventful night. An hour before sunset the believers directed their steps toward the holy Tomb and Badi Effendi and me found ourselves amongst them. The carriage brought from Haifa the members of the holy Family and then returned again to Acca to bring the Beloved of our hearts. The sun had just set behind Mount Carmel in the liquid deep of the golden sea when the Master alighted from the vehicle and greeted the believers who had gathered outside the garden to welcome him. At first he entered the holy shrine alone and chanted the Visitation Tablet for women who had gathered there to worship. When they went out the men were called in and we found him sitting in one corner of the room, sublimely patient silent, still, pure, meek and holy- a wonderful picture of the heavenly being who has subdued every inclination, every appetite, every desire from prompting of self and has thus found within the empire of his eternal heart the Kingdom of love, humility service and the joy that never fades. His eyes were closed and in the mirror of his countenance one could easily see the reflection of the sorrowing, prostrated world. The atmosphere was also colored with the sad and obscure shades of grief and unnamable distress. Here yea, here, there is all peace, all unity, all redolent sweetness but there, there what about there! Our brothers are killed and being killed on the battlefield, our mothers are widowed, our sisters are weeping over the deaths of their dear and near ones, towns are destroyed, the precious blood of the innocent is flowing and many atrocities are perpetrated in the name of religion and patriotism. How could our hearts find rest while the spirit of hatred and murder has filled the hearts of humanity! How could we feel happy, how could the ethereal atmosphere of this sacred place be joyous, how could the face of the Prince of Love be radiant, while mankind is in the grip of a deadly struggle! No indeed! None of us could lay a claim to happiness. We were all suffering. The heart of the universe is pain-stricken, how can the limbs and the members be whole! For more than one hour we sat around the Divine Candle while it burned silently with the light of pity and compassion! Then we {{p48}} left the holy Shekimah with the same solemn silence and quietness. For almost 5 and 6 years the Master was not in Acca and consequently these meetings on the nights of the ascension lacked the dynamic of his presence and benign influence of his personality. From this standpoint the friends were happy in having him in their mindset and receiving from him the blessing of heaven. They were all his guests for supper and at 9'oclock two large tables were set and we were served with roast meat and other delicious eatables. According to his usual custom he walked around the tables, spoke with this or that believer, ordered Aga Mehdi and Khosro to fill the plates with more meat, and serve ice-water. His three sons-in-law were also serving. He saw me eating with a spoon and he came and stood behind me. "Hast thou not yet learned to eat with thy hand?" he asked humorously and slapped me hard on my shoulder. "I am not glad to be able to serve the believers of God. This I consider to be my highest attainment and my greatest glory. The real friends must be the servants of each other and arise in mutual helpfulness and cooperation. The hallmark of spiritual illumination is service, love and fellowship. Let the believers adorn their inner beings with these qualities and advance step by step along the path of ideal progress. We are all the servants of humanity and must endeavor to fulfill the law of self-sacrifice in its perfect and most complete form." After dinner he sat down himself and partook of the same food while Khosro served him. Then he retired to his room to rest, leaving the friends to their own devices. It was most beautiful moonlight night and we were divided into different groups, some of us took our chairs under the olive trees, others went under the pine trees, and still a number of young ones took a long walk in the moonlit plain among the sea-shore, dreaming of past events and visualizing the future bliss and serenity of their fellowmen. The old believers of the days of Baha Ollah related for my benefit the details of the last hour of the Ascension and in what happened afterwards. In the sweet and soft light of the moon I took notes of those things and I hope to incorporate them in a separate article sometimes in the future. Because the Beloved was sleeping we did not sing Bahai songs but we would {{p49}} have done so under any other circumstances. Thus we spent the hours of the night till 3 a.m. The few sleepers awake and Aga Mehdi was seen busy preparing tea to arouse and refresh the drowsy ones. No sooner we drank two or three small cups then we found ourselves fully awake and in the passion of all our faculties, although we did not close our all eyelids all night. After a few minutes the Master came out of his room and in his majestic yet humble way led us again to the holy Tomb. All night the lamps and candelabras were burning, sending out into the moonlit space, streams of soft, gentle light. The inside of the "Holy of [unreadable]" was redolent with the sweet fragrance of exotic flowers and plants and the delicate odor of orange blossoms made the air subtle and ineffably beautiful. Again the Beloved sat in his unobtrusive corner and two of the believers started to chant Tablets in lovely voices. On and on they continued chanting verses of holiness filling our hearts and minds with the charming whisperings of the Spirit. Although, you, dear reader, were far away, yet we all prayed for and remembered you. We sent you through ether the silent messages of love and affection and hope you have received them. The Master was praying for the whole Bahai world, supplicating at the threshold of his divine Father to pour upon them the confirmations of the Kingdom of Peace and encircle them with the angels of the Realm of Might. We are all sure that his devout prayers will be borne directly to the footstool of the throne of the Lord and his earnest desires will be fully granted. The whole world is nowadays dependent on his heart. Quietly the hours slipped by in this sacred communion and silent worship. There was no music, no choir, no organ, no vocal expression of adoration but all the hearts were turned to God begging Him to keep us firm and steadfast in His Covenant. While we were thus praying the sun arose from the Eastern horizon and flooded the plain with its rays. As we left the holy place we were greeted by the twittering of birds heralding the arrival of another day.

This morning we drank tea in the Presence of the Beloved and he dwelt on the extraordinary heat of the past few days emphasizing the fact that in such hate enervating climate the Blessed Perfection lived for nine consecutive years.

Aga Mehdi Abul Qasem came in reported that the locusts have entered the gardens and are eating the flowers and the trees. They wished him to order them to go away. He was silent for a few minutes and then he said: - "These locusts are your guests. Is it quite in accord with the law of decorum to send them away, especially now that they are quite hungry? What would you have done were you attacked with hunger and nothing in sight to eat? They are the armies of the Lord. If you give banquet or a feast to the King's army, would he not be pleased with you and send you a decoration and express his satisfaction and now would not the Lord be pleased with you because you have so bountifully entertained his numberless legions?" Poor Abul Qasem was very disconsolate, for he knew that in a few days the lovely Rizwan will be changed into a barren waste with not one green leaf in it. For the last few days he had worked himself to the point of utter exhaustion to keep out the "guests" but they were knocking from all sides and finally breaking through all barriers, they rushed in from every direction like the torrents of water.

In the afternoon The Motosarref, Gaemmazam, the German Consul and five other officials called on him and they kept him busy talking to them for more than one hour. With the utmost deference and respect they sat in his presence, listening to his words. Then three Catholic and Orthodox priests called and he spoke on the interpretation of certain passages of the Holy Scriptures and instructed them in the mystic significations of the Words of God. Then he made tea with his own- blessed hands for us and served us in his own inimitable natural, spontaneous manner.

Dear friends!

The day was spent in Bahajee and I enjoyed a restful, refreshing sleep under the tall over shading pine trees waving with not unmelodious sighs, in dark luxuriance, in the hottest sunshine. It was a difficult thing to keep awake all night but it was a new and never-to-be forgotten experience which may not become repeated in my life in exactly its present environment and spiritual suggestibility. No doubt sometimes in the near future I will be sent out of this Eden of Peace and heavenly contentment into a world of constant struggle and unceasing activity and then the remembrance and mention of these days and nights will be a source of noble aspirations and creative ideals. Then depending on the Beloved's Confirmations these sacred events will form the ground plan of my activities and hopes. How difficult it will be to leave him and go away from him. One is so accustomed to this calm and peaceful atmosphere that separation from it will act as a great shock. There are some people who have been prisoners in the open, spacious cage of his Love, have breathed day and night the air of his tenderness, have sang the songs of his grandeur, have eaten their food from his table and soared in the immensity of his compassion. Like unto the fish they are habituated to swim in the salubrious water of his knowledge and bears joyfully every hardship and trouble in order that they may grow and perfect themselves by learning his lessons and applying them to their daily problems. When such persons are sent away from him they will feel more than many others the exquisite pangs of separation, because from the home of truth they are sent into a world of falsehood, cant and hypocrisy, from the rose-garden of reality they have to wander through the sandy plain of the thorns of doubt and the briars of skepticism; from the heaven of Love they hurled down into the hell of hatred, suspicion, selfishness, condemnation and distrust. There is however only left the dim light of one consolation and that is, to go out and both by precepts and examples teach the Cause and serve the friends of God not that they will be beyond the pole of the criticism, the abuse and the denunciation of the friends and foes but they will have a chance to practice that which they have learned {{p2}} to give that which they have taken in, to spread that which they have accumulated and to proclaim these glad tidings which they have mastered. The secret of growth, comprehensiveness, excellence and enfoldment lies in actual service and in the loving association of spirits with spirits. If a person walks in this undeviating path he will surely reach the goal of true attainment and perfection; otherwise he will have to be satisfied with the mediocre and the commonplace, never rising to the noble heights of universal thoughts and the lofty attitudes of deeds.

Looking on this subject in the light of the above observation it is a double blessing to be with Abdul Baha in these days, for one gathers strength and moral force by simple association with the centre of the Covenant and will come to his assistance whenever surrounded by the ministers of trials and hardships. He will then bring back to his mind his smiling face, his majestic mien, his heavenly presence, his spiritual words and his solicitous advice and then being energized and moved by these blessed remembrances his faith will be increased, his belief will be reinforced and his assurance electrified. Pondering over His concentrated purpose for the promulgation of the Teachings he will apply himself to its clearer realization, knowing the universal scope of this self-renunciation he will consciously try to imitate him, considering the impartiality of His practical charities, he will strive to approach his standard, reflecting on the sweet gentleness and amiability of His character he will endeavor to gain the same qualities visualizing His simple spirituality and humility he will make an effort to manifest the identical attributes and beholding Him in the highest heaven of divine glory he will attempt to ascend the same golden rounds. Thus living, thus dreaming, thus working he will become able to chase away the gloom of separation, to neutralize the effect of remoteness, to banish the two great specters of Time and Space, to leave behind the dark station of the “Everlasting No” and step into the radiant world of the “Everlasting Yea”.

By the evening all the friends had returned to Acca and Haifa; the Beloved and his holy sister were driven to the former and we walked from Bahajee, and after an hour found ourselves in the home of the Blessed Beauty, ready to take up the thread of our lives where we had laid them down.

May 30, 1915 Home of Baha Ollah Acca, Syria

Dear friends!

An interesting incident in the life of the Bab before he declared his mission to the world and while he was living as a merchant in Bushir was related by the Beloved. Those who have lived in the East and have become familiar with the immemorial custom of bargaining and haggling between the seller and the buyer enjoy this story, for it clearly shows how the Bab in that early period acted on the principle of “Prix Fixe”, a radical procedure, setting at naught the time honored commercial code of century prevalent amongst merchants and traders. The public expects to haggle and the storekeepers knowing this ingrained custom invariably advance the price, - leaving a margin for reduction; in order to attract the whimsically of the people.

The Master said: "One day in the course of conversation Haji Sayad Javad said to me: 'I was a good friend of Haji Sayad Ali, the maternal uncle of the Bab. During my travellings I reached Bushir and inquired about him. They directed me to his office and to my chagrin I found that he has left for Shiraz but the Bab who was then in the efflorescence of his youth was appointed in his place to manage the business of the office. His mustache was just beginning to grow and the signs of manhood appearing in his whole being. As I looked into his young countenance I was wonder-struck with his spiritual dignity, stateliness of manners and the nobleness of his department. At the time his holiness was engaged in the business of indigo. After a short conversation I left him impressed with the loftiness of his ethical standard and the purity of his personal character.

Another day I called on him and while I was sitting in his presence several commission men entered the office. He received them with discourtesy and bade them be seated. After a few preliminary remarks they broke the news that letters are being received from India that the market value of indigo has dropped one or two points. Other merchants were also present and they refuted strongly the assertion made by the commission agents. Pro and Con the conversation lasted for two {{p4}} hours, each side trying to down the other. While the bitter controversy was raging the Bab sat silent and still and seemed to be not at all interested in the talk which has been going on with such animation. This was rather a crafty device for they intended to buy indigo from the Bab in the absence of his uncle at a lower price than the market value. When they finish their talk, one of them addressing him said: ' Malek- Ottojar has heard that you have in your office many boxes of indigo and he desires to buy some of them from you at the current price. Will you be kind enough to specify your terms? Up to this moment the Bab had not said a word but now with the utmost calmness and dignity and with a few words and as simple as possible he told them the price and the terms by which the different installments were going to be paid. Loudly and vociferously they protested against the high price and the terms, as it was their wont, stating that there must be a reduction. He listened to their words silently and at last getting exasperated at his serene imperturbability they cried: ' What is your wish? He answered: 'I have already told you. Have I to repeat again the same propositions? Now they were indeed exasperated. 'What is this new custom?' they bemoaned! We have an interest right to bargain. This shall never be. Are you going to dictate to us? Do you, a young man, know the commercial laws of the country better than we do? Who has ever heard of such strict adherence to one idea? We will not have it. We warn you that if you want to carry on business amongst us you must change this novel, peculiar custom, otherwise no one will approach your office.' The Bab just looked into their faces and did not answer them. When they got tired with their harangues and realized that their words produced not the slightest effect they left the office with disgust and grumblings. In an hour they were back with a message from Malek-ottojjar that he says the price of this indigo is quite high and he begs him to make at least a slight reduction for his sake.

'I have stated in so many words' he said' the last fixed price and reduction is impossibility, you are wasting your precious time uselessly! The commission men were beside themselves with fury {{p5}} and attributed this one-sidedness to his stubbornness and obstinacy. Seeing how futile would be their rage they betook themselves away but soon returned in a chastened mood that the buyer has surrendered and won't like to have so many bases. The full terms were drawn up and the cases of indigo were transferred to the store of Malek-ottojjar. A few days passed and in order to gain their point they turned another leaf of double dealing and pretended the papers were tampered with and certain conditions were incorporated therein by the force of circumstance. Boisterous and noisy they came to the Bab, shouting for considerable reduction of price insisting that it must be done immediately. Without heeding their heated protestations he said: 'Are you not satisfied with former stipulations?' They all answered: "Of course not. We are duped we are hoodwinked?" 'Very well then, you many send back the goods;.' "What! Sending back the goods!" Who has ever heard such a thing! You are insulting the dignity and honor of Malek-ottojjar' [the king of merchants] 'Then you do not intend to send them back.' 'No indeed. We will be considered worse than fools.' Calmly turning his face to his servant he said: 'Go and take with thyself a number of porters call at the store of Malek-ottojjar and ask in my name for the cases of indigo. Do not return tell you bring them! The men were so stupefied at this thunderous command that they could not utter a sound and preferred to sit there and see the result. In an hour they were more than amazed to see the servant back with the goods.

"This incident was widely circulated in Bushir that Mirza Ali Mohamad has had the daring and courage to precipitate a commercial alternation with the king of the merchants and that his career will be brought to an end by the secret machinations of the powerful man whose dignity has been so sorely wounded. The intimate friends of Aga Sayad Ali called and begged him to go to the enraged man and beg his apology and pardon, intimating that the result of this injured feeling will probably be ruinous to the trade of his uncle. The Bab listened to their advice and said simply: - 'Do not worry about our business. There is {{p6}} a God who will protect it from al the outside encroachments." After two months the same cases of indigo were sold at a good profit and in cash. When his uncle arrived from Shiraz and heard the story in all its bearing he was not a little puzzled and agitated and thought it was no more than a commercial obligation to offer his apology to Malek-ottojar in order to sooth his anger, but the Bab forbade him not event to dream of such a humiliating course, that the episode had been closed and needed no more ventilation."

During the day we had only a few glimpses of the Beloved for he was busy, going out to call on his friends and receiving those who came to see him. Whenever he comes to Acca there is always a long procession of callers who come either to inquire about his health or to relieve them out of their manifold distress. In these days the latter classes prevail over the former.

In the evening he received the believers in his room for a few minutes and exhorted them to be patient and forbearing under the heavy loads of present misfortunes and troubles. He promised them that better and happier days are coming and assured them of the protection and preservation of the Divine Powers.

Toward the afternoon two big warships were seen in the horizon cruising back and forth which they continued to do till long after sunset. There was something threatening in their dreams.

The plain Acca is a swimming sea of locusts. They have entered the town and filled the streets. The aqueduct is contaminated by them and this source of the supply of water is shut to the distracted inhabitants for the next fifteen or twenty days. They enter the rooms and every conceivable place. As many of them are being trampled under the feet, a most fetid and poisonous odor is diffused which may become the source of some epidemic disease. Oh Lord! How Thou hast abandoned thy servants and enriched them with unimaginable trials!

May 31, 1915 Home of Abdul Baha Mount Carmel, Haifa Syria

Dear friends!

Last night in the course of his conversation the Beloved referred to our departure for Haifa and I was glad to know that we will be out of the depressing, dejecting and sickening atmosphere of Acca. Save the companionship of Abdul Baha and the holy remembrances attached to the home of his heavenly father nowadays nothing is left in this desolate town to cheer one's heart and uplift one's aspiration. The sooner one is out of such soul-burdening environment the better it is. Hence it was with a feeling of relief that Badi Effendi and myself and two other Bahais hired a carriage at one P.M and started for Haifa. Because the greatest Holy Leaf and two other members of the blessed family were going to be with him he sent us ahead with the promise that he will come tomorrow. The two warships appeared again this morning and anchored in front of Haifa. About noon one of them approached the harbor and started to bombard the warehouse petroleum and a village by the name Hartieh, two hours from Haifa, the head quarter of the army. She threw about 25 shots and then ceased. The bombardment was going in Haifa while the poor inhabitants of Acca were panic-stricken, fearing that the same virtuals of shots and shells might be served to them. Notwithstanding this we started on our way and were meanwhile watching the movements of ships. We had covered more than half way when all of a sudden the bigger warship steered its course and anchored right in front of the German Colony. In a minute the reverberating sound of the gun filled our ears and the white smoke covered the slope of Mount Carmel. At first we were startled and worried ourselves for the safety of the believers, because the smoke arose from the vicinity of the home of the Beloved. As the bombardment continued we observed the balls were aimed at one spot and that spot we guessed to be no other than the German Consulate. Fifteen missiles were thrown {{p8}} but their terrific sound was more than deafening! The carriage driver was so afraid that he thought it would be safer if he retired behind the sand hills and thus a temporary protection secured.

Our brother Badi Effendi has written his impression of this significant day and I would like to quote herein his article: -

"It is indeed a most radical change to hear the roaring of cannons within the centre of the Canopy Universal Peace! Ever since the dawn of history some religious significance has been associated with Mount Carmel. Its peaceful and calm atmosphere attracted the attention of seers and prophets. Through the play of the forces of nature, winds and storms, lightning and thunder they received messages from an High. The pure hearts detached from worldly passions and appetites heard the still small voice of the Lord of Hosts whispering into their ears. Its very atmosphere is full of spiritual inspiration and its starry heaven affords ample material for one's meditation. Hearts were lifted up to God in prayer and heavenly teachings were received for the betterment of humanity. The Glory of Carmel became an actual fact by the arrival of Baha Ollah who raised His tent on its summit and proclaimed to the world the establishment of Universal Peace. On this day instead of hearing that still small voice, sweeter than any music of human voice, we do not hear except the roaring of cannons, the bursting of bombs and the falling of missiles and shots from the air. The home of spirituality and blessedness is visited by the noise and confusion of hatred and malice. Men instead of looking up to heaven to receive the blessings of God turn their eyes in awe and consternation [unreadable] any bomb fall from the aeroplanes or the warships of the enemies. Is this the only calamity countless billions of locusts are besetting Syria and every green herbs or vegetables is eaten up, transforming Edemic gardens into waste barren; the pressure of military service and its requirements drags down the people to complete ruin, starvation is read in the eyes of poor people and destruction and death is the common lot of humanity.

"Is there no Gracious God to help men in this terrible predicament or is this the fulfillment of the words, the wages of sin is death? The voice of God is as strong today as it was thousand years ago but the ears are [unreadable] prejudices and do not hear. The world is really in need of divine principles and teachings. The reason why these things happen is because the world of humanity is surfeited with materialism, that mankind has entirely neglected the spiritual bases of life. According to the natural laws of growth if we fail to nourish any part of our life we are sure to find it atrophied and deficient in carrying out its function therefore the first and foremost duty of man is to nourish the moral side of his life; failing to do so, he has killed his life of spirit and that surely leads to the destruction of the whole being, just in some diseases of the eyes if one is affected the other will surely meet the same fate.

"In the morning an aeroplane was sent up to scout the outlying district and three bombs were thrown down to destroy telegraphic lines and as a result two persons were killed. We were still in Acca that the petroleum storehouse was bombarded and on our way near Haifa we witnessed the destruction of the German Consulate by the unerring marksmanship of the warships' gunner.

"The Master's house being very near the consulate, the Governor had sent words that it seemed wiser and safer for the members of the family to move somewhere else. Therefore in a precipitate manner they with the exception of Mrs. [unreadable] who unnamed is the house with [unreadable] had left everything, taking refuge in the Holy Tomb and the Pilgrims Home. Many natives also, both men and women had availed themselves of this rare opportunity. Hence in an actual manner, the Temple of the Lord had become a refuge and a shelter for the oppressed and the weak ones."

When we reached Haifa we found all the shops were closed and the streets guarded by soldiers. Near the German Consulate hundreds of men and women had gathered to see the wreck. We ascended the mountain and were glad to find to find all the friends safe and sound. The people had been much afraid.

The Violation In Chicago

From the Inception of the Bahá'í Cause in America there had been hypocrisy violation in the Chicago Bahá'í Community.

The Master wrote many Tablets upon this subject. After His first visit to Chicago the Master sent Mr. MacNutt from New York to Chicago, Himself paying Mr. Macnutt's expenses that he, Mr. Mactutt, might settle the matter of violation there caused by Dr. Nutt. I don't recall exactly what happened except that Mr. MacNutt was not awakened to the condition and accomplished practically nothing. Zia Baghdádí once told me that the Master had remarked to him that instead of sensing the condition of violation in Dr. Nutt, that Mr. MacNutt conferred with him and thought things to be alright and as they should be .

This condition continued for several years centering in Mrs. Luella Kirchner and a group associated with her in nativity. Thus conditions continued until the fall of 1917 when the Bahá'ís from various parts of the country assembled in Chicago to celebrate the Centennial Anniversary of Bahá'u'lláh's birth. While there was an utter semblance of unity in those gatherings held in the Auditorium Hotel there was in reality a very bad condition existing among the Friends. I thought of it a great deal. Where were undercurrents in every direction. One morning as I awakened in my room in the Auditorium Hotel I seemed to see a map of this country with the various Bahá'í Centers marked, and on it s huge black octopus with its head in Chicago and its tentacles reaching out to the 'various Bahá'í Centers. It was not a dream nor a vision but a thought that came to me pictured in this manner. I spoke to some of the Friends about it, and that day daring one of the meetings the matter was brought up and a committee of investigation was appointed by the Friends to look into the matter and to render the Bahá'ís in this country a report. I was made chairman of that commission with Imogene Hoagg, George Latimer and Louis Gregory as members. The committee remained in Chicago for several weeks going thoroughly into the affair. When we had completed our findings we called together the Friends from the various assemblies to her our report.

In the meantime the Kirchner outfit had been very active through correspondence and through sending emissaries around the country. Much destructive propaganda had been accomplished. The sentiments of some of the outstanding Bahá'ís had been so worked upon that they took a stand against the findings of the committee. Among these was Mrs. Parsons of Washington, Juliet Thompson, Mountfort Mills and Roy Wilhelm of New York, Harry Randall of Boston and a number of others. In the meanwhile various false reports of all kinds abounded and did much destruction, so when the Friends assembled in Chicago to hear the findings of the committee division already existed.

For many years Mrs. True and Zia Baghdádí of Chicago had held the fort against the violators, and around them had gathered a group. Mrs. Kirchner, the leader or the insurgent forces, also had her group. In as much as the committee of investigation round Mrs. True's group to be of the right wing and Mrs. Kirchner's of the left wing, we decided to do all in our power to keep the Friends coming from different parts of the country from further contamination. In order to safeguard the position of the firm ones it was decided to hold our meeting at the home of Mrs. True. Now a group of Friends including Mrs. Parsons, Harry Randall and others were confused upon the point in issue. They did not understand the principles of violation. To them it was merely a matter of inharmony between a few Bahá'ís in Chicago. 'They therefore determined to remain. "neutral". They did not attend the meeting of Mrs. True's. They remained to their hotel down town and requested that a joint meeting be held on "neutral" ground to which the Kirchners and others be invited. This could not be done. After the meeting at Mrs. True's house late in the evening the meeting, adjourned down to the hotel and met with these Friends, but at that time they were in no frame of mind to listen to tiny report of the committee. Confusion reigned, and they returned to their homes in really a worse frame of mind than that in which they had come.

The committee moved eastward. We came to Washington then rent to New York and Boston explaining our report to people. At various points we were opposed. Edward Getsinger lead the opposition in Boston. Various ones in other places did the same, and here in Washington, Mrs. Parsons and a group of her friends would not come to hear the report explained. Things were in a very, bad way, but little by little they quieted down, and after some time when correspondence was re-established with the Holy Land (which had been cut off during the war) Parsons received a Tablet from the Master in which He stated that Mrs. Kirchner was a violator and should be avoided. Parsons spoke of this Tablet to me several years afterwards, but I have not yet seen a copy of it. Just the other day I made inquiries from Leona Barnitz hoping to get a Photostat of this particular Tablet knowing in her will that Mrs. Parsons had left her Tablets to Leona. The Tablets have not yet been turned over to her. When it is possible I will try again to get a copy of this Tablet to place with these reminiscences.

The effect of this violation was of very long standing. In New York City, Mrs. Ford took a stand for Mrs. Kirchner and felt very bitterly toward me and others who had taken a prominent part in this investigation. I really believe that it was Mrs. Ford's antagonism personally against me that made her espouse the cause of Bourgeois and his temple design and line up her forces against the architectural ideal that I was trying to put before the people; namely that of a temple design after the lines of the Taj Mahal which the Master wanted, Now I can see quite clearly that the Master's wish for the architecture or the temple was sacrificed because of this condition of violation which condition so blurred the vision and the minds of the Bahá'ís in this country that they could not see nor understand His wish in this matter.

But in time all these things will be straightened out. The fact that the Master wished me to design the Bahá'í Temple for Mount Carmel in Palestine is proof to me that He preferred the Indian Style in which I worked to any other style. While I am pleased that He has entrusted this work to me I on truthfully say that I have really no desire of mine own to be the architect of this temple. I would gladly pass the work on to others providing that I felt that they were carrying out the Master's wish so far as the style of the temple is concerned.

Thus poison infected into the Cause will run sometimes for generations before it is eliminated.

In this volume containing a report of the committee of investigation appears also several other documents pertaining to the same. The article on "Firmness in the Cause" was written in Europe shortly after the famous Faríd violation in London. In my article entitled "The Protection of the Cause of God" I make allusions to several experiences dealt with elsewhere in these reminiscences. On page fourteen I allude to Mrs. Allen-Dyar and her activities. On pages twenty-six and twenty-seven I allude to the Ormont Silver expedition and the troubles that he created in the Cause. On page thirty-six I refer to Dr. Woodward and his activities also mentioned elsewhere in my writings, and on page forty-two I write again of the conditions in London in 1914 just prior to the out-break of the great war.

The recovery of the Cause in these parts from these troubles has been slow and laborious, and I fear it will be some time yet before we are through with these ill effects. In this volume is a copy of a telegram that Mrs. True received from the Master regarding the violation. The last efforts of the Master in His mission here on earth were concerned with the violation. As I recall the last cablegram He sent to America was sent to Roy Wilhelm. It was regarding the violation.

During my last hour with the Master in the little upper chamber of the hotel at Tiberias He spoke at length of the violation in America apropos of nothing that I had said, and His words have been recorded in another part of my reminiscences. Thus the struggle has gone on.

For a number of years now I have been quite outside of this struggle. While the stand that I took against the violation in 1917 brought me many firm friends among the Bahá'ís it also created a feeling of great enmity against me in the hearts of others. Traces of this still exist, and for that and other reasons I prefer now not to be in any position of prominence in the Bahá'í Cause. There is a time in one's life when he no longer cares to fight, particularly when things that are very clear to him are more of muddled in the mind of the Bahá'í Group. However the experience in 1912 in Chicago was a glorious fight and a glorious venture, a time of great inspiration that one can look back upon as a soldier can on a battle.

"It is a {{p1}} certain fact, absolutely established, that people whether righteous or wicked, the people of light or darkness, pious or mischievous, live on after the death of the body and physical dissolution and disintegration. But the life of the wicked in comparison with the existence of the believers is as non-existence. This is why Christ speaks of this life (of faith) as everlasting Life. He says: 'If you follow me, you will attain Life eternal, and whosoever believes not on me is deprived of the Life eternal.' The meaning of Christ's saying was not that the unbelievers become absolutely annihilated; the meaning of Christ is that the life of those, who reject Him is as non-existent, compared with the life of those who accept Him."

"The mineral has existence, the vegetable has existence, but the existence of the inferior kingdom as compared with the existence of the human kingdom is as non-existence. Even the mineral is living in relation to its own kingdom: but the mineral kingdom in comparison with the vegetable kingdom is non-existent, and the vegetable with the animal is non-existence. The ignorant with the knower is dead; the rejected compared with the accepted is dead. The imperfect compared with the perfect is dead."

Here the Master took up a photograph of a Virgin and Child, by Raphael and said: "Many babies at the time of the childhood were living, but Jesus was more alive than they. It is not meant that the wicked after death will absolutely perish; this was the belief of the ancient Greek philosophers. They believed, that whosoever did not attain any distinction or power of function on this plane of being, perished. That is why Christ speaks of the righteous entering the Kingdom of heaven; and the wicked being cast into hell. This problem was not solved in any dispensation until it is solved in this dispensation for the people ask “Where is this kingdom in which the righteous dwell?” — The kingdom was spoken of by the prophets as Heaven, it being said that man after death could ascend into heaven. Then afterwards it was found there was no such place as Heaven; the stars and planets are in truth all in motion and are not stationary, and they are all material. It was then asked ‘Where is hereafter?’ Existence must be visualized, must be made tangible, else it is non-existence. Any existence which is not realized on the material plane is only a figment of the mind therefore, existence must be externally realized. In response to the question: ‘Where is hereafter?’ Since we do not see it, we will say that as the mineral and vegetable belong to this world and are utterly ignorant of the human kingdom— one might question the mineral — find it utterly ignorant of the vegetable, one might even find that it denied the existence of the plant— that if one questioned the embryo in the womb about the human kingdom, it would know nothing of it, and would even deny its existence; even so the realities of the Kingdom of Heaven are not to men.”

“The fact is certain that there is a world of GOD, and that it is above this human world; therefore, it can not be apprehended in the human world. The human world is ignorant of this Kingdom. It is called the Heavenly body, and this is what is meant by Christ, when He says, that after leaving this body man enters the Kingdom; It is beyond the human Kingdom. This is what is meant by Bahá'u'lláh when He says: ‘The Supreme Concourse welcomes you’. This problem was never solved until this dispensation.”

Question: “What is the relation of the mineral and vegetable with the human spirit?”

Answer: “All are connected by the bond of existence. What greater bond is there than this? Furthermore, none of these can continue to exist independently of the other; for interrelation and solidarity make their existence possible. For example, from the plant a certain element is exhaled which gives life to the animal. We call this the fiery element and you call it oxygen. And from animated beings a certain watery element is given, {{p2}} which you call hydrogen, and that promotes plant life and its growth and evolution. So there is a connection, and the growth and evolution of each are dependent and contingent upon the other. So are all the other beings (connected) making the world of existence as one person — a great person. Just as the members and parts of man co-operate and work together, likewise the parts and members of the world co-operate with each other and are interdependent. This chain of interrelation is continuous throughout all existence. Not a single one of the parts of the chain can be loosened; if it were loosened the organization of existence would be faulty.”

Question: “Will animal and vegetable ever become the human?”

Answer: “The spirit will not become human spirit, nor will vegetable spirit become animal spirit. Existence is one, as it appears in every grade, according to the exigency of that grade. Existence in the mineral grade takes the form of the mineral; in the vegetable; the vegetable form, and in the animal kingdom the animal form. In the human kingdom it appears as a human being. As existence is limitless, therefore it appears in limitless forms. This is a new philosophy, but it is plain and evident.

This lamp is one and the same lamp; it has cast its light upon the wall, upon the floor and on this glass, but its manifestation on the mirror is very superior to that on the wall. The manifestation of that light in the eye is not witnessed in the ear; but the light is the same. Mind is a universal power but it appears in every man according to his capacity.

Perfect souls are like mirrors, and the light of the mind becomes most effulgently manifest in them. Imperfect souls are like the stones, — the light of the mind reflected in them is only a semblance (of the light in the mirror), but the light is the same.

Bickerings, etc., among nations must be done away with. Consider plants — how harmonious are all their elements. Those revolving stars which have inter — communication thought the attraction of gravitation, how good and beautiful that is!

When we study beings in general, we discover that there is a tendency (propensity) for the lasting of life, or for continuous living, so that whenever these elements unite to form a composition, the resultant compound makes it possible to live — e.g. — certain elements have united in a composition, forming this leaf; likewise, certain elements have agreeably united and composed, the resultant being known as man. Likewise in the stone — we find that in this formation certain elements have come together.

Therefore it is most evident that composition or organization and union are perpetuation of species. When the composition, or rather, compound is subjected to a flaw in the agreement (of the elements) separation and dissolution result. Therefore, it is plain and evident, that agreement and union among men are productive of life results. Every movement which aims at separation, causes disagreement and produces dissension amongst men, is to be condemned and rejected.

“Consider the animals; — those which are tame associate with each other agreeably; they live in companies. The sheep are loving to each other, hence they live in company as a flock. Tame birds are to be found in flocks, but birds of prey and ferocious animals live separately — such as the lion, tiger, bear, dog — all of these live separately, in solitude, and do not form companies. Likewise, vultures and birds of prey live solitary.

“If agreement and union obtain in a home, there will be upbuilding and prosperity therein; the honor and virtue of that home consists in its unity and harmony.

Enlarge this condition, if the inhabitants of a village should be united, how much this unity and agreement will conduce to the happiness of that village. Enlarge this circle yet again — the people of a city if united and agreed, how much this would be the cause of rest and  $\{\{p3\}\}$  composure and well-doing in that city. Still widen the circle, the people of a country, if in the utmost unity and solidarity know this will become (conductive) to the welfare and advancement! Therefore, consider if all the inhabitants of the earth become united, what great results and what immense happiness will obtain.

“BAHÁ’U’LLÁH has hoisted the tent of Unity of mankind. He has addressed men thus: ‘Ye are all the leaves of one branch and fruits of one tree.’ No matter how many are the flowers in yonder garden, — even though their lines and colors and the forms of the leaves and the shapes of the plants differ, yet we know that the same rain falls upon them — how delightful, how magnificent! All of them receive heat and light from the same sun, one cloud showers its bounty upon all, the same sunshine and the same zephyrs animate them, — all of them are refreshed by one breeze!

“Look at these people, how they are negligent and inadvertent, how superstitious! The exposition of Reality is evident and plain. All the nations are inimical to us, — they persecute us because of this; They speak evilly of us because of this; when they cannot do anything else against us, they lie about us. In order that this animosity may be suppressed and hidden, we forbear everything. Pray that, GOD willing, you may be confirmed. The Blessed Perfection has said that if any religion or faith is productive of hate and enmity, it must be abandoned.”

Received from Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím, 13 Wood Lane, Shepherd’s Bush, London, W. England.

In a letter dated June 7th 1917, to Jos. H. Hannen, the following is an extract from Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím’s letter on this subject: “Doubtless you know of Mr. Myron Phelps, — the one who wrote the book called: “THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF ‘ABBÁS EFFENDI.” He has been for a second time to ‘Akká some years ago, and took some very interesting notes of what the Beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said in answer to his questions. Some time ago we got a copy of these notes, and I am sure you and the friends there would like to see a copy of it. So I have copied it and am sending you enclosed copy. These notes must not be published until we have permission of Mr. Phelps.”

Dear Miss Hiscox:

I have returned from the Front. The Master is well and being fully protected and looked after by the British military authorities. I arranged for funds and relief stores to reach him and shall go to Haifa directly I can get away again. I have cabled London and seen Yazdí. Please inform the Cairo friends. In great haste,

Yours,

W. Tudor-Pole.

I saw the authorities at G.H. and fixed up every possible arrangement for his comfort and that of those around him.

Mr. Roy C. Wilhelm.

Dear Bahá'í Brother:

Capt. W. Tudor-Pole is an old English Bahá'í and he entertained 'Abdu'l-Bahá at his home in England. He joined the forces in Palestine, was wounded last December during the attack preceding the capture of Jerusalem, was sent to a hospital in Cairo. After recovery, he was given a very important position here in Cairo at General Headquarters, at the behest of the O.E.T.A. (Occupied Enemy Territory Administration), which has necessitated his taking frequent trips to Jerusalem. He was able to do a great deal to interest the Foreign Office in London and Gen. Allenby here at Headquarters in 'Abdu'l-Bahá and followers, and complete protection for them was authorized by the military officials before the attack on Haifa. Capt. Tudor-Pole has sent on 200 lbs., $1000, to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and ordered food sent on. He has also written to him that any time he would like to leave Haifa, and come to Egypt he (Mr. Tudor-Pole) will make all necessary arrangements to have him brought here. He has sent on a friend and junior officer, whom I also know and who is much interested in the Bahá'í Teachings, to remain permanently at the Military Office at Haifa and he will see 'Abdu'l-Bahá frequently and look out for his welfare and comfort. Mírzá Muḥammad Taqí (one of the old Persian Bahá'ís of Cairo) has sent 50 pounds, $250, and many of us have sent letters to 'Abdu'l-Bahá through Mr. Tudor-Pole. We know that you have all rejoiced in America to read in the papers of the capture of Haifa and 'Akká by the British. Capt. Tudor-Pole got transferred (last year) from his regiment in England to the Palestine forces in order that he might be of service to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He has indeed been of the greatest service! I feel he was sent by God. Notify all other Bahá'í centers. Let me know if this reaches you in safety.

c/o Thos. Cook & Son,

Cairo, Egypt.

Faithfully yours in the Cause of God,

Elinor Hiscox.

Later, September 29th.

Capt. Tudor-Pole has just received a message from Col. Storrs, now Military Governor of Jerusalem, who had just returned from a trip to Haifa, where he saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and gave him the money sent by Mr. Tudor-Pole. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is very well and all the family and have had plenty of food to eat – not luxuries of course – but they have not suffered in that part of the country from lack of necessary food. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said he did not need the money for himself, but he accepted it to give to the poor. He sent greetings and love to all. He wishes to remain at Haifa for the present. Before the war, Col. Storrs was Oriental Secretary at the British Residency in Cairo; he studied Arabic for a long time with our Bahá'í Brother Ḥusayn Rúhí, and he saw a great deal of 'Abdu'l-Bahá when the latter was in Egypt, drove him out to the pyramids in his automobile, etc. So it was a mutual pleasure for them to meet now at Haifa after tee long years of warfare and separation. Praise God! The worst is now past.

Yours in El Abhá,

Elinor Hiscox.

Visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás, at Haifa and Acre

On the 25th, 26th and 27th February, 1919.

I arrived from Jerusalem in Haifa on the 25th February. The new railway from Ludd to Haifa to now completed, and this greatly shortens the journey. For instance, one can leave Cairo at 6:15 in the evening, and arrive at Haifa without change at 11 a. m. the toile owing morning. The Military Authorities are re-building the light railway between Haifa and Acre, and are already making arrangements to bring a new water supply into Haifa, and to improve the drainage system. Roadways in both towns are being reconstructed and general improvements are under way. The Headquarters of the British Army of Occupation have now been removed from a camp near Ludd to permanent quarters in Haifa. A large number of buildings are being erected on Mount Carmel for the Headquarters Staff, and at least 2,000,000 is to be spent upon the port of Haifa and improvements in Acre, always provided that Palestine remains under British control.

The result of all this will be that Haifa will become the most important port on the Mediterranean Coast between Port Sa’id and Alexandria, and will be the principal import and export center for merchandise and travellers arriving and departing by sea. The whole of Palestine, (as well as the Damascus areas and the country behind) will look to Haifa as its port, so that from a political, commercial and military standpoint, Haifa is undoubtedly destined to become the capital of Palestine. The seat of Government will probably be transferred, before the year is out, from Jerusalem to Haifa, and Jerusalem will remain the religious center of the country only. Those feels are reported because they fit in accurately with Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to prophecies concerning the great future lying before Haifa and the Bay of Acre.

A new railway is projected between Haifa and Damascus to take the place of the present narrow gauge Turkish system. Jerusalem is also now linked up with Haifa by the broad gauge railway via Ludd.

On arriving at Haifa, I was met by Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí, Persian Consul at Port Sa’id, who is now visiting the Master at Haifa. He told me that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was at Acre at present. He also gave me the interesting news that he had been married on the previous Saturday to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s daughter Monever Khanoum, to whom he had been engaged for some years. On the following day,

I drove round the Bay and found the Master at Acre, showing every sign of vigor.

It appears that General Commander-in-Chief of the British Forces, had called upon Him at Haifa a week ago, and at the Master's wish had written with him to Acre and taken tea at Hadje's, outside the city. The party included Allenby: General Bole, chief of General Staff: and Colonel Staenton, Military Governor -of Haifa, who has become a firm friend, and promise to do all possible for 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the movement generally.

I cannot report the intensely interesting conversation between General Allenby and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, because it was of a private nature, Sufficiently to say that the Commander-in-chief was deeply impressed, and asked for literature on the Bahá'í Movement, with which I have since provided him.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has now been visited by all the important military personages in Palestine, including the Commander-in-Chief, General Sir Arthur Money, Chief Administrator, General Ronald Storrs, Military Governor of Jerusalem, and many military heads of departments, to say nothing of a constant flow of officers and men who call upon him daily.

The Master states that he has no present intention of leaving Haifa, where he is overwhelmed at the moment, with a world-wide correspondence and many collars. It can be stated confidently that his presence is of immense value to the British Authorities, and that his influence is doing much to lessen the friction between various important religious communities in Palestine and elsewhere.

The Master entrusted me with about 100 tablets to be distributed to various parts of the world, and expressed the strong desire that I should return to Palestine after spending some leave in London during the present spring.

After spending the day in Acre, I returned to Haifa in the middle of a violent thunderstorm, during which the carriage in which I was travelling with Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí was nearly swamped in the sea. The weather at present is very violent in this part of Palestine, but on the whole the winter has been a mild one.

The following day the Master travelled across to Haifa, the weather was most inclement, and gave me several hours of his precious time in discussing many confidential matters affecting the future of the country, as well as of the Movement. He is extremely anxious that any friction which may have arisen between individual friends in the Bahá'í Movement in England or America should be entirely alleviated in order that a thoroughly united front may be shown to the world, thereby proving that this Movement is of a spiritual nature which unites rather than creates discord. A tablet dealing with this important subject has been written to friends both in England and America.

He is also very anxious that the aims and the ideals of the Movement should be placed before the world in a dignified and correct manner, and is, I believe, about to issue certain suggestions concerning the future publication of book and pamphlets.

I promised to return to Haifa on or about the 18th March, 1919 before leaving for England, and meanwhile have arranged for some important interviews by which the beneficent effect of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence in Palestine at this critical juncture may be largely increased.

Meanwhile I am happy to able report that the Master's health is good: that he is receiving every consideration from the authorities: that he is taking part in a quiet and important way in the reconstructive and regenerative work in Palestine that he is cheerful about the future: that he to call certain friends to Haifa from various parts of world: and that there is no cause for anxiety regarding his future welfare under British protection.

Any literature in English or French that can be spared direct should be dispatch direct to Shogi Rabbání, Effendi c/o 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás, Haifa, who is forming a small ending library for the use of many people out here who wish to understand what this Movement stands for.

The news received from friends in India and Persia is satisfactory, where Bahá'ís are increasing very rapidly in numbers under the new political and social conditions now developing in those countries. Friends throughout the Near and Middle East look to friends in England and America to show by their example a united and, harmonious front, so that the news of the movement may spread without the danger of sectarian of other differences springing up.

I strongly advise the friends in the rest to combine in sending a Memorandum to both General Allenby (General Sir E. H. H. Allenby, C. C. M. G., K. C. B. & C. Commander-in-Chief E. E. F.) and to General Sir Arthur Money, C. S. I. & C., Chief Administrator, Jerusalem expressing gratitude for the courteous consideration shown to 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás and his friends since the British occupation, and at the same time a Memorandum should be sent to the Et. Hon. A. J. Balfour, O. M., M.P., Foreign Office London, who was responsible for instructing the Military Authorities out here to safeguard 'Abdu'l-Bahá and to give him full protection. Copies of these Memoranda might be sent to the Foreign Office officials at Washington, and also to the Master himself, by hand in the latter case.

The above notes are not intended for publication but for the private guidance of Friends. There is no objection, however, to carefully edited extracts appearing under the aegis of the Bahá'í Publication Board.

This book was published in Boston in 1920. There is no record of this work ever having been registered, or transferred to another party. Under the U.S. Copyright statute in effect in 1920, the copyright endured for a first term of 28 years (through to 1948). The copyright would have had to be renewed in 1948, which it apparently was not, for another (and final) term of 28 years (through to 1972). At the very least, it appears that the work went into the public domain in 1948.

This file was typed, proofread, and submitted by Mike Thomas and html formatted by Jonah Winters. Thomas explains the process of inputting the text:

I scanned a paper photocopied copy sent from Haifa, formatted the text and quickly read it, added some diacritical marks, added words are in square brackets ( [ ] ). So-called extra page breaks are to indicate end of original pages so that page numbers are as per original book. Photographs (not good enough quality to scan in) in the original are indicated by reference to them as a separate paragraph in an approximate position on the page without breaking a paragraph (text flows alongside some of them). I added the comments regarding copyright. My normal method [of proofreading] is to check text as it is being recognized (OCR), the check spelling mistakes and expected OCR errors, and finally to read through as I format it to see that it makes sense - if not I
check it against the original. That process catches the majority of errors. I will do a thorough check soon when time is available.

THE LIGHT OF THE NEW DAY

“O People! O People! The Sun of Reality has dawned from the horizon of the world, casting its effulgence upon the East and the West. He has instructed the world of humanity through heavenly teachings and has become the cause of human solidarity. The Teachings of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh declare the oneness of the world of humanity cause religion to be the foundation of union and accord in the world; become conducive to good fellowship among the children of men; conform religion with science and reason; take away political prejudices and race prejudices; uphold the doctrine of perfect equality between men and women; espouse the cause of an international auxiliary language; foster the universalization of education; readjust and equalize in the most perfect manner the economic relations of the social structure; destroy totally the basis of hostility and ill-will from amongst mankind; constitute the five continents as one continent; suffer the various races of men to become as one race; rend asunder entirely the veils of superstitions; reveal in the assemblage of humanity the light of Truth; illumine the hearts with the rays of guidance; resurrect the spirits with the breaths of the Holy Spirit, and baptize the souls with the water of Life Eternal, the fire of the love of God and the outpouring of the Divine Spirit.”

Foreword

“In case travel to the Holy Land may be accomplished in the utmost comfort and happiness, your visit will be the cause of the rejoicing of hearts.” This message from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the necessary urge to the yearning heart that united Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Randall, their daughter Margaret and Mr. Albert Vail in a pilgrimage to Haifa and Mount Carmel.

When thou shalt be released from military service thou hast permission to present thyself at the Holy Land”, were the welcomed words received in France, that joined Mr. George Latimer to this little party, a group of five, eager to attain the fulfillment of Isaiah’s prophecy—“and it shall come to pass in the last days that the Mountain of the Lord's House shall be established in the top of the mountains and shall be exalted above the hills and all nations shall flow unto it."

When one has attained to the longing of the heart and reaches the City of Destination, such emotions arise that he cannot record these impressions until looking back through the perspective of calmness. For twelve days we lingered at the Place of Desire, in quiet and meditation, inhaling the fragrances of that Holy Spot, the "Garden of God", and sharing the bestowals of Divine Favour that descended through the Word of 'Abdu'l-Bahá—that Word which establishes the ideal communion between hearts.

Wherein are set forth the fruits of that pilgrimage, His Utterances, not as instructions to us but as a Message to the world, in their continuity as they came to us like the successive waves of the Ocean of Celestial Wisdom.

A few of the luncheon talks were taken down in English by Mr. Latimer. The rest were all interpreted by Shoghi Effendi, the grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and transcribed in the original Persian by Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím of London. Each day they were translated into literal English. We owe an unending debt of gratitude to these two devoted souls, who by their tireless energy and servitude made it possible for us to share these precious Gems with the friends of God.

The photographs were taken by Miss Margaret Randall, Mr. Arthur Hathaway, Fugeta and Mr. Latimer. This book has been approved by the Bahá'í Executive Board.

Comparing this century to all previous ones, 'Abdu'l-Bahá has called it the Diamond Age. It is our hope that these rough chips, hewn from the Diamond of Divine Knowledge, without polishing, will shine and sparkle with such brilliancy that every soul will see, as we have, in them—the LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

Introduction

During the six months following the arrival of our permission, the probability of making a journey to the Holy Land "in the utmost comfort and happiness" seemed almost an impossibility. Yet all things are possible with God for when one's heart is full of yearning to make this pilgrimage, the desire, if it is in accord with wisdom, is fulfilled.

In October fourth we left New York on the Steamer "Lapland", a little party of five, with our hearts turned toward the Light in the East. Our passage was without storm and we were able to tell many people the reason for our journey. During the afternoons there were several little groups gathered together at teatime. A number of progressive Japanese and a group of Chinese on an educational mission to Europe became interested in the principle of Universal Brotherhood as a power for uniting the East and West. The Sunday before we arrived at Cherbourg the large salon was filled with souls eager to hear this Message.

We were in Paris for a few days during which time we had several meetings with the friends. Their hearts were yearning to join us on our pilgrimage. From here we went to Italy arriving at Naples a few days before sailing. There we found Fugeta, the young Japanese Bahá'í, who was on his way to serve in the Master's household. He had been waiting seven long years to be summoned for this service. There also we found Arthur Hathaway, an American friend, journeying to Haifa. Both had been waiting for some time for a boat to complete the trip. We took Fugeta with us leaving Mr. Hathaway with the hope of a passage within the week.

On November sixth we felt indeed that we were beginning our real journey when we boarded the little boat "Karlsbad" at Bari, which was to take us to Haifa. Again our passage was beautiful and in a few days we arrived at Alexandria, going immediately to Cairo.

The day following our arrival in Cairo early in the morning that wonderful soul, Mírzá Muḥammad Taqí, accompanied by Tofti Yazdí, whose face is alight with the love of service, came to our hotel and extended to us the greetings of all the friends of Cairo. He invited us to come to a meeting in the early evening at his home. Our hearts were filled with unspeakable joy over the anticipation of meeting our Oriental brothers. We promised to join them about six o'clock and they left us with Miss Hiscock, who upon learning of our arrival had come to call and greet us. Her work in Cairo and Alexandria among the young Egyptians has been very extensive and many have been attracted to the Cause through her sincere efforts. Planning to take tea with her in the early afternoon, we parted, feeling that sightseeing was dull indeed when one could experience the delight in meeting such blessed souls as these.

During the day we met Mrs. True and her daughter, Miss Edna True. They had just left the Master the night before, bringing with them the light and radiance of His Spirit, and we felt that our visit with Him had almost begun in Cairo. At five we all gathered for tea. Mrs. Stannard of London, who has done splendid work for the Cause in India, Miss Hiscock, the Trues, ten of us from all parts of the western world drawn together in this eastern city by the Divine Power. It was a wonderful hour—hearing of the work in the East and telling of the work in the West.

At six we drove to the home of Muḥammad Taqí. A large number of the friends had gathered awaiting our coming. The warmth of their welcome, the joy that shone in their faces and their humility made a lasting impression upon us. Delicious Persian tea was served immediately and although only a few could understand English, words were scarcely needed for the spirit of love and understanding, the real language of the heart, was so strong between us. Prayers were beautifully chanted in Persian and Arabic and greetings were exchanged. Each one of us said a few words but our hearts were too full for utterance.

They in turn spoke to us, but had no word been spoken the evening would have been rich in the silent language of the heart. When we left them we were deeply conscious that here in Cairo we had attended our first real Bahá'í Feast, and that we in America know little of the true meaning of humility and service as lived by our eastern brothers.

Again at Alexandria on our return we experienced the richness of love and devotion of our Oriental friends in a meeting at the home of Muḥammad Sa'íd Adham, an enkindled Egyptian believer. There were a number of Egyptian Bahá'ís, quite new in the Cause and wonderfully full of fire and enthusiasm, they being the spiritual children of the late glorious teacher, Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl. Here we met Dr. Zia and Zeenat Baghdádí on their way to meet the Master.

The next morning, shortly after sunrise, we left for Port Sa'íd. Many of the friends came to this early train to wish us a safe journey and once again to send their love to their beloved Master.

At Port Sa'íd we were greeted by Aḥmad Yazdí and we further realized that the hospitality and kindness of the Oriental believers is far beyond our western expression. Here we found another group of loving souls who came to offer us their love and service. We stayed in Port Sa'íd only a few hours, and here the guiding hand of 'Abdu'l-Bahá appeared in the chance meeting of Arthur Hathaway who had just arrived from Naples and was endeavouring without success to obtain passage to Haifa. We were able to overcome his difficulty and with him rejoined the "Karlsbad", our hearts already overflowing with the joy and love which our brothers had showered upon us.

On November sixteenth our journey ended. That morning in the mist of a glorious golden sunrise our little steamer dropped anchor in the blessed harbour of Haifa. The greatest peace ever experienced filled our hearts as we stood on the hurricane deck and realized that in this city the Light of the World was watching our approach. Through the hurry and confusion of landing, the babel of the noisy Arab boatmen taking us ashore in their tiny boats, the endless routine of customs, we felt ever that peace in our hearts.

Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím had been sent by the Master to welcome and assist us. The Master's carriage took us to the Western Pilgrim House, a beautiful vine-covered house directly across the street from 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This was to be our home during our visit with the Master. The view was beautiful, with the blue bay of 'Akká stretching out before us and in the distance the "most great prison" city gleamed in the brilliant sunlight. Mount Carmel rose behind us in majestic beauty. As the carriage drove up to the gate, Margaret beheld the Master gazing from a window of a little turreted room just opposite. The impression filled our hearts that He was watching our arrival and had in his prayers assisted us through our difficulties on sea and land. He was "Waiting, patiently waiting".

At the Pilgrim House we found Dr. Esslemont of England, the only other western pilgrim. He was confined to his bed recovering from an illness contracted during enforced quarantine. He is to be in Haifa three months gathering material for a book on the Cause which the Master has given him permission to write.

Almost immediately Shoghi, accompanied by Mírzá Faḍíl, one of the ablest Persian teachers, came to greet us and brought word that the Master would welcome us after we had rested from our journey. Here we were joined by Colonel and Mrs. Allison, an American physician and his wife. They were fellow travellers on board the “Karlsbad” and had become so interested in our pilgrimage that they deferred an intended trip through the Holy Land to come directly to Haifa to hear from the Master’s own lips His Message for mankind. They remained for some days sharing with us the jewels of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s wisdom at the evening meals. They went to Damascus, but soon returned, eager to be again in His Divine Presence. When they departed the benediction of the Master went with them and His Love will surround them during their entire journey.

For twelve blessed days we remained in Haifa, surrounded by the love and thoughtfulness of our Divine Host. He showered his bounties and blessings upon us, coming each day to be with us at luncheon, and we in turn going each night to his home for the evening meal. He also summoned each of us at different times to His Holy Presence, where all of our heart’s longings and desires were expressed and answered. During the day when we were not occupied with the translation of the Master’s wonderful talks, the pilgrims from all parts of the Orient came to visit with us, creating in our hearts, by their beautiful spirit of evanescence, a greater bond of unity and understanding. Every afternoon Mrs. Randall and Margaret had the great bounty of having tea with the ladies of the household. Stories of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were related by the sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Often He came in and joined them. Such was our life for twelve wonderful days.

As our first meeting with the friends in Egypt prepared our hearts to receive the Light of the Divine Kingdom, so these days indelibly imprinted upon our hearts the glorious realization of the Power of the Centre of the Covenant.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

THE WELCOME

For forty days we had been in the wilderness of travel, passing through the dead cities of modern glory and ancient, splendour, which history prizes with its crumbling monuments and vanished life. We had arrived at the “Mountain of God”, which Christ knew, Muḥammad knew, which all the prophets knew guarded the secret of God and for ages had watched for the advent of His Coming and the establishment of His Covenant.

Word came that the Master was coming to welcome us! As the moment so long anticipated approached, our hearts were overwhelmed with joy. We saw Him leave his house, his white turban glistening in the sunlight. He came up the steps majestically and with a radiant smile greeted us with the utmost love and tenderness. His solicitation for our every comfort and well-being brought the realization to our hearts that we were indeed in the home of the “Lord of Hosts”. After expressing to Him our great happiness for the privilege of this attainment, we conveyed to Him the love of the western friends and of those in Egypt.

He spoke for half an hour on the love that exists between the Persians and Americans, saying that it was not a political interest, but a true love that existed in their hearts. He said that all the Americans who had gone into Persia went without desire for personal gain, nor to interfere with politics—but with Persia’s interests at heart. He commented at length on the joy of our meeting. After enquiring about President Wilson, He said that his task had been too great for one man; that the Peace Table must seat delegates from every nation in the world and when that happens its decisions will be effective and permanent. Universal Peace will only be brought about by a Universal Court of Arbitration. Then He left us and we watched Him walk up the road, feeling that all our worldly cares had ended and that here indeed we were in the hands of the Divine Physician, the Healer of all the wounds of the world.

UNIVERSALITY

The First Afternoon 16 November 1919

At three o’clock Shoghi burst in at the door with the words: “The Master bids you come to see Him!” Colonel and Mrs. Allison, were with us and a Mr. Denham of England, a traveller whom we had met on the “Karlsbad” and told of the wonderful Master in Haifa and his universal Teachings. He was so interested he asked us if it would be possible for him to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá while the steamer waited in the harbour. We told Shoghi Effendi and he arranged this interview.

Across the street we hurried in joyous expectation. We entered a garden, approached a large stone house, entered a hall, severely simple, and a salon, large, bright, carpeted with a beautiful Persian rug of rich crimson pattern. On the chairs were plain linen covers and a small table stood in the centre of the room which was beautiful, yet simple, without other ornamentation. As we took our seats a wondrous peace and content descended upon us. We were at home in the home of the Master.

Soon the Beloved entered the door. He had just been lunching with the Bishop of Haifa and apologized for delaying us. We could have waited forever in his home for He seems to fill the whole house with the light of His Presence. He centred all his love, his kingly courtesy that afternoon upon Mr. Denham, his English visitor. He was so gracious, so brilliant, his smile so loving that Mr. Denham’s face simply shone in response.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Here is the Holy Land. It is a very good place. From all parts of the world people desire to come here. This Mount Carmel has a very good climate. It is picturesque and has an ideal setting. Here at Haifa they need a good number of physicians. Its well-known physician is a Jew. There is no popular physician here.”

Mr. Denham asked: “Should the fundamental truths of this Cause be taught to children in the schools?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “In childhood it is easy. Whatever a child learns during childhood, it will not forget. There is a proverb in Arabic that says: ‘Teaching a child is like carving upon stone. It can never be erased.’ A child is like a fresh branch. It is tender. In whatever way you wish you can train it. If you want to keep it straight it can be done. But when it grows up, if you want to straighten it, it cannot be done except through fire.”

Mr. Denham: “Should the truths of this Cause be taught in Bahá’í schools or in all the schools?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “It makes no difference what school we enter or where we send our children. There are schools in Persia in which there are children from all religions. Whatever is universal is heavenly and whatever is personal is satanic. Then everything ought to be universal. It is clear and evident among the Bahá’ís that whatever is universal is heavenly and whatever is personal is human.

“Although the Christians say that all the world is for the Christians, yet this is the Bounty of God for all the people. Enough of these superstitions! People are so antagonistic to one another and wish to defeat each other. Praise be to God the Century of Light has come! It became evident that these ignorant superstitions are the causes of destruction. Why should not the children attend schools other than their own, so long as He has created all as human beings? All are the sheep of God and He is the kind shepherd. This is the Divine Policy. He would not leave any sheep unattended and is kind to all. The Divine Policy must be followed and therefore universality should be the rule.”

Mr. Denham: “Should truth be spread verbally or by writing?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Both. Real teaching is by action. Action has effect. One act is better than a thousand words. Jesus Christ says ‘by their fruits’ (actions) and not by their words. What is the effect of words alone? The real thing is action.”

Mr. Denham: “We have a saying in England—‘Example is better than precept.’”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Certainly. Action has made man eloquent. There is no eloquent language better than action. As long as the sun is bright, is it necessary that it should say ‘I am bright?’ There is no need for that.”

Mr. Denham: “The Master must be very tired with so many interviews.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Man, when he associates with sanctified souls, his fatigue passes away. Sometimes if I sit with a person for five minutes I become tired, while at other times I may sit with others for two hours and not become fatigued.”

Mr. Denham: “The atmosphere here is very peaceful.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is very good provided you come and stay here. Then you will see.”

Mr. Denham: “If everyone who desired to come, came here, there would be no room.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “There was a society in Persia where the members sat in silence. By gesture they could know what was to be said, as for example, by the gesture of the hand. Whoever wanted to join the society had to give an application. Once there was one who wanted to become a member, but the president wanted to make the members understand that he was not fit to be accepted. There was on the table a tumbler and a pitcher of water. He filled the tumbler with water. His object was to make the gathering understand without talking. The glass was filled to the brim and both the members and the candidate understood. Then he who had applied took out a small piece of paper from his pocket and placed it gently on the surface of the water and the tumbler did not overflow. They clapped. By this he meant that his presence amongst them was exactly like that piece of paper and they accepted him right away. And now you are like that delicate piece of paper. However full it may be here you will find room.”

Colonel Allison asked if the war would have any spiritual reaction in the United States and in the world.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes. In the first place, people were very negligent. Especially in Paris no one would mention the name of God. I used to speak about God to many people and they would ask me to take another topic. It had reached to such a state, but now they realize and are better than before. The hearts have become a little more tender.”

Colonel Allison: “Since the cessation of war the spiritual impulse seems to have abated.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Those whose sons have been killed, naturally, their hearts are affected. They would like some one to talk to them about God and the spirit. For instance, a father and mother having had a son who might have been killed, they would like to know whether the soul of their son is immortal. As soon as they hear that his soul is immortal, their hearts are consoled. There were Germans here, some of whom had lost their sons, and they would come to me and ask me to talk to them about spiritual things. ‘Give us proofs of the immortality of the soul.’ I would ask them: ‘What for?’ They would say: ‘If the spirit is immortal, then our hearts are really consoled.’

“This war has been instrumental in partly awakening mankind and it has exposed the virtues of Universal Peace. All people are desirous of having Universal Peace because they have suffered from this universal war. They do not want another war like it. Gradually racial prejudice will be dispelled. There will come a day when the German will say to the Frenchman: 'I am a Frenchman.' And the Frenchman will say: 'I am a German.' If the Government should like to wage war the people would not agree to it. They would say: 'If ye leaders have any war go and fight it out. We will not go. Why should we go? What is the use? If there is any use, it is for you; but there is no result for poor people like us. Our sons and property are taken while ye are in palaces and pavilions, enjoying delicious food and drinking wine. If war is good, go yourselves and fight. Ye simply eat and enjoy yourselves.'

"Ultimately all men will say we have no quarrel. This war has brought about these sentiments; such as sentiments of Universal Peace; also the abolition of religious superstitions, patriotic superstitions and all these which have gradually gathered together—and caused the war. It will reach such a state that if any one is in any place, he will say this is my home, and you (Col. Allison) will say Syria is my home.

"All have understood that war is the destruction of the foundation of humanity. It has no benefit save loss."

Mr. Randall: "This war has made all the nations poor."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "The loss in this war will be felt in the future. All these strikes in Europe and America are the results of the war. Had there been no war, there would have been no such strikes. In Egypt the strikes caused an increase of thirty per cent in wages.

"His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh fifty years ago mentioned the evils of this war and said these things would happen, and that the cure is Universal Peace and the establishment of Universal Arbitration and that all nations should be included to solve these disputes. If the letters which His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh sent to the rulers of the world had been put into action, this war would not have occurred. What is the result? France needs fifty years to recover and become as before, likewise Belgium, Roumania, Bulgaria, Montenegro, Servia and Turkey, even Persia. Although Persia did not fight, yet her loss was great."

In the midst of this wonderful interview, the whistle of Mr. Denham's boat blew to call the passengers aboard. 'Abdu'l-Bahá urged Mr. Denham to stay two or three days. When he replied that he must go, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said "perhaps" he would come back to Haifa on his return from Damascus. He went away with the words: "The Master has the most magnetic personality I have ever known in the world."

THE ONENESS OF HUMANITY

The First Evening Meal 16 November 1919

A little after seven that ever memorable Sunday we were bidden to dine at the table of the Master's bounty. We gathered, nineteen of us, in the large dining room which opened from the salon and one by one He placed us at the long table. Mrs. Randall was placed at the head, Colonel and Mrs. Allison at her left and right. He himself took a lowly seat at the side of the table, with Margaret, her eyes shining like jewels, at his left and saintly Ibn Asdak, the only surviving member of the "five hands of the Cause" in Persia, at His right. On the opposite side He placed the American friends, Dr. Suliman Rifat, a Turkish doctor from Constantinople, Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh Khán Wargha, the son of the famous martyr, and Mírzá Moshen, one of His sons-in-law, while at the end were Shoghi Effendi and Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím, who took down the divine words in Persian. On his own side of the table were Mírzá Maḥmúd of Bombay, who travelled with Him in Europe and America, Mírzá Asadu'lláh Faḍil, the learned Mullá, now a most effective teacher in Persia, and Shaykh Farajullah, the fiery but peace-loving Kurd. Fugeta, the Japanese Bahá'í, who as 'Abdu'l-Bahá said was "all love and service", immediately received the great privilege of waiting on the table. With Koshro, the Hindu boy whose mother had dedicated him to the Master's service, Fugeta served the friends with the delicious dishes.

Each evening we dined at that table descended from heaven. When he was well, Dr. Esslemont of England sat opposite the Master. Here we were—Persian, Arab, Kurd, Turk, English, American, Hindu, Japanese, Muḥammadan, Christian, Jew and Buddhist, gathered at one heavenly table by the power of the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh. Our hearts were united by the most wondrous love, the Centre of the Covenant of love shining and speaking in our midst. Our cup was full with joy at the commemoration of this oneness of mankind, a lasting, universal brotherhood in the Kingdom of the Father.

The Master sat there before us, at times silent, but when He spoke every word vibrated with power. As He talked of world conditions, his irresistible logic, the splendour of his universal mind, were a continual astonishment. As He paused, told a humorous story, laughed about Fugeta, heaped more food on Margaret's plate, his great love set all our hearts in uproar.

It is not the Master's human personality, attractive as it may be, but the light, the truth of God shining through his selfless spirit that makes Him so wonderful and his words like the Water of Life.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "East and West are gathered here. Very good! Whatever gathering establishes love and union among human kind is Heavenly Bounty. We hope that this gathering will become larger and that everywhere such heavenly meals may be prepared and be the cause of love and unity amongst people; so that discord may be extinguished and union established, disunion be put aside and the banner of the Oneness of the World of Humanity be raised.

"Many meetings are held in the world such as the meetings of merchants, meetings for politics, meetings for geographical research, meetings for the North Pole, etc. But our meeting is for the love of the Oneness of Humanity. For six thousand years the world of humanity has been blighted, even history tells us this, and no doubt it was so before that. Mankind has been the slave of nature and in the world of nature there is disturbance. In the world of nature there is antagonism to the world of man; in the world of nature there is self-seeking and, briefly, in the world of, nature there is great disturbance. Man is saved from the world of nature by the Light of God, otherwise there would be darkness upon darkness. All the prophets and seers have come that the world of humanity may be saved from the claws of nature and that they may transform the world of nature into a world of light.

It is now six thousand years that the world of humanity has been in darkness. There has been struggle and fighting. There has been war and conflict, enmity and hatred. Now it is sufficient, and something must be done to abolish them. Praise be to God, the bounties of God are many. Now is the time that the Light of Reality should shine and darkness be dispelled. God willing, this world will become the world of God. It is long enough for the world of man to be in the animal world.

“His Holiness Christ gave his life so that the world of mankind should be saved from darkness. But what a pity mankind is still in darkness. His Holiness Christ tried so much. At the end very few were saved—the disciples and the followers of the disciples. Again the world of nature prevailed and that radiance of Christ was veiled and the material darkness became intense.

“Sixty years ago they introduced the potato into Persia. There was so much superstition that they used to say that whoever takes it becomes an infidel. No one would eat it except those who would take it with wine. There was so much prejudice. If any one would eat it occasionally they would say he has become an infidel. Now see what Bahá’u’lláh has done. We are all gathered around one table, filled with love.

“In America we had a good number of heavenly and spiritual gatherings. One night in Washington there was a gathering full of spirituality. It was so effective the Turkish Ambassador wept. This was a great gathering. We also had good gatherings in Europe, such as in London, Paris, Vienna, Budapest and Germany. They were all spiritual meetings.”

Mr. Randall mentioned that there were about seven hundred people at the Feast of the Ridván in New York this year at the Convention.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “In future you will see far greater gatherings.”

After a long pause during which another course was served ‘Abdu’l-Bahá began:

“President Wilson left his work unfinished in Europe. Now they have made a plan that the British, French and Italian Governments will complete the work without America, for instance, the treaty with Turkey. The Senate in America decided that they will not be obliged to enter the League of Nations, because he could not establish the League of Nations. If President Wilson had established the International Court of Arbitration, it would be permanent. Now he entered this war so that real justice might become apparent. But the other nations did not take up the burden. For instance, he announced the freedom of the nations, that each nation should be independent. It did not bring any result. The result was that America gave some of her youth and wealth, but to no effect. Perhaps it was not necessary. Because if the Court of Arbitration was not organized, then the result of the purpose of the war would disappear. The rights of all would have been preserved. Now it has no result. This war was without result....

“The only result of the war that has appeared is that this place (Palestine) is freed. Because England has taken this place. Palestine was greatly ruined, but when England came it was released. Baghdád was freed. There will come a day when this country, especially Baghdád, will progress greatly. Mesopotamia will progress greatly. Especially good results will appear here, for the population could not better their own condition. It is necessary for her to be under the power of a strong nation. Nothing could be better for her than England.

Just as with Egypt. From the time that England came there it progressed very much. I know that fifty years ago the revenues there were eight million pounds, now they are thirty million. One feddan (about an acre) of ground was worth fifteen to twenty pounds; now it is worth five hundred pounds it has progressed so much. There were no high schools except schools for theology. There was only one school for religion in Alexandria. Now it has twenty-four schools. The revenues in cotton were thirteen million bales, now they are fifty million, for it has improved so much. If it had been under the old Government it would not have progressed at all. They cannot administer for themselves. It is necessary that they be under the protection of another power. England has revived them. India was in a very bad condition and the kings of India were great oppressors. England freed the people of India from the grip of their kings. Before England went to India, no one was safe with his life and property.

“If America accepts the Mandatory of Turkey it will be very good, because there is continual fighting between the Kurds and the Armenians. In Anatolia there is continual killing amongst them. If America accepts, it will cease.

“We pray that all these may pass away. God willing, the world of humanity will find rest; the existing competition between the powers may pass away. Thank God we are free from all these questions. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has emancipated us. With us, all are the same. All countries are one. We have no conflict with any one. Any government which is based on justice is appreciated. Whatever government it may be, as long as it is just, it is acceptable. Any country is our country. Wherever we go, that is our country. Bahá'u'lláh says: ‘The world is one home. There is no glory for one who loves his country, but for one who loves the world.’ We are free and apart from all these questions.”

GOVERNMENT

Luncheon 17 November 1919

After spending the morning translating the Master's talks of yesterday, we were most happily surprised by the announcement that He was coming to have lunch with us. We did not realize at this time that this bounty was to be ours each day. Luṭfu'lláh, who was continually helping us in every way, exemplifying with glowing radiance the Abhá spirit of love and service, spread the table, with Fugeta's help. Soon the Master arrived with a joyous smile and greeting, placing each of us at the table, nine in all, with Margaret next to Him.

Dr. Esslemont quoted from Bahá'u'lláh's Glad Tidings: "Although a republican government profits all the people of the world, yet the majesty of Kingship is one of the signs of God. We do not wish that the countries of the world should be deprived thereof.' Does this mean that a hereditary monarchy, such as England is preferable to a form of government whose head is elected for a period of years as in the United States?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Actual despotic government is undesirable. A republican form of government is good, but a constitutional monarchy is better, because it combines both kingship and republic. It is a form of government with a distinctive head."

Dr. Esslemont: "Is there any advantage in having a permanent ruler?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "In case we have no permanent ruler we shall have a republican form of government and having a republican government that form of government will lead to dissension and oppression during the election times. Then Justice will not prevail.

"I was in America when Wilson was elected. There was so much dispute between Taft and Roosevelt. One would say Wilson is good, and one would say Taft. This was the general conversation and there was constant dispute and conflict. The papers were in discord. In public gatherings, even in churches, there was distraction. Secretary Bryan and his wife came to me in 'Akká. He came a second time. When I went to America I wanted to meet him. He had no time. He was making speeches every day. In short, he had no time. Once every four years there is an election."

Dr. Esslemont: "If the king is unworthy does the parliament have power to remove him?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "The parliament can remove him, certainly. In a constitutional monarchy the king has nothing to do. All the affairs are settled by the cabinet and the parliament of the nation."

Dr. Esslemont: "Will parliament appoint the Prime Minister?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "No, the King will appoint the Prime Minister, but he will be responsible to the parliament of the nation. He will be responsible before the members of the parliament and if he is at fault he will be dismissed. The difference lies in this that when there is a distinctive head, a kingdom has a dignity of its own. For example, take France and England. In France there is no dignity attached to the Government, but in England there is more of it."

Mr. Latimer: "We always speak of the Kingdom of God and not the republic of God. Earthly things should be the counterpart of the spiritual world."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Well said. In London the Persian Ambassador came to me. He said there is some discussion between England and Persia about a certain matter. Sir Edward Grey has said the matter must be so. I came to Paris and the Turkish Ambassador came to me. He said that with regard to a certain matter the President of the Republic says so and so, but we left the matter pending. Very soon there will be a new election and perhaps there will be a President who will agree with our ideas. But of that matter in London the Ambassador said 'Impossible'. As long as Grey says, 'Do so,' it must be done. The President of the Republic will certainly be dismissed but Grey will remain. That is why He (Bahá'u'lláh) says a constitutional monarchy is better, because it combines a republican form of government and a monarchy."

Mr. Randall: "In such a case will there be any princes and nobles?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "He who serves (the government). No one can say that I must be respected because my father has been a general. A person who does not serve the nation will not have any distinction, although he may be respected. He will be respected because of the services of his father. So far as offices are concerned, he will be given no preference; but he who serves must have the mark of distinction. It could not be otherwise. Were it not so, no one would care to serve. For instance, Bismarck. What a great service he performed. He raised Germany. But after he had gone, they enjoyed no special distinction. Consider this, that Germany had seventy million population. One person made this Empire and raised it. This person was wise. But seventy million caused its downfall. One person was better than seventy million. One perfect man is better than one hundred million imperfect men."

Dr. Esslemont spoke of a Tablet in which it said only the Words of Bahá'u'lláh were to be read in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. "Does this mean that the Words of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá are not to be read?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "There is no harm in it. But the essential thing is the reading of the Words of Bahá'u'lláh. The Prayers of His Holiness the Báb are also good. If it becomes necessary to have an explanation of some topic that comes up, they may refer to the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

Dr. Esslemont: "Are not 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Words the same as those of Bahá'u'lláh?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Yes. Bahá'u'lláh in his explicit texts says: 'He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) is the Expounder.' I have no opinion of my own. Whatever is His Blessed Will I carry out."

Mr. Randall expressed the desire that for many months he had longed to be at the table of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and [noted that on] the night of our arrival ‘Abdu’l-Bahá broke bread for us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Praise be to God, we are together in the utmost love. This table which is here is the same as the Lord’s Supper during the lifetime of Christ. Because the Lord’s Supper was a gathering for the promulgation of the Cause of God, so that it may attract mankind through love. I hope that these will be like that also.”

UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE

The Evening Meeting 17 November 1919

Each evening shortly after sunset the friends of the East and the West about Mount Carmel gathered in the Master’s salon. The Master spoke a few words of greeting, and one or two of the Persians heavenly melody chanted the prayers and Tablets. The Master sat silent as though lost in prayer, while the waves of peace flowing from Him seemed to fill the room. Then He gave a short address upon the early days of the Cause or about the divine principles of Bahá’u’lláh and the meeting ended. We rose refreshed as though bathed in a river of light.

We thought of the friends at home and longed to held such meetings in America, that the Centre of the Covenant might come in a spiritual aeroplane and abide in our midst. Later ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed our desire in a talk at dinner.

After the evening meeting those of us who were to dine with the Master waited and chatted with the friends, our joy singing in our hearts, until the dining-room door opened and we beheld the Beloved inviting us to take our seats at the table of unity.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “We had at one time very great sufferings and persecutions. We were greatly harassed at ‘Akká. Praise be to God that you came here in the utmost joy and happiness. Mr. Mills came and wanted to see me. It was impossible to come near, because there were so many guards around us. He came several times and finally saw Me from a distance. Now you have come in the utmost freedom. Day and night you are here and we can be together. Some of the Bahá’ís of Persia have come here on foot. They could not enter ‘Akká. When it was understood they were Persians, they were not allowed to enter. They used to go to the plain from which they could see the room of the Blessed Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh). They would weep after looking from afar and then return home. One of the most sincere and loving friends came and gazed from afar. He wept a great deal. After weeping much he returned. On his return to Persia, he was recognized and was killed. He became a martyr. He was from Yazd. From his native town to ‘Akká was a two months journey. He came all the way on foot....

“When you hear Persian music it will sound strange, but after you become accustomed to it you will enjoy it very much. Now if there were a Universal Language, how excellent it would be. We could talk with each other. How excellent it would be. Compare this with all the world, the greatest means for love is a Universal Language. It creates love amongst mankind. For the language of the Kingdom is one, it is the language of the hearts. Hearts create amity with each other. In the same way that the language of the Kingdom is one, so also should the human tongues be one. Then it will be perfect. Hidden and manifest, inner and outer, will become one.

“A Turk came here and one of the inhabitants told him, ‘You are the light of my eye.’ This he said in the utmost love. The Arabs use this expression to convey the utmost love. In Turkish it (ain) means a bear. So this man picked him up and threw him on the ground. One who knew the language came and said: ‘What are you doing?’ He replied, ‘This man calls me a bear.’ The other avowed, ‘By God, I say the light of my eye.’ But praise be to God, that despite the fact that Bahá’ís do not know one another’s language, they understand with their hearts and become infinitely happy.

“What did you do with Mr. Remey?”

Mr. Latimer: “He was teaching in the New England states. Although he longs to be here yet he is happy in teaching there.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Mr. Remey is very good. He works very hard. He is very restless. He is continually travelling from city to city. He has not left a place unvisited. He has gone everywhere, even to India. I am going to send him to Persia so that he may be one day in the East and one day in the West.... His soul has a great future.

“There are some Bahá’ís in America who are very good souls. I know them all. They serve the world of humanity and they love all the world. They have no enmity. They sacrifice their lives for the world. But the tests which have been in the East have not yet been in America. For their property was pillaged; they were persecuted and abused; and in the end they were martyred. In Yazd on one day two hundred were killed and all their property was pillaged. Even the women and children were martyred. Some of them would even give sweets to their executioners so that their tongues might be sweetened. They did not take the offensive themselves, although each one of them was courageous enough to overcome ten persons. They had no fear. They never knew when they were in their homes, at what moment ten or twenty persons armed with swords would arrive. They had no fear.

“In the beginning of the Cause they used to defend themselves. One of them would overcome twenty or thirty. Then when they understood the Teachings, they no longer defended themselves.”

Dr. Esslemont: “Did the Báb instruct them to defend themselves or did they do it in ignorance?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “They did not know the Teachings. It was in the beginning of the Cause, and the Teachings were not spread and they were not aware of them. They used to defend themselves bravely. One hundred and ten were in the fortress of Ṭabarsí. They were fighting. Repeatedly they overcame. They were surrounded in the fortress by the army with its cannons and guns. They had nothing but swords, yet they always defeated the army. One night they attacked the army entrenched in a series of seven fortifications, each with troops and guns. The one hundred and ten came out and arrived at the first fortification, broke through and routed them. The soldiers of the first fortification fled to the second. The night was dark. They thought these were the enemy, and so they killed their own soldiers. They had no flares then to throw into the air by their guns. Each garrison would capitulate to the next one. They defeated all the seven garrisons. On that very night the Babu’l-Báb was martyred.

“They besieged the fortress of the Bábís so that for eighteen days they had no bread. After the eighteen days, during which they were without food and starving, the enemies came and made a covenant that they would not harm them. They took an oath to it: ‘We will leave you alone.’ They dropped their swords, came out and entered the camp of the enemy. For eight days they had eaten nothing. They were invited to eat. While they were eating ten regiments arrived and killed them with their spears. Such was their bravery. Now if a Bahá’í wishes to attack, he can overcome ten. He has no fear. But the Teachings forbid them to defend themselves. If they are attacked, they have no desire to defend themselves. This is why the people of Yazd killed two hundred of them. They offered no resistance.”

ECONOMIC JUSTICE

The Evening Meal 17 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I remember the time we were in America. There were several of us travelling. Those were good days. They were all full of the commemoration of God. There were no mentionings save those of God. Especially in Chicago, there was a children’s meeting. I had them gathered. It was very good. They were very spiritual children. There was a little girl there. Jokingly I said to her: ‘I want you to marry this boy.’ She said: ‘I want an Eastern husband.’”

Mr. Latimer mentioned that he had received a letter from Miss Alma Knobloch telling of the commemoration of the children’s meeting in Esslingen, Germany.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Consider the power of God. Such a small woman! She is confirmed in service. She is greatly assisted. When a person compares her success with her physical body, a hundred people will not be so assisted as she—this woman is so short. That is why the confirmations of God are necessary.

“We were at ‘Akká when Kamál Páshá became Prime Minister. His brother became the Governor of ‘Akká. In Turkey the brother of the Prime Minister can do whatever he wishes. No one can object to him. One day he came with a carriage and we went out together. On the way I noticed he had a hunting outfit and he had four or five large hunting dogs. A gazelle was sighted. These dogs chased after it.

“One of the Bahá’ís had a small dog. An Arab Bahá’í. He also had come. These five dogs of the Governor did not catch anything. This little dog caught a large gazelle. The Governor became ashamed. When the dogs returned he began to beat them. He said: ‘What can I do, the Bahá’ís are assisted. These five large dogs of mine could catch nothing, but this little dog did.’ He dismounted and took the little dog in his arms and kissed it. He told the owner of the dog that he would not give the dog back to him.

“The idea is this, that Miss Knobloch has attracted the people. There is a large man, Mr. Herrigel, very large. She converted him.”

Colonel Allison asked about the present and future of Syria and Palestine.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Palestine, it is clear, will be for England, and Syria will remain in the hands of France. France will hold Syria, temporarily, but in the end it will come under English control. Now France will remain there temporarily. Syria will progress. Especially Palestine, in the same way as Egypt. Egypt has progressed very much under the English.

“If the Muḥammadans, Christians and Jews unite, there will be great progress. The Jews are unpopular now, but they will progress, and they will come here to reside. In the Books of the Prophets this promise has been given and in the Tablets of the Blessed Beauty for the Jews of Persia, He has written that the promises which have been given to you, ‘that you will be gathered together’, will be fulfilled. Forty years ago He wrote this. Many of the Jews of Persia have become Bahá’ís and blessed souls have entered the Cause.”

Question: “Will all the Jews return to Palestine?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Some of them will come, but not all. There are twenty-five million of them in the world. They cannot all be gathered in Palestine, for there is not room. There is room for one million more Jews. No more than that.”

Mr. Randall: “How long did Bahá’u’lláh reside in Haifa?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Several times He came here. He remained for a month or two.”

Mr. Randall: “Will not the economic problems be solved first in America and will the United States be able to lay a just foundation and be an example to the world?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Certainly. The economic question will have great importance in Europe and America. This question is impossible of solution except through the Religion of God. Day by day it is settled, then it comes up again. It cannot be settled save by the Religion of God. Labour will not be satisfied in any way. In Egypt, for example, wages have been increased thirty per cent. Notwithstanding this they are not content. Where there is an agitation of the masses, it will not be quieted, until it reaches its climax. At last, things will come to such a state that they will say: 'The factories belong to us and the capitalists will get their share from us.' It will come to that. 'We will apportion the share they ought to receive, for instance, one-tenth.' They will take nine-tenths. Everything will become chaotic. At last it will reach such a state that the world of humanity will come to an absolute stand-still. Even the labourer will go hungry. Then absolutism will return, so that the Government may remedy it. For instance, if the workmen of a factory strike, it will be useless; the Government will become so powerful. Nothing save the Religion of God will solve it. Nothing save the Religion of God. This will include both; the capitalists and labourers will be freed.

"The solution begins with the village, and when the village is reconstructed, then the cities will be also. The idea is this, that in each village will be erected a store-house. In the language of Religion it is called the House of Finance. That is a universal store-house, which is commenced in the village. Its administration is through a committee of the wise ones of the community, and with the approval of that committee all the affairs are directed.

SEVEN REVENUES

"First, whatever contributions are necessary, they obtain from the bank at interest. For instance, they borrow from the bank at three per cent and loan to the public at four per cent. Any farmer who is in need of implements, they supply and give him all his necessities. When the crop is harvested, it will be the first income (of the store-house). The first revenue is this. But this revenue is not equally distributed. For instance, a person may have a crop of one thousand kilos and this is only sufficient for his wants and living. From him nothing will be taken because he needs it all. If something is taken from him, he will remain hungry. But again, there may be one whose needs require one thousand kilos and his income is two thousand kilos. From him one-tenth is taken. Again, one needs two thousand kilos, but his income is ten thousand kilos. From him two-tenths will be taken. He needs two thousand kilos. If two thousand are taken from him he still has six thousand remaining. One has fifty thousand kilos, from him one-third is taken. One may have ten thousand kilos expenses, but has one hundred thousand kilos income. One-half is taken. The greater the income, the greater is the ratio (of taxation).

"Second: It is also the same with the cattle. They take proportionately the revenue from the cattle. For example, if a man has two cows necessary for his wants, nothing is taken from him. The more he has, the more is taken from him.

This is the second revenue.

“The third revenue of the store-house comes from one who dies without heirs.

“The fourth revenue comes from mines. If a mine is found upon the land of a person, one-third of it belongs to him and the remainder to the store-house.

“The fifth revenue is hidden treasure. If a person finds a hidden treasure (in the earth) he takes half of it, and the other half goes to the store-house.

“The sixth revenue. If it (treasure) is found on the way, also half of it belongs to the store-house.

“The seventh revenue is voluntary contributions. Of their own free will and with the utmost willingness, the people will give.

“These are the seven revenues, but there are seven fixed expenditures.

SEVEN EXPENDITURES

“The first expenditure: The store-house ought to give one-tenth to the Government, to the public treasury for the public expenses.

“The second expenditure is for the poor. The poor who are in need, those who are exempt, not those who are idle. For instance, if a person’s crop is burned or he has a loss in his business, and for this reason has become poor; these poor people are to be taken care of.

“Third: The infirm, who come to want and cannot work.

“Fourth: The orphans. To them also help must be given.

“Fifth: The schools. The schools must be organized for the education of the children.

“Sixth: For the deaf and blind.

“Seventh: Public health. Whatever is necessary for the public health must be arranged. Swamps should be filled up, water should be brought in; whatever is necessary for the public health.

“If there is something left over (after these expenditures) it should be given to the Great House of Justice. And thus there will be no want in the village. The people will not remain hungry, they will not remain naked. All will be in the utmost welfare and comfort.

“Notwithstanding this, it does not mean that all are equal. It cannot be so. For this reason, the prominent ones, the rich and the poor, will all be at ease. The people of the world are like an army. It has a general, officers and privates. It cannot be possible for all to be privates or all to be officers. Each of these ranks is necessary. But all of them from the leaders to the lowest should know their duty. It is quite clear that a general cannot live like a private. For instance, the president of a republic cannot live like a working man. It would not do. This is the aim, there must be both those who direct and those who carry out the plans.”

Mr. Randall: “Would it not be a good plan to establish a Bahá’í village in America to carry out these ideas on economics so that the people could see them in action and follow their example?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Certainly. If a village is so organized the states will adopt the plan, and there will be contentment. Both the rich and the poor will be happy.”

Dr. Esslemont: “Will the Persian Government allow these villages to be organized in Persia?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The Government will not allow it. In future it will. Now it will not consent to this. The authorities do not permit it.

“If it is carried out in one village, it will be adopted in other places. If this is carried out it will be very good, but now each one is thinking of his own interest. That is why there is so much conflict. This must not be. If this system becomes established, then justice will prevail and there will be no war. In America I said to the Socialists: ‘These plans which you have will lead to no results. Suppose you take the property of the rich, what will you do after one year? All of you will be in need and will die from starvation. But it cannot be so for neither you nor the rich will be at rest.’ This question of strikes can only be solved through the Religion of God. In Egypt the labourer gets an increase of thirty per cent. Next year they will want more. They will strike. Then it will be doubled. Again they will not be satisfied. Finally they will say they want to be partners. Then both the capitalists and the labourers come to a standstill and affairs will be topsy-turvy.”

THE CAPTIVITY OF NATURE

Luncheon 18 November 1919

Luncheon was always the midday of spiritual joy and warmth, for during that hour we seemed to be in the household of the Master’s thoughts and in the freedom of His Presence. We watched for his entrance through the gateway, frequently with flowers in his hands and his cheery welcome: “Good morning—how are you!?”

Today He seemed unusually happy and his wonderful eyes embraced us with their light. We told Him of our stay in Paris and of the friends there. Whenever the Cause is mentioned the Master seems to become its living centre, its radiant light. ‘Very good, very good. I want you to stop in Paris on your return. I want you to illumine Paris. The first thing to do is to gather the friends together in Paris, and with these gathered, encourage them to start meetings. Every evening in Paris they should meet and discuss means for teaching the Cause.”

[Picture: The Group of Western Pilgrims.]

We also spoke of the Chinese and Japanese we had met on the steamer “Lapland” and of our talks with them. “Try to meet them again on your return,” He replied, “especially the Japanese newspaper correspondent, and encourage him to come here and visit me on his return to Japan.

“If a delegation of Bahá’ís should go to Japan they will do splendid work, because the Japanese think their own religion is out of date. Even the Mikado realized their religion was out of date, and so he invited representatives from the different religions to Tokyo; from the Moslems, Christians and the Jews. But he did not like what their representatives presented. He intended to select one of the existing religions and promulgate it, but he cared for none of them. I was living at that time in ‘Akká under very severe restrictions and it was impossible for me to send a Bahá’í there. He would have done splendid work. They have eight million gods (laughingly). Ask Fugeta, he knows. Although he left there when he was young he is well aware of the condition.

“The conversation of the Japanese on religious subjects attracts the masses of the people. For example, they worship the sun. They say that all the contingent beings are in need of the sun. Without the sun nothing can exist, neither in the animal world, the vegetable [n]or the mineral world. Their existence is entirely due to the heat and light of the sun. So they have to worship that great luminous body. This appeals to the mass of the people. While in reality the sun with all its glory is nothing but a captive to nature. It has no will power, no intelligence. It cannot deviate a hair’s breadth from nature. It cannot control its own movement. It cannot even help from giving forth its rays. It is just the same as the other planets. How numerous are the fish in the sea, the jewels and the corals also! They likewise are captive in the hands of nature.

“So all the contingent beings, except man, are captive to nature. Man, however, has a will and acts in accordance with its direction. He discovers the reality of all things, while the sun is unaware of its own presence. Now man interferes with the laws of nature. He wrests the sword from the hand of nature and then strikes it.

“Man is a human soul and like the other animals should act according to the laws of nature. He should always live on the earth, he has no wings, no membranes such as the fish have. But he becomes a bird and flies through the air. He becomes a fish and swims over the ocean. This is contrary to the laws of nature. So it is with all his other achievements. Man’s achievements prove he is not subject to nature. His reason gives him power over nature.

“Nature lacks reason, will power. It cannot discover its own secrets; it cannot foresee the future; it cannot remember the past; it cannot make heavenly discoveries; it cannot communicate with the East and the West in one minute; it cannot imprison the voice in a machine, and so on. This proves that the soul of man is above nature. This sun, with all its light, is a captive, it has no will power, but the spirit of man is above the sun. What is light anyway? A phenomenon, and if light is a standard for greatness, the glow-worm and benzene are preferable to man.

“Man’s body is overcome by the power of animals, such as the lion, leopard, wolf, snake; but with his spirit it is different. Then he has the upper hand. He can imprison them. The African boa-constrictor can be controlled by man and he takes the wild leopard and tames it to be as meek as a lamb.

“So it is evident that man has a spirit which is above other beings. That power can discover the mysteries of nature, the earth and the heavens. It can be in the East and organize vast enterprises in the West. These prove that in man there is a power greater than nature.”

Turning to Margaret, who was busy trying to peel some dates, the Master said: “Dates are good for digestion and create heat,” calling her his daughter, saying, “She is frank, her heart is pure.” He gave her the name “Bahíyyih”, an Arabic name meaning “full of light”, saying it was the feminine of Bahá, the name of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sister, known as the Greatest Holy Leaf.

PROPHECIES

The Evening Meal 18 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The Blessed Beauty has gathered the East and West together. For this reason we are very happy. It is not in fun, but is a serious matter. It is beyond comprehension. From the beginning of time to the present day such an event has never happened, that the hearts of the East and West should be united. There should be no differences between them.”

Margaret Randall told of the establishment of a Bahá’í Junior Magazine and asked for a name for it. The Master was told who had charge of it, and His face lighted up with a beautiful smile as He said: “The name is The Magazine of the Children of the Kingdom. Who writes it? This (name) is suitable for it.

“The Bahá’í children are more learned than the former wise men. His honour Ibn Abhá had two children. They came here. In reality it was apparent they were born Bahá’ís. They used to sit in the meetings and chant the prayers of the Blessed Beauty in the utmost sweetness. The brother of Mírzá ‘Azíz’u’lláh Khán Wargha, Rúḥu’lláh, was twelve years old. He used to sit and talk with the greatest eloquence. He would explain with proofs and arguments. At the age of twelve he was martyred with his father. He did not flinch at all. He had no wavering and no fear. One day Rúḥu’lláh came to me and said: ‘I have done wrong. Before they come and complain of me, I have come to confess.’ I said: ‘What have you done?’ He said: ‘I gave a slap to a child.’ ‘Why did you slap him?" He replied: 'He came and bothered me so much I became vexed. From the excess of anger I struck him. No doubt he will come and complain. Before he comes I have come to tell you. Have him come and give me a slap so that it will be atoned.'

Mr. Randall asked if the Master would speak on the fulfilment of Bahá'u'lláh's prophecies, the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá in general.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "There are many, very many. Some of them are explained in the book, Some Answered Questions. Refer to it. For instance, in the Old Testament the time is recorded as forty-two months. Again in the Old Testament it says each day is one year. Forty-two months are twelve hundred sixty days. This is evident and clear. It says forty-two months and also in several places it says each day is equal to one year. This date is the time appointed for the Promised One. According to eastern reckoning in the year 1260, His Holiness the Báb appeared. This corresponds to the year 1844 of the Christian era. In that year in America a strange event happened. On that night certain people left the city and waited. Until morning they remained outside the city waiting for the appearance of the Promised One. This is known in New York. His honour Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl has reported this in his book. It is thus recorded in the Old Testament. After the destruction of the Temple seventy weeks were to elapse before the appearance of Christ, that is, the coming of the Messiah. Seventy weeks is equal to four hundred [and] ninety days. After one year from the foundation of the Temple four hundred [and] ninety years elapsed, then Christ appeared.

In the same book there are many concerning His Holiness Muḥammad and his Imáms. There are many prophecies. For instance it is recorded that at the year 60 (AD 1844) the Promised One will appear. It was fulfilled. In the same way the late Shaykh Aḥmad and also Siyyid Kázim of Rasht and also Siyyid Muḥammad Akhlate and also Muḥyi'd-Dín have prophesied it. Briefly there are many. In the Traveller's Narrative it is mentioned that Siyyid Muḥammad is of those who gave many prophecies of the future.

"Ra and Ghayn are the two letters which both the Moslems and Jews use in reckoning. Each of these two has a numerical value. Ra is equal to two hundred and Ghayn is equal to ten hundred sixty. Add two hundred to ten hundred sixty and it becomes twelve hundred sixty. It is clear that the appearance of the Lord comes (at that time).

"There are many prophecies but we do not use them as proofs. We prove the appearance of the Blessed Beauty in other ways. For the sun is in no need of having others say that it exists. Is this not so? Is there need for any one to say the sun is shining? Its own appearance is sufficient. So the knowledge which appears from the Blessed Beauty is quite sufficient. He has written books. I will tell you about one of them briefly, concisely. From the beginning of the world until now, no one has established his cause while in chains. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned by two kings and was guarded by soldiers and forbidden to meet any one. Briefly, under these conditions He raised His Cause. While in prison He established His Cause. Nothing can be compared to it from the beginning of time until now.

“He has prophesied all the recent happenings. (Turning to the Allison) You come one day and I will show them to you. He wrote to Napoleon (the Third) twice, at a time when he was in the utmost power and glory; to William also, addressing him clearly He said that ‘Thou wilt fall from your station. Do not boast. Hast thou not seen what has become of Napoleon? The same will befall thee. I hear the lamentation from Berlin. Although Berlin is at present in the utmost glory, I hear her cries. I hear her crying and lamenting.’

“He addressed Ṭīhrán, when the Sháh, Násiri’d-Dín, was in the utmost glory. He said: ‘O land of Ṭīhrán, agitation will befall thee and affairs will be upset.’

“Then He addressed Constantinople when the Ottoman Empire was in the utmost glory. He said: ‘O thou city between the two seas. Thy reign is that of the oppressor. Soon it will reach such a state that lamentation of the mass and women and children will reach to heaven.’ What He has said about the Ottoman Empire has come to pass. He said: ‘This ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd is an owl, and an owl does not live in a house.’ He foretold the end of ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd. Bahá’u’lláh was in the prison of ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd. While He was in his prison at such a time He made great addresses.

“He was like a king addressing his servants. The imprisonment of the Blessed Beauty was not like that of others. There were many officials who came there. The Governor of ‘Akká had tried for five years to receive an audience in His Holy Presence. He did not grant it. Every one knew this. While in prison He was in the utmost glory but all were humble (before Him). ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd had issued a firman (order) that the Blessed Beauty be not allowed to leave his room. Soldiers were on guard. If I should have gone there, they would not let me enter. Nevertheless the tent of the Blessed Beauty was pitched on Mount Carmel. Throngs of Bahá’ís used to come outside the city of ‘Akká to visit.

There were always sixty or seventy of the Bahá’í pilgrims there. No one would dare to speak. If you also were there, you would have been astonished.

[Picture: ‘The Barracks.]

“The aide of the Governor of Yemen, ‘Azíz Páshá, was on the steamer and sent a message to me: ‘Come, I want to see you.’ I went. He asked me: ‘Whose pavilion is this? It is visible from afar. It has no equal.’ I said: ‘This was the pavilion of Bahá’u’lláh, the tent of Bahá’u’lláh. This was the imprisonment.’ He said: ‘Is this the imprisonment of Bahá’u’lláh!’

“When we first entered the barracks it was very difficult. All were imprisoned in the barracks. No one was allowed to come out. Even when I wanted to go to the baths they would not let me. Tablets were revealed at that time which are still preserved, telling the Bahá’ís not to grieve, ‘for ere long these doors will be open and My Tent will be pitched outside the walls.’ For two years it was very difficult. After two years we left the barracks. In the ninth 'year the Blessed Beauty left the city. He remained all the time outside 'Akká. Every now and then He used to visit 'Akká.

"We were all ordered to be imprisoned forever. All of us were to be imprisoned eternally. When we came here (Haifa) the governor sent for me and said, 'It is a firman of the Sultán that you should not leave the barracks.' He ordered the firman to be brought to him and it was read. It was written, 'Everlasting imprisonment.' I said: 'This is a lie. It has no truth.' The governor was surprised, exclaiming: 'This is the firman of the Sultán!' I replied: 'I cannot remain forever in this world. 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd cannot remain forever either. I will not remain in the world so that I may be forever in prison. It is certain that a day will come when I shall die and I shall be freed from this prison. Therefore this is a lie.'"

Mr. Randall: "What date was referred to in the Book of Daniel: 'Blessed is he who comes to the thousand, three hundred and thirty and five days?'"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "This date is reckoned according to solar time. From the declaration of Muḥammad thirteen hundred thirty-five years will pass according to solar reckoning. There will be a very blessed Cause at that time, this is reckoning from the Hijrah. Three or four years before 1917 the Jews interpreted it to mean the year 1917. They reckoned it according to lunar time. Now this reckoning according to lunar time is thirteen hundred and five years. Three years ago they were expectant. They wrote everywhere that the Messiah will appear. The Rabbis of the Holy Land wrote everywhere. Even a Persian Jew came to me. He said: 'In the year 1335 the Messiah will appear. It is certain. All the Rabbis are agreed upon it.' I said: 'Your Promised One was Christ. He came nineteen hundred years ago.' He said: 'He has not come. He must come in 1917.' I said: 'If He does not come, what then?' He replied: 'Strike me one hundred times with a stick.' In the beginning of the year (1917) I sent for him. He said: 'Wait until the end of the year.' The end of the year came and I sent for him again. He did not come. I sent for him several times, but he did not come. His name was Ishmael. He was a physician here, an oculist. No matter what I did he remained away until the poor fellow died."

Dr. Esslemont: "What are we to expect at the end of 1335? What shall we see?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Thank God you are still young. Universal Peace will be established; the Oneness of the World of Humanity will be established. No war will remain. The Teachings of God will be promulgated. One language will be adopted and spread. Misunderstandings will pass away and it will be very good."

Mr. Randall: "Will the geography of the world be the same then as it is now?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "There will be changes. There are places which are conclusively proved to have once been the sea. This has been caused by the great cataclysms of the universe. For example, the Himalaya Mountains are about nine thousand meters high. It is one of the highest mountain ranges. On the summit there are many crustacean remains of the sea. They are innumerable. For instance the skeleton of sponges. Alkali is found there. So much is there, that it is impossible for it to have been transported. This shows that this was once the bottom of the ocean. On the island of Source in the Mediterranean Sea there was a great earthquake. It began to boil over and became a large island. Then it solidified. First it was liquid, then it solidified. It became a green stone. Then it gradually crumbled. Therefore the geography of the earth will not remain in one condition.

“There was a very large lake in Persia. It was very large. It completely disappeared and became stone. In a thousand or two thousand years time, it may boil again. Therefore the geography would change. It is natural.”

Mr. Latimer: “Will this change be sudden or gradual?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It will be gradual. Even the geologists say that America and Asia were once joined together. Now they are separated. This was, not so at first. These changes are accidental. Asia was joined in the north to America. The geologists are agreed upon this. Then the separation came.”

Dr. Esslemont: “A man from Aberdeen travelled from Búshihr to Shíráz in two days by auto.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Now automobiles run there from Búshihr to Shíráz. This century is very great. Many of the mysteries of existence will become manifest. Great inventions will appear and great discoveries will be made.”

A MESSAGE TO AMERICA

Luncheon 19 November 1919

Today the Master said that although He was very tired, his great love for us made Him feel that He always wished to be with us. The Master had arisen at midnight and corrected Tablets for four hours. In spite of his fatigue, however, He joked continually with Bahíyyih and Fugeta, causing several outbursts of laughter in which He joined most heartily.

During the course of the meal, Mr. Randall told Him about Grace and Harlan Ober’s little son Ronald. The Master was greatly interested and upon Mr. Randall’s request said: “Give to him the name ‘Azíz’ meaning ‘dear.’ It is from the Arabic.” Mr. Hathaway then asked for a name for his daughter Dorothy, saying that she was very full of light. The Master said: “I will give her a name from the Persian, ‘Mahpareh’. This is made from two words, ‘mah’ meaning moon and ‘pareh’ meaning portion. The translation is ‘a portion of the moon’.”

Mr. Randall: “Will the Divine Tablets brought by Aḥmad Sohrab and presented at the Convention in New York last spring be preserved in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár or delivered to the different regions to which they are addressed? They are now in our possession in a safety deposit vault in New York City.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “For the present it is better to keep all the documents in the safety deposit vault in New York. Then later you may put all of them in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár. Hang them on the walls, not in a safe.”

Mr. Latimer: “On our return the first question the friends will ask is, “When will the Master return to America?””

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “We will see what God wants. If America becomes illumined, its illumination, like a magnet, will draw me there. If America will become the America I want it to become, I will surely come and I will go to all parts, to every state.”

At this juncture we were served a Turkish dish, a delicious fritter dipped in honey, called “mouthful of the judge”. The Master then told the following story:

“The Turks are fond of eating. In this respect they are like the monks for they like to eat very much. The judges are very fond of this dish. Once upon a time two men had a quarrel over a piece of land. It was a dispute over the boundary line. One of them invited the judge to his home for dinner. Afterwards the judge departed and changed the boundary line, taking a piece of land from the other. When the other one found this out, he invited the judge to his house for dinner and served him this dish. When the judge had eaten this delicious dish he went back, and as he had given the former man ten metres, he now reversed the boundary line and gave to the second one twenty metres, because the former had only served him eggs. When he was asked by this man, ‘Why did you give me ten metres and then take twenty metres from me?’ the judge replied: ‘The first line was based upon the egg, but this one was based upon the mouthful of the judge.’ So this dish received its name.”

Dr. Esslemont spoke of the passage in the Mysterious Forces of Civilization where it says that if one of the states afterward broke any article of the International Tribunal all the nations would rise up and exterminate it.

“What is meant by this passage?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “By this passage is meant that all the governments should, combine to overthrow and change an unjust government; and not the extermination of the people.”

Mr. Latimer: “Did ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dictate or write the Mysterious Forces?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I dictated it.”

Mr. Latimer then asked concerning the authorship and authenticity of the Traveller’s Narrative.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The one who wrote the Narrative (not the Notes) received most of his material from me.”

Dr. Esslemont referred to the passage in the Mysterious Forces where it says that men who serve the House of Justice should receive their recompense from their private income. "Does this mean they should not receive any salary?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "It means they should not be bribed. There is no objection to their receiving a salary. When this book was written there was a great deal of bribery in Persia."

For our dessert we had some pine-fruit which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told us was considered very delicious in Persia. He took one of them and broke it with his own hands and handed a portion to each of us in turn. He then left us. Our hearts were very much moved that we should be favoured with so much of his attention when the affairs of the Cause and of the world occupied so much of his time.

THE WAR

The Evening Meal 19 November 1919

Mr. Latimer asked if this last war was the war of Armageddon.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Yes. What could be greater than this war? In this war all the people of the world took part."

Mr. Vail asked if the prophecy in the next to the last chapter of Daniel, where it says the King of the North and the King of the South will fight, referred to this war.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Yes, it is so."...

Mr. Randall: "If the present League of Nations does not include all the nations of the world, would it not be better for America to remain out of it?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Certainly. She should enter when all the nations are represented. Then it would be the International Court of Arbitration."

Mr. Randall: "Does not the dream in the last chapter of Daniel of the three persons clothed in white linen who stood on each bank and one on the waters of the river refer to this Revelation?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Yes. I have explained this in the book Some Answered Questions. Refer to it. It will become clear.

"The Blessed Beauty has freed us from all these quarrels and calamities, and has made us to be at peace with all nations and peoples. He left no room for quarrels."

Mr. Latimer: "Was the Bábí, Áqá Muḥammad-‘Alí, who was martyred with the Báb, killed with the first volley or the second?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "With the first one he was killed. He was mutilated. But the body of His Holiness the Báb was not hit by the first discharge."

Then Mr. Latimer asked about the taking of the body of the Báb to Tīhrán.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is just as it is written in the Traveller’s Narrative. Read it in the Traveller’s Narrative. It is the same. All the other accounts are without foundation. Sulaymán Khán, the martyr, brought His Blessed Body to Tīhrán.”

THE HOUSE OF JUSTICE

Luncheon 20 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá called Luṭfu’lláh to sit with us at table, making nine for lunch. When Dr. Esslemont presented a translated letter from one of the Stuttgart friends, the Master’s face beamed as He said: “I am going to send you to Germany. You will find the friends there very enkindled. If you spend but one day there you will be most happy.” When told of the smiling faces of the German children, how they sat quietly for hours at the meetings, while our young American Bahá’ís were very restless, He remarked: “Activity is always better than rest. It is much better for the body to be active. Fu’ad, Shoghi’s little cousin, is restless all the day.”

The Master was shown the photograph of the Boston Bahá’í Unity House and a description of the house and the plan of its activities outlined to Him. He looked at the picture some minutes, then said: “Good house, beautiful.” He liked its being several stories in height and said: “Good system.” His joy was manifest as his beautiful face lighted up. He asked to keep the photograph and as He walked alone to his house after lunch, we saw Him stop in the road and again look at the picture. Then putting it under his arm, He passed through the gateway.

Mr. Latimer asked if it was not the idea for the friends to open up their homes, once in every nineteen days, for the Feasts.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “A group should come together every nineteen days. It is not optional, it is incumbent on them. In every, city they, should do this. For example, in Boston there should be a Feast by a group of friends. The purpose of the Feast is this — to enkindle the spirit of love and friendship, and that the friends should gather once every nineteen days.”

Mr. Latimer: “Should the Feasts be held on the first day of each Bahá’í month?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “No, any day. The purpose is to call a gathering and that gathering should be in the utmost love and harmony. This will promote to a great extent the spirit of love and amity.”

[Picture: “His Gate.”]

Mrs. Randall: “Should there be singing of songs as well as chanting of prayers in the meetings?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes.”

At this point cabbage was served and the Master said this was quite a German dish.

Mr. Latimer spoke of the first French prisoners he saw brought into Germany. They were served sauerkraut, but would not eat it, and so they were served it again at the next meal.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The captive is not in a mood of eating. There is a bird with a very sweet voice and it is also delicious eating. When it is captured it no longer eats and soon dies of starvation. There is a nightingale of Hama. It is not found elsewhere. It is very small, but it has a very beautiful voice. It cannot be taken to another city, but always is found there. If it is taken away it dies. They tried several times to bring this bird to ‘Akká, but it always died. It was a captive.”

Dr. Esslemont asked several questions concerning the House of Justice. The substance of the Master’s reply was:

That these Houses of Justice will not be in every village but only in the large cities, not the small ones. Each large city will have one and only that one. The surrounding villages will be under the control of this House of Justice. The national House of Justice of a country will be considered as a branch of the world House of Justice. For example, one branch in England, one in France, and so on. After a year they will all gather and elect an International House of Justice. This International House of Justice is like the present League of Nations, with one difference. The League is not representative of all the nations of the world, while the House of Justice will be. There are three stages—the local, national, and international. In the city the mass of the people elect a delegation or a committee and this committee appoints or elects the members of the local House of Justice. The members of the local Houses of Justice convene at some given place and elect directly the members of the national House of Justice, either from their own members or from others. This national House of Justice directs the affairs of the country. Then the members of the various national Houses of Justice convene and elect in the same manner the members of the International House of Justice. A uniform rule applies to all of them.

The tie that binds the House of Justice to the store-houses in the villages is that if there is any balance left in the store-house, after all its expenses are paid, it goes to the House of Justice. The House of Justice regulates the taxes. For example, in Haifa the tax rate is one-tenth. This is too much. Somewhere else it may be two-tenths, but that is not sufficient because the soil in that place may be very fertile.

Those villages around the big cities are represented by the House of Justice of that city. The village is the unit. Its wise men are chosen to administer the affairs of the village. For example, there may be a farmer who has no animals, implements or seeds, and this committee will help him. There will be universal banks and the council will borrow money from them and loan it to the people.

For instance they will borrow at three per cent and loan to the people at four per cent. The one per cent is for the expenses; and thus the village will have the storehouse.

Mr. Latimer: "Are the general storehouse and the House of Finance the same?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Yes."

Mr. Latimer: "In Mrs. Parson's Tablet it says one-third of all the treasures found or in the earth are given to the store-house, while in his talk to us the other evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said one-half. What is the distinction?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: "There may be other differences besides these. Even if one-third is given to the finder it is too much for one person. Suppose he finds gold then surely one-third is too much to give him; but if one discovers coal it is a different matter. One-third may be given to him, or one-fourth. These matters are all used as examples. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says so many sheep, or cattle, or one-tenth or two-tenths of one's income, these are merely used as examples to show the theory. These matters are determined by the House of Justice and not by the House of Finance."

"THE CAUSE OF GOD"

The Evening Meeting 20 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "In Persia every night there are several meetings in different places, held in the utmost supplication and submissiveness. The rulers of Persia, Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháh and Muḥammad Sháh, thought they could uproot this Cause. Such was their imagination. Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháh thought he could annihilate it, like Nero, the Roman Emperor. No matter how they strove to extinguish this Light, it became brighter. They all disappeared while the banner of God was hoisted.

"Some of the relatives of Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháh claimed to be believers. Among them are his daughter and granddaughters. His daughter wanted to come here, but I sent her a wire not to come. It is strange that they have experienced this many times.

"When Christ appeared, all the powers tried to uproot His Cause. The governor as well as the people. Twelve times they were massacred. Most of the Christians were killed. Notwithstanding this, it continued to spread. Many people were killed, many houses were destroyed, people were imprisoned, but in spite of all this it spread.

"In France, Louis strove much. He killed many. He deported many from his country.

Then he began to realize that he had failed to uproot the Cause of Christ. At last he began to realize that he should uplift it. Then he summoned his ministers and consulted them. He said: 'I see that our future is very bad. The more I try to extinguish this Light the brighter it becomes. I think this Flag of Christ will bring down our flag. Therefore before our flag comes down, let us yield to it.' They laughed at this. They were not thinking of the future. They were the embodiment of prejudice. It will be a cause of destruction. He quitted them. Then he sent for a Christian who was influential and trustworthy. He said: 'I have repented. I want to be under the Banner of Christ. I want to become a Christian. What shall I do?' He replied: 'Empty one of these temples, throw out all the idols, remodel it, raise up a bell and proclaim that on Sunday you will go to church for the proclamation of the Cause of Christ.'

"On Sunday, with his robes and all his ministers and all his family, he drove in state to the church, with dignity and glory. He entered and took off his hat. He asked a Christian to pray. All of them prayed. Then he came out and proclaimed that his religion was the religion of Christ.

"Now they have experienced this. Notwithstanding this fact, they are obstinate. Ignorance caused them to oppose.

"So also in the time of Muḥammad, for thirteen years they killed, pillaged, destroyed houses. Then He left for Medina. All the tribes and sects were against Him, and they went to Medina to destroy Him. God sent discord among them so that they could not do this. Ultimately it was uplifted. It dominated all sects and races. All had become believers. Now again they have experienced this and have seen what the result would be.

"Again the Persians did the same thing. They shed so much blood and later Nāṣiri'd-Dīn Sháh regretted it, but he was killed.

"Moses came. He advised Pharaoh and all the people. They did not pay attention. After the lapse of some time they realized they were at fault. Later Christ came. He led them, advised them and was exceedingly kind to them. They said, 'It is not true.' After some time they found out they had been mistaken.

"Then His Holiness Muḥammad came. He guided them, supplicating and praying. He said: 'Consider the bygone nations. They finally regretted. You must not do the same.' They did not listen and at last they found they were mistaken.

"The same is true now. His Holiness the Báb said: 'Do not resist so much.' They did not listen.

"Then His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh came. He gave so much advice, wrote so many Tablets and guided so many. Still they said: 'It is not true.' Now some have already found they were mistaken. Had they not opposed, it would have been better.

"Now see what influence it has produced, and how the Cause of God has brought us together, we who have been scattered. Our feelings were different, our opinions different. We were in the utmost enmity with each other. Now it has gathered us in the utmost love and friendship; in the utmost humility and submissiveness, like one family, better than a family. Never has such a love been aroused.”

“YE MUST BECOME AS LITTLE CHILDREN”

The Evening Meal 20 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I remember the meetings, gatherings and churches which we attended in America. All the Bahá’ís here are very happy about your coming here. They are very happy.”

Mr. Randall remarked it was one of our great joys to be here to meet them.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The condition of man is pure at two stages of his life. One at childhood and one at the attainment of greatest wisdom. At childhood his heart is very simple. On that account he is loved, but the purity is from his weakness of will. When he reaches to the utmost wisdom, then again he is pure. But then that is on account of his supreme will power. If he is educated, his morals progress toward the world of perfection. The child has no worries, cares for nothing, but this is due to his weakness. He does not seek honour, he does not seek wealth, and so on. This is due to the weakness of his will power. When he reaches the stage of utmost wisdom, again he will have no cares. He is free from limitations. This is due to excessive power, the Power of God; for he has tried it and experienced it and has seen the unimportance of worldly matters, the same as the child has. This is what Christ says: ‘Ye must become as little children.’ ”

During the course of the meal ‘Abdu’l-Bahá noticed that Bahíyyih was eating only sparingly of the delicious Persian rice, and He said: “Rice, you do not like it? Rice is good, eat it. Perhaps you will not like the next course.” Then a large dish of beans was brought. The Master saw that Bahíyyih did not eat and He began to laugh, saying: “I will tell you a funny story. Referring to Margaret, I said, ‘Eat some beans.’ She did not.

“When I was in Paris, a wealthy man invited me to a restaurant to have dinner. For his sake I went. For each person’s meal they charged one pound. We sat at table. On the bill of fare was a statement saying: ‘Do not eat the first courses. The last one is the best.’ This person was a Syrian. I began to eat, but he did not. I repeatedly urged him to eat, but he said: ‘No.’ At the end of the dinner they brought a course which we could not eat at all. The Syrian tasted it and then left it. He became very disappointed. He said: ‘I have eaten nothing. Bring me some food.’ The waiter said: ‘I cannot, it is against the rule.’ It was very hard for him. He remained hungry and it had cost him a pound. (Laughing heartily.)

“In the same way that we are gathered here in the utmost love and friendship,

I hope that, God willing, we will meet in the Kingdom of Abhá. The essential gathering is there. That gathering is everlasting. There is no separation therein. This is our hope.”

Mr. Latimer remarked that some doctors claim that the minerals of the fruits are next to the skin and that when we peel fruit we lose the best part of it.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “There is a substance in the skin of the fruit which aids digestion. For instance in the skin of the grape there is an element which helps in digesting the grape. Of course the skin is hard, the same as with this date.

“Ishmael invited me to a meal. He had one special table and a general one. At the special table five were seated. Ishmael, myself and three others. At first a bowl of chicken broth was brought. It had been left till it was cold. It was like jelly. He took a bowl and said: ‘You must eat it with a spoon, thus. I will eat it with a spoon.’ Then roasted meat was brought. It was very good. The broth also was very delicious. Then vegetables were brought; after the vegetables, jellies. After these they brought pilau. In reality it was very delicious. He said: ‘I have brought a French cook to whom I give a hundred pounds a month. These dishes were prepared by him.’”

At the end of a many-course dinner, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá apologized for the simplicity of his meals, saying that perhaps we were accustomed to and preferred such European dishes to the plain Persian food. We felt sure that He who knows the hearts realized that material food meant little to us at this time.

A MESSAGE TO THE JEWS

Luncheon 21 November 1919

Shortly after breakfast, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá suddenly appeared in the doorway. He had heard that Dr. Esslemont, having had a relapse, was confined to his bed, and in tender solicitude had come to see him. With words of cheer He left him, saying that as He had suffered a great deal at Haifa, the Doctor was receiving a similar bounty by suffering a little. Gladly would we all have been sick for the blessing of a similar visit.

When He returned for lunch, the Master was in radiant spirits, recounting to us several amazing stories bringing out the humility and greatness of Christ.

Mr. Latimer spoke of the attraction of a number of Rabbis to the Cause and that the Message had been given in a number of Synagogues, but apparently their interest had waned.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Its influence still remains and it will flame up. All of you, your major work is service and giving the Message.”

The Master gave a vivid reproduction of his talk to the Jews, in substance:

“In one of the American cities I was invited by the Jews to speak. As they had strong enmity, it was now the time to prove the validity of Christ. The Jewish Rabbi came to me and protested that I had spoken in churches, so why not speak in a Synagogue. I told him: ‘Maybe you will find my talk against your ideas. If so will you stamp and whistle?’ He assured me they would make no disturbance. I replied: ‘You may do whatever you like at the end of the service, but do not disturb me until I finish speaking.’

“Then I spoke extensively on their history. After preparing them in detail with their own history, I told them that Christ did not appear when they were in manifest glory. Had they followed Christ they would have become the beloved of all regions. But they did not follow Christ, except some of the members who were very poor. Some were fishermen. The Jews did not follow, but Christ established His Cause and the lowly ones became great, such as Peter, John, Paul and so on. See to what glory they have attained, and how they are worshipped. And, being Jews, they have glorified you. But you have denied them and brought shame upon yourselves. The fishermen did not act in this way. If you had followed in their footsteps you would have attained eternal glory.

“O ye Jews, ye believe that Christ was the enemy of Moses. That He has destroyed his edifice, abrogated his law and changed his regulations. If that is the case we shall leave Christ also, because Christ has admitted He is a man of God, a prophet of God, the Bible is a divine book and the Mosaic law is divine. For Him to believe He is a prophet and is divine and at the same time be his enemy, this cannot be so.

“We should investigate the truth. Refer to history. You have striven for eleven hundred years. Have you caused the name of Moses to reach Constantinople? If you mention the name there, they say they have never heard of it. The Bible had not reached Damascus. But Christ spread the Bible all over the world and had it translated two hundred times. Can you find a single home in America without a Bible? Who did this? Had Christ not come, the name of Moses would not have reached America. Christ has proven that the Jews are the chosen of God. Only Christ has proved that Daniel, Solomon, Moses, Jeremiah, etc., were all Prophets of God.

“Is this the conduct of an enemy or a friend? You must be just. Consider to what an extent Christ has promulgated the teachings of Moses. Ask the people in America who is Moses. They will say: ‘He is a man of God, the Torah is the book of God, his law is the divine law.’ Ask them: ‘Who is Aaron?’ They will answer: ‘A Prophet.’ So also with Solomon, David, Elijah, Jeremiah, all of these. Does this hurt Christ, this confession? No. And if you will say Christ is a Prophet of God there will be no more conflict. What harm can there be in it? For two thousand years you have been killed and dispersed only because of these two words. Had ye admitted Christ was a Prophet of God none of these things would have happened.

When I had finished one Jew got up in the audience and said: ‘Henceforth I am no longer a Jew.”’

“THE CALL”

The Evening Meeting 21 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “If I speak in Persian you do not understand. It matters not whether one speaks Persian or English. Hearts are attracted by the fragrances of God. I was just now saying there were several calls in the world. There is the call of war, there is the call of politics, there is the call of peace, there is the call of commercial interests, there is the call of the churches, there is the call of the Jews. There are innumerable calls. These calls have no effect. The call which pulsates in the heart of the world is Yá Bahá’u’l-Abhá! This is the life of the arteries, it pulsates. There are other blood vessels which are inactive. This is the call which creates activity. This is the call which gives life.”

“THE BLESSED TREE”

The Evening Meal 21 November 1919

At supper, Fu’ad and Riaz, the two three-year-old grandchildren of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, were both seated at one end of the table. their faces shining with joy and happiness for this privilege. We learned that before dinner, the Greatest Holy Leaf had told Fu’ad that as he had been there all the day, it were better for him to go home for dinner. He quickly left the room, going direct to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and complained of this. He replied with loving kindness: “Of course you can stay with me for dinner.” Immediately Fu’ad returned triumphant to the rest of the family, saying: “Now you see the Master wants me to stay with Him.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said of Margaret: “Your daughter has a sincere heart, very sincere and pure. She should have a Bahá’í education so as to develop a heavenly character and become a proficient teacher. She will become eloquent and speak in large gatherings and I will supplicate the Blessed Beauty that He may confirm her, so that she will attract many souls and speak with great power. In her time the Blessed Tree will give forth fruits. Now it has given leaves, but in her time it will bear fruit.

“If the question of violation had not occurred, now the Blessed Tree would have borne fruit. It was near its blossoming, but this delayed it. If it had not been for violation, what would have been the condition of America! They have made the people indifferent. When the Cause was ablaze, it was as though water had been poured upon it. Just the same as in the time of Christ. It has retarded the progress of His Cause, as Arius did. One million and a half souls were his followers even the Emperor at Constantinople. Arius was very eloquent. He proved the existence of something that did not exist. But the Ocean of Christ sent forth a wave and cast ashore Arius and all."

Mr. Randall remarked that he wished Bahá'í, his son, was at table with the Master's little grandson. He seemed to be so happy at the evening meal with us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "God willing, a day will come when he will be at this table. In America on your return prepare Feasts in memory of these gatherings. They will be rejoiced. In the same way as we have done. First read the prayers and the Tablets of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. Give speeches. Then give a supper and at table have interesting talks. Then your talks will bring joy and happiness, also pleasure and contentment. The encouragement to activity must be so great as to bring happiness."

Mr. Randall: "We will go back and hold these Feasts just as the Master has said."

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "I also supplicate to the Kingdom of Abhá and beg the utmost assistance and confirmation for you."

"BY THE WAY OF THE SEA"

A Day at ‘Akká 22 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said: "The first fair day you must all drive to ‘Akká. Let us hope it may be fair tomorrow."

"Some day ‘Akká and Haifa will be connected as one large city, with a long breakwater, sheltering harbour and docks, and a driveway through orange groves, skirting the sea. The ships of all nations will be seen here, commerce will thrive, and the Bay of ‘Akká will be the centre of the pilgrimage of the world; the sovereignty of world reverence.

The dawn ushered in a jewel of days, matchless in the hands of the Maker of days. Bright and early Shoghi appeared and said: "You will go to ‘Akká today." After our hasty breakfast the Master came to us, looking radiantly happy. All was in readiness—two wagons, each drawn by three horses abreast and Esfandiar in attendance, the faithful and loving coachman of the Master, as shining as the Master's horses he has so devotedly lived with and groomed for a dozen years. The Master seated us all, including in the party Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím, Fugeta, Dr. Rifat and Shoghi Effendi. Then He said: "I send you on my behalf to the Holy Shrine." There is something so vibrant in his voice that it stirs the heart—perhaps the recalling echo of a forgotten past, or the first melody of an awakening future, maybe just the gladness of this day of Promise.

Along the hard road of the mountainside, past walled terraces and groves, through the narrow and winding streets of Haifa we passed out to the beach way—the way of the sea. It is a joy to ride through the spending waves, over the firm, rippling sand, passing caravans of camels and little donkeys bearing a man's load. One feels as though he had moved back centuries into the living history of Bible times, really breathing the atmosphere of the Holy Land. It was just so two thousand years ago, perhaps more, for 'Akká like the sea has no age; there is no record of its not being.

The brilliant sunshine moved over the slopes of Carmel in the morning blues, this Mountain of God, that like a sentinel has guarded the secrets of the land of prophets, and opposite, the white domes and minarets of 'Akká looked in the distance like the silhouette of a shining city of mystery, mentioned in Muḥammadan tradition as "Blessed is he who has seen the One who is in 'Akká." We had travelled five thousand miles and before us was the city of our desire, not because it was 'Akká, but because it was the fortress city of the "most great prison" of Bahá'u'lláh, the exiled home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and the scenes of the moving spirit of the new Gospel. History in time will eagerly search, as we did, every corner and nook for the speaking presence of the little band of seventy-two exiles imprisoned here in their warring for God.

The last of these steadfast companions of Bahá'u'lláh (except 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Greatest Holy Leaf), Áqá Ḥusayn, met us at the barrack walls and conducted us through the fortress which for two years was their prison home—as remote from the world as their nearness to Heaven. Through all the narrative of scenes and incidents shines forth the splendour of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God, his sacrifice and tender service, the patient suffering, the wise Master, and through it all the joyous companion, as for two years time measured the days by the twilight of a sun-forsaken place. Such humility, reverence and love, is seen only through the sight of a heavenly illumined heart.

In the "most great prison" cell overlooking the sea, with nineteen rafters and three large cross beams, Bahá'u'lláh was confined for two years. A stone cell without bed or chair, the hard stone floor its only resting place. Here dwelt the Manifestation of God, ignored by the world and persecuted by man—the repetition of history. But God's ways are not man's ways and the Kingdom of Love, the Glory of God, silently dawned, and its light was the sign of His Coming. Surely the Kingdom of Heaven cometh not by observation.

By a little barred window, Bahá'u'lláh used to stand and show himself to hundreds of pilgrims a mile away. These devoted followers, who left family and home in far-away Persia, crossed sand deserts on foot in the weltering sun with scanty food, for just one look of recognition, one hand wave of acknowledgement from "Him whom God would manifest".

Denied His Presence they wept in joy to be even thus near the Blessed Beauty. They knew The Presence, these disciples of the Cause of World Unity, and that the Most Great Peace will shine forth when the brooding veil is lifted.

But to continue on our way, we passed into another similar room in which thirteen members of the household lived, and adjoining, the room which the Purest Branch occupied, the brother of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He died in this room, and Bahá’u’lláh granted his last request—that the doors of communication with the outside world should be opened. Truly the narrative of this exiled life is one of foot sores and chain marks, of prison life made tortuous with vermin and sickening food, and yet these very walls echoed with the chants of praise and glory to God.

Emerging again into the sunlight, we proceeded to the flowering Riḍván, a mile or so away, the garden of Bahá’u’lláh in later years. The Riḍván is a little Emerald Isle, and one crosses the small river that separates it and seems to run through it. The trees were brilliant with oranges and lemons, the tall date palms reared over all, with great clusters of ripe dates, striking red pomegranates appeared through the foliage, and although not in flower season, many beautiful flowers were still blooming. The seasons overlap here, and linger while winter passes by and spring hastens. In some corner it is always summer and fruit yielding. In the midst of the garden there are two giant mulberry trees beneath which Bahá’u’lláh loved to sit, and many of His Tablets were revealed here, Tablets that bring the breath of a new age—“Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit,” saith the Lord.

Down the garden walk we reached the little house which Bahá’u’lláh occupied. One views with strange emotions the sacred room, furnished just as He left it; one can hardly realize that here one stands in the same plain room wherein dwelt the Temple of the Glory of God. The chair, the bed, tea urn and table, the most simple of needs for the Ruler of All Things; but in all this pilgrimage one finds no earthly treasure. The world in time will lavish its wealth to adorn the footprints of the Spirit. Returning to the centre of the garden, under the mulberry trees lunch had been spread—pilau and fruits of all kinds from the Riḍván. The Master had provided for every comfort and need. Truly He is a lordly host.

[Picture: The Feast in the Riḍván.]

One would like to linger in this beautiful garden and sink into the atmosphere of its peace, but it is only one of the abodes of Bahá’u’lláh and now we were to go to the Bahjí Palace, visiting by the way the little Bahá’í cemetery which marks the end of the pilgrimage upon earth of the visitors of exile. Cut in the white marble stone of the Purest Branch is inscribed, “O Thou Eternal One. Thou hast returned to Thy Lord.” Verily the mystery of origin and return is here recorded. We stood by the grave of the mother of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, she of whom Isaiah spoke, “Thy Maker is thine husband”—the eye of the Prophet sees without the aid of time.

We approached the Bahjí Palace where Bahá’u’lláh lived at the close of his dwelling upon earth, and where He ascended in 1892. Through the opening of an iron door, the entrance to the Palace, stood a little donkey with head and neck protruding out. He seemed all eyes and ears as evidently he watched our coming. It was an unusual host to welcome us, but we did not enter as the Bahjí is occupied. We strolled on to the house adjoining the Blessed Tomb, which is sometimes occupied by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; and there amid the flowers, tea was served and our thoughts were tranquillized for the realization of the day’s purpose: “I send you on my behalf to the Holy Shrine.”

If there is one supreme hour, like the central pearl in the necklace of time, it had now arrived, and yet one always fails to record a supreme moment—it evades words, and springs from somewhere deeper in the mystery of the heart, like a traveller in a strange land, who has not learned the language. Art and literature portray the light of the horizons, but the Centre, the Dayspring of its being, is approached in worship that eludes form.

In the raining silence of golden sunshine we entered the outer room of the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. Persian rugs of great beauty surround a central garden of choice plants and shrubs. One feels that this is not a tomb, but an enclosure of light, for the brilliant sun poured its joyous waves through the glass roof. It is the home of life and warmth, not of death, and unconsciously the love and praise of God springs from the heart. The air was sweet with the perfume of flowers that seem to know the Holy Presence. It is the communion place of the spirit and “His resting place shall be glorious”, as the Prophet Isaiah foresaw. In soft and sweetest cadence Shoghi Effendi chanted the Tablet of Visitation.

[Picture: The Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh.]

We knelt at the Holy Shrine, an enclosure at the side, plain and unadorned save for the beautiful rugs and lamps that mark the Tomb. Our hearts turned to the Heart of Him from which love is born and our prayers rest in the Hands of His Power.

Back by the way of the sea in the setting sun, we returned to Haifa to find the Master standing at our gateway to welcome us back:

“Have you had a happy day.”

INSIGHT

The Evening Meal 22 November 1919

We were all gathered as usual at the home of the Master, but the evening meal was delayed, we knew not why, past eight o’clock, and just before dinner in walked Colonel and Mrs. Allison, returned from Damascus. Soon the Master appeared in the doorway and with hands extended: “Welcome, very welcome, Colonel and Mrs. Allison.” Had the Master watched from afar their coming? How their faces lighted up. He seated them near Him and spoke to the Colonel about Damascus.

Colonel Allison told about the disturbance of the Syrians in Damascus.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “This is childish play. They did these things so that the English would not evacuate.... You did not pass the time badly today?” (referring to our trip to Bahjí).

Mrs. Randall: “The Master knows how our hearts feel, and it was one of the happiest days of our life.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Whatever is on the earth will be forgotten, but Bahá’u’lláh will never be forgotten. I ask God that these gatherings of ours also will not be forgotten.”

Mr. Vail said he had just received a letter from Mrs. True saying the friends in Egypt told her Bahá’u’lláh did not land at Alexandria.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It was on his way to ‘Akká. He Himself did not land but we all went ashore. Those who were taking care of us were quite sure we would not escape. We went and looked around.”

Mr. Randall: “When and where was the Hidden Words revealed and why was it called hidden?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “At first it was concealed. It was not circulated. It was revealed at Baghdád towards the end of our stay there. It was not given to any one. There were not more than two or three copies of it. It was at a time when all the enemies were attacking us. The Sháh of Persia was oppressing, and the Ottoman Government was also oppressing us. At such a time they were revealed.”

After the Master had asked what they had seen in Damascus, Colonel Allison told of the place where St. Paul had received his sight after he had become blind.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “What is recorded in the Bible is this, that Paul was in the wilderness. He heard a voice. The voice he heard was ‘Why are you persecuting me so much?’ Somewhere else it is recorded: ‘We were in the wilderness and I became awakened.’ Then he changed and acted in a manner opposite to his former actions. That is, he was blind and had no insight. It was here that he received his insight. This physical sight will in the end become blind, but when the inner sight is obtained, it will not become blind. The important is not physical sight, it is the insight, for the physical sight is not the cause of guidance, but it is the inner sight.”

Colonel Allison: “The Americans are doing good refugee work there.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The Americans do a lot of work indeed. Everywhere, even in Persia. It is right to do so.”

Mr. Latimer: “Will the Kitáb-i-Aqdas be amplified by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, before it is published in English?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “No. If some one asks for an explanation, it will be given. The explanations are clear in the Book of Aqdas. Except in a few places, it is very clear. It is quite easy for any one to understand it. It is not like the Qur’án. The Qur’án is High Arabic (very difficult). This is very clear. It has no complications. All of it is clear.”

Mr. Randall: “We have no complete translation of it in America.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Nothing has been translated well, for they have been translated by individuals. A person is needed who is well versed in Persian, Arabic and English. Then it will become good. A single individual cannot do it satisfactorily. Among those which are translated, the translation of the Íqán is not bad. It is fair to a certain extent. In future a committee will be formed. They will translate. The Bible is translated into Arabic, but it is not a good translation. The one translated by Van Dyck is better for he has done it with some others. It is better. But in reality it is not a good translation. If a person knows Hebrew, he will know how different it is. Now also the Writings of the Blessed Beauty cannot be translated. No matter how it is translated it cannot be like the original. The original is quite different. It is in the utmost eloquence and beauty. It is so marvelous that no one is able to produce the like. It is so eloquent, so complete. In Persian and Arabic it is extraordinary. All is written in a new style. No one has ever written in such a style. What difference there is between the many translations of the Bible and the original. In Persian the Writings (of Bahá’u’lláh) are in the utmost beauty but not the translations...

“For instance there is a text in the Bible that says, ‘I am the bread of heaven.’ In Persian this expression is very exquisite, but not in the translation. This is the word which Christ himself spoke. It is very exquisite, but when read in Arabic it is not so. Those words which come from the Blessed Lips have a different power. God willing, your children (turning to Mr. Randall) will learn Persian and they will understand how beautiful they are.

“If a person learns Persian now it will not be like Greek, French or Italian. From it great results will come. After ten or twenty years the European who knows Persian will become famous throughout the world, because of his translations. They will have great beauty.”

Mr. Randall: “We hope to get a better translation of the Súriy-i-Haykal.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It needs a translator like the one (Fitzgerald) who translated Omar Khayyám. If there be such a translator then let him translate it. This person has indeed translated Omar Khayyám well. It has become much better than the poems of Khayyám. Very much better. It cannot be compared to the poems of Khayyám. All of it is in praise of wine. But in reality this translator has elevated it. That is why it has become so famous in Europe. They think there is no poet equal to Omar Khayyám in Persia. But in Persia he has no importance. What a difference there is between him and Sa’dí (the didactic poet), and between him and Ḥáfiz (the lyric poet).”

Mr. Randall: "Will this committee on translation in America be appointed by the Master or should we use our own initiative?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "But they themselves ought to select them for translation. Those who know several languages, well versed in languages, literature and in science."

MEETINGS

Luncheon 23 November 1919

Today the Master came, carrying in his hand a handkerchief filled with jasmine blossoms, which are brought down each morning to Him from the garden of the Tomb of the Báb. He sprinkled these flowers on the table cloth and then seated us at the table.

Mr. Latimer asked whether the local Houses of Justice would be in each city or one in each state, whether the International House of Justice would be elected directly or indirectly, and whether ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would appoint the House of Justice.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Each state, for instance New York, will have one House of Justice. The cities (of that state) will be under that House of Justice.

The nations will choose directly the International House of Justice and everything will be in its hands. For instance, Syria will have a House of justice. The people will elect it. Then this House of Justice of Syria [as a state under the Turkish Empire] will elect the House of Justice of Constantinople. Then Constantinople, London, Paris, Washington and so on will elect the International House of Justice."

The Master said He would not appoint the House of Justice. It would be constituted after Him.

Mr. Vail asked for any suggestions as to the meetings in Chicago.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Each one of the friends should try to guide one soul. Those who are worthy; not the persons who enter the Cause and bring degradation to it.... The people who are pure and sincere would not be the cause of degradation to it. But when a person enters the Cause and sees a gathering and tells lies, he has no faith. He is untrustworthy. This sort of people bring degradation to the Cause, but there are others who, when they become believers, are deeply attracted to it."

Mr. Vail: "Would it not be well to hold group meetings in the homes in Chicago?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Very well."

Mr. Randall: "Would this not apply to Boston and other places?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá.. "Yes. Every one should try to invite his own friends. At least he must make one Bahá’í each year."

Mr. Latimer: "Is it all right to have public, advertised meetings to which the public is invited?"

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "It is all right. They may come to the public meetings."

The greetings of several Jewish friends in America were presented and a delighted expression came over ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s face as He said: "See the Power of God, how He has united the Jew with you, such as Mírzá Luṭṭu’lláh here. In London, also, there is Yohanna Dawud. He is very good. He was a Jew. He is very good."

Mr. Latimer: "I remember some years ago Yohanna Dawud coming to our meeting in Paris. He spoke almost like an orthodox Christian, quoting the New Testament continually."

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: "Those of the Jews who become believers have much love for Christ. To the Jews we explain the reality of Christ. There was an English lady at ‘Akká. She was a missionary. She was very much against us. She was very prejudiced, that is, she had the utmost enmity. Whenever she would see a European or an American here she would commence to slander. She did this thinking perhaps she would convert them. One day there was a Jew with me, who had become a Bahá’í. We went to a shop. She was there also. Her colour flushed from excessive anger. I told her, ‘Dost thou know how much I love thee?’ She said: ‘No.’ I said: ‘As much as thou hatest me, just that much do I love thee. But if thou wishest to know how much that is, see how much hatred you have for me.’ When I said this she laughed. I said: ‘Thou hast no right to hate me for this man was a Jew and I made him believe in Christ and the Holy Spirit, the Holy Ghost. I made him believe in the Heavenly Father. If you want to know, ask him.’"

"She asked him: ‘Were you a Jew?’ He said: ‘Yes.’ ‘Are you a Christian? Do you believe in Christ?’ ‘Yes.’ Then I said: ‘Ask him, what are your reasons? What proofs have you that Christ is the Spirit of God, the Word of God? I taught him these. Ask him.’ She asked. He began to give his proofs, first asking: ‘Do you want intellectual proofs or from the Book?’ He proved the reality of Christ from the Old Testament. Then she asked for intellectual proofs. He gave her those also. She looked up and said: ‘In the name of God, this is very good. He has a very good faith, but thou wilt not let him remain a Christian. You speak to him of Bahá’u’lláh. If you do not speak of Bahá’u’lláh it is very good, but you will not leave him alone. You will make him a Bahá’í also.’"

TEACHING

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to Mr. Vail: “If people ask you about your conduct (as a Bahá’í teacher), say: ‘We do not oppose the religion of any one and we act in accordance with the Gospel. But we must also act in accordance with the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. They are—the Oneness of the World of Humanity, Independent Investigation of Truth, Abandonment of Prejudice, Universal Peace, etc. You must act in accordance with these Teachings.

“Spread the Message, but you must do it with wisdom. Do not speak at first so as to amaze and bewilder the people. Speak upon topics that are suitable to the mind of your hearers, topics that do not amaze. Emphasize the Teachings as I have done when I was in America. Say, the darkness of ignorance has made gloomy the horizon of the East. Religious prejudices from one side, the darkness of racial fanaticism from another, political prejudices from another side, ignorant prejudices from another side, self-attachment and personal interests and motives—all these have made the horizons of the East darker than night. At such a time the Dawn of Guidance, His Highness the Supreme, the Báb, appeared, His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh, like unto a sun, shone forth and all this darkness was converted into light. And these lights are nothing but the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. Enumerate them all. This is the introduction. Say that to any church, gathering or audience. No audience would object to that.

A GATHERING ON “THE MOUNTAIN OF GOD”

At the Tomb of the Báb 23 November 1919

Each Sunday afternoon the pilgrims gather at the Tomb of the Báb which stands on a magnificent eminence halfway up Mount Carmel. The first Sunday the Master did not attend the meeting. The second Sunday He drove up early with Mr. Randall to have a quiet interview before the meeting began. Others of us followed later on foot. Soon we overtook Mírzá Núrí’d-Dín, the gifted scribe who engraved so beautifully the Great Teaching Tablets. “‘Tis hard,” he said, “to climb the Mountain of God but very easy to come down.” It did seem hard, the rocks rose so abruptly one above the other. But when we thought of our Beloved just above us on the mountain, wings rose beneath our feet.

A fathomless stillness surrounds the Tomb of His Highness, the Supreme Báb, the “Gate” to the City of God, the New Jerusalem of Light. One would like to rest there forever on the terrace in front of the Tomb overlooking the sea, breathing deep the silence of the Kingdom. The view from that Holy Mountain, that “Vineyard of God” is ravishingly beautiful. The city of Haifa lies below, white stone houses with red-tiled roofs, planted amid walled gardens; the great bay swings in a perfect semi — circle around to the north. ‘Akká, white, dazzlingly bright in the resplendent sunlight of that holy land, lies like a jewel on the blue sea. But the atmosphere, silent, luminous, like a living spirit, is the true garment of wonder. It is as though Elijah, Isaiah, the Christ, Muḥammad, the Blessed Beauty—the Feet of Him around Whom all names revolve”—had all left their foot-prints not only on the mountain soil of that “Garden of God”, but in the shining air and had diffused the fragrance of their holy garments over all its flowers and grass, and made even the dust reflective of a hidden and heart-subduing beauty.

As we turned and entered the great central room of the Tomb we saw engraved on the doorway the symbol of the Cause of God, two stars standing at each side of the Tree of Life. The Báb was the morning star of the Day of God on earth.

In one corner, sitting on the beautiful Persian rug that covers the floor and part of the wall, was the blessed Ḥaydar-‘Alí. How we had longed to meet him! With what wonder had we read of his years of service, his twelve years imprisonment in a dark, solitary cell, at Khartoum, his being carried in a bag head downward over the desert and singing for joy as they beat him. Now he was here before us! He embraced us with heavenly love and said. “How wonderful to be living in the day prayed for by all the prophets of God. They all wrote and dreamed of this day.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá calls him “the angel of Mount Carmel”, adding, “He walks on earth but he lives in heaven.” Some one in our circle asked the “angel of Mount Carmel” what he was doing these days. He replied: “I am preparing a book on the writings of John. I am only an ant of God, but I am trying to do about as much as an ant can do.”

When the Master entered the room, now filled with friends, Persians, Arabs, Egyptians, Americans, joy swept our hearts. Ḥaydar-‘Alí, like an eager child in the presence of the Master, tried to rise but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá prevented him. The Master in his humility does not allow any one to bow before Him or show Him special deference. Soon after, Ḥaydar-‘Alí was ill and had to leave the room. As the friends lovingly helped him out, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “He is a blessed soul. From his youth he has had no thought but the service of the Kingdom.”

Presently we all rose and followed the silent steps of the Master out and around the terrace to the holy room where the body of the Blessed Báb lies in its age-long rest. The Master stood at the door and anointed our hands with rose-water as we entered, a symbol of the new reality, brought into the world by the Holy Spirit of the Báb. We lifted the rose water to our foreheads and then bowed with our Persian brothers just inside the Threshold. The atmosphere of that holy place was marvellous. The air was vibrant with a living presence. It pressed upon us, overwhelmed us with the Power of that Light which shone through the Báb as through a gate. At the same time a peace that passeth understanding broke over us.

One by one, silently, the Persians, those pure, wonderful servants of the God who is Most Glorious, approached the inner room and dropped their heads on the shining Threshold, while Shoghi chanted impressively the Tablet of Visitation. Our hearts were aglow with the thought of the bounty of God. The very heavens seemed to open; and when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—that star that never sets, the Star of the Covenant—with sublime tenderness helped Ḥaydar-‘Alí down the centre of that room, supporting and leading him, and then with kingly majesty walked back again—the effect was indescribable.

After we left the Tomb we watched the majestic figure of the Master, with black flowing abbá, shining white turban and silver hair, finding his way down the winding stony path. The friends followed in silent love and wonder. “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace.”

ḤAYDAR-‘ALÍ

The Evening Meeting 23 November 1919

Mr. Randall remarked that we had never seen such an afternoon and such an evening.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is rare, but the moonlight nights are more wonderful. The air is clear, the moon shines so perfectly that one does not care to sleep but rather to sit up and watch it. In London it is very peculiar. First there is the darkness of the clouds, then the fog and then the smoke. Day becomes night. All is darkness.”

Mr. Vail remarked that it was a great joy to meet Ḥaydar-‘Alí today.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “He is a blessed soul. He is very detached. During his life-time he has had no attachment to this world and did not care for the means of living. He was attached to nothing. He always used to travel from city to city teaching the Cause. He was much persecuted. He never wavered nor faltered. He was very kind to the poor and helped them very much. He never thought of himself. He was content with a very small means of existence. As much as I wanted to prepare comforts for him, he would not accept. We said: ‘Thou hast become old, thou art not strong. We will prepare means of comfort. We will get a maid to care for you. We will get a house so that in every way you may be in comfort.

He did not accept. He said: ‘Let me remain in a corner of the Pilgrim House.’ It is strange, he is quite old and feeble, but his intellect is very bright. Up to [the] year before last he was writing. Now on account of extreme age, his ears do not hear. The power of hearing has lessened, but his mind and intellect are keen. He has forgotten nothing. He remembers everything.”

Mr. Latimer said the editor of some of the papers in America is agitating the “Yellow Peril”.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Is he afraid of Fugeta? Is he very much afraid of Fugeta? (Laughing) The yellow race in future will develop. It will develop much. New China has just awakened.”

Mr. Latimer: “Will the method of teaching the Chinese and Japanese be different?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Naturally, it depends upon the degree of capacity there.”

THE FUTURE OF AEROPLANES

The Evening Meal 23 November 1919

Mr. Randall asked if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would speak of the future of aeroplanes.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It will progress to such a degree that any one can travel with them. The danger will become less and less. It will be such that one wishing to travel, instead of going by carriage or automobile, he will take the aeroplane. God willing, it will be directed for good purposes. At present it is used for destructive purposes. We hoped the aeroplane would serve the world of humanity, but it has become the means of destruction for the world of humanity.”

UNIVERSAL PEACE

“All these recent inventions have become the cause of evil and loss. During this war all these inventions have become the cause of the destruction of mankind. For instance, the telegraph, aeroplane, railway, steamer, wireless, telephone, all of these. Our hope was that these would serve the world of humanity and that they would become the means of the progress of mankind, and the means of the reconstruction of the world. But what a great pity that they have been used for destruction. If there were no steamers, America would never have entered into the European affair, for it would take at least six months for her to cross the ocean. After this war we hope the world of humanity will become awakened and realize that there is no remedy save according to the Heavenly Teachings.

“If the tent of the Oneness of the World of Humanity is not pitched on this earth and Universal Peace is not established, there will be more wars. For this war has become a cause of hatred. For instance, the Germans will not forget, the Austrians will not forget, the Bulgarians will not forget, the Turks will not forget. If the banner of Universal Peace is not raised, this question of war will be more acute.

“On one side there will arise the tumult of the Socialists, from another side the storm of Bolshevism, from another the problems of labour, from another the antagonism of nations, from another religious hatred, and from another racial prejudices. It is clear what will happen. All of these are like dynamite. One day they will explode, unless the banner of Universal Peace is raised according to the Divine Teachings and the Oneness of the World of Humanity proclaimed.

“According to the Divine Teachings, the banner of Universal Peace must be raised by the power of the Word of God. The Oneness of the World of Humanity must be established by the power of the Holy Spirit. No matter how the politicians strive, it will become worse. The power of man is helpless.”

Shakh Farajullah asked: “Is the banner of Universal Peace going to be raised after this war?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Not now. This period is like the false dawn. This peace is like the false dawn. We will see what the future brings. This has not taken place yet.

“We cannot abolish war by war, for it is like cleansing blood with blood. The Divine Teachings will accomplish it, however.

“The exigencies of the world of nature are essential to it. One of the exigencies of the world of nature is war. Another of the exigencies of the world of nature is treachery. See how they are warring! Now the world of nature has no will power. Man acts according to the requirements of nature. In the world of nature there is treachery and deceit. Consider what the cat does with the mouse, and the fox does with its prey. In the world of nature there is separation, there is the struggle for existence. These are the natural tendencies. This is irresistible.

“That which saves man from the world of nature is the Power of God. It is faith. It is the Fear of God and it will make man an angel; it transforms him. From all these conditions it frees him. It acts opposite to that of nature. It breaks the sovereignty of nature and without this (power) it is not possible.

“Man escapes from the apparent laws of the government because he is afraid of the law. That is, if a person strikes another this is punishable. Then there is a secret sin; that is, because of the fear of the law and punishment, he keeps it hidden. But from the secret and hidden sin, he will not be freed, save by the Power of the Kingdom. Then, fear of punishment will not withhold him (from committing hidden sins) but it is the Fear of God which does, for he realizes that God is aware of it. Therefore both from the hidden and apparent sins, he will be freed. He will become illumined, he will become spiritual, he will become heavenly.

“Otherwise man is rapacious. He is more terrorizing than any animal. For example, a wolf tears to pieces one sheep, but man kills a thousand persons in one day. Man kills a hundred thousand, and then boasts about it. For instance, if he kills one person, he is taken and put in prison and then killed. They say he is a murderer; but if he kills a hundred thousand they cry: ‘Bravo!’ If a person is walking in the street and some one steals his hat, they say: ‘He is a thief.’ If one steals his donkey in the wilderness, they say: ‘He is a highwayman.’ But when one pillages a whole country, they say: ‘He is a conqueror.’ Therefore man becomes man only through the invisible powers, not through his apparent powers.

“When the Emperor of Russia called a meeting at the Hague, they asked me: ‘What do you think about it?’ I asked: ‘Under whose presidency is it? What do they discuss?’ ‘They discuss peace.’ Then I asked: ‘When they leave that meeting what do they do? One is a general, another is a colonel, another is a major, one is a politician, still another one is the inspecting officer. Do they not return to their professions? The general goes and prepares plans, the colonel drills his soldiers. It is just like all the innkeepers who gather together, concerning the selling of wine. They say it has a grave danger. We must do something to stop the selling of wine. But when they leave the meeting they return to their taverns. Their profession is wine selling. Do not think they are going to bring about peace; their profession is war.’ The Emperor of Russia was the generalissimo of war. He was the first one to declare war after this meeting, and he was the president. He was the president of the peace gathering, and then he was the first one to declare war.

“These nations of the world are like two cocks. These cocks fight with each other, they fight, fight, fight, until they are tired. Then they stop and make peace. After they have rested a while, they fight again. This is the real truth of the situation.”

Mr. Randall: “What will be the outcome in Russia?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The future is bad. The future will be great destruction. Nations should strive to extinguish this fire so that it would not spread to other countries. It will soon affect other countries. Soon it will affect them. For the mass of the people have a Bolshevik tendency. The mass of the people all desire to become equal with the rich, but law and order prevent them. Because the majority is with the masses, and they all desire equality with the rich, but, they are afraid of punishment. When no order prevails, it is certain they will think they are equal.”

BAHÁ’U’LLÁH

Luncheon 24 November 1919

Today Dr. Esslemont asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to speak on the life of Bahá’u’lláh at Bahjí.

[Picture: Approaching the Bahjí Palace]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Bahá’u’lláh lived in ‘Akká nine years. Two years were passed in the barracks and seven years in a house in the city. There was a mobilization at that time, toward the end of two years, and the barracks were needed for the soldiers. Then the local governor gave permission for them to be transferred to a house. When Bahá’u’lláh moved from the barracks he did not come out of the house for seven years. During our stay in the barracks it was very difficult. No one was allowed to go to the baths. Every morning four of the friends accompanied by four gendarmes would go to the market to buy provisions.

When we left the barracks we were all sent to a caravansary in the city but Bahá'u'lláh went to a house with his family. All the time He was in one room, during the seven years, but it was not on account of strict regulations. In the next room adjoining, thirteen people were living. It was even smaller than this room. A woman guest came from Persia. There was no place for her. In the room where we slept there was a high trunk and she made this her bed. At midnight she tossed and fell down. We all woke up and laughed about it until morning.

“When things were very gloomy in the barracks Bahá'u'lláh revealed some Tablets which are still preserved, saying: ‘Do not grieve. These doors will be opened and I will leave the city and go to the country.’ This caused great happiness. This was a great source of consolation to the friends.

“After nine years had elapsed, Bahá'u'lláh said one day: ‘I have not gazed at verdure or a green leaf for a long time.’ Bahá'u'lláh was very fond of verdure. He used to say: ‘The country is the world of the soul and the city the world of the body.’ From this remark I gathered that He was indirectly referring to something.

“There was a certain Páshá Muḥammad Safouat in ‘Akká. He was in the utmost enmity toward us. He had a palace three miles from ‘Akká surrounded by gardens. It was a very lovely spot with running water. I went and called on this Páshá at his home. I told his Excellency, ‘You have left the palace empty and are living in ‘Akká He replied: ‘I am an invalid and cannot leave the city. It is lonely and there is no one to associate with me.’

“When Bahá'u'lláh made this remark, I knew that He was longing to leave the city and I knew that whatever I did I should succeed. So I said: ‘While you are not living there, it is empty. Give it to us.’ The Páshá became greatly astonished at this. I rented it from the Páshá at a very low rate, five pounds a year. It was very strange. I paid him for five years and made a contract. Then I sent some labourers to repair it. I built a bath and ordered a very large carriage to be prepared.

“One day I said I will go first myself. Alone I left the city on foot. The gendarmes were on guard. They did not object. Just like that I went out. They said nothing. The following day I went to Bahjí. No one said anything. Then one day I prepared a feast and invited all the officials of those districts. From morning until evening it lasted. Then I returned.

“One day I went to His Holy Presence and said: ‘The palace is ready and also the carriage to drive you there.’ At that time there was no carriage in ‘Akká or Haifa. He replied: ‘I will not go. I am a prisoner.’ Later on I requested again. Again He refused. I went so far as to beg Him a third time. He said: ‘No.’ I did not dare to insist.

“There was a certain Muḥammadan Shaykh in ‘Akká who was very well known and influential. I called him and said: ‘This is the situation, but Bahá’u’lláh will not accept it from us.’ He loved Bahá’u’lláh, it was pure love. I said: ‘You are daring; you go to His Holy Presence and take hold of his hands and do not let go until He promises to leave the city.’ He was an Arab. He went and sat close to the knees of Bahá’u’lláh, took hold of his hands, kissed them and said: ‘My Lord, why do you not leave the city?’ He replied: ‘I am a prisoner.’ The Shaykh answered: ‘God forbid! Who has the power to make you a prisoner? You have kept yourself in prison. It was your own will to be imprisoned. Now I beseech you to come out and go to the palace. It is green. The trees are lovely. All the leaves are green, the oranges are like balls of fire.’ As often as the Blessed Beauty said, ‘I am a prisoner, it cannot be,’ the Shaykh took his blessed hands and kissed them. For one hour he did not cease. Then Bahá’u’lláh said, ‘Kheili Khoob’ (very good).

“The following day he rode in the carriage. I was also in His Holy Presence. We left the city. No one objected. We went to that green spot. I returned and left Bahá’u’lláh there. From that time on He was either there, in ‘Akká in Haifa, or at Bahjí.

“That palace is in ruins now. It was thirty-five years ago that the Páshá died. All his property was destroyed. I want to restore that palace. The Páshá’s property became wakf [property set-aside for religious purposes]. If it were not wakf I would buy it. That green spot is wakf.”

Dr. Esslemont: “Where were the Tablets to the kings revealed?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Partly in Adrianople; partly in ‘Akká

Dr. Esslemont: “Did any rulers reply besides Queen Victoria?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “No one.”

Dr. Esslemont: “What was Bahá’u’lláh’s mode of life at Bahjí?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Like the conduct of a prince. The Páshás used to come and desire to call but He would not meet

Dr. Esslemont remarked that the missionaries objected to his living in luxury compared to the humble way of Christ.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Of course the enemies will write whatever they wish. Majesty is very easy to be acquired by one, but the miracle is that being in prison, He still lived in the utmost majesty. Every prisoner is meek and oppressed, yet Bahá’u’lláh lived in the utmost majesty. Two despotic sovereigns, two powerful autocratic rulers imprisoned Him, yet He addressed them in exceedingly severe terms. Notwithstanding that He was in their prison, He was still in the utmost majesty. Such a thing has not been seen since the beginning of the world. It is a fact, known to all, that the Governor of the city, for five years, begged admittance to His Holy Presence, but He would not grant it. He was under his orders and the Governor had received a firman to confine Him closely.”

Dr. Esslemont: “Was it not true that Bahá’u’lláh had to show forth all the attributes of God, how to be both poor and rich?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes. However, He lived very simply and economically regarding his own welfare. He had no return from his property at that time. His property was confined to half the village of Adasieh [near Tiberias]. It was in ruins and yielded no revenues. Now it is restored and we get some revenues. Bahá’u’lláh owned vast properties in Persia which were confiscated; also in Baghdád, but they were taken from Him toward the end of our stay. All were sacked and confiscated by the Turkish Government.”

“‘ABBÁS”

The Evening Meal 24 November 1919

Mr. Denham appeared at the Pilgrim House about sundown. We greeted him warmly. Drawn by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s word on that first Sunday, he had changed his route, cancelled an engagement in Jerusalem and had come to Haifa to see again the wonderful, Master. He went with us to the evening meeting where the Beloved gave a marvellous address on the glory of martyrdom, the splendour of Christ’s crucifixion, the way sacrifice of pure spirits in the path of God’s Cause sends the Word of God forward conquering and to conquer—a vivid portrayal of the early days of Christianity.

[Picture: “The plain of ‘Akká is the worshipping place of God.”]

Never had we seen the Master so absolutely radiant as at dinner this night, when He described His possible martyrdom—the longing of His heart. His first words were: “The plain of ‘Akká is the worshipping place of God.” When Mr. Denham said he would like to ask why the Cause of God grows more strong through persecutions and martyrdoms, which would have a tendency ordinarily to check it, the Master’s face lighted up, His eyes sparkled, His words blazed forth as He told us the following thrilling and graphic account:

“It affects the hearts. Conquering is not impressive. Humility makes impression. See what a conqueror David was. He conquered countries, he killed all his enemies, he overcame all, but when he is mentioned it has no effect. But the humility of Christ, see what an effect it has! Or John the Baptist, when they cut off his head, see what an effect it had! Consider what an effect these have. The Emperor of Germany was banished, Bonaparte was exiled and his enemies did away with him, but when one of the Bahá’ís of God is persecuted, his persecution is his elevation. His Holiness Christ was defeated. They crucified Him. The defeat was his utmost glory. It was quite the opposite. The things that are the cause of glory in the world are considered shame in the Kingdom, and that which is humility in the world is glory in the Kingdom.

“A telegram came from Constantinople from ‘Adu’l-Ḥamíd. This was its contents: ‘Abbás, the Persian, two Europeans have come to him. They have brought dangerous papers against ‘Adu’l-Ḥamíd. He must give up those dangerous papers and he must say where those two persons are.’ I said: ‘I have not received such papers and such persons have not come to me.’ They said: ‘If he does not say where, then say two Americans have come before you.’

“‘As to the papers, such papers and such persons have not come to me. These papers are about politics. We do not interfere in the affairs of politics at all. We interfere in the affairs of the heart, in education and in morals.’ They said: ‘We have witnessed them.’ I replied: ‘Such papers have not come to me and such people have not come to me. But you want to condemn me. Whatever you want, say it. I will write it and I will sign it with my own hand without any trouble, for I have never defended myself. Say it. I will write and sign at the bottom of it. Then why do you take more trouble? You want answers with these questions to prove some fault. I, myself, confess, without trouble to you, for I have never defended myself.

“‘Nevertheless I am thankful because of this telegram. I am very thankful, for this telegram has joined me to such souls that I am rejoiced. For instance, Christ was not Christ Páshá, nor Mr. Christ, nor His Honour Christ, just simply Christ. I also am ‘Abbás. It was Moses, son of Emam, not Monsieur Moses, not Lord Moses, not Moses Páshá, not Moses Áqá. He was Moses. I also am ‘Abbás. It was Muḥammad, not Monsieur Muḥammad, not Mr. Muḥammad, just Muḥammad. I also am ‘Abbás. It was Abraham, Noah, Joseph, not Joseph Páshá. I also am just ‘Abbás. I am thankful, for God never created for me any humiliation. He has never created it. Therefore no one can humiliate me.’ What is the utmost humiliation? They may say, ‘Beat him, put him in prison, put him in chains.’ If such things happen to me it is glory for I have not committed anything that may be humiliation. This would happen because I am a Bahá’í. This is my glory.

“Humiliation would be this: ‘Take ‘Abbás. Beat him. Put chains on his neck. Bring him and hang him up, and have one regiment come and fire at him a thousand bullets.’ They shot a thousand bullets at my forerunner. This same declaration was made upon the cross. God willing, I will give the same also. There will be no greater glory than that for me. Therefore, whoever humiliates me, for the purpose of humiliation, for me that is glory. No glory is higher than this—that some day they shall hang me and fire at me a thousand bullets. Fire! Shoot! Why? They have made me walk in the footsteps of my forerunner. The object is this, in the Cause of God there is no humiliation.

“If His Holiness Christ had not been martyred, His Cause would not have become so famous. When they placed the crown of thorns on the head of Christ, and carried Him around the streets, His Holiness Christ used to see that all the sovereigns of the world were bowing before Him. All the crowns bowed before his crown of thorns. His Holiness Christ used to foresee this. This humiliation was his greatest glory. He saw this crown to be the everlasting sovereignty.”

After some general conversation, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “When Jamál Páshá came to Jerusalem he made some remarks about me. He said: ‘I will go and conquer Egypt. I will drive England out of Egypt. I will conquer all the Suez Canal. Victorious I shall return. My first command will be this, that I will hang him ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the gate of ‘Akká.’ The German Consul was in that meeting. He was an acquaintance of mine. He came and told me that Jamál Páshá had said this. Then there was also a captain who was the commander of the 12th, by the name of Zals Bey. I said: ‘Let Jamál Páshá go and conquer Egypt. Then I will give myself up. Let him conquer Egypt, I am ready.’

“Jamál Páshá went. One day, in the morning, the German Consul came to me. He said: ‘Some strange thing has happened. Jamál Páshá attacked two days ago. Today a telegram has come from Beersheba.’ This is clear. As soon as the battle began he fled. He rode in his automobile and fled and he had come to Beersheba and sent the telegram from there. He would not say: ‘I am defeated.’ I said: ‘It must be so.’

“Two or three day’s later, the German Consul came and said: ‘He (Jamál Páshá) is defeated.’ Jamál Páshá returned here. He began to twist his moustaches and said: ‘This was a reconnoitering attack. I wanted to test the strength of the enemy.’ But I understood.”

THE INHERITANCE LAW

Luncheon 25 November 1919

At luncheon the Master was in a supremely humorous mood, joking repeatedly with Fugeta. Previously He had said that Fugeta was to return to Japan on a camel or an elephant, but today He decided to send him there in an aeroplane, smiling as He said: “When I ride in one, it will be a spiritual aeroplane.”

Mr. Latimer asked whether in the distribution of inheritance the method of the Báb or that of Bahá’u’lláh would be enforced.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The method of Bahá’u’lláh will be enforced and the House of Justice will not presume to change it. The purpose of Bahá’u’lláh’s arrangement is that man is not to be interfered with in the leaving of his property. Man may divide his wealth as he likes. Every one has to write a will and affix a seal thereto and no one need know about the arrangement he has made. After his death the will is opened and read and whatever he has decreed will be enforced. Man should have perfect freedom to decide as he wishes, in making his will. This is his own good pleasure. Man has a perfect right to do with his property as he sees fit and his wishes should be carried out.

“In case a person dies and leaves no will, then the law (method) of Bahá’u’lláh will be enforced. But man can bequeath all his property to one person. He is perfectly free to do as he wishes with his own property for he has been the one to acquire it.”

Dr. Esslemont: “In case all the property is left to one person, is there any provision for that person to divide the legacy or give something to the House of Justice?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “No. It is his will and the property becomes his. He may give a part to the House of Justice or to orphans, etc. He is permitted to do just as he likes, and that should be enforced.”

Mr. Latimer: “In the seven divisions of inheritance, teachers are mentioned, does this mean Bahá’í teachers or all teachers?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is not confined to Bahá’í teachers.”

Then Dr. Esslemont asked a question about entailed estates in England, explaining in detail how some property is set aside for some purpose and then increases very much in value, but cannot be touched and that these entailed estates are handed down from one person to another intact, to the eldest son. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá startled us all by answering this question, without waiting or giving Shoghi a chance to interpret one word of the question to Him. He said: “In accordance with Bahá’u’lláh’s Teachings, a Bahá’í can give all his property to his eldest son. He may do just as he likes. As long as it is his own property he may do as he wishes. One’s property cannot be snatched by another. There is one difference, however; when a Bahá’í leaves all to his eldest son, the eldest son in turn may break the line and divide as he wants to—according to Bahá’u’lláh’s method, or as he wishes.”

Dr. Esslemont said that England was suffering from this system which was called the “Rule of the Dead Hand.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “A hard, fast rule will lead to chaos. People will say why should I work, I have enough, so I won’t work, and so on. This is not just. It will enchain the person. It will restrict him. You must give him absolute freedom in disposing of his property for he is the one who has acquired it. What if he does not love his eldest son? What then?”

Mr. Latimer: “In America, the state imposes an inheritance tax on estates according to the amount left.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “This is a political issue. It has nothing to do with a religious law. There is nothing to prevent the state from making an inheritance law. A Bahá’í does not interfere with it.”

AN AFTERNOON WITH THE HOUSEHOLD

In the afternoon during Mrs. Randall's visit with the ladies of the household, the Master came in for tea and she said to Him: "The friends, tell me that the Master said when in America—'What if 'Abdu'l-Bahá should come again in an aeroplane?' Will He do this?" He replied: "I am too busy here." She continued: "It would not take long," and He answered: "I will go to America in a spiritual aeroplane and it is much quicker than a material airship. There is no comparison."

[Picture: The Garden House.]

At this point little Fu'ad entered the room breathlessly and began speaking very fast and excitedly. It seemed that his pet donkey had a fever and he was asking 'Abdu'l-Bahá to pray for it. Earlier in the afternoon he had given two oranges to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Master now gave him one to eat. When he had finished, the other was given to him with the instruction: "Give this to the ladies." He firmly refused, saying the gardener had said that no one but 'Abdu'l-Bahá should eat the oranges, and no amount of persuasion could make him give it to the ladies—but he had already eaten one himself.

Mrs. Randall asked the Greatest Holy Leaf if she would relate some of the incidents of her early life with Bahá'u'lláh at 'Akká. She gave an interesting account of Bahá'u'lláh's first imprisonment at Tíhrán, of four months, the journey in mid-winter to Baghdád, and then of their final arrival at their last place of exile, 'Akká She said:

"When we were coming to the 'Akká Prison, we landed first at Haifa, seventy-two in number. We were kept in a little house here for a few hours and then put in sail boats and sailed across the bay to 'Akká. As there was no place to land we were placed in chairs, carried by two men, and taken ashore. Everybody had come to the shore to watch the arrival, because they were interested to see what kind of people these prisoners were. There was a line of soldiers from the shore to the barracks. First the women were taken up and locked in a room. Then the men were treated likewise. There was no furniture, only a few rugs, and we had no food except some fragments of bread. We became very hungry and upon hearing the cries of the children, the guards brought us some partly cooked rice. This we could not eat, but gave a little to the children to appease their hunger and quiet their cries. A small amount of bread was given to Bahá'u'lláh but He ate very little. Fortunately we were very tired and soon fell asleep. The next day the guards allowed one man to leave the barracks for one hour to buy a little food for us.

"In spite of all these conditions we were marvellously happy in the barracks. The second night we were there we got to laughing so hard that Bahá'u'lláh came to the door and told us to stop, for the guards might think we had gone crazy to be so happy in such a place."

MOUNT CARMEL THE LAND OF PROPHETS

The Evening Meeting 25 November 1919

Somewhat late we entered the evening meeting. Immediately ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent for Shoghi to translate to us the Tablet of Bahá’u’lláh, one of exquisite beauty and majesty, which had just been chanted. From time to time, He gave the interpretation and explanation of the verses, and we were thrilled by their clearness and directness. We were witnessing the fulfilment of Bahá’u’lláh’s Words: “He is the Expounder of the Book.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The gathering of the friends is very good. In one month’s time it will be very fresh and green here. This wilderness is where Bahá’u’lláh has crossed. This is the place where the tent of the Blessed Beauty was pitched. Many of the Divine Teachings and Tablets were revealed here.

“This is the ground where all the prophets have trod. They dwelt here and gave the Glad tidings that a day will come when the tent of the Lord will be pitched upon this spot. His Holiness Christ always used to cross this Mount Carmel, Haifa and Nazareth. Therefore these cities and this mountain have a spiritual atmosphere. If man is in the mood of quiet and meditation, and passes through here and at the same time meditates, he will feel as though this mountain and this wilderness are speaking to him. Such will be his feeling. His Holiness Muḥammad came here also. He came here twice, once when he was eleven years old and once when he was twenty-eight. The cave of His Holiness Elijah is here. He used to stay there and had many pupils around him and was wont to teach them until they were educated.

BAHÁ’Í FEASTS

The Evening Meal 25 November 1919

At supper Mr. Randall asked the Master about a correct Bahá’í calendar of Feasts and anniversaries so that the East and West would conform in prayer and celebration.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied that this would be left for the House of justice to do, because of the complicated reckoning between lunar and solar time and that the East and the West might unite together on an accepted calendar.

Mr. Randall then asked if America might for the present adopt the Persian dates.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “Yes, if they want to. They must want to and take the initiative. It is not the request of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. These matters are left to the House of justice which will be established before this century is out.”

At the end of the meal, after He had talked a great deal about dates and the changing of lunar to solar time, intimating that there was a problem to be solved,

He arose and after going to his customary washstand to cleanse his hands, He turned and said:

“These meals have been very happy. They are the Lord’s Supper because the wish and purpose has been concerning the affairs of God.”

“THE CENTRE OF THE COVENANT”

Luncheon 26 November 1919

Insight into the wisdom and knowledge of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as the Centre of the Covenant comes to one in various ways. This morning we had been discussing the plans for another trip to ‘Akká and the Bahjí Palace. Some of us desired to go while others preferred to remain in Haifa, to be near the Master. As He came into the room He divined our thoughts, for He immediately said: “Each of you may do as you wish, go to ‘Akká or remain here,” continuing, “the plain of ‘Akká is full of spirituality. It is full of spirituality around the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh.”

[Picture: “The Greatest Branch.”]

Mr. Latimer asked if all the Muḥammadan Ḥadīths concerning ‘Akká such as “Blessed is he who has passed a night in ‘Akká,” “Blessed is he who has seen the One in ‘Akká” and the ones quoted in the “Fils du Loup” Epistle were authentic or merely tradition. He replied: “Yes, they are all authentic.”

Mr. Randall asked that before we left if the Master would speak of the Covenant and what is meant by steadfastness.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is mentioned in the Tablets of the Blessed Beauty. It is recorded in the Book of the Covenant and in the explicit texts of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. Clearly He says, and in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas He writes, that ‘after Me turn your faces to the Branch who is branched from this Pre-existent Root. Ask from Him the meanings of the Writings and Tablets. He is the Expounder of the Book.’ In the Book of the Covenant, He says: ‘The meaning of those two blessed verses is the Greatest Branch and all must turn to Him.’ He, addressing the branches, the twigs, the relatives and the friends, says: ‘You must turn your faces to Him.’ Then in a Tablet to me in His own handwriting, He praises very much. I do not want to speak of it because He praises very highly. I do not want to (repeat it). It is written in his own blessed hand. In that Tablet He says: ‘O God, he who loves Him, love him; and whosoever hates Him, spurn him; make victorious whosoever serves Him and defeat whosoever denies Him.’

“He writes in the Kitáb-i-‘Ahd, calling it the Book of the Covenant, in all his Epistles and Prayers, in more than a thousand places, that ‘whoever violates My Covenant is an infidel; he who does this is to be avoided, whosoever he may be!’ ‘O God! degrade those who deny My Covenant, defeat them. O God! protect Thy friends from those who deny Thy Covenant.’ Then He laments for those who violate. There are more than a thousand places in all the Writings and Tablets, even in the Hidden Words: ‘Remember the covenant ye entered into with Me upon the Mount of Paran, situated under the blessed shrine of Zamán. I took as witness to that covenant the Supreme Concourse and the dwellers in the city of Life. Now I find none steadfast in that covenant. Pride and disobedience have indeed effaced it from the minds to such a degree that not a trace of it has remained, and, although knowing this, I have endured it patiently and have not divulged it.’ ”

Mr. Randall: “We yearn to face only the Centre of the Covenant and be steadfast. We understand the outer plane or station but know little about the spiritual reality of the Centre of the Covenant.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I understand this yearning. As to the difference of opinion of My Station, everything is false except what I say. The Blessed Beauty has left no room for any one to weaken (the Cause). He entered into this Covenant to preserve the Bahá’í Unity so that no one might say anything on his own behalf. He says: ‘Whenever there arises any difference, refer to the explicit texts of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas and the Kitáb-i-Ahd.’ He has closed all the doors of interpretation to whosoever says he understands this to be so or that to be so. ‘Whatever He ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says is right.’ He has left no room for interpretation. He has called it ‘the Book of My Covenant’. It was the last Tablet. After this one no more Tablets were revealed....

“The importance is the unity of the friends. That is very important. Unity must be made very firm. Whoever has love for Bahá’u’lláh must give his life for the friends. Love for the friends is love for Bahá’u’lláh In this Cause there is no danger save the disharmony among the friends.

“Whenever disharmony and disagreement arise between two persons, it will ultimately lead to their both turning away from the Cause. The Náqidín are waiting for this, that when one becomes hurt they can influence him. Therefore you must preserve the Bahá’í Unity. Do not let any conflict arise between two friends. When there is a difference both will become grieved. There must be only love. You must never offend any soul. You must always have love. As soon as you see any dissatisfaction between souls, strive to create love between them. For the Kingdom of God does not accept differences.

Bahá’u’lláh says: ‘If two persons argue over a subject, both are wrong’, so that no disagreement should occur. No one should say, ‘My opinion is right.’ He says, ‘Both are wrong’, so that no differences should arise among the friends. You must strive for unanimous opinion. There must be love, love, love. God is love. The Blessed Beauty appeared for love. His purpose was not that differences should arise between two souls. See how in the utmost love we are seated here. Hearts are in the utmost love. You must all be the same in America. You must take the example from here.”

Mr. Randall said he thought that now America is beginning to grow a little spiritually.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is so. This is my hope that day by day it may become more. The Blessed Beauty appeared with the rays of love. This is the cause of my happiness. I have no other pleasure save the unity of the friends.”

SEVERANCE

Many times during our interviews ‘Abdu’l-Bahá impressed upon us the need of love and its power to transform the heart of mankind. The real spirit of Bahá’í Unity will be the mirror to reflect this love to the world. To Mrs. Randall he gave the secret of its attainment in the following matchless gem:

“Severance from the world is the first sign of the Love of God. As long as man is much attached to this world he will be unaware of the Kingdom of God. As soon as he begins to be detached from this world the Spirit of the Kingdom, like unto a sun, will shine from the horizon of his heart.”

The Evening Meal 26 November 1919

The last supper. With the knowledge of our approaching departure and his closing words of the previous evening ringing in our ears—that these meals were the “Lord’s Supper” — our hearts were too full to speak. He also was silent, but in that silence we found the baptism of the spirit.

LOVE

Luncheon 27 November 1919

‘Abdu’l-Bahá came very early for luncheon and took us all into Dr. Esslemont’s room which was flooded with sunlight and faced toward the Tomb of the Báb. We all sat around in a circle realizing that for the last time He had come to be with us in the Pilgrim House. Once more our hearts were inexpressibly filled with joy and gratitude. He mentioned many of the friends in America asking us to convey his utmost love to them and then added: “They are very numerous, to all I send love.”

Mr. Vail spoke of the Friday evening meeting of the young people of Chicago in Mr. Scheffler’s studio and asked for some message for them.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Convey to the attendants in that Friday evening meeting my love and extend to them my longing. See what has happened to this world. There is tumult and darkness upon darkness. Perhaps you may be the cause that through you it will be illumined. It is a world of carnage, a world of bloodshed, rancour and hatred. God willing, you may convert this world into the world of the Kingdom, that it may become a divine world, that these gloomy clouds may pass away and the Sun of Truth shine with divine splendour This is real service and anything besides that is all imagination, mirage, waves of the ocean, storms, and eventually it is lost.

“Upon ye be Bahá’u’l-Abhá!

“You must all do your best to increase love among the friends, that really and sincerely the friends may all love one another—so that faith in the kingdom may give forth good results, because life in this world depends upon love. The illumination of the world of man depends upon love; the splendour of God depends upon love; tranquillity of heart and soul both depend upon love. Anything besides that is personified imagination. If a friend arrives from another city or state, friends must show him the utmost love so that he may be pleased with coming to the city and meeting the friends.”

Mr. Vail said there are many people in America who are reading books of automatic writing purporting to convey messages from departed spirits and they believe that thereby they prove immortality of the soul and this gives consolation.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “What is the purport of it?”

Mr. Vail: “To prove immortality.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “They are right to a certain extent because it is possible to have spiritual communications and sensations. They think they are in direct communication with spirits. Tell them what you feel are spiritual sensations. The world of man has no communication with the vegetable or animal world. But there are sensations or spiritual emotions between the two. When man looks to the plain, meadow or mountain he does not speak with them, but there is a wave of spiritual communication between the two. The lower worlds are not able to communicate with man, but they have a sensibility.”

Mrs. Randall asked if in the future there would be new arts and possibly new colours.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes. New arts and other inventions that will perfect the existing ones. Everything will be renewed, in every department. This generation cannot be compared to the past.”

The Master spoke of Margaret being tired of rice and Dr. Esslemont of soup. Margaret replied: “I must confess I am a little bit.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I know that without your telling me. You will not eat rice for a time.”

Dr. Esslemont said material food makes little difference when we have heavenly food.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “That is the essential. The Apostles of Christ here in the wilderness could not even get food for their Master. Christ said of John the Baptist that ‘his food was grass and herbs.’”

After a long pause He continued: "Christ was once eating grapes and He said: 'I shall not eat these grapes any more until I shall eat again in the Kingdom of my Heavenly Father.' I hope we may eat together in the Kingdom as we do now."

THE FAREWELL

About 3:30 the Master sent for us. We knew it was the moment of parting. Our visit seemed like one day, not many days, and we could hardly realize that it had drawn to its close, like a setting sun. We stood in His Blessed Presence and every heart echoed the wish that we might never leave Him. The Master had spoken in spirit and now his tender, impressive words revealed his prayer for us and mankind: "Your steamer is waiting; it is best that you remain together and go direct to America. Turn to me always that I may be in your hearts for I love you very much and this is eternal. You are always in my heart, but I must also be in your hearts, then we are in oneness.

"Praise be to God that ye have come and attained this station, and have long tarried in this sacred surrounding. Ye have visited the Sacred Shrine and have reached this sanctified spot and have passed the nights and days with the utmost joy and fragrance. Praise be to God that all of our gatherings were divine and were in commemoration of God, and were conducive to perfect joy and gladness. My hope is that immediately after your arrival in America ye may convene such blessed and spiritual gatherings—gatherings that proclaim loudly the Love of God. Then I shall inhale the fragrances that emanate from those gatherings, and I shall in spirit hear the call of Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá, and shall listen to the sweet melody that will be raised from those gatherings.

"I am always with you and although I am far from you in body, yet in spirit I am ever near and present amidst you all. At heart I am attached to you and the connective waves of my sensations are never interrupted. I ever pray on your behalf and beg for you assistance and confirmation. May you all rest and abide under His sheltering protection."

For one moment He held us each by the hand and his last words will ever be our ongoing: "You are under the protection of God."

It was good to leave in the rain. Nature seemed to cry in this shower of Bounty. For twelve days we had been with the Light of the World. Without in the rain were waiting the concourse of the beloved friends to bid us "God Speed." They surrounded us in these last moments of silence, and Ibn Asdak, who understands the language of God, with simple gesture, pointed above—"Yes, we would meet in the Kingdom." It seemed like parting, but this may be the mystery of our coming—that we have not left the Kingdom.

Letter from Haifa

Frank A. Chant

2 January 1920

GM1/7/1

Dear Uncle Frank and Aunt Louise:

Will drop you a line as there seems nothing else to do at present. We are all well and enjoying the visit. ‘Abdu’l-Bahṣ comes over to lunch every day at the house he has hired for the American Pilgrims. At night we have our dinner with him in his house. We arrived in Haifa on Christmas Day. I went around the shore, nine miles to ‘Akká on New Year’s Day, visited the Tomb of Bahṣ’u’llṣh and had dinner with a druggist in ‘Akká — a wonderful New Year’s dinner. ‘Abdu’l-Bahṣ has just bought a car. I am taking him out for a drive nearly every day until Fugeta, the Japanese can learn to run it. I gave him the first ride in it, up to the Tomb of the Bṣb last Sunday. I put my arm around Hyder Alee, the old Bahṣ’ as it is hard for him to sit up alone.

Have been up on top of Mount Carmel. Our house is at the foot of the mountains, just below the Tomb of the Bṣb. I am quite familiar with Haifa now. Go down town every day, and drive outside with ‘Abdu’l-Bahṣ. His house is just across the street from ours. And up above, the houses for the Persian Pilgrims. They have just built a new garage on ‘Abdu’l-Bahṣ’s grounds.

Yesterday we attended the wedding of MírzáMaḥmúd, and after the ceremony I drove ‘Abdu’l-Bahṣ and two Jewish Rabbis to the Jewish quarters. ‘Akká is certainly a very interesting place. Centuries old. The same stones that Christ walked on. I was out on the Nazareth and Tiberius road yesterday. Jeffrey and I expect to go to Jerusalem soon. We take the train one day in the morning, get there about noon, stay over night and come back again the next morning. I hope to start back before long. Want to get back to Ethel and baby. I have an idea he will have another conference with me and then let me go. He has made a good many things clear to all of us. He asked me today if I didn’t wish to have a saddle horse and ride with Jeffrey. I gave Him your letters and they were translated for Him immediately.

I will wind this letter up now on January 5, 1920, while on my way to Jerusalem, Jeffrey, Shírázy and I. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has given me instructions in regard to work when I return. Have had two private talks with him. He told me to go to Jerusalem, see the Holy Places, after that I can return home. Will be glad to see baby and Ethel again. With love to you all.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s House, 3:30 P. M. Sunday, Nov. 16, 1919.

Mr. Denham: The Master must be very tired.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: When I associate with pure and sanctified souls, my fatigue passes away. Sometimes if I sit with a person for five minutes I become exhausted. With others I can talk for two hours and feel rested.

Mr. Denham: The atmosphere seems to be delightful here.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: You must come and stay here to get the benefit of it.

Mr. Denham: If everyone who would like to do so came here, there would be no room.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: There was a society in Persia that conversed only by signs. They thought it was good for sharpening their wits. Everyone who wished to join had to fill up a form of application and present it. A certain man was very anxious to join. The president wanted to make the members understand that they should not accept this man. He therefore, took a glass and filled it with water to the very brim so that it could not hold another drop without spilling. The members understood, and so did the candidate. The latter, however, was equal to the occasion. Taking a tiny piece of thin paper he placed it carefully on the surface of the water. It remained there floating and not a drop was spilled. The audience clapped with delight and the candidate was accepted with enthusiasm. You are like that piece of paper (to Mr. D.). However full we are we shall be able to hold such a guest as you.

Col. Allison asked about the effects of the war.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: First, The people before the war were wry negligent, especially in Paris. There no one mentioned the name of God. When I spoke about God to some people they would ask no to take another topic. But now they realize more. They are better than before. The hearts have become a little more tender.

Second, those who have lost dear ones in the war naturally think more of the spiritual world and of the life after death. There were Germans in Haifa who lost their sons and brothers in the war and they would come and ask me to tell them about spiritual things and about the immortality of the soul.

Third, the sufferings of the war have awakened people to the need for universal peace. The people do not want another war. Patriotic prejudices will disappear. If the governments want to make war, the people will say: ‘Very well, go and fight yourselves. Why should we go? What is the use? If there is any benefit you reap it, but for poor people like us there is nothing to be gained. If war is good, go and fight yourselves.’ All men will say 4, ultimately, we have no quarrel with our fellow-workers in other nations.

Fourth, the war has done much to sweep away racial, religious national prejudice. It will reach such a state that wherever a man is residing he will say, ‘This is my country, my home-land.’

Fifth, the war has convinced everybody that war is greatest evil and destroys the foundation of humanity. Sixth, economic effects. This war has made all the nations poor. The losses will be felt in the future. All these strikes in Europe and America are after-effects of the war. His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh fifty years ago mentioned the evils of this war and showed how to avoid them. If his advice had been acted upon there would have been no war. But they would not listen. What is the result? France will take fifty years to recover, Belgium, Bulgaria, Romania, Serbia, Turkey, even Persia – all have had great losses which it will take many years to recover.

Evening meal, November 16, 1919.

‘Abdu’l Baba (helping himself to potatoes): Sixty years ago they introduced the potato into Persia. There was so much superstition that people would say: Whoever eats it becomes an infidel: hardly anybody would eat it, except a few who took it with wine. Now see what Bahá’u’lláh has done. See the difference between that state of matters and this feast!

After another course was served, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

President Wilson went back to America leaving his task in Europe unfinished. Now they have made a plan that the British, French, mod. Italian Governments will complete the work without America. The American Senate has decided that they will not be obliged to enter (or remain in (?)) the League of Nations. If President Wilson had succeeded in establishing the International Court of Arbitration, it would have been permanent. He entered the war so that real justice might become apparent, but the other nations did not take up the burden. He announced the freedom of the nations – that each nation should be independent. It did not have any result. America sacrificed some of her youth and wealth, but without effect. Because the Court of Arbitration was not established, the Jar as largely in vain.

Mr. Randall said: Should America remain in the League of Nations?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: As thins are now, it is better that America should remain outside. Should Germany get a chance she will again attack France. Than if America is in the League she would be obliged to come and fulfil her agreement. If Germany gets the chance she will not forget to revenge herself. It is difficult for Germany to get this chance – very difficult because France, England, Italy and America are united. As long as this agreement lasts, she will not have an opportunity. But should a quarrel arise between France arid ‘En and this alliance will be broken. Immediately, Germany would declare war.

The best result of the war has been that this place (Palestine) is freed, because England has taken it. Mesopotamia also is freed. Baghdád and Mesopotamia will progress greatly. Especially good results will appear there, for the population were unable to better their own condition. It is necessary for her to be under the protection of a strong; nation. Nothing could be better for her than the help of England. E4,ypt, from the time the British have gone there, has progressed very much. Fifty years ago the revenues wore 8,000,000 pounds. Now they are 30,000,000 pounds. One fadan (Egyptian measure of ground) was worth 15 to 20 pounds. Now it is worth 500 pounds. There were no high schools except schools for theology. Now there acre many. The revenue in cotton was 13,000,000 bales. ‘Jew it is 50,000,000. If Egypt had remained under the old government, it would have made no progress, for the people are not able to carry on the administration. It is necessary that they be under the protection of another power. England has revived them.

Before the English wept to India the country was in a very bad state. The kings and rulers were great oppressors. England freed the people of India from the rip of these ‘kings. 10fere the English wont there, no one’s life or property were safe.

If America accepts the mandate for part of the Turkish dominions it will be very good4There is continued fighting between the Kurds and Armenians. In Anatolia there is continual slaughter. If America accepts the mandate, this will cease. We pray that all these strifes may cease. God willing the world of humanity will find rest.

Thank tied Bahá’u’lláh has emancipated us. With us all are the same. The world is our country. We have no quarrel with anyone. Any government that is based on justice is appreciated. As long as it is just, it is acceptable. Any country is our country while we are residing there. Bahá’u’lláh says the world is one home. Glory is not his who loves his country, but his who loves his kind. We are free and apart from all those quarrels and contentions.

At Lunch, American Pilgrim House, Nov. 17, 1919.

J. E. E. asked for an explanation of Bahá'u'lláh's teaching about Monarchial Government.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Despotic government is bad. A republican form of government as in America is good, but a constitutional monarchy is better, because it combines the virtues of both kingdom and republic. The head of a kingdom has a distinction that a president elected for a period of years has not. The kingship should pass from father to son. When the head of the Government is elected every few years, this leads to political intrigues and the whole nation becomes immersed in political contests. I was in America when President Wilson was elected. There was great agitation and discussion. One would say Wilson is good, another would uphold Taft. This was the general subject of conversation and there were constant disputes and conflicts in public gatherings, even in churches. The newspapers were in discord. Secretary Bryan and his wife came to see me in Aika. He came a second time. When I went to America I wanted to meet him. He had no time. He was giving many speeches every day. Once every four years there is an election.

J. E. E.: Is there an advantage in having a permanent head of the nation rather than one elected for a period or years?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In case we have no permanent ruler we shall have a republican form of government and that will lead to dissension and wire-pulling at election times. Then justice will not prevail.

J. E. E.: If the king is unworthy has the Parliament power to renew him?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The parliament can remove him – certainly. In a constitutional monarchy the king has no legislative power. All affairs are settled by the cabinet and the Parliament.

J. E. E.: Will the Parliament appoint a new king?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes.

J. E. E.: Should the Parliament appoint the Prime Minister?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá's No: the king will appoint the Prime Minister, but he will be responsible to the Parliament, and if he is at fault he will be dismissed. The advantage of a kingdom is that it has a dignity of its own. Compare, for example, France and England. In France there is very little dignity attached to the government, comparatively speaking.

Mr. Latimer: We always speak of the kingdom of God, not the republic of God should not earthly things be the counterpart of heavenly things?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Well said: In London, the Persian Ambassador came to me and said: There is some discussion between England and Persia about a certain matter, but Sir Edward Dray has said the matter must be so, so there is no course but to accept his decision. I came to Paris and the Turkish Ambassador came to no. He said that with regards to a certain matter, the President of the Republic has said so and so, but we have left the matter pending. Very soon there will be a new election and perhaps the new president will agree with our ideas. In London, the ambassador said: As long as Dray saps, 'Do so,' it must be done, but in France: The President of the Republic will certainly be dismissed presently. This is Why Bahá'u'lláh says a constitutional monarchy is better because it combines the merits of kingdom and republic.

Mr. Randall: In such a case will there also be hereditary princes and nobles?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: One who serves his country well should be rewarded by fitting distinction, but no one will be able to say that he must be honored because his father was a great general. A person who does not serve the nation will not have any distinction. He may be respected to some extent because of his father’s services, but so far as offices are concerned he will have no preference. He who serves must have the mark of distinction. It could not be otherwise – were it not so people would not care to serve.

Consider Bismarck. This one man built up the great empire of Germany. An empire of 70,000,000 souls. 70,000,000 people caused the downfall of Germany – so this one man was hotter than 70,000,000.

MASHRAK EL AZKAR.

Dr. E. spoke of a translation of a tablet in which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is reported as saying that only the words of Bahá'u'lláh must be read in the Mashrak el Azkar. Does this mean that the words of The Báb and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are not to be read?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: There is no harm if they are, but the essential thing is the reading of Bahá'u'lláh’s words. The prayers of his holiness The Báb are also good. If it becomes necessary to have any explanation of some topic that comes up they may refer to them.

J. J. E.: Are not ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s words the same as Bahá'u'lláh’s?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. Bahá'u'lláh in his explicit texts says: “He (‘Abdu’l-Bahá) is the Expounder.” I have no opinions of my own. Whatever is His Beloved Will, I carry out nature. His reason gives him power over nature. He can foresee the future, investigate the stars, communicate from East to West in a minute, imprison the voice in a machine. The sun with all its light, is a captive. If light were the standard of greatness, then a glow-worm would be above men, benzene higher than man. Man’s body is subject to nature, like the animals, but his spirit is not.

Supper, November 18, 1919.

Bahá'u'lláh at 'Akká

He (Bahá'u'lláh) addressed Constantinople, when the Ottoman Empire was in the utmost glory saying, O thou city between the two seas—'

What he has said about the Ottoman Empire has come to pass. He said, 'This 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd is an owl.' He foretold the end of 'Abdu'l amid. Bahá'u'lláh was in the prison of 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd but he was a king addressing, his servant. The imprisonment of Bahá'u'lláh was like no other imprisonment. Many officials wore there. While in prison he was in the utmost glory and all were humble before him. Abduk Ḥamíd has issued a firman that the Beauty should not be allowed to leave his room. Soldier's were on guard. No one should be allowed to see him – not even myself. Nevertheless, the tent of the Blessed Beauty was pitched on Mount Camel. Throngs of Bahá'ís used to come outside the city of Aka to visit. There were always sixty or seventy of the Bahá'í Pilgrims there. The aide of the Governor of Yemen, 'Azíz Páshá was on a streamer and sent a message to me, 'Come I want you.' I went. He asked 'Whose pavilion is this?' (Bahjé) It is visible from afar. It has no equal.' I said that this was the pavilion of Bahá'u'lláh. He said, 'Is this the imprisonment of Bahá'u'lláh?' When we first entered the barracks it was very difficult. Even I was not allowed to go to the Baths. After he left the city Bahá'u'lláh used to visit 'Akká now and again.

Supper, November 19, 1919.

Mr. L.: Was the great war Armageddon?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Yes.

Mr. Vail asked if the prophecy in the next to the last chapter in Daniel where it says the kings of the north and south will fight referred to this war.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Yes.

Mr. L.: If Germany gets the opportunity to declare war again, will the United States enter the war again?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: She will remain neutral. She has learned her lesson. She has spent so much money and life with so little result. She has found that interference with the political affairs of Europe is harmful for America. Neither should America interfere in the affairs of Europe, nor Europe in those of America.

Mr. R.: Had America not entered the war would not Germany have conquered the whole of Europe?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: No. The war would have been lengthened, but England would have gone on for five years longer, if necessary. America's coming in shortened the war.

Mr. R.: If the present League of nations does not include all the nations of the world, would it not be better for America to remain out of it?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Certainly. She should enter when all the notions are represented. Then we all have the International Court of Arbitration.

Mr. R.: Does the vision in Daniel of the three men in white who stood, one in the river and one on each bank, refer in this revelation?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. You will find the interpretation in Some Answered Sections.

Praise be to God , the Blessed Beauty has freed us from all these quarrels and strifes and much as to be at peace with all nations and peoples.

Mr. L.: Was the companion of The Báb who was martyred with him killed with the first volley or the second?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The second. He was mutilated, but the body of The Báb was not hit by the first volley. The Traveller’s Narrative gives the correct account of the martyrdom and the rescuing of the body of the Báb. Sulaymán Khán, the martyr, brought the Blessed body to Tíhrán.

Lunch, November 20, 1919.

A delightful dish was served (something like doughnuts) called ‘the mouthful of the Judge.’ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told the following story:

The Turks are very fond of eating. In this respect they are like some of the monks. Once upon a time two men had a quarrel over a piece of land – a dispute over the boundary line. One of them invited, the Judge to his house and entertained him at dinner. Afterwards the Judge gave a decision in favor of this man taking ten metres of land from the other. When the other found this out, he also invited the Judge to dinner and served among other courses this delicious dish. When the Judge had eaten of this he was charmed. He went back and reversed his decision, giving to the second man twenty metres. When he was asked by the first man the reason for this he replied, ‘The first decision was based upon eggs (the first man had given him eggs for dinner) but this one was based upon something far more delicious. So this dish was called thereafter ‘The mouthful of the Judge.’

The Master asked Bahiyeh whether she would like an ostrich egg whether would like to taste camel flesh. She said she would rather see the camel alive. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said she must ride on it herself.

J. E. E.: Fugeta rode on a camel at the pyramids.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: We will send him to Japan on a camel – or better still on an elephant – a large one, then Fugeta would be quite eclipsed.

J. E. presented translation from German of a letter from Frau Schwarz. The Master was very pleased and his face became enkindled with happiness. He turned to Doctor and said, "I am going to send you to Germany." Then he said that if it were possible Mr. Vail and the Randalls should go also. "You will enjoy it very much. 'You will find the friends there very enkindled. You will see little Miss. Knobloch. She is the sister of Fugeta in size.'" Dr. E. remarked that it might be difficult for an Englishman to get into Germany. The Master replied, 'Strive and endeavor to get into Germany. If you cannot do it now, go later on. If you spend but one day there you will be most happy.'

Supper, November 21, 1919.

Speaking of Bahiyeh, the Master said, "She will become eloquent and speak in large gatherings. I will supplicate the Blessed Beauty that he may confirm her so that she will attract many souls. In her time the Blesses Tree will give forth fruits. Now it has given leaves, but in her time it will bear fruit."

If violation had not occurred, the Blessed Tree would have already borne fruit. It was near its blossoming, but violation delayed it. It has not been for violation and Khayru'lláh's presence what would have been the condition of America! They have made the people indifferent. When the cause was ablaze, it was as the water had been poured on it.

It was just the same in the time of Christ. Violation retarded its progress, e.g., in the case of Arius. One and a half million souls were his followers – Even the Emperor of Constantinople. Arius was very eloquent. He proved the existence of something that did not exist, but the ocean of Christ sent forth a wave and cast ashore Arius and all.

November 21, 1919.

Evening Meeting:

There are many calls in the world now. There is the call of war – politics, peace, commercial interests, the churches, the Jews. There are innumerable calls. These calls have no effect. The call which pulsates in the heart of the world is 'Ya Bahá el Abhá!' This is the life of the arteries. This is the Call which creates activity. This is the Call which gives life!

Supper, November 22, 1919.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: On the way to 'Akká the rest of us went ashore at Alexandria and had a look around, but the Blessed Beauty did not land. Those who were taking care of us were quite sure we would not escape.

Mr. R.: When and where were Hidden Words written and why were they called 'Hidden Words'?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: It was revealed at Baghdád towards the end of our stay there. It was concealed at first, and was not circulated. There were not more than two or three copies of it. It was at a time when all the enemies were attacking us.

The Sháh of Persia was oppressing and so was the Ottoman government. At such a time they were revealed.

The Book of Aqdas is very clear and easy to understand. It is not like the Qur'án, which is in High Arabic and very difficult. It has no complications.

Mr. R.: We have no complete translation of it.

Now, the writings of the Blessed Beauty cannot be satisfactorily translated. The translation can never be like the original. The original is in the utmost of eloquence and beauty. It is so marvelous that no one is able to produce the like, – it is so eloquent and complete. Both in Persian and Arabic it is extraordinary. All is written in a new style. No one has ever written in such a style. – The actual words from the blessed lips have a power which is lacking in any translation.

If a person learns Persian now, it will not be like Greek, French or Italian. From it great results will come. After ten or twenty years the European who knows Persian will become famous throughout the world.

Mr. R.: We hope for better translation of the Surat-ul-Rykl.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It needs a translator like Fitzserald who translated Omar Khayyám. In this case the translation is much better than the original – very much better. The original is all in praise of wine, but the translator has elevated it so that in England they consider Omar Khayyám a great poet, but in Persia he has no importance. What a difference there is between him and Sa’dí (didactic) and between him and Haffiz (lyric).

Carmelite Monastery.

The Carmelite Monastery had leased 1000 acres on Mount Carmel, but claimed 40,000. The governor said it was manifest oppression on their part. They had taken this land by unjust means. Then the governor was invited to a banquet, but the monks discovered he could not be bribed. He was not made more lenient by the banquet and sided with the people. They all sat around the table and the Master sat in one corner. On one side sat the governor and his officials, on the other, the monks and priests while facing them were the notables of Haifa. One of those notables addressed the governor, saying that those monks were the people of God and the Germans were bad people. The monks were always kind and they clothed the naked while the Germans were just the opposite. They cared for no one except themselves. The governor said ‘yes’ to all of this and asked ‘Have you finished?’ To whom are those monks related? He (the notable) answered, ‘To Christ.’ Then the Governor replied, ‘Christ was in the wilderness without a home. He had no /amp save the stare, no bed save the ground, no food save the herbs, while with those monks it is exactly the opposite. Their food is sumptuous, their residence palatial, the view so splendid! They are in the utmost comfort and their wealth is immense. Notwithstanding this, consider how they have used force to do it. That connection does this have with Christ?' They all remained silent at this. Afterwards the monks said 'Abbás Effendi had told the Governor what to answer.

From George Latimer's Notes of Visit to 'Akká, November 22, 1919.

The barracks withstood all attacks of the Crusaders and eight months Beige by Napoleon in 1799. Taken in 1918 by two officers and three Indian soldiers in a motor car, without a shot being fired. Áqá Husayn the only survivor (except 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Greatest Holy Leaf) of the seventy-two souls who accompanied Bahá'u'lláh to 'Akká. He was the cook and has been associated with Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá for sixty-six years. He is now seventy-seven (years old). The party arrived when the figs were ripe in 1888. In the barracks the epistles to the Sháh and the Pope were revealed. Bahá'u'lláh's room had neither bed nor chair. The window of his room ever-looks the house where 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived from 1900-1910, when he received the first Western pilgrims.

To see Bahá'u'lláh pilgrims had to stand on the plain beyond the third series of ramparts, at quite a distance. The Purest Branch fell through a skylight from failing to keep count of his steps one night when he was saying his prayers. His dying wish was that, for the friends, 'The Gate of rooting crowd be opened.'

Lunch, November 23, 1910.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Each of the friends should try to guide at least one soul – to make one Bahá'í each year.

Mr. R. spoke of Richard Mayer, a German Jew who was giving all his time to the cause.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: See the power of God, how He has united the Jew with you – such as Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh here, He is a Jew. So is Tuhanna Dawud of London. Those of the Jews who become believers have much love for Christ.

There was a Mrs. Ramsey at 'Akká who was a missionary. She was very much against me. Whenever she saw a European or an American here she would commence to talk against me. One day there was a Jew with me who had become a Bahá'í. We entered a shop where this lady was. She flushed with anger. I said to her, 'Dost thou know how much I love you?' She said, 'No.' I replied, 'Just as much as you hate me, do I love thee! If thou wishest to know how much that is, see how much hate you have for me.' When I said this she laughed. I said, 'Thou hast no reason to hate me, for this man was a Jew and I have made him a believer in Christ and in the Holy Spirit, – the Holy Ghost. If you want to know, ask him.' She asked him, 'Were you a Jew?' He said, 'Yes.'

‘Are you a Christian, do you believe in Christ?’ ‘Yes.’ Then I said, ‘Ask him what proofs he has that Christ is the Spirit of God, the Word of God. I taught him these, ask him.’ She asked. He replied, ‘Do you want intellectual proofs or from the Book?’ He proved the reality of Christ from the Old Testament. Then she asked for intellectual proofs. He gave these to her also. She looked up and said, ‘In the name of God, this is very good. He has a very good faith, but thou wilt not let him remain a Christian. You speak to him of Bahá’u’lláh. If you do not speak of Bahá’u’lláh it is very good, but you will not leave him alone. You will make him a Bahá’í also.

Evening Meeting:

November 23, 1919.

Mr. R. said he had never soon such a perfect afternoon and evening.

Dinner, November 23, 1919.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke of the prostitution of wonderful inventions – aeroplanes, wireless telegraphy, steamers, railways, etc., to purposes of war. “Had it not been for steamers, America would not have entered the war. After this war we hope the world of humanity will become awakened and will realize that there is no remedy for the world’s sickness except according to the heavenly teachings, for this war has become the cause of hatred. For instance, the Germans will not forget, the Austrians will not forget, the Bulgarians will not forget, the Turks will not forget. On one side there will rise the tumult of the Socialists, from another, the storm of the Bolsheviks, from another, the demands of labor, from another the antagonisms of nations, from another, religious hatred, from another racial prejudice. It is clear ‘that will happen. All of these are like dynamite. One day they will explode unless the banner of universal peace is raised according to the divine teachings and to oneness of the world of humanity. But according to the divine teachings, the banner of universal peace must be raised ‘by the power of the Word of God. The oneness of the world of humanity must be established by the power of the Holy Spirit. No matter how the politicians strive, their efforts cannot bring peace. Unaided human power is of no avail.”

Shaykh Farajullah asked, the banner of universal peace going to be raised after this war?’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Not now. This period is like the deceptive dawn. We will see what the future brings. The real dawn has not yet come. We cannot abolish war with war. It is like trying to cleanse a blood-stain with blood. The divine teachings will accomplish it, however.

In the world of nature we find treachery, deceit, the struggle for existence. That which saves man from the world of nature is the power of God. It is faith. That will make of man an angel. The fear of God keeps man not only from open but from secret sins. The nations of the world are like fighting cocks. They fight, fight, fight until they are tired. Then they stop and make peace. After, they have rested awhile they fight again.

Mr. R. asked about the future in Russia.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The future is bad. There will be great destruction. Nations should strive to extinguish this fire before it spreads to other countries. It will soon affect other countries, for the mass of people have Bolshevich tendencies. The mass of people all desire to become equal with the rich. At present law and order prevents this – the poor are afraid of punishment, but when no order prevails, it is certain that the masses will strive to make themselves actual with the rich.

Col. A. asked whether the rulers, such as Wilhelm II who cause war should be tried.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Whoever is responsible should be, but in that case the ministers of all the nations will have to be tried. The Kaiser is not the only one guilty.

Col. A.: The English wish to try the Kaiser.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: What about Clemenceau? Was he not also one of the causes of the war? But the Kaiser is defeated, and it is always the defeated one who is to be tried. The Emperor of Germany was very proud. As a nation the Germans were proud. Even those in Haifa were proud. One could not talk with them.

Col. A. asked the Master if he saw the Kaiser when he came to Haifa.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Some went to meet him at the Port. I did not go. He was proud. He was the embodiment of pride. The Turks helped him much. He did not then dream of his downfall. When he read the Epistle of the Blessed Beauty, what did he care? Nothing: There were severe statements in it. All the vents were foretold. It is in the Surat-ul-Hykl which was published thirty years ago and spread throughout the world. In it the Blessed Beauty says: ‘Thou wilt become like Napoleon. Do not be so proud. I hear the lamentations of Berlin although today it is in manifest glory.’

In front of his carriage were two Ottoman soldiers. A poor unfortunate man was sitting on the ground. When he saw the carriage he got up, but the soldiers killed him. The Kaiser never even asked why they killed him.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the Feast given for Pilgrims, November 26, ‘19.

The friends are gathered with the utmost love and affection at this table. I hope they will all be present at the heavenly table, and may partake of the heavenly food. Although this food is rich, yet it is light, for it is cooked with love and served with love. This pilau is cooked and served so. I ask God and beseech at the threshold of the Blessed Beauty, that, as he has gathered you around this table, so he may gather you in the heavenly kingdom, in the utmost love and fragrance, bestow illumination upon all. It is my hope that through the bounty and favor of God this gathering may not be forgotten.

Lunch, November 30, 1919.

I asked the Master whether it had been prophesied by Bahá'u'lláh or himself that after the Great War there would be a period of economic unrest, revolt against governmental authority and chaotic social conditions, before the establishment of the Most Great Peace.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: Bahá'u'lláh frequently predicted that there would be a period when irreligion and consequent anarchy would prevail. The chaos would be due to too great liberty among people who were not fit for self-government. He had repeatedly said that in consequence of this there would have to be a temporary reversion to an absolutist form of government and firm coercion of the people. This would not, however, be an unjust coercion, such as that exercised by Turkey or the Russian government in the past, but a just coercion in the interest of the people themselves, to prevent disorder and chaos.

See how many disturbances there are now! England has come and freed these Arabs from the Turkish yoke. For 600 years the Arabs have been enslaved and now they are free, their children, themselves and their property. Now that they are free they say to the English, ‘What are you doing; hero? We do not want you. Get out of our country.’ England replied: ‘I have spent many lives here, much English blood has been shed. I have spent much money. Am I going to leave now? I have freed you from this slavery. I have erected a just and equitable government and I mean to recover from you what I have spent and to obtain compensation for the lives that I have sacrificed on your behalf.’ They say, ‘What right have you?’

It is our wish to be free and independent.’ Now if there was not this freedom, they would not say this and they would be very thankful.

J. E.: Does ‘Abdu'l-Bahá think that Wilson went too far in his proposals for entire self-determination for peoples inexperienced in self-government?

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: Wilson lacks experience in the world of politics. America, so far, has not entered into foreign politics. She is a beginner in this matter, but she is expert in the internal politics of her own territory. There was no need to proclaim entire freedom for all formerly subject nations. This is clear, that each nation now wishes complete self-determination and freedom of action.

There will come a period of disturbance and chaos. The prevailing state of the world is one of irreligion which must result in anarchy and confusion. I have always said that the peace proposals following the Great War were only a glimmer of the dawn and not the sunrise.

HOUSE OF JUSTICE.

Lunch, December 7, 1919.

Question: Am I right in thinking that the Houses of Justice will at first be instituted for the Bahá'ís only, but when the Bahá'í Cause becomes widespread they will come to take the place of existing parliaments and legislative assemblies?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It is the same Beit-ul-Adl. Belt-ul-Adl will be established. It is like parliament. It takes its place, but this is a parliament which has the utmost of authority and power.

Q. I see that in his tablet to Ex-Governor Sulzer the Master says that the Universal Arbitration Tribunal will consist of the best men and women of the different countries. Will women in the future sit in the Beit-ul-Adl also?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Men and women are equal in this respect, with the condition that woman should reach to the degree of men. As yet they have not reached this state. They will become members of the Beit-ul-Adl in the future. The time will come when woman will reach the degree of men (as regards education). Then they will be equal.

Q. When the Bei-ul-Adl are fully established All there be one supreme king for the whole world?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: There will be constitutional monarchs, but they will have no independent power. Bahá'u'lláh says that in each country there should be one head (king) but there will not be a supreme king for the whole world. The universal Beit-ul-Adl will be the supreme authority.

Q. The International Bait-ul-Adl will be a legislative body. Lust it not have an executive to carry out its decisions and must that executive not have a head?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In each country the executive of that country will carry out the decision of the International Beit-ul-Adl. It will be carried out as in the League of Nations. All, the countries will carry it through. In the same way the decisions of the Beit-ul-Adl will be carried out in all the countries.

Q. Then the only king of the whole world, the King of Kings will be God?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes! The real true King is God. The others are but figureheads.

Prophecy about ‘1917’ at Leland Stanford University.

In that gathering I said that war would roach its crisis in 1917. The newspapers also recorded it. I said, ‘This universal mar will come.’ I said, after that they will unite.

J. E.: I got the impression from the English translation of the prophecy in the Spar of the West that the Lost Great Pews would follow almost immediately after 1917.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No! I said that in 1917 the scope of the war would be enlarged. Great disturbances will happen in the world. After that they will make peace.

Q. Will the International Court of Arbitration and the International House of Justice be one and the same?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No!

Knowledge of Bahá’u’lláh.

Lunch, December 15, 1919.

J. E.: Would ‘Abdu’l-Bahá tell us about the knowledge of Bahá’u’lláh?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It was infinite, unlimited. This is clear. Can a limited power raise such a cause: This is apparent. Even the enemies of Bahá’u’lláh admit this. They say there is extreme power in this personage.

J. E.1 I have been told of a tablet in which he said that whenever he wanted to know anything, there it was before him in a clear and manifest tablet.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: When he wished anything it would be accomplished. (Leaving prison).

Dr. C.: Thy did Bahá’u’lláh refuse to go to Mazraeh when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked him, and then go when the Nufti begged him.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: I did not insist. Sometimes a king will not accede to the request of his Prime Minister but will grant the request of a farmer. I did not insist. I used only to supplicate. As he did not accede, I did not insist. But the Mufti was persistent. He had not the same feelings that I had. He took the Blessed Beauty’s hands and did not leave him till he got his wish.

J. B.: You didn’t insist yourself, but you sent the Shaykh to do it.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá (laughing): You said right. Bravo, bravo (Aferin, Aferin)! A young man when he wishes something from his father states his wish with the utmost politeness, but a little child cries, snatches, kicks, and takes that he wants.

Illness of Bahá’u’lláh.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Bahá’u’lláh’s last illness lasted twenty-one days. (‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not specify the name of the disease) – it was nothing to speak of. Several months before that Bahá’u’lláh used often to speak about his ascension. For three years he used to eat very little – often he would eat nothing at meal times. They would take the food and bring it back untouched. Sometimes he would take milk or rice pudding.

Arrival at ‘Akká.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: At that time there was no port either at ‘Akká or Haifa. Passengers were carried ashore on a chair or on the shoulder. The notables had a chair. The Blessed beauty was carried on a chair. He went to a house in Haifa. Then went by a sailboat to ‘Akká. He came to Haifa by steamer and from Haifa to ‘Akká by boat. After nine years at ‘Akká, by his own wish, he went out of the town. He came several times to Haifa. His tent was pitched on Mt. Carmel. Two white donkeys were sent from Persia for him. He used them after he came from ‘Akká.

Q.: Did Jesus first realize his mission when the Spirit descended on him in the form of a dove?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The Holy Spirit was always with Christ.

Q. Did he know of it.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It was hidden from others but to him. The story about the dove is simply a metaphor. No dove came down. Amongst the people John the Baptist felt that there was the Holy Spirit in Christ. The Holy Spirit was always with Christ. He knew about his mission from early childhood.

Q. Did The Báb, Bahá’u’lláh and. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá also know of their missions from early childhood?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes.

Q. In a book I read that at the age of twenty-four The Báb realized his mission.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: From childhood it was apparent to himself, like the sun. The people felt his greatness although they did not know about his future.

Lunch, December 13, 1919.

Dr. C. asked if a statement concerning the title of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which she had found among a collection of translations was correct.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This is not a correct translation. I wrote that his highness The Supreme (Báb) was the fore-runner like John the Baptist, like the dawn. The Blessed Beauty is the sun and I am ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and no one should go beyond that. For me this one word ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is sufficient. I did not say that I have all the knowledges. The utmost of my perfection to this, that I am. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’ – call me only ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Dr. C. spoke of a tablet just revealed for America, asking for earnest souls to proceed to Persia and of her willingness to go if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá desired it.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: You alone are not sufficient. There be a party.

Marriages of Bahá’u’lláh: ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

If he is God, whatever he does is right. If he is false, whatever he does is also false – even though he may not marry. There are religious devotees in India who do not marry at all. Is this a proof of their truth? This is the essential (proof) but the non-essential is this:

When my mother became helpless and could not serve, Bahá'u'lláh did not wish, as is custom of the Europeans, to have a 'mistress,' he accepted another wife.

In the Bible polygamy is not forbidden. Christ prohibited divorce only. In the first century the Christians used to marry several wives. Even Paul says that the religious leader ('elder') must have one wife only. More than one is not permitted as otherwise he will be distracted. From this it may be inferred that they used to marry more than one. Monogamy was instituted by the Church Council, for this was the habit of the old times.

If one searches into the truth about Christianity one finds that all those rules are from the Council, who borrowed from the ancient nations. This Council adopted twenty-one things from the ancient nations:

1. Pictures and images in the churches. Till the seventh Council, there were no pictures. They said: 'The mass of the people are accustomed to idols of gold and silver. Now there is nothing in the church. It is empty and looks bare to them. It is better that one should put pictures of Christ, the disciples and Mary in the church, so that it may be more attractive – an empty church has no attraction. It has for the learned ones, but not for the mass of people.'
2. In the same way with lights. According; to the ancient custom they used to have lamps lighted in daytime. They said: 'These are necessary to make the church popular with the masses.'
3. In the same way with incense which they used to perfume the nostrils.
4. Then bells were used by the ancient ones also. At the time for prayer or service; the bell was rung.
5. Remission of sins. The religious heads, like the Pope, should grant absolution for sins.
6. The religious leaders should wear ornamented garments. Until that time the religious leaders wore simple clothes.
7. They appointed that no one should wear a crown (or mitre) according to the ancient customs.
8. That the priests should not marry.
9. The religious leader should have a private room in the church.
10. The religious leaders may have the right to excommunicate.
11. Sacrifice, which they had.

12. Transubstantiation. The priest would take the bread and bless it and bless also the chalice and would give it to the people in the church.
13. The clergy should have political as well as religious authority. There are twenty-one things and among these is monogamy which was instituted by that Council, according to the ancient customs.

Bahá'u'lláh.

Lunch, December 19, 1919.

“The time of the Blessed Beauty was spent in the manner described with the appearance of The Báb, but when The Báb declared himself, the Blessed Beauty began to spread the cause of The Báb. In every way he assisted it. Tíhrán was the capital of Persia and centrally situated. His house was always full of people – crowded. They used to come and ask questions. Notwithstanding that his holiness Bahá'u'lláh had never been at any school nor studied any sciences. This is certain. People of learning used to come – people of sciences – people of religion, of every sect, and he would answer their questions. People were astonished that the Blessed Beauty had never studied. Where did he get his wisdom Where his knowledge? With utmost of power he promoted the cause of The Báb. He spent great sums of money for it, he even sold some villages and devoted the proceeds to the cause. The news spread everywhere that the Blessed Beauty assisted the cause of The Báb. It was customary in Persia for the people of learning to wear a turban. If a person had no turban around head, it was presumed that he had no learning. Such was the custom at that time. It is not so now. The Blessed Beauty wore a hat, therefore whoever visited him would see only a hat and would become astonished.

“Then they took the Blessed Beauty and imprisoned him. The first one who went to prison for the cause of The Báb in Tíhrán was the Blessed Beauty – the very first – but it was for one night only and it was because he had given shelter to some Bábís. The next day they set him free.

“Then the journey to Bedasht was made. Kurratu'l-Ayn had been imprisoned in her father's house at Kasvin. They had made things very hard for her. Her husband, her father and all her relatives and her some The Blessed Beauty sent and arranged her escape by night. She was brought to Tíhrán and for a few days was in house. Then he sent her to Bedasht for the friends were gathered there. Later the Blessed Beauty went also. He spread the cause of The Báb in Mazandaran. The government had not yet risen again at the cause. There was a little opposition (by the government) at Shíráz but no serious opposition elsewhere. They had sent The Báb also to Tabriz. The people were not afraid. Therefore, in Mazandaran, whoever came to his holy presence became a believer. He went to Bedasht and there openly declared the tidings of the New Manifestation – that Hazrate A'la is the manifestation. The former ordinances are abrogated, such as veiling (of women). Once the Blessed Beauty was no well. He was in the garden. Jenab-i-Khuddus came to visit the Blessed Beauty. Kurratu'l-Ayn wished that the Blessed Beauty should go to the garden where she was living. Jenab-i-Khuddus said, ‘He will not come.’ Jamáli Mobarak (Bahá’u’lláh) had arranged beforehand what they should do. In the meantime Kurratu’l-Ayn came without veil or covering. At that time about 300 or 400 friends were gathered there. This was a momentous event. It might easily have led to their all being killed, but God preserved them. Kurratu’l-Ayn came out without veil and proceeded to the tent of Jamáli Mobarak. All the friends were about and when she arrived he asked her to sit down. He then ordered that the Sura of Faqeyeh should be read and he proclaimed the New Era. ‘It is the New Era.’ Because of the unveiling of Ṭáhirih (The Pure), the gathering of the friends broke up in confusion. Some ran away; some returned (to their former faith); some objected, some were astonished and some remained firm. One drew a razor and cut his throat, saying, ‘The religion is broken.’ He became bewildered. Each one went his own way. Later they gradually reassembled. See what the abandonment of the veil meant when it caused a man to cut his throat!”

Q. Did Kurratu’l-Ayn habitually discard the veil after that meeting?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No. In the presence of some of the more intimate friends who used to visit her, she would unveil but not in public.

“Then Jamáli Mobarak went towards a fortress in Mazanderan, where some of the friends were gathered (Shaykh Tabarci was name of fortress). The people in that neighborhood began killing the friends. The friends gathered in the fortress to defend themselves. Jamáli Mobarak sent considerable stores of provisions to the friends. Then the government sent soldiers who surrounded the fortress – a large number of soldiers. Jamáli Mobarak went towards the fortress. Outside the fortress at night, the soldiers caught him – nine miles from the fortress (3 farsakhs) they caught him. They pillaged all his property and took him to the city of Amol.

Lunch December 20, 1919.

Mírzá, Taqí, governor of Amol, with 700 riflemen (at that time in Persia there were riflemen and regular soldiers. The soldiers were fairly well disciplined, but not the riflemen) surrounded the room of Jamáli Mobarak.

“They looted everything that was there. They brought Jamáli Mobarak to the town. The Mullás were gathered in the mosque. They brought Jamáli Mobarak and his companions there, and answers, they passed sentence of death on him. All the people of the town had come. The carpenters came with their axes and the butchers with their axes and gathered in the middle of the meeting. Jamáli Mobarak was sitting in a recess of the Mosque. The governor afraid that they Jamáli Mobarak. A great responsibility would then devolve upon him as Jamáli Mobarak and he were from the same town – from Mazanderan. He feared that the people would martyr Jamáli Mobarak because the ‘Ulamá had given the sentence and the people were obedient to the ‘Ulamá and did not fear Governor. In this recess (where Jamáli Mobarak sat) the Governor’s men removed the wall from behind and carried Jamáli Mobarak out. By the time the people got at the place, Jamáli Mobarak was taken away. They carried.. to the house of the Governor and shut the door.

Q. Was Bahá’u’lláh called Jamáli Mobarak in those days?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá; In those days he was called by his name, Mírzá Ḥusayn ‘Alí.

J. E. Did he take the title Jamáli Mobarak after his declaration?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: We called him %mall. Mobarak because of respect. He did not call himself by that title. The uncle of this Mírzá Taqí (the Governor) was a general and in the fortress. He was a Bahá’í. When he received the news he wrote to Mírzá Taqí, ‘Beware that not one hair of his blessed head perish! How neglectful you have been. If anything happens, we shall not be free (of responsibility). They will require his blood of us. The family of Jamáli Mobarak will not take their ‘hands from our heads. However, now you must take the greatest care of him and all the property that has been pillaged must be restored.’ (But the property was carried off by the people and could not be traced).

Then Jamáli Mobarak went from there to Bandar-e-Jaz. The fortress had been taken. When the friends had gone hungry for eighteen days, the enemies let them out from the fortress and aware not to injure them. The friends came out and laid down their arms. All were except a few who escaped. Among those who escaped was Jonah Astag – father of Ebn Astag.

Briefly, while Jamáli Mobarak was in Bandar-e-Jaz Muḥammad Sháh issued a firman for the killing of Jamáli Mobarak. This story is very piquant! (How ‘Abdu’l-Bahá laughed as he made this remark.) When the firman came from Ṭihrán, Jamáli Mobarak’s whereabouts were not known. The order was, ‘Kill him wherever he is.’ One of the relatives (of Jamáli Mobarak) in Dandar-e-Jaz was in the service of the Russian Government, doing all kinds of work. They sent the news to him. He said in the Holy Presence, ‘There are the Russian steamers and the work is in my hands. Now that Muḥammad Sháh has given the sentence of death, come, get on board one of those steamers.’ He said, ‘I will not go. It is impossible.’ At that time anyone who took refuge on a Russian steamer would be protected. He (the relative) said, ‘Then go to the place where the Admiral lives,’ for the house of the Admiral was on an island. Jamáli Mobarak did not go. The following day one of the notables of the town invited Jamáli Mobarak to go to one of his villages. He had also invited other notables. As he was a fellow-townsmen-Jamáli Mobarak. They rode on the way to other, but this person who was in the service of the Russian over and nearly died from fright. He was a relative of Jamáli Mobarak and did not know what to do. Jamáli Mobarak rode in the utmost dignity with the people around him.

Meantime a mounted messenger arrived from Ṭihrán and gave a letter to Mírzá

Majeed (the relative). He opened it, read it, and suddenly began to roar with laughter. (Like the laughter of Fugeta). They cried, ‘What is it?’ ‘That man is dead,’ he said. They said, ‘What is the matter?’ Mírzá Majeed said, ‘Don’t you know? He issued a firman that they should kill Jamáli Mobarak – now God has killed him – that firman is useless.’ They made a feast and had great rejoicing with Bahá’u’lláh because of this deliverance.

Lunch, December 21, 1919.

From Bandar-e-Jaz, Jamáli Mobarak went to Núr there he taught. (Núr was the town where his family had lived for generations.) He entered the village and most of the inhabitants became believers. Then he went to Tíhrán. Nasr-ud-Din Sháh was on the throne and the Prime Minister was Amir Nazam. He was a very bloodthirsty man. He used to say, ‘Until I kill five or six persons a day I cannot rest, and I cannot govern the kingdom.’ He had great enmity toward Jamáli Mobarak and he was very despotic. Whatever he wished he did. He decreed that they should martyr Hazrat-e-A’la (the Báb). He sent soldiers to Mazanderan, Zanzan and. Tabriz. In those three places he commanded them to kill all the friends. The friends defended themselves. Then Jamáli Mobarak went to Baghdád and remained a year. Wherever he went he used to teach. In any city on the way, he tarried and spread the cause of God – everywhere. He did the same around Baghdád and in Kerbela and Najaf. Afterwards he returned to Tíhrán. Jamáli Mobarak was in the middle of this journey when Nasr-ud-Din Sháh seized Amir ilazam and killed him. Jamáli Mobarak came to Tíhrán, Mírzá Aka Khán had become Prime Minister. Jamáli Mobarak had greatly befriended Mírzá Aka than at a time when he was in need of assistance. When they had caught, him and fined him, the Blessed Beauty helped in the payment of the fine. Afterwards also, Bahá’u’lláh provided him with allowance and sent his wife and family to him with dignity and comfort, Mírzá Aka Khán the Prime Minister. He said to all his relations, “Go and meet the Blessed Beauty.” To his brother he said, ‘You go in place of me.’ The Blessed Beauty came to the house of Safar ‘Alí Khán (brother of the Prime Minister). Then the people, ministers, members of the court and princes used to come and go. From there Jamáli Mobarak went to the village of the Prime Minister for he had invited the Blessed Beauty saying, ‘Now you are my guest.’

The Blessed Beauty was there in the summer when his holiness The Báb was martyred. There was a young man by the name Saclike. He was present on the day of the martyrdom of His Holiness. He became greatly affected. From Azarbaijan, he started, taking two companions going straight towards the Sha. He fired a pistol at the Sháh, but he did not know how to go about it. He had charged the pistol with small shot instead of a bullet. Fourteen pellets struck the Sháh. Thor ho dragged the Sháh from his horse and fell over him. They killed him on the spot. A great commotion arose. Now this person had done this on his own initiative, but all the friends were blamed for it. Briefly, Jamáli Mobarak it was in the village of to Prime Minister. The Prime Minister wrote a letter to his brother who was in that village with Jamáli Mobarak. He wrote telling of the occurrence and saying that there were rumors against Jamáli Mobarak. After a few hours another messenger came. The Prime Minister wrote that Jamáli Mobarak is strongly suspected (of complicity to the plot). Jamáli Mobarak saw that the Prime Minister was fearful about Jamáli Mobarak being in his village, so he determined to leave. The brother of the Prime Minister said, "It is not necessary," but he did not insist. This village is nine farsakhs (27 miles) distant from Tīhrán. There were people in that village who were supported by Jamáli Mobarak. He was always giving them something. They were immersed in the gifts of the Blessed Beauty. They were good people. They came to His Holiness and said, 'In these mountains are places which all the people of Persia could discover. We guarantee that you will remain safe there. We will let no one know where you are except one person who shall bring your food. There is a gorge, beyond that gorge another gorge, beyond that the mountains. For ten days journey there are gorges and mountains. There is no village there – nothing whatever.' If he had gone there he would have remained safe. He did not agree to go. He rode with the utmost dignity toward the village in which the Sháh was. About half a farakh before reaching the village, he alighted. They heard of it. One-hundred-fifty armed soldiers came and surrounded the house. Jamáli Mobarak rode with the soldiers around him and went to the camp. They raised a tent there and kept him there, with guard of soldiers. They asked him no questions. After fourteen days, in chains, with bare foot and head, accompanied by some of his followers, they sent him to Tīhrán, a distance of about three farsakhs (9 miles). His hardships on that journey were beyond description – barefooted, bareheaded., his neck loaded with chains. The guards would urge on their horses and they brought him to a dungeon in Tīhrán.

For four months the trial continued. At the end it became apparent that Jamáli Mobarak had no concern in this matter. He was released from prison very weak and thin. That prison was underground, had no apertures. There were ten or fifteen steps down. There was one door. When you entered from the door you would go down. There were about 150 persons imprisoned, but there also Jamáli Mobarak continued to speak about the cause. The friends were zealous and enthusiastic, in the greatest happiness. There were about thirty or 40 of the friends. Every day they used to come and martyr a few. The executioner would come and take them away. When the music was sounded, it was known that a martyrdom was taking place. When the executioner came to call a prisoner, he would rise up and dance – dance a regular dance – then would kiss his blessed hands and embrace the other friends and would go – to be martyred.

Prisoners were arranged in two rows facing each other and they sang portions of the Qur'án. One row sang, then the other one responded. After four months it was finally proved that Jamáli Mobarak had no complicity in the plot. He was released. For a month he was ill, as in the prison their daily ration was one loaf – no tea, no covering – one loaf per day. Then it was arranged that Jamáli Mobarak should leave Persia. He went to Baghdád.

House of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Haifa, December 28, ‘19.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to Mr. Chant, “Do you like Haifa by this time?”

Mrs. C.: It is very interesting.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Look at the spiritual side of Haifa, not the material side and see how spiritual it is. The prophets appeared in this region. For this reason spiritual susceptibilities come to man here. One forgets the troubles and the anxieties of the world of nature. When one gets to Paris he becomes a prisoner of nature. If one had some spiritual feelings they would die there, because all thoughts there are the thoughts of the world of dust. But here one obtains thoughts of spiritual freely. Tyhmore Land was a king (in the Orient) similar to Bonaparte (Napoleon). He conquered Turkestan, Írán, Tooran, Anatolia and here. There was a port in Aleppo and he left soldiers there. They rebelled against him and again he made them captives and again they rebelled. He sent an army against them and it rebelled. The king said that there must be some influence in that land because whoever enters that castle becomes rebellious; then he ordered that the castle be destroyed.

Dr. E.: Who gave the name Bahá’u’lláh to him?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The title of ‘Bahá’u’lláh’ was given by himself. The Blessed Beauty gave the name ‘Bahá’u’lláh’ to himself and he wrote it to His holiness the Supreme (The Báb). The Báb conjugated the name ‘Bahá’u’lláh’ in 360 different ways. His holiness The Báb gave to himself the titles ‘Báb’ ‘First Point’ (Noteyeh Oola) and ‘the mention of God’ (Zekrullah). His holiness Bahá’u’lláh chose only the title ‘Bahá’u’lláh’ and he wrote it to The Báb.

Dr. E. Did ‘Abdu’l-Bahá give the name ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to himself?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. I myself chose this title for myself.

Dr. E.: Was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá born in Núr?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No. (I was born) in Tíhrán.

Dr. C.: Was Bahá’u’lláh born in Núr?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The father of the Blessed Beauty was born in Núr. So also his mother.

Miss B.: Where did Bahá’u’lláh make the declaration, ‘I am the one whom God would manifest.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In Baghdád he proclaimed himself as the One whom God would manifest, but Bahá’u’lláh was known to the believers (before this time) as the manifestation of Ḥusayn. (Ḥusayn was the grandson of Muḥammad).

Mrs. L. Asked concerning the Bible prophecy of the coming of the Prince of Peace out of Syria.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That is, the Manifestation appeared in Syria not that he came out of Syria, but from Syria he appeared as the Prince of Peace and the place was this Syria.

Pilgrim House, Lunch, December 28, 1919.

The question was asked, ‘Did the climate of ‘Akká change when the Blessed Beauty went there?’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said it did. The water which was salty was soon changed. “During the time of the Blessed Beauty, the cholera came up to the gates of ‘Akká, but it did not enter ‘Akká. Ask, for they know about it, ask from the Christians of ‘Akká. It came to Damascus, Beirut, Mt. Lebanon, Aleppo, Tiberias, Nazareth and here it came too. It came up close to ‘Akká, but it did not enter. In the dungeon where three hundred were imprisoned it was so damp, so dark, no wind, no sun – it did not come. In Lebanon which is dry, it came. But immediately after the ascension of Bahá’u’lláh there was no cholera elsewhere, but it was in ‘Akká. The third day after the ascension it came. Even the Christians said that the talisman was broken.”

Dr. E. asked if the water was brought there during the time of the Blessed Beauty.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “In the beginning this water was brought here ninety years ago, then it was cut off. After thirty years of cut off, again the pipes were repaired. The water of ‘Akká is good.”

At the Tomb of The Báb, Afternoon, December 28, ‘19.

When Hájí Hayderr ‘Alí was brought into the room the Master remarked about him and others like him:

“The hair of these men has been made white (through their services) in the cause of God both during the days of the Blessed Beauty and afterwards. They had no ease day nor night – had no intention save service in the cause of God – had no other thoughts. The Bahá’ís of Persia fell greatly under tests, their blood was shed, their lives were given. They used to be caught, killed, imprisoned; they were beaten, they were fined, they were exiled. Notwithstanding this they remained firm and steadfast. They are of the believers who have been tested. They received afflictions and remained firm. When such tests come to America and the believers remain firm, then it will be well. For instance now there are no tests (save) spiritual tests. When there are material tests those are real tests. The Bahá’ís of Persia would go under the sword. The executioner would stand over their head with dagger in hand, saying, ‘Deny, then you will become free.’ He would not deny and was martyred. Another would come and be killed because he would not deny, saying, ‘God, forbid (that I should deny). They would cut out his throat, cut his ear, cut his nose; they would put iron in the fire and burn his flesh. Sometimes when opposition was at its worst, the government used to search for them, throw them into the rivers. Whoever was suspected of being a Bahá'í was immediately. The Bahá'ís though walking an earth were not an earth, they were in heaven. They had no news of this world – no one knew that they would alive an hour, they knew not the feeling of this world – all the time they were engaged in prayer. Tomorrow I will show you the photograph where three executioners have taken one person, desiring to cut his throat. They took his photograph. The one who took the Epistle of Bahá'u'lláh to the Sháh of Persia, Nassir-ud-Din Sháh.”

Pilgrim's House, Lunch, December 29, 1919.

The question was asked, “Were some souls born to redeem others?”

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: No, but some souls, by their good morals and deeds did so. For instance, a son by his good deeds may be the cause of the redemption of his father if he does good deeds.

Miss. B.: The Master told my father he would be blest through me.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: God willing thou wilt do such a work that thou wilt be an honor to thy father.

Mrs. R.: Then some souls came to attain.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: they have capabilities. For instance, one has a capacity for politics; he attempts to become a merchant. He will not be successful, for he hasn't capacity for this. Then one who has the capacity for merchandise interferes in political affairs. He will not be successful here, but if he becomes a merchant he will be confirmed. Before I send a student to school in Beirut I ask, ‘What thing dost thou wish the most, what work.’ If he wishes to become a mathematician or doctor or learned one, whatever he desires I tell him to do that.

Dr. C.: How about those souls who do not know their capacity until later in life?

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: It must be considered what their capacity is. He must discover it. The well known Plato would not accept a pupil until he saw him. He would examine the student for a time and study his features. Aristotle came to become one of his students. He knew Aristotle and knew that Aristotle did not have capacity for medicine, so he sent word, ‘I cannot accept you (as my student).’ Plato had seen Aristotle in childhood and this is why he would not accept him. Aristotle saying, ‘Thou hast seen me as a child, when I have no capacity for medicine and I had other capabilities and that is not acceptable to you. That is correct. I have no objection to that, but with education I have changed and now I have a capacity for that, therefore if thou acceptest me thou wilt become happy – thou wilt see that thy education is not spoiled.’ Plato accepted Aristotle, when Aristotle said, “I have been educated.”

Mrs. P.: Did he become a good physician?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. When thou dost train a young, a crooked branch it will become a straightened. If thou wilt train a garden of weeds it will become a flower garden. Even education had effect on some animals. For instance thou wilt see they can train birds. I have even seen a trained donkey to dance. For instance, through cultivation a five-petaled flowers becomes a hundred-petaled one. A fruitless tree through cultivation become a fruitful tree.

Mrs. P.: then persons who do not know how to train their children, would it not be well for them to have the state educate them according to Plato’s idea?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The business of the government is not merely to take taxes from people. The business of the government is to educate people. The government must be kinder than the father. Briefly, the government has great effect.

Consider how a small potato becomes very large.

Dr. C. Asked concerning x’s theory on vibration, “By date of birth and first name one can tell inclination of child.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: These rules of the stars are from the ancient astronomers. They used to take the sun coming out of the Zodiac and from that they would take out other things, but they had no true foundation.

Dr. C.: X says this theory has nothing to do with astronomy, but is a mathematical science.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: There is a kind of mathematics where they take the name of the person according to ‘Abjad’ (each letter of the alphabet has a numerical value) and the sum total of the values of the letters in the name used. This mathematics is a concise science. They add the numerical value of numbers. It becomes 120. (Note: This figure was indistinct in original copy. Copyist) See how many 9’s are in it. These things were very much studied in the East, but now the Eastern people have put them aside. In ancient times the king had a man who used these calculations especially to him. If the Sháh wanted to make a journey, this man might say, ‘don’t go. If you do it will be dangerous.’ If the Sháh wanted to marry, he might say, ‘Don’t marry this year, wait until a certain hour arrives, or until the sun reaches a certain sign (of the zodiac).’ If the Sháh wanted to take some medicine, he might say, ‘Don’t take it today.’ There were many, many such precautions, but it was found that no benefit resulted from observing them, so they were put aside.

Dr. E.: The Báb used such calculations, did he not?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: They did it only for giving names or titles. If they wanted to give a person a title they would select one with a numerical value equal to that of his own name.

Dr. C.: What I know about these systems is 100 times more than X knows. There are so many systems which I know, which X knows nothing about. But these things take up man's time. They are unworthy. The mind of man is meant for nobler things. In these things there may be consolation for some people, but not for Bahá'ís. e.g., The expert counts and takes a number and tells his client, 'You have had difficulties in the beginning of your life. Toward the end of your life conditions will be more favourable.' This pleases the client. Or he says, 'In the future you will become wealthy. Your heart's desire will be fulfilled.' These things please the client. He says, 'You have been in great danger, but God will bring you safely from it.' This pleases him. I say this in order that you may not engage in such things, for these things have been taken from the East.

Mrs. P.: X said that 'Abdu'l-Bahá advised X to write a book about this subject.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: X said to me, 'I want to write a book.' I said, 'Write.' I do not prevent anybody. I saw that she was very keen on the object. It is not that I told her to do it or said that these things were good. If a person is keen on a subject and I object to it, he will be annoyed. One must so act as not to grieve people. X said, 'I want to do so and so,' so I said, 'Do it. May God assist you!' (To those at table): You know that reason is better than these things.

Dr. C.: X says, "Anyone who takes my course in Vibration becomes a firm Bahá'í"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Now tell her, 'Turn your attention to spiritual things and make your discoveries from them, not from numbers.' These systems were prevalent in the East and caused danger in the East. e.g., A king wanted to go to war. They told him that he would be victorious for the number of of your name is greater than that of the other king's name. The unfortunate king took their advice and went to war and lost his country.

Mrs. P.: To Mrs. Waite you sent a tablet advising her to study the numbers '5' and '9'.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Those are the numbers of the name of the Blessed Ones. (Báb = 5. Bahá = 9) That is not playing with numbers. e.g., When we ('Abdu'l-Bahá) write a letter, we put the number '9' at the top. This stands for Bahá'u'lláh.

This number is that of the name of the Blessed One.

This time Turkey did not gain anything by entering the war. If she had not entered, it would have been far better for her. But the Páshás believed in these systems. Some said, 'We have made a calculation and found that you will be victorious. Germany will overpower England.' The unfortunate Turkey entered the war and was defeated. The human reason is a gift of God and is better than any other numerical system.

Home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Supper, December 29, 1919.

In connection with a remark made by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Shaykh Farajullah, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that Christ said, 'I am the bread of heaven.' He (the sheikh) must eat bread alone until he follow in the footsteps of his holiness Christ.

He eats beans and he takes soup. We speak in Persian and in Arabic and you don't understand. We speak with you now in English. Praise be to God, we have interpreters. I wish that one day we go to visit the Holy Shrine (of Bah'u'llah). We have an auto now but we will let Mr. Jeffery go on a donkey, on two donkeys. Here donkeys are scarce – good donkeys are found in Egypt.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: I have mentioned and spoken about this subject of mathematics in the meetings in America. Now also tonight I want to say a little about it.

This reality of man encompasses all things and is the discoverer of things. All these things that thou seest were once not existence, but this power which is in man has been hidden. Everything has been hidden. Man has discovered it. That which was hidden has become manifest, such as the telegraph, photograph, electricity. In former centuries it was hidden, no one had any knowledge of it. The power of man has brought it to light. This is personal discovery, or the discovery of a person. The object is this, that before it was hidden, it was an absolute mystery. This power of man has discovered it and also other things have been discovered. There was a time when there was no petrol. The reality of man has discovered it. There was a time when there was no glass, man has brought it from the hidden things – also all the existing arts and present sciences. These present sciences were not here one hundred years ago. The power of man has brought them from the hidden; then it became apparent that in man was a power that was able to discover them and he is the creator of things. Things are hidden, he discovers them. This is clear and apparent. No one can deny it.

Those persons who prognosticate or use numbers – all of them try to concentrate their thoughts and from the excess of thought and concentration they deduce certain meanings and perhaps it may come to pass. But this is not from these numbers and prognosticates, neither from stars but he thinks it is from them while it is the reality of man which discovers them. I said this in America. Is it possible for a person to say that a thing will happen? No. It is the reality of man which has discovered it. But what does he think? He thinks the result is from the prognostication. This is the truth of the matter.

Miss B. asked about a passage in The Íqán, p. 175: ‘All prophets have explained but two letters and he says Gha'im shall bring forth the remaining twenty-five.’

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: Those are the letters of Abjad. There is a tradition which says that when the Gha'im appears all the civilization and sciences which have been existing before will be as one letter, but after the Promised One comes, it becomes twenty-seven. That is, so many discoveries will be made that all those (new) sciences, arts and discoveries are twenty-seven. In Arabic there are twenty-eight letters, in Persian, thirty-two; therefore there are more in the Persian than in the Arabic. Sheikl Almad and Seyyid Kashim Rasht were the forerunners (of The Báb). They were well known persons, that is, they were extraordinary good.

Mrs. L.: In the Words of Paradise, p. 54, ‘There is a wonderful instrument in the earth which has the power to change the atmosphere of the earth.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It does not say it is in the earth, but there is a power which is very strong which will become apparent in future, such as the power of dynamite. That is what he said and it has come to pass. For instance, he said, ‘There will be discovered a thing which is poisonous. Whenever it is discovered, if it reaches the nostrils of persons it will kill them. This become apparent in the late war. The Blessed Perfection said this fifty years ago, but now it has come to pass.’

Miss B.: Daniel prophesied that two-thirds of the people would be destroyed.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This is not the time for the fulfilment of this. The object is that severe things will happen. Two-thirds of the people will perish. In this war many places were destroyed. This is what I said. It will become more severe than this. In this war, one-tenth of the earth was destroyed. A fourth of the people of the world were destroyed. Houses were destroyed. It will be worse than this in the future, because of war and other things – war, cholera, plague, etc.

Miss B.: Will the geography of the earth be changed?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The surface of the earth will be affected. For instance, what has become of the jungles, the places where war was? Ten states of France were destroyed. The banks of the River Rhine were destroyed. Russia was much ruined.

Mrs. P. asked the meaning of ‘There were two women in the field, one was taken and the other left.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: One will accept and the other reject the Revelation.

Lunch, December 30, 1919.

A question was asked concerning the possibility of attaining the station of Christ.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: They have asked if it is possible for a person to reach the station of Christ – whoever suffers or prays, can he reach this station?

No! It cannot be, because Christ was the word of God, the Holy Spirit. This is ancient, but these people are accidental, and the accidental is not ancient. It cannot be.

Any person progresses in his own degree. For instance, this mineral progresses, but, no, no matter how much it progresses, it cannot develop eyes and ears. The highest station it can reach is that of the diamond. Its progress is confined to the mineral kingdom. The same is true of the vegetable kingdom. However much a flower progresses, it cannot have eyes and ears and understanding. The accidental powers cannot achieve that. This is especially for animals. Why? Because the station of the animal is higher than that, and however much an animal may progress, it progresses in its own kingdom. Suppose you gather all the animals, such as the horse, which is in the utmost of beauty, the peacock, which is in the utmost of grace, they cannot attain mind. They cannot reach the station of man. In the same way, souls have degrees. They cannot be compared with the mineral and vegetable. This mineral, however much it progresses, cannot become vegetable.

Now there is a child who cannot remember things. It has no mind, nor power of understanding. However much it may progress, it will not become like an intelligent person.

Those who ask questions must be people of knowledge, so that they may understand. But there are a good many people come and ask questions of me. I answer them, but they don't understand the realities.

Supper, December 30, 1919.

Mrs. P. asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá to tell a story which he had told on a certain occasion at Dublin.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: There was a family in Jazirat-ul-Arab. The Shaykh had a nephew who desired to marry the daughter of the Shaykh. Amongst the Arabs they say that the betrothal of cousins is made in heaven and it is good for them to marry. He said, 'According to the Arab custom, the Shaykh cannot refuse,' nevertheless the Shaykh refused, saying that if anyone would bring the mare of Shaykh Sharyan, he would give his daughter in marriage to that person. This mare was a famous one.

The boy went to the tribe of Shaykh Sharyan. Between the two tribes there was always war and dispute. If they had known that he belonged to the other tribe they would have killed him, so he changed his name and went. For two years he searched for this mare in the hopes of finding it and thus getting the girl. One day when he was crossing the desert, he saw the Shaykh riding on that mare and coming towards him. There was a well there, which was not deep. He threw himself into it. Then he cried aloud, 'Save me, save me!' The Shaykh heard his cries and came and saw him. He asked, 'Who are you? Whence came you?' The boy said, 'I am a stranger. I cannot get out.' The Shaykh undid his headgear and let down the end. He said, 'Take hold of this,' and dragged him out.

While the Shaykh was arranging his headgear, the boy jumped on the mare and started off. The Shaykh cried aloud saying, 'O youth, I cannot reach thee, but I want to know something you did this just for a trick, or because you saw the mare was good?' The youth answered, 'It was a trick.' The Shaykh asked, 'Why did you play this trick?' The youth replied, 'I want this mare in order that I may get the daughter of my uncle in marriage. Her father said that the one brought this mare should have the girl. For two years I have been searching for this mare and now God has given her to me!' The Shaykh replied: 'As this is the reason I make you a present of the mare and forgive you, so you will attain your desire.' The young man came back to him, saying, 'You are very generous. In order that I might attain my desire you freely gave me this mare. I return the mare and will give up the girl as well as the mare.' The Shaykh replied, 'It is impossible that I should accept the mare,' but the youth persisted. Then the Shaykh said, 'Come and be my guest and the mare shall be yours.' The youth answered, 'I will return the mare.' Anyhow he accompanied the Shaykh. The Shaykh called the notables of his tribe and said to them: 'It is God's wish that we should associate with the other tribe. It is better that we should take this mare and the youth and go to the other tribe and give this mare to the head of that tribe, and have this wedding.'

The Shaykh rode with several of his tribe to visit the other tribe. News came to that tribe of the arrival of Shaykh Sharyan. They were surprised and said: 'What has happened that the Shaykh has come?' The visitors arrived and sat down. They said, 'This youth has wished for this mare and has searched for it two years. Now we have come to get the girl for him and to give the mare which was demanded.' The man replied, 'How is this? Tell me how it all happened.' The visitor said, 'This youth took the mare and went. I asked him why he did so and he replied, 'Because of the daughter of my uncle.' Because of this I presented the mare to him and said, 'Because you have been so generous in giving me this mare. He swore and I also swore.' I said, 'We will take the mare and come here and arrange things.' Shaykh Sharyan was a powerful man and so was the youth. The Shaykh of the other tribe said, 'I am no less generous than Shaykh Sharyan or the boy. I will give the girl and do not want the mare.' Thereupon they quarrelled. One said, 'I will not accept,' the other said, 'I will not accept' and the third said, 'I will not accept.' At last they came to an arrangement saying, 'We will have this wedding, and when a child is born, the mare will belong to it.'

Mrs. P. Told how they laughed over this story in Dublin.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Sometimes joking is necessary. Otherwise we would get depressed. The Blessed Beauty said, 'In every twenty-four hours, two hours must be spent in a way that will cause happiness.'

Lunch, Pilgrim House, Haifa, Dec. 31, '19.

(Two Shaykh (Druce), one of them the head of the Druce community were present and sat on the Master's right.)

'Abdu'l-Bahá: See what his holiness Bahá'u'lláh has done, that he has gathered us all and has made us all one! They (the Druses) trust to no other, but they know that we are trustworthy and straight. Their hearts are assured. His holiness Bahá'u'lláh has taken the bonds from our necks and has made us free. This Shaykh is a very esteemed person. He is chief of the Druce community. He is very wealthy.

J. E.: Did the Druses suffer greatly during the war?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: No. – If the weather were good I would take you to visit the Druses' village. They have good mules and horses.

Mrs. P.: It was hearing of the people of different religions sitting around your table that attracted me to the Bahá'í movement. Now I have seen it for myself.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: God willing, you will see many things. There are still many things to be seen. When you go to Persia you will see many things. We could not spread the cause of Bahá'u'lláh in these regions (the neighbourhood of Haifa and ‘Akká) because the Turkish government prevented us. The Shaykh is inviting you all to his place.

Dr. E.: We should all be delighted to go.

Supper, December 31, 1919.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In the world of existence is it possible that the truth should not become known? No. e g., If we were not faithful towards the government they certainly would find out. In the times of the Turkish government they thought at first that we were not, but in the end it will become apparent that we were faithful. It does not matter how much they investigate at court – see how much they tried us and suspected that we were not faithful to the government, but at last it was proved. An intelligent man will always adhere to divine truth. If he does not do so it is certainly that it will become proved. The Turkish government wanted to prove us guilty and ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd was always trying to find something against us, but in the end it was proved that we were faithful. This shows that nothing is better than honesty. (Before supper ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had remarked that the British government paused all letters addressed to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá without opening them – thus showing their entire confidence in his faithfulness. He had just received a batch of letters from Germany unopened.) The Turkish government at first used to open all letters, but finding that there was nothing political and nothing against the government in them, they used later to pass many of them unopened. During the war ‘Abdu’l-Bahá received a letter from the Persian Consul in New York – an American – containing violent denunciation of the Turks and one from Mr. Dreyfus speaking very strongly against Germany, but, by the Providence of God, both were pass unopened.

Mrs. P. quoted two texts: “It must needs be that offences come, but woe unto that man through whom the offence cometh.” “Ye are never tempted above what ye are able to bear.” (Baul) and asked for an explanation regarding individual responsibility.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This is an intricate subject and must be investigated with great care. It is a complicated problem, and has baffled the comprehension of all. Its explanation is difficult. If you knew Persian or Arabic it would be easier. I will tell you about it briefly.

The general opinion is that whatever proceeds from man springs from his own will and has nothing to do with God. Whatever man does is created by man himself and for this reason.

This is the opinion of the philosophers. The philosophers of religion on the other hand, say thus: "It is not so man is powerless. Of himself, he can do nothing. All is from God. This is the truth – not that." Now we must explain this.

It is unquestionable that there is no one but God. He is the Creator of deeds. Our help comes only from God. If God does not help, what can we do? Notwithstanding this, man's efforts count. Take, for example, the Governor here. Who has given him his power? The English government has given him the power, to do as he wishes. Now it is possible that he may do either justice or injustice. Justice is good, injustice is bad. If the English government has given him his power, he can do no justice except through this power. The minute the English government says, 'You are dismissed,' his power ceases. Can he do any oppression after his dismissal? No! Whatever he does is through the power of the government. But if he does injustice, that is not the fault of the government.

I say this again. You must consider it carefully. This is one of the most difficult questions.

Take another example. You come from America on board a steamer. What moved a steamer? Fire! If there were no fire, no steam, could the steamer come here? No! Could it go from here to America? No! Then the power of steam brought the steamer here, and it will carry it from here to America. The power of the steam, and not the steamer itself, is the propelling force. This power is from God. According to the will of the commander it will propel the ship wherever he wishes. If he wishes to go to the East, the steam carried the ship to the East. If to the West, the ship is carried to the West. The power of God is similar to this steam. If that help is cut off, the steamer cannot go either to the East or to the West. It will remain without motion, absolutely. The going of the steamer to the East or to the West is in the hand of man. The will of man through the real power directs him to any point he desires. Therefore it is said, "The real power is from God."

Take another example: (Here 'Abdu'l-Bahá moved his fingers.) These members of man moved through the power of the spirit. If there was no spirit, no member could move. When all those members are perfect, the movements are in order. The spirit causes this orderly motion. But if an illness affects the hand the movement is impaired. For instance he wishes to move the fingers to one side, but they go to the other, owing to paralysis. Whether the movement be normal or abnormal, both are from the spirit. If there be not the power of the spirit, the hand cannot move. If there be no spirit, can this hand move? No! This hand moves through the power of spirit. But the regularity of the movement is not through the spirit – is not from God. The work which a man does is through the power man has given him. If the power were not given him by God, he could do neither both good nor bad. But if he does bad work, God is not the cause of that. It is like the steam. Whether it moves regularly or irregularly, is due to the directing force. Notwithstanding this, the irregularity of the movement is from man and not from the spirit.

I will illustrate in another way: I can caress Fugeta or I can slap him. Both will be by the power of the spirit. If I strike him, it will be because of my intention, not because of the spirit. It will be because of my wish to do so. The striking is by power of the spirit through my desire. Have you understood it now?

I will give you a short example: This movement of my hand is known of God. The movement of a tree God knows. Both are from God, but there is a difference. The tree has no will, but I have. The creator of both movements is God, but there is a difference between the movement of my hand and that of the tree. A leaf moves, but without will, but my hand moves by will. Both of these movements are from God.

Supper, January 1, 1920.

General Allenby and his wife spent a day here, from morning to evening. He went to see the prison and the barracks and visited the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh.

Mrs. P. said she heard Gen. Allenby was going to be governor here.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Perhaps. Now he is governor in Egypt. He is a very humble person.

Miss B.: What is the form or condition of the human spirit before it becomes connected with the identity at the time of birth on this place?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The reality of spirit, because it is not corporeal, cannot be in bodily form. We cannot say it is like the fire, or like the water, or like flame, or like odor. In the world of man it has no likeness. The utmost is to satisfy the hearer. It is beyond explanation, for it is a reality of the intellect, and not a thing which can be perceived. Perceptible realities can be explained. But the intellectual realities cannot be explained by or through words. You may try to explain by words. For instance, the mind itself is the intellectual reality. It cannot be seen or heard or smelled or tasted or touched. This is the intellectual reality and is not perceptible by the senses. If you wish to explain it by the senses, it is impossible. You say it is the discoverer of the reality of things. This is the encompasser. This is the discoverer. This is the maker of rules. This is the cause of order in the world. The world of existence moves because of this. Those are its qualities. You cannot explain the reality of it in terms of the world of perception, for it cannot be perceived.

Miss. B.: What is the difference between soul and spirit?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: They mean the same. It is one reality. The names are different. We must consider it according to its use. Because it is the discoverer of reality, they call it intellect, for it is the cause of the true life of man. When it produces an effect on one, we speak of it as the hearts whilst these three things are one. For instance (pointing to a cup), this is called in ‘fenjan,’ in Persian: ‘cup’ in English; In Arabic. And these names are for this article.

Miss B.: Is ‘reality’ another name for the same thing?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It is another name, another quality, for this.

Pilgrim House, Haifa, January 2, 1920.

Question: Was it right for Bahá’ís to buy ‘Liberty Bonds’ to carry on the war?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That is passed now. An arrow that has been shot does not return to the bow. There is nothing to be gained by talking about it now.

Q. But if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were to give his opinion about it this new, it would be a guide for similar occasions in the future.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This is not a time to buy ‘paper.’

Q. What should be done about the ‘Liberty Bonds’ that were sent as contributions to the Mashrak-ol-Akhar fund?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That rests with the Convention to decide.

Mrs. P.: Who is to decide on the piano for the Mashrak-ol-Akhar?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That rests ‘with the delegates to the Convention – not all those present at the Convention, the delegates only – not strangers. The Convention is like a parliament. The delegates represent the opinion of the whole body of believers. What they decide unanimously or by a majority, must be accepted. The majority must rule.

L. B.: I am afraid the Convention will have a hard time unless ‘Abdu’l-Bahá prays for us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Your duty is to go with the majority and accept to decisions.

Mrs. P.: Then it is the delegates to the Convention and not the Unity Board that have to decide on the plans?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. The delegates must decide. The Board must carry out the decisions of the Convention. There must be order. It cannot be that everybody has the right of interference; in that case nothing would be accomplished.

Dr. C.: They say that all organization is forbidden by the teachings.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That is all talk. The text of the Blessed Book cannot be changed. No one can interfere with it. Things not definitely stated in the Book are referred to the House of Justice. Whatever the House of Justice decided, that is obligatory. Now it is not possible for all the world to come together. The Convention is similar to the House of Justice to a certain extent. Its decision and laws must be carried out.

Dr. C.: In the beginning of the ‘Big Ben’ pamphlet, the words occur: ‘The Bahá’í Revelation is not an organization. The Bahá’í cause can never be organized.’ Is this a correct translation?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No. That gives the wrong idea. In the cause of Bahá’u’lláh there is the Beit-ul-Ad’l (House of Justice). Political affairs are not explicitly settled in the tablets. They are referred to the House of Justice. Whatever the House of Justice decides to obligatory. In the writings of Bahá’u’lláh instructions are given with regard to worship, but the assembly of the House of Justice sees that at one time a certain arrangement to necessary and at another time a different arrangement. It is not circumscribed in its action. One hundred years ago – one ruling was necessary, today, another, tomorrow, perhaps, another. Therefore the cause of God Is not rigidly circumscribed. It is in accordance with the exigenciss of time and place. The political affairs are not definitely fixed by Bahá’u’lláh. This is the object of what is sad in the Book of Aqdas. Bahá’u’lláh says: ‘Political affairs are referred to the House of Justice.’ Whatever they think wise accordingly to the requirements of time and place ought to be carried out. But the command of worship is to be found in the Book. Political things will not remain unchanged. The politics of one hundred years ago are quite impracticable today. For example there was slavery one hundred years ago. Could that be carried out now?

The members of the House of justice will be inspired. Whenever it is established it will be under the protection of the Blessed Beauty. Whatever the House of Justice decides is the will of the Blessed One. In this was there is order – otherwise there will be confusion. The Bahá’í laws are not rigid and unalterable. Whatever the House of Justice decides must be carried out.

Dictated: “Political laws in the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh are not rigidly fixed. Whatever decision is arrived at by the members of the House of Justice (which is like a parliament) either unanimously or by a majority – according to the requirements of time and place – that is the law of God. In other words the cause of Bahá’u’lláh is not circumscribed, for this reason, that circumstances of time and place change. For instance, the laws of America cannot be carried out here, and the laws of this place would be unsuitable for America. The circumstances are different.”

“In the time of Moses, the children of Israel were in the wilderness. There was no ease and comfort. Therefore ten offenses were made punishable by death. In the time of Christ there were towns and cities and civilization. The exigencies of the time did not require those ten laws for capital punishment, so he abolished them. Why? Because the time and circumstances were different. In the former time these laws were necessary, nut in Christ’s time, they were no longer necessary and in this time other arrangements are required.”

Dr. E.: “It is misleading, is it not, to say that the Bahá’í cause cannot be organized?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “How is it possible that there should be no organization? Even in a household, if there is not organization there will be hopeless confusion. Then what about the world? What is meant is that the organization is not rigid. In ancient times it was rigid. In the Torah all the political affairs were rigidly fixed, but in this cause they are not. In this cause there are political freedom, i.e., in each time the House of Justice is free to decide in accordance with what it deems expedient.

This is a brief explanation of the matter.”

Supper, January 2, 1920.

Evening, after Mírzá Maḥmúd’s marriage.

Talking of the marriage ceremony, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

“Here we do not have much talking but there (in America) they speak so much that nobody can follow what they say. In was invited to a wedding in America. People were talking in couples. In the East, one talks and the rest listen. When he has finished another will speak, but they do not talk so much. Every place has its special customs. Every nation likes its own ways. At Christian weddings they smoke cigars and the room becomes filled with smoke.”

Dr. E. remarked that it was nice to have the bride and groom take part in the ceremony themselves, as in the West, instead of by deputy.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It is so now. Everything depends on the time. Now it is impossible in the East for the bride to appear.

Mrs. P: In America all the interest centers in the bride. The groom is insignificant.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The marriage which is associated with spirituality and illumination is good. In the Arab districts only the bride and bridegroom are present. They place two stones. The bridegroom stand on one and the bride on the other, opposite each other. The bridegroom says, ‘I am on one stone and all the world is witness that thou art my wife and I thy husband.’ The words are few but comprehensive. In the religion of God the consent of both parties is necessary. No one can compel a couple to marry – at most we give permission, we do not interfere more than this. Both parties must consent then the consent of the parents on both sides is necessary. This is obligatory. In the East it was customary that the girl was not consulted in the matter at all. She knew nothing whatever about it. Her father would give her to some man and she could not protest. To whomsoever he thought best he would give her. But the Blessed Beauty in the Kitáb-el-Aqdas, explicitly says that no one must interfere between the two, without the consent of both sides and the consent of the parents the marriage cannot take place. But you in America and Europe attach no importance to the parents consent, the young people do as they wish. If the parents are not agreeable, it will lead to inharmony.

In the East, among the Muḥammadans and Christians, there is no love between the bride and her mother-in-law, as a rule; there is continual quarrelling and contention, because the consent of the parents has not been obtained for the marriage. Of course the mother does not wish for her son to marry someone she disapproves of and the son resents here interference. But amongst the Bahá'í it is very rare to find any unkindness amongst relations by marriage. As regards divorce, Bahá'u'lláh says that if a husband and wife cannot agree, there should be a preliminary separation of one year. If at the end of the year there is no reconciliation, then divorce is permissible. Because both sides would be in torment, separation is better. In the Bahá'í marriage the husband and wife must be in the utmost happiness together.

Mrs. P.: During the year friends on both sides must try to bring about reconciliation, should they not?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes. The object of marriage is to create a family. Therefore marriage must be very carefully considered. The Blessed Beauty said that we must marry so that children may arise to be the cause of the illumination of the world. The blessings of God are apparent.

Pilgrim House, Haifa, Lunch January 3, 1920.

Mrs. P.: It was the delegates and not the Unity Board who were to decide, was it not? This was spoken of yesterday but the notes were not taken. Will the Master please repeat so it may be taken down today?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The object is that all affairs ought to be referred to the Convention, that is, the Assembly which is composed of the representatives from the different assemblies sent to the Convention, not all the people gathered for the meetings. If all people present in the meetings take part in the discussions it would not do.

Mrs. P.: It was said by some that the Unity Board should be the deciding body.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No! Not in general affairs. The nation chooses representatives. These representatives make an Assembly of the nation. Now affairs are in the hands of the Assembly of the nation. Are the affairs in the hands of the Assembly of the nations or in the hands of the people? No doubt all affairs are in the hands of the Assembly of the nation, not in the hands of everybody. This Assembly of the Convention is like the Assembly of the nation or Parliament. Those members are elected by the nation. All affairs are referred to Parliament, not to the people. Parliament discusses affairs and reaches a decision. The Convention is like that and this meeting sees to the affairs and whatever the meeting decides the Executive Board must carry out. Did you understand?

Mrs. P.: Yes!

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The essential thing now is teaching. This gathering of the Convention is for the object, also to arrange for the building of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár or for choosing people to go out as teachers. These are the objects. In Persia there are no Conventions. There is a spiritual assembly in each city and all are engaged in teaching. People should be engaged in teaching the cause. Teaching should make one full of joy and happiness. It will attract one, it will bring spiritual susceptibilities, it gives extreme happiness and joyfulness. One's own self becomes enriched thereby. Teaching the cause is the most important work in which any one can engage, for in any other work there will not be such results as in this. Give great importance to work of importance and this is not to be brought under special rules. It can't be. They should teach in any way possible. This will bring happiness; it also brings one nearer the kingdom of Abhá. It will be the cause of joy and happiness and refreshes one.

Dr. C. said he hoped we would return so filled with power and that our words might not arouse antagonism.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Leave unsaid anything that would create disagreement. It is not necessary to touch upon such subjects. Bahá’u’lláh says that whoever is the cause of differences should be avoided. In any problem if two people disagree both are in the wrong. He did not say, one is right, the other wrong. This is to prevent the arising of dissension.

Mrs. P.: Would it be wrong is quite the thing is forgotten. When discussion is forbidden the matter will be dropped. I will illustrate by a story: ‘I was in New York. An old lady of eighty years who was a little out of her mind came to me one day and said, “The spiritual assembly has made a certain decision. I want to discuss the matter before you and them. You please call them. I will prove their faults.” I said, “If you have any difference of opinions do not come to me and tell me. It will create trouble.” She said, “It is necessary and I know all about them.” “Well then go and tell them,” I said. She said “They will not listen to me.”“ She wanted to do this to have it known that she had opposed them. This is illness and malady.

Mrs. P.: I know the majority vote should decide questions, such as where to hold the Convention, and the question of all arrangements shirt of a matter of conscience. But when it comes to a matter of principle should one go against ones conscience?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: You cannot go according to an individual's conscience. Each one thinks he is right (concerning a subject) this must be considered. If each should move according to his conscience, disturbances would arise. Can you find two persons in the world having the same conscience in every detail? No! Now this must be considered. If there be a crowd, the difficulty increases.

Mrs. P.: I have to bring this to a more personal issue. I am willing to be told if I have made a mistake. A meeting was called in Chicago in December to hear the findings of a certain committee. I know of those findings and objected to the methods of procedure of the committee. Between December and April, when the committee met in Chicago, the findings of this committee were spread and caused each assembly to be divided into two camps. Disapproving of this, did I do right to remain away from the Convention or should I have gone and opposed this procedure?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Now this is a problem that is passed. If we speak of matters that have passed it will not bring joy and happiness. Let us speak of subjects that will bring happiness and joy. If we speak on these subjects we will not become happy, nay, rather, it will depress us. We have gathered here for joy and happiness.

Mrs. P.: I think we are able to learn lessons from past experiences.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This Convention which is held every year whatever decisions are reached must be accepted, for this is a general gathering. To a certain degree it is like the House of Justice, but it is not the House of Justice. Bahá’u’lláh says, ‘Whatever the House of Justice does that is my command. They cannot go against it.’ Suppose tomorrow there is a House of Justice, whatever command they would give could not be interfered with by anyone. The people must obey. For instance, Christ said that they must go about and teach, giving the glad tidings. Perhaps one might say, ‘I do not think wise and when we find a seeker, we will speak to him.’ Is that the way to obey that command? Whatever the House of Justice commands must be obeyed.

Mrs. P.: To follow Christ, Bahá’u’lláh, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, is very different. People in the time of the establishment of the House of Justice will be more spiritual.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: I said the Convention is similar to the House of Justice – not that it is the House of Justice. If it is not so one thousand sects of religion would arise. Each one would rise up to cause disturbance and would say, ‘My conscience says it is not good.’ Another would say, ‘My conscience says, “This is good”’ and they cannot agree on anything. Perhaps this little one (Pointing to Miss B.) would arise and start a sect, Fugeta another, Mrs. L., another, Dr. C., another, J., another, (as he pointed to each other in turn.) You would ask why and they would say, ‘Our conscience.’

Mrs. P.: Afterwards will the House of Justice, (Well ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told us to put this aside.)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Put this question aside. If I speak on this subject great disturbances will result. Should I speak on this subject do you know what will happen in America? Forget the past.

Mrs. P.: I am perfectly willing to do this.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: I desire that all your talks create spirituality, create happiness, create joy.

Dr. E.: I take it that the only thing that would prevent a majority vote would be in a matter contrary to the written teachings of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It is the explicit text of Bahá’u’lláh that no one should disagree. He (The Blessed Beauty) said, ‘Whatever the House of Justice decided, that is my command.’ The purpose of this is that no one can say that the House of Justice has made a mistake. If this is said, it is the same as saying that the Blessed Beauty made a mistake. If in meeting one does not accept a decision he must be quiet. If he does not like it he must be quiet but not do anything which will cause differences. He must not say this is wrong, he must be quiet and then there will not be any controversy. There are a number of people in America who are waiting to find some matter for controversy. For instance, you say it is day. Two or three will arise and say, 'No, it is night.' Especially those women of eighty years and more, I want to close all these doors (of controversy) so that there should remain no more of these things. They should speak of love, faith, mercy, teaching the cause of God, but questions other than these have engaged the people of America. Wherever they go this is to be put aside. In Persia there are none of these things, none whatever. There is no Convention. There is a spiritual assembly. If the spiritual assembly in a city decided a thing, if one does not like it he does not object, he remains silent. They are engaged in teaching morals; they have meetings for ethics, meetings in which they teach spiritual civilization. Nothing causes them to say this is bad. If he does not like a certain proposal he does not enter it. If he likes it he will join in. Now I want to become like mannered.

Pilgrim House, Lunch, January 4, 1920.

Question: Did Christ walk on this mountain (Carmel)?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes! He came several time because the people of Galilee were very much against him; also the people of Tiberias, therefore he used to come to this mountain.

Q: Were the people more friendly to him here?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: They were not so bad here. That is why Christ said, ‘A prophet is not without honor save in his own country.’ His own country was Galilee.

Q: Was Haifa a town in the time of Christ?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes! It is ancient. It is one of the Phoenician towns. ‘Akká is also ancient. It was also Phoenician. Haifa or Gaifa gets its name because it is at the foot of the mountain. The name is Phoenician, not Hebrew. The Phoenicians were here 2500 years before Christ.

Q. Did Christ speak Arabic?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It was not pure Hebrew, because the Romans have occupied Palestine. The Romans, Chaldeans and Assyrians were mixed and the language was a mixture. In ancient times the Arameans were at Damascus and its neighbourhood. There were two tribes in these regions at that time. Both disappeared. There were also Sodom, Adum and Amur. Sodom was the town were Lot lived...

The conversation turned to the subject of food.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that the body of man was in need of seventeen elements. In this kind of pea, eleven of these elements are present and six are lacking; in beans, nine of these elements are present and eight are lacking. In bread (whole wheat bread) all the seventeen elements are present. Therefore it is possible for man to live all his life and keep healthy in bread. He cannot live in peas alone. If he does so for a year he will become ill. Eggs also have all the seventeen elements and so have milk, but eggs and meat are not suitable for all. The fatty elements in them does not agree with some. Excess of eggs is not good, it will prove injurious.

Q. Would eating eggs induce cancer?

Q. What about eggs and milk?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: it is heavy. Whatever man needs is in bread. Meat is for carnivorous animals such as the lion and leopard. See! Man has no claws for tearing meat. This proves that meat is not his natural food. Animals and birds that have sharp claws are meat-eating, but man has not claws. The lion has curved teeth for seizing and tearing meat. He cannot eat bread or grains. He must eat meat.

Fugeta asked whether it was right to fish?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It is permissible, but I should not do it myself. I never hunt or fish, but your friends the Japanese fish very much. Their food is mostly rice and fish.

Q. Will ferocious beasts like the lion disappear?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In many places they have disappeared already. In the British Isles there are no lions or wolves, or bears. Many of the ferocious animals of old have completely disappeared ages ago. All these things are according to the divine will. We can see the remains of these animals in museums.

In the Master’s Salon, before Supper, January 4, 1920.

(Jeffery, Mr. Chant, and Mírzá Shírázî had gone to Jerusalem)

Q.: Is the suppose sepulchre of Christ really the place of his burial?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: For three-hundred years after Christ’s death no one searched for his grave. Rubbish was depodited there. The mother of the Emperor Constantine came to Jerusalem and made careful enquiries to ascertain the place and they have to the conclusion that the grave was there. This is the truth that for three-hundred years they used to put rubbish in it.

Q.: I hear there are two reputed burial places, which is the correct one?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Opinions differ, but the general opinion is that it is there (i.e., at the Church of the Sepulchre). Christ at the time of his death was oppressed; also after his death and during his lifetime, he was oppressed. This oppression has turned the world upside down. It destroyed all the nations, but he himself was elevated. All the flags of the nations came down, but the one of Christ was exalted. All this because of oppression.

Supper, January 4, 1920.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá told us of his talk with two newspaper reporters concerning the Revelation. These reports were taken down to be forwarded to Belgium papers by these reporters.

Lunch, January 5, 1920.

Dr. C. heard in America that a crypt was to be built in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár in Chicago.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Whatever anyone thinks he says, but do not trust to what is said unless I have written about it. Whatever I have written with my own hand, that is correct.

Dr. C. heard that the remains of the Blessed Beauty would be transferred from ‘Akká.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: I have not said so. Do not accept anybody’s word unless it is from my pen.

Dr. C.: What was the age of Karratu’l-Ayn before her acceptance of the Báb’s declaration, also when martyred?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: She had passed her thirtieth year and after five years she was martyred. That is, when she was martyred she was about forty years old. The work, not the age of a person is the important thing. She was very humble. She would treat any other woman as if she were that person’s maidservant.

Mr. P. said that she heard that the tablet that was read at the wedding of Mírzá Maḥmúd had been revealed by the Blessed Beauty for a member of the household.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The father of this girl (bride of Mírzá Maḥmúd) was martyred. When this girl was quite young, her father was killed and all the property was confiscated, causing her to grow up amidst great trials. Therefore the utmost of favour was shown to her. The girl, her mother and grandmother went through great hardships. Her grandmother was very good, very noble, had great knowledge, was revered, busy continually with the mention of God, not resting for a moment. After they had martyred their son-in-law, the Governor sent for her. As she entered the door he kicked her under his feet, beat her on the head with his feet till she became unconscious and like one dead. They left her. Her brother came and placing her on the shoulders of a man she was carried home. Because of this so much favour has been shown to this girl. Before the grandmother became a Bahá’í she was greatly esteemed and distinguished among women because of her goodness and her personality. The brother of the grandmother was also greatly esteemed, though he was not a Bahá’í. Had it not been for this brother she would have been killed. He was one of the great Mullá of Persia. He came and took her from Iṣfahán to Mashhad in the province of Khurasán. He said to her (his sister), ‘My sister, beware not to speak another word on this subject. You went through trouble in Iṣfahán and we have left there. Do not, do not speak here because here is the place we are visiting.' These people who make a pilgrimage come from great distances and it is the custom that both in the morning and afternoon the tomb is visited. For instance, they go from morning to noon. This brother went in the morning to visit the tomb. She knew he would not return soon, so she went from house to house every morning and afternoon. Once her brother found out that she had thought many women. He took her and went away saying, 'They will kill you and me.' She was very spiritual. If one were to sit and talk with her from morning to night they would not become tired. She was very unassuming and when she spoke tears would come to the eyes of her hearers.

Supper, January 5, 1920.

'Abdu'l-Bahá had succeeded in securing butter and told Mrs. P. that he had done so because he knew that in America, butter was used on the bread. Mrs. P. said she could get on without it.

Pilgrim House, Lunch, January 6, 1920.

Mrs. P.: I am sure no one would object to this if it is given in public. When the speakers call 'Abdu'l-Bahá by other names argument arises. Will 'Abdu'l-Bahá tell us about it?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: I like this name but the Blessed Beauty has given other names also. Amongst the names, I like this name, but if the person calls me 'The Greatest Branch' I cannot object. He has said, 'The Branch branched from the pre-existent Root,' But I like this name. Whoever calls me by this name, ('Abdu'l-Bahá) I become happy.

Mrs. P. We love other names as well. What is 'Abdu'l-Bahá's instruction concerning what we should say concerning 'Abdu'l-Bahá's station to new believers and the public.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Tell them 'Abdu'l-Bahá' is my name and his signature is 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Mrs. P.: Is it right to explain to those interested about other names also.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Tell them the Blessed Beauty has given them – for there are hypocrites who say 'My Lord' but their intention is to weaken the faith of the believers. 'Abdu'l-Bahá calls himself 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but you can tell them the Blessed Beauty gives him other titles. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá says 'Abdu'l-Bahá so that Náqíḍín shall have no grounds (for opposition). Tell them 'Abdu'l-Bahá say: 'I am 'Abdu'l-Bahá'. The Náqíḍín mention those other names so that they may be able to cause troubles. One cannot speak in glorification of one's self. The others should do that. If one says, 'I am polite, I have done such and such good actions,' – that would be a sign of hypocrisy. The one who praises himself – you should take no heed of him. I have written, 'May my spirit be a sacrifice for the dust of the feet of the friends.' Some people have thought that if the Covenant and Testament have weakened, it will be a good thing for them. There are some who think so. Beware of this. Their intention is to glorify themselves – like Dr. Farees and Mírzá Asadu'lláh. These things are like foam – they pass away. Let us speak of things which make us happy. Let them say what they like. Let them call me 'Abbás.' I like 'Abbás'. I always sign myself 'Abbás' when I write a poem. Man must have deeds. What do names matter?

The people have many titles, but what is the use of them? He must show works. One of his titles is 'Lion,' but he is not worth as much as a cat – yet his name is 'Lion'.

Miss B.: We heard in Persia that the Bahá'í cause is stronger than the Catholic church.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: It is more powerful – there is no comparison. The Catholic church is like a drop, but the cause of Bahá'u'lláh is like the open. The Catholic church is but a name. They are worshipping the dead bones.

Miss B.: Should we give the Message to the Catholics?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Yes! There is no harm.

Mrs. P. told of giving the Message to a young priest on his way to Rome. While she was talking to him to others listened and asked questions.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: According to statistics, the Pope has sixty-thousand souls working under him – Cardinals, Bishops, Clergy of various ranks, missionaries, nuns. They claim three-hundred million followers. They have also one-hundred millions in wealth, but they are declining day by day. I have nothing; I am single and alone, but the world is disturbed. Astonishing news comes from Tíhrán, Irak (Mesopotamia) and from all parts of Persia, from Tabriz, from Khurasán and anywhere. In Kirmán and Kafsánjan there is resurrection. The resurrection is in progress. In the meetings all are engaged in the commemoration of God. Some believe and some deny. It is extraordinary.

Mrs. P.: When will the physicians learn to treat by proper diet?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: Ere long, during this century. I treat myself always by diet. Yesterday I treated myself with this butter. Today it was not necessary, so I did not eat it. One day at Adrianople I was with the Governor and we went to a garden where pears are growing. The Governor picked some pears with his own hand and gave them to me, insisting that I should eat them. I did not want them, but he insisted, so, being embarrassed, I ate. The effect was disastrous. Immediately it affected my chest. I fell down and had to be taken home. The Governor came home with me. They put me on bed. One brought me tea, another something else. I said, 'Bring me salt.' I put a lump in my mouth. It tasted then better than sugar. I began to suck it. The Governor asked, 'What are you doing?' I said, 'I am taking medicine.' He said, 'What medicine?' I said, 'Salt.' He said, 'My God, my God, what a medicine!' I took another piece and began to suck it and a third piece. I felt better and the trouble was gone. The Governor said, 'What are you doing?' I said, 'I am alright now.' The Governor had a book in his pocket, taking it out he made a memorandum, 'Whoever becomes ill from eating pears should eat salt.'

In 'Akká there was a man, very short, an artist a very good man. His name was Hádí. One day he came to me and said, 'This malaria is killing me. I have had it for two years. The doctors prescribed medicine and it gets better for a few days, but returns. I am dying.' I joked with him, saying, 'You do not take any food.' He said, 'O yes, I eat very well!' jokingly I said, 'What food do you like best? I will mention the different foods and you tell me what you like best – pilau, abgousht, koftah (made with pounded meat), baqlaba (a sweet pastry with ground nuts), sweets, dried sour milk with shourba.' When I said 'shourba-e-Kashk (dried sour-milk mixed with broth) he said, 'and put some garlic in.' I said, 'Very well.' They prepared it for him and he got well. Then he was ill at another time and he told them to prepare the same thing for him. That time he ate it and died. ('Abdu'l-Bahá did not order it the last time.)

Wedding Feast, Afternoon, January 6, 1920.

Sobhi chanted a long prayer revealed by Bahá'u'lláh for the marriage of one of the friends.

Hájí 'Alí represented the bridegroom (Bahrám) and the bride was represented by ( ? ).

Each of these deputies had two witnesses. When the deputies were seated before 'Abdu'l-Bahá, with their respective witnesses behind them (standing) 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked the two witnesses of Hájí 'Alí: 'What do you witness?'

They replied, 'We witness that Bahrám has appointed Hájí 'Alí as his deputy.' He then asked a similar question of the two witnesses of the bride's deputy and received a similar answer. The Master then made the bride's deputy and received a similar answer. The Master then made the bride's deputy repeat the following words, 'I marry the one whom I represent, Zarintaj , the daughter of Áqá Ḥabíbu'lláh, to the one whom you represent, for nineteen miskals of gold and I asked God for confirmation.' The answer was, 'I also accept.'

Lunch, January 7, 1920.

Mrs. P.: Will 'Abdu'l-Bahá explain further what he means by the words, 'The only thing to disperse differences is the power of the Covenant.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: First of all the Blessed Beauty made this Covenant so that there should remain no differences. If there remain any disagreements amongst the friends, or differences as to the meaning of the Book – in whatever way they may arise any difference, Bahá'u'lláh says explicitly turn to Him (i.e., to the Center of the Covenant), whatever he says is correct; and after him to the House of Justice. What is this for? It is to dispel differences. If there are any differences among the friends – e.g., between you and Dr. E. – whatever I say, Bahá'u'lláh says, is correct. If I say you are in the right, the other one must obey: If I say he must follow you, he must do so, that there may remain no differences. This is for the Bahá'í unity, without this, no Bahá'í unity can be obtained. Notwithstanding that his holiness Christ said nothing about Peter except the one word, 'Thou art the rock and upon this rock I built my church,' this word became the cause of dispelling differences, so that whatever Peter said, the others would accept. Should Peter say, 'I believe so,' the others would say, 'His holiness has said that thou art the rock, Peter's faith is correct. Whoever believes in whatever Peter believes, he is a Christian.'

This saying of Christ is a tradition. It is not from the pen of his holiness. It is possible the one should deny it, but the Blessed Beauty made this Covenant with his supreme pen. No one can question it or deny it. He made it so that no differences of opinion they should be referred to him (the Center of the Covenant), 'therefore the Covenant is the greatest power. The Blessed Beauty is with his Covenant and helps his Covenant. This power is the power of the Blessed Beauty. Who can withstand it? The Yahyáís could not stand against it. They became humiliated and submissive. Whoever tried to oppose it perished, because the Blessed Beauty is the assister of his cause. No one can say, 'This is my opinion,' if there had not been the Covenant, there would have been by now one-thousand sects.

Mrs. P.: Was not Peter chosen by Christ because he had recognized Christ's station as the Son of God?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: His Holiness Christ wished his followers to understand that whatever Peter said was correct. His holiness was stating a general rule and not referring to a particular case. He does not say that in any particular case, Peter was right. He said, 'Thou art Peter and I shall erect my church upon thee.' Had he told Peter that this particular testimony of his was right, it would not be stating a general principle. No one objected, whatever Peter said they would accept. But this saying of Christ was an explicit Covenant (like that made by Bahá'u'lláh). His holiness does not say that if the people did not understand the meaning of the Bible they must turn to Peter. We must talk a little of the things which bring happiness.

Because these things refer to me I do not want to talk about them, but you force me. If I do not speak on this subject, divisions will arise, but I prefer not to talk of myself. I wish always to talk of the Blessed Beauty, of the things which will bring happiness and be the cause of progress and of the illumination. Whatever you wish to know about the Blessed Beauty ask. Whatever your heart wishes about him, ask. I know of nothing else but him. Ask about him, I know, for I am annihilated in him.

Mrs. P.: I wish I could get some stories about his youth.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: I have already told such stories. Whatever I say of the Blessed Beauty to anyone it belongs to all. These Náqíḍín talk and say that I will write,

‘May my life be a sacrifice to the dust of the feet of the friends!’ but the friends cannot write to me, ‘May you be a sacrifice for the dust of my feet.’ Could he write so? Could he say so? Now the Náqídíń say, ‘As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá writes, May I be a sacrifice for the dust of your feet,’ this shows that the dust of our feet is nobler than he. They say that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his prayer says, I am ignorant. ‘ so ‘Abdu’l-Bahá confesses that he is ignorant. He says I am a sinner. This I say, but no other person can say that I am a sinner. Do not you pray, ‘O God forgive me!’ Can anyone say to another, ‘O thou sinner, whilst he himself is a sinner?’

On said to Christ, ‘Good Lord,’ and Christ replied. ‘Why callest thou me good? There is none good save one, that is God.’ Can we say that Christ was a sinner? It is permissible for one in the station of his holiness Christ to say so but can anyone else say that Christ was a sinner? No! Was he not a well-doer? He said that because of his humility and submissiveness. He was the best well-doer of all.

sooner.’ But instead of that his cause was elevated. He paid no heed to the Ottoman power. This is why the Ottoman minister became so angry. The Persian Ambassador was authorized by the Persian government to exert himself to the utmost to get the Blessed Beauty removed from Constantinople to Adrianople. He tried so much that he nearly killed himself in the attempt. Because of his efforts he went to Persia hoping to become Prime Minister and receive his reward. When he went to Persia he said, ‘Whatever I can do in the matter of exiling the Blessed Beauty, I did and my efforts were ultimately successful in getting him sent to ‘Akká, but this was a very difficult affair.’ But the justification for it is this: When Bahá’u’lláh arrived in Constantinople he became the cause of the honor of Persia, for he took no notice of the Ottoman government. All other Persians who have come even the princes, have been the cause of Persia’s humiliation for they used to go to the minister’s houses begging – one would beg a living, another would beg nationalization and so on. But when Bahá’u’lláh arrived in Constantinople he paid no heed to us (Persian officials) nor to the Ottoman government.’ He (the Ambassador) was an enemy and this is the wishes he gave.

They sent the Blessed Beauty from Constantinople. His cause became elevated and when they sent him to the prison for murderers and highway robbers in ‘Akká, in that prison he raised his banner. He wrote epistles to all the sovereigns. He wrote to Napoleon 3rd, to the Emperor of Germany, to the Queen of England, to the King of Austria, to the Pope, to the Sháh of Persia, to the Ottoman Vizír (‘Alí Páshá), to Sulţán ‘Abdu’l ‘Azíz. In prison his power became apparent. This was a manifest proof. In Surat-ul-Hykl, these letters are published.

J. E.: Was the letter to Ra’is addressed to the Sulţán of Turkey or to the Vizire?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: To the Vizír (Prime Minister) – ‘Alí Páshá in whose hands was the control of affairs.

Dr. C.: Did Bahá'u'lláh write to the United States.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá: Yes! He wrote to the President of the Republic who was killed. It is in the beginning of Hykl – all of it.

Briefly, two bloodthirsty monarchs, while Bahá'u'lláh was in prison, tried with all the Ulama and all the ministers of the two governments, to withstand him but they could not. One of the monarchs was killed, the other was dethroned. The more they killed the Bahá'ís, the more the light spread. The more they tried to raze the cause to its foundation, the stronger it became. The more they tried to cover up this light, the brighter it shone. The darker and dingier the prisons, the clearer became the illumination. That proof could be greater than this? When his holiness Moses appeared, a member of the household of Pharaoh became a believer. When the ministers of Pharaoh consulted concerning Moses and resolved to kill, exile or get rid of him, this believer was amongst them. He concealed his faith, but at the end he spoke his opinion as follows: ‘Moses does nothing except to assert the oneness of God. Should he be killed for this? He says God is .mighty. Is this a reason for killing him? Either he is telling the truth or he is not. If he is untruthful, there is no need for you to do anything. He will come to naught. Do not take useless trouble. Why strike at a tree that has no root? A tree that has no root no doubt will become dry. Why take trouble about, it? But if he is truthful your efforts will be of no avail. Without doubt his banner will be raised and whatever he wishes to do will be done.’

At the Men’s Meeting. January 8, 1920.

One of the friends from Rafsanjan asked whether he would have the privilege of visiting, ‘Akká once more. The Master answered (in substance) as follows:

God willing you will go the day after tomorrow. I am planning arrangements whereby friends may be able to stay at Bahjí for a few nights. At present that cannot be carried out owing to lack of bedding, etc., but we hope that in the future it will become possible. I could send away the people who are living in to Palace but do not wish to do that. I wish to treat them kindly. I expect that soon we shall have two motor cars which will make it easy for the friends to go frequently to ‘Akká.

We have lately received wonderful news – more wonderful than you can imagine or suppose, but now is not the time to make it fully known. However I will give you a hint about it. Nations are asking for assistance from the Bahá'í cause. Now is the time for us to work. I swear, by the Blessed Beauty that if we live and act according to the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh for one year, all the doors will be opened before us and the world will become a wonderful world. Until now we have been greatly oppressed. Suppose you have a bird in this room with all the doors and windows closed – the bird cannot fly. The Bahá'í cause has been like that bird, but new is the time of our freedom. The restrictions are removed. Now we must make an effort and the cause will make wonderful progress.

Supper, January 9, 1920.

Amongst the proofs of the Blessed Beauty in this: That what he revealed in tablets about fifty years ago is accomplished today. Amongst his prophecies are those about the Turks in Kital-ul-Aqdas, Surat-ul-Hykl and in the Tablet to Ra'is. Whatever was revealed has now been accomplished. He addressed Constantinople fifty years ago as follows: 'O thou. Point which liest between the two seas (i.e., Constantinople)... Hath thine outward adornment rendered thee proud? Soon thou shalt perish, by the Lord of Creation! and thy daughters and widows and those peoples that are within thee shall lament.' He also says: 'We hear from amongst you the hooting of the owl.' This in Arabic means it will become ruined, for the evil haunts ruined places. And in the Tablet to Ra'is (addressed to All Páshá, Prime Minister) he said: 'Soon thou shalt be overthrown. To Persia, at time when the Sháh Nasiru'd-Din was in the height of his power, he wrote; addressing Tíhrán, foretelling political disturbances and the establishment of Constitutional government, he said: "Thou wilt become desolate and because of commotions great loss will come upon thee, but be not grieved, for thou art related to God and, God will assist and satisfy thee. He will grant thee a Sháh who will be the cause of thy comfort.'

An epistle was written to Napoleon, but Napoleon did not take any notice of it.

Dr. E. asked, 'Is the first Epistle to Napoleon in the Surat-ul-Hykl?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: No! This epistle has been lost sight of. Then another epistle was revealed. In the second tablet he says: 'I wrote to thee to test thee. For thou hadst said when the Ottoman fleet was sunk by the Russians in the Black Sea and when the Czar of Russia said to thee, 'O Emperor, I am a Christian and thou art a Christian, why dost thou not come to my assistance?' – thou didst say, 'The cry of those (i.e., the Turks) who were drowned in the Black Sea reached my ears and awakened me. 'I wrote to thee, 'How did that cry affect thee? but thou didst not answer. Then it became evident that it was not that cry of lamentation that awakened thee. Nay, rather, it was thine own ambition that awakened thee. I tell thee plainly that thou wilt be punished and the kingdom will pass out of thine hand.' This was addressed to Napoleon when he was at the zenith of his power, but ere long he was overthrown. This prophecy is published and is in the hands of the opposers and enemies.

He addressed the Emperor of Germany in forcible terms as follows: 'See what happened to Napoleon (3rd) who was before thee. Be admonished and leave thy pride. Thy kingdom will not remain to thee. I hear the lamentations end moaning, of Berlin, although it is now in manifest glory.'

The occurrences which have been foretold by the Supreme Pen innumerable. i.e., About the coming of the Blessed One from Adrianople to 'Akká. He said:

‘They will imprison me in ‘Akká. There the climate is detestable and the water is foul.’ At that time the water in ‘Akká was very bad.

Dr. E.: Was this written before the Ottoman government had decided to send Bahá’u’lláh to ‘Akká?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes! The Blessed Beauty wrote: ‘These things will not affect me. If they cut me to pieces the cause of God will prosper in every way.’

When he was in the barracks at ‘Akká and no one was allowed outside the prison walls, he wrote tablets to the friends saying, ‘Be not grieved. These doors will soon open and I will go out and my tent will be pitched on Mount Carmel.’ When the firman of the Ottoman government commanding everlasting imprisonment, i.e., imprisonment for life, came the Blessed Beauty said, ‘No, I will go out, the friends will go out also.’ After two (?) years this prophecy was fulfilled.

Miss B.: Did the Blessed Beauty prophecy that after the Great War all religions would be investigated and the Bahá’í movement would prevail?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No! It is not so. He said: Great events would happen and people will become irreligious. There will be tumult and because of irreligion there will be such confusion that all will be in distress. Then they will return to religion. As long as there is no religion, the happiness of the world of man is impossible. If thou (Miss B.) wishest I will show thee the tablet tomorrow.

Mrs. P.: Was the letter to the Emperor of Germany addressed to Wilhelm 2nd or Frederick, his father?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: To Emperor Wilhelm. He said, ‘O Banks of the River Rhine, blood shall flow in thee, because thou didst become negligent of God. Another war will come and blood will flow and there shall be lamentation in Berlin.’

Mrs. P.: Is this something in the future, because in the recent war there was no fighting at the River Rhine?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: It has already happened. The Rhine is between Germany and France. The phrase refers to the whole of Germany. When they speak of the banks of the Mediterranean, that includes all Syria, for this country is situated on the bank of the Mediterranean Sea.

All talks so far were given in Haifa, Palestine.

Bahjí, ‘Akká, January 10, 1920.

(Saturday night before Supper, In the Master’s room.)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: In Paris one of the notable representatives of Franca invited me to attend an evening party and I went. We saw that they had prepared a big banquet with sweets and cakes of many kinds. There were well-known musicians who played and sang. Pianists, violinists, cellists, flute-players and one young man and a woman sang. Many noted people were present. I had thought they desired me to give an address but I found it was not so. I became extremely grieved that night. They played and sang but I was in agony. Than it was four hours after sunset I rose. The host asked me to sit. I said, 'It is our custom to sleep four hours after sunset.' The host said, 'We are just going to have dance.' I excused myself. He became greatly astonished that with such music and dancing I should desire to leave. I said, 'I am sleepy. I desire to go.' He was surprised. The son of Zele Sultan was there – Bahrám Mírzá, and a few of the Persian ministers. I said, 'These will be my representatives. They will hear these tunes and if there be a dance they will dance also. Excuse me, wish to go.' That night I was very uncomfortable.

Dr. E. said, 'You were like a fish out of water.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: It is so. You have expressed it very well. Bravo!

Dr. E. asked if 'Abdu'l-Bahá had heard the report of the Committee of nineteen in the United States. The report seems more wonderful to us than the Acts of the Apostles.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: God willing, they will become assisted. Every night I pray and supplicate to the Kingdom of Abhá and beg confirmation.

Whatever the world of humanity is in need of is to be found here.

All the religions of the world see the utmost perfection of man in those.

The Jews are attached to laws, even until now they are proud, saying, 'Our Book is the Book which contains laws.' The teachings and exhortations which his holiness Christ gave the Christians can be found in Bahá'u'lláh's teachings. Politics are in the Qur'án. The Muslims can find politics in the utmost degree in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Such fundamental things that are useful, as equality and freedom, these can be found in the laws of Bahá'u'lláh.

The kings will remain kings, ministers – ministers; the rich – rich; the poor will be in comfort and each person of humanity can find his greatest desire herein. These teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are all inclusive. Other teachings are like branches but the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are like the trunk of a tree which sends out all the branches.

These are from a person who never entered a school, who had never seen a teacher, who had never associated with people of learning and who had from the beginning of his life been in the utmost of tribulation. Such teachings are divine. What greater proofs than these!

Garden of the Riḍván, January 11, 1920.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “In the days of the Blessed Perfection this was a place of recreation. He used to sit there (pointing) and the friends used to sit around on those seats. Words and prayers used to be revealed and they were all in the utmost of humility and submissiveness. One day I came here with the Motesareff (Governor). His holiness Bahá'u'lláh was here and the friends were here. He did not receive the Montesareff. He did not meet him. He did not meet me, either. He said, ‘Return with the Montesareff,’ and I returned”

“Bahá'u'lláh was thus imprisoned, with such glory and authority, and he did not take any notice of the Montesareff. From all his qualities the signs of power and greatness were apparent. Even in his imprisonment and his oppression (the signs were apparent).” (Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: ‘This place is greatly in need of repair.’)

Bahá'u'lláh's House at ‘Akká, Lunch, Jan. 12, ‘20.

The owner of this house was a native of Beirut, he himself used to live here. When the government gave permission for us to leave the barracks we wanted to rent a house. His partner had built a palace outside ‘Akká and his house (adjoining this one) became empty. We wanted to take that house and the partner was willing, but when the owner heard of this, he became furiously angry, saying, ‘How can I be content to live with these strangers. How can I have trust and confidence in them?’ His partner said, ‘I trust them. These are not people to be afraid of. If they do not pay the rent I will be responsible for them.’ The Russian Consul at that time, Mr. Urena, was a relative of the owner of the house and was an honorary interpreter of the government service. (In former times, certain people, for the sake of the honor used to work for the government without salary.) He said to the owner of the house. ‘You do not know these people. They are not highway robbers and they have been guilty of no treachery to the nation. They have been sent here because of some religious matter. Rest assured about this.’ Notwithstanding this the owner of the house is still distrustful and dissatisfied, until a Greek doctor in ‘Akká was also related to him, implored on their behalf saying, ‘The Consul and I will be responsible. If anything happens, we will hold ourselves answerable.’ At last at last they satisfied him and we came and lived in the small house adjoining this. The owner of the house carefully nailed up the door connecting the two houses, both in the upper and lower floors, so that there should be no going and coming between the two houses.

Less than a fortnight afterwards we heard a knocking at the door. On opening it, we found the wife of the owner of the house who had come to visit the ladies. She asked, 'Why do you not come to visit us?' They answered, 'You have nailed up the doors between the houses.' She said, 'Ah! We did not know you, at first, but now the doors must be opened, both upstairs and downstairs, and you can fetch water (from our house).'

Less than a month elapsed, and I was sitting downstairs one day, when the owner of the house himself, came and said, 'I want to go to Beirut and I can trust no one. I have in the house money and jewels. I have three daughters and two sons-in-law, but I cannot trust them, and not even my partner. I want to leave things in your charge and go. I can trust no one else. I beg of you to let one of your people live in my house so that I can feel assured until I return after a few months.' I said, 'I cannot promise. Get someone else to undertake the charge and do not put it on me.' He said, 'It is impossible. If you do not consent, I shall have to give up this journey.' And he made an oath with Jamáli Mobarak. I was therefore obliged to consent, and sent one of the Bahá'ís to live in the house and take care of it until his return. He was exceedingly grateful and said, 'Never in all my life before have I travelled with my mind so much at ease as now, for I have the utmost confidence in you.'

Three Talks given by Ebn Asdaq, January 1920.

Pilgrim House, January 5.

I visited Bahá'u'lláh in Baghdád when I was ten years old. What I shall tell you is my own experiences, and not hearsay. About three years before Bahá'u'lláh left Baghdád, I visited him with my mother, father, sister and four servants and one of our relatives who was not a Bahá'í. at that time, Bahá'u'lláh had not openly declared his mission. He commanded us to go to a place two or three miles out of Baghdád, because the head of the Muḥammadans was there and we would not be interfered with. We made our headquarters at that place, but spent most of our time in Baghdád.

The Blessed Beauty took a house for us in Baghdád, and he said that those who wished to know about the cause should go to my father and learn about it. I was a child, and used to go with my mother to the household. We lived there fourteen months.

While there, although Bahá'u'lláh did not openly declare his mission, we could see the signs of greatness in him. The Báb told my father about Bahá'u'lláh and my father knew who he was before he proclaimed himself. I also knew it. Another important thing is: The Báb had written a tablet to my father because my father had served in Shíráz. He was punished there. (He received five hundred lashes on his bare back; had a ring put on his nose and was led through the streets by a cord attached to the ring.) Because of this, the Báb had written a prayer, in which he said, "O God give him his reward as much as possible. When Asdaq sees the Lord, grant him his reward." Bahá'u'lláh wrote to my father: "O God in the time that he meets thee, grant him (to know) all the secrets. Thou art the doer of whatsoever thou wishest. Thou art the Dear, the Powerful."

Mrs. P.: Was 'Abdu'l-Bahá the first who knew and realized the reality of Bahá'u'lláh?

Ebn Asdaq: As 'Abdu'l-Bahá had the station of divinity, he would know. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is not a human being. How is it possible that man should not know himself first? In the world of man my father was one of the first to realize the station of Bahá'u'lláh. Bahá'u'lláh while in Baghdád, wrote a tablet with his own hand for my father:

"O thou Sadiq, that Word which his holiness the Báb wrote has appeared. That Word has appeared through the Lord. It has appeared in the form of man. Then prepare to meet his Beauty and see him in that Beautiful garment (garment of man) and be humble and submissive to him."

My father became humble and submissive before his declaration. I also received a tablet from Bahá'u'lláh:

"O God, this is a servant, the son of a servant of thine. This boy has moved in the love of thy grace. He has journeyed in childhood from his native town to come and see Thee. He has journeyed far until he has arrived in Thy holy presence. He has been privileged to arrive in Thy holy presence, and at this time I ask Thee to grant him from Thy sweet milk, so that he may raise up the banner of Thy cause, and when he is grown, he may remain firm in Thy path. Because he has remained now under Thy command, may he in future remain firm, because thou art the Powerful, the Dear, the Beloved." This was in itself a declaration, and was revealed four years before the proclamation.

All the qualities of Bahá'u'lláh are seen in 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The form, movement, talking, walking even the feet are the same. When 'Abdu'l-Bahá begins to chant, the words and the voice are the same. The other day I was present when 'Abdu'l-Bahá was revealing tablets, and it reminded me to Bahá'u'lláh.

When we had fourteen months in Baghdád, Bahá'u'lláh said: "Your time is finished. Your visit is now at an end." Could a mere man say: "Your time of remaining here is finished. You must return to Persia." My father showed grief. Bahá'u'lláh said: "No! This is like a man in a steamer. The steamer goes many miles a day, but the man thinks he has not gone any distance. Your service has been great."

That day when we were dismissed, the river was very turbulent and we could not cross to the other side. When we started, the river became quiet. The bridge was lowered and we crossed to the other side. We had intended to start that same night, but we had to wait. That night when I saw they were not going, I ran back to Bahá'u'lláh's house. In the passage of the house I saw a servant. The servant asked: "Why are you here? Have you not gone?" I said: "Yes." "Why are you here then?" I answered that I had come back to get one of the papers which Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá write on. Then I went with him to Bahá'u'lláh. When Bahá'u'lláh saw me, he said: "I am writing a tablet for you." At the same time Bahá'u'lláh wrote a tablet for my mother, in which he speaks of her weeping. (She had cried because of my leaving) Bahá'u'lláh said: "We have heard you crying." She cried, saying, "The love of the child is more than mine." However I returned with two tablets, one for myself and one for my mother. My parents asked where I had been and I told them.

We returned to Persia, Khurasán. There Ḥasan Absaltaneh was the governor. He knew that we had been at Baghdád. The Mullás heard of it also. Ḥájí Muḥammad Karim Khán of Kirmán, who was bitterly opposed to my father came also to Khurasán. The Mullás and he united and forced the Governor to take my father. They put him in chains and sent them on a camel to

Ebn Asdaq: It is obligatory to say it for ourselves each morning. It is alright to say it also for a sick person. The Báb said: "Treat the sick by three methods: Giving them tea; giving lights drinks and by prayer. Bahá'u'lláh says: 'Thy remedy is the mention of me.' Prayer for healing is always good. The Greatest Name to be used in prayer is "Alláh-u-Abhá!" "Ya Bahá el Abhá!" is a call to God, equivalent to O God!"

Visits to Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká.

I made four visits to 'Akká. The foundation of religion is to know the Manifestation of God. My aim was to get the teachings direct from the Manifestation so that I might be strong in the faith. Most of the talks I heard from Bahá'u'lláh concerned the following: First: The prophecies of the past; Second: The greatness of this Revelation; Third: The Center of the Covenant.

The foundation of all the religions of the past are contained in the Revelation. The foundation of the Bayán was founded in the Manifestation. It is the giver of the glad tidings of this revelation. One day when Bahá'u'lláh was walking and speaking of the greatness of his Manifestation, he said: "O son of my name (my father's name was Sadiq, i.e., faithful, but Bahá'u'lláh called him Asdaq, i.e., most faithful)! Thou hast seen that from behind millions of veils of light, we have manifested a mystery of this Revelation which is comparable to the eye of a needle, and have named it 'divinity.' Then all the people of the world were stunned. We have manifested the secret of divinity only because it was the wish of the First Point (Báb). Otherwise what differences does it make whether we call ourselves 'God' or 'slave?' For the honor depends on the person and not to the name given to him. Should I call myself, 'slave,' that word 'slave' would be equal to the word 'God.'"

Bahá'u'lláh often said: "Should anyone ask whether I claim divinity, say, 'Yea, Yea! By the Lord of the Universe.’ ”

One day Bahá'u'lláh looked from the window of his room in 'Akká and saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá going to a tea-room in the public square which was used as a meeting house, both by believers and non-believers. Behind 'Abdu'l-Bahá were groups of friends and strangers. Bahá'u'lláh looked at me and said with a sad voice: “Although the calamities that have befallen us are countless, yet in comparison with what he ('Abdu'l-Bahá) is going through, we are at rest, because he bears the weight of the cause on his shoulders.”

On another occasion, one afternoon during the Feast of Ridván when I was standing with the number of the friends in the Holy Presence, Bahá'u'lláh was walking, bareheaded. He turned to his servant, Mírzá Aka Jan, and told him to bring and chant the new tablet which had been revealed. Aka Jan began to chant the tablet. It was a commune on behalf of the believers, the teachers, the arms of the Cause and the Branches. When Aka Jan reached the prayer for the Branches, Bahá'u'lláh sat down on the floor. He slapped his thigh three times, saying with emphasis each time, “Áqá ('Abdu'l-Bahá) is not of the creatures.” All the Branches (Muḥammad-'Alí and the others) were present when this was said.

A Talk given by Ḥájí Ḥaydar-'Alí, December 26, 1919, at the Pilgrim House.

When I was living in Adrianople, the Blessed Beauty told me to go to Constantinople. I remained there fifteen months where I was a sort of medium for the people. I sent their letters to Adrianople. After fifteen months the Blessed Beauty commanded me to go to Cairo but he told me to conceal my faith. ‘If they ask you if you have been to Adrianople say, ‘Yes, but only as a traveler.’ I went to Constantinople. When I arrived there I found people had sent fifty letters to that place saying that the prophet of the Bábís had come to Cairo. What was I to do? What would you have done, if you wore in my place? If I say I am not a Bahá'í, then they (believers) would come and say, ‘Curse it. Deny it!’”

I stood firm and said, “I am a Bahá'í.” There was a sort of freedom. No one could hurt anybody. I stood firm saying, “I am a Bahá'í.” Had I not done so they would have made me deny it. My house was full of people, morning, noon and night and I used to prove to that the validity of this mighty cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

The Persian Consul came and said, “I want to seek the truth and become a believer.” Even in secrecy he came to my house. Then he invited me to his house. I had a friend who told me to not go to the Consul's house because he was a materialist. He said, “If you go there you will be under the Persian flag and no other nation could save you. Do not go.” I said, “If God wishes me to go to prison I will and I am going to the Consuls house.” I and three others went to the Consul's house. The Consul appeared very kind. It was during the Feast of Ramazan. We sat down from night until early dawn. Then the Consul went into the house. The servants and soldiers came and said that the Consul was not coming any more. "If you wish to go, go!" We came down from the top floor where we had been and as we descended it became lighter and lighter with we came near the place they had chosen to imprison us in. They placed ten of their men in charge of each of us. They took away our clothes, put our feet in stocks and chains on our necks. The following day they went into our houses. I had a lot of literature. Some of it was in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own handwriting and the writing of Karim. Good and valueable literature. They took possession of all. Then the Consul went to the Egyptian government and said, "These people are the ones who wanted to kill the Sháh of Persia and now they want to kill you. The Khedive of Egypt became afraid because of this. Then they took us to a prison twenty-four miles away placed chains on our nooks and tied our hands behind our backs; they spit on us, but we said "Goodbye." The Egyptian mounted soldiers said that each of these men would strike fifty, but the people soon saw we were unable to strike two people. Gradually they pitied us and horses were given us to ride until we neared the prison. Then we had to dismount, the chains were replaced about our necks and we were brought to the prison. They had been given strict commands to put us in prison without light, in chains the ends of which were through a hole to the outside so people should know we were there.

There is a tablet by Bahá'u'lláh called The Trumpet and we began to chant this tablet. Those who befriended us brought light, opened the door and brought good food. When the soldiers came near, the door was closed until they passed and then opened again. We were kept here forty-five days before we were returned to Cairo. They took us to a place near the executioner's residence. I wrote to the one in charge of the prison that the government should be just. I said that we had not killed anyone or stolen anything. They say we have changed the religion, changing a religion is not in the power of a small man. Why have they imprisoned us near the executioner's house? When the government received the letter they said, 'Yes, if the rest of the people hear of this they will become Bábís also. So they took us to an upper floor, gave us rugs and made us more comfortable. Then they brought heavy chain. They tied a foot of one man to one foot of another man, one arm of one to one arm of another man and put us on camels, bodies and heads hanging down to the ground, each side of the camel. We rode all night this way. When we arrived near where the officers of the government were, we complained and they ordered a flat board to be placed on the camels and we rode on it and were more comfortable. Those who were on guard over us, mounted men said that we were not like men. 'You have not harmed anyone or stolen, yet you seemed so happy under these conditions. They took us from Cairo to Khartum. It takes the post thirty-six days to travel this distance but we were several months on this journey. In a tablet to us the Blessed Beauty said, "We have smelled the breath of faithfulness and steadfastness from Khartum." We had many troubles and afflictions before arriving in Khartum. They took us to a prison in the middle of the desert. On two sides was water (Nile) and there was a very large stable there. They placed us in the stable giving each of us the space of three span. (He showed by means of his to outstretched hands, thumbs touching what he meant by a span.) They gave the prisoners maize to eat. Each one had his portion above his head. Those in prison used to gamble at night, either by lamplight or fire. There

‘ABBÁS THE BAHÁ’Í

‘Akká, March, 1920.

On The ramparts, among the old masonry to a background of crumbling golden stone, there was an impressive little figure, white bearded, with waving white hair. He wore a white ‘emma’ and an ‘abaya’ of tender brown over his gray galabia. It was ‘Abbás the Bahá’í. Later on, thanks to the courtesy of one of our Syrian schoolmasters, we were invited into the house. Word came that he would be very glad to see Mr. and Mrs. Ashbee, and we spent a wonderful hour with him. He was quite willing to talk and our interpreter was clear and true in his English. Old ‘Abbás curled himself up in the corner of his divan, looked at us with his wonderful illuminating eyes that radiate love, and set forth the cardinal points of Bahá’ism.

I have rarely come across a man who so completely sums up the saint, or let us say saint and philosopher combined, for the presence and image of the man are of the Middle Ages, their spirit of personal holiness, while what he says has the lucidity of the Greek, is disruptive of all religions and mediaeval systems, is philosophic, modern, and synthetic.

“First,” said he, “we must get rid of all glosses, Talmuds, codes of divinity, and clerical law. Get back to the revealed word of God where we can. Christ had the revealed word, so had Muḥammad, so had others before them, but – and here’s the point – those revelations were for their own day and environment. You cannot always take the literal interpretation of first-century’ Syria or eighth-century Arabia and say that in its application it is true now.”

He gave the impression of being very modest about his own teaching, adding that the East was in a bad way, “needed light, and had to be told these things. That was the reason for Bahá’u’lláh and the Báb.

“Then,” said he, “all the nations must come together, there must be a league of nations for the government of the world.”

He sketched out a sort of council appointed by the presidents, the kings, and the democracies.

“And the existing League?” we asked. He smiled and shook his head. “That is only the merest beginning. It is not representative of all. It palliates the disease, the disease of discord. It is no remedy.”

But Bahá’ism went much further, and here it cuts itself free from the orientalism of Pauline Christianity and from Muḥammad. There must be equality of the sexes. “Humanity,” said old ‘Abbás as he took a pinch of snuff from a little enamelled box, “is as a creature with two wings – man and woman – you must not cripple either, or you impede flight. Humanity needs both for progress.”

“And the common tongue that is to make it possible for man to speak with man?”

It will, come,” said he.

Janet suggested that the tongue might be English. He accepted the suggestion with a look of warm-hearted love that seemed to imply: “We all of us would like to have our own, but God has found a tongue before.”

Who knows but it may be English yet? Still the last language in which God revealed himself was not Aramaic, nor Greek, nor Hebrew, nor Egyptian, but Arabic. And don’t you make any mistake about it! But the languages of God are many.

He tells somewhere in his teaching: Release comes by making of the will a door through which the confirmations of the spirit move.

And those confirmations of the spirit? They are the powers and gifts with which some are born, and which men sometimes call genius, but for which others have to strive with infinite pains. They come to that man or woman who accepts his or her life with “radiant acquiescence.”

A good phrase, “radiant acquiescence.” Let’s remember it.

As we motored back across the sands, we saw Lord Milner’s destroyer lying outside the harbour. “War,” old ‘Abbás had said, ‘is not of God because it does not unify.” But may it not at times serve as a besom to sweep up ere we begin afresh? That is what it did in South Africa, after which came the peace of Vereeniging and Smuts and Botha became our friends.

The wise men of all time, be it Ptahotep on his tomb, Diogenes from his tub. Plato when he parted from Dion, or Christ with the tribute to tsar, have always been the passive protest against power. When they offered ‘Abbás his title, with whatever bit of ribbon or strip of paper it was accompanied, he said:

As it comes from the British Government I accept it, as a teacher of God’s word it will make no difference to me.

It is pleasant to think that English administrators go to this wise old man for help and counsel. We dined in the evening with Colonel Stanton, the Military Governor of Haifa, Lord Milner, and Herbert Samuel.

The two last were rather envious of our afternoon with ‘Abbás, and Colonel Stanton told us how he often went to get his advice. “Of course,” he added in the characteristic manner of the British Administrator, “I have to listen for half an hour or so first to the beauty of the flowers and the wings of the mind; after that we get to business.”

I thought of the destroyer lying outside ‘Akká, and waiting to take Lord Milner back to England. Somehow I rather wished he could have put his journey off another day and come with us if we went again to ‘Akká. He was a little melancholy and pessimistic, but he always takes a big sweep.

He came to see us later in Jerusalem, and had a good time with him last December in Cairo, when he called me to give evidence before his Commission. His is a wonderful manner of getting at the point. He has a way of folding himself up behind his eyes when he is asking you a question or thinking about what you say. Perhaps on those occasions he, too, goes for light to the idea behind.

Yes, say his friends, but Lord Milner is getting old, ‘Abbás is older, and his sweep is bigger; for his is – shall we say? – a less bounded, because more oriental, faith in the goodness of God and the destiny of man.

But it is noteworthy, is it not, that while the political vision is from the Englishman, the spiritual vision is not from the Christian, nor from the Jew, but from the Moslem.

“You must learn,” says old ‘Abbás, “to distinguish the sun of truth from whichever point of the horizon it is shining! People think religion is confined in an edifice, to be worshipped at an altar. In reality, it is an attitude toward divinity which is reflected through life,” land—I put him in because he realized that the game was up, and the age of St. Louis over.

Modern Zionism is like a hen-coop in a storm that pretends to be a habitation. It floats persistently on the: top, deceives and eludes the sharpest eyes, and yet no fish can swallow it For all that the spiritual dream of the Jew is one of the facts of life, and if he would give up his “historical case,” false and unreasonable, and based on Anglo-American Protestantism, the country might yet be his But he never will, and hence is ever doomed to wander, complain, and stimulate.

Come out and look at it. It's all so lovely and unreal, and of the mind, so full of sunshine, and colour, and contrast. And there are delightful people here. III even take you to old 'Abbás, the Bahá'í, at 'Akká, one of the wisest men. I should say, that ever lived; and there are others, for the country creates unreality and beauty – a sort of mosaic surface-work, glasure of life in coloured faience that glitters in the sun, and yet the very toughest and most impervious of coats . . . Do come!

Yes, and there were poets in the land in those days; even though the Administration buried them away in a department of economics. That was where I discovered Hans, Ernest Keppel Bennett to be precise. It is right that poets should leave their mark here, and we were so sorry to lose him. Some absurd providence stuck this gracious, amethystine creature, all delicately cut and faceted, into a smug statistical hole only fit for lumpy chunks cut round en cabochon. He is now in England and getting out that dainty little book, "Built in Jerusalem's

We arrived in Haifa on the evening of the 21st just after dark.

Oct 24.

This afternoon we visited the Holy Tomb of the Báb.

We left the Pilgrim House at 3:30 in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s little Ford car.

We were received by several women believers in the little house just beside the Tomb and there were served with Tea.

Told by Miraza Badi‘ Effendi.

When General Allenby took Palestine he commanded the people of Haifa to make formal acknowledgement of the British victory by calling upon him to pay their respects.

Afterwards he went personally to pay his respects to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and at the same time to show appreciation of the British Government for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s services to the poor during the war.

At that time Gen. Allenby said that he was happy to call upon one who was the real ruler of the earth.

Pilgrim House, Haifa.

Oct. 25th.

When the British Government first spoke of decorating ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Mírzá Badi’, the Governor’s Private secretary said: “‘Abdu’l-Bahá does not receive decorations from Kings, he decorates Kings. However, inasmuch as he has accepted the persecution by the Turkish Government for 40 years, he will no doubt accept the honor you wish to bestow upon him.”

October 26th.

Miss Elizabeth Stewart arrived at the Pilgrim House last night from Tíhrán, Persia.

About the same time that the Tarbi was established the Muḥammadans also a schools and now have eight or ten schools for boys and girls (separate).

The city has a Board of Education at Tarbíyát School is under the supervision Board.

The girl’s school has an enrollment pupils. Miss Lillian Kappes – English.

There are twelve teachers, all Bahá’ís one who is to be there but a short time.

The salaries are from 8 to 10 dollars. They were formerly only 2 or 3 dollars.

Miss Kappes was obliged to do work outside in order to make ends meet.

At present physical education in all the schools. It was taught in the Tarbíyát several years before the Muḥammadan school adopted it. The Tarbayat school is a great school. There are seven grades. They have eight grades next year. The girls was instructed in English.

e experience of this visit is one that can be described even by those who experience _____ge of this visit. To kneel at the Holy old, to ask forgiveness, to beg to become _____ of service in the Cause of God; to pray for ity of the friends, and strength and con_____ion to go forth to serve,* the knowledge come only through the of Bahá'u'lláh, are some of the Heart's _____nees at that time.

_____ our way home we stopped at the Garden of _____, owned by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, to get some dates _____den which is beside the Ridván is where they are grown.

While we waited the care-taker climbed up a alm of great height and with a cycle cut _____ branch hanging full of dates (gunny sacks d each branch of dates to keep those which d first from falling. "ever before have I _____ anything so delicious as a ripe date fresh _____he tree. th gardener gave us many beautiful pomegra Rúhâ Khánum told us that our Lord did not _____ fruits in this garden, that he kept it for r entirely. Everyone in 'Akká and Haifa kn 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the friend of the poor.

_____ were all very happy as we drove home along _____ch just at sunset. The blue bay and sur_____g hills were covered with a wonderful glow _____drove into Haifa the Muḥammadan women with Long black veils and the men riding their donkeys, made a picturesque sight not to be _____en.

We passed several outdoor restaurants where the men were sitting by small tables eating and some smoking the bubble-bubble. (water pipes) Our big automobile almost filled the narrow streets and when Arthur sounded the horn the pedestrians flew in all directions.

We also met a caravan of camels coning in troy the outside towns laden with grain etc.

Miss Elizabeth Stewart's trip from Ṭihrán, Persia as related by her.

She left Ṭihrán Aug.7, 1920 by automobile accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. New (English), their child, 6 years old and two babies, twins six weeks old (twins under Miss Stewart's special care), and the; chauffeur, who was somewhat interested in the Cause.

They arrived at Kaswin at five in the morning and remained over night. From there they went to Muḥammadan – Hamakan is old Ecbatana of the Bible – Here they remained two days at the home of some Scotch people.

From Hamadán they drove all day and arrived at Kirmanshah, driving over the great pass Assadaba which is over 1000 ft. above sea level. The road was marvelous- made by the English, here they remained two days at the home of an English family (bankers). They were told that the Englis: and the Arabs were fighting because the Arabs had torn up the road. But on the third day they let them go on to the large camp, Kerina.

There were 6000 tents at the camp – many soldiers and families,. They were given a tent and told they would have to remain a week. They were permitted to eat with the officers... officer's mess.

A large dairy was connected with the camp.

Indian cows were used because they thrived best in the hot climate. Instead of being in camp one week they were there FIVE. From day to day they were told they might leave the following day. But it was five weeks when camp was broken up and they had to move another sixty miles distant.

November 2, 1920, Pilgrim House, Luncheon.

A. B. I wanted to come for breakfast this morning but could not. I have been serving the people at lunch at the other house and now I have come here.

His Holiness Christ said, that the one who wishes to be greatest among you must be your servant. (In English) Good servant, good servant!

One must be either a serpent or a servant; he must choose. The people who are arrogant are serpents not servants.

It is very difficult to arrange the matter concerning Mrs. B's land. The work which Asadu'lláh and Faríd did was not solid. At that time they should have secured a title from the government. They failed to do this. Now it would be better to sell it. It is worth twice as much as she paid for it. If she paid 100 lbs, sell it for 200 lbs. find out how much she paid, then after the price is found out it can be bought by someone. This is better. It is in the name of 'Ináyatu'lláh, and not Mrs. B., so it can be sold. If it were in her name it could not be sold. I have thought much over this and have come to that conclusion. I will pay Mrs. B. the price if she is willing to sell. Send a cable and out and I will sent the money – thus the matter may be solved. It has been unsettled for ten years. This is better.

Mrs. C. and Mrs. B. wished to give it to 'Abdu'l-Bahá if it still belongs to her.

A.B... I cannot accept it, as Mrs. B., is needy, but do not tell her this.

I once bought a piece of land. There was a man who was very antagonistic and tried to prevent my securing a title; but with great difficulty everything was settled. This man even tried to bribe the government. When it was all settled and my title was clear I sent word to baha'u'llah and He sent back word. "Leave the earth to the people of the earth" and I immediately destroyed the title and gave the land to the man."

Mrs. C... Yes, very good!

Mrs. F.. "Il the land of Mt. Carmel belong to believers eventually."

A.B.. Yes, all the land of Haifa and 'Akká belong to believers.

Mrs. R.. mentioned about Mrs. Nourse's land. Mt. Carmel, and asked if she should communicate with Faríd about getting it.

A.B... I do not say to anyone to complain about another. She is authorized to do what she likes. 'Abdu'l-Bahá does not command anyone to have a law suit. Cable to Mrs. B.

Cpy of Cable: :Clear title to Brittingham's lot:. Master says sell twice original price. Later buy another. Cable consent.

A.B... The Bahá'ís should sacrifice life ___ in the path of each other.

M. Dreyfus..said that Nos hugati(one who has ___ a pilgrim house at Port Sa'íd) has, served him and his wife very much and another friend, Jalál afshar had served them as well.

A.B....I must be so that each one of the friends should prefer others to himself.. the others should be first to him.

It has happened in Persia that one of the friends was caught and another sacrificed his life for that one. The Sháh wanted to kill some one...one of his friends said: 'I am he' so that the Sháh might kill him and the other might go free.

This is the measure of faith, that one should prefer the friend to himself, and should others first. His holiness Christ s said: 'Do unto others as you would they should do unto you', but Bahá'u'lláh has said 'Prefer him to yourself'.

Once they brought 7 of the friends to martyr them. Each one said: 'Kill me first' and why? Because they did not want to' see the martyred bodies of the others.

M. D.. In Paris it is not possible to invite many to our house at one time on account of conditions.

A. B... Now, anywhere there are strikes. It is necessary that all the nations and people should make laws and regulations. At the end all the nations will be united so that no one can break those 1PWS. and re-regulationF. The Blessed Beauty has written that if it becomes other than this, then the result will be Bolshevism. Even her B... has been found.

___ Blessed Beauty has plainly written there will be revolutions and dis___ness. There are THREE classes: high cated, middle and lower. This last are dominating. ___.. How long will irreligion prevail?

___.. About 50 years longer. Now no one ___eligious save the (real) Bahá'ís.

___.. Will B... prevail in America?

Notwithstanding this they complain. Did Fugita take a walk up the mountain? ...Yes.

___ Be careful. If you fall you will ___oll down the mountain.

8. The Prison of ‘Akká. Told by Mírzá Badi’. Jan. 15, 1920

One day all the pilgrims and the re____t believers were gathered together in Holy Tomb of the Báb. We had come together under the shade of the Tree of the Covenant and his Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke the Niagara Falls in America, saying that it is one of the greatest water falls in the world.

In this connection He said that the rower the grandeur and the force of the water fall is an expression of this overflowing bounty of the Day of the Manifestation. Showing how great, majestic and powerful it is. These holy words of the Master reminds one of his influence upon great men of position and the leaders of mankind.

Ever since the beginning of the occupation of Haifa (Sept, 1918) all sorts and conditions of men: military or civilians have had the honor and privilege of being in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Field Marshal Allenby the commanding General of the Egyptian Expeditionary force visited Him several times and every successive visit was conducive to greater respect and consideration on his part. One day, together with the Master, he visited the prison of ‘Akká as well as the Holy Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, an account of which the write: writer has already given in detail.

Gen Money, the chief administrator of the occupied enemy territory administration south, and his successor, Major Gen. Watson, visited the Beloved several times. The present chief administrator Major Gen. Bols, visited the holy Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, together with Field Marshall Allenby, and had the pleasure of partaking of both material and spiritual food at the Master’s table.

Those who have the privilege of being constantly with the Master can, to a certain extent, realize the difference in the attitude of those who visit him, and in this way can have an idea of the importance of the Cause.

Pilgrim Notes

Inez Greeven

April 26,1920

In another morning the Master called me to his house and said “You are very welcome – you must not feel like guest in this house, you are my daughter and I am your father – it is like your own home –and I love you very much. I should be with you always in heart and soul and I should pray for you.when you return to America the spirit of Bahá’u’lláh will protect you alwaysand I praybthrough his aid you may render service to the Cause. Never let the material thing make you unhappy – do you think they are worthwhile? No, they are a mere passing receipt. A mother sometimes goes against her child, a husband r wife forgets after a year’s separation, but love of God is eternal. He never forgets, he is always with you. You have a pure heart and spirit and it will guide you in the right way. See what a light station the Kings and Queens have had in the material world, and how it has all passed and is without result. All material things have the same ending but in the Kingdom of God the lovest have _____.”

April 26,1920

In the morning I was called to the Master’s house and after shaking my hand he walked up and down for a few minutes and said: “How are you? Are you well?” Then He sat and designated a chair for me. The conversation was in substance as follow. You should be very happy that you have been favoured to come here and attain to this meeting. I am your friend, God is your friend always, never doubt it but think of this whenever you are sad try to review her what I am saying – “Never let the material things make you sad if you believed be, come and see me anytime when you go away, if you become sad return here and be refreshed. I am your father and I love you very much.” After a few moment of silence he said: “Would you like to go to Persia unite the party it is to be sent.” I answered that I would very much. He continued, “Then I shall write to America and tell them. You can return and continue your plans. The party will leave at the beginning of next spring. Have you anything you wish to say?" I said I had two lawsuits that need to be settled as I needed the alimony from my husband before I could go, and the Master said: "But he must be obliged to give it to you. I know all your troubles but they do not matter." Then I said: "She only reason. I am sad is not because I am so unworthy and fid I cannot live up to this teachings." He said: "I will pray for you that you may become enlightened and a Bahá'í indeed." I asked why our faults became so clear here that my inner condition made me very sad. He said: "An atom cannot be seen but when you put it in the path of the sun it becomes visible and when a butterfly is drawn to the light through the power of love its beauties become manifest." He gave me two ____ and two for Mrs. King, saying: "She loves you very much, Mrs. King loves you very much. Don't think, be happy – not sad. Thank God that you have been accepted in the Kingdom."

May 1st.

The Master said this morning that he sent for me and gave me these talks as lessons, and I must learn them and put them into action. That I had great capacity and he prayed for great results from me in the future – that I should be as a flame when I left here and so intense that he can't feel the heat in Haifa. I should be as a flaming candle – no, as a star, as the moon and light the night. The people of America must say that I had changed completely from this visit, that I was greatly favoured to have so much of love. You are my dear daughter. I love you very much. Speak to me as your father and tell me if you have enough money to get home with comfortably whatever you need I will give you – always come to me when you are in need, but God will never provide for you. Do not be sad over material things. I said material things never made me sad, especially money, that God had provided me with the means for this trip and I had sufficient, but would been like to leave some for the poor. He said, "No, I give to them once a week and there are some private donations here besides a fund, so they do not need it. Give to the poor elsewhere as they are God's trust to him and must be cared for. But take care of yourself right now, and do not spend your money so freely. I spoke of my inner condition being the cause of unhappiness now as I was so critical and could not help seem the faults of others. He said, I must not, that he had sent for me for that reason and continued: 'I understand all and when so many are in the same house there will be friction – you must be the peace maker and when the conversation leads to war, you must change it to bring peace or leave. Follow my example, for I do not tell you of the short comings of others – nor do I mentions your faults to others, I am very merciful to you. Be you likewise. You must flame with love, have a good disposition so that all may love you and be made happy you have all been accepted as children of the kingdom, which is of God's great bounty, so you must act accordingly now go back to the house and kiss, embrace.' Then he laughed very much and gave me a rose he had in his girdle."

May 5th.

The Master sent for me again this morning and after telling me to sit beside him, asked me how I was. When I said “better, much better.” He asked why. I said that and what had happened at the house, I spoke only of my own condition – as being chaotic and unhappy over being so critical. Then the Master said, “So be aware of one’s faults is a good condition and causes perfection, but to see the faults of others makes one decrease in perfections. Never sit with the birds on the lower branches, but fly to those on the high branches. Look at the creatures only as the handwork of God and their relations to Him, do not let them make you sad. For instance, look at me with all flame to bear – am I ever sad? Never I always meet you _____. I speak plainly to you as a father to his beloved child and for your progress but to the stranger and must be more careful. If one is sad when he enters a beautiful garden he cannot enjoy it nor tell one when he leaves of the beauty of the flowers and their perfume likewise you are sad you are here. You will not enjoy the Divine bounty of this garden – you are greatly blessed to have been permitted to come here.” After a pause: “Are you entirely free from your husband now and did he want the divorce?” When I explained and also said that I prayed for him that he might be awakened the Master said; “He will be, but he will be sad, even unhappy, and will not like with this woman long (he had asked of her – what type she was and if he’d wish to marry her). It is incomprehensible that he should have left you perhaps he never had very good qualities.” I said yes, that he has alright once but under a bad influence and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said through my pity God would help him and that he also would pray. He said: “God will send you another and better man who will protect and be good to you and make you happy. But select carefully and think about it – a good heart and spirit and intelligence are necessary.”

In the first part of his talk when I said it was so hard to be good, he said, “Yes, but it is good to be good. All things that are good are hard, as learning for example. It is good to be learned but difficult. Self is the hardest thing to understand. It will not always be hard – after a while it will be easy – trust what I say.”

May 7.

Very welcome, very welcome. I have seen all the others now I shall see you – and again before you go you re my good daughter. When you return I want you to be such a flame that the people will say it is entirely another Mrs. Cook. I see that you are quiet always – I want you to be strong like a lioness and talk, teach. Stand up at the meetings and read the word, then tell them of what you have learned here I have educated your spirit and I want you entirely enkindled, so that if all the calamities of the world should befall you, you would not care at all. Let them say that while before you were physical, now you are spiritual. Have courage for I shall pray for you constantly from the Kingdom of God. Man has been given great courage and with the help of God this develops. I want you to become so well from that I shall hear of your work here – from all over the world. Do you think you can do this? Will you guarantee that you will do this? If you will think of what I say it will aid you always – try to put it into practice. Actions will show your gratitude for God's bounty to you. I love you very much and will help you. You will become so detached from the world that you will think and speak only of God. You must be sure to go to Persia with the Party, but now prepare yourself. The Persians are our fire – very kind, very warm and very loving. They do not disagree (with a laugh and I remarked that if that were the case I should stay forever) If you care to remain you may – many have gone for a short time, but wanted to stay. You must talk to them, enflame them and learn to fly.

Of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Haifa, Palestine,

In Oct. 23, 1920

Dr. Luṭfu’lláh told me this morning that the English were going to build a prison on the site of the barracks in ‘Akká where Bahá’u’lláh and His followers were imprisoned for two years (This to be a prison for all Palestine)

Where they were told of the imprisonment and after investigation, told the Bahá’ís that these rooms should not be touched but left as a sacred place for the believers all over the world to visit in future years.

April 1-11, 1954

Whatever the House of Justice decides is the Will of the Blessed One. In this way there is order – otherwise there will be confusion. The Bahá'í laws are not rigid and unalterable. Whatever the House of Justice must be carried out.

Dictated: “Political laws in the House of Bahá'u'lláh are not rigidly fixed. Whatever decision is arrived at by numbers of the House of Justice (which is like a Parliament) either unanimously or by a majority – according to the requirements of time and place – that is the law of God.” In other words the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh is not circumscribed, for this reason, that circumstances of time and place change. For instance the laws of America cannot be carried out here, and the laws of this place would be unsuitable for America. The circumstances are different.

In the time of Moses, the children of Israel were in the wilderness. There was no ease and comfort. Therefore ten offenses were made punishable by death. In the time of Christ there were towns and cities and civilization. The exigencies of the time did not require those ten laws for capital punishment, so he abolished them. Why? Because the time and circumstances were different. In the former time these laws were necessary and in this time other arrangements are required.

Q: It is missing, is it not, to say that the Bahá'í Cause cannot be organized?

A: How is it possible that there should be no organization? Even in a household, if there is no organization there will be hopeless confusion then what about the world? What is meant is that the organization is not rigid. In ancient times it was rigid. In the Torah all the political affairs were rigidly fixed, but in this Cause they are not. In this Cause there is political freedom, i.e. in each time the House of Thia is a brief explanation of the Master.

(Evening after Mírzá Maḥmúd's marriage) Supper, Jan. 2, 1920

Talking of the marriage ceremony 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Here we do not have much talking but there (in Amrica) they speak too much that no one can follow what they say. I was invited to a wedding in America. People were talking in couples. In the East one talks one talks and the root listen. When he has finished snother will speak, but they do not talk so much. Every place has its special customs. Every nation likes its own ways. At Christian weddings they smoke cigars and the room becomes filled with smoke."

Dr. E. remarked that it was nice to have the bride and groom take part in the ceremony themselves, as in the West, instead of by deputy.

A.B. It is so now. Everything depends on the time. Now it is impossible in the East for the bride to appear.

Mrs. P. In America all the interest centers in the bride. The groom is insignificant.

A.B. The marriage which is associated with spirituality and illumination is good. In the Arab districts only the bride and bridegroom are present. They place two stones. The bridegroom says, "I am on one stone and all the world is witness that thou art my wife and thy husband" The words are few but comprehensive. In the religion of God the consent of both parties is necessary. This is obligatory. In the East it was customary that the girl was not consulted in the matter at all. She knew nothing whatever about it. Her father would give her to some man and could not protect. To whomsoever he thought best he would give her. But the Blessed Beauty in the Kitáb-ul-Aqdas, explicitly says that no one must interfere between the two. Without the consent of both sides and the consent of the parents the marriage cannot take place. But you in America and Europe attach no importance to the parents consent. Even if the parents do not consent the young people do so they wish. If the parents are not agreeable, it will lead to inharmony. In the East, among the Muḥammadans and Christians, there is no love between the bride and her mother-in-law, as a rule, there is continually quarrelling and contention, because the consent of the parents had not been obtained for the marriage. Of course the mother does not wish her son to marry someone she disapproves and the son resents her interference. But amongst the Bahá'ís, it is very rare to find any unkindness amongst relations by marriage. As regards divorce, Bahá'u'lláh says that if a husband or wife cannot agree, there should be a preliminary separation of one.

Notes of a Pilgrimage to Haifa in January 1920, taken from Utterances of His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Q: What should be done about the Liberty Bonds that were sent as contributions to the Mashrak El Askar fund?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: That rests with the delegates to the Convention, dele-gates only - not strangers. The Convention Is like a parliament. The delegates represent the opinion of the whole body of believers.- What they decide unanimously or by a majority must be accepted. The majority must rule.

Q: I am afraid the Convention will have a hard time unless - ‘Abdu’l-Bahá prays for us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Your duty is to go with the majority and accept its decisions.

Q: Then it is the delegates to the Convention and not the Unity Board that have to decide on the plans.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Yes, the delegates must decide. The Board must carry out the decisions of the Convention. There must be order. It cannot be that everybody has the right of interference: in that case nothing would be accomplished.

Q. They say that all organization is forbidden by the Teachings.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: That is all talk. The Text of the Blessed Book cannot be changed. No one can interfere with it, things not definitely stated in the Book are referred to the House of Justice. Whatever the House of Justice decides, this is obligatory. Now, it is not possible for all the world to come together. The Convention is similar to the House of Justice to a certain extent. Its decisions and laws must be carried out

Q. In the beginning of the Big Ben Pamphlet, the words occur, “The Bahá’í Revelation is not an organization. The Bahá’í Cause can never be organized. Is this a correct translation?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: No. That gives the wrong idea. In the Cause of - Bahá’u’lláh there is the Beit-ul Adl (House of Justice) Political affairs are not explicitly settled in the Tablets. They are referred to the House of Justice. Whatever the House of Justice decides is obligatory. In the Writings of Bahá’u’lláh instructions are given with regard to worship, but the assembly of the House of ,Justice sees that at one time a certain arrangement is necessary and in another time a different arrangement. It is not circumscribed in its action. One hundred years ago one ruling was necessary; today another, tomorrow perhaps another, therefore, the Cause of God is of rigidly circumscribed. It is in accordance with the exigencies of time and place. Political affairs are not definitely fixed by Bahá’u’lláh. This is the object of what is said in the Book of Aqdas. Bahá’u’lláh says political affairs are referred to the House of Justice. Whatever they think wise according to the requirements of time and place ought to be carried out But the Command of Worship is to be found in the Book, politics will not remain unchanged, the politics of a hundred years ago are quite impracticable today. For example, there was slavery one hundred years ago; could that be carried out now?

The members of the House of Justice will be inspired Whenever it is established it will be under the protection of the Blessed Beauty; whatever the House of Justice decides is the Will of the – Blessed One. In this way there is order – Otherwise there would be confusion The Bahá’í Laws are not rigid and unalterable. Whatever the House of Justice decides must be carried out.

Dictated: "Political Laws in the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh are not rigidly fixed. Whatever decision is arrived at by the members of the House of Justice (which is like a parliament) either unanimously or by a majority according to the requirements of time and place, that is the Law of God. In other words, the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh is not circum-scribed for this reason that circumstances of time and place change. For instance, the laws of America cannot be carried out here, and the laws of this place would be unsuitable for America. The circumstances are different."

"In the case of Moses the children of Israel were in the wilderness, There were no ease and comfort. Therefore ten offences were made punishable by death. In the time of Christ, there were towns and cities and civilization. The exigencies of the time did not require these ten laws for capital punishment, so He abolished them. Why? Because the times and circumstances were different. in the former times these laws were necessary, but in Christ's time, they were no longer necessary, and in this time other arrangements are required."

Q: It is misleading is it not, to say that the Bahá'í Cause cannot be organized?

'Abdu'l-Bahá: How is it possible that there should be no organization? Even in a household if there is not organization there will be hopeless confusion. Then what about the world? What is meant is that organization is not rigid! In ancient times it was rigid. In the Torah all the political affairs were rigidly fixed, but in this Cause they were not. In this Cause there is political freedom - i.e., in each time the House of Justice is free to decide in accordance with what is deemed expedient. This is a brief explanation of the matter.

Q: It was the delegates and not the Unity Board who were to decide, was it not? This was spoken of yesterday, but the notes were not taken down. Will the Master please repeat so that it may be taken down today.

When the Turks came and attacked the place they brought the wines of all description a great number of barrels of wine, wines of twenty years old. The Turks sated themselves with drink and wine and said, "No matter how much the store is not exhausted." They brought out boxes of tinned beef, salmon, etc, so it became evident that the monks used meat. Sweets and chocolates also they found. The Col. declared, "In all my life I have never tasted such wine. It is wonderful. A little in a glass with water is delicious."

Dr. E. Where was it the Master lived! In the lower cave of Elijah near the bottom of the slope?

A.B. Yes, in the lower cave.

Mrs. P. Was it in the upper or the lower cave that Elijah lived?

A.B. It was in the lower cave that he used to teach and enlighten the people. Sometimes he would go up to the upper cave. There was a small cave there where he would go and sit for an hour or so when the sun was very hot, but his dwelling was in the lower cave. There he used to sleep and teach.

Dr. E. The cave has evidently been enlarged and squared by artificial means.

A.B. The lower cave was partly excavated by Elijah. It has since been enlarged, but the cave is very old. It dates perhaps from before the time of Abraham. It has been enlarged and squared by man, but there is still a divan there where Elijah used to sleep.

Dr. E. Were the buildings outside the cave there when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived there!

A.B. I was in the room towards the West. The rooms on the Eastern side have been built since.

Dr. E. How long did the Master remain there?

A.B. One month!

Magam, Sunday afternoon, 15th Jan

“Whoever reads the books of the prophets and reads the prophecies concerning Carmel will understand the greatness of Carmel and will then appreciate the visit to the Tomb. What wonderful tidings the prophets have given concerning this Carmel! All those prophecies have now been fulfilled. Amongst the names given to it is, “The Door of God”. It is called Car-mel, i.e. Garden of God. Many tidings are given about it – continual tidings – amongst these are “Carmel is Bahá’u’lláh.” This is the Carmel of Bahá’u’lláh. When one reads these prophecies and becomes aware of their significance, then from visiting the Tomb one becomes very happy. (To Mrs. Parsons) if you wish, come one night here and be the guest of ‘Abbás Gholi and sleep here. Come at night and visit here and then see how spiritual it is. I will tell ‘Abbás Gholi that you may become his guest”

When in America at Washington, I spoke about the relations of white and colored people. Even you (Mrs. P.) said: “If the colored people come here, the white ones will not come.” You told me: “We have appointed a special place for the colored people but they do not go there.” They said, “Why you not let us come to the meetings with the white people?” They thought the arrangement was a slight upon them.

First, I spoke in a church, then in a University for colored people. I said: “I see a strange thing in Washington. There is a great rivalry between the white and colored, to such an extent it has reached enmity and hatred, and if it remains so, the result will be very disastrous. It is certain that the effects will be very bad. This inharmony arises from ignorance; it has no real foundation, because in the sight of God there is no distinction between white and black. If the heart is turned to God it becomes illumined even though its owner may be black. If the heart is blackened with the passions of the world of self and material things and with satanic fancies that person has fallen away from God, no matter how white his skin may be. And more over consider that there is a difference of color, in the world of animals also... (Here A.B. dove of different colors.. of different colored flowers in a garden etc..) How is it that difference of color, which in the animal and vegetable worlds is the cause of beauty, should in the human world be the cause of enmity and hatred?"

O colored ones! The whites have done you a great service. They have sacrificed their lives and wealth for your liberation. For four years there was war in America for the sole purpose of liberating you, until at last success was attained and you were freed. Then this freedom extended to Europe and your fellows in Europe became free also. It also affected the East and all the black in the East became free. Then it reached Africa and your fellows there also became free. Now that not one colored man – even a barbarian – can be enslaved. The whites in America have sacrificed themselves for your freedom. Now it is fair that you should oppose them? This is great unfaithfulness and ingratitude and injustice. You should always express thankfulness and gratitude because the whites of America sacrificed themselves, enter into war, we spent money only for your freedom – and obtained it. Then this freedom extended to the whole world. In truth, the whites of America became the cause of the freedom of your race. Instead of showing gratitude you have risen in opposition. In no code of morale would such conduct be justified. If a person receives even a little assistance from anyone, he should not forget it throughout his life, he should always be thankful to that person - This is worthy of man. This is the requirement of religion, and this is justice. If man is not appreciative of help received, there is no doubt than he is worse than an animal. For consider: If a man does some kind turn for an animal, for example if he gives a piece of bread to a dog, the dog will never forget it. Also the cat and other animals do not forget a kindness shown. Briefly, you are human how can you forget this service, this sacrifice which the whites have made for you? What will you say, before the whites when the whites say: "O God, we have given our lives and our wealth to free the blacks and now they have risen in opposition to us. Instead of becoming humble."

Tuesday morning the permission to enter. Palestine had come. We devoted the day to preparations or leaving on the evening train. Mírzá Muḥammad Taqí with Mírzá Tofik called on us in the morning. A Cairo believer sent a large basket and asked sent it to the Master. He spoke of it as small, but when it appeared, it seemed large to us. It was very heavy, filled probably with fruit. The hall porter at the hotel was not a little surprised to see travellers from the Occident having so many callers from the Orient.

At the railroad station in the evening several Bahá'í friends appeared to bid us farewell. Mítrza Muḥammad Taqí bought a ticket to the first station in order that he might come out on the platform from which our train left. He presented us with beautiful flowers and with a tray full of little cakes. How happy he looked in rendering these services. We saved out some of the most beautiful roses to present to the Master.

We arrived at Kantara about eleven in the evening. Here we had to get porters to carry our many pieces of baggage to the customs officer. We were entering Palestine. After another exciting melee of porters officers, crowds, all enveloped in wellnigh English soldiers had been evicted from our berth, settled down for the night. The train stayed at Kantara until six in the morning, when it started on its long day's journey over the desert of the Sinai Peninsula.

The desert is rolling, not perfectly level. About the only vegetation is cactus, except that now and then there is a small oasis with date palms and a cluster of tents with bronzed and rather wild looking people.

In the afternoon, we approached the hill country. At first, vegetation on the hills was sparse, but as we went on, it became thicker. We saw large flocks of sheep and goats. Then we came to the country which is cultivated. The fields are stony and stone walls have been built. This reminded me of New England. The orchards too reminded me of New England apple orchard. The hills though are rather bigger and bolder than the New England hills. I thought it a very beautiful country. Its beauty seemed to me homelike, quiet and peaceful.

After a time, the train came near the sea. The sunset colors were beautiful. We were now approaching Haifa. Partly, it seemed to me the Land of Hearts desire, partly I was filled with a feeling of nameless awe, as of one approaching an unknown land. If I could have looked ahead, I should have known it to be the Land of Love, but a greater, more perfect Love than humanity of itself could ever conceive.

About six o'clock in the evening of a day in early September, 1920, we arrived in Haifa. Rúhí Effendi, a grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Fugeta, a Japanese Bahá'í, Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím, a Jewish Bahá'í and an American Bahá'í were at the train to meet us. Said Effendi, an Egyptian Bahá'í had come on the same train with us. All were so kind to us, wishing to do more than they could show their love. Fugeta climbed into our compartment through the window, grasped the two heaviest of our many pieces of luggage and walked off with them, looking smaller than ever (He is no taller than a child) between the suitcase and the large basket. Said Effendi ran into our compartment and began to carry out pieces of luggage, but was advised by the others to go and find his own. We rode up in the Master's auto to the Western Pilgrim House. This is on the outskirts of Haifa, opposite 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house, on a street leading up Mt. Carmel. It is attractive in its simplicity. The large central room, which one enters first, is used as a dining room. It contains an oval extension table, bentwood chairs and a sideboard. Out of the dining room open three sleeping rooms and passageway. Out of the passageway open another sleeping room and the kitchen. We occupied the bedroom opposite the entrance. It contained two iron beds with mosquito nettings, two rugs, a medium-sized table with looking glass over it and an iron washstand. There were four windows, two opposite of the door, looking up Mt. Carmel and one in each of the other two sides of the room. There were outside blinds and dotted Swiss curtains. The windows had iron grating on the outside and against one of these was a clay water bottle. The water in this was always of a delightful coolness.

The atmosphere of the Pilgrim House is that of a quiet beautifully clean and fresh place in the country. When I looked out the windows up Mt. Carmel to the shrine of the Báb, I realized that I was surrounded by an atmosphere even more intensely beautiful. As the days passed we learned that we were in the abode of love, service and fellowship, ever and an even more beautified by the presence of the Master.

We were told that the Master was resting at the Shrine of the Báb.

After a little, we were invited to cross the street to the Master's house. It was evening now. The sky seemed very near, as we went across the narrow street, unlighted save by the brilliant stars, which seemed to hang so low.

At the Master's house we met the ladies of His household (His sister, His wife, two of His daughters), two grandsons and two granddaughters. All greeted us lovingly, the ladies embracing and kissing us. We sat in the reception room, a large room simply furnished with reed chairs and tables. There were no rugs on the tiled floor. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wife, the Holy Mother, spoke most, Rúhí Effendi, one of the grandsons, acting as interpreter.

She said that their whole life was in meeting the pilgrims from the East and from the West. She asked most kindly about our journey, our homes, the condition of the Cause in America. When we said that we had to spend two months in coming from New York to Haifa, she replied that the Eastern pilgrims have even more difficulties than those from the West. One family of pilgrims, she said, had been in Haifa three months waiting an opportunity to leave. This family we met later. It consists of a man, wife and an eleven year-old daughter from Baku, Russia. Shortly after they arrived at Haifa, Baku was taken by Bolsheviks. In this day the man had lost his home and business and must find a new place in which to live and work.

Another group of Oriental pilgrims after enduring many hardships on the way thither, on their return were unable to obtain passage on the boat, although they had paid their passge in advance, until they said the price again.

When the Holy Mother heard that two of our party were teachers, she said that that was a class especially praised by Bahá'u'lláh in the Aqdas. He recommended that they be given inheritances by the state. She spoke of the martyrs in Persia. Whole families were wiped out, families of prominence. She asked if there were persecutions in America. I said that perhaps the Cause would spread.

My Pilgrimage to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Sylvia Paine

It is a joy and privilege for me to share with you some of my memories of the pilgrimage to Haifa in Sept. 1-8, 1920 when I had the great privilege of meeting the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

I went with my mother, Mabel Paine and two other believers, Genevieve Coy and Cora Gray. We had a long and somewhat difficult journey – leaving Urbana, Il., in early July 1920 and arriving at Haifa Sept. 1. Of course, we travelled by train and boat going from New York to Naples, Italy, where we waited about two weeks to go to Brendisi, Italy, where we boarded a ship in the Adriatic Sea bound for Haifa. There were a few delays in the sailing, because of strikes. To enter Palestine, we needed visas, issued in Cairo, Egypt, which took several more unscheduled days.

Then by train from Cairo to Haifa. It was a trip taking all day, as the train could not run at night there – we boarded in the evening, slept on the train which started at daylight – arriving in Haifa in late afternoon.

In Alexandria, Egypt and later in Cairo we had the joy of meeting with many of the Bahá’ís – mostly from Persia and Egypt. They took us to the train, looked with baskets of fruit and flowers for the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The next day, after arriving in Haifa, we went up Mt. Carmel to the Shrine of the Báb where there was a gathering of believers (men only) and the Master spoke. We sat outdoor, in front of the Shrine, looking North to ‘Akká and beyond Lebanon.

He greeted us joyfully, inquiring for the friends in America – mentioning several – Genabis Faḍil, Abu’l-Faḍl, Roy Wilhelm. He spoke of the rain falling on both barren and fertile land, only the fertile land responding. So it is He said, with His words – some people hear them but forget, some do not even hear them but some people are ready, and so it is with His words; some fall on hearts that do not have capacity – they do not take effect, others seem to understand but they forget my words and do not live in accordance with them while others have great capacity. They hear my words, they understand, they live accordingly although Christ's brothers were so near Him, they did not understand. But the soil of Peter's heart was fertile, He understand Christ.

At the close of the meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá greeted us individually. I was excited, in awe of Him, but longing to be with Him. I remember the moment when He spoke to me, holding out His arms, and I spontaneously rushed into them. For a moment, I felt truly selfless – forgetting my customary and fear of demonstrating emotions.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was called away on business having to do with purchasing land on Mt. Carmel. Those owning a certain piece of land did not wish to sell, 'Abdu'l-Bahá let the matter rest, telling the friends not to be troubled.

We prayed in the Shrine of the Báb, our shoes removed and hands anointed with rose water.

Our pilgrimage lasted eight days and seven nights.

Breakfast was served in the cottage when we stayed – across the street from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house.

For dinner we crossed to His house and ate at a long table with many people – when the Master joined us and served the friends.

When he was in Haifa; several days He rested near the Shrine on Mt. Carmel.

One day, we went to 'Akká, visiting Bahjí, seeing the barracks where the friends were confined when they first arrived for years, at the end of the day we entered the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh for prayer and meditation. I remember having been told that I should be very careful to pray for the right thing as my prayer would be answered (shades of the fairy stories). But I tried very hard to pray to be selfless and good – knowing all the time that this experience was far beyond my capacity to fully appreciate.

Mother and I had private meetings with the Master. He gave me the name Badieh – which I am told _____ - something new and wonderful. He was radiant and laughing with me, telling me an answer to the question what I should do in life, "It doesn't matter so long as she does it in love, with the right aim."

In our last evening in Haifa we were with Him – He bade us goodbye and called me "Badieh Khanoum" with a beautiful ringing laugh, I wished I could carry with me forever the sound of His voice and that laugh of greeting, His voice impressed me especially so full, musical, beautiful, I never heard another voice like it.

I have thought of these days in Haifa many times – trying to keep as close to the spirit I found there are possible. I truly believe that the blessings of such a pilgrimage last after the visit is over. I am sure 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Master has guided me, protected me in ways which I experienced as a young child, though no which I can never be thankful enough – any small services which I can do for Bahá'u'lláh will never repay the gift He has given me.

Said to me at breakfast; “You, drinking coffee? Drink tea, good, very good”.
When asked to explain why tea was better, He said: “Coffee has the particles pulverized in the liquid and is disintegrating, while tea is clear, aids digestion and stimulates the spiritual qualities.”

“You must excuse me tonight if I do not sit at table with you, but Bahá’u’lláh

September 1, 1920

Beginning Sept 1, 1920 for 7 or 8 days Sylvia was a child of 11 years, arrived by train in late afternoon, greeted by Bahá'ís piled into the Master's car, Fujita came on train to help with baggage brought presents from American friends with Cora Gray, Genevieve Coy met Master the next day was at house next to the Shrine of the Báb sat in front of Shrine with other men believers, sat in semi-circle four or five chairs reserved for pilgrims next to 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'he walked with a great deal of energy and he was radiant and loving and smiling'

‘As he talked, he looked out across the bay of Haifa — you could see Akká in the distance — and His eyes just seemed to penetrate into that distance. His eyes were very expressive. . .’ after talk, ‘Abdu'l-Bahá greeted each pilgrim individually with a handshake, except for Sylvia, who, because she was a child, He hugged.

‘I was a shy and rather self-conscious child and I felt very much on my best behaviour because here I was having gone months to get there. . . We left Illinois on the first of July and it took us until the first of September to get there. . . Here we were with all of these delays and difficulties in travel. . . and I knew that it was something very important and that I was supposed to be very much impressed, but I wasn't quite sure how and what. But I was self-conscious and afraid that I would do the wrong thing at the wrong time as a child is likely to feel in such circumstances. My memory is that there was an instant in which, when the Master greeted me, for just an instant that all that feeling of self-conscious left me. I felt, I can't say a force of power, but it was as though these artificial things which come from a child's insecurity were gone. Just for that moment. I was not a person who rushed up and hugged people. . . but with Him I did and I didn't know why. For just an instant, it took that self-consciousness away from me. . . I have a very strong memory of that entered Shrine of the Báb father was not a Bahá'í who allowed his wife to go but couldn't understand why. At a large sacrifice, he helped his wife and daughter go, but did not go himself. Wife thought she might be spoiling the family unity by going, but felt that she had to go. Permission was given, but not by father (head of Dept of Electrical Engineering at the Univ of Illinois). Mother accepted the Faith in 1915.

Mother had individual interview with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Was in tears about any disruption and unhappiness she may have caused to her husband who had sacrificed so much to raise money for the trip. Her husband had not been permitted to come by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but could not understand why. He would have preferred for the family to all have gone together.

Sylvia’s visit was brief. One of the daughters in the Holy Household suggested that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá give Sylvia a name. When she came into His presence, she had the impression of light and radiance and happiness. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá paced up and down the floor and gave her the name of Badiéh. Sylvia said very little, but her mother asked how she could serve the Faith. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that as long as she aimed to serve the Faith, then it was good. Ladies of the Household had a naming celebration afterwards for Sylvia with rock candy and tea.

One day, Sylvia was walking through Haifa with one of the grandchildren of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá when she thought to herself that wouldn’t it be interesting that just as they were casually strolling along the street they should meet the Master. And suddenly, there He was, just as though it was an answer to her thoughts.

On the last night after dinner, pilgrims gathered for their last meeting with the Master. When He saw Sylvia, He laughed and called her name in English. Sylvia remembered the quality of His voice, which was nothing like she had ever heard, and thought that she really wanted to carry the memory of that voice with her when she left. She remembered the strength and vibrance of the voice and its rich musical, beautiful quality of His voice.

Greatest Holy Leaf spoke to them about their experiences coming to ‘Akká. Remembered her as strong, gentle and loving. Sylvia sat next to her and the Greatest Holy Leaf would stroke her hands rode in 3-seat horse carriage. Went to Cave of Elijah and though Haifa trip to ‘Akká went by horse carriage with Isfandíyár, 7 or 8 went started at 7 with lunch with Shoghi Effendi’s mother and some of her other children drove along the beach

‘We came to the gate and one of the horses had something wrong with its shoe. There was someone there outside the gate. . . and the shoe was repaired. I remember particularly a train of camels. . . and I think some donkeys, too, who had arrived in ‘Akká from someplace and they were waiting to have work done on the camels’ feet by a blacksmith. . . I, as a child, was very impressed to see a train of camels waiting to get into the gate in ‘Akká. We went in to this rather narrow gate and in the streets. ‘Akká seemed thousands of years older than Haifa, though Haifa just seemed like an old Arab town, but ‘Akká had far more antiquity — the cobble-stoned streets, rough and everything very dirty. We went first to the Barracks where the Friends were first imprisoned when they first went. . . We went into a long room. . . with open arches which led out on this court. The Barracks were built around the court. . . in which was a pool of rather stagnant water. . . I was very impressed. . . that seventy people or so all crowded into this room. We had been told by members of the family and by the Greatest Holy Leaf what it was like. The soldiers took us around the Barracks [to] lots of rooms that we weren't terribly interested in.

What made an impression on me was this great, long Barracks room. . . it was just a great, long, dark place. . . and I thought how in the world did these people ever manage with just that dirty water out there. They told us about how terrible water the water was and it was all they had to drink. The Greatest Holy Leaf. . . said she used her handkerchief to strain the water before she drank. It was August and they were so thirsty and hot and they weren't given any food at all. Then the next day they were given some dirty bread. . . I do remember sitting on a porch and eating melons. . . this may have been the House of Abbúd. . . Families were living there and it was a dwelling place. . .

We drove around the streets of 'Akká. . . then we went with the carriage out to the Riḍván Garden which was very, very beautiful. That made an impression on me because of the running water and the little fountain and a blind mule which went around and around pulling this rope which made the fountain run. And the mulberry trees and the benches. We sat on the benches and had a picnic lunch and took little naps under the mulberry trees. . .

The last stop was past Bahjí to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. We never entered Bahjí because it was not in the hands of the Bahá'ís, but they never told us this. They just said that is where He lived. They never emphasized these negative things at all.

We went into the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and that made a tremendous impression on me because I realised that this was probably the most Holy place I would ever be in and here was an opportunity to get closer to Bahá'u'lláh and to get more understanding of God and whatever part I might have to play in this Faith. It was about 4 o'clock and we went in. . . The remarkable thing to me was that we were there all by ourselves. We knelt at the Threshold then they open the door and we all went in, clear in to the very place. . . I remember praying and thinking that, in my rather childish way, whatever we prayed for in all sincerity at that spot would be granted.'

They returned to Haifa by road and arrived in time for dinner with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. After dinner, 'Abdu'l-Bahá got up and went to a basin and pitcher at the side of the room and washed His hands and face, after which He was given a towel. Then He said to the pilgrims, 'Go and rest' and then He left.

September 13, 1920

S. S. Montenegro, September 13, 1920

Homeward bound after a week in Haifa! A week in Heaven! Delay after delay, postponed sailings, strikes among the harbour workers and slow boats had left us, as we thought only two or three days for that wondering spot but we had pushed on, trusting that since we had had permission to come, the journey could not be in vain. When the last obstacle, the permit to enter the Palestine, was finally removed, we started off in the first train from Cairo on the evening of August 31, 1920. Three of the Cairo friends came to see us off, an Armenian, Mírzá Tofic, the Master's nephew, and dear blessed Mírzá Muḥammad Taky Iṣfahání. The latter tipped the "conductor" when he taught we were not looking, and just as we were about to pull out, gave us a bunch of fragrant roses and a tray of French pastry. He speaks no English but the goodbye smile he gave us needed no interpreter.

All next day our hearts were full as we journeyed up through the Holy Land by the "way of the sea". In the afternoon hills and mountains came into view and we said to each other as the little villages stood out in the clear air, "a city that is set on a hill cannot be hid" and again when the blue misty heights rose in the distance, "I will lift up my eyes unto the hills from which cometh my help". We had thought of Mount Carmel as higher and steeper, and so while we were still looking ahead for a glimpse of the "Holy Mountain", we rounded its base and began to pull into Haifa, a long cluster of houses shining white and beautiful in the rays of the setting sun.

Having learned by previous experience that passing baggage through the window is the accepted method of getting it out, I jumped off as soon as the train stopped and was just about to engage a porter when a voice at my side said, "Are there American Bahá'ís here? Miss Gray?" With joy I turned to say "yes" and "Alláho Abhá" to a fine looking man in a fez. Four men from the household had met us, Rúhíe, the Master's grandson, 'Azíz'u'lláh Khán, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh and Fugita. Fugita clambered in through the window while the rest sent off the posters who flocked around us. He passed our baggage out through the window and finally staggered out the door with huge basket of fruit sent by some friends in Cairo in my suitcase, stoutly denying that either was in the least heavy! Rúhíe put us and some of our baggage into an auto and went with us to the house, leaving the others to follow with the rest when the car should return.

On the way up, Rúhíe told us that the Master was on the Mountain but He would either come or send for us the following day. My heart sank for tomorrow seemed so far off! We learned too that Malcolm and Mrs. Hoagg were the only other Americans there. The latter had been there three months in preparation for going to Italy to teach. She acted as hostess and Fugita was cook. He got the breakfast of toast, tech, cheese, honey and an egg, brought us the lunch sent over from the Master's house, and served when we gathered at the Master's table for dinner. Formerly there was a woman housekeeper at the Pilgrim House, but when she left, just before Mrs. Hoagg arrived, Fugita had offered to take her place. A young girl from the Master's house came over every morning to straighten the bedrooms, and the boys brought the water, but Fugita cooked, washed the dishes, cared for the lamps, made and served the afternoon tea, and looked after the house generally.

The ride seemed long, we were so anxious to be there, but it probably took ten or fifteen minutes to reach the gate of the house made familiar to us by photographs brought by returning pilgrims. We were welcomed to the American Pilgrim House and shown our rooms by Mrs. Hoagg, to those dear plain rooms with tiled floors and big windows. Soon after we were taken to meet the sweet-faced, starry-eyed ladies of the household.

As we entered the gate of the Master's house, that too looked familiar in the moonlight and we seemed indeed to be coming to a place we had known a long time. We were shown into a reception room lined with comfortable chairs and lighted from a large chandelier. Soon the ladies came in simple, light colored house dresses, with white veils thrown over their heads, Khanoum, (the Greatest Holy Leaf), the Holy Mother, Rúḥá Khanoum and two girls of about fourteen or fifteen. They greeted us with smiles and embraces and told us that we were very welcome, that they had been expecting us for a long time, (because of some letters written by the friends in America after we had left). I remember almost nothing of that they said, but one does not soon forget the love, the kindness they shower upon the visitor, nor the sweet beauty of their faces. When dinner was announced. they laughingly excused themselves because of the men guests who were present, but I still remember the feeling of desolation with which I gave them up for the dinner hour. Mírzá Houssein, one of the sons-in-law received us and seated us at the end of the long table, and one by one the men came and took their places until the table held twenty-four. Mírzá Jalál sat at one end and Mabel at the other. Fugita and Hosro served as always and little Fu'ad trotted around "superintending" After dinner we returned to the Pilgrim House where Rúhíe Effendi, Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh, and Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh Khán joined us. We sat for a time talking in the moonlight and went in for our first right in Haifa.

I woke early with the thought that that day I should see the Master, but the hours passed and He did not come. Of course I should have spent the time in preparation, but I could not. I walked around, looked out the window and walked again, restless for His coming. At lunch Rouble came saying that after tea we were to go up the mountain to meet the Master, that there would be a gathering of the friends there.

About four the carriage came to take us up the mountain. Many of the men were there when we arrived but five chairs had been placed at the west of the terrace and to these we were directed. Opposite us was an arm chair where the Master was to sit. After a little time the men suddenly rose and looking toward the other end of the terrace, we saw the Master coming slowly toward us. He was clad in long pongee-colored robes with a white turban and kerchief. I think He bowed to the friends as He came passed them, and then bowing to each one of us, He sat down and called Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh Khán to interpret. He looked very tired and frail as He asked after our health and happiness and our journey. I tried to tell him how good the friends had been to us on the way but He dismissed the idea saying, with an air of finality, "That is the duty of the Bahá'ís" as if such things were merely a matter of course. The Master's high standard suddenly became very real to me.

In the course of the conversation the Master asked whether we had met Janabe Faḍil before we left America. We told him yes, and He remarked that He had sent two real Bahá'ís to America and one was Jenabe Faḍil. Then He continued that the other was Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl. We spoke of Jenabe Faḍil's progress in learning English and He said 'Abdu'l Faḍil learned English when he was old. "He said he was too old, but the Master smilingly said he learned it!" adding that "he who is confirmed is confirmed in all things." Then with evident amusement He told the story of how some American ladies had insisted on seeing Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl during his study time in the mornig, and how they had knocked so persistently that at last Abu'l-Faḍl had opened the door and said, "Abu'l-Faḍl not home." And the Master laughed heartily.

When He had inquired about our health He asked whether we liked the view there, the wonderful view out over the Bay of 'Akká. When Genevieve had said yes, He went on "The truth is that this place has a spiritual atmosphere. There are many beautiful views, but they do not have spirituality, as for instance the Mountains of Lebanon, which are beautiful but are without spiritual meaning. All the prophets have been here, but none were raised up in the Lebanons. It is strange that although all the world is one piece of land, yet God has continually remembered Palestine. But Samat, Lebanon and Damascus He has not mentioned. There were there worshipping places for idols, the ruins of which still exist. There was in Balbeck a temple of the sun the remains of which still stand. As it is written in the Book (Qur'án) "God gives His bounty and favor to whomsoever He willeth! That is the case with this land.”

At the meeting on the following Sunday Mabel said that worshipping God was easier in that place than in the churches and the Master answered, “Yes the heart is attracted here. His Holiness Elijah had a cave near here ten the children of Isreal were in opposition to the religion of God. They were engaged with their own passions, only in name were they the people of His Holiness Moses. Had Moses come he would not have recognized them. He would have said, ‘I do not consider them as my own for they have entirely forsaken the religion of God. They have not the laws of God. There is no light in them at all. They are like a new servant those name is Diamond, but who is still a charcoal servant! This was the condition of the chi iron of Isreal.

“Then His Holiness Elijah educated certain souls. He trained sincere and pure souls to reach the station of what they should be. Then they began to teach and call the children of Isreal and invite them again to the law of God. All the leaders of the people Elijah gathered together on this mountain. There were three hundred and sixty of them. But all his advice was of no avail, all his guidance went for naught. For Several years he worked for their education, but the effort produced no result. Then He realized that they were kind of people who would spoil other souls and he put them to death. After that the other people were able to return to their former spirituality and their good lives. They became alive again. The everlasting Glory again became apparent. They overcame the neighboring tribes; they rebuilt the Temple of Jerusalem; they put the laws of God into effect. Then when Elijah knew that he had finished his work, he went away. He left them and disappeared. They thought that he had ascended to heaven, but no he went away because his work was finished, and because he had no attachments. He did not return. When a person is sincere and pure, his actions show it. Elijah worked with such purity of purpose and labored so unselfishly, that when all the way became smooth and when the time of comfort and ease came, he he left that his work was finished and left it. He had no attachments, he went away to rest.

“All one’s thought and actions must be heavenly, that is related to the Kingdom of God. We must be attached to nothing in this world. This world is like the waves of the sea, it does not last. The wise person does not attach his heart to waves.”

Then Mabel, thoughtfully for the problems of the Urbana group, asked whether the friends there should attend the Unitarian church. The Master answered, “There is no harm in it.” Then she asked whether it was better to go there than somewhere else, and He answered,

“One can worship anywhere. In any place, in any church or in any mosque the purpose is to turn to God. If there is a Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, it is better to be there for in other worshipping places the hearts are not communing with God, they are turned to the world, and therefore they do not inhale the breath of the Merciful. But n the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár the hearts are turned to God for it is the place of the breath of the Merciful. But if there is no Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, it is not bad to go to other worshipping places."

"When I was in America I used to go to the churches and speak there. When I entered while they were engaged in prayer, I also would stand up and turn to the Kingdom of God. After they had finished their prayer, I would give the divine glad tidings. I would give them the proofs, evidences of the divine. I gave the teachings of the Blessed Beauty and all would listen. There was no opposition. When they were in communion with God, it made me happy. When they were calling, 'My God! My God!' I became happy.

"When His Holiness Christ gathered His disciples together on that special night, it was not in an established worshipping place, but in a room. And that night they had the Lord's supper, and in a room. The purpose of worship is that the heart may be attracted, the spirit may be filled with the divine glad tidings, and the souls be turned unto Him. This is the object, the other things are secondary."

Then some guests came to see the Master and with a word of apology He went to receive them. When He had left, Mrs. Hoagg took us into the Tomb, a beautiful simple room, a place of peace and strength. We knelt a long time, our hearts reaching out to those great Teachers in this day of God. As we came out, we met the Master returning to enter the Tomb with the men. Because I had been the last to leave I found myself nearest the door and the Master as He swept past. He took the vase of rose water and held it out to me, but seeing that I hesitated awkwardly, not knowing quite what was expected, He smiled, and then with quick thoughtfulness poured some on his Hands and bathed hands and face in the fragrance. Then with another smile of loving encouragement, He held it out to me again. The Master was the last to enter and in a moment He spoke to Rúhíe who immediately began to chant in a wonderfully sweet voice the exquisite "Visiting Table."

The Visiting Tablet,

Bahá'u'lláh.

The praise which became manifest from Thy supreme soul the glory which dawned from Thy countenance, the Most Glorious, be upon Thee! O Thou manifestation of the Almighty, the Kind of Immortality and the Possessor of all which is upon the earth and in the heavens! I testify that through Thee the sovereignty of God and His Almightyness became revealed. Through Thee the Suns of Priority shone forth in the heaven of preordination and the beauty of the Invisible appeared from the horizon of Origin. I testify that through the motion of Thy Pen the Command of "Be" and "it was" was published abroad, he hidden Mystery of God was revealed, the unknown potentialities were disclosed and the Manifestations were sent. I testify that through Thy Beauty the beauty of the Adored One was uncovered; through Thy face the face of the Desired One beamed; through one word on Thy part the creatures were separated and the sincere ones ascended to the apex of loftiness while the polytheists descended to the lowest degree.

I testify that whosoever recognized Thee: has recognized God, and whosoever attained to Thy meeting has attained to the meeting of God. Blessed is he who has believed in The and Thy verses; become humble before Thy majesty, was honored with Thy visit, Thy good pleasure, milked about Thy court and presented himself before Thy Throne.

Woe is him who has oppressed Thee, disbelieved in Thee, repudiated Thy signs, rebelled against Thy sovereignty, fought against Thine own self, seemed haughtiness before Thy countenance, contended with Thy proof, run away from Thy government and supremacy and was written with the fingers of command as one of the polytheists in the Tablets of his Holiness.

O My God! O My Beloved! Send to me from the right hand of Thy grace and providence the holy fragrances of Thy bestowals, and release me from myself and the world and draw me toward the heaven of Thy nearness and Thy meeting. Verily Thou art surrounding all things!

Upon Thee be, O Thou Countenance of God, the praise of God and His mention – the glory of God and His light! I testify that the eye of creation has not witnessed an oppressed one like unto Thee. During all Thy days Thou wert in the dark chambers of calamities. Now thou wert under the swords of enemies and anon Thou wert under chains and irons. Notwithstanding all these Thou didst command the people as Thou wert commanded on the part of the Wise and the Knowing! May my spirit be a sacrifice to Thy afflictions and may my soul be a ransom to Thy trials! I beg of God, of Thee and of those whose faces became illumined through the rays of Thy face and followed that which they were commanded for the sake of Thy love, to rend asunder the veils which have intervened between Thyself and Thy creatures, and destined for us the good of this world and the world to come. Verily Thou art the Powerful, the exalted, the Mighty, the Forgiving and the Merciful!

O God! Glorification and salutation be upon the Tree and its Leaves, Its Branches and Its Twigs, Its Roots and Its Limbs – through the continuation of Thy Comely names of Thy most high attributes. Then protect it from the perversity of the antagonists and the hosts of the tyrants. Verily Thou art the Omnipotent and the Omnipotent.

O God! Glorification and salutation be upon Thy servants who have attained and Thy maidservants who have attained. Verily Thou art the Generous, the Possessor of the most great bestowals, and verily there is no God beside Thee, the Pardoner and the Clement.

Diary of Aḥmad Schrab, August 30, 1914

After the chanting of the Tablet, the men prostrated themselves and we followed their example as well as we could. Then bowing and kissing the fragrant threshold, we stepped back and knelt again to pray for a few moments. When we at length came out, Mrs. Hoagg was at the door to say that the Master was waiting to tell us goodbye. Hastily we put on our shoes, and at the east end of the building found Him waiting to shake hands and say goodnight. When we passed the caretakers house on our way to the carriage, there He stood again, smiling and waving us on our way. That little glimpse of Him coming to wave as a second goodbye was to me one of the sweetest incidents of our stay and made the Master's love very real.

The morning after our first meeting with the Master while we were still straying on the mountain Genevieve and I left the house a little after five to visit the Tomb. The caretaker met us, smiled and unlocked the door. We spent a long time in that sweet, quiet place. When we came out we met Rúhíe and Mírzá Lotfulla we filled our hands with fragrant white blossoms. The latter led us to the circle of tall graceful cypress trees where used to sit, but we were barely inside when Rúhíe came to say that the Master had sent for us. Joyfully we went to a room in the caretaker's house where the Master sometimes stays. For some reason I entered first, and saw Him sitting on a divan by a little barred window, looking out over the Bay of 'Akká toward the prison city. He motioned me to come in, but I stood stupidly rooted to the threshold and unable to move. At once He smiled, as one smiles at a child caught in an awkward predicament, rose and coming toward me, motioned me again to the chair, saying welcome. My mortification at having made him rise was almost lost in admiration for his quick kindness. Genevieve came and sat next to me, and Mírzá Lotfallah and Rúhíe followed.

Almost at once an herb tea was brought Him and in a moment a tray for us, tea, bread, homey, olives and delicious ripe figs and we were invited to eat our breakfast. We drank our tea and ate some, but we were much more interested in looking at Him than in eating.

He spoke in of the wonderful view of the Bay and the distant mountains, and then told us how the body of the Báb had for years been concealed, carried from place to place, never left long in one spot but continually move about to prevent its being discovered, and finally, about twenty-five years before brought to Haifa, disguised as a bale of silk. Then we went out, we saw the carriage waiting for Him, and so we waited to see Him leave. But to our surprise we were invited to share it with Him, and so we drove down the mountain sitting quietly behind him. We saw him no more until dinner time. The secretaries told us how busy and tired He was, that many visitors came every day, that there was an overwhelming amount of correspondence, that threatened persecutions in Persia were taking time and attention. he seemed so weary that we hesitated even to present the letters we had brought and asked almost no questions, knowing that one gets all one has capacity for.

That night the Master met us at dinner and placed Mabel at the head of the table opposite Him. It is a place of honor, but the lights hide his face and one prefers less honor!! He was very tired that night and beyond a question or two about our comfort, almost nothing was said. One evening a little later I found my napkin at the head of the table. Thinking it a mistake, since the Master had placed Mabel there, quietly took it as I passed around to the side, but the Master looked back, stopped me and put me at the head. And so he put now one now another in the place opposite Him.

On Sunday about four we were told that the carriage was waiting to take us up to the Tomb of the Báb for the regular Sunday meeting. Sweet Tuba Khanoum and little Fu'ad went with us. About thirty of the friends were already gathered there when we arrived. The Master's chair was placed where a projection of the building would shelter Him from the wind, for while the day was warm the breeze on the mountain was cool. Túbá Khanoum had left us at the caretaker's house saying that she would stay there.

We seated ourselves and soon tea was served, very sweet tea in tins class cups without handles. As we talked Mírzá Luṭfu'lláh brought the big book in which the friends were asked to sign their names. Finally a stir made us look up and then came the Master, followed by Rúhíe and little Fu'ad. I do not remember much that He told us that day, but I think it was then that He said, "Some people do not listen to my words. Some listen but do not heed, and some hear but forget." At dinner that night He said to us,

"I hope that the health of the friends is good. Today you went to visit the Tomb of the Báb. Are you happy?"

As the grapes were being served He said, "His Holiness Christ was once eating grapes." He said, "I will not eat of the fruit of the vine until I eat it new with you in the Kingdom." But the grape of the Kingdom is different from these grapes. In the Kingdom there is no grape like this. Now I also say to you all, we will eat together of the divine bounties I hope, that is, of the heavenly food. Its taste is everlasting. Its power is everlasting. God willing, we shall there all at together of the heavenly food." I almost gasped for of all the sayings of Christ this one had more than almost any other attracted and puzzled me. And here was the Master using almost the very same words.

Several times the Master came to us at breakfast motioning as to be seated and to continue our meal. He always asked after our health and whether we slept well. To tell the truth I had a most prodigious case of hives in Haifa and did not sleep much, but health seemed so trifling a thing that I cheerfully told a lie each time, or else kept still and let the others say we were very well! Somehow I could not seem to talk about a thing like lack of sleep and a little discomfort. He usually stayed only a few moments and then smiling and rising abruptly He would leave us. Sunday morning He came to ask us all to go to church. Mírzá Lotfulla always reminded me of my kodak as He left, but I could never remember to have it out and ready and besides taking pictures of Him was almost impossible. The only two I tried were not very successful but I loved them anyway.

One morning after breakfast He said, "The body of man belongs to the world of nature, his body is similar to that of the animal. The tendencies exist in man but his divine power is great. Man's divine nature is pure and sanctified, his spirit is heavenly, but his body belongs to the lower world. If the spiritual powers overcome those of the body, then the animal tendencies will not remain, and he will become illumined, and heavenly. He will become full of activities and good works. But if the natural qualities predominate over the spirit, those of the spirit will not remain at all. All the powers of the body will become "natural". In such a state the love of self is found. Then man is filled with darkness upon darkness. He becomes negligent of God. There will remain no signs of spirituality in him. This is why His Holiness Christ said we twat be born again. Once man is born from the womb of his mother and becomes free from material darkness; in the same way he must again be freed so that he may become free from the darkness of the world of nature. This is the second birth. Man must strive always so that his spirit may overcome his body. If he strives continually the second birth will be obtained. He will become free from all his imperfections, he will become filled with virtues, he will be nearer to the divine and will follow the divine teachings. he will become like a lighted candle. This is the truth of the matter. But when his is immersed in the world of nature, he is like an animal, a fierce animal and filled with imperfections."

The most vivid experience for file was the visit to 'Akká. We left about eight in the morning with Zia Khanoum, Merhanges and Riaz, "By the of the sea we drove toward the old prison city, only now the English have built bridges ever the two rivers and laid wire, like our wire fencing as approaches to them. Our eyes continually looked ahead to that old city. At the gate we stopped for a blacksmith to replace a shoe, and we watched the camels and the tiny donkeys file through the small entrance in the massive wall. Just inside we came to the barracks and went up the long stone steps to the entrance. A very polite soldier met us and showed us through, but he insisted on showing us the whole fortress. At last when we had climbed innumerable stairs, we persuaded him to take us to the only part we cared to see. Up the long steps we went to the tiny rooms where the family lived in those early days of close confinement. Three small rooms opening into a central one with a small space of roof through an opening of which the Purest Branch fell, was their home for months. And yet Khanoum said, "Those were happy days." Across the court with its cistern from which, the water supply was derived we went to the long tunnel-like room where the many followers were herded together. At present water has been added and the window much enlarged, but it is an uninviting spot.

Later Khanoum told, us that at the time the Purest Branch died, some Persian pilgrims had come but could not gain admission to Bahá'u'lláh just then a large company of soldiers came to the barracks, and the pilgrims, mingling with the strange soldiers gained entrance. Someone else, Zia Khanoum think, told is that the addition of the new troops made the barracks so crowded that the Bahá'ís were sent to houses outside the walls. In these ways the dying wish of the Purest Brand was fulfilled and the Pilgrims saw the Blessed Perfection.

Just outside of the walls we visited one of the houses where Bahá'u'lláh had lived, a small house, overlooking the Bay, kept now by some of the friend and owned I understand by Mm. Dreyfus-Barney. There we saw his room which He was not allowed to leave and the chairs where He had sat. Zia Khanoum's eyes filled with tears as we entered, in remembrance of the Being Who is no longer present to their eight, but Whom they so love.

From the barracks we drove to the garden where Bahá'u'lláh used to sit "under the roof not made by hands," and between the two streams of water. All sorts of flowers and fruits grow there. The old gardener, Abu'l Kázim, died during the war, so that it is no longer possible to hear the story of the locusts from his lips. There they spread rug for us under the mulberry trees, and we ate our lunch and rested until tea. It seemed like eating lunch in the holy lace of some great cathedral.

From the garden we drove to the Bahjí where we passed through a beautiful garden, carefully tended, into the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. The center of the room is a garden with flowers and shrubs, although to tell the truth I did not look at it. About the garden the floor is covered with thick rugs and from above the sunlight streams in. All is light and warmth and life. We knelt to pray in that blessed spot. I tried to remember all the friends for a moment at least that a little of the beauty of that of might come to them too. But my chief prayer was for myself that I might have capacity to take in a little of this wealth of spiritual life. I had hoped to be admitted to the inner room but Zia Khanoum withdrew and I, feeling keenly my unworthiness, tried to accept with radiant acquiescence. But as we were just leaving she came back and to great joy opened the door into the wonderful room. The strength and majesty of the hills, the splendour of the sunlight, peace that passed understanding were there. Our share of the great ocean was limited only by our tiny cups. To each comes his own experience but to me, this was the culmination of our trip. To leave that spot seemed to tear out my heart and I sat during the drive home speechless, my eyes full of tears my heart aching as each moment increased the distance from that glorious Threshold that was my parting and nothing else, not even Master's goodbye so stirred me. It seemed easy to follow the Master's word at dinner that night, that that visit to the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh must be graven on our hearts, that we must never forget it.

The next day, our last in Haifa, we saw the Master for a few moments. I asked Him whether He had given any instructions for teaching where race prejudice was strong. He answered to go slowly, to be kind and to be courageous and to be patient. "You must not mind if people oppose you. But give them time. Their prejudice is like a religion, it will take them a long time to become Bahá'ís, but when they are, they will be very good ones. But to the principles and be kind. People are like wood, some is easily kindled and some is wet and no matter how much fire you put under it, it only smokes, it will not cook anything." And when I laughed He joined in merrily. Then he took our rosaries and ring stones in His hands, looked at them lovingly a moment and then he touched his lips to them and gave them back.

Genevieve and I could not bear to go away from the house, so we sat under bear His window where we could hear His voice, and talked with Mírzá ‘Azíz’u’lláh Khán until lunch time. Once He came into the garden on some errand about the building which was put up but almost all morning He was busy with visitors and letters.

That night we waited after dinner o say goodbye. He sent his love t the friends, to each and every one, and said we were to say that He never forgot them and that He always prayed for them. And then with a smile of love and a hand clasp He left us. Early next morning we left Haifa but always the memory of His eyes and His loving smile and the beauty and kindness of that household follows us to bless and hallow all the way.

HISTORY OF THE VIOLATION OF 1. KHAIRALLAH

Doctor Zia, Ibrahim Khairallah

After drinking the afternoon tea, ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ said:

“Doctor Zia, Ibrahim Khairallah was an insignificant man and never could make his living in Syria or Egypt. I sent him to America and assured him that he would be confirmed. In America, he found that all the doors were open before his face. Then he became arrogant, and thought he was great. When he first came here, he praised Lua Getsinger and her husband and he requested me to appoint them as leaders in America. I did not heed his request. He sent Lua to Mrs. Hearst and she gave her twelve hundred dollars and sent two hundred dollars to Ibrahim Khairallah through ‘Abdu’l Karim. Khairallah came to me, weeping and complaining. He said, ‘Is this right, that Lua Getsinger should receive twelve hundred dollars, and for me only two hundred dollars, and even this much was never given to me? When I saw him weeping for money my heart was shocked at him. Then he asked to expel Mr. & Mrs. Getsinger

I said, ‘No, that is not possible, because that would be harmful to you. He asked, ‘Why is that?’ I said, ‘Then they will become your enemies, and certainly harm comes from enemies.’

“While he and his wife were in my presence he spoke in Arabic, accusing her of terrible things. I knew that he was dishonest and she was innocents, that if she had any faults, he was the one to be blamed for it. Therefor, I showed the more kindness to her.

“Finally, he asked me to make him the leader in America. I told him to drop the thought of leadership and to be severed and sanctified. He became very angry: Then the violators deceived him and agitated him. Their custom is that as soon as they learn that someone is angry they go to him and show him their sympathy, and to agitate him and plant in him the seeds of hatred. Thus Ibrahim Khairallah became an enemy. I found such a soul in like a deadly poison to the Cause of GOD. How could I trust him in all the affairs! Therefore, I had to shun him.

“If Ibrahim Khairallah had not violated the Covenant; the growth of the cause in America would have been astonishing. Three hundred souls; in Chicago turned away from the Cause in one day on account of violation. I sacrifice my life to the holy souls, but what can I do with the selfish and egotistical people Khairallah and those who are similar to him have taken the Cause for their own material benefit, fame, name, influence, and for the formation of their work and business. If they remain in the Cause, it is a blow to the Cause, and if they are out it is a blessing.

“Khairallah is the hero of the violators. He wants to establish a center in Brookline. Far from it! As to the foam - it will dry up, but what benefits the people will remain in the earth. The rain and streams irrigate the lands. Every land absorbs water and is benefitted in proportion to its capacity. But the existence of foam is inevitable. However, the foam will dry up, and that which benefits the people will remain in the earth.”

The writer mentioned his meeting with Ibrahim Khairallah, to convey to him his Master's message. He (the writer) asked Khairallah the.

March of 1921

Interviews with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Tiberias.

The following exquisite picture describes the approach of two very devout Christians, Professor and Mrs. Kuns to the Holy Land and their interviews with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the Easter season in 1921. Professor Kunz is a University scientist. His wife is the daughter of a prominent professor of Theology. They were sojourning in Switzerland, their homeland, whence they travelled to Palestine in March of 1921.

With ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Tiberias and Haifa.

By Anna Kunz.

To approach Haifa by boat is most wonderful. It was just a few minutes before midnight of March the twenty-second, 1921, when the “Karlshad” entered the blessed harbor of Haifa, drooping anchor stout a mile off the shore. The full moon stood bright and glorious over Mount Carmel along the sea shore up towards the mountain every house could be seen. There were a few lights only, but the moon illumined the whole country most beautifully. My heart was aching as I stood in silent prayer, but the wonderful spirit of that sacred place and land soon filled my heart and I realized that we had finally reached the Holy Land holy in the past, holy in this great day of God and holy forever.

Early in the morning my husband and I were met by Dr. Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím, whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had sent, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not at Haifa. After a severe illness, he had gone to Tiberias for a rest. In his absence, we were beautifully taken care of by his family and friends. Awaiting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s further instructions as to when we should be permitted to meet him, we enjoyed Haifa and ‘Akká.

In the pilgrim house, located near 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house, we were given room with a view up Mount Carmel. It did not take us long to understand why this rather low mountain range is called the Mountain of God, His spirit indeed lingers there. The whole atmosphere seemed laden with a glorious something, with a great peace, with a joy from on high. This mountain, sacred through the memory of past prophets has received a new baptism of the spirit in this dispensation. Shortly after our arrival we were climbing over the rocky path to the Tomb of the Báb. It was a glorious spring morning. The birds were singing, flowers of all kinds were blooming everywhere. Mount Carmel seemed to speak aloud of all the blessings that God had spread there. It is true, we were greatly favored to be permitted to come to those places during the year's most beautiful season. But we deeply felt, though the outward beauty of that country was heavenly, that there was another beauty dominant, beauty that could never vanish. The beauty of the spirit will always linger there and will be found by the pilgrims of any season. God's spirit surrounds us certainly everywhere, but there it seems to hover in great abundance, as it has led God to bless this country above others. This spirit of love and rearm, of service and self-forgetfulness, emanates as it were from a great consciousness of God's presence overwhelmed us constantly. This happened again and again as we entered the Tomb of the Báb, while at the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, and while with 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family. And him, through whom in this age this splendor is conveyed to God's creature we finally saw at Tiberias, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God, we were permitted to see.

As on that beautiful spring morning, so also at other times, once at night with the moon as our guide, we went to the Tomb of the Báb. Oh, that all the Bahá'ís could realize the fragrance of that place! Each time we went there it seemed more beautiful. As one enters that sanctuary one feels at once in union with the higher world. As we knelt there in prayer my heart seemed to melt, there was but one great longing. When we prayed there for the last time, it was in the evening before our departure, it was as if my heart would break. I knew that I loved this place more than any other place in the world. Since we have gone away, during all these past months, there would often come over me a great longing for that holy shrine and again and again my thoughts wander there and I kneel down at this shrine and rest. Now that this building is the resting place of 'Abdu'l-Bahá too, it must be more glorious than ever.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's family keeps open house all the time. The women pilgrims are always welcome among those beautiful women and their children. They live a Life of great simplicity; their life is a reflection of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life. Their thoughts are with him always; they love him with a deep abiding love; they serve in his footsteps and for his sake serve all mankind. Many a precious lesson was taught to me while in this household. Often I was surprised to see that in spite of their restricted life these women uphold a truly broad attitude towards life in general; they are full of the universal spirit; they know no narrowness they are all-inclusive and therefore heavenly.

On Good Friday, before sunrise, we started for 'Akká and Bahjí. We were a beautiful little group, two grandsons of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, some other young men, the Master's youngest daughter, Monaver Khánum, Mr. Kunz and myself. From the station we walked over the green meadows towards Bahjí, Passing Bahjí palace we soon reached the little house, where 'Abdu'l-Bahá often stayed for days and where all the visiting friends rest before entering the Tomb. When we passed through the blooming garden, which was fragrant like the place around the Tomb of the Báb, after removing our shoes, we entered the court. There we all knelt at the door which leads to the holy shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, while Monaver Khánum with a sweet voice chanted the Visiting Tablet. Then he opened the door and invited us to follow her. The place was filled with the fragrance of Jasmine blossoms, a heavenly light filled the room. Here we felt at ones at rest and were permitted to pray for our friends, for the world, whose savior had come as a thief in the night. Here heaven and earth seemed to meet. He certainly has made his resting place glorious. Before the onrush of his spirit all human thoughts had to die; there was but one prayer possible, that all the world would soon be enabled to serve at this holy Threshold. This was my great longing and this only had importance before so meek glory. Tears were welcome, they brought relief to the heart so overfull. Everybody slowly withdrew leaving Mr. Kuns and myself alone at the Holy Shrine, whence for ages to some people of all classes, races and religion will derive new strength and assurance of God's nearness. When we finally had reached the garden again, we found a few Hindu soldiers there. They were talking with the Tomb keeper and we were told that many of them, (not Bahá'ís at all) would often come to the gate of this sacred place, kiss the wall and withdraw again, explaining that they felt and knew that they were standing on Holy ground.

During the afternoon we saw the Ridván. We also visited the barracks, where the first Bahá'ís with Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá spent their years of imprisonment. Filled with seared memories we returned in the evening to Haifa. The next morning we were to leave for Tiberias, where the blessed Master expiated us.

'Azíz'u'lláh Bahadur accompanied us to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. From the train we could see Nazareth. We finally reached the Jordan valley and arrived, after three hours ride, at the southern end of Lake Tiberias whence we continued by boat to the old and unique little town of Tiberias. So we finally reached the goal of our journey. We were to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

How I wish that I could be worthier to tell of his glory, as he walked among men in human flesh, unknown to most people, and understood by a few only. On the day of our arrival we got only a few glimpses of the Beloved, but they were sufficient to make us realize that his power and authority were not of this world. It was a bright and luminous Easter morning when the Master called us into his room. Oh, that I could picture him to all those who never saw him, could picture him in these simple surroundings at the shores of that same lake where Christ walked and taught. Though I feared to approach him, after his loving words of welcome this fear vanished. Here we sat before our Master, in a little room with only the most necessary furnishings on top of the hotel, with a view of that blessed lake. His look seems to go into ones very heart. Yes, he knows his children and their need. As I think of him now, I always love to think, first, of his great simplicity, his marvellous humility which knows of no self-existence, and last, or better, first, of his boundless love. To us his outward appearance seemed similar to that of the old Hebrew Prophets.; his humility, his simplicity and love were like the Christ. This boundless love conquered the hearts at once. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá talked to us with a ringing, piercing voice which will forever sound in my ears. His words would come forth with that unique simplicity, then he would pause for a while, often closing his eyes. His spirit, it seemed when I dared to look at him, had left his body; he was looking into infinitude, communing with that world for which we long. Having seen him, we could understand well what he meant when he said to us, “the Prophet discerns by sight.” We came before him, my husband especially with many, many questions in our minds, but sitting in his rooms we seemed to forget them or better, there did not exist any unsolved problems. He said, “God has created a remedy for every disease”, and while in his presence, we tasted of this remedy.

During the days of our stay at the hotel we saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá often. We followed him as he walked peacefully to a nearby garden. Unknown he passed through the crowd. We saw him come back to the hotel, climbing the many steps to his room with a youthfulness that made a husband say “It looks as if he were carried over these flights of steps by union hands.” Though he was at Tiberias for a rest he received visitors all day long. During those three days spent near him his love would more and more fill our hearts, so that my was sad and depressed when on Tuesday morning I realized that he was to say goodbye to us that day. And as he bade us goodbye our hearts wore near to breaking. As our tears of love and gratefulness flowed he suddenly left his room telling us to remain within.

Before leaving Haifa we saw the Master not unexpectedly again. A few beautiful pictures of how he lived and loved in his own home I shall cherish forever. And as we left his glorious earthly home I felt as others, permitted to come into his presence, have felt. I realized that we could in no way comprehend him, we could only love him, follow him, obey him and thereby draw nearer to his beauty.

His words spoken to us we herewith gladly share with all the friends.

Tiberias. Easter morning.

The Master welcomed us heartily and said: “I was very glad to hear of your coming. When all the people are negligent you have been chosen by God! You came to the Holy Land, attained to the pleasure of visiting the Holy Tomb and were able to come and visit me here. How are the friends in America?” We told the Master that the friends are well.

We told the Master of a group of Jews who were on the boat from Brindisi to Palestine. He said: "In their heavenly books the prophets have spoken of the Day of the Lord, the Last Day, and what they have spoken is all being realized in this day. The Blessed Beauty sixty years ago in some of his tablets premised the Jews that they would come back to the Holy Land and what he said will be realized. The pavilion of the Lord will be pitched on the mountain and this was fulfilled. The pavilion of the Blessed Beauty was often pitched on Mount Carmel and the plain and hills around 'Akká while he was a prisoner. He was subject to two despotic kings and he was under severe restrictions. Then guards were placed at the gate everybody was forbidden to in him. But his pavilion was pitched on the hills. He would go and spend some days in them, and yet he was a prisoner.

We told the story of Mr. Schneider. (Mr. Schneider was a refugee from Russia. He reached the northern boundary of Persia penniless, knowing no one and ignorant of his route. Some people met him and took him to their home where he sojourned for several days and then was taken by his host to the next village and to a home where he was welcomed and entertained. From village to village he was conducted, and cared for, until at last in safety he reached the sea coast. On inquiring at last who could be these people who had treated him with such marvelous kindness he learned that they were all Bahá'ís.) He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) said such should be the case with all the Bahá'ís. They should be the mercy of God to all the people of the earth without distinction of race and religion. Bahá'u'lláh's light has shone forth upon all. His rain of mercy has fallen on every spot just as the sun shines upon the pure and the sinner. The rain falls upon good soil and the rocks. The attributes of the Bahá'ís should be the same. They should be the light of guidance to all the people. We said: "Easter has a new significance for us. Resurrection has a new meaning." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "It is a good, significant coincidence that we meet at this place where Christ told 'fisher to become a fisher of men." He pointed out the place, about 150 meters away, where this happened. The Sermon on the Mount was preached on Mount Tabor, which, as an accompanying Jew told us, dominates Galilee.

Monday morning at 7:30

Looking at our children's picture his beautiful face lighted up and after looking at it for a long while he said: "They have bright faces. They will be real Bahá'ís because they will have a Bahá'í education. They will become good Bahá'ís.

Question: "Science denies immortality. How does the prophet know the contrary?"

The Master said: "Science does not know; but the Manifestation makes discoveries with the power of the Spirit. For instance: a philosopher with induction finds out a way. But the prophet discerns with sight. A blind man has to find his way with a stick from point to point; so a philosopher through arguments from premises goes to conclusions, and not by sight. But the Manifestations see with their inner eye (own eye); they do not go from premises to conclusions.

The prophets see many things with their inner eye. They do not need to go by discoveries. The scientist with induction is like a blind man who cannot see two steps ahead of him. The prophet sees a long distance."

Question: "Shall I find my mother again?"

The Master said: "Certainly. Separation is only in the world of bodies."

Questions "Will the day come when all mankind will be able to discern by sight?"

He said: "There will always be some. Only a special number will have this attainment. As Christ said, 'Many are called, but few are chosen.' It will always be so. The transformation depends upon divine bounty. The mineral progresses in its own world. Put from the mineral to the vegetable it progresses only by divine bounty. Also transformation from the vegetable to the animal is God's plan. Of itself the transformation cannot take place. In the realm of men transformation is possible only through another person."

Question: "When people deny religion how shall we deal with them?"

Answer: "You must be tolerant and patient, because the station of eight is a station of bounty; it is not based on capacity. They must be educated."

Question: "What are the requisites for a successful meeting?"

Answer: "Before the meeting you must pray and supplicate for divine assistance."

Question: "Shall we devote much time to the study of philosophy?"

Answers "Everything must be done moderately. Excess is not desirable. Do not go to extremes. Even in thinking do not go to excess but be moderate. If there is too much thinking you will be unable to control your thoughts."

I asked the Master to assist me in the physical sciences, in the solution of problems. He said: "You will be able to solve these problems."

Addressing both of us: "You are confirmed. Another power will help you." - (besides the power of science.)

Question: "Why so much evil in the world?"

Answer: "God has created a remedy for every disease. One must apply the remedy. Now these patients run away from the expert physician. They neglect him. Under inexperienced physicians they get worse. The words of the religious leaders have no influence, no effect. These physicians are more diseased than their patients. The spiritual leaders now have no faith, though they claim to have faith in order to secure their positions."

Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock

We thanked the Master for the prayer revealed for our children. He said "It is for your sake that I wrote it."

Question: "What is the best method to spread this Cause?"

Answer: "Explain the teachings, the principles of this Cause. Some of them were revealed fifty years ago, some sixty years ago. Fifty years ago there was no thought of universal peace and arbitration. No one spoke of the oneness of religion and science. Now many spread them in their own ways, I spread them through numerous churches and papers in America; then glee in Europe.

"The word of God is powerful. It will come to pass."

Question: Should these principles be spread under the name of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, or without these names?"

Answer: In the beginning you should mention Bahá'u'lláh. They are his and are spread by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When all the world was in disorder, when warfare was prevailing in the East and the West, Russia with Turkey, Persia with England and Afghánistán, and Garibaldi was fighting, the East was in intense darkness. There was prejudice of race and religion, national and political prejudice. The East was in intense darkness; the sun was very dark. And at such a time Bahá'u'lláh arose and spread a set of teachings."

Question: "The students in the schools have to study so many subjects! There are arising more and more sciences. What should be the remedy?"

Answer: "It is too much. One must be moderate in choosing the number of subjects. When there are too many the result is confusion. Moderation is necessary. For instance: if a man has the power to carry a load of three hundred (pounds) he no doubt would fall if we give him one thousand (pounds). He cannot bear it. In the same way, one brain must not be overburdened. For instance: students should not have more than six hours a day, lessons and preparations included. Otherwise they will not succeed. The brain becomes tired"

Monday afternoon, March 28, 1921

The Master! "This lake is very blessed. His Holiness Christ and the other prophets walked along its shore and were in communion with God all the time and spreading the divine teachings. Now, praise be to God that you reached this land safely and we met one another on the shore of this same lake! You will receive great results from this visit afterwards. You will become the cause of the illumination of the world of humanity. You will release the hearts of the people from the intense darkness of different prejudices, so that each soul may love all the people of the world, without distinction. Just like a shepherd who is affectionate to all his sheep, without preference or distinction you should be affectionate, to all. You should not look at their shortcomings. Consider that they are all created by God who loves them all.”

Tuesday morning, March 29th

The Master: “You have been here three days. They are equal to three years. In the Bible in the days of the Lord one day was equal to one year. I hope that these three days are equal to three years. The results of this visit will be equal to the results of three years. Now you should go back in perfect harmony and joy and with supreme glad tidings. You should gladden the hearts with glad tidings of the Beauty of Abhá. Say to the friends: ‘The Kingdom of God has been opened to you. The tree of life is yours. Heavenly graces are bestowed upon you. The effulgence of the Sun of Truth is shed on you. God has chosen you. This crown He has placed upon your head. This eternal life has been given you. Therefore you should be very happy. Turn day and night to the Kingdom of Abhá. Supplicate for boundless favors from that Kingdom.’

“I am praying every night and supplicate and implore. I beg of God to bestow upon you infinite grace so that all at us may attain to the station of servitude, so that we Say do as ‘do wishes us to do. We are all His drawing light from the Sun of Abhá.”

sea was calm and our bark was rowed very quietly out through the brake in the reef which lies between the port and open sea.

We rode at anchor until shortly before sunset when we drew up, taking a course along the shore to the North.

On arrival in Haifa the following morning on Friday, January 14th, 1921, our party of pilgrims landed, and with us was Garibaldo Federici who had obtained permission to spend the few hours with us on shore that the ship remained in port.

Unfortunately Mts. Van Patten and her eon were not allowed to land, but were obliged to return to the ship to go to Beirut, there to get the visa of the British Counsel, from whence they were to return by the first simmer back to Haifa. This whole affair seemed to me to be uncalled for. In Haifa I went to the chief officer in command of the port – a Brittisher – explaining the entire affair saying that these two people were the guests of Sir ‘Abbás Il Bahá’í, a credential in my eyes sufficient value to give them the courtesy of the port for short visit at least, but the law was the law, all technical – purely technical in its workings, so our friends were obliged to go back to the ship.

But, however, not before they had gone through a quarantine .examination along with the rest of us against small pox.

We were examined one by one in a small cabin on the deck – a dark sort of a box lighted by one small pane of glass set in as a window. They were looking for vaccination marks. I had one on one of my arms. Intending to show it in the confusion of the moment I got it mixed with the scar of a dog bite on my other, a relic of boyhood experience. I was about to bare the other arm to find the scar wanted when the inspector passed me with a glance at the mark left by the dog – and I was out of the booth. Mrs. Van Patten was the next to enter. A half-grown Arab urchin from the wharf crowd peered into the window and grinning at Mts. Morten went through the movements of sticking a lancet into his arm, as if being vaccinated, screwing his face up in mock grimaces of pain and pointing toward, the door of the cabin to suggest that that was the fate of Mrs. Van Patten within – (all the time he was laughing with glee). His little game worked to his satisfaction for Mrs. Morten became frantically excited over the fate of Mrs. Van Patten and insisted that I go to her rescue (I had laughed with the boy taking it all as his joke) but I found that Mrs. Morten was serious and would not take it as a joke). So I banged the door which was opened and the lady stepped out – she had not been subjected to vaccination. Then seeing how well his little act had taken with Mrs. Morten that little urchin laughed and roared, rolling over on the ground as he did so, fairly hugging his sides in his glee. I laughed also, but to myself.

We were met at the port by several young men from the Master's household and taken to the Pilgrim House. Here a curious thing happened. I entered just ahead of Garibaldo whereupon the several men Bahá'ís there embarrassed me – kissing me on either cheek as is customary in the Orient. Garibaldo was at my heels, and when I had saluted thus, the last of these friends, I looked around to see that Garibaldo was being embraced in like manner by all – thinking he was also a Bahá'í brother. It worked well, however, for it touched his heart. Later he told me that day had been the happiest one of his life. After an hour's rest and visit with the friends we all went over to the Master's house, where he received us with his usual tender welcome. Tea was served.

Said the Master to me, "We have been expecting you for a long while. It is about six or seven months since you started from America. It was good that you went to see the friends in Germany. They were much delighted to see you. In their letters they expressed their joys. In reality they are full of life. How Consul Schwarz? How is his wife and kiss Koslin, are they well?"

Turning to Mrs. Morten, he said, "How are the friends in America?" Mrs. Morten replied, "They are very happy and active."

The Master – "Now Faḍil has gone to the West. He has visited almost all the important cities in America. Now he is in the Western parts and is greatly confirmed. The reason for all his success is his sincerity. Because he is sincere he is confirmed." Turning to me, He continued, "It is similar to thy case. That is to say it is thy sincerity which is the cause of thy confirmation – especially in Germany."

The Master – "I was in Germany only two weeks. All which thou hast been seen there is the result of those two weeks. It is our hope that the friends in Germany will become the cause of union and harmony among the people of Germany, England, Austria, Greece. Italy, ect. It is only the power of God which is able to acclaim this harmony."

"The League of Nations, of which they are speaking today, was treated of by the pen of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, revealed fifty years ago. Now it has started and unquestionably it will develop into the supreme court of arbitration because all things which have been decreed by the supreme pen of Bahá'u'lláh are inevitable. When America entered into the war, all the world was thinking that these difficulties would be removed. The result was quite the contrary. At that time difficulties existed among some of the European powers. Now those difficulties have extended and enveloped the entire world. There is no remedy except through the power and influence of the work of God, and this will be accomplished."

Turning to Garibaldi Federici, the Master said, "How are you. You are very welcome". When told of Federici's troubles and danger in the war, The Master said "he was saved in order that the call of the Kingdom might reach his ear. Everybody is not fitted to hear the call of the Kingdom. It is only the chosen ones, as His Holiness, the Christ said, who have the capacity to hear this call. The worms and moles that live under the ground have not the capacity to hear the melodies of the birds of the air. It is our hope that God will recompense all his sufferings. I pray that in all the affairs of his life, he will be successful. As he had the capacity to hear the word of God, God saved him that he might hear this heavenly call."

After our interview we returned to the Pilgrim House for lunch. Early in the afternoon the Master sent his automobile (a recent offering to him from Mrs. Goodall and her daughter, Mrs. Cooper of San Francisco) to take us over Mount Carmel. Thus the afternoon was spent visiting the several places of religious interest upon the Mountain. At the Holy Tomb of the Báb, we stopped for prayers in the Shrine and a cup of tea, served out upon the terrace with the wonderful view of the bay and 'Akká in the distance after which we took Garibaldi Federici back to his ship, where we met Mrs. Van Patten and her son who were not allowed to land. We tried to cheer them up as much as possible. That night a large group of pilgrims, Oriental and Occidental gathered at the Master's table. He waited upon us himself and after we all had been served he said: Asked. 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Did you have a nice time in Germany?"

"Praise be to God".

C.M.R. "I was happy to come but homesick to leave"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "How many months were you there?"

C. M.R. "Five and one-half months."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "You made a good journey."

C.M.R. "I was never so happy in all my life."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "When one associates with the friend of God it gives him spiritual spirit, verily in reality he finds a new spirit. Consul Schwarz and his wife are very good?" (English) "How is Miss Kostlin?"

I replied that they were all well and happy and that they had showered abundant kindnesses upon me. Then I told the Master in brief of my stay in Esslingen, and the meetings held in various places in Germany, Stuttgart, and the vicinity. Leipzig, Gera, Karlsruhe, Heidelberg, Mannheim, Freibourg, Goppingen, Reutlingen, etc. Furthermore, I spoke of the kindness of every one whom I met in Germany, unbelievers as well as believers, saying that when I went from the United States to Germany people said Do you not fear the people there? I said Whom one loves he does not fear. All were kind with the exception of a Priest in Priebourg who opposed me, and was insulting in a public Bahá'í meeting. 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "The Germans have great capacity."

C. M. R.: The people are seeking. I found I could speak directly. I told them Bahá'u'lláh had appeared and that the Kingdom was here." 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Continually good news used to come about you. He who is a believer and firm and steadfast in the Covenant of God. His news is always good. The light which is lighted in this lamp every day which comes from it is uttering to the Persian souls, consider how strong is the power of God that Mr. Remey is from Washington, and we are from Persia, it has united us. What power it is. It is the power of God. No human being can accomplish this. Consider now that Mr. Remey is coming from Washington, and these friends (in Germany) are so affected."

(Turning to me) "I want to send you to exile. I want to write to the German Government that he has made a revolution in Germany. If he goes again send him out of there. No doubt the result of this journey will be known later on. There is a story in Persia which is told that a thief went to break through the wall of a house in order to enter and steal. The owner of the house saw from window that the man was digging. It was at night. He said 'What are you doing?' The man replied 'I am drumming'. He said, 'Where is the sound?' 'Oh' the man replied, 'You will hear it tomorrow'. Now the voice of your drumming will be heard tomorrow. The Cause will be very much strengthened in Germany, and they will become great friends with the Americans. France has not this capacity. The capacity for which the Cause should grow, in France does not exist, because France is engaged in pleasure and luxury, theatres, dances, etc. Their spiritual susceptibilities are but little. Quite the contrary with Germany. Verily It is very strange that most of the people in France are thoughtful only of worldly things. They think always of theatres and dances. They worship women. Now their worldly condition has no Comparison with the condition of this cause. This is the cause which has uprooted the following of self and worldly passion. It educates the souls with the qualities of the Supreme Concourse."

Then after a few moments of silence the Master continued – "Miss Kappes has passed away in Tíhrán. They have written a short account of her funeral. Here was translated from Persian into English a post card which Luṭfu'lláh had from his brother, Dr. Arastoo Ḥakím of Tíhrán, Dec. 2, 1920. 'No doubt you have heard of the passing away of Miss Kappos, caused by Typus. I shall write later in detail, I only say that the funeral was carried out with such respect and honor, that until now no funeral here has been carried out upon such scale. The students of the Tarbiet School all in black carried bouquets of flowers in the procession and a great number of the Bahá'ís following on foot as far as the gate of the city, including many women. About 100 carriages to Vargaheh, which belongs to Mírzá 'Azíz Khán, and there according to our own Bahá'í custom the prayer for dead and supplication for dead was made. The funeral was made with the utmost glory. It happened that a heavy snow was falling. God willing I will write in detail. (signed) Arastoo.

'Abdu'l-Bahá – “Tíhrán is the capital of Persia where Nacir Ed Sháh used to reign. It is good that he should bring his head out of grave and watch. Macir-Ed-Din-Sháh said “It is my Sword which uproots these people’: His son came to me in Paris, and wept and said, “We have run away with wife and servants when the constitution was founded. Now we are obliged to retain here. I said it would be good for Nacir-Ed-Din-Sháh to see it now. This is why it is said by The Prophet are surrounded by the heavenly cohorts.” Nacir-Ed-Din-Sháh was then on the throne and some people had written articles against the cause. They took these to his presence. He asked what is this? They said proofs and arguments against this cause. We said of mine. Now he should lift his head from the grave and see what it is. His sword did not even have the effect of a gun. At the present time M. Agha Khán owns the former palace where the Sháh spoke these words. In this same hall where he spoke about this, the cry of Bahá'u'lláh is now raised.”

“A great person of the Arabs had gone and climbed into a tree watching for one of the well-known Arabs to pass in order to shoot him. He passed by. He struck at his side. He said what is this. This is one blow of the blows which will follow. Nacir-Ed-Din-Sháh this is one blow of our blows. Where is he? This blow has broken his side. In reality His power has been broken. The result of all these oppositions and troubles were of no use to him. On the other hand the cause of God destroyed him.”

“Letters that I write in Persian to Germany, are first written down in Persian and then in German. Do they understand them well?”

C.M.R. “Yes, some of the friends are studying Persian so as to translate directly.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá: “It is good that I write to the friends, but stead of answering their letters (in the future) that I will pray and supplication their behalf.”

Turning to his secretary, Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh Bahadur, he said, Note: 1. “Vargaheh” is a beautiful garden situated in the out skirts of Tíhrán, laid off on the plan of a wheel with nine spokes at the hub of which is situated the monogonol mausoleum of the martyrs Vargha and his son Rououllah. Here the friends gather to celebrate many of the sacred Bahá'í anniversaries.

“Now you have so many translations to do. It is not the work of one bat of several people.” Later addressing us all in general while, we sat about the supper table, he said:

(Friday, January 14th, 1921)

“His honor, Mr. Remey, is a very blessed soul. Verily he is detached. Verily he is detached. This soul, this youth, is the son of an American Admiral. His father and mother are prominent people of Washington. Mr. Remey left both father and mother, the world and whatever was in the world. He has proved the saying of his Holiness The Christ, that the son would separate from the father, and the daughter from the mother; his honor, Mr. Remey did so work upon this principle that his father was not contented with him. He became detached from all –he gave up his life and time for the Cause of God. His father and mother became grieved but he was not disturbed. From the day that he became a believer until now, day and night, he has been engaged in speaking and in teaching the Cause. Every difficulty and obstacle that came in his path he withstood. He was not discouraged but day by day his love increased. He taught many. 4te went to Honolulu. There in those farthest islands of the Pacific he taught. He went to the cities of America, and in each place he taught. As obstacles and difficulties came in his way, took no notice of them, troubles and obstacles in the path of d, were to him comfort and ease. In those journeys which he de he had little comfort; depending on God, he went from city to city. He travelled in those parts until he finished his service there, then he hastened singly and alone to Germany, and there he taught many souls. Then it was found that he had the capacity to visit the Holy Threshold. Therefore, I asked him to come here, that he might meet you all here and forget all his troubles through this meeting with the friends, and also to visit the Two Holy Threshold. Therefore, you should pray on his behalf that God should add to his power, his kindness, his attraction, and his gift of speech, so that in the future ho may be able to do more than before and that, like this 'amp which is burning, he should give light.”

Upon the following day – Saturday, January 15th, the friends gathered to celebrate the 78th anniversary of the Declaration of the Báb calculated after the Moslem or lunar reckoning.

At luncheon I referred to a message which the Master had sent to my other saying that I had transmitted his words to her and that I trusted that I might someday be able to bring her to the Master.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá Inchallah. ”How is the Cause in Washington?

C.M.R. “Mrs. Parsons is busy preparing for the races Congress.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá “God willing she will be confirmed therein. Unless re is illumination between the whites and blacks through the teachings of the Blessed Beauty in the future times will become very difficult. When I was in Washington I went first to the varsity of the colored. (Howard University). There were no of the same color, what pleasure is there therein? Or if all the flowers be yellow or black, there is no pleasure in it. But if one enters into a garden where there are different kinds of colored flowers, this difference in color is the cause of beauty.

Is that not better? The ornament of a garden is by and through its different kinds of flowers – not through one kind.” The whites have done very much service for you (the colored) were slaves. The people of the North of America fought for four years for you. How many souls were killed. How much wealth they spent. How much trouble did they take until they freed you. the colored people became free in America. They became free in Europe. This was also reflected in Asia, and there also they became free. In all the world the colored became free. This was done through the help of the white. You must be very thankful to them, because they became the cause of your liberty. They sacrificed their lives for you. Now it is worthy of you to be thankful and pleased. But on the contrary you have arisen against the whites. Whilst you should pray for them and adore the whites who made you increase your worth and made you free, and gave you the rights of citizenship. You should be very thankful and should love the whites and the whites should be kind to you and should not prefer higher than you.”

“I spoke in detail to them, then they invited me to their church. I saw in the church that many of the whites were present. A Jew invited me specially, and he invited the white and the colored. We went and in the place where the talk was to be given there were white and colored everywhere. That Jew got up and expressed his thanks saying “I am pleased, therefore, I have gathered you colored and whites here, so that you should associate with each other.”

C.M.R. – “I noticed in the Master’s plea to the whites he talks of Mercy and not justice.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá–“This was because they did not have hearing ears that icyly of justice was not spoken to them., but in the way of Mercy it was spoken to them,”

Mrs. Morten: – “A friend told me that in churches some colored leaders were inciting the people to arise against the whites and make race war.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. “If there is not peace between the colored and the white it will end thus. It is certain that it will come to this. The colored killed many of the whites in Soudan. They even made the image of Christ in black, because the white are so bad in their sight.”

C.M.R – “We have found in America that when both races are present the meetings are more spiritual.”

Mrs. Morten –“We would the inter-marriage between the blacks and whites increase or decrease the trouble?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá – “It will cause decrease. In the beginning, it will use a noise but later on when offsprings come it will be different. The offspring from a white father and a black mother, daughters married a white child, be very powerful and very good.”

“‘Abdu’l-Bahá –”In brief it is this. This problem of the difficulty between the colored and white cannot be solved save through the power of God. The power of man is important. I made a marriage there between the white and colored. Mr. Gregory with his wife Miss Matthews were the two." C.M.R.—"I had a letter from Mr. Gregory telling how great an inspiration his wife is to him."

'Abdu'l-Bahá – "It is very good – very good. I wanted them to marry in Washington. They said it cannot be done in Washington, therefore, I sent them to New York and they married there. The beauty of it is that Miss Matthews was an English lady."

Mrs. Marten said, "Things have been very difficult for her. She was in difficulty."

'Abdu'l-Bahá – "Yes, that is true."

At the Holy Tomb of the Báb said 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"When love exists all things are beautiful. The non-existence of love sees everything bad . . . if the people had had love they would not have opposed the Cause. This is a balance. This is also a balance among the people to show whether one has love for another or not. If he loves it is good. To the Orientals, the dog is unclean. The occidentals love it very much. In Persia there was a lover known as Majnún and his beloved had a dog. People saw him as he was kissing the head of it. He was kissing all members of the body of the dog from head to tail. They said to him, "'Majnún, art thou mad? This dog is unclean. How can you kiss it?" He answered "This is the dog of Lelah!"

Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá to me: "There is a remembrance of you here in the Tomb" referring to the lamp."

"This feast is on behalf of the late Noush, a Parsee Bahá'í of India. We wanted to give this feast. On a blessed day of the declaration of His Holiness The Supreme Báb it was given. Verily, verily, Noush was a very blessed soul. He was very humble. He was very sincere – He was also writing poems, verily he was NOUSE. Amongst the Parsees there are verily pure souls. Now their sincerity is not known. It will become apparent in the future. These souls are still in the ground but their sweetness not known. It is not yet known which is barley and which is wheat. When they bear fruit it will be known which ones are the essence of the love of God and which are not. When these seeds grow up into trees then it becomes apparent. Therefore now it is not known. When it bears fruit then it will be known, Roush was Noush. Noush means, the sweet water, sweet water of the life of immortality."

After the chanting of the prayers 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to Mrs. Morten "Do you like Persian Songs? You are not accustomed to it. When I was in America at first I did not care for your music, but later I remained there for a time I became to like it, and later I liked it very much, especially when they used to sing out from the depths of their hearts, My God, My God."

C.M.R. – "Some of the friends in America are learning to chant according to the Persian Custom."*

**Note: The nine branch chandelier in the Venetian style of bent iron work suspended in the center of the inner chamber directly over the tomb of the Báb was a piece of my design and my hand craftsmanship which the Master had allowed me to make and there some years before. C.M.R.*

Said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Persian tunes are very good when one is accustomed. The American tunes during prayer service are very good. The Persian tunes are good in ode (sonnet) and verse.”

C.M.R. – “Mr. Kinney chants to music the Holy words with great effect.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I have heard the voice of Mr. Kinney. It is very good. He plays the piano well too. He is very good in music. Praise be to God that in such a blessed place the friends are gathered together in the utmost of attention toward the Tomb of the supreme One. Thoughts are powerful. The susceptibilities are spiritual. Now let us all go and visit the Tomb on behalf Of Roush Mouslim, the sweetest Noush.”

Supper in the home of the Master, January 15.

Said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Tonight at this table, praise be to God, there are Americans, Arabs, Turks, Persians and Indians. It is like Mahjoon (delicious sweet confection) sometimes, it happens that the material food becomes spiritual, for the spiritual powers dominate. There will remain, then nothing of the material food because the spiritual dominates. Now every lamp was a wick. It oil, but the oil has domination over the wick. The wick is substance without light. But the oil it: a substance which has power of giving light. Now upon this wick the oil has domination. This wick is secondary. The wick is not apparent at _____. In the same way when the spiritual susceptibilities are dominant, the material things are not necessary. For instance take fire in iron. When the fire penetrates, the Iron has no importance (loses its properties). All that is seen is the fire. Iron is black, but when the heat of the fire overcomes it, it becomes like fire. In like manner when spiritual things dominate material, loses material properties.”

Often it happened that we used to eat in the Holy Presence of Bahá’u’lláh, but, we were not conscious of what we were eating. It was as if we were eating heavenly food. In reality often it would happen that after the table was over one would ask what we had eaten. We could not remember. When one’s mind is concentrated upon something while eating he is not conscious of the food. Similarly when one is overpowered, with joy he cannot be mindful. In the same way when one is depressed, when one is eating one is not mindful of what he is eating, because grief is overpowering. Now tonight we are sitting here. The hearts are engaged elsewhere. The hearts do not think of food.

“Man is immersed in the spiritual susceptibilities. That is why that supper in the time of His Holiness Christ was called the Lord’s Supper. When the disciples were eating, The Blessed One (Christ) said it was the Lord’s Supper because spirituality had overpowered them to such an extent and they were engaged only d concentrating on Christ, and not on food. Therefore, he said that it was the Lord's Supper. That was the Heavenly food."

Lunch at the Pilgrim's House, January 16th. Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "It is good for the friends that wherever they go, they have relatives and friends. . . . About fifteen years ago, a Persian merchant came to me and said "I want to be a Bahá'í." I saw him to be a worldly man, not knowing anything about being a Bahá'í, or about the Kingdom, and that he was not thoughtful of God. I said "Come, you are my friend, but do not say you are a Bahá'í. MY FRIEND, NOT BAHÁ'Í." (These words, The Master said in English). But any kindness that you wish I will show unto you. I wrote a letter that wherever that person went they should show him kindness. After that I asked him, "Now tell me the truth, why do you want to be a Bahá'í?" He said, "In every city where one goes there are Bahá'ís, and as soon as they now that I am a Bahá'í they will receive me as their own relative and friend. Once I travelled with a Bahá'í. We went to Port Sa'id. No one knew me, but they came to receive him. I asked him if they were his relatives. He told me they were not relatives but Bahá'ís. From Port Sa'id we went to Cairo. They came to meet him at the station, and they gave feats for him. Being his friend, I was also invited. Then we went to Búshihre, then to Shíráz and then to Abadic, then to Káshán and to Tíhrán. In every city there were Bahá'ís and no one came near me for my own sake, although I was a Persian, and they were all Persians."

Among the Bahá'ís of God there is a divine brotherhood. There is a brotherhood of the heart, an eternal brotherhood."

January 17th.

This morning shortly before noon as we sat in the central room of the pilgrim house we heard a distant murmur of voices from the direction of the town. This rapidly increased in volume until we distinguished the rhythm of a chant coming out, as it were, from the voices of the crowd which by then we discovered were coming up the street. At first we could only see the turbans, Tarbauches and other head dresses above the top of the wall about the garden, as the crowd surged along the street filling it like a living stream from wall to wall. By this time groups of people from the neighboring houses had appeared as spectators in groups; some on the steps and terraces, and roofs while the more venturesome men and boys found seats on the walls along, the street, some few climbing into trees that they might have a view of the street. Then above the heads of the crowd appeared black banners, torches and other funeral emblems which gave us our first knowledge of what was taking place, and finally borne on the shoulders of men, pall covered coffin moved slowly past followed first by chanting priests and choristers and then by hundreds of people – the friends he came in told us that this was the funeral of one of the chief priests of Haifa. After the excitement had subsided lunch was served to which the Master came. When we were all seated and served, He spoke as follows:

“People travel from the East to the West, and from West to East but in the path of God they take not one step, for there is not merit in them. They fear the torment of this world for one hour but they do not fear the eternal torment. Now here in today four or five thousand people were a deed person, but not one person came here, but after a dead body five thousand people went. A priest had died. They were carrying the corpse list that priest had no news (idea) of what had been going on and he went from the forgetful world.”

Mrs. Morten; “In the next world do we remember things which happened here.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes there is no doubt of this.”

C.M.R. “Is this remembrance due to spiritual development”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It is apparent that all people have feelings or susceptibilities and those who are in the world of light feel that they are in the world of light, and those who are in the world of darkness feel that they are in the world of darkness. This which I am going to tell you is an example, for it cannot be measured. Man had the susceptibility of the condition, mineral, vegetable and animal. He has come from the mineral, from the world of the vegetable and from the world of the animal. He had the feeling of it and knows that he had come from the world of the mineral, the animal, and the vegetable. But the world of the mineral has no comprehension of the world of man, neither has the vegetable. This is only an example but that station beyond is sanctified. It cannot be compared with this world.”

C.M.R. “When I was in Germany I met several Theosophists who asked if the soul existed before it came into this world.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Before birth its condition was the condition of potentiality. Then when it came to this world – this is the world of completion, and this world does it learn. If it studied in this heavenly school it would progress, otherwise it will remain in the degrees of ignorance and will not progress.”

Mrs. Morten” When Bahá’u’lláh said all progress is made on this plane he did not mean the next.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Essentially it is in this world, for in this world our will either becomes illumined or remains darkened. There are also progressive degrees in the world beyond (this world) this is why charities are done for the dead. We pray for them. Why do we pray? We pray because there is progress of degrees there.”

C.M.R. – “Will our prayers have more effect on souls in this world or in the one beyond.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “In both worlds!”

Meeting at Master's home, January 17th.

Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "There is thought which has results and from it, fruits come forth. There are some kinds of thoughts which are like superstitions. These come and go (without any result). It is a waste of time. But there is a thought from which scientific discoveries are made. Discoveries are studied and the realities of things are studied. That kind of thought has result. But there is a thought which conceives only of worldly things and pleasures which comes out from the animal susceptibilities. These are useless. These are a waste of life. Now most of the people's thoughts are great, his station is high. But if his thoughts are ordinary or low, his station descends, and becomes cold. If we put aside the high ideals which are the cause of the greatness of humanity, then the world of man has no result. He consists of skin, flesh and bones, whatever man is, he is the result of his thoughts. The spreading of the breezes of God are the fruits of thought. All the existing sciences and arts are the result of thoughts. All the discoveries are the result of thought. All these arts and new things are the fruits of thought. The existing kind of citizenship is fruit of thoughts. Man is composed of thoughts. If his thoughts are illumined he is illumined, but, if his thoughts are dark, he is dark. The moles and worms of the earth expend all their energies going down into the earth. They work under the earth. Their thoughts and energies work under the earth. They work down deep. But the birds which sing well have their object always to ascend, and are continually flying. There is the thought which gives man the utmost of happiness, gives one detachments and the raising up of consciousness. He discovers the mysteries of God, and establishes new things, but there is also a kind of thought which makes man the slave after world of nature, and guides to animal things. It becomes the cause of the ignorance of man and becomes the cause of neglecting God, ' and makes man to become pure animal, therefore man is the result of thought. For instance, take for example two souls sitting together. One is soaring to the eternal sphere while the other is descending to the depth of the deep. One is progressing every day while the other is retrogressing. Both are the result of thoughts."

Tuesday Morning, 19th January 1921

This morning The Master was in His room, and seeing me standing in the garden, He opened the window and beckoned to me. I hurried to him; Shikh Muḥammad-'Alí, one of the Bahá'ís of Echkehabad, was in the room. At the Master's bidding we both sat down while He corrected and signed some tablets. After a while He called Mírzá Azizollah Bahadur to the room, and then He asked co how the Cause was progressing in Honolulu. I told Him that there were some very firm believers there, and that many people were friendly to the Cause, but as yet there were not many who were fired with the enthusiasm of the Cause. The Master replied, saying that at first a fire among reeds and grass smoulders but suddenly it rages and sweeps all before it then He went on to say that the cause would someday spread quickly in Honolulu, in this manner. I then told him that after leaving Honolulu, the last time, I realized how I might have worked while there more effectively, and to better advantage than I had done. He replied that it was a sign of growth to feel and admit one's short-comings, saying that self satisfaction was a great danger to man, for at this moment when one is most satisfied with himself, he inevitably falls to a low position.

The Master then resumed his writing for some minutes: looking up, He said in English, "Speak, Mr. Remey, speak to Me". I told Him that my constant prayer was that I might be enabled to make a complete sacrifice of myself and of my spirit in the Faith the Cause. With much kindness he said, "You have come this before making jour prayer." He then asked me to enumerate the ties in Germany where there were Bahá'ís, and I repeated the times of a number of cities and towns where there were friends, and where I had attended meetings. The Master was very happy, indeed, as He always is, when the Believers in Germany are mentioned and he said "The spread of The Cause of God in Germany is inevitable."

19th January 1921.

This afternoon Mrs. Morten and I took a walk along the Jaffa road by the sea to the promontory of Mount Carmel. There we visited the cave known as the School of the prophets, in which, according to tradition, the Holy Family rested on their return from Egypt, nineteen-hundred years ago. At the entrance of the cavern is a house where our Master spent several weeks in seclusion after the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. Not far distant by the sea, is the convent of the Carmelite Sisters. It is said that during The Master's stay at the School of the Prophets, on is retreat from the world just after the ascension of The Blessed Perfection, one evening as the sun was setting He walked over to this convent and asked admission, sending word to the Mother Superior that he had a message of importance to deliver to the inters of the order. Word was taken to Him that his request mild not be granted, because of the cloistered conventions of the order. A second time He pleaded with her for a hearing, but to no effect so He left unable to give His Great Message to these religious devotees who are praying continually for the coming of Die Lord.

From the School of the prophets Mrs. Morten and I walked over to the nearby Bahá'í cemetery at the foot of the mountain to visit the tombs of the Great Affnan whose mission had been to direct the building of the Mashrekál 'Azkir of Echkehabad, of Hadje Mírzá Weyder 'Alí, and of other Bahá'ís whose mortal remains have been laid there. As we were leaving the enclosure we saw an automobile coming toward us, which proved to be that of The Master. To our joy He, Himself was in the machine beckoning to us to approach, Several of the friends were with Him, and at the Master's bidding we got into the motor, which took us on around the promontory and for some distance on the road towards Jaffa, until we were within sight of the ruins of the ancient town of Athlit by the sea. Then The Master directed that we return to Haifa where we arrived at about sunset. Luring the ride Mrs. Morten asked The Master if the story were true that the apostles, Peter and Paul, on their journey along this coast, had spent a night at the School of the Prophets. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that it was authentic.

On the morning of January 20th Mrs. Van Patten and her son reached Haifa from Beirut where they had been forced to go because Of the passport complications to which I have already referred, and where they had been obliged to wait several days for a steamer to bring them back to Haifa.. That day at luncheon the Master welcomed them, saying, “In this world nothing lasts. Every trouble, anxiety and obstacle will pass.” Turning to Mrs. Morten, He said, Praise be to God that these dear friends have come. There is no further anxiety for you.”

Mrs. Van Patten, “I feel that we have caused much anxiety here.”

The Master, “Yes, everyone was expecting you. Many different telegrams came from you.”

Mrs. Van Patten, “We did the best we could.”

The Master, “Did you meet the friends at Beirut?”

Mrs. Van Patten, “Yes! ‘Alí Báqir, Rúhíe Effendi, Dr. Barakat, and many others. We had a lovely time there. Everybody sent their love to The Master.”

The Master, “You are very, very welcome. e were thinking of you all the time. Yes, when a person has an object in view he is not at ease. For instance when a person is starting for his home he is not aware of the things he sees passing on the way. Those whom he sees in reality are his relatives, family and friends. This is your home. You have had many troubles on the way.”

Mrs. Van Patten, “I thought we should have to go back and forth forever.”

The Master, “There is a kind of trouble that is useless – the troubles that are taken for the nether world. For instance the trouble that the kings and ministers of the country undergo for their difficulties are so great that they have no rest, no repose at night. But all these will vanish and will have no fruit. Consider bow much trouble was taken by Bismarok. How many days he labored. How many nights he did not sleep. How he strove in political affairs until at last he made Germany an empire. His work did not stand very long. When the French and their allies advanced and destroyed what he had constructed it was then useless, Or all his troubles and agonies were futile.”

“Bismark having been one of the foremost political leaders of the world, and coming to such an end, what will be the fate of others? 41hat happened to Napoleon I, with his extraordinary power? How hard he labored. How many days was he away from home. How many voyages did he make on land and sea. What trouble he underwent during the war with Russia. This was all useless and produced no fruit,—it all passed away.”

“There was a Prime Minister in Persia by the name of Mírzá Agha Than. Once he told us a story. 1e had a village the name of which was Kooch-e-Sal. He and his ministers came there. All the ministers (of state) were there. They came to the presence of the Blessed One (Bahá'u'lláh). In the meanwhile a person came from the Sháh bringing to Mírzá Aghah Khán a box of sweets. This particular sweet was called "Gaz" in Persia. It is made into discs. Mírzá Agha Khán gave one piece of the sweets to each of the ministers present. The sweets being from the Sháh were appreciated and were precious to him for it indicated the love of the Sháh. He wished the remainder of the sweets in his bedroom that he might eat them, therefore he told his servant who placed them there."

"The Ministers wished to play a joke on the Prime Minister. They said (to themselves) we will go at night and steal the sweets, he gave only one piece to each of us keeping thirty or forty himself. We will go and steal them and eat them. He went to his bedroom. They came at night and looked through the keyhole found him awake. They came after an hour and found him awake.

Again they came and went until morning. Neither he nor they slept that night. In the morning when they were all gathered together one of the ministers said, "You did not let us sleep, nor did you sleep yourself, last night. As many times as we looked through the keyhole of your door we found you awake. You did not let us carry out our plan." Mírzá Agha Khán breathed a very deep sigh, and said, It was not only last night that I did not sleep. I fell asleep for a few moments to awake again, Why?" he answered, I am continually thinking, my heart is not at rest. My thoughts are very trying and fatigue of this sort is far greater than the fatigue of the body. Shall I tell you of what I was thinking last night?" Then he began to recount his thoughts, one after the other. They said, "Oh, that is enough for us." He swore to God "I long to be a hammal (porter) so that I may labor by day and sleep by night, but what am I to do? I am the son of Mírzá Asadu'lláh. I have so many relatives. I am obliged to care for them all."

"The object is this – that he took so much trouble. That was the end of him? All was forgotten and there are no results. But the troubles of the believers of God have eternal results. Whatever trouble they may take, this trouble will have great results both in this world and in the heavenly world. What great results – followed the efforts of the Apostle Paul – results in the world Of the Kingdom and even in the nether world these results are lasting."

"I became very happy in meeting you. Praise be to God that you have illumined faces. The signs of the love of God are apparent upon your faces."

Mrs. Van Patten said, "We are very happy to be here."

The Master replied, "God willing you will always be visiting here. You will be in the spiritual condition of continual presence here."

At the home of the Master, Supper, January 20th

The Master addressing Mrs. Van Patten and her son. "I wished very much that you should come and be present at this table. Although this is a material table, yet in reality it is heavenly food for you all have sat in utmost love and sincerity, and the hearts are communing one with another. It is neither for the material food that you have gathered here nor is it for politics that you are present nor is it for material discoveries that you have come. It is only for the love of God that you are present, and for receiving His Bounties: therefore, although this is material food, in reality it is heavenly, and I am your servant, and I am serving you and am exceedingly happy. I hope that you will all serve like me, that you will rise with the utmost love to such an extent that each one of you should sacrifice yourselves for one another and accept any calamities that come. This is the station of the believers. This is the station of those who turn to the Kingdom of God. It is these souls who are assisted by the heavenly cohorts. Such souls are like lighted lamps. Like illumined stars. They are like fruitful trees. They are like the heavenly flower gardens. Those souls are those of whom His Holiness, Christ said, "Ye are the salt of the earth. God willing it is our hope that this salt will remain and last for He (Christ) said, "If the salt has lost its savor, wherewith, shall it be salted." Therefore, it is my hope that under the protection of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, you may endure forever."

Supper at the Master's table, January 21, 1921.

Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "Did his Holiness Christ appear and all know that He was Christ? Is it possible that they should have known that it was His Holiness Christ and that this was the Coming, and, notwithstanding this, deny Him? Any sane man can understand that this is impossible. If a servant of the Government be sent to a certain place – a gendarme, for instance – the populace will be alarmed, but he will be recognized and the people will, not oppose him. Why, Because they knew he is a representative of the Government."

"His Holiness Christ was the Light of Heaven, the Sun of Reality; he was assisted by the Holy spirit, and great glory. Is it possible that one should I know him. And the proof of this is 'hat when His Holiness Christ appeared and proclaimed Christianity the Jews denied it utterly. They said "Verily, we look for a promised One and this promised. One will come. But according to the text of the Torah, which must be fulfilled, there are certain signs for His Coming. And these signs have not been apparent, and these conditions have not been established; so we know that this Christ is not the Promised One. It is written in the Torah that He will come from an unknown place but this Christ is from Nazareth, and we know his home. The second sign is that His staff will be of iron, that is it will be a sword; he does not carry oven a shepherd's crook in his hand. The third sign is that He will rule the world; this man has not a mat to lie upon – how can he rule? He is a wanderer in the wilderness, his lamp is the light of Heaven, his bed is the ground, his food the green things of the desert. What sovereignty is this? This Christ is not the Promised One. The fourth sign is that He will spread the Law of the Torah, for it is written in the Book that the laws of Torah are everlasting. The Promised One will teach these laws so that they will be spread throughout the earth, until in all the world there will remain no law but the Law of Moses.”

”This man has broken the Laws of the Torah; he has broken the Sabbath; notwithstanding that it is the very text of Torah that if a person cote and should work miracles and break the Sabbath, he should be killed. How could this be the Messiah? He says “I have come from Heaven” but we know that he came from the womb of Mary. How could this be the Promised One? And among the signs is this: that the Jews have become despised. They have become the captives of the Roman Empire, their sovereignty is destroyed. How could this be the Messiah?”

“According to the text of the Torah, during the reign the promised One, even the animal world will be permeated by human justice. No animal will oppress another; serpent and mouse will live in one hole, eagle and dove will lie in one nest, lion and gazelle will feed in one pasture, wolf and sheep will drink from one stream. Now we see that in this very time, oppression has reached such a height that he, himself, has been crucified. How could this Christ be our Messiah? This Christ is the enemy of Truth, this is the false Christ.”

“That is, God forbid, according to the very test of the New Testament; they said, ‘He is Beelzebub’ (that is, Satan). This is written in the New Testament. Why did they do this? All the promised signs were fulfilled during the time of His Holiness Christ. But the Jews did not understand. Each one of those signs was as manifest as the sun, but the ignorance of the Jews caused them to deny them. They were blind and did not see, they were deaf and did not hear, they had no inner guidance, and could not understand. If they had had eyes they would have seen that His Holiness, Christ was shining like unto the sun. He was pure spirit. But the Jews would not understand, and for this reason they opposed Him.”

“The sovereignty of Christ was a reality; the sovereignty Of Christ was everlasting. His was not a Napoleonic sovereignty, which is destroyed in a day. Napoleon as imprisoned on the Island of St. Helena, and there he wept and lamented until he died. The sovereignty of Christ is a sovereignty which has lasted until this day and which will be everlasting. Pity that the Jews did not understand. It is His Blessed Tongue which divided truth from untruth, and His words were like a sword.”

“Now regarding the prophecy of the conquest of the East and the West, His Holiness, Christ conquered Heaven and earth, but the countries which He conquered were the countries of the hearts, not this world of dust. ”That matters this world of dust? Only the hearts are significant. In brief, the laws of the Torah (that is the reality of the Torah) were widespread. Whatever was hidden in the Book was revealed by His Holiness Christ, but not the literal words of the writings.”

“Now considering the prophecy that wolf and sheep should drink from one stream, and lion and gazelle should feed in one pasture, the meaning is that there were souls in that day who were as wolf and sheep, dove and eagle, serpent and mouse, among them, and these irreconcilable ones became believers in Christ and drank from His stream (of truth). For instance, as the Jew quarrels with the Idol worshipper, their differences are like those of wolf and sheep, yet these two came together and drank from one fountain. They gathered t the fount of His Holiness Christ. Then it is proved that because the Jews did not know Christ, they denied Him and Crucified Him. Had they known they could not have crucified Him. It is now two thousand years since lie appeared, but • till the Jews are looking for their Messiah and have not yet recognized the Christ.”

“The words of the Torah and the New Testament are not understood by the ignorant ones (spiritually unawakened), but the meaning is made clear to those who receive divine inspiration. e mass of the people have no comprehension, they cannot understand. For instance, can the layman follow the technical language of the scientist? Geographical terms, mathematical, geometrical terms are not intelligible to the people. The language of a doctor is understood by a doctor. What can the laymen understand of it? Therefore, it was the disciples who truly reach Torah. 3ut, although the Jews were reading the torah day and night, and had committed the writings to memory, they did not understand a single word, because they were not (the real) people of Torah.”

Saturday, January 22nd.

This morning as we sat at breakfast Mírzá ‘Azíz’u’lláh Bahadur old us an episode in the life of Mriza ‘Abdu’l-Ḥasan of Shíráz – the paternal grandfather of Mírzá, ‘Alí-Muḥammad Than Báqir and ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn an Báqir of Shíráz whom many of us knew. Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Ḥasan was one of those who recognized the Divine answer of the Báb before The Báb had made His public declaration Mecca. It was as follows: He was on the same ship, with o Báb when He went to Mecca. The vessel, which was a sailing craft of no great size, on the way, encountered a severe storm. The people on board were terrified. Seeing that the was calm and unperturbed under these circumstances, and wing that He was a seyed (a descendant of The Prophet Muḥammad) Milza ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn approached Him asking him to say on behalf of the ships company for their safety and deverance from the storm. The Báb calmly assured him that the danger would soon pass; Thus Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Ḥasan first became attracted to the Holy Person of The Báb. Later on, on the voyage he overheard The Báb dictating prayers and verses to the amanuensis. The spirit contained in these Holy Utterances convinced Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Ḥasan that The Báb was the promised one of Islám. From then he became devoted to The Báb, and was by Him when He made His declaration to the vast multitude of Mussulman pilgrims, gathered in the court of the Islámic world. He retained always firm and stood firm in the Cause, passing through many persecutions, even the physical assaults of the enemies of the Cause until he died at a very advanced age about fifteen years ago.

Saturday, January 22nd.

This afternoon The Master sent our party to the top of Mount Carmel, for an afternoon outing. We stopped for some mites on the extremest top, just above the Tomb of The Báb. Nearby was the overturned and battered obelisk erected some are ago to commemorate the visit of Kaiser Wilhelm 11, to Haifa. When the British troops took the Mountain the soldiers demolished this monument. Nearby was a long range n mounted on a foundation commanding the town. One of the friends told us that it had killed about two hundred people during some of the recent military operations of the war. Now was out of commission considerably demolished like the ___lisk it showed the result and after effect of war. Below us, between the foot of the mountain and the sea, the German Temple Colony wa3 spread out like a map, its main avenue, flanked by parkways, leading direct from the sea up to the Tomb of The Báb. As many know this colony was laid out here by these people that they might he here to welcome The Lord on His Second Advent. He came at the appointed time and upon this Holy Mountain exactly as promised but the people did not recognize Him, yet the Holy Shrine of the Báb, built by the Center of The Covenant overlooks the Temple Colony, with the main avenue of the Colony for its principal approach.

January 23rd, Sunday.

This morning at breakfast Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím told the story of the tragic death of Ebtehadj-ol-Molke of Rasht, one of the most respected and best known among, the servants of the Cause in Persia. When the Bolchevists arose in Persia it gave opportunity for the Moselem enemies of the Cause to incite the people against the Bahá'ís. Ebtehadj-ol-Molke was a man of wealth. His property was confiscated and his home burned by the Boloheviste, and because he, himself, withstood and would not join with the Bolchevist party, they killed him brutally. Oe were all very mach affected by the story of this tragedy, the details of which I here omit. It made me toe' very badly because my first experience of Bahá'í hospitality in Persia had been in his home where I spent several days with Ebtehadj-ol-Molke in aesht when I went to Persia in the summer of 1908.

This same morning, January 23rd, the Ma2ter came to the Western Pilgrim house to call on the friends quartered there. He explained that He was entertaining some people at lunch, upon to mountain, so He would not be able to be with us at noon.

This luncheon or toast vies spread by the Water upon the mountain in the front middle chamber of the Tomb of The Báb, the moslem notables of the town, the white turbaned muftis, and other men in the knit dress of the country, arriving at the Master's house and .going from there up the mountain in the me of the Oriental friends, familiar with the inner workings of the Mater's household told us of the elaborate preparations for the Feast which had been in progress for days in the big kitchen where all the food. for the Blessed Family and the visiting pilgrims was prepared. One detail this rests in my mind. It was a sheep roasted whole, roasted during the process with milk. The cooking of this Tease was done very slowly and lasted the entire night, one the Master's daughters remaining on watch to direct the servants and see that they did not fall asleep and allow it to burn.

The feast lasted all day from morning until night. When the Master returned home He was tired out with the entertaining of His guests. In the Orient a feast is a feast. Arthur Redeen who ran the guests up and down the mountain in the automobile gave us a vivid description of how those men of Haifa ate and of the quantities of food they consumed. In the evening one of the Persian Bahá'ís who had been at the feast gave a general idea of the Master's talk to these men, and of their response. Unfortunately these words were not reported, but the general good spirit of the gathering was the result of the Master's influence and work in Haifa.

Talk with the Master in His house January 24th in Haifa, Palestine. Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "As I had caught cold, I could not be present at lunch with you. In order to make up for that, I call you here." Mrs. Van Patten; "The Master must have been very tired yesterday."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Yes, very tired. The guests I had yesterday, had themselves asked me to invite them to the Tomb. From the morning until the evening they were occupied in smoking, eating and drinking tea. I had to entertain them myself, and therefore, I became very tired."

Mrs. Van Patten: "Before we came to Haifa we did not know t hospitality meant, and now we have learned. I hope we can profit by it."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Here we do not have the means to entertain the friends as well as we would like to. Now we are to build a new guest house and Mr. Remey is to be the architect. When house is built we hope to be able to entertain the friends ter. But our real feasts and entertainments are in the Kingdom of God. It is a table on which every kind of food can be found, and to which all the people of the world, without distinction, are invite. This is an eternal table. The feast of yesterday is completely gone, and there is no trace left. It will yield no fruit. But oar Heavenly table is eternal; its fruit is everlasting."

Mrs. Morten; "Our life here Is like Lazarus' short stay in Heaven. When he left he longed to return again."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "I pray that you will find eternal life... This is why His Holiness Christ says "The Cause of God is like banquet spread by a certain rich man, who invited the chiefs and important people to eat at His table. They all, without exception found excuse. Then that rich man sent into the streets and gathered the poor, who ate His bounty with joy. His Holiness Christ invited the chiefs of Israel to His Heavenly table, but they did not come. Then he sent to the poor and choose People like Peter and John, etc. who were fishermen. He made them the chosen ores. His own brothers, His near relatives became estranged from him, and Peter, the fisherman, came close to him we have spread a table also to which we invited the people of these parts of the world. These people, who are near to us, did not accept our invitation, they became estranged to us, so chose distant people, who came close to A, like you, whom we chose from America.“

Mrs. Van Patten: “I have many questions but when I come the presence of the Master I become empty.” ‘Abdu’l-Baba: ”God willing, you, yourself will find the answers to these questions in your own heart. The confirmation of the Blessed Beauty, Bahá’u’lláh will enable your heart to discover the answers.

” Mrs. Van Patten: “I cannot express to the Master the gratitude I feel to the Master for the tablet He revealed for me last winter, regarding the death of my husband. 4111 this pilgrimage that we have made have any effect on the happiness of my husband?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Because you are praying for his welfare at the Holy threshold, and his progress, there is no doubt prayer will have its effect. Charity and benevolent deeds, done in behalf of the departed one, will also have its effect.” In speaking of the Temple ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The Mashrequil-Adhkar in America is of great importance, because it is the beginning of the divine institutions. Later on there will be thousands of them. In every, city there will be one. But now this one is of the utmost Importance. The friends should have one in every city. They should build if they can, otherwise they should rent a place, calling it the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, and all joining without exception in the work. When the friends enter the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár they will become purified from selfish desires and so spiritual progress and development will be attained.” Bill Van Patten: “Will the Master tell me what is the best kind of life work to take up?”

Master: “That to which you are most inclined.”

Bill: “Up to now I have not been able to decide on anything.”

Master: “There are certain professions which are practicable in every place, while there are some, which are not so. Medicine, for example can be practiced everywhere. Take up medicine. Do you like it?”

Bill: “I have not thought of it.”

Master: “Take it up, and a liking for it will be created in you. Medicine is demanded everywhere. As soon as one of the friends who is a doctor comes here, all demand his services. While Mr. Remey, who is an architect, comes and not one asks for him. Medicine. . . please God, you will heal both spiritually and physically.”

Saturday, January 23rd.

Tonight the moon as full, and a party of us climbed the mountain to the Holy Tomb of The Báb. My have heard descriptions of the beauties of this sacred place on Carmel. Its charms surpass description. Standing on the terrace before the building Mírzá Aziaollah Baal and I were speaking of the friends in Germany and before coming down the mountain we spent some time in prayer before the door of the Tomb. I remembered them in my supplications, not unmindful of the fact that I myself was in greater need of their prayers than they were of mine.

Later in the day to me: The Master Said: "Individuals are many and each holds certain particular opinions desiring that the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár should be built after their own personal tastes and opinions. They write to me. They ask me to give orders that it should be done according to their taste. Every day such letters come). Now Thou art an architect. If you observe some differences it is based on your knowledge of the art, but hundreds of people are writing to me, expressing their criticisms while they know nothing of architecture. This is why I refer everyone to the convention. Anybody who writes anything about this question I say it should be referred to the Convention. Whatever the Convention decides upon I approve. There is no remedy other than referring these affairs to the Convention, because order cannot be established. Affairs should come under system and organization. People must comply with what the majority thinks advisable. Individuals should sacrifice their opinions for those of the majority, otherwise order cannot be established."

The Master had been ill and for some days we had not seen him until about noon on February 1st. I was summoned to His bedroom together with Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh who interpreted.

Said the Master: "How are you? I have not seen you for some time. I would like to see you more often, but God willed. It so that I became sick and could not see you so frequently as I was desirous. Now apologize to you for this. Though I have not been with you much, but in heart I have been with you always. I feel the utmost attachment to Mr. Remey. I hope at in every place and under every circumstance you may chance be, you will be confirmed and assisted. I am almost eighty years old, that is I am now in my 79th year, and next year on the 5th day of Djemadi Oval, I will be in my eightieth year."

"This means that this body of mine has been suffering for eighty years. Many kinds of sufferings have befallen me. It is this body of mine that has been able to endure these various calamities and hardships. Had it been any other person's body it would not, it could not endure more than forty of such years. But now this body has become sick. I can no more write, I can no more speak, I can no longer put forth effort nor strive. Now is the turn of you people who are firm and steadfast and detached to arise and serve and become like unto pillars for this divine edifice".

Here the Master's son-in-law Mírzá Hádí Shírázee entered and told the Master that our lunch had been waiting for some time and was getting cold. The Master told us to go and eat.

The Master was slowly recovering from this attack of influenza. Shortly before lunch He called me into His bedroom where he was seated on a divan looking rather tired and weak. Mírzá 'Azíz came to translate His words. He brought with him a telegram for the Master which 'proved to be Prone of the Bahá'ís in America whose wife was about to get a divorce from him, in which he supplicated the Master to heal the difficulty. After reading the despatch the Master said, "The problem of divorce has become very bad among the people of the West. The Westerners scold the Easterners on account of their divorces, while such cases of divorce in the West never take place in the East. For over 50 years we have been here, and not a single case of divorce has occurred, but in America when a man becomes tired of his wife and sees another woman who is prettier than wife he obtains a divorce from his wife and goes through matrimonial processes with the other woman. Similarly if a woman sees some other man whom she likes better than her own husband, she tries to obtain a divorce from her husband in order to unite with the other man. This is very bad. The best system or method is that of the law of God, that is, when in-harmony appears between a man and his wife, and they want to separate, they both should wait for one year, and if during this period love and harmony is not re-established between them, that is if both are so repulsive to one another that they cannot hope of restoring harmony between them then they may separate."

I said I want to sacrifice all my thoughts and desires before the will of the Master. Then He said, "I know that and have perfect confidence in Thee. I know that Thou hast no desire save that which God wisheth Thou art. Thou are sincere and thou wilt be confirmed."

During the winter of 1920-21, my brother William Butler Remey joined a group of three Chicago Bahá'ís, Dr. E. M. Appel, Mrs. Hauser and Mrs. Arne, True Perron, bound for the Holy Land, crossing from New York by way of the Mediterranean, they landed in Alexandria and after a few days in Cairo, came by through rain from Cairo to Haifa, where they arrived the first week in February, when the Master was just recovering from an attack of cold.

On February 8th, at 10:40 A.M., my brother and I were nailed by the Master to his bed room. He was just out of bed from his recent illness. I recall seeing the cup which I had brought to him from the Schwarz Family, on the table by his bedside, with some medicine he had been using.

Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "You are very welcome. What a coincidence! You came when Mason was here too. It is excellent. I hope you did not have any inconvenience on the way."

Will: "None."

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "You are very welcome. Through the graces of the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) I hope that under all circumstance and conditions, you will both remain heavenly brothers to each other, because physical brotherhood is of no importance. Real brotherhood is heavenly brotherhood. This is why according to the Gospel when the brothers and mother of Christ went to visit His Holiness Christ, His Holiness said that His brothers were those who believed in (the advent of) the Kingdom of God. Then turning to the disciples He said, that they were his real brothers. He did not accept to receive His physical (Natural) brothers. Vow it is my hope that you will be both natural and heavenly brothers to each other in every respect and condition, in such a way as never to be separate from each other. I pray that you may become confirmed and assisted in every state of life; that and be always happy and rejoicing. At present, under God's protection we shall meet again".

Thursday 10th, February.

This afternoon The Master called my brother and me to Him. He had been ill and this was the first time that we had seen Him looking really better. After welcoming us and ordering tea, He spoke saying "The body, and the physical condition of man has no importance for this condition is transitory and of this earth. That which is of real or eternal consequence is the spiritual condition of the soul of man. Though I have been ill in body and suffering, praise be to God my spirit has been good, therefore, my illness was not important. It is the light in the lamp which gives it value and not the lamp itself. A very beautifully wrought lamp is useless unless it is lighted, and when there is a brilliant light in a lamp it is of use and value, even though its chimney be thin and fragile, So it is with man. His spirit is the important thing, while his body is unimportant."

I presented to The Master Herr Herrigel's letter telling of the recent meetings of teaching held in Tübingen and Cöppingen and of the service of arranging for the Tübingen meeting done by Herr Goring. Also the Greetings of the Freiburg Assembly to The Master. He responded by sending his greetings to these friends.

Saturday, A. M. Feb. 12th

The Master called Will and me to Him – Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh, translating. After greeting us He said "How are you? Are you happy? I hope that you will be always happy, although I do not have the time nor the strength to see you as often as I would like, yet be assured that I am always thinking of you and supplicating to the Kingdom of Abhá for your confirmation.

Especially by night do I implore assistance for you. The Kingdom of God is like a King who sends an army to the frontier to fight. The King is occupied continuously in thought with those soldiers who are fighting on the field, he is always thinking of sending some new reinforcement to them. He is seldom mindful of those soldiers who are stationed at his capital. Now also my thought is always turned towards those friends who are active in Service. This is why every one of them who goes out teaching in every part finds himself or herself victorious and triumphant,(Turning to C.M.R.) for example you, yourself, travelled all over America to the North, South, East and West and to the Hawaiian Island, to Persia, to Caucasus, India and Germany. Everywhere divine confirmations and heavenly hosts were supporting thee, thus thou wert enabled to achieve conquests. Praise be to God that He has given thee such a nice and dear brother as William who is of the same opinions, of the same taste, the same beliefs, and even of the same expression (or looks). What more doesn't thou wish than this?"

Sunday Eve. 13 February

Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá to me "Speak". I told him that I had prayed to the Blessed. Beauty at the Tomb of the Báb for more love. He said "Baba'u'llah is the sun of love which shows all over the world. He was imprisoned when He gave all these teachings to the world, saying that all use the fruits of the same branch and the leaves of our tree. He accepted imprisonment so that you might be free. He was under chains in prison when h gave forth these teachings; He accepted all the sufferings and trouble so that you might attain to the palace of the Kingdom".

One evening as we were seated around the dining room table in the Pilgrim house talking about the Revealed Word and its life giving spiritual power, one of the Oriental friends told the following incident in the life of the Master which gave us a physical picture illustrative of the Spiritual principle of the divine food, sustenance, and healing for the Nations contained in the Revealed Word of the Holy Manifestation.

As I recall the episode was as follows:

'Abdu'l-Bahá was travelling. The path was long and difficult and stony, and the sun was exceedingly hot. Suddenly the mule, upon which he was riding, staggered, 'Abdu'l-Bahá dismounted and the animal overcame, fell by the roadside. Knowing that by virtue of his instinct the mule would eat the particular food which contained the cure for his malady, 'Abdu'l-Bahá ordered his attendant to gather some handfuls of various kinds of grasses and herbs and offer them to the sick animal. The mule refused to eat of the proffered delicacies, until finally the man gave him a bunch of thistles. These he chewed eagerly until his mouth bled quite freely. Thus relieved of the pressure of blood in his head caused by the excessive heat, the animal was able to shortly resume the journey.

As the fragrances emanating from the shrubs and flowers of an oasis in the desert attract the weary wayfarer and invite him to the refreshment and shelter for which he craves, so is the Word of God, embodied in His Manifestation, the source of sustenance for starved and hungry souls in this world. The Message given by the Manifestation which lives in the souls of those severed ones who follow Him, sends forth a heavenly spiritual fragrance that awakens and attracts those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, to the Holy Cause of God, where their real heart's desire is found.

While in Haifa one of the friends told me that on one occasion the Master had said that many of the troubles in the Cause in America were this to political tendencies and methods employed by the Bahá'ís, and that he said that in Germany the friends had been free from this condition. This thought set my mind in motion and in considering this matter I realized that in travelling from country to country, knowing our people under many differing conditions and circumstances, I had had an opportunity to notice how the various human or natural characteristics of different peoples make it easy or make it difficult for them to surrender themselves to the methods of conducting the word and the activities of the Abhá Kingdom as pre-scribed in the principles of the 3aha'í Revelation. For example in despotic countries such as many in the Orient where for generations the people have been accustomed to obey the law without question, one sees that there the people in accepting the Bahá'í teaching, are prepared to accept it in its entirety and without question. Upon the other hand in other

Our party of four American pilgrims had left Cairo on the evening of August 31st. Three of the Egyptian Bahá'ís had come to the train to bid us farewell, and to give us messages to take to Haifa. One of the group was an Armenian, who brought a basket of fruit for the Master. Another was MírzáTofik, a young man of twenty-one or -two years of age, who is student in the college at Beirut. He interpreted for us often during our five days in Cairo, and also served as a most pleasant and helpful guide in some of our trips about the city. The third person to bid us Godspeed was Muḥammad Taqíṣfahání, in whose home we had spent some of our happiest hours in Cairo. He speaks no English, but he gave us many sweet thoughts, through MírzáTofik's interpretation, and his smile was a benediction. We loved him so much that we could not have borne parting from him had it not been that the goal of our journey was Haifa and the Master! His parting gift to us was a tray of delicious pastry, and a lovely bouquet of roses. Through all the next day's ride the flowers kept fresh, and on the day after that there were two or three buds that were fresh enough to be given to the Master, when Mírzá Muḥammad Taqí's message of love was told him. The Master wore them in his girdle all the rest of that day, and said that he always was happy when he thought of the loving heart of the Bahá'í who had given us the flowers.

When we woke on the morning of September first, the train was running through the desert country of southern Palestine. For mile after mile the rolling sand dunes stretched into the distance. Long lines of camels were passed; and occasionally acres of date-palms, loaded with green dates, showed where a little moisture was held in the sand below the dry surface. For hours we looked out of the window, watching with an intense fascination, those long miles of desert. Some one in our party that said she could quite understand why the children of Israel murmured in the wilderness, if that was the kind of country that they had to travel through! We wondered whether Joseph and Mary, and the infant Jesus, had traveled so hard a road when they went down into Egypt. But later, in Haifa, we were told that the tradition of the country says that they went to the port at the foot of Mt. Carmel, and from there continued their journey to Egypt by boat.

During the middle of the day, the train passed from the desert into the pasture land. That is as different from our green American meadows as one can imagine. The pastures are brown and dry, and we wondered how the many herds of goat and sheep that we saw could find enough food to keep them alive. We saw almost no cows, and in Haifa we found that it is very difficult to obtain milk; we did not see any butter while we were in Palestine. Instead of butter, a white, salty cheese made from goat's milk is served.

In the afternoon we rode through the beautiful valley near Joffa, with its thousands of fruit trees. The fields have to be irrigated, but when that is done they "blossom abundantly," and the trees are loaded with oranges and lemons, which were green at that season of the year. A little farther north is the valley of Sharon, and we tried to remember some of the beautiful words of the Old Testament with regard to that valley. "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God."

The last part of the journey was very beautiful. The train ran close to the edge of the seashore, and we saw the sun drop down through fleecy clouds and sink in the blue waters of the Mediterranean. On the right a low range of hills rose – rocky, and sparsely covered with vegetation. Beyond them appeared line after line of hills, until, far in the distance, high blue mountains towered in to the sky. We thought that they must be the Lebanons, and we wondered whether we should soon see the valley of 'Akká. After a time the lowest range of hills rose so close that all the others were blotted out. Cora suggested that perhaps the termination of this range was Mt. Carmel, and so it proved to be, for suddenly we rounded a point of land, and Haifa appeared to the east, with Mt. Carmel above.

Haifa lies on a narrow plain at the foot of the mountain, but there are buildings scattered part way up the slope. A long white road traverses the length of the hill, and reaches the top near its western extremity. I looked for the Tomb of the Báb, but I am not sure whether I saw it then. The train runs through a considerable part of the town, before reaching the station, and our eyes were very eager in their search for the various places of which we had heard so much. Suddenly I remembered that we should now be able to see ‘Akká across the bay, and hurrying to the other side of the car, I looked out – and across the water I glimpsed the city of the Lord, the “door of hope.” We were so happy to be so near our journey’s end, – we were so full of expectation, that it seemed as if the train would never reach the station. But at last we did pull up in front of it! Cora went out to look for a porter, and I was ready to pass baggage out of the window to her. But almost immediately a hand was reached in to shake mine, and we were welcomed by a young man, whom we later learned was Rúhí Effendi, one of the Master’s grandsons. Soon a familiar figure appeared in the car, Fugeta, whom we had last seen in New York. He helped pass out bundles, and soon we were all on the platform with our numerous parcels and bags beside us. We shook hands with several young men, Bahá’ís from the Master’s household, and then we four American pilgrims were in the auto, with the driver, Rúhí Effendi, and some of our baggage. Said Effendi, who had just arrived from Alexandria, Fugeta, and the other friends waited for the car to return for them.

The car ran through several streets, going steadily upwards, – and I was too happy and too far from ordinary speech to be able to say a word. Suddenly we turned a corner, and after going less than a hundred yards the car stopped. {{p165}}

I recognized the Pilgrim House, from the picture of it in The Light of the World. On the other side of the road was the wall of the Master’s garden, and rising above it, the little room, like a watch-tower, in which the Master often stays.

During our ride from the station, Rúhí Effendi told us that the Master was staying was staying on the mountain for a few days, to rest from the many demands made on his time when he is in his house in the town. We would not see him until the next day. Perhaps we were disappointed for a moment, but here one knows that all that the Master does is wisely done. And next morning we were sure that it was well that we should have time to rest, and drink in the exquisite peace of the place, before meeting him.

At the door of the Pilgrim House we were met by two Americans, Mrs. Hoagg and Malcolm McGillavrey. Malcolm had been in Haifa a week, but Mrs. Hoagg had been there since early in the summer. She acted as hostess for the Pilgrim House; she showed us to our rooms, – one for Cora and me, another for Mabel and Sylvia. Simple, clean, and filled with a faint fragrance as of incense, is our place of rest, the place the Master has provided for those who come from the West. Every hour I wonder more at the love and kindness which has so provided for our comfort! Whenever we sit down to a meal, I think, “This is the meal the Master has given us!" The material food has come now, but the spiritual food had reached us in America!

Fugeta cares for the house; he gets the breakfast; he serves the lunch, the food for which is brought over from the Master's house; he washes the dishes, he cleans the lamps, he is always busy in serving us. In the evening he helps wait on table, at dinner in the Master's house. The other boy who serves at dinner is Khusraw, who came from Burmah when he was very young, to serve the Master.

After our arrival at the Pilgrim House we sat on the porch for a while. The night was beautiful, – a full moon, and yet the stars were very bright. At about half past seven, Mrs. Hoagg took us over to the Master's house to meet the ladies of the household. We entered a gate that is covered with a luxuriant growth of vines, and walked under an arbor to the entrance of the house. It was hard to believe that we were really there! We had seen pictures of the house often and it was so very like the pictures! (That is true of everything here. The pictures we have seen have been very good, I think, for one recognizes places and people immediately.)

We went up a rather long, broad flight of steps, turned to the left, and were in a high-ceilinged room of moderate size. There were many chairs and divans against the wall and at the end of the room was a big wicker chair which one knew at once was the Master's. Immediately the ladies came in they greeted us with the Greatest Name, they inquired about our health, our journey, about the believers in America. Rúhí Effendi translated for those who did not speak English. There were present the Holy Mother, the Greatest Holy Leaf, two of the daughters, TúbáKhanoum and RoohaKhanoum; two or three young girls, granddaughters of the Master, – and Fu'ad, the adorable four-year-old grandson, whose picture I had seen in Mr. Latimer's note-book.

The Holy Mother spoke about BAHÁ'U'LLÁH'S commands about education. The two daughters talked with us about the friends in America. Little Fu'ad ran in and out on a very sturdy pair of legs. I cannot remember much of what was said. We knew that we were very welcome. We knew that we were at home as never before! I could not but try to realize that these were the women who had been for years prisoners in 'Akká, who had undergone unspeakable hardships – these women with smiling faces who welcomed us so cordially.

After a time, how long I cannot tell, – someone came and announced dinner. The ladies said "good night," for they do not come to the table where the men pilgrims are. We were taken out into a big, big room, which had a long table down the center. Many men came filing in and seated themselves. There were probably twenty or thirty at the table. Later we learned that five religions, and six or seven nationalities were represented. Christians, Muḥammadans, Buddhists, Zoroastrians, Jews – were met in love and unity at the table of our Master. Egyptian, Persian, Arab, Burmese, Japanese, American, Parsee, Turk, – and perhaps other nationalities were infinitely happy because they had found the joy that passeth understanding, – because they were the guests of 'Abdu'l-

Bahá! One does not remember words here, but the atmosphere of joy and peace is unforgettable.

As we were leaving the house, Rúhí Effendi, who had just come down from the mountain, brought word that the Master would either come down, or send for us the next day.

At the Pilgrim House we sat out on the porch in the moonlight and talked until almost ten o'clock, – and then went to our rooms to pass our first night in the Holy Land! I slept peacefully, and the night was all the more beautiful because I woke several times for a few minutes of happy realization that we were at last in Haifa, – in the “land of heart’s desire!”

September 2, 1920

To waken in the Pilgrim House in Haifa is a very, very happy experience! From our west windows we could catch a glimpse of the Tomb of the Báb, and how eagerly we looked up at it, knowing that there the Master was dwelling; there was the memorial to the wonderful young herald of our Faith, the Supreme Báb.

Breakfast in the Pilgrim House comes at seven o'clock. It is a simple, friendly meal. The food consisted of tea, toast, poached eggs, honey and cheese. And the lovely companionship of the friends! There were the seven of us who slept in the House, and Said Effendi and MírzáLuṭfu'lláh always came in and had breakfast with us. MírzáLuṭfu'lláh came down from the mountain each morning bringing handfuls of jasmine blossoms from the garden of the Tomb, and these he strewed on the table. They were a lovely reminder of the spiritual fragrance of that spot!

After breakfast on that morning I was sitting in our room praying. Cora was writing at the table, the door into the living-room was open and the various sounds of the household drifted in to us. I was having a very happy time reading some of the prayers in the little prayer-book, and also in praying for the friends who were not there with us. I found myself bathed in a wonderful atmosphere of love and peace. It was like nothing I had ever experienced! It was not supernatural, in the sense of seeming queer or strange. It was simply an all-pervading peace and calm that seemed to fill my whole heart and spirit. I seemed to be at one with all the beauty and joy and light in the universe. Thus, I think, some ray of love from the Master's thought prepared me for meeting him that day.

At lunch Rúhí Effendi brought word that we were to go up to the Tomb at about four in the afternoon, to see the Master! After lunch we all went and rested for an hour and a half. That is part of the day's program always. At three o'clock came tea, another invariable occurrence.

As the hour drew near when we were to go up the “Mountain of the Lord,” to meet ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, I remembered one evening we had spent with {{p167}} Juliet Thompson not long before we had left New York. She had said with deep earnestness, “When you are in the Master’s presence do not be self-conscious, if you can help it. Do not be afraid. There is nothing to fear. He is all love and kindness. Pray, pray, all the way on your journey, that your hearts may be freed from all self-consciousness. Go to him freely, gladly!”

I had tried to remember that, I had prayed for purity of heart that I might learn the lessons the Master will teach those who are ready to learn. And yet as we rode up the steep road toward the Tomb, there was a strange mixture of love and dread and longing in my heart. The way seemed very long! And yet it was very beautiful. We saw the valley of ‘Akká, with the river Kishon winding through it down to the sea. Across the bay, ‘Akká shone brightly in the afternoon sunlight, – that “White Spot,” which so many, many pilgrims have sought because the Glory of God had lived there.

Finally we turned off from the main road, and the carriage drove down a steep incline toward the MossaferKaneh [musáfir-kháníh], – the Persian Hospice for men. There we alighted and Mrs. Hoagg led us along a wide path, which is bordered with cypress trees on one side and with fig trees on the other. We passed the house of the care-taker, with the little room on top where the Master sometimes sleeps when He is on the mountain, and walked around to the front of the Tomb.

In front of the Tomb of the Báb we found perhaps thirty of the men pilgrims sitting. One of the most majestic was a tall man, dressed in a long black robe, – one of the Bahá’í teachers from ‘Ishqábád. And with all his dignity, he had the most beautiful laughter-wrinkles around his eyes! One soon realized the cause of the latter, for he smiled almost all the time!

We were shown to seats in front of the Tomb, on the edge of the beautiful garden of the terrace. We were told that the Master would come soon. During the last few days I had prayed so much for the ability to learn to serve the many children of the Father. I had found myself trying to imagine what the Master’s presence would be like, – and then had tried not to do that for fear I would be hindering my realization of his actual presence! And so I had tried to go to him with only the thought of the love of God in my heart.

Suddenly all of the believers rose and faced the East. Then, from around the corner of the Tomb came the Master with two of the young men walking a little behind him. He came slowly toward us, – and said, “Welcome, welcome!” in English; and then, “Sit down, sit down!” Sylvia sat next to him; then Mabel Paine, myself, Cora, and Mrs. Hoagg. The other friends were beyond her, in two rows.

When the Master had walked toward us, it seemed to me that I had seen him come just that way at some previous time. He seemed to be so beautifully familiar to me! I suppose it must have seemed so because of the pictures I have seen of him, and the stories I have heard other pilgrims tell. It was a moment that one would prolong if one could, that one would never forget!

The Master began to speak in Persian, and Rúhí Effendi translated into English. He asked several questions; he talked of principles of living. Sometimes he would be silent for several minutes, – with his eyes looking far, far away. It is very difficult to remember much of what he said. Indeed, it was almost difficult to listen!

I wished only to look and look at the beauty of his face! For that was what impressed me first, – the exquisite beauty of the Master. It was like the most beautiful pictures we have of him, with life and color added. His is a face of living silver – the wonderful silver of hair and beard, and the blue of his eyes. The side face is majestic and sweet and loving. It was that which we saw most of the time. The full face is more dignified; {{p180}}to me it seemed more awe-inspiring. And yet, when he smiled, it was most exquisitely friendly, and human!

But he looked very, very tired. And one of the secretaries had said in the morning that he looked more rested than when he had gone up to the Tomb a few days before. It hurt poignantly that any face of such beauty should be so weary. We had brought letters from friends in America to give to him, but when we saw the weariness of his face, we could not bear to add at all to the burdens he has to carry.

And yet the weariness was not, I think, a weariness of spirit. I cannot tell why I felt that way, partly because he can reach, as no one else can, the infinite sources of spiritual strength.

I had no desire to speak to the Master; there was nothing that I could say. I do not know what happened in my mind and heart. There was no shock, no surprise, no sadness, no thought of my own faulty past. But I came to understand that for one who has been long in his presence, there can be no desire except to serve him; that one's life would be happy only as one pleased him; that one would be sad only as one grieved him. I felt then that I had begun to learn, – that the will to serve was becoming greater, as I had prayed that it might. Having seen the Master but once, I could make no promise to myself that that longing would carry me through and beyond all my selfish habits of the past. But I knew that to be in his presence would mean that I must love him, that I must do his will.

After a time, perhaps half an hour, some English visitors came; the Master begged to be excused; we rose and watched him until he disappeared from sight. Afterward we walked about the garden at the front of the Tomb. We saw the big reservoir for rain-water, built into the terrace, which supplies water for the garden and for many of the people of the neighborhood. MírzáLuṭfu'lláh brought us figs from one of the trees in the garden. We looked across the beautiful blue waters of the bay, to 'Akká, shining in the distance. We caught a suggestion of luxuriant growth of trees, and were told that it marked the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. The sun sank behind the mountain, and finally Mrs. Hoagg said it was time for us to be going down but that first we might see the interior of the Tomb.

The care-taker opened a door at the southwest corner of the Tomb, and spread a piece of matting in front of it. Mrs. Hoagg went with us to show us the custom used in entering the Tomb. We removed our shoes, and then the care-taker poured rose-water on our hands, from a little glass cruet. We followed Mrs. Hoagg into the first room. It was perhaps fifteen feet square, and the floor was covered with a beautiful dark Persian carpet. There was no furniture of any kind. Directly in line with the outer door was a second door that led into an inner room. That was also covered with beautiful rugs. Standing on the floor were exquisite glass vases with candles burning in them. They were in groups, perhaps of three, and they gave the impression of flowers of living flame. I think there must have been other objects, a few, in the room. But the whole impression was one of exquisite beauty, simplicity, and peace. The inner room was raised several inches above the outer, and the raised threshold was covered with an embroidered cloth.

Mrs. Hoagg walked slowly up to the threshold, knelt there a moment in prayer and then came back to a corner of the room. Cora followed her, and then came my turn. I had heard of the custom of prostrating oneself at the threshold of the Tomb, and I had wondered whether it would not seem stilted and formal. But it did not in the least! Perhaps it was the dignity and majesty of the Tomb, perhaps it was because we had been with the Master so recently. I was filled with a feeling of humility, with a longing to be "evanescent at His threshold," and the kneeling in prayer seemed the most natural thing in the world! After that moment at the threshold, I walked to the back of the room while Sylvia and Mabel in turn went forward. We knelt in prayer a long time. I cannot guess what was in the hearts of the others, but my own was filled with a great longing to lose my old selfish self, and to acquire the unselfishness of service. It was a wonderful time. I thought of that "radiant youth called the Báb," who had given everything, – friends, family, life itself, to prepare the way of the Lord. I thought of the Master and the years of imprisonment and hardship that he had spent in the service of the Blessed Beauty. For the first time, since coming to Haifa, I was almost ready to weep, – not from sorrow, but from the sense of the greatness of the power of God.

No thought of death entered my mind while I was there. It was not a place of mourning! When I thought of the Báb, it was to be happy that one so pure of heart had lived and served. The only grief was for my own faults and failures; and the future, with the hope of service, was much more vivid than the past!

Finally Mrs. Hoagg, Cora and I had left the Tomb. Mabel and Sylvia had not yet come out. We were about to put on our shoes, when suddenly the Master came around the corner! He smiled at us, and took up the cruet of rose-water. He held it out toward us, and I realized in a few moments that he wished to pour some on our hands. But I did not dream of going into the Tomb again, and so I did not realize what he meant! So he poured some on his own hands, put some on his face, and again held out the rose-water, giving us a glorious smile as he did so. That time we understood that he was waiting to anoint our hands, – and we gladly held them out for the fragrant drops. Mrs. Hoagg whispered, “We will go in again” – and just then the men believers came in a long line from the front of the Tomb. The Master anointed the hands of each, and they passed into the Tomb. Each knelt at the inner threshold a moment, until all had risen, and stood in a circle about {{p182}}the room. Then the Master spoke to Rúhí Effendi, who began to chant a long prayer, one of the Prayers of Visitation. His chanting was the sweetest, the most melodious of any I have ever heard. After the prayer the believers knelt at the threshold, and then passed quietly out. We four Americans were the last to leave, and as soon as we had left the Tomb, Mrs. Hoagg came to say that the Master was waiting to say good-bye to us. He stood at the northeast corner of the Tomb, and as we passed he shook hands with each of us, adding a caress for Sylvia. We turned and watched him as he walked back to the Tomb, waiting for the last glimpse! Then we walked down the mountain in the gathering dusk, and we were very happy. On the way down MírzáLuṭfu’lláh told us interesting stories of the spread of the Cause in Persia, of the self-sacrifice and patience of the believers in trying to bring others to see the Light of this day.

Of the Master’s talk on that first afternoon I can remember the following: He said that we were very welcome, and inquired whether we were well. Then almost immediately he asked about Mr. Vail. Mrs. Paine said, “He sends his love and longing. He wishes to do the Master’s will. “

CORA GRAY: “It is through his teaching that we are here.”

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ “You must be very grateful to him. He has been the cause of your life. He has educated you. He has no aim save to serve the Kingdom.

“Some people are ready for education. They are like the fertile ground. Some have not capacity, they are like the barren or salty ground. His Holiness Christ has told a story of the seed that fell on stony ground and so it could not grow. Other seeds fell in the shallow earth, and they soon withered away. But some fell on the good fertile earth, and grew and produced fruit. So it is with my words. Some fall on hearts that have no capacity; they do not take effect at all. Those people do not understand. Others hear and seem to understand, but they forget my words and do not live in accordance with them. But others have great capacity; they {{p183}}hear my words; they understand; they live accordingly.

“Have you seen JenabeFaḍil in America?”

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: “He is a very pure-hearted man. He is a real Bahá’í. He is confirmed in service. He who is confirmed is confirmed in all things. Of the Persians who have gone to America only two have been fully confirmed Bahá’ís – his honor, Abu’lFaḍl, and his honor, Faḍil. They are both very good.”

Then the Master told the story of MírzáAbu’lFaḍl, and the English ladies who insisted on seeing him! Finally, when they had knocked very persistently and continuously, MírzáAbu’lFaḍl became tired of hearing it, so he went to the door, and said, “Abu’lFaḍl is not here.” Up to this point in the story, the Master had been speaking in Persian or Arabic, and Rúhí Effendi had been interpreting, but when the Master came to this part, he spoke in English, very distinctly, and then repeated it, “Abu’lFaḍl is not here!” and then he smiled the most adorable smile!

When we first saw the Master, he asked whether we had had any troubles or difficulties on the way. Cora replied that if we had had any, we had now forgotten all of them.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: “There is a Persian poet who says that when one has attained to the goal of one’s journey, the end of one’s search, he forgets all that has happened on the way.”

Cora said that the friends in Alexandria and Cairo had been so kind to us, and had helped us so much.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: “That is the duty of any Bahá’í. He is greater who serves most. That is the way to progress. Some flowers have color and no fragrance. Some have both fragrance and color; some have neither. So it is with the hearts of men.”

September 3, 1920

On September 3d we did not see the Master at all, for he was still up on Mt. Carmel. I was very, very happy, with a calm peace. During the morning I wrote in my diary. In the afternoon we had tea with the ladies at the Master’s house. Some one told Mrs. Paine to sit in the big wicker chair at the end of the room, and she was happy to sit in the Master’s chair. I talked to TúbáKhánúm for a time, mostly about education. Her daughter, Soraya, is to go to Cairo, to the Protestant School for Girls this year, and TúbáKhánúm was saying how much they disliked to have to send their children away from home. But the schools in Haifa are not advanced enough for study beyond the age of fourteen or fifteen. She said, “We like to have our children at home in the evening in order that we may give them some spiritual teaching ourselves.” I could faintly imagine the loss to those children from separation from the lovely daughters of the Master! TúbáKhánúm said that the previous year Soraya had been in a girl’s school in Beirut. She had been eager to go, for{{p166}}evidently life is a very restricted affair for a girl in Haifa! But this fall Soraya was not quite so eager to go to Cairo. Perhaps she had begun to realize how different her home in the Master's household is from the ordinary places of living!

We told the ladies that we hoped some of their children would come to America to study. But of course they think that a very long way from home to send them. Shoghi Effendi is now in England, just ready to enter Oxford, and Rúhánges, his sister, is to enter some college for girls there. TúbáKhánúm, and, on another day, RúhákHánúm, spoke of their hope of the founding of a Bahá'í School on Mt. Carmel. They are so sweetly appreciative and kind; they act as though the person to whom they are talking had all beautiful characteristics, – and one longs to arise to meet that faith with deeds! TúbáKhánúm made me feel that way, when in speaking of a future Bahá'í school on Mt. Carmel, she said, "When such a school is founded I hope you may come and teach in it." What could be more wonderful! But one would have to "live the life" perfectly in order to be worthy to teach in such a school.

After a time Mrs. Paine told me to come over to sit in the wicker chair. That brought me near dear RúhákHánúm and the Holy Mother. They talked to me about education. The Holy Mother said that when I was teaching my classes I could show forth Bahá'í love and kindness, even though I could not directly give the Bahá'í teachings. Besides, she said, there were many of the Bahá'í teachings that I could mention in class, even though I did not label them "Bahá'í."

The Holy Mother is very, very sweet. She is quiet, calm, giving one the impression that no disturbance ever ruffles the evenness of her life. Her voice is low, and yet assured. There is a "sweet reasonableness" in it that seems to say, "Why be impatient? All will be well in God's good time!" She makes me think of the verse in the Hidden Words, "Be contented with what we have ordained for thy sake. This is for thy good if thou art content with it." The Holy Mother is content with His will. She was not in the group of prisoners who were exiled to 'Akká in 1868, but came from Persia with her brother. The journey was very hard. Much of the time she had to sleep at night in the same room with several men, and therefore she had to wear a veil at night, as well as in the daytime. Imagine the faith and courage of a young woman, who would come all that journey of months, through wild countries, in order that she might enter the Prison City, and marry – a Prisoner! When she reached 'Akká, the Bahá'ís had been removed from the barracks, and were living in a small house, one we saw when we visited 'Akká. One can only faintly imagine the warmth of the greeting she must have received when she came to be the wife of the beloved Greatest Branch! At that time the Master must have been twenty-seven or eight years old. We know that even then he was the comfort and joy of the whole Bahá'í colony!

One of the ladies apologized because they had not been over to the Pilgrim House to call on us, for they had been unusually busy. There is much to be done in that big household, and in addition, two or three of the children had been quite ill. I think it was RúhákHánúm who was saying that they wanted to see more of us, and she continued, "One should go and call on one's guests – and yet we do not!” Then she smiled and said, “But you are not our guests! You are members of our family!” What sweeter hospitality could one desire!

I have mentioned the big wicker chair at the end of the room. However, I never saw the Master sit in it! Whenever we saw him in that room, he sat in a corner of one of the divans, – always in the same place.

I think it was this same afternoon that the ladies took us out and showed us the garden. The whole plot of ground upon which the house stands is from one-third to one-half an acre in size, and all of it is a beautifully cared-for garden, except for the parts where buildings actually stand. (There is nothing comparable in it to our American lawns of grass!)

The garden has all been made since 1911 or 1912, by one faithful Bahá’í who loves to serve the Master in that way. I think many of the seeds, cuttings, etc., have been sent by Bahá’ís from various parts of the world. The result of the gardener’s work is a lovely place. Flowers, fruits and vegetables of many varieties grow there. We saw peaches, lemons, and pomegranates hanging on the trees. The pomegranates were just ripening and one of the ladies picked some for us to taste. There were two varieties, a sweet kind, that everyone likes, and a rather sour kind which reminded us of our red currants. Cora and I liked its sharp tartness, but most of the others did not care for it. The pomegranates are a beautiful fruit, with their dozens and dozens of bright red drops, crowded together within the reddish-yellow rind.

The Greatest Holy Leaf walked about several of the garden paths, looking at all the plants and trees. Some one told us that that was the first time in months that she had been in the garden! Apparently the ladies seldom go into the garden, because there are always men about who do not belong to the immediate family! And the Master says it is still not the time for the Bahá’í women in Haifa to go contrary to the custom of the country with regard to veiling when strange men are about. The ladies are longing for the time to come when they can lay aside the warm black veil!

To return to the garden: Several of the paths have trellises over them, with vines which make them very lovely. Above the main gateway there is a big bougonvillea plant which was covered with many blossoms when we were there. Beneath one of the arbors, against the house, and just below the Master’s window, was a garden-bench, where the friends often sat and talked. Cora and I went over there and sat for an hour two or three times, drinking in the beauty and peace. I had heard much of the Master’s garden, and I was so happy to see it with my own eyes!

At dinner that Friday evening the friends were very merry. There was a constant chatter, laughter, and teasing! MírzáBadi‘ (who is interpreter for the English governor) sat next to Mrs. Hoagg, and they carried on a gay conversation. He has the nicest face, and his eyes twinkle with fun all the time!

We had watermelon for dessert. When the Master is not there to give the signal for leaving the table, it is the custom for all to watch until every one has finished eating; then all rise at once. But that evening, Malcolm and Mírzá{p188} Luṭfu'lláh lingered over their watermelon longer than the others! – I think Mrs. Hoagg and MírzáBadi' were responsible for flashing a signal down the table, that we should rise and leave them there! So some twenty-three people rose and looked on while Malcolm and MírzáLuṭfu'lláh finished their watermelon, while everyone laughed at them! We were all like the simplest children who had played a prank on two playmates!

All day Friday we had been wondering when the Master would come down from the mountain. We were eager for him to come because we knew that we should see more of him then. – And yet, remembering how tired he had looked, I could not help but wish he might stay longer in the quiet peace near the Tomb, in the hope that he might become more rested.

All that day I had been very happy and content not to see him, but as the evening came on I began to long to see his beautiful face again! And so I could not help but be happy when we heard that he was coming down the next morning – that Esfendiar was to go up for him sometime between six and seven! And so I went to sleep in our quiet room in the Pilgrim House, rejoicing that on the morrow we should see him again.

September 4, 1920.

On Saturday morning, Cora and I rose in the darkness of 4:30 a.m., dressed, and by 5:15 we were on our way up the mountain toward the Tomb of the Báb. That early hour was a bit too late, for even then we found the climb warm, and the sun rose before we had reached the Tomb. We stopped to watch its glorious arising from behind the Lebanon hills. There were enough clouds to make a really beautiful sunrise. The valley of 'Akká was radiant, and the river winding through it gleamed silver! It looked, in its outward physical seeming, “a door of hope!” We continued up the hillside to the Tomb. As we passed the caretaker's house, he saw us, and by a gesture, asked whether we wished to enter his house. Perhaps he thought we had come up to see the Master, whom we knew was either in the house or at the Tomb. But we motioned toward the Tomb. He smiled, and preceding us, opened the west door into the room where we had been on Thursday. Then he quietly departed.

The candles were not lighted and the central room was not quite so beautiful on that account. But a soft light filtered in through the doors, – and the exquisite peace filled our hearts. We stayed for perhaps an hour, in meditation and prayer.

It must have been after seven when we went out into the garden. We walked about a bit, and then Rúhí Effendi and MírzáLuṭfu'lláh came out to wish us good-morning. On the previous evening we had told Rúhí Effendi that we were going up to the Tomb early in the morning. But when he saw us there, he said, "You really came! I didn't think you would! Americans never get up early!" At which we laughed much! Rúhí Effendi's English is very good, – but sometimes a phrase or some slang expression is used which he does not understand. He looks courteously questioning, half surprised, and waits for some one to explain!

The two young men talked to us for a few minutes, and then asked whether we would like to see the circle of cypress trees where BAHÁ 'ULLAH used to sit. Of course we wanted to see them, and so MírzáLuṭfu'lláh went with us, while Rúhí Effendi went to the caretaker's house. I wondered whether the Master had already gone down the mountain, and decided that he probably had, because it was after seven.

MírzáLuṭfu'lláh led us up a path, onto a terrace back of the Tomb, and there we saw the circle of cypress trees. There are ten of them, planted quite close together so that their boughs interlace, forming an almost solid wall. They are on a bit of ground which is raised about three feet from the surrounding field, and is held up by a stone wall. We went up into the circle of ground between the trees. Above our heads was a small circle of blue sky. The ground was brown with needles from the trees. I thought of the Blessed Beauty, and was glad that at one time in His storm-tossed life He had been able to withdraw to that quiet green spot. But we had been there only a few minutes, when Rúhí Effendi came toward us, calling that the Master wished to see us! And we went on eager feet, following Rúhí Effendi to 'Abbás Kuli's house. ('Abbás Kuli is the caretaker of the Tomb of the Báb.)

Cora was ahead of me, and she told me afterward that when she entered the room where the Master was sitting on a divan, she was not sure what to do! He bade her welcome, but still she stood in the doorway! Then he rose, held out his hands and motioned her to a chair. She went and sat down. Just then I came in, and the Master motioned me to a chair beside Cora. I cannot remember whether he shook hands with us or not. (Usually he shook hands with us when we left him, but not when we came into his presence.) MírzáLuṭfu'lláh and Rúhí Effendi sat by the door, and a tall Persian or Turkish man sat near us.

The room we were in had a north window, which looked out over the Bay of 'Akká. Like all windows in the eastern houses, it had several iron bars across it to keep out intruders. The house is high on the hillside and there was a wonderful view across the bay. The Master sat on a divan in front of the window, and occasionally arranged some letters and other small objects, which {{p196}}he finally put into a small handbag. As he did this, he talked to us. He said, "This location here by the Tomb is very beautiful. "

We said, "Yes, we enjoy it greatly."

Then he talked to us a little about the Báb. He said, "After the Báb was martyred, his body was kept in Persia for several years. It was never kept in the same place for more than a few years. Not many of the friends, even, knew where it was at any one time. After a long time it was brought here to Haifa, and placed in the Tomb on Mt. Carmel."

Cora asked how long ago it was brought here. I think the Master's reply was, about twenty-four or five years ago.

Cora asked MírzáLuṭfu'lláh to say that we hoped that the Master was feeling more rested.

He replied, No, he was not rested, but that did not matter. And his expression implied that physical weariness was a matter of small concern.

'Abbás Kuli brought to the Master a little tray with a teapot full of what looked like tea. The Master poured out some and drank it, explaining that it was a kind of herb drink. Then 'Abbás Kuli brought us tea in the lovely little Persian glasses. Afterward he came in with a tray full of things to eat and placed it on a chair in front of us. The Master told us to eat. "He says you must eat your breakfast here," MírzáLuṭfu'lláh interpreted. We did not really want to eat – when we could be looking at the Master – but at his command we ate a little. The tray had on it ripe figs, ripe olives, honey, and slices of white bread, – and the latter were the only slices of white bread we saw on our whole journey! I ate one or two figs, and a few olives. After a time the tray was passed to the tall Oriental next to us. Thus we had breakfast with the Master at the Tomb of the Báb! As we ate he was silent, looking out of the window upon the sea of 'Akká. His beautiful profile was outlined against the window; his gaze seemed to dwell on distant 'Akká, – and I could not but think of those long years of imprisonment that he had spent in barred 'Akká. Some slight vision of all he had suffered swept over me. I knew then, beyond all question, that I had found him as the Master. My spirit knelt in humility at his feet.

After a while he gave the bag he had been arranging to Rúḥí Effendi, and said that he was ready to go down the mountain. We followed him from the house to where Esfendiar was waiting with the carriage. We had expected to walk down the mountain, but after the Master had ascended to the middle seat, he motioned to us to get in the back seat. And so Cora and I rode down Mt. Carmel with the Lord of our hearts. No word was said, but we were very happy. At the gate of his house he alighted, and, saluting us with uplifted hand, he left us and entered his home!

At the Pilgrim House we found Rúḥí Effendi and MírzáLuṭfu'lláh, who had walked down and were there before us. Then we ate of the breakfast that Fugeta had prepared!

September 6, 1920

September 5, 1920.

This morning all of us had finished breakfast at about 7:45 and were sitting at the table talking. No, MírzáMuḥammad Said had not finished; he had just come in, and was waiting for Fugeta to bring him some tea. Suddenly, Mrs. Hoagg said, "The Master is coming!" She had seen him pass the window! We all rose, just as he entered the door. He came in like a ray of light and life. He sat down at the end of the table, bade us be seated; told Fugeta to give Said Effendi his breakfast. But Said Effendi did not eat! He drank the tea Fugeta brought, because, as he said later – that was not so hard to do, but he could not eat toast and eggs while the Master was speaking! We quite {{p197}}understood his feeling, as we remembered our experience at the Tomb yesterday morning!

The Master said that he hoped we were well and very happy. Then he asked again if we were well.

Mrs. Paine said, "We are all very well except Sylvia, who was a little ill in the night, but that is not serious."

‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: "I hope she will soon be well."

Sylvia smiled and nodded and the Master said, "That will soon pass away and you will be well again." Then he continued, "Your food and rooms are very simple here, but your purpose in coming here makes them seem good to you. When a man is good, all things about him are good. When a man is bad, all things about him are bad. It is necessary that man be very good. "

After a pause the Master said, "You have come here, and every day you try to improve. You try to improve more each day. You must become pure in heart. Then when you return to America, you must carry spirituality and inspiration with you. You must be like Jacob, who inhaled the fragrance of the garment of Joseph from a distance. But more than that, you must be one who carries the garment, who spreads the fragrances of the Spirit."

Turning to Mrs. Hoagg, the Master told her to take us to church this morning. Then he continued by saying, "The purpose of going to the church should be to worship. Turn your hearts to God and worship Him. One can worship God anywhere, in a church, in a mosque, in all places. But here I hope that you will go to the church. "

Then he rose, smiled on us, said "Goodbye," and walked from the room, and down the steps. We went to the door, and watched him till he disappeared behind the wall.

I think that neither Cora nor myself had said a word all the time he was with us. I do not know how she felt, but for me, there simply was nothing that I could say. To be in his presence, to look on the beauty of his face, to listen to his voice, was all I wished to do. I do not know how or why, but in his presence, all life is lifted higher; it acquires freshness and beauty.

MírzáLuṭfu'lláh translated the Master's words in this talk.

Following the Master's request, we attended the little Episcopal chapel which is near the Pilgrim House. After our return from there, we called on RúḥáKhánúm for almost an hour, and such a happy time as we had! Her house is just next the Master's, so that she can easily help entertain the Master's guests, and yet look after her own household. She and her two sisters talked with us often, giving us wonderful stories about the Cause and instructing us in many ways. That day she told us about the Master's life, during the Great War; how he gave food, money and encouragement to all those who sought his help, no matter what their race or religion. The people of the household lived on the simplest food in order that they might have food to share with the hundreds who came begging for bread. She told us, too, how few letters and papers came from the friends all over the world, and how they longed for news of the welfare of the Bahá'ís in the different countries.

That afternoon after tea, we went over to the Master's house and talked with the ladies for a short time. Then word came that the carriage was ready to take us up the mountain, for the regular Sunday afternoon meeting. TúbáKhánúm, and one of her sons, Soheil, went with us. In front of the Tomb many of the friends were gathered; more than forty, I think. For a time we talked with the people near us. Then MírzáLuṭfu'lláh brought out the large guest book, and asked us to write in it our names, addresses, the date of our arrival in Haifa, and some word of greeting. Cora wrote, {{p198}} "The valley of Achor shall be unto them for a door of hope." Mrs. Paine wrote, "Beautiful beyond compare is Mount Carmel, the joy of the whole earth." And I added the sentence from the Hidden Words which I love so much, "Lift up thy heart with delight." On that mountain one learns so much about why one should "lift up one's heart with delight."

In a short time the Master came from around the eastern corner of the Tomb, followed by little Fu'ad. The Master was radiantly beautiful. He wore a dove-colored overcoat or wrap, for the wind was cool on the mountain-side. Fu'ad was dressed in a stiffly starched white dress, and made a staunch little body-guard for the Master. (Some one told us that one night Fu'ad went up to the Master after supper and said, "You go to bed now and rest. I will take my gun and lie across the threshold. If any thieves come, I will scare them away!")

The Master gave us the talk about Elijah, which MírzáLuṭfu'lláh took down in Persian, and later translated into English, so that we might have a copy of it. At the Tomb that day Mírzá 'Azíz 'Ulláh interpreted for us.

As always the beauty of the Master's face, its power and majesty, held my attention so that it was difficult to listen to what he said. After the talk, the door at the west end of the Tomb was opened, and we all filed past the Master, who anointed our hands with rose-water. Never again will we be able to inhale that special rose fragrance, without the memory of that western entrance and the Master at the door, coming to our minds!

The candles were burning in the glass vases; there was utter stillness except when the Tablet was being chanted; and, as on the previous afternoon, my heart was won by the peace and glory of the place. While the tall, black-robed Bahá'í from Eskabad chanted the prayer of Visitation in Persian, the Master stood in the doorway, and the room was filled with a divine radiance of Love. At the threshold of that Tomb one may lay all burdens down. Life becomes simple and straight because one feels surrounded with Divine Love.

After the meeting in the Tomb the carriage took us back down to the Pilgrim House, and then returned to bring the Master. Cora and I watched for his return for a long time, while the quick twilight faded into darkness. Soon above us, on the mountain, there shone out the light in front of the Tomb, which is lighted every night unless there is very brilliant moonlight. At last, the carriage drew up before the door of the Master's house, and we caught a glimpse of white as he swept down from the high seat, and we heard the murmur of his greeting to the men who were sitting in front of the gate, waiting for the call to go in to dinner. So do all the pilgrims linger near his house, hoping that they may but glimpse his face as he passes by them.

That night at dinner, the Master said, "I hope the health of the friends is good. Today you went to visit the shrine (the Tomb of the Báb). Are you happy?" His smile, his care for our happiness and comfort, would have made any one happy, and our smiles of reply must have been bright enough to show him a little of how happy we were!

For dessert that night we had grapes, although on every other night we had watermelon. While we were eating the grapes, he said, "His Holiness Christ once was eating grapes. He said, 'I will not eat of the fruit of the vine again until I eat it with you in the Kingdom.' But the grape of the Kingdom is other than these grapes. In the Kingdom there is no bread like this. Now also, I say to you all, we will eat together of the divine bounties, God willing, in the Kingdom, – that is, divine food, heavenly food. Its taste is everlasting. Its sustenance is everlasting. God willing, there we all together will eat of that heavenly food."

September 6, 1920

On Sunday afternoon the Master said to us, "Tomorrow, I am sending you to 'Akká!' and his smile was light itself.

We left the Pilgrim House at about 8:00 a. m. Zia Khánum, Mehranges, Riaz, of the Master's household and Esfendiar, called for us. Mrs. Hoagg and we four people added five more to the group. With joy in our hearts we began the two hours' drive to 'Akká. Down through the narrow streets we rode, and then eastward past the railway station. We passed through a grove of tall palm trees, and down to the shore. At last! that beautiful “way of the sea,” toward the Holy City, ‘Akká! How often we had read of the journey along the white sand, where the horses’ hoofs play in and out of the water, as they follow the hard-packed sand at the sea’s very edge. We watched the waves rush up and then back, sweeping with them tiny sea animals. We passed trains of camels and donkeys, all on that universal highway “not made with hands.”

We thought of all the happy, longing pilgrims who have gone to ‘Akká by that same “way.” Doubly happy were we that our Master was living safely in his own house in Haifa, and not as a prisoner in ‘Akká!

Always ahead of us was a glimpse of ‘Akká, which shone more clearly as our three horses trotted along the shore. To the East, the hills of Lebanon were purple in the distance.

As we neared ‘Akká, Mrs. Hoagg pointed out the walls, the gate, the cemetery where some of the Bahá’ís of that group of exiles are buried. Finally, Zia Khánum pointed out the tower of the barracks.

Outside the gate we halted, for one of our horses had lost a shoe. The blacksmith was sitting under a tree, with his tools about him. But at Esfendiar’s request he came and put on the needed shoe. While we waited, we looked at the high wall of the city, which showed how much a prison city it had been. The walls were high and thick; the gate was small, and beyond the outer wall was a second inner wall. A long train of camels passed us, going into the city, and one tiny donkey, heavily loaded, came out! People in oriental garb drifted by us, and glanced at us curiously, but not in unfriendly fashion. I remembered the showers of stones from small boys with which the Bahá’í pilgrims to ‘Akká used to be greeted, and I meditated on the changes that time brings!

We entered the gate, passed between the two walls for a distance, and on into the town. Esfendiar stopped the horses at the foot of a long flight of steps. It was the way to the barracks. At the head of the stairway a soldier met us, and conducted us about, for the barracks are now occupied by a few soldiers. This man looked like an Arab, but he was under British orders, I think. He led us through many winding passages, showing us several places in which we had no special interest. But finally he led the way to the tower on the west side of the court, the tower where BAHÁ ULLAH was imprisoned for two long years. Zia Khánum told us of the various places associated with Bahá’í history. She showed us the room where BAHÁULLAH had lived, the window from which He had looked out upon the plain of ‘Akká. She showed us the rooms where the immediate family had lived, and the roof from which the Purest Branch fell. The rooms were small, rude; a sad exchange for the royal palaces of Persia, as far as physical comfort was concerned. Yet joy was there, because they might suffer hardship in the service of God. To have been there in the days of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH – for that privilege one might have been able to bear much!

Afterwards we crossed the large court, {{p203}} and saw the pool, or reservoir, in the center, from which the exiles obtained the slimy water which was their only drink during the first twenty-four hours of their imprisonment! On the south side of the court we saw the rooms where most of the exiles were imprisoned. They are like rather wide and long corridors. At present they are quite well lighted, but Mrs. Hoagg said that the British have changed them a great deal, and have let in much more light. When she first saw them, they were very dark and gloomy. And in the days of the Turkish rule, they must have been very dirty, unwholesome and dark. Here, amid all manner of privations and sufferings, the band of exiles praised God for having led them to believe in His greatest and newest Manifestation. As we walked about the barracks, Zia Khánúm told us stories of those early days, making them live again, for our instruction.

After we left the barracks, a few moments' drive brought us to another house where the Bahá'ís had been imprisoned. Bahá'í families live in it now, and they welcomed us with sweet kindness. We saw the little room where BAHÁ'U'LLÁH lived for seven years. In an adjoining house, which now seems to be a part of the first house, the holy family lived for many years more. There BAHÁ'U'LLÁH'S room has been left as it was when He used it. The windows overlook the sea; to the south there is a view of distant Haifa; to the north, the plain of 'Akká. I think BAHÁ'U'LLÁH practically never left the house while they lived there. We hear of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's caring for the physical needs of the friends, as well as it could be done under the very difficult conditions; engaging in trade that he might have money with which to equip a bath; in all ways constantly serving his father!

It was to the smaller of these two houses that the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá came from Persia. I am not sure, but I think that some of the daughters were born there.

In the family of Bahá'ís who care for these two houses, we met a woman, Sakineh Sulṭán, whose husband, at the age of twenty, was martyr in Persia! When we were there she was probably over fifty years of age. A few years ago her daughter died leaving a baby boy, Labib, for whom she is now caring.

Whenever one is with these Bahá'ís who have been intimately associated with BAHÁ'U'LLÁH or 'Abdu'l-Bahá, one marvels at the spirit of service and self-sacrifice they show. We longed to acquire in its fullness that attitude of evanescent service.

It was after eleven when we left the city of 'Akká behind us, and drove toward the Riḍván. We went north of the city wall, toward the east. By strange track-like roads we drove, past gardens walled with cactus plants. It was perhaps a mile and a half or two miles before we came to the Garden, – the Riḍván. Just before we reached it we turned to the south, and the road followed a little stream. We passed a water-wheel, turned by a small donkey, and later we saw the water he had pumped, as it fell from a fountain in the garden.

At the gate we left the carriage, and Esfendiar unharnessed the horses that they might have a well-earned rest.

How I had longed to see the Riḍván at ‘Akká! That spot between “the two rivers,” that garden on an island! It is a place of beauty and peace. Tall palm trees, pomegranate trees loaded with ripe fruit, beautiful vines bearing many-colored blossoms, – all add to the beauty of the Riḍván. From the fountain, streams of water run to the north, south, east and west, watering the plants.

But the place of most wonderful associations {p204} is the spot on the side of the stream, where the two great mulberry trees form the “tent not made with hands,” “over land and water.” There, in the later days, the Blessed Beauty used to sit beneath the trees. It is a place of rest and peace. The troublous world seems very far away. Love and peace are in the wind, in the soft rustling of leaves, and the murmur of the water.

Our lunch was spread on a rug beneath one of the mulberry trees. We ate of the Persian foods from the Master’s household, of the fruits from the Riḍván. We were utterly content to sit in that heavenly place and watch Riaz, and another small boy who had come with us from ‘Akká, sail boats down the tiny stream from the fountain.

After lunch we all rested for an hour or more, after which we had tea. It was too sweet a place to leave, but the hours were passing, and the supreme goal of our day was still ahead of us, – the visit to the Tomb of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH. And so we left the Riḍván, with the prayer in our hearts that we might come again to that lovely garden of our Lord.

We drove to the north, across the rolling ‘Akká plain, till the Bahjé appeared before us. Here BAHÁ’U’LLÁH lived after He left ‘Akká, still technically a prisoner, but permitted to live among trees and flowers, instead of being shut in by the dark prison walls. At the Bahjé we turned westward, and soon rounded the corner of a long, low building, where the caretaker of the Tomb lives, SiyyidAbu’l-Cassim. There we alighted, and Zia Khánum indicated a small gate into the garden. Slowly, with wonder in our hearts, we followed the path through the garden to the door of the Tomb. In the little outer room we removed our shoes. A short flight of steps brought us into the large room of the Tomb.

We found ourselves in a large room, with a garden in the center. At the west end were several windows, and floods of light poured down upon us from the glass windows in the roof. In the north-west corner of the room, a curtained door led into the Tomb itself.

Zia Khánum drew aside the curtain but the door was closed. We knelt in the space before the door, and Zia Khánum chanted the prayer of Visitation. I tried to remember the words of the Tablet of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH, “Cause me to drink of the cup of evanescence, clothe me in its mantle and immerse me in its sea, “ but my mind seemed almost a blank. I remember the promise that the prayer one prays in all sincerity at the Tomb of BAHÁ’U’LLÁH shall be answered. With my whole heart I prayed for “evanescence” at His Threshold, and for the power to serve His Cause. Then I prayed for various people I knew, who were in need of a vision of the greatness of God's love. And then for the Bahá'í friends in America. . . .

And how I longed to enter that closed door, into the Tomb itself! I remembered that. . . . and. . . . had been inside and that they had been somewhat surprised at being led in, for they knew that people were not always permitted to enter there. I realized how very far short I fell of the purity of heart of that party of pilgrims. I knew that the Master gives to each one what he most needs. And so it was as though the Master said to me, "You have not yet learned enough to appreciate the atmosphere of that inner room. Live the life; serve the Cause; achieve purity of heart. Then perhaps if you return here, the rewards of the pure in heart will be yours!" And with my whole mind and spirit I pledged myself to the accomplishment of that task.

We were in prayer at the threshold of the Holy Tomb of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH for a long time. Finally Zia Khánum went out toward the outer door. We followed her, ready to leave that place of light. But she returned, went to the front of the room, and opened the curtained door. I do not know why she did it; perhaps Mrs. Hoagg reminded her that it was our visit to the Tomb. But I am sure that in some way, the Master's will entered into it. When I fully accepted his will for me as my guide, "acquiesced," then my desire was granted.

The heavy curtains at some of the windows were pulled back, and the setting sun poured a radiant glory of light into the room. "His resting-place shall be glorious" – with torrents of physical light, as well as with spiritual glory. I do not know how long we knelt there. Time's passing ceased for us. My very breathing was a dedication of myself to our glorious leader, BAHÁ'U'LLÁH.

Our drive home was a silent one. I think we were all rather weary, physically, from our long day. But the spiritual significance of all we had seen filled us with so much to think about, that we had no desire for speech.

The sun set in the blue waters of the Mediterranean, in a majesty of color. Darkness came down and shut us in on that crescent sea-shore. The horses sped along through the darkness, toward the distant lights of Haifa. We were eager to be again in the Master's presence.

We reached Haifa a short time before the dinner-hour, weary, but happy. At dinner that evening the Master said, "Did you have a happy day in 'Akká?" And we replied, "Oh, yes, it is a day we shall always remember!"

He replied, "You must always remember it! It must be like images cut in tablets of stone!"

That evening as he bade us good-night, after dinner, he said in his dear, measured English, "Go – and rest! Go – and rest!"

By the Master's love for us, we know something of the love of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH. And from the love of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH we know of the Love of the Infinite Father, whose voice comes to us through the Supreme Pen: "I knew My Love in thee, therefore I created thee; upon thee I laid My Image, and to thee revealed My Beauty. * * * I loved thy creation, therefore I created thee. Wherefore love Me that I may acknowledge thee and in the Spirit of Life confirm thee."

September 8, 1920.

On the morning of September 8th, I went alone to the Tomb of the Báb at sunrise. Cora had not been sleeping well, and so she did not feel like rising at 4:30 that day. But I woke, dressed and was almost to the Tomb before the sun rose. When his full splendor began to loom above the horizon, I sat down on a stone in the field below the MossaferKhaneh (Pilgrim's House), and watched the lord of day cast his first light across the valley of 'Akká.

After a time I went on up to the Tomb, {{p212}} passing along the path with its beautiful cypress trees. At the Tomb I entered the room on the east side, and stayed there in prayer and meditation for almost an hour. The tall Bahá'í from Eskabad came in and knelt in prayer for some time, and then chanted. After he had gone, a younger man whom I did not know came in and chanted very softly and sweetly. He went out and I was alone for some time. The folds of the long veil I wore fell about my face and shoulders, and seemed to shut me in with God. His radiant Presence was very near.

I tried to fill my heart with the exquisite beauty and peace of that heavenly place, for I knew that was my last morning on the mountain. I knew that many and many would be the times that I would long to be kneeling at that Threshold.

Finally I knew that it was time to be going down the mountain. Just as I was leaving the Tomb, MírzáLuṭfu'lláh came in. I went out into the garden, and walked about a bit, drinking in the beauty of flowers, hills, water, and sky. Soon MírzáLuṭfu'lláh came out and bade me good-morning. Then he suggested that we gather jasmine blossoms to take down to the Pilgrim House. So we pulled off dozens of the fragrant flowers, and filled our pockets and handkerchiefs with them. Later we strewed them on the breakfast table. MírzáLuṭfu'lláh said that he used to fill a basket full of blossoms, stripping the bushes each morning. He took the basket to the Master, who scattered them everywhere he went.

About 7:00 a. m. we started down the mountain. MírzáLuṭfu'lláh had a stone-bruise on his heel, and was wearing a loose slipper and carrying a cane; but never once did I hear him complain about it. Instead he talked of how the Master works, with no thought of physical fatigue. He works all day long, interviewing callers, etc. He goes to bed possibly by 9:00 or 9:30, but often he is up again at midnight, chanting and praying. Then he may correct Tablets for a while, and then sleep two or three hours more. And at perhaps 6:00 a. m. he rises for the day's work! Apparently he averages not more than four to six hours of sleep a night! So his whole life is given to the service of mankind.

MírzáLuṭfu'lláh said, "The real Bahá'í activity is not to stay here in the light of the Master's love. It is to go out into the world and spread his message of service. Be happy that you are going out to work for him."

But at another time he said, "Pray for us who live here in the Master's household. We have many temptations to guard against. We must never become impatient or give way to any depression. Not long ago when the Master was speaking to us, he said, 'You must be an example to all who come here. In you they must see what a real Bahá'í should be.' So we need your prayers that we may live up to that work."

We had thought of the great joy of being a member of the Master's family, but then we began to realize that only those of great unselfishness may be his helpers there in Haifa.

On that beautiful morning we entered the Pilgrim House before breakfast was quite ready, and strewed the jasmine blossoms over the table.

The Master came in after breakfast, and stayed only a few minutes. He smiled at us all, and we were very happy to be near him. He asked especially about Mrs. George's health. He said a few words to her, smiled at all of us, and then rose and left us. We all went to the door and watched him as he disappeared through our gate.

After breakfast we went over into the Master's garden, and waited for an opportunity to talk with him for a few moments. After a while RúḥáKhánúm called Mabel and Sylvia in to see him. While they were gone we stood talking with Mrs. Hoagg and some of the young men. I shall not forget the look on Mrs. Hoagg's face when she spoke of the Master's longing for unity among the friends. His only happiness is to know of the increase of unity among the believers, and of their spreading the Cause. His face always becomes sad if he hears of any contention or lack of harmony. "If people in America could see the Master, could realize how he works, they would never do anything to sadden him," she said. When one is in the Master's presence it seems utterly impossible that one should ever do anything that would sadden, or make any heavier the load of work he carries! "In the light of his holy presence, all desire dies save the desire to be like him."

Later in the morning Cora and I were called in to see the Master. RúḥáKhánúm translated for us. We gave the Master the letters we had brought from American friends. We asked him to bless the ringstones and rosaries we had bought at MírzáEnyat 'Ullah's shop. He took them in his hands, said a few words that must have been a prayer, kissed them, and handed them back to us. And so we brought back to America Bahá'í ringstones, made doubly precious by his touch of love.

The Master said that he was sorry not to have seen us more, but that he had been very busy while we were there. "But," he continued, "it is not the length of time that one spends here that is important. Some people stay a short time, and then go and do great service. Other people are here a long time, and they learn nothing. There is some wood that is very dry: it catches fire quickly and burns well. There is other wood that is so wet that it will not burn even though you should try for a whole day. There is no result but smoke. It will not blaze, it will not keep any one warm; it will not even cook anything!" As he said the latter he smiled. But when RúháKhánum translated it, Cora laughed out loud. That seemed to delight the Master, for he laughed very heartily with the most unaffected enjoyment.

Cora asked how one should teach the Bahá'í Movement to our United States southerners, among whom race-prejudice is so strong. He said, "Go slowly at first. Be kind and courageous and patient. Live the Bahá'í life among these people. Do not mind if they oppose you. Their prejudice is so strong. It is like a religion. But when they become Bahá'ís they will be very good and sincere ones. But at first teach the principles and be kind to them. The rest will follow in time."

After this we went and talked with some of the ladies of the household. Soon the Master called for Mabel and Sylvia, and gave Sylvia a Bahá'í name, Badia which means "something new and wonderful." We were not present when he gave her the name, but Mabel said that he walked up and down the room, radiating power and love.

When Sylvia came back with her new name, the Holy Mother brought out a box of candy, in honor of Sylvia's nameday. The candy was white with a little chocolate center. Bringing it out in Sylvia's honor was one of the sweetest, kindest acts of simple thoughtfulness that we saw in Haifa. Needless to say, Sylvia Badia Paine was a very happy girl that day.

It was on that morning that the Greatest Holy Leaf showed us the pictures of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH and the Báb. We had already seen pictures of the Báb, and so I think most of our attention was centered on the photograph of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH. The pictured face was of dignity, power and majesty. But the feeling of the power, the glory, the supreme Reality of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH which came to me in Haifa, did not come from seeing His photograph. That Reality is living and vibrant in the unselfish lives of the friends; it makes radiant the atmosphere of the Tomb on Mt. Carmel and the Tomb at Bahjí; it shines from the Master's eyes.{{p214}}

Later in the morning Cora and I were sitting on a bench in the garden, just below the window of the Master's writing-room. Occasionally his voice floated down to us, as he dictated or talked with a caller. Once he came out of the house, and walked to the corner of the garden, where some masonry was being done. Soon he returned, and his voice was again heard from his room. Such brief glimpses made us very happy, for he radiates such life that one is lifted toward supreme joy just to know he is near. In his Essence he is so detached from earthly things, he is so different from all human beings one has ever seen, he is Love incarnate.

Mírzá ‘Azíz ‘Ullah came and talked with us for a while, and told us stories about the European Bahá’ís whom he had visited not long ago. Other friends passed and stopped for a word. It was a perfect morning and we were sorry when the lunch-hour called us back to the Pilgrim House.

After dinner that evening RúḥáKhánum took us to receive the Master’s farewell. I can remember very little of what he said. He told us that his love and thoughts and prayers would go with us. He sent his love and greetings to all the Bahá’ís in America.

I knew that I should not see him again, but I felt no sadness or grief. His love was too great: it poured in a radiant flood about me, and held me suspended in a priceless moment, when time stood still, and I lived in eternity. His eyes were glorious stars of light and love. No words can express their beauty.

He shook hands with us in parting. When he said good-bye to Sylvia, he smiled down at her and said, “Sylvia! – BadiaKhánum! – MissBadia!” – and his voice was filled with the most affectionate and sweet laughter!

Thus we left the Master’s house, that wonderful home, of which he has said, “My home is the home of peace. My home is the home of joy and delight. My home is the home of laughter and exultation. Whoever enters through the portals of this home must go out with gladsome heart. “

Next morning, before daybreak, we ate our last meal in the Pilgrim House and said farewell to our happy housemates there. Saïd Effendi, MírzáLuṭfu’lláh, Rúḥí Effendi, and faithful Esfendiar and his horses, took us to the train which left at 6:00 a. m. We had a half-hour’s talk with the young men before the train pulled out – but of that time I remember clearly one thing. MírzáLuṭfu’lláh turned to us as he said good-bye, and added, “Be good! Be good!” Then he smiled and said, “You know what I mean!” And no one who had seen the members of the Master’s household for a week could fail to know that “to be good” is love and service and the spreading of the ideals that the Master teaches.

In the Hidden Words BAHÁ’U’LLÁH has said, “If thou run with all immensity and speed through the space of heaven, thou shalt find no rest save in obedience to Our Command and in devotion before Our Face.” In Haifa one learns, as never before, the meaning of that sentence. The will to obey, a longing for devotion, are born in one’s heart and spirit.

Since we left the Master’s home, the days and weeks and months fly past, and are filled with many duties; many calls to help in the work of the world. But the beauty of the Master’s face is with us. “In the light of His Holy Presence all desires die save the desire to be like Him.” Alláho’Abhá!

STATEMENT BY CURTIS D. KELSEY OF EXPERIENCES IN WHICH HE PARTICIPATED, A PART OF THE EARLY DAYS OF THE BAHÁ'Í FAITH IN AMERICA.

Our family first heard of the appearance of the Bahá'í Revel Revelation around 1909, through Mrs. Latimer, mother of George Latimer. George and his mother were early and very active believers on Pacific Coast. We were all living at Portland, Oregon at the time. Mrs. Latimer and ay mother were very dear friends and together they participated in club and civic affairs.

Mrs. Latimer was very anxious that my mother know about the Faith and somehow she managed always to swing the conversation around to comments about the Faith. Mother would bring these comments and what little literature she received home to the family and try it out on us. However, we treated her comments politely, but it made very little impression upon us. The reason being that our family was drifting away from serious attention to religious beliefs. My father as a boy had decided against membership in any particular church because he could not accept the disunity in Christian beliefs, there were so many branches of the same Faith and he did not like the dogmatism and the critical attitude they held towards each other. He decided that all that was necessary to do was to live up to ones idealism and carry out one's life with integrity, honesty etc. In those days father was very active in the West. He was a well known Civil, Hydraulic and electrical engineer and he had great deal to do with power and irrigation development in this country. I had reached the point where I thought his outlook was very good and adopting the same pattern

I shall always be grateful to my beloved parents for the freedom they imparted to us from the usual fixed pattern of the day, such as belonging to any one of the hundreds of concepts of Christianity. Of course, mother sent us to Sunday school as we grew up, but she made it very clear to us that we did not have to accept any particular belief. This resulted in our associating with various groups. We attended Baptism, Congregational, Unitarian, Christian Science, New Thought and other groups. And finally we were letting go of any fixed attendance with any group. Mother brought her family up this way because she did not like the fear engendered when she was a girl and she was finished also with the dogmatic literal interpretation of the Bible. So she decided that her children would not be subjected to the same limited experience. She knew that there must be some other answer to life's problems.

You can see from what I have told you that we should have been ready ground for the Bahá'í teachings. But at the time we were first hearing of the Faith very little was being given out. There were many mixed up ideas that were being given out by some of the early believers, that we later found were not Bahá'í. I can remember when they would refer to 'Abdu'l-Bahá as a great Persian philosopher, teacher and etc. They expected he would soon come to America. They were not sure he would come as far as Portland. Mrs. Latimer said, she heard that he would be in California and she and mother planned to go there to see him. However, circumstances prevented their having that wonderful bounty. Several years passed and our family had moved to Tacoma Washington. One day my mother announced that Admiral Remey's son, Mason Remey and Roy Wilhelm would be in Tacoma in a day or two. She said, she was going to arrange a meeting at our home where her friends could come here and hear them talk about the Bahá'í Cause. The day came and some 40

Well if any of you have ever had this Illinois, you know what a severe headache goes along with the Illinois. One night mother had given me a large ice pack to try and stop the pain and make me more comfortable. However, it did not seem to relieve the pressure and I can remember my turning over and pushing my head in the pillow to try and get relief. While I was doing this I heard a full piece orchestra in the room. I was aware that it was not a physical experience, but I could hear all the instruments very clearly. At the same time the pain stopped instantly. I turned around quickly and sat up in bed and called to my mother. She came in quickly thinking something had happened. But it was not what she expected. When I told her what had taken place, she brought in the Bahá'í books, saying, perhaps we can find the answer in the Bahá'í writings. We stayed up most of the night talking about the experience and reading. We were both reading very carefully and as I read, I said, mother this is all true, why have you not shown me this before. She said, I have been trying to tell you about it for nine years and you always said you were not interested. This only goes to show that the statement, "God screens us evermore from premature ideas... our eyes are holden that we cannot see things that stare as in the face until the hour arrives when the mind is ripened..., then we behold then, and the time when we saw them not is like a dream.

The next morning when the doctor came in he was very surprised to find no sitting up in bed. He was interested in the experience but had no answer for it. Several days later the doctor allowed the Bahá'ís to come into to see me and the following two weeks were ones I shall never forget. Into the room came Howard Ives, Mary Ranford Yard, Hooper Harris, Roy, Mrs. Florian Krug and many others, so you now I heard a great deal during their visits and it really a wonderful time. When well and able to leave the house I camped on the door steps and meetings of the friends every here. I could not seem to get enough of the teachings and also I wanted to find some explanation of the experience I had been through. The right answer did not come to me until several years later while at Haifa. Palestine, in 1921. One day in talking with the beloved Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, he told me that the experience was spiritual, that it was real and that the music I heard was of the Kingdom, and that it had caused my spirit to become awakened. Sometime later I read a tablet written to another believer by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, who had had a similar experience. In the early days many people enter the Faith through experience. You will recall from a previous statements that I had practically closed the door to any mental focus of attention. This condition can be almost as bad as an orthodox position.

One day I was down at 104 Wall Street to see Roy and to have lunch with him. After lunch and when I was saying goodbye, Roy said, How would you like to go to Haifa? I replied that I would like nothing better, but I did not think there was such chance of my doing so. Roy said, well you don't know, you never can tell and we parted. Several 'woks later I received a cable from 'Abdu'l-Bahá and it read, CURTIS KELSEY PERMITTED, signed 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ 'ABBÁS. With the receipt of this cable I had a very strong impression that I must do everything possible to arrive in Haifa as quickly as possible I thought it would take about 20 days. Our family were now living at New Rochelle, N. Y. I must say right here, that all through these related experiences, my father was friendly with the Bahá'ís, but gave it no attention as he was too preoccupied with his business affairs. He was beginning to think it was taking up too much of my time etc. Like many young men I had very little money and I was planning on ways to raise the funds to go to Haifa. I had an old model T Ford and I drove it down town one evening around six o'clock. I stopped at a grocery store where I knew several fellows there. It was during the rush hour and I called out to the boys and said, how would you like to buy my ford. It took them by surprise and they did not answer right away so I started to walk out. One of the boys came running over and said, wait a minute Curt, if that buggy of yours can climb a certain hill here in town, I'll give you $150.00 for it. I said, hop in and over the hill we went in high gear. I knew it would be alright, because I just cleaned the spark plugs, in the car. Now I had my first money and I sold several other items. All this time, I had not said a word to my father about what I was planning to do. Not being a Bahá'í I also knew he would not understand why I was going to make the trip. I could understand his attitude but I wasn't ready yet to tell him about the trip. Then I went to see Roy and when he found I was serious about making the trip, he gave me $500.00 towards the trip. I found out that he had written to the Master about my coming over to Haifa that he knew a young man who could set up the lighting plants there. Some time ago Roy had read the statement of the Báb in the Bayán, “How veiled are ye, O my creatures who without any right, have consigned Him unto a mountain, (that is the fortress of Maku) not one of whose inhabitants is worthy of mention... With Him, which is me, there is no one except him who is one of the letters of the Living of My Book. In his presence, there is not at night even a lighted lamp. And yet, in places of (worship) which in varying degrees reach out unto Him unnumbered lamps are shining! All that is on earth hath been created for Him, and all partake with delight of His benefits, and yet they are so veiled from Him as to refuse Him even a lamp.” After reading this statement Roy had written to the Master and asked permission to send a lighting plant over to light the Shrine of the Báb. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá cabled back and told Roy to send three lighting plants. Roy being one of those Bahá’ís who acted at once on a request from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá immediately made arrangements to send the three plants to Haifa. These plants had been at Haifa for a year or two when he had written to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá about my coming over to install them.

Now having almost $700.00 in hand I felt it was time to talk to my father about the trip. Just as I expected he was not in favour of my making such a trip. He said, here you are a young man just getting started in life and you are planning to go half way around the world to do this work and they are not even paying you for the work. If you go ahead with your plans, do not expect any help from me. You must be taking leave of your senses to even think of such a thing. Of course I could understand his point of view, but I said Dad, I just have to make this trip. Then he said, well if you are set on it, go ahead, but don’t expect any help from me, so I went ahead with plans. I then went to the steamship office and told them I wanted to reach Haifa in 18 or 20 days. They told me I could not make it in that time as it would at least 30 or more days. Nevertheless I bought my ticket via Paris, Naples, Alexandria, Cairo and Haifa, a day or two later I left New York and quite a number of friends came down to say goodbye and my father was also along. He mewed over to me to say goodbye and in doing so placed something in my hand. Later when I opened the envelope I found nearly $200.00. On reaching Paris I made immediate inquiry about sailing out of Naples and was told there would not be any for two or three weeks. I said, well. I’ll go on to Naples anyway perhaps something will happen. They told me to stay there, that I would have more fun in Paris. I said, no thanks and continued my trip to Naples. On arriving there and at the steamship office they confirmed the report received at Paris. However I told them I would be down the next morning to see them again about sailings. The man said, no don’t do that, we know our business but let me have your hotel where you are staying and if anything happens, which I’m sure will not as quick as you expect, I will call. This satisfied me and I returned to the hotel. That night he telephoned me at the hotel and said, How did you know that the Esperia was putting into port here. I replied that I didn’t know it. He then said, the boat had put in here to take off a sick passenger who has a first class passage on to Alexander, do you want it for the rest of the way. I said, yes brother hold it for me and I was again soon on the way. On this part of the journey from Naples to Alexandria I met Mr. Charles Dana who had charge of American missionary work in the Near East. He was interested in why as a young man was travelling to Haifa and of course I told him all about the trip. He told me he was going on to Beirut and that he knew a number of Bahá'í students at the university there and that the fine students. He asked why it was that the Bahá'í were able to win so many Muḥammadians to accept the teachings. He doubted if all their own efforts had made sincere converts to Christianity. I said, we were successful because we did whittle down or belittle the teachings of Muḥammad. That the Bahá'ís as bringing the same message. And as a matter of fact Muḥammad, himself had questioned the Arabians on their not accepting the previous prophets. Mr. Dana stopped off with me at Haifa and went up to see the Shrine of the Báb. Then he went on to Beirut. Our train reached Haifa waiting there at the station was Dr. Lotfulla Ḥakím and Fugeta who is Japanese. They drove me up to the Western Pilgrim House in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's high buckboard wagon. The pilgrim was then, was then located on the lower end of Persian street. The front steps faced the sea looking towards 'Akká. On arrival there I found western friends and Mde. Standard who had arrived from the East. The dining table was all set and we were waiting for 'Abdu'l-Bahá who was resting, in one of the rooms off from this central. We had only been talking a few minutes when the door opened and through it came the majestic figure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and looking in my direction he said, Mahaber, Mahaber, You are welcome, you are welcome. Then he seated us all at the table and he asked after the health of the friends etc. Then turning again to me he said, did you notice how easy it was for you to come here. I replied that I had and then it dawned on me that I had reached Haifa within the time I had set myself, about 20 days. After lunch the Master bid us all goodbye, told us to rest and that he would see us again that night. For the next 15 days I was busy around Haifa that were out of order. There were two cars in the Master's garage, a cunningghem and a ford. They were out of order because no one knew how to fix so me minor trouble. This also I took care of. I also put in my time getting the different parts of the three lighting plants ready to install and I was putting out of things to do. I wanted to get started at the work of setting up the plants, but I didn't dare ask the Master because I knew he would tell me when he was ready. One day I was standing directly in front of the Master's house in the street talking to Rúḥí Effendi, and I said, Rúḥí when do you think 'Abdu'l-Bahá is going to let me start the work. This will take quite some time and if I don't get started I'll never get back home. Rúḥí said, I don't know. Just after the comment 'Abdu'l-Bahá came to the doorway of his house and called to us and said, We will start the work tomorrow and went back in the house. I know he couldn't have heard as talking as we were in the center of the street and at least a hundred or more feet from the house. That night we were told that the Master was going to visit the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and that I was to go along. Dr. Lotfulla, Fugeta and I shared a room together just off the rear doorway to the pilgrim house. The next morning before any of were up, there stood the Master at the doorway to our room. The foot of my bed faced the door. He bade us to rest and then said to me, I cannot go to Bahjí today, what shall I do about it. I answered at once, that when the Master was ready I would be ready and he said. Bali, very good and left. That afternoon word came over to us that we were going to Bahjí. About 5 o'clock that evening Kosrow, Rúhí Effendi and I went down to the railroad station with the Master, where we were to ride the train of the little narrow gauge Turkish rail to 'Akká. It made the sixteen mile trip over at night and came back the next morning. Well the Master did not get on the train right away He sat down in the station and waited for someone. The conductor quite worried as he wanted to get started. They had to reach 'Akká before sunset because after sunset the gates to the city were closed and you would have to stay outside the walled city until morning. Finally an Arab came into the station and had a talk with the Master then the Master got up and went on to the train. The engineer pushed the train we reached the station outside 'Akká before sunset. But the Master sat down in the station and waited. Rúhí and I stood and waited. The sun had gone down and the moon was rising. Pretty soon Kalead one of the caretakers at the Bahjí came into sight leading the white donkey of the Master. He stood with us and waited also. Right after out of the dusk, came a tall Arab, who went into the station where he talked with the Master. In a few minutes the Master came out mounted the donkey and we started off to Bahjí about two and one half miles north east of 'Akká. Rúhí was walking on the left side of the donkey, I on the right side and Kalead was leading the donkey. It was a wonderful night, the air was just right and white clouds were floating met a full moon. The Master would pull his Abba around his shoulders and then he would comment beautiful clouds, beautiful moon, wonderful night etc. Then he turned and asked if I was finding it hard to walk and of course I told him I wasn't. I didn't even notice my steps I was so intent on the Master. In those years the land outside 'Akká, Bahjí and Haifa was just wild land and at night the jackals come out and howl like the coyotes in our Western country. In a half hour or so we reached the Bahjí. The Bahjí is really a group of buildings, the main building being the Loftly Mansion where Bahá'u'lláh lived and where he received Prof. Edward G. Browne. The living quarters are on the second floor. To the left, northeast of the Mansion and separated from it were a group of six one story buildings. At the north end of this group is the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. In this year 1921 the Mansion was not in possession of the Bahá'ís so that night when we reached there with 'Abdu'l-Bahá we stayed in the end of building at the south end of the smaller group. In this building you walked up several steps into a small court room off of which branched four rooms, an inner garden with an orange tree and a kitchen. Kosrow had gone ahead of us and dinner was ready when we got there. The main dish was a small squash stuffed with rice, meat candied orange peel. There were bowls of must, sour milk, also oranges, pomegranates and most unusual grapes, large bunches 12 or more inches long. The skin of the grapes so tender, that you hardly noticed it when eating them. We also had glasses of tea. While we were eating and talking, there in Arabic and I was anxious to know what was being said, so when this man left then they told me of the conversation. In the garden at Bahjí 'Abdu'l-Bahá had some sweet orange trees and someone had been stealing them. The Master had asked this Arab at dinner, if it was not a custom among the nomad Arabs that if the father had not stolen during the day, his wife would not let him come in the tent at night. The Arab replied that this was true. Then the Master asked this man if he had ever been kept out of the tent and he said no. Then the Master asked him if he had ever tried the sour oranges with sugar on them and he said he had not. The result was that in the next few days someone began to steal the sour oranges at Bahjí. After dinner we went with the Master to pray at the threshold of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. Before we entered the shrine we removed our shoes, then Rúhí and I stood behind the Master as he chanted the Tablet of Visitation. After this, 'Abdu'l-Bahá turned to Rúhí and gave instructions that the beautiful rugs and other things were to be taken to 'Akká. We didn't know that the Master knew what was going to happen a short time after this visit. We spent the night at Bahjí and the next morning we went into the yard back of the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and the Master asked me how I would light the shrine. I told him then he made me acquainted with two of the friends who had just arrived from 'Akká. He said these men will help you put up the building for the light plant. After this we walked back to house where we were staying and there waiting for us was Asfendir with the Master's four seated, high buckboard wagon. In a short time we were on our way to 'Akká, where we visited the Most Great Prison and then we went to the House of Aubud. While we were there the chief of the Druses with his two sons arrived and we soon sat down to dinner. The Chief was very unhappy and wept. All the time the Master would try and cheer him. Later I found he was weeping because he sensed something serious was going to happen to the Faith. This man was in his 90's. Right after dinner we said goodbye to these friends and with the rafter we started driving back to Haifa along the seashore. About halfway back the sun was just setting over Mount Carmel. It is such beautiful sunset that I asked the rafter if we could stop while I took a picture and he complied. This picture came out as one of my best photographs. We soon reached Haifa and before bidding good night he said he wished me to complete tree lighting of the Shrine of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh so that the lights could be turned on at the same time. I must digress here to tell you that other friends of Roy knew of his sending of the three lighting plants to Haifa. Mrs. Franklin paid the expenses of a young man from California to go to Haifa and do this work. However, 'Abdu'l-Bahá would work and sent him back to America. Another young man (Ḥusayn Caribi) a Persian believer living in India, learned about these plans and he had had some experience in electrical work so he went to Haifa and asked the Master if he could not do the work. The Master, however, told him no that the time was not yet, but that later he would send for him and he could help with the work. Just before I started the work the Master made me acquainted with Hosien and said, he is your friend and he will help you with the work. He does not speak English and you do not speak Persian, but you will get along. I can assure you before very long we were getting along very well. At the start for instance if I wanted to know the name in Persian and I would do the same in English and it was surprising how quick we get along. In order to accomplish the Master's instructions we would have to work two weeks at Bahjí and then return to Haifa and work two weeks at the Shrine of the Báb. While at Haifa, I would have to come down from the mountain at noon time and have lunch with the Master. I would remove my work clothes, wash up and rush into the dining room. For several weeks there were no visiting friends so at lunch time there would be The Master, Rúhí Afnán, Fugita and myself. One day the Master asked Fugita, what was holding Kelsey up? Fugita told him that I was changing my work clothes and cleaning up. He said, you tell Kelsey to come in without changing his clothes. So I had to come to the table in my work clothes from then on. If I told you everything that happened at these times this story would run into a book. One thing I would like to convey and leave with you is the wonderful spirit and presence of the Master. The wholesomeness of this personality, his complete simplicity were disarming, made you feel at rest and forgetful of yourself. The radiance of the love he projected upon one is something you cannot describe. Love is a spiritual quality which passes from one to another. One experienced I believe you never can forget it. We never left his presence without a longing desire to be of real service to the Cause of God. Fugita had a lovely brown cat that the Master liked and sometimes we would hide it just before the Master came to lunch. The Master would always say let the cat out and the cat would run over to him and rub up against his feet. At the table, the Master would push his chair back and feed the cat. It was wonderful to see the Master relax at these times. Sometimes he would push his turban back on his head and sit there reading the paper or mail he had received during the day. Sometimes long periods passed without even a word being said. You felt you could sit in his presence as long as he would let you. In those days the subject of life after death interested me, so one day I said to the Master, thinking I would get a quick answer, what is the difference between the life of the cat and that of ourselves. The Master did not answer directly, but he gave a short talk on what happens when we take food into the body, how it is passed through the various organs of the body, how it is digested, refined, purified and then that which is of value to the body is used and that which is of no value is left behind. At the time it did not seem to answer the question but in later years I found it did. Think over the statement from the teachings, "We have placed mankind in the alembic and after due refining processes, the believers are the fragrant extracts thereof." Then the Master rose from the table and walked across the floor and as he did so his foot struck a loose tile. He stopped, looked at the loose tile and then said, It is progressing and it is possible for it to reach the state of a mirror (human temple).

It was not possible to hide, anything about yourself from the Master. If you were sensitive you knew and felt this and that he knew you better than you know yourself. An instance of this is shown in this story. On Sunday afternoons it was customary for us to go to the Shrine of the Báb and after a visit at the shrine, we would rather in the central front room of the shrine building and hear the master talk about the Faith. On these occasions there would be 30 or more believers present. The talks were in Persian or Arabic and I did not understand what was being said, but always being present. Under these conditions my thoughts would drifting and I would be thinking about the various statements in the teachings that I didn't understand and some things I was questioning. While I was thinking this way, I heard an inner voice say, look up. I responded at Gaza and over in the opposite corner from where I was sitting sat the Master, He was looking directly at me and smiling. As soon as I looked into his face the doubts and questions vanished. At Haifa, in the evening around seven o'clock trio on would gather in the left front room of the Master's house to hear him speak about the Cause. The Master would usually sit in the corner of the room and the men would sit around the room with the chain against the wall and facing the Master. We always remove our shoes before entering the rooms would sit with their arms folded and no one spoke unless the Master spoke to them or asked then a question. The Master would sometimes say a few words to me in English, ask after my health and how the work was going along etc. One evening he asked me if I understood what was being said. I replied that I loved being present but that I did not understand Persian or Arabic. The Master replied, Well your heart understands and the language of the heart is much more important than words.

You might like this story about wiring the shrines. The wire that was sent over was of the knob and tube type to place on the surface of the wall and I did not like the idea of placing this black wire on the walls of the shrine. So one day I asked the tester if he would permit me to go to Cairo to see if I could get some lead covered wire and switches so that I could imbed it in the walls out of sight. The Master said I could go and that Fugita had always wanted to visit Cairo so he could go along with me. Fugita was delighted with the idea of this trip and said now I can wear my tuxedo. When he arrived at Haifa a number of years ago he had a Whole trunk full of good clothes that he had never been able to use around Haifa. I had known Fugita in America and he had been at our home many times. At the invitation of the Master, Fugita had travelled part of the trip with him across America. The Master told Fugita to study certain subjects at college and one day he would send for him to come to Haifa. Shortly after the first World war he came to Haifa as the Master had promised and a few years after our beloved Guardian was in Haifa, Shoghi Effendi asked him to return to Japan to teach and help the friends there. Fugita is now living in Tokyo. Now back to our story. Fugita was very fastidious. It loved to dress up and at the same time he was full of life and fun. Together we made quite a pair. He was short about 5'8" and I just six feet. With the 4 or 6 inch beard that the Master had him grow; when people saw us coming along they stopped to look a second time. When we got off the train at Cairo it was night and quite dark. We didn't know just exactly where we would stay while in Cairo. While we were thinking of IAA our next move would be Fugita heard someone talking and said, that sounds like American and we moved over to where we heard the voices. To our surprise we ran into the Norse family. Mother two sons and daughter. They were on their way to Haifa and were they surprised to see us. And when they found out what we were to do they said, but where are you going to stay. We said we don't know just yet. Mrs. Norse said, that settles it you are going with us and we will not take no for an answer. So off we went to the famous Continental Hotel. Fugita hadn't slept in a good bed since he left America and I hadn't for several months. Well, when they ushered us into our room 20 foot square and high ceilings. When the door opened Fugita dropped his bags stood there for a second or two looking at the two beds which were about three feet above the floor. Then Fugita ran and dove across the foot of the bed landing in the middle and the feather bedding folded right up around. For a minute or two I didn't see him then out of the feather bed the first thing saw was this little head with a moth eaten beard, and it many looked small in the middle of this great big bed. Well, Fuge put on his tuxedo and down we went to the large dining room. Fuge made quite an impression and he was enjoying it. All eyes were on our table. You could sense people saying who is this person. It became more so when into the dining room walked a colorfully uniformed person and spoke to Fugita and said a Persian gentleman wished to speak with him. Fugita excused himself bowed to us and left the room with this man. Through the doorway we could see the man who asked to see Fugita greet him, embrace him and kiss his beard. All the Persian Bahá'ís knew that the Master loved Fugita, had had him grow his beard and often would tease Fugita by pulling it. Fugita would have tea early every morning with the Master and he made him laugh a great deal. The friends knew this and loved Fugita for it. We had quite a wonderful stay at Cairo accomplished our task and were soon back at Haifa. When we left Cairo many of the friends came out and sent us off with baskets of fruit and flowers.

With the new materials we brought book from Cairo we were able to put in concealed wiring in both the Shrine of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh. One morning just before we started work, word was brought excitedly to the house that Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Ḥasan Afnán had drowned himself in the sea. Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Ḥasan belonged to the family of the Báb and for many years had been living in Haifa across the street and directly in front of the Master's house. He settled up all his affairs after which he walked down to the sea, folded his clothes lay them on the shore, then walked into the sea and drowned. He was an elderly man living by himself at Haifa. He would see end talk with the Master quite often. He had had a great deal of suffering throughout his life and when the funeral procession passed in front of the Master's house, 'Abdu'l-Bahá came out into the street and placed a corner of the casket on his own shoulders and walked in the procession. (You can see a picture of this in Vol. 12, No. 18 of the Star of the West.) That evening in the men's meeting the Master spoke to us of the subject of suicide. Some of the words he spoke were these; "We must never take our own life, you must not injure yourselves or commit suicide." He said that God never placed upon us a burden greater than we could carry. Each burden was for our own good and development. He further said, should anyone at any time encounter hard and perplexing times, he must say to himself, 'this will soon pass'. Then he will be calm and quiet." "In difficulties, I used to say this to myself. Then I became patient." "If anyone cannot be patient and cannot endure, and if he wishes to become a martyr, then let him arise in the service of the Cause of God. It will be better for him if he obtains to martyrdom in this path.” few days later when the Master left this earthly life we then realized, that Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Ḥasan realized the approach of this great calamity, the Master’s ascension and could not wait to see it.

November 27th, rolled around and Fugita, Dr. Lottfulla and I had gone to bed as usual. A little after 1 o’clock that night we were suddenly weakened by someone pounding loudly at our door, get up, get up, the Master, the Master then they were away. You would have thought we were firemen, the way we flew into our clothes and were over to the Master’s house. When we reached there, everyone was crying and moaning and a great deal of confusion prevailed. I passed up the steps there sat Rúhí Afnán beating his head and crying and blaming the American friends as contributing to the Master’s passing through disobedience. Of course this was not true. I rushed on into the Master’s room, members of the family were there and Dr. Florian Krug was just turning away from the bed and saying the beloved Master has just left us. I walked back into the main central room of the house and everyone was still crying and wailing. You could hear people say, Why does this have to happen and what will become of the cause now that the Master has gone. I knew I loved the Master but I did not feel emotionally disturbed. It was not like myself because I was not an indifferent person. I tried to force myself to feel it, then an inner voice spoke to me and said, no, not that, this is a time to observe. I quickly looked around the room and there on the other side of the room was the Greatest Holy Leaf going from one to another comforting them. You could see that she was getting control of the situation and it was wonderful to see how smoothly she was setting things in order. You could see the deep sorrow in her lovely face, but she knew just what was to be done. Being the beloved daughter of Bahá’u’lláh and the loving and sacrificing sister of our beloved Master ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and as I looked at her I realized that the Cause of God was in safe hands. You of course know that the Cause of God was actually in her hands until our beloved Guardian returned to Haifa from England about forty days after the passing of the Master. The Greatest Holy Leaf came over to where I was standing and said, Kelsey, will you take Kasrow and Fugeta and go to ‘Akká and inform the friends there. We immediately got the ford car and started on our way. The road to ‘Akká in those days was along the seashore. The night was balmy, a fall moon and clouds floating by. As I drove along, Fugeta sitting beside me and Kasrow in the back. We were not talking they were quietly crying, and now I too was crying. I was else praying and my thoughts were for the friends all over the world and what a terrible shock this would be to them. As we drove along we had to pass over two sand bars that were made by streams flowing into the sea. As we came to these streams Kasrow got out and ran ahead and I drove after him in the water and safely over each sand bar. We informed several of the friends and told them to come to Haifa and then we started our return trip. It was so soon in driving back along the seashore that we did not think it was necessary to check our roadway. We could see the tracks entering the water. We drove safely over the first sand bar and when we came to the next one and were passing over the bar it had moved so the car started to settle in the water. We all jumped out and walked around the car lifting it to keep it afloat. Fugeta and Kasrow are both short and as they would bend over to lift, their feet would slide out from under them and they would float in the water. This could not go on so Kasrow ran down on the seashore where we could see in the distance Arab fisherman getting ready to pull in their nets. It was just nearing daylight. We continued to walk around the car. In about a half hour large group of these fishermen came on the run. When they reached us they picked up the car and placed it on shore. I cleaned the water out of the carburettor and we were soon back, Haifa.

A complete change had taken place, large numbers of people were gathering in the street and arrangements were being made for the funeral service to take place that day. Various dignitaries from the surrounding villages and Haifa and 'Akká, were coming and going inside the house in paying their respects to the family. Finally the British High Commissioner, Sir Herbert Samuel arrived from Jerusalem with his entourage. Almost at once after they went into the house, the funeral procession. The first thing we saw was the simple casket coming through the doorway on the shoulders of the people. As they started up the street, no one was allowed to carry it more than a few steps when others would move in and take their positions. The casket was draped with a simple paisley shawl. About half way up the mountain the boy scouts joined the procession and they place a wreath on the casket. There were thousands of people in the streets. But for the rest of this story you can read it in "God Passes By, page 309."

As I look back it was wonderful to be present when Shoghi as a young man of 24 returned to Haifa and assumed the tremendous burden of the Guardianship. We now know what a tremendous responsibility he did assume and how marvellous and inspiring are the achievements he alone is responsible for.

A day or two after Shoghi Effendi's return the Will and Testament was read and the friends took all day in reading it I saw a number of the older men coming out of the house with tears in their eyes. They were overjoyed to know that the Beloved Master had provided so well for the continuation of the Cause of God. Knowing the conflict in the past history of religions, at that time it was difficult to realize that here for the first time in the spiritual history of mankind we were unveiling divinely guided institutions.

A short time after Shoghi Effendi's return to Haifa went back to work to complete the lighting of the shrines. You most likely know that Shoghi Effendi left Haifa for a short period because of the heavy burden on his heart and the weight of the responsibility ahead of him. I doubt, even today that there are any of us who can really appreciate what Shoghi Effendi had to face. True there were many loving friends who arose to serve and assist our beloved Guardian and the history of the Faith has proved it so, but without that divinely appointed station, the best of us would have been lost at sea.

April 1922 rolled around and I was soon to leave Haifa. I didn't want the day to arrive, but I knew it would come. The lighting of the Shrines was complete. When the searchlight shown down Mount Carmel Avenue the children would get out in the center of the street to see their shadow. When this searchlight was turned on it actually light house, because the light was so much brighter than the one in the Monastery at the point of Mount Carmel. Arrangements were made to leave it on from sunset to sunrise, as a guide for the ships.

When I was ready to leave Haifa, I found that I only had money to buy deck passage as far as Constantinople. I was young, felt I could handle my own affairs and told no one about it. I thought, well, I'll get some work at Constantinople to pay for my passage from there home. But the day I was ready to leave the Greatest Holy Leaf sent word for me to come over to the Master's house. When I entered she was in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room where we met in the evenings and the daughters of the Master were also there. As soon as I came in, they surrounded me and began to tell me how much they appreciated the work I had been doing etc. and I thanked them for all the kindness and happiness that I had had in doing it. Then the Greatest Holy Leaf spoke up and said, Kelsey, you need some money to return to America. I said, no thank you everything has been taken care of etc. Then from behind me one of the daughters said, no Kelsey, you need this money to return home. I told her the same thing I had said to the Greatest Holy Leaf and then another daughter made the same statement. This couldn't keep up so finally the Greatest Holy Leaf took my hand and placed an envelope in it and said kindly but firmly, you must take this money, you need it to return home. Tim said, well, I'll take it if you will let me return it when I get home and she replied, no because this is the money for you to return home. What else could I say. As I was leaving one of daughters came to me and said, Kelsey, I want tell you something that will make you very happy through your life. Then she said, you know then the Master would go over to the pilgrim house and be alone with you and Fugeta day after day at lunch time. I said, yes. Then she said, I spoke to the Master one day about it, and said to him, why don't you stay over at the house at noon and rest, I'm sure Kelsey won't mind if you do not go over there. Then do you know what he told me? He said I like to be with my friends.

I was soon on my way to Beirut with 'Abbás Adek Iqbal there we visited with the triangle, and then on to Damascus where we again met the friends. Then back to Beirut, then by steamer to Constantinople than on to Paris and base. On reaching home there were my family and many friends anxiously waiting to hear all about the trip.

Copy of Notes of Miss Rosenberg the reading of the will of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as given in a talk at the London Spiritur1 Assembly. Feb. 2nd 1929 at the home of Mrs. Homer 2 Sloane Terrece Sloane Square, London, Miss Rosenberg said, that the Will was left sealed up in a packet and addressed in ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’S own hand to Shoghi Effendi and nothing could be done until Shoghi Effendi came and opened the packet. A very solemn meeting was appointed for the reading of the Will. There were old gray-headed men present who had been in the Movement for many years, and if there had been the slightest doubt of the authenticity of the Will, they would have known it. The whole document was in Dig own hand-writing. There were at least 200 people present at the reading of the Will, and it was most impressive ceremony every time Shoghi Effendis name was mentioned, the whole assembly arose and made obeisance.

The original appointment of Shoghi Effendi was made when he was only 9 and ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ was in great danger. The three parts of the Will have different dates .There was not the slightest question at the time as to the validity and the very oldest members there acknowledged It. They had the Will photographed, Miss Rosenberg examined the Will and could see, that it was old as it was stained from the dampness ,as it had been put in a strong box and buried.

Monsieur Dreyfus-Barney was there and he translated many things of ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’S.

A Persian believer who had been with ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ for many years said that he was sitting by the Master at one time, when he was writing a Tablet for this believer to take to Persia, and he began to think how everything depended upon the Master and it came into his mind “Whom can we have to succeed Him?” and ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ called aloud. Shoghi Effendi and he came running very quickly to the Master and the Master said to Shoghi Effendi “Here is a friend who very much wishes to see you – He said that after ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’s death he understood this incident. The reading of the Will was a most solemn affair. The Will is in his own hand-writing. At the solemn gathering no one of all the old Persian believers assembled questioned It.

ACCOUNT OF THE PASSING OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ BY GRACE KRUG,
(MRS. FLORIAN KRUG) PRESENTED AT “THE CABIN” IN WEST
ENGLEWOOD, NEW JERSEY, WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 28, 1934.

Dearly. beloved Friends,

To give you a word picture of this very important event, without some of the intimate details is impossible. Since the room is filled with Believers only, I will speak freely.

On the 19th of November 1921, Dr. Krug and I arrived in Haifa. The ship dropped anchor about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Rúhí Afnán and Fugita met us at the pier. After the custom and formalities were over; we drove at once to the American Pilgrim House. The beloved Master was waiting inside the gate to welcome us with a love ineffable. I noticed how tired He looked, my spirit sank, and I said to Rúhí Afnán, “Has the Master been well of late?” He replied, — “Yes.” After escorting us into the house and telling us to be seated, the Master inquired, with His usual solicitude, as to our health, the comfort of our journey, etc., and to tell how happy He was that we had come. Suddenly He arose, asking us to follow Him, led the way out of the house, up the street, to the gate of His own residence, into His garden, and up a flight of outside stairs to a room over the garage that had been built during absence of the past year. He turns, smiled and said: “Now I am going to give you and Dr. Krug my room.” I burst into tears, I don't know why such a feeling of apprehension came over me. His grandson, Rúhí Afnán, tried to comfort me by saying, — “The family are all very happy, Mrs. Krug, that the Master has decided to move back into the big house, as we were anxious about His sleeping out here alone.”

Friends, the last nine days in which we were blessed with His presence on earth, His life from hour to hour was so busy and beautiful to watch, that after my early morning visit each day to the Shrine of the Dab, I stood at my window to catch as many glimpses of the Master as possible. In the morning He would seat Himself in the garden, under the grape arbor, to receive the many visitors seeking His wisdom. There were Generals in gaudy uniform, Arabs again a poor man or woman asking alms. He was so beautiful and serene, with a sweetness of spirit that I had never noticed before. There was an air of finality and completeness around Him. The first private interview that Dr. Krug and I had with the Master in His reception room, I knelt at His feet and held my miniature up to Him to bless. He looked at it intently with an expression on His dear face unutterably sad and said: "It is most beautiful, but put it away, do not wear it while you are in Haifa as my enemies will use it against me." Then He chanted a short commune, placed the miniature upon His heart for a moment and returned it to me. Again that same feeling of sadness came over me.

A few days before His passing, the Master had fever. Rúhí Afnán suggested to Dr. Krug and me that we go to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and ask Him to please rest more. We went. Dr. Krug begged Him not to make the physical effort of walking daily to the American Pilgrim House to meals. The Master replied: "Very well, for your sake Doctor, I won't go any more." I left His presence again in tears and said to the Doctor: "We creatures through our love and devotion for the Nester put our finite wills over His and when He grants our requests we are sadder than before."

The next morning, Friday, He said to His daughter, Rúhí Khánum, "Today Kasro must be married." Fiends, I will digress for a moment and give you a brief history of this remarkable man, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's body servant. Many years ago while the Master was still a prisoner in 'Akká, one of the Hindu Bahá'ís on his way to visit Him passed through the Slave Market in one of the large cities in India, and saw a forlorn child, aged six years, standing on the block to be sold. The Pilgrim's heart was so moved at this pitiful sight that he bought the poor boy and took him with him to Palestine. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had him educated, brought him up with His own family and he has proved to be a most faithful servant. There are no words to describe his sincere devotion to the entire family. Kasro's bride was a daughter of one of the Persian martyrs, and she too, was bought up in the prison with the family. Friends, I am certain, after 'Abdu'l-Bahá's ascension, Kasro, in his agonized grief, would have killed himself had he not been married. Think of the Master's foresight!

Kasro's wedding ceremonies took place early in the afternoon. The Master called us about 5 o'clock to His reception room. The bride was seated at His side. All those in His presence were very happy. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, with a twinkle in His eye, looked at me and said: "Dr. and Mrs. Krug must have a second honeymoon here.," I replied: "Inshalla, Boved." (God willing). The Master was very much amused at my answer.

After His ascension, those last words addressed to me were very precious, memories.

Saturday He was not well, He saw none of the visiting, Pilgrims. In the afternoon, His daughter Moneva Khánum, found Him with a pillow under His Bahá'u'lláh's coat wrapped around Him without a pillow under His head on the divan in His room. She said to Him, - "Master, please permit me to put a pillow under Your head if you are not feeling well." He replied: "No, my head is not worthy of a pillow, all other heads are allowed pillows, but not mine." Oh Friends, the pathos of those last days of servitude!

Sunday, a Bahá'í brother from India gave a most beautiful feast at the Shrine of the Báb. Dr. Krug and I arrived rather early and waited with the friends for the family to come. When 'Abdu'l-Bahá's four sons-in-law entered the room without the Master, again that same feeling of dread came over me. The spiritual feast was most uplifting and the bountiful hospitality by our Parsee brother was greatly enjoyed. After the feast was ended, Rúhí Afnán ran at once down the mountain to the Master's house and said to Him; "Master, all were disappointed that you were not at the Shrine." He replied: "But I was there in spirit." "When this body disintegrates and returns to dust, for that care not at all, it is as cloud that covers the sun.

Friends, that night at supper word came that the Master had no fever and was better. We were all so happy and unified in spirit that I doubt if over again in this world will I feel the same. Little did I know what awaited us!

We retired as usual, but Dr. Krug had a premonition that he would be called to the Master's bedside before morning. About one fifteen o'clock we were awakened by screams from the Masters house, "Come Dr. Krug, the Master, the Master!" Like a flash, the Doctor was up, dressed, out of the room and across the garden into the house. You see, friends, had we not occupied 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room over the garage, Dr. Krug could not have reached the Master so quickly. I stood absolutely petrified with fear. Finally I was able to slip a one piece dress over my night robe and rushed after the Doctor. Friends, how can I describe that scene in the Master's bedroom! Dr. Krug stood in the center, his hand raised saying "Silence, our Beloved Master has ascended." I ran to His bedside and there He lay in the majesty of death. His lovely eyes were still open, but the light of love and understanding that had for so many years cheered the souls of men was gone! My first thought was, my Adored One is freed from our endless questions, freed from His life of servitude and headaches. I turned and knelt at the feet of His sister, the Greatest Holy Leaf, put my head in her lap and in that agonized moment, she stroked any head and tried to comfort me. Friends, not one thought of herself! God has never created a more glorious woman than she!

For hours after the ascension that night, chaos reigned. The house was crowded with guests, there were at least 40 women believers with their babies, sleeping oriental fashion on the floor in the large hail of the Master's house. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daughters told me at the time of Bahá'u'lláh's ascension the same thing took place. Finally, Dr. Krug called me saying: "Fugita will make a cup of tea for the guests in the American Pilgrim House. Mr. and Mrs. John Bosh, of Guyserville, California; Mr. Curtis D. Kelsey, Dr. Krug and I went over. Not a word was spoken and not a tear did shed, the agony of His passing was too deep. I stepped out on the stoop of the Pilgrim House and gazed at the myriads of stars over my head and prayed and wished from my soul, that the material veils would be lifted from my eyes, that I might see the Hosts of the Supreme Concourse bearing my Beloved Master in Triumph to His Divine Father, Bahá'u'lláh. As I sat in the silence of the night, was conscious that the Master's spirit, like attar of roses, had filled not only the town of Haifa, but the world.

In the early dawn Dr. Krug called me and said: "Come dear you must rest a little." At 9 o'clock that morning there were at least two hundred Muḥammadan women in the garden and on the steps of the Master's house, wailing, as the news of His passing spread like wild fire. After making my way through the crowds of the reception room and found Monever Khánum, the Holy Mother, with the four daughters, surrounded by friends of the family. Two Muḥammadan Mufti (priests) were chanting the Qur'án in the hall. I said to the ladies, "Oh, can't you be alone in your agony of grief?" They replied: "No it is not the custom here, God willing, tonight we will be by ourselves." All the servants were so grief stricken that the family was obliged to send to the Hotel in Haifa for cooks to come and prepare the midday meal. There were hundreds of people that had to be fed.

Tuesday morning before 9 o'clock crowds assembled for the funeral, thousands of people. The day was cloudless. Sir Herbert Samuels the Governor of Palestine motored all night from Jerusalem to attend the funeral. Over 10,000 men and women followed the casket up Mount Carmel, borne on the shoulders of men who truly revered 'Abdu'll-Bahá.

At the request of the Holy Family, Dr. Krug wrote for the archives of the Cause, a scientific diagnosis of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's illness :- "INSTANTANEOUS DEATH CAUSED BY CEREBRAL HEMORRHAGE."

Pilgrim Notes

Inez Greeven

September 1921

Arrived. Sept. 1921. Three at Pilgrim House, Kelsey, Daisy and I. Later Mrs. Staunard came. Louvards the end a couple from Beirut. Master came almost daily to house at 11 o'clock for a rest after His walk. Very often for midday meal (unusual), sent for us to have tea at His house about 3 P.M. and came again for the evening meal. Things recalled that were said and various times. Were we comfortable and happy in the Pilgrim House? Answered that everything was wonderful and we couldn't be happier – that the food always tasted better in Haifa than anywhere else. Master said, "That is due only to the love in your hearts – in reality it is very simple" and told the story of the visit to thorns gatherer. At dinner one day, The Master said: "Today we have children soup – which Rúhí Effendi likes very much and he is therefore happy and grateful to God (much laughter and Rúhí confused). But there is no merit in being thankful only when one has all that he wants – the real test is to allow gratitude to God under all conditions even when he has nothing to eat." When Master came she asked many questions and the Master said it would be better conversation on more spiritual .

So when I met Him that evening at late sunset standing before the gate of His garden, He greeted me with these words, as He pointed to the darkening sky: "Good stars, good heavens, good night." And walked on through the gate.

Oct. 1921.

The story of love – (eating the dough). In answer to a philosopher, about Socrates – Sun spots due to volcanic eruption of radium. Mars inhabited, but not our form of life – each kind must have its own element.

Answer to how to know the will of God: "Study the Tablets, information for everything therein.” I said we might not build on our land in Haifa at all, but someday give the land to the Cause. The Master said, “No, build a little house for yourself now, it does not have to be as large as this one – just a few rooms.”

Thank God that I have kept my promise to you that I would keep you to speak, but you did not keep yours. I pray constantly for the Divine Confirmations for you, and if you will turn to me I will always help you. My desire is that you shall become ablaze with love like this lamp and that I may hear your voice speaking to 2 and 3 thousands here in Haifa. Kurat al Aime was so timid that when one asks her of her health she could hardly be heard to reply – yet when heart became alight with love – even though she had not seen Bahá’u’lláh she raised her voice before men and women and set them on fire. I want you to do likewise – only be assured that I will help you, be assured. Turn your face to the Kingdom of Abhá and ask help, they regard the people as ants and speak – take no heed for what you shall say. When I gave talks before the people in Europe I regarded them as sheep, do as I did. You are of Bahá’u’lláh’s chosen and you have _____ great bounty. I never forget you but pray for you always – we are never separated in spirit. How much better than to be here in body, as you see so many of those who live in Haifa always. You are my two dear daughters and I am well pleased with you – with the good love you have in your hearts. This is your home – know that if you stay a year, it is too short. You may return when you like. I shall give you such a cup of the wine of the love of God to drink while here that you will be intoxicated for the rest of your life handed Him a very beautiful pear from the garden. There was no displeasure at this interruptions, nor was the tiny grandson allowed to feel any indifferent to his gift; the Master gathered the child to Him, took a large knife from His pocket and cut the pear as many pieces as there were persons in the room (about six or seven) and insisted that we each eat one then and there. I also see the gesture with which the Master put his hand into a box of chocolates, which someone had brought Him from Europe, and gave them to the waiting children. All the generosity of which He was the Manifestation was expressed in that one movement. Not a few pieces picked here and there, but the hand thrust deep into the box and brought up overflowing. Or when He urged us at table to “Eat, eat,” – then our plates were piled high as little mountains and we did not know if this were a test of our obedience or lavish hospitality! I only recall that after I had made myself finish the last grain of rice. I felt very virtuous and as if my sacrifices had surely won recognition on the Abhá plane.

Those days at Haifa are in memory woven into a pattern of pure bliss – a _____ when although one dwelt on earth’s one’s spirit was in heaven. Time lost all meaning: it was of no importance whether it was Monday or Tuesday, March or May. We lived entirely by the sun of the Master’s Presence; those moments before we were summoned to His house, to be given a private talk, were full of excitement and those when we caught a glimpse of His turban above the garden wall, as He passed on the road for His daily walk, were full of a glowing and quiet emotion.

When we told the Master how grateful we were for this great privilege of being permitted to visit Haifa, He answered: "Yes, but your conduct when you leave here will prove your gratitude to God for this bounty."

One evening at supper I asked the Master why it was that so many pilgrims to Haifa shared the same experience, in as much as they did not realize at the time of being there the full significance of all they were receiving; that it was only later upon reaching home that the full light seem to burst over them. The Master answered by pointing to a hanging lamp overhead, which cast a large circle of shadow on the table, and said: "Directly under the lamp there is always a shadow. It is only when one comes out from under his shadow. It is only when one comes out from under this shadow that one receives the full benefit of the direct rays."

During the first part of our 1921 visit we were only three at the Pilgrim House. 'Abdu'l-Bahá seemed to feel that we were lonely (perhaps because the year before we had been nineteen or twenty together) and due to this gave us a great deal of His time. He came many mornings about 11 o'clock, after He had taken His walk, and rested in one of the bedrooms for a short while. Then He would sit at the open doorway and talk to us. One morning He told us of two things that had happened before he came to us. One of the He has performed." This is how it came about that 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of these miracles He had sent us, early that morning, a large silk handkerchief of jasmine blossoms, from the garden at Bahjí, with which to decorate the dining-table. When I thanked the Master for them, and said how heavenly the perfume was, He said: "Yes, I have given some of them also to an English officer who came to me this morning in great distress because his wife is ill unto death. He begged me to pray for him that his wife might be healed. I gave him a handful of these blossoms to take to her, told him that she must inhale the perfume and that I would pray for her. Now she will recover."

A few minutes later the Master said: "I shall tell you something that happened while I was taking my walk," and began to laugh as if recalling something very amusing. He began: "About a year ago an old, old man, whose house I pass sometimes when walking came out to the gate to speak to me. He said that he was very sad because his greatest wish in life had never been fulfilled – and that was to have a child; he and his wife were old now and hope was gone, but perhaps if I would pray for them God might hear it and send them a child. I promised him I would pray for him that his wish be fulfilled. I had not seen the man again until today, and as I passed the house he came running on the road and held up the tiniest baby I have ever seen – just so big." And the Master laughing heartily, marked off between His hands a space so short that it was inconceivable any baby could be so tiny and live.

During the latter part of our visit other pilgrims joined us and many scientific questions were asked. 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered these, but said He preferred to have the conversation held to more spiritual lines, especially when some expected guests from Beirut should arrive. Two of the questions recalled were as follow:

Q. "Are the planets inhabited?"

A. "Yes, but not with our form of life, each kind must have its own element."

Q. "What is the cause of sun-spots?"

A. "Volcanic eruption of radium."

On another occasion 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that in the future all countries would become tea drinkers – such as China, England, Japan and Russia are today. He explained that tea aids digestion and opens the door to spiritual influences, whereas coffee is disintegrating (due to the pulverized particles it contains) and is a physical stimulant.

When we were a large group at the Pilgrim House, as in the Spring of 1920, there was occasionally a conflict of opinion as to some happening of the day. I recall one morning in particular when argument had waxed hot over the loss of a piece of jewellery in front of the Shrine of the Báb. One of the pilgrims said that this was symbolic, the meaning was clear that all such silly vanities must be lost at Haifa, but the whole gathering dissented with one voice. Then the advocate of no jewellery carried _____ battle was in full force when we became aware that the Master had entered the room. One moment of His presence was sufficient to make us realize the banality of our conversation and the futility of such argument. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá glanced around the long table where we were sitting and designation each in turn, said: "I find Mrs. Blank suitably dressed for her position in life (her dress was of the best quality and workmanship to be had) as also Mrs. , " – whose dress was of gingham cut on the lines of a wrapper. In referring to this incident later, the Master said to me: "When there are so many in one house there is apt to be friction, but you must be the peacemaker. When the conversation turns to war you must lead it back to peace – or leave." I said that these were almost the first words I could recall from my childhood, as my grandmother never tired of teaching us: "Blessed is the _aker." The Master answered: "And today she is enjoying the Kingdom of God for ____ alone."

On the last day of our 1921 visit I was numbed by the pain of the coming separation; I must have sensed that it was to be my last time with the Master. Several times during that day I was recalled to His home and He explained that it was a special favour due to my leaving. When my _____ our last farewell, and showing very _____

_____. Now _____

_____ in person _____ many who live here _____ not know me in spirit. Then. _____ a streak of sunlight on the floor, He said: "Although the sun is so far away yet it is light is ever with you, and so no matter where you may be shall always near you."

I feel that these words of promise should give to each believer who had not the opportunity of seeing the Master in the body that measure of happiness that

He so wished for all of us.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá so seldom did thing repetitions that when such a thing occurred we know that it had a special significance.

During one of my visits to Haifa, the Master came daily the Pilgrims House to take a midday meal with us. We were always awaiting Him in the central hall, _____ as a dining room, upon entering He would shake hands with each of us.

Our several days in suc_____ ‘Abdu’l-baha went to Mrs. S_____ and and, _____ shaking hands, _____ her that He would now squeeze her hand and she must see if she could resist it.

Soon Mrs. S_____ was jumping around frantically, squealing and laughing at the same time. As she was very tall and liquefied person, these unusual girations created a comical sight and we were all convulsed with laughter, in which the Master joined heartily.

When Mrs. S_____ could endure no more, the Master released her hand and said that now she must try to do the same to Him. She made a tremendous effort, using both hands in order to produce the save result, but to no avail. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stood ingly motionless and hers, _____ to admit herself finally _____.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá turned to me and said I must meditate on this when I returned home.

The next day this was repeated and the next. Each time, He said I must meditate on this.

Spring

Twenty one years I have never been able to come to any conclusion that did not come too obvious to hear _____ relation to what the Master included. Only within the past week has a believer _____ a solution that would _____ to answer the question. _____ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s hand was flexible, relaxed and gave with _____ pressure placed upon it, while the hand of Mrs. S_____ was rigid – the knuckles stiffened – and pain was the result of every motion to release herself.

Could it not be that the Master wanted us to learn through a physical demonstration the spiritual value of non-resistance to the painful experiences of our lives – or the real viewing of “radiant acquiescence”?

To be tense in mind or body brings its own penalty, but the flexibility exhibited by the Master assures one of vulnerability.

If we allow ourselves to become rigid in our attitude toward life and in our actions, the result will be not only pain but a deprivation of much of the happiness which the Master always stressed and without which, He said, spiritual progress was impossible.

Thus, I believe, was the lesson ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wanted me to learn.

Feb 7 to 18, 1921

2/7/21

We four left Cairo Sunday Evening – Arna, Mrs. Houser, Mr. Will Remey – amid the usual excitement of a hurried departure. Made the train and change at Kantara, found sleepers waiting, most comfortable, Excellent service – and a comfortable trip, nearing the Bay of Haifa about noon Monday and the town on time at one o'clock.

Mrs. Houser and I were so excited with the realization that we had reached at last after over a month's travel our destination that we were in a tremble all over. We lost the first view of the Bay but not of the friends. We all saw Mason Remey first and we were all so glad on account of Will's pleasure in finding him. Then Fugeta, Arthur Redeen, A. Zizullah who took care of everything, bags and all. Brought us up in the car to the Pilgrim House.

How simple, plan unusual, but such a welcome – such a feeling of having reached home at last.

Mason, the boys, Fugeta and Arthur did everything for our comfort. We had luncheon and then a long rest. After which tea was served and we then drove out on the plain of Haifa. We saw the tomb of the Báb way up the mountain there and many other points of interest. The school of the prophets, The Monastery, The Convent where the nuns are waiting the second coming of Christ – the nearness of the Bible – the same surrounding – changed so little seems so real.

We saw the wonderful coloring on the Bay with the red tiled roofs of the low houses.

We arrived home from this wonderful drive and the Master _____ for us at once. We went together, Arna, Mrs. Houser and myself. The Master was resting in bed – welcomed us. Prayed that we _____ all be confirmed – said that we had come at a good time _____ the cold and before the heat. He asked about our journey _____ health comfort. He then spoke of our visiting the fri_____ whenever we went and about his welcome when he went among _____ friends. He gave messages from friends and he said the _____ of the friends here always helped to make him well. _____ Master has seen no one for over two weeks and we all _____ it a wonderful privilege to see him.

He daid goodnight with such love and smiled – we all _____ very much overcome.

Prayer

_____ for every soul who wishes to carry it for protection. _____ Lord: Thou knowest that the souls are surrounded by mis_____ by calamities and afflictions. Every calamity hovers _____ and every black ordeal attacks him like the over-_____ serpent. He has no shelter or refuge save they pro_, thy watchfulness, they preservation, and thy safety, _____ Merciful.

O My Lord: Make thy protection my armour, they watchfulness my shield, the threshold of the door of thy singleness my fortress, thy care and the watchfulness my refuge and asylum. Protect me from the danger of myself and guard me from every suffering disease, affliction end difficulty – verily thou art the protector, the watchful, the preserve, the pair feet snd verily, thou art the !merciful, the Compassionate.

2/8/21

‘Abdu’l-Bahá – The Master sent or us after tea. We went and waited in the garden with Rúḥá Khanoum daughter of the Master. Their welcome end friendliness was lovely. Finally the Master called and Rúḥá Khanoum interpresed. The Master looked stronger than the night before. He was seated upon a small couch looking out of the window at his side from time to time as he talked. Arna showed him Patti’s pictures and he looked very happy. Then Arna asked how he could like us to return and the Master answered that he wished us to go to Paris and London and meet the Bahá’is there. Then the Master said that it was good to travel in the cause of God and bring the message to new people. That service not in the cause of God was without avail. He spoke of Mr. Wilson, Napoleon, Bismark, and of the uselessness of the service to their countries, and then of their death all alone and deserted. The Master then told of Mary Magdalene and that while in Paris a beautiful Cathedral was built in her honor – she has lived because of her work in God’s cause. We spoke of Mrs. Houser’s going around the world and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wished that all success might be hers.

We asked that we might be confirmed in God ‘s work and The Master said He prayed that we might, that God never left us, that the Holy Ghost would direct us in all we tried to teach. That we were like his army each a soldier sent out and that he never left us.

The Master stood and shook hands with each of us and we left with Rúḥá Khonoum.

The Tomb of the Báḥ

Rube Khonoum took us for a drive up Mt. Carmel and to the tomb. We first went to the Main assembly room and waited, were served tea and fruit. Talked together mostly about the education of children. She is so unlike an Oriental woman – so progressive – so anxious that her children receive the best education and tut they should be free. Her little girls will never wear the veil.

We then went to the Tomb. After removing one shoes and washing o hands with Nose water, we entered and stood facing the room of the tomb. Someone chanted a prayer after which we each knelt and prayed at the door. It was all so simple, quiet and peaceful. A wonderful calm spell hard beyond words to explain.

We came out to ace the beautiful afterglow just fading on the sky over the blue, blue bay of Haifa.

May Cod confirm us and make us steadfast in his cause.

2/10/21

This is a wonderful wing morning. The air is full at warm sunshine. Everything is full of life.

We were called to the Master and he greeted us with such radiant welcome saying, over and over, “Welcome, you are very welcome.” The Master then talked to us about health and disease saying that disease was always contagious but it was not so in regard to health. That the nature of man was always to reach out and seek the bad – that person life without training from the spiritual sources was always seeking tile bed and destroying the good. Often men were worse than animas. A wolf will destroy one ship while man will kill many of his own kind in one stroke.

Arna asked about why spiritual person were ill. The Master answered that there were two kinds of disease, physical and spiritual and that the diseases caused infections were physical and attack the physical body according to natural laws. All physical life is subject to natural laws. That spiritual diseases were caused by shock, injury, sorrow, and greet exposure to hardship. Spiritual diseases were often due to mental fatigue. Consumption was a disease of a spiritual nature in this sense. The Master said that one might have a very terrible dream of such a nature that the mind would become affected and result in lose of mental faculties. This would be spiritual disease.

The Master approved of work such as I have tried and said it was good not to mind what criticisms were made.

2/11/21

This place of perfect peace. The Master called for us about two o'clock. All the ladies, Mrs. Morton, Ven Patton, Perron Houser and myself. Arna asked about sending children to Sunday School and the Master said it would be much better to send them to a Bahá'í Sunday School as the Christians do not teach Christ in the true spirit of rather in reality.

The Master then talked about the Bahá'í cause in its relations to all other religions, Christian, Jew, all and that the Bahá'í teaching were inclusive. They contained the principles of each religion not only did a Christian or a Jew understand his own religion better but embraced the other prophets. There (?) also found not only interest but the solutions of their questions in the Cause. Each individual could find the things in which he was most interested. The economist found laws if one wanted freedom it was there.

The Master then told the story of the Jew who was tried in a court in Persia because he became a Bahá'í and he said he was not guilty because he still believed in his own religion and at the same he believed in Christ and the Bible and also Muḥammad and the Qur'án and though he were put to death he would not deny Christ. They tried to frighten him but he remained firm. And at last (?)

2/12/21

We left by train early for 'Akká. It was a beautiful day. The sun over the sea and land was bright and clear. We entered old prison city through the main gate and walked through the Gate to the barracks. The English are now cleaning and remodelling putting in (?)

We walked up the long dark hill, climbed the stone steps by the passage of many feet to the rooms above where the holy Family were imprisoned. The room where Bahá'u'lláh wrote the tablet to the kings and where the son of Bahá'u'lláh was killed. From there we went to the first house where Bahá'u'lláh was kept for seven years and then through to the second room where there were some of his belongings. He was sunlight and air. The room faced the sea and there was a balcony on three sides. For two years Bahá'u'lláh occupied these rooms and was in comfort for the only time during his imprisonment.

We then went through the Bazaars and by carriage to Bahjí and visited the tomb no words can describe the feeling caused by the wonderful presence.

The beauty - simplicity - fragrance - the majesty. Leaving the tomb we had luncheon and then drove to the garden of Riḍván. Home by carriage along the Beach in the late afternoon.

In the early evening we were called to the Master and he asked us if we had enjoyed our visit if we were happy – he spoke only a little but made us very happy.

He said it was not the length of time we staid but our meeting, that many came and staid only a day and went away and great results followed the meetings. Also if we carried out the laws of Bahá'u'lláh we would never be separated.

Sunday 2/13/21

We spent a quiet day most of it with Rúhâ at her home. After having been shown the pictures of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh by the Greatest Holy Leaf, These treasures are wonderful. A little of the intense feeling one has at the tomb is felt as one studies the picture of Bahá'u'lláh. The wonderful face is so intense and so fine. Eyes are so clear and piercing.

The Great Holy Leaf also had a wonderful picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in colors. Seemed as if it was done only yesterday, the likeness was so perfect. The dear little woman showed 'us many treasures and among them was the hair, of Bahá'u'lláh which she had cared for herself. It was black and still full of life.

We remained out in the sunshine taking pictures until lunch time. Tea the late afternoon. We drove up to the tomb of the Báb. We sat out in the balcony of the keepers house and enjoyed the wonderful view, We talked together and with some of the other Pilgrims and then one at a time went into the tomb.

After we came home, the Master sent for us and we had a Short talk. We were made happier that at any other time. The Master said that we were welcome because we came to him in spirit and our meeting was one of the spirit. That many came and there was only a physical Meeting, but with us we were welcome because of the spiritual meeting.

Monday 2/14/21

It has rained very hard all morning we have read and mended – rested until Rúhâ Khanoum came and took us to the Master. The Master was in his own room for the first time. His face was very beautiful and expressive.

He spoke to us of the life and sacrifice of Christ: of his death and of his goodness and gentleness, of the forgiving Christ. Truly no one can make Christ allying personality save 'Abdu'l-Bahá. His teachings to us have been filled with the love of Christ. The Master brought out the point of the unreasonableness of the teaching that all people before the birth of Christ sacrifice save all.

Tuesday 2/15/21

We saw the Master with Mrs. Van Patten and Mrs. Morton during the early afternoon and the Master spoke of how short a time we had been here, but that time was so small a factor that many people come for only a d-day and great results occurred great benefits to humanity that others came for a long period and without results.

The Master then spoke of the strength and love would come to us if we made every effort to teach. Tea the afternoon we were called to talk about Mrs. True's cable and the conversation.

The Master called us during the morning. He was so happy and made us so happy. He said we were all good Bahá'í. the (?) bounty was without limit full and free.

All our friends know that my husband and I made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Our object was to visit a great spiritual teacher living there. Some of our friends thought that we had gone to Persia, however, this we did not; we visited an illustrious family of Persians living in Haifa, Syria, and who, banished and exiled from their native country, came to stay in Palestine.

We first cabled to that great teacher, asking permission to come to visit him. The reply came at the end of one week – a cable with the single word: “Permission.” We were delighted over this, and began immediately to make preparation for our departure. Within a short time we were on the Atlantic, sailing for France. Arrived in France, we first went to Paris to visit some friends there. From Paris we went to Switzerland, which is our native country. It would form a separate chapter to relate of this return to our native land, of the coming back to the scenes of one’s childhood and early youth, of the seeing again of the “old folks at home”, suffice it to say that it was like dreams fulfilled and prayers answered. From Switzerland we went to Germany, to visit there some friends of that Great Teacher. We were, delighted with them. We experienced for the first time the greatness of such a world-union and world-brotherhood, as taught by this Great Teacher. At last we came to Venice, Italy, where we embarked for Alexandria, Egypt, a three days’ trip on the Adriatic Sea, From Alexandria, we came by train to Cairo. There again we met the friends of that Great Teacher. We knew we would met these friends in Cairo, that they belonged o another race, had another color and spoke another language, but what of the language of love which is the load-stone of hearts, and the color of brotherhood which is the same in every land? We remained with those friends until an inner voice told us that it was time to hasten to our final point of destination. It was a warm November day when we left these friends for Haifa, Palestine. We came by train to Haifa, which is a port city with a beautiful harbour. More and more ships from all parts of the world come to this port now since the war and since England has the government of Palestine, or at least of a great part of it.

The harbour of Haifa is not developed yet, but will be. People who come by steamer to Haifa are always enchanted by the harbour which presents the most beautiful panorama in the world.

Mount Carmel, the most mentioned of all the biblical Mountains, rises – out of the Mediterranean at Haifa. Mount Carmel means “vineyard of the Lord.” It is the holy mountain of the Holy Land. To see its beautiful situation, to see it in its emerald greenness, and to not think of the psalmist’s words would be impossible. The psalmist, speaking of Mount Carmel, says: “Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth.” The Orient and the Occident have never in the past had much relation with each other. Through history we can ascertain the cause. There was a time when the Orient possessed all the culture and civilization and all the wealth and splendor of the world and the Occident was in darkness and comparative poverty. But then came a time when all this was reversed. From that time to this the Orient has lived on the remnant of its former splendor and greatness. Now a new and great change has come into the world, a new spiritual light is shining, and under its rays the east and the west – the Orient and the Occident – will rise together to a higher state of civilization than either one has ever had.

Through this light our eyes are opened to things we never saw before. One of the things is the realization of the marvellous possibilities of the harbour of Haifa – and of the near-by biblical plain of Esdraelon. Through that plain the shortest Way to the Far East can easily be effected. This is of great importance to the world. And it would not be so great an undertaking as has been the Panama or the Suez Canal.

It is then through the Holy Land – the heart of the world - that the Orient and the Occident will finally be united. The outer relation which already exists between those countries will be followed by an inner relation between them and all strangeness and foreignness will disappear.

But to come back: We had reached Haifa and were met by new oriental friends who spoke our language well, and who made us very happy by their cordial welcome. They took charge of our baggage and drove us in a Ford to the Pilgrim House. There we found several other American pilgrims whom we did not know, but who welcomed us as old friends. There are two Pilgrim Houses on the slope of Mount Carmel: one was built by an oriental friend to accommodate the pilgrims from the oriental world, and another by an American friend to accommodate the pilgrims from the western world. Many people from different countries came steadily to visit “The Master at Haifa.”

The midday meal was waiting to be served on our arrival at the Pilgrim House. Our revered Host was not present, nor any member of His family. We were told that we would meet Him in the afternoon. We awaited His coming eagerly but knew that His work in the world was the very hardest that it is possible for any man to have.

At last we saw Him coming down the road and suddenly we found ourselves in the room with Him. One must know that to meet with that great One was a matter quite different from meeting anyone else, kings and princes • included. It is almost impossible to describe just what one experienced in being with Him. It is certain that the soul was stirred to its very depth. In His presence the soul realized that it stood in the presence of its real master. His personality was a mirror of holiness and sanctity. His life had been perfect in all respects. In the pure mirror of His self one could see one's own self. And what one saw was not what one thought one was, but what one really was. As thus we stood in His holy presence we felt aware of our un-worthiness; we became conscious of our faults and shortcomings; we saw ourselves in our imperfections. We could only take refuge in the ocean of His understanding and in the sea of His love - Which seemed to us vaster than the expanse of the universe! He greeted-us, taking our hands in His and speaking welcoming words in Persian, and bade us be seated. We felt overwhelmed and barely could find words to answer Him. Our beings were thrown into commotion by meeting Him. We felt as though we, were in the presence of a king before whom all things Are revealed and disclosed he spoke to each one in the room and after a short visit rose to leave, saying that He would come again, to be with us at the evening meal.

At about eight o'clock He returned. He bade us be seated at the table, assigning us seats beside Him. We ate Persian food, It was delicious. It seemed to taste better than food of other countries.

There were about twelve people at the table, of different nationalities and tongues, and two others waited upon us. As I mentioned before, our Host's nationality and language were Persian, so He spoke to us through an interpreter - one of His grandsons.

Our Host spoke blessed ____ He said the soul needed food as well as the body. Even as the body would die if the material food were not forth coming, so would the soul die if the spiritual food would not reach it. If a person would not become spiritually nourished he could not be called Pa living soul." That the food of the soul consisted in turning to God, in seeking to attain the realities of life and acquiring divine perfection, in man's good actions and deeds, that only such a soul was living, and that all others were dead. He explained the words of Christ "Let the dead bury the dead," Saying by this was meant that those are dead who are bereft of spiritual attributes, those who do not partake of spiritual food, that those are dead, although in body are living.

At the close of the meal He rose, and all of us did the same. He bade us goodnight and to rest well, and then went away, accompanied by His grandson. On the next day we had the happiness of seeing Him again at table with us. Again He spoke heavenly divine words to us. He spoke of Christ. He said that by "Christ" was meant the “Spirit of God”, that by “Christ” was meant the teachings – Christ’s teachings. He said that only such as carry out the teachings of Christ were Christians, and that all others were not, and that only such as live the life that Christ taught, know Christ, and that all other do not know Him. He spoke of the tribulations and ordeals, the difficulties, and hardships of the life of Christ on earth, and of all that He suffered for our sake, that we might attain to enlightenment, and our ignorance be changed into knowledge, and our faults into virtues. He spoke of the hardships and trials of the disciples and of their endurance and fortitude in the path of God and of the fruit that their troubles bore. He enjoined us to be like those disciples – to do the work they did – to live the life they lived, and to endure the hardships they endured – to do all these things for the sake of God.

He spoke of the reality of Christ until we began to grasp it as never before, until it seemed as though Christ Himself was in the room with us, in our midst, seated at the table, speaking to us, teaching us..... On the next day we were taken in a carriage to the summit of Mount Carmel. It was a large carriage with three bench-seats in it and canvas-sides that could be rolled up. It had heavy wheels and was drawn by two strong horses. It is a stony road that leads to the top of Mount Carmel. We stopped on the way to look at the Cave of Elijah. We spoke of the biblical story, of the 400 prophets of Baal and of Elijah’s conquest and further up we had a view of the river Kishon.

On the top of Mount Carmel is a monastery inhabited by Carmelite Monks. These monks have awaited the coming of the Lord on Mount Carmel for many years. They think that the Lord will descend on Mount Carmel from heaven. They have taken this passage of scripture literally, as so many do. It says that the Lord is to come and live there, on Mount Carmel, where He shall invite the nations, where men shall come from the east and from the west and from the north and the south, and shall sit down in His kingdom, where He shall teach them of His ways. Besides these Carmelite monks there is also an interesting colony of settlers in the town of Haifa, at the foot of Mount Carmel, who came there nearly fifty years ago for the sole purpose of seeing the Lord’s coming on Mount Carmel. They are called the “Templars,” a sect which originated in Germany. It is true that the time for the fulfilment of biblical prophecies is at hand, and that these are the days for man’s apprehension of the promised final Messiah upon earth.

My husband and I went to see some of these German people in the colony. Over the doors of some of their houses we read, hewn in stone, biblical verses relating to the coming of the Lord. “The Lord is nigh”; over another: “Watch and pray, for ye know not what hour the Son of Man cometh”; and over another: “When the Son of Man cometh, will He find faith on earth?” They are good, kind. • folks, these settlers, engaged in commerce and trade, but not yet sufficiently spiritually awake to their present surroundings. They are still looking for the coming of the Lord. It is the same with these Carmelite monks....

Our beloved Host had often. spent days at a time on Mount Carmel; not at the very top, but some distance up where He had a tent; and, when there, the people would go up to see Him. Isaiah says: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, The view from Mount Carmel is superb and might remind one of many more prophecies of the psalmist and the prophets. In the distance one sees the Lebanon Mountains. Isaiah says: "And the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it." By this Isaiah meant that the famed beauty of the Lebanons would in no wise rival the beauty of Carmel. At our feet we saw the Mediterranean and the beautiful harbour of Haifa and the nine-mile long beach of Haifa to the ancient city of 'Akká, walled and fortified, where our divine Host was so.. long a prisoner with His Father. The nine-mile long beach is beautiful and remarkable in its form of a half-circle, and like an embracing arm, ready to receive the world.

While looking at the superb panorama, we were told of a prophecy uttered by our Great Teacher, regarding Mount Carmel quote it here:

"In the future the distance between Haifa and 'Akká will be built up and the two cities will join and clasp hands, becoming the two terminal sections of one mighty Metropolis. As I look now over this • scene I see so clearly that it will become one of the first emporiums of the World: this great semi-circular bay will be transformed into the finest harbour wherein ships from all nations will seek shelter and refuge; the great vessels of all people will come to this port, bringing on their decks thousands and thousands of men and women from every part of the globe; the mountains and the plains will be dotted with the most modern buildings and palaces; industries will be established and various institutions of a philanthropic nature will be founded; the flowers of civilization and culture from all nations will be brought here to blend their fragrances together and blaze the.... way for the brotherhood of man; wonderful gardens, orchards, groves and parks will be laid out on all sides; at night the great city will be lighted by electricity; the entire harbour from 'Akká to Haifa will be one path of illumination; powerful search – lights will be placed on both sides of Mount Carmel to guide the steamers, and Mount Carmel itself from top to bottom will be submerged into a sea of lights. A person standing on the summit of Mount Carmel and passengers of the steamers coming to it will look upon the most sublime spectacle of the whole world."

These are wonderful words which the future undoubtedly will see, fulfilled.

Suddenly all of our ideas and plans became changed – our beloved Host departed this life. He did not suffer any previous illness. He worked hard to the last day of His life. He had reached His 77th year.

His passing was a momentous happening and a great event. The news of it was telegraphed all over the earth and appeared in all the newspapers of the world. With it were brought reviews of His great life, and expositions of the principles of His Teachings.

Thousands walked in His funeral procession, my husband and myself among them. He was buried on Mount Carmel.

After the great experience Of His death and burial, when we thought we would soon have to leave, we were allowed, to stay 7 weeks, more in the Pilgrim House near the bereft and mourning members of His household, all holy people, every one of them severed from the things of this world, living a life of utmost service and devotion to mankind in the path of God. One day I found myself writing in my diary: "These are the real resurrected disciples of Christ." Often at early dawn we would arise to ascend Mount Carmel to His shrine, and, there fill our hearts with hopes of performing such service and deeds as we witnessed coming from them.

At last we realized that the time had come when the portals of our visit to Haifa had to close. Our going opened the way for new pilgrims of which there are ever new ones.

Sadly we made our last visit to the shrine, and then took leave from our spiritual friends. We left them with the hope of returning to theta at another time. In body we left, but in spirit we stayed. The day before we left Haifa, we made a journey to Nazareth in the morning and returned to Haifa in the evening. From this it can be seen that Nazareth is not far from Haifa and Mount Carmel. In fact we heard that our departed Teacher had said that Jesus Christ had many, many times been upon Mount Carmel.

The first stoppong place on our homeward journey was Jerusalem. Jerusalem is the triune holy city of the world. It is the holy city of the Jews, the Christians, and the Muḥammadans. To all these three Jerusalem is equally sacred. It is their holy city because it is the place where their particular holy shrines once stood or even now stand – such as the Mosque of Omar, which stands there now. Jerusalem is sacred to the Jews because of the promises given them in the Old Testament. To the Christian, Jerusalem is sacred because of the life and death of our Lord Jesus Christ there. To the Muḥammadan Jerusalem is sacred because of the Mosque there, and because Muḥammad prayed there, and the Muḥammadans have been the possessors of Jerusalem for nearly thirteen hundred years. A Muḥammadan will tell you that one prayer at Jerusalem is worth a thousand prayers elsewhere.

It always seemed that the Jews had a greater right to the Holy Land than all other people, because it was their erstwhile father-land, i. e., from the time of Abraham to the time of the passing of their kingdom. To this day and age the Jews are wailing at the Wailing Wall of Jerusalem, where they weep and pray for the restoration of the glory they once had. They wail the seventy-ninth psalm: "Oh God, the heathen have come unto thine inheritance."

"The holy temple have they defiled, they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. We are become a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and derision to them round about us... How long, Lord? Wilt Thou be angry forever? Shall Thy jealousy burn forever?..."

The Jews are right in their wailing. But they shall not wail forever. Daniel gives the prophecy. The time is at hand, but those wailing ones do not yet know it.

In Revelations it says that their tears shall be wiped away.

Solomon built his glorious Temple upon the top of Mount Moriah at Jerusalem, which is one other of the, holy mountains of the Holy Land. Solomon built this temple in commemoration of the sacrifice. of Abraham, when Abraham was ready to offer his son, Isaac. In that story is contained the great symbol of the ages; it is the symbol of our willingness to sacrifice what is dearest for the sake of God, whenever this call should come. The Jews understood this symbol well. It is upon that holy mountain that Solomon built his temple three thousand years after Abraham. Abraham was upon that mountain four thousand years ago and it has since been the great altar of the world.

The Muḥammadans built their Mosque upon that exact spot over a thousand years ago. They built it over the same place that held. Solomon's Temple. And why?

First, we must know that the patriarch Abraham had tracted several marriages – incidentally three, two of which come into .relation here: One with Sarah, who bore Isaac from whom the Jews and Christians sprang, and one with Hagar, who bore Ishmael from whom the Muḥammadans sprang.

Thus Abraham is the progenitor of the Muḥammadans as well as of the Jews and Christians. Thus, Abraham is of the same importance to the Muḥammadans as he is to the Jews and Christians; and the Muḥammadans have the same love and reverence for Abraham as the Jews and Christians have. This is the reason why the Muḥammadans built their Mosque around that same great altar of the world, and this is the reason that Jerusalem is the triune Holy City – sacred to the Jew, to the Christian, and to the Muḥammadan.

But outside of these, God has other children. He has Hindoos, Buddhists, Fire Worshippers, Sun Worshippers, and others. They too will be regenerated and renewed in this great day of light and shall unite with others in the same worship of the One God... “Were shall the nations meet?” “Where is the worshipping place of the nations of the earth?” The psalmist replies: “Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth!” .....

Dear Friends,

It is well known that the loved ones of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in every part of the world, are anxiously waiting to receive some details of the closing events of His unique and wonderful life. For this reason the present account is being written.

We have now come to realize that the Master knew the day and hour when, His mission on earth being finished, He would return to the shelter of heaven. He was, however, careful that His family should not have any premonition of the coming sorrow. It seemed as though their eyes were veiled by Him, with His ever-loving consideration for His dear ones, that they should not see the significance of certain dreams and other signs of the culminating event. This they now realize was His thought for them, in order that their strength might be preserved to face the great ordeal when it should arrive, that they should not be devitalized by anguish of mind in its anticipation.

Out of the many signs of the approach of the hour when He could say of His work on earth: "It is finished," the following two dreams seem remarkable. Less than eight weeks before His passing the Master related this to His family:

"I seemed to be standing within a great Mosque, in the inmost shrine, facing the Qiblih (that Point of Adoration whereunto the worshippers turn, as in a Christian church to the East) in the place of the Imám himself. I became aware that a large number of people were flocking into the Mosque; more and yet more crowded in, taking their places in rows behind me, until there was a vast multitude. As I stood I raised loudly the 'Call to Prayer.' Suddenly the thought came to me to go forth from the Mosque.

When I found myself outside I said within myself, 'For what reason came I forth, not having led the prayer? But it matters not; now that I have uttered the Call to Prayer, the vast multitude will of themselves chant the prayer.'"

When the Master had passed away, His family pondered over this dream and interpreted it thus:

He had called that same vast multitude all peoples, all religions, all races, all nations and all kingdoms to Unity and Peace, to universal Love and Brotherhood; and having called them, He returned to God the Beloved, at Whose command He had raised the Majestic Call, had given the Divine Message. This same multitude the peoples, religions, races, nations and kingdoms would continue the WORK to which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had called them, and would of themselves press forward to its accomplishment.

A few weeks after the preceding dream the Master came in from the solitary room in the garden, which He had occupied of late, and said:

I dreamed a dream, and behold, the Blessed Beauty [Bahá'u'lláh] came and said unto me, 'Destroy this room!'"

The family, who had been wishing that He would come and sleep in the house, not being happy that He should be alone at night, exclaimed, "Yes Master, we think your dream means that You should leave that room and come into the house." When He heard this from us, He smiled meaningly, as though not agreeing with our interpretation. Afterwards we understood that by the "room" was meant the temple of His body.

A month before His last hour, Doctor Sulaymán Rafat Bey, a Turkish friend, who was a guest in the house, received a telegram telling him of the sudden death of his brother. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, speaking words of comfort to him, whispered, "Sorrow not, for he is only transferred from this plane to a higher one; I too shall soon be transferred, for my days are numbered." Then, patting him gently on the shoulder, He looked him in the face and said, "And it will be in the days that are shortly to come."

In the same week He revealed a Tablet to America, in which is the following prayer:

“Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá [O Thou the Glory of Glories]! I have renounced the world and the people thereof, and am heartbroken and sorely afflicted because of the unfaithful. In the cage of this world I flutter even as a frightened bird, and yearn every day to take my flight unto Thy Kingdom.

“Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá! Make me to drink of the cup of sacrifice, and set me free. Relieve me from these woes and trials, from these afflictions and troubles. Thou art He that aideth, that succoureth, that protecteth, that stretcheth forth the hand of help.”

On the last Friday morning of His stay on earth (November 25th), He said to His daughters: “The wedding of Khusraw must take place today. If you are too much occupied, I myself will make the necessary preparations, for it must take place this day.” (Khusraw is one of the favoured and trusted servants of the Master’s Household).

‘Abdu’l-Bahá attended the noonday prayer at the Mosque. When He came out He found the poor waiting for the alms, which it was His custom to give every Friday. This day, as usual, He stood, in spite of very great fatigue, whilst He gave a coin to every one with His own hands.

After lunch He dictated some Tablets, His last ones, to Rúhí Effendi. When He had rested He walked in the garden. He seemed to be in a deep reverie.

His good and faithful servant, Isma’il Áqá, relates the following:

“Some time, about twenty days before my Master passed away, I was near the garden when I heard Him summon an old believer saying:

‘Come with me that we may admire together the beauty of the garden. Behold, what the spirit of devotion is able to achieve! This flourishing place was, a few years ago, but a heap of stones, and now it is verdant with foliage and flowers. My desire is that after I am gone the loved ones may all arise to serve the Divine Cause and, please God, so it shall be. Ere long men will arise who shall bring life to the world.’

“A few days after this He said: ‘I am fatigued! The hour is come when I must leave everything and take my flight. I am too weary to walk.’ Then He said: ‘It was during the closing days of the Blessed Beauty, when I was engaged in gathering together His papers, which were strewn over the sofa in His writing chamber at Bahjí, that He turned to me and said, “It is of no use to gather them, I must leave them and flee away.”

‘I also have finished my work, I can do nothing more, therefore must I leave it and take my departure.’

“Three Days before His ascension whilst seated in the garden, He called me and said, ‘I am sick with fatigue. Bring two of your oranges for me that I may eat them for your sake.' This I did, and He, having eaten them, turned to me, saying, 'Have you any of your sweet lemons?' He bade me fetch a few.... Whilst I was plucking them, He came over to the tree, saying, 'Nay, but I must gather them with my own hands.' Having eaten of the fruit, He turned to me and asked, 'Do you desire anything more?' Then with a pathetic gesture of His hands, He touchingly, emphatically and deliberately said:

'Now it is finished, it is finished!'

These significant words penetrated my very soul. I felt each time He uttered them as if a knife were struck into my heart. I understood His meaning but never dreamed His end was so nigh."

It was Isma'il Áqá who had been the Master's gardener for well nigh thirty years who, in the first week after his bereavement, driven by hopeless grief, quietly disposed of all his belongings, made his will, went to the Master's sister and craved her pardon for any misdeeds he had committed. He then delivered the key of the garden to a trusted servant of the Household and, taking with him means whereby to end his life at his beloved Master's Tomb, walked up the Mountain to that sacred place, three times circled round it and would have succeeded in taking his life had it not been for the opportune arrival of a friend, who reached him in time to prevent the accomplishment of his tragic intention.

Later in the evening of Friday, He ['Abdu'l-Bahá] blessed the bride and bridegroom who had just been married. He spoke impressively to them. "Khusraw," He said, "you have spent your childhood and youth in the service of this house; it is my hope that you will grow old under the same roof, ever and always serving God."

During the evening He attended the usual meeting of the friends in His own audience chamber.

In the morning of Saturday, November 26th, He arose early, came to the tea room and had some tea. He asked for the fur-lined coat which had belonged to Bahá'u'lláh. He often put on this coat when He was cold or did not feel well, He so loved it. He then withdrew to His room, lay down on His bed and said, "Cover me up. I am very cold. Last night I did not sleep well, I felt cold. This is serious, it is the beginning."

After more blankets had been put on, He asked for the fur coat He had taken off to be placed over Him. That day He was rather feverish. In the evening His temperature rose still higher, but during the night the fever left Him. After midnight He asked for some tea.

On Sunday morning (November 27th) He said, "I am quite well and will get up as usual and have tea with you in the tea room." After He had dressed He was persuaded to remain on the sofa in His room.

In the afternoon He sent all the friends up to the Tomb of the Báb, where on the occasion of the anniversary of the declaration of the Covenant a feast was being held, offered by a Parsi pilgrim who had lately arrived from India.

At four in the afternoon, being on the sofa in His room, He said: "Ask my sister and all the family to come and have tea with me."

After tea the Mufti of Haifa and the head of the Municipality, with another visitor, were received by Him. They remained about an hour. He spoke to them about Bahá'u'lláh, related to them His second dream, showed them extraordinary kindness and even more than His usual courtesy. He then bade them farewell, walking with them to the outer door in spite of their pleading that He should remain resting on His sofa. He then received a visit from the head of the police, an Englishman, who, too, had his share of the Master's gracious kindness. To him He gave some silk hand-woven Persian handkerchiefs, which he very greatly appreciated.

His four sons-in-law and Rúhí Effendi came to Him after returning from the gathering on the mountain. They said to Him: "The giver of the feast was unhappy because You were not there." He said unto them:

"But I was there, though my body was absent, my spirit was there in your midst. I was present with the friends at the Tomb. The friends must not attach any importance to the absence of my body. In spirit I am, and shall always be, with the friends, even though I be far away."

The same evening He asked after the health of every member of the Household, of the pilgrims and of the friends in Haifa. "Very good, very good" He said when told that none were ill. This was His very last utterance concerning His friends.

At eight in the evening He retired to bed after taking a little nourishment, saying: "I am quite well."

He told all the family to go to bed and rest. Two of His daughters, however, stayed with Him. That night the Master had gone to sleep very calmly, quite free from fever. He awoke about 1:15 a.m., got up and walked across to a table where He drank some water. He took off an outer night garment, saying: "I am too warm." He went back to bed and when His daughter, Rúhí Khánum, later on approached, she found Him lying peacefully, and, as He looked into her face, He asked her to lift up the net curtains, saying:

"I have difficulty in breathing, give me more air." Some rose water was brought of which He drank, sitting up in bed to do so, without any help. He again lay down, and as some food was offered Him, He remarked in a clear and distinct voice:

"You wish me to take some food, and I am going?" He gave them a beautiful look. His face was so calm, His expression so serene, they thought Him asleep.

He had gone from the gaze of His loved ones!

The eyes that had always looked out with loving-kindness upon humanity, whether friends or foes, were now closed. The hands that had ever been stretched forth to give alms to the poor and the needy, the halt and the maimed, the blind, the orphan and the widow, had now finished their labour. The feet that, with untiring zeal, had gone upon the ceaseless errands of the Lord of Compassion were now at rest. The lips that had so eloquently championed the cause of the suffering sons of men, were now hushed in silence. The heart that had so powerfully throbbed with wondrous love for the children of God was now stilled. His glorious spirit had passed from the life of earth, from the persecutions of the enemies of righteousness, from the storm and stress of well nigh eighty years of indefatigable toil for the good of others.

His long martyrdom was ended!

Whilst yet the gloom of their bereavement was hanging darkly over the disconsolate ladies of the Household, a grand-daughter of the Master had a wondrous dream of Him; He was speaking with His beloved sister, the Greatest Holy Leaf, in the very room where, in the early hours of the day, it was the custom of the ladies to assemble in His presence, chanting the morning prayers, and to take their morning tea. He turned to her and said: "Wherefore are ye all perturbed, why lament and be sorrowful? With you all I am well pleased. For a long time have I desired to join my Father, the Blessed Beauty. I was ever beseeching Him to take me to His Rose-garden above, and now that my prayer is granted, how happy, how joyous, how rested I am. Therefore grieve not." He then counselled them in many ways, exhorting them to follow at all times the commandments of Bahá'u'lláh.

Early on Monday morning, November 28th, the news of this sudden calamity had spread over the city, causing an unprecedented stir and tumult, and filling all hearts with unutterable grief.

The next morning, Tuesday November 29th, the funeral took place; a funeral the like of which Haifa, nay Palestine itself, had surely never seen, so deep was the feeling that brought so many thousands of mourners together, representative of so many religions, races and tongues.

The High Commissioner of Palestine, Sir Herbert Samuel, the Governor of Jerusalem, the Governor of Phoenicia, the Chief Officials of the Government, the Consuls of the various countries resident in Haifa, the heads of the various religious communities, the notables of Palestine, Jews, Christians, Moslems, Druses, Egyptians, Greeks, Turks, Kurds, and a host of His American, European and native friends, men, women and children, both of high and low degree, all, about ten thousand in number, mourning the loss of their Beloved One.

This impressive, triumphal procession was headed by a guard of honour, consisting of the City Constabulary Force, followed by the Boy Scouts of the Moslem and Christian communities holding aloft their banners, a company of Moslem choristers chanting their verses from the Qur'án, the chiefs of the Moslem community headed by the Mufti, a number of Christian priests, Latin, Greek and Anglican, all preceding the sacred coffin, upraised on the shoulders of His loved ones. Immediately behind it came the members of His family, next to them walked the British High Commissioner, the Governor of Jerusalem, and the Governor of Phoenicia. After them came the Consuls and the notables of the land, followed by the vast multitude of those who revered and loved Him.

On this day there was no cloud in the sky, nor any sound in all the town and surrounding country through which they went, save only the soft, slow, rhythmic chanting of Islám in the Call to Prayer, or the convulsed sobbing moan of those helpless ones, bewailing the loss of their one friend, who had protected them in all their difficulties and sorrows, whose generous bounty had saved them and their little ones from starvation through the terrible years of the “Great Woe.”

“O God, my God!” the people wailed with one accord, “Our father has left us, our father has left us!”

O the wonder of that great throng! Peoples of every religion and race and colour, united in heart through the Manifestation of Servitude in the life-long work of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

As they slowly wended their way up Mount Carmel, the Vineyard of God, the casket appeared in the distance to be borne aloft by invisible hands, so high above the heads of the people was it carried. After two hours walking, they reached the garden of the Tomb of the Báb. Tenderly was the sacred coffin placed upon a plain table covered with a fair white linen cloth. As the vast concourse pressed round the Tabernacle of His body, waiting to be laid in its resting place, within the vault, next to that of the Báb, representatives of the various denominations, Moslems, Christians and Jews, all hearts being ablaze with fervent love of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, some on the impulse of the moment, others prepared, raised their voices in eulogy and regret, paying their last homage of farewell to their loved one. So united were they in their acclamation of Him, as the wise educator and reconciler of the human race in this perplexed and sorrowful age, that there seemed to be nothing left for the Bahá’ís to say.

The following are extracts from some of the speeches delivered on that memorable occasion.

The Moslem voicing the sentiments of his co-religionists spoke as follows:

[^] In Ḥasan Balyuzi’s book entitled ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, p. 466, we find that “The first speaker was Yusuf al-Khaib, a well-known Muslim orator.”

“O concourse of Arabians and Persians! Whom are ye bewailing? Is it he who but yesterday was great in his life and is today in his death greater still? Shed no tears for the one that hath departed to the world of Eternity, but weep over the passing of Virtue and Wisdom, of Knowledge and Generosity. Lament for yourselves, for yours is the loss, whilst he, your lost one, is but a revered Wayfarer, stepping from your mortal world into the everlasting Home. Weep one hour for the sake of him who, for well nigh eighty years, hath wept for you! Look to your right, look to your left, look East and look West and behold, what glory and greatness have vanished! What a pillar of peace hath crumbled! What eloquent lips are hushed! Alas! In this tribulation there is no heart but aches with anguish, no eye but is filled with tears. Woe unto the poor, for lo! goodness hath departed from them, woe unto the orphans, for their loving father is no more with them! Could the life of Sir ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás have been redeemed by the sacrifices of many a precious soul, they of a certainty would gladly have offered up their lives for his life. But Fate hath otherwise ordained. Every destiny is predetermined and none can change the Divine Decree. What am I to set forth the achievements of this leader of mankind? They are too glorious to be praised, too many to recount. Suffice it to say, that he has left in every heart the most profound impression, on every tongue most wondrous praise. And he that leaveth a memory so lovely, so imperishable, he, indeed, is not dead. Be solaced then, O ye people of Bahá! Endure and be patient; for no man, be he of the East or of the West, can ever comfort you, nay he himself is even in greater need of consolation.”

The Christian then came forward and thus spoke:

[^] Mr. Balyuzi, on p. 467 of the same book, advises, “The next speaker was Ibrahim Nasar, a celebrated Christian writer...”

“I weep for the world, in that my Lord hath died; others there are who, like unto me, weep the death of their Lord... O bitter is the anguish caused by this heartrending calamity! It is not only our country’s loss but a world affliction... He hath lived for well-nigh eighty years the life of the Messengers and Apostles of God. He hath educated the souls of men, hath been benevolent unto them, hath led them to the Way of Truth. Thus he raised his people to the pinnacle of glory, and great shall be his reward from God, the reward of the righteous! Hear me O people! ‘Abbás is not dead, neither hath the light of Bahá been extinguished! Nay, nay! this light shall shine with everlasting splendour. The Lamp of Bahá, ‘Abbás, hath lived a goodly life, hath manifested in himself the true life of the Spirit. And now he is gathered to glory, a pure angel, richly robed in benevolent deeds, noble in his precious virtues. Fellow Christians! Truly ye are bearing the mortal remains of this ever lamented one to his last resting place, yet know of a certainty that your ‘Abbás will live forever in spirit amongst you, through his deeds, his words, his virtues and all the essence of his life. We say farewell to the material body of our ‘Abbás, and his material body vanisheth from our gaze, but his reality, our spiritual ‘Abbás, will never leave our minds, our thoughts, our hearts, our tongues.”

Yet another Moslem, the Mufti of Haifa, spoke as follows: [^] According to Mr. Balyuzi on p. 468, this person was Muḥammad Murad.

“I do not wish to exaggerate in my eulogy of this great one, for his ready and helping hand in the service of mankind and the beautiful and wondrous story of his life, spent in doing that which is right and good, none can deny, save him whose heart is blinded...”

O thou revered voyager! Thou hast lived greatly and hast died greatly! This great funeral procession is but a glorious proof of thy greatness in thy life and in thy death. But O, thou whom we have lost! Thou leader of men, generous and benevolent! To whom shall the poor now look? Who shall care for the hungry? and the desolate, the widow and the orphan?

May the Lord inspire all thy household and thy kindred with patience in this grievous calamity, and immerse thee in the ocean of His grace and mercy! He verily is the prayer-hearing, prayer-answering God.”

[The following several paragraphs are from Mr. Balyuzi’s book, pp. 469-474. They were not included in the original compilation prepared by Lady Blomfield and Shoghi Effendi:]

Another distinguished Muslim, ‘Abdu’lláh Mukhlis, followed the Mufti of Haifa:

“...the sun of knowledge has set; the moon of virtues has disappeared; the throne of glory has crumbled, and the mountain of kindness is levelled by the departure of this benevolent one from the mortal world to the immortal realm. I do not need to explain the sublimity of the great one whom we have lost or to enumerate his great qualities, for all of you who are just are witnesses and can testify to what has been given him of personal beauty, beauty of his character, greatness of his heart, vastness of the sea of his knowledge and generosity... I beg your pardon if I fail in doing my duty as far as faithfulness is concerned or if I am unable to pay the generous one who has departed what he deserves of the best and highest praise, because what my tongue utters has emanated from a tender memory and broken heart. Indeed, they are wounds and not words; they are tears and not phrases... ‘This calamity has made all previous calamities to be forgotten. But this calamity will never be forgotten.’ ”

Next, Shaykh Yunus al-Khatib, a Muslim poet of note, recited a poem he had composed; and he was followed by Bishop Basilious, the head of the Greek Catholic Church of Haifa, who dwelt particularly on ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s humanitarian deeds, His generosity to the poor, His charm and majesty of mien. Then came the turn of the youth to pay homage and tribute. Wadi’ Bustanj, a young Christian, had a poem to offer. Here are some lines from it:

“In the souls and in the minds thou art immortal. One like thee, who has all perfections, virtues and honors, is eternal... O ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, O son of Bahá’u’lláh! May my life be a sacrifice to one like thee. Thou art the all-wise, and all else beside thee are only learned. What can the poets say in thy day? O ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, O son of Bahá’u’lláh! Thou wert just as God wanted thee to be and not as others wished. Thou hast departed in the Holy Land wherein Christ and the Virgin Mary lived. The land that received Muḥammad; the land the dust of which is blessing and wealth... We shall be sustained by this Tomb and the One it contains. The covenant of love and devotion will remain forever between us.”

The eighth speaker was Salomon Bouzaglo, one of the leading figures of the Jewish population of Haifa, who spoke most eloquently in French... [a resume, in English is presented here]:

“It is indeed strange that in an age of gross materialism and lack of faith a great philosopher such as He whom we mourn ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás should appear. He speaks to our hearts, our consciences. He satisfies our thirsty souls with teachings and principles that are the basis of all religion and morality. In His writings and public talks, and in His intimate conversations He could always convince the most learned and the most orthodox. His life was the living example of self-sacrifice, of preferring the good of others to one’s own.

“The philosophy of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is simple and plain, yet sublime. It accords with human character. Its virtues overcome prejudice and superstition... ‘Abbás has passed away in Haifa, in Palestine, in the Holy Land wherein prophets have always appeared. The ancient glory of this land is restored. We are not the only ones who weep for Him, in Whom we take pride. In Europe, in America, in every country, people athirst for social justice and brotherhood also weep for Him. He suffered from despotism, fanaticism and intolerance. For decades, ‘Akká the Bastille of the Ottomans held Him a prisoner. Baghdád the ‘Abbásid capital also served as a prison for Him and for His Father. Persia the ancient cradle of divine philosophy threw out her children, whose ideas were conceived in her land. Cannot we witness the manifestation of Divine Will to exalt the Holy Land that it become, once again, the cradle of noble and generous ideals? He, Who has left such a glorious heritage, is not dead. He, Who has promulgated such great principles, is immortal in the memory of posterity.”

Shaykh As’ad Shuqayr, a prominent Muslim citizen of ‘Akká, admired for his scholarship and eloquence, was the next speaker, after whom Muammad Hafadi, a well-known Muslim poet, read his threnody. Shaykh As’ad spoke of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as:

“...one of the inhabitants of ‘Akká because these inhabitants lived with him for more than forty years. His meetings were meetings of learning wherein he explained all the heavenly books and traditions... His philanthropies to the widows and orphans were never interrupted... He had so great a station; yet he never failed to help the distressed! In the winter season he met with the learned and notables of ‘Akká at the home of Shaykh ‘Alí Meeri, and in the summer the meetings were held in a court in the Fakhoreh ... In both of those meetings the attendants found him a book of history, a commentary on all the heavenly Scriptures, a philosophy of the pages of contemporary events that pertain to scientific or artistic topics. Then he moved to Haifa, and then went to Europe and America where he gave comprehensive and eloquent addresses and exhortations. His intention was to bring about unity among religions and sects and to remove the severe strife from their hearts and from their tongues, to urge them to take hold of the essence and let go the non-essential. He did that by presenting his message in a scientific manner. A group of Persians and others criticized him and found fault with his ideals in pamphlets they published and spread.

Nevertheless, without paying any attention to their criticism and opposition, nor being hurt by their hatred and enmity, he went forward and proclaimed his teachings. It is the law of God among His creatures a law which will not be changed — that the originator and declarer of principles must inevitably have those who agree and praise and those who disagree and reject.”

[^] 5. “The district in which the house of ‘Abbúd is situated,” according to a footnote on p. 472 of Mr. Balyuzi’s book.

And here are a few lines from Muammad Hafadi’s poem:

On Sunday night heaven was opened and the spirit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá flew with its glory. It was received and entertained by the prophets... O Mount Carmel, thou art now more proud than the heaven, for thou hast become the holiest mountain... I shall weep with tears for thee as long as I am living; how often thou didst wipe them with thy hands...

[Here we continue with Lady Blomfield’s and Shoghi Effendi’s compilation:]

The nine speakers having delivered their funeral orations, then came the moment when the casket which held the pearl of loving servitude passed slowly and triumphantly into its simple, hallowed resting place.

O the infinite pathos! that the beloved feet should no longer tread this earth! That the presence which inspired such devotion and reverence should be withdrawn!

Of the many and diverse journals that throughout the East and West have given in their columns accounts of this momentous event, the following stand as foremost among them:

“Le Temps,” the leading French paper, in its issue of December 19, 1921, under the title ‘Un Conciliateur’ (a peacemaker), portray[ed] graphically the life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá... [The excerpt was entirely in French, and is not reproduced here.]

The “Morning Post,” two days after His passing, among other highly favourable comments, concluded its report of the Movement in the following words:

‘The venerated Bahá’u’lláh died in 1892 and the mantle of his religious insight fell on his son ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, when, after forty years of prison life, Turkish constitutional changes permitted him to visit England, France and America. His persistent messages as to the divine origin and unity of mankind were as impressive as the Messenger himself. He possessed singular courtesy. At his table Buddhist and Muḥammadan, Hindu and Zoroastrian, Jew and Christian, sat in amity. ‘Creatures,’ he said, ‘were created through love; let them live in peace and amity.’

The “New York World” of December 1921 publishes the following:

“Never before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did the leader of an Oriental religious movement visit the United States... As recently as June of this year a special correspondent of “The World” who visited this seer thus described him: ‘Having once looked upon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, his personality is indelibly impressed upon the mind: the majestic venerable figure clad in the flowing aba, his head crowned with a turban white as his head and hair; the piercing deep set eyes whose glances shake the heart; the smile that pours its sweetness over all.’...

“Even in the twilight of his life ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took the liveliest interest in world affairs. When General Allenby swept up the coast from Egypt he went for counsel first to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When Zionists arrived in their Promised Land they sought ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for advice. For Palestine he had the brightest hopes. ‘Abdu’l-Bah believed that Bolshevism would prove an admonition to the irreligious world. He taught the equality of man and woman, saying: ‘The world of humanity has two wings, man and woman. If one wing is weak, then the bird cannot fly’...”

“The Times of India” in its issue of January 1922, opens one of its editorial articles as follows:

“In more normal times than the present the death of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which was sorrowfully referred to at the Bahá’í Conference in Bombay, would have stirred the feelings of many who, without belonging to the Bahá’í brotherhood, sympathize with its tenets and admire the life-work of those who founded it. As it is we have learned almost by chance of this great religious leader’s death, but that fact need not prevent our turning aside from politics and the turmoil of current events to consider what this man did and what he aimed at.”

Sketching then in brief an account of the History of the Movement it concludes as follows:

“It is not for us now to judge whether the purity, the mysticism and the exalted ideas of Bahá’ism will continue unchanged after the loss of the great leader, or to speculate on whether Bahá’ism will some day become a force in the world as great or greater than Christianity or Islám; but we would pay a tribute to the memory of a man who wielded a vast influence for good, and who, if he was destined to see many of his ideas seemingly shattered in the world war, remained true to his convictions and to his belief in the possibility of a reign of peace and love, and who, far more effectively than Tolstoi, showed the West that religion is a vital force that can never be disregarded.”

Out of the vast number of telegrams and cables of condolence that have poured in, these may be mentioned:

His Britannic Majesty’s Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Winston Churchill, telegraphing to His Excellency the High Commissioner for Palestine, desires him to convey to the Bahá’í Community, on behalf of His Majesty’s Government, their sympathy and condolence on the death of Sir ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás K.B.E.

On behalf of the Executive Board of the Bahá’í American Convention, this message of condolence has been received:

“He doeth whatsoever He willeth. Hearts weep at most great tribulation. American friends send through Unity Board radiant love, boundless sympathy, devotion. Standing steadfast, conscious of his unceasing presence and nearness.”

Viscount Allenby, the High Commissioner for Egypt, has wired the following message, through the intermediary of His Excellency the High Commissioner for Palestine dated November 29th, 1921:

“Please convey to the relatives of the late Sir ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás Effendi and to the Bahá’í community my sincere sympathy in the loss of their revered leader.”

The loved ones in Germany assured the Greatest Holy Leaf of their fidelity in these terms:

“All believers deeply moved by irrevocable loss of our Master’s precious life. We pray for heavenly protection of Holy Cause and promise faithfulness and obedience to Centre of Covenant.”

An official message forwarded by the Council of Ministers in Baghdád, and dated December 8th, 1921, reads as follows:

“His highness Sayed Abdurrahman, the Prime Minister, desires to extend his sympathy to the family of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in their bereavement.”

The Commander in Chief of the Egyptian Expeditionary Force sent through His Excellency the High Commissioner for Palestine these words of sympathy:

“General Congreve begs that you will convey his deepest sympathy to the family of the late Sir ‘Abbás al-Bahá’í.”

The Theosophical Society in London communicated as follows with one of the followers of the Faith in Haifa:

“For the Holy Family Theosophical Society send affectionate thoughts.”

One of the foremost figures in the little and hollowed town of Nazareth wired the following:

“With the profoundest sorrow and regret we condole with you on the occasion of the setting of the Day-Star of the East. We are of God, and to Him we shall return.”

The thousands of Bahá’ís in Tíhrán, the capital of Persia, remembering their Western brethren and sisters in London assure them of their steadfast faith in these words:

“Light of Covenant transferred from eye to heart. Day of teaching, of union, of self-sacrifice.”

And lastly, one of the distinguished figures in the academic life of the University of Oxford, a renowned professor and an accomplished scholar, whose knowledge of the Cause stands foremost among that of his colleagues, in the message of condolence written on behalf of himself and wife, expresses himself as follows:

“The passing beyond the veil into fuller life must be specially wonderful and blessed for one, who has always fixed his thoughts on high and striven to lead an exalted life here below.”

On the seventh day after the passing of the Master, corn was distributed in His name to about a thousand poor of Haifa, irrespective of race or religion, to whom He had always been a friend and a protector. Their grief at losing the “Father of the Poor” was extremely pathetic. In the first seven days also from fifty to a hundred poor were fed daily at the Master’s house, in the very place where it had been His custom to give alms to them.

On the fortieth day there was a memorial feast, given to over six hundred of the people of Haifa, Acre and the surrounding parts of Palestine and Syria, people of various religions, races and colour. More than a hundred of the poor were also fed on this day. The Governor of Phoenicia, many other officials and some Europeans were present.

The feast was entirely arranged by the members of the Master’s household. The long tables were decorated with trailing branches of Bougainvilliers [sic]. Its lovely purple blooms mingled with the white narcissus, and with the large dishes of golden oranges out of the beloved Master’s garden made a picture of loveliness in those spacious lofty rooms, whose only other decoration was the gorgeous yet subdued colouring of rare Persian rugs. No useless trivial ornaments marred the extreme dignity of simplicity.

The guests received, each and all, the same welcome. There were no “chief places.” Here as always in the Master’s home, there was no respecting of persons.

After the luncheon the guests came into the large central hall, this also bare of ornament, save only for the portrait of Him they had assembled to honour and some antique Persian tapestries hung upon one wall. Before this was placed a platform from which the speeches were made to the wrapt and silent throng, whose very hearts were listening.

The Governor of Phoenicia, in the course of his address, spoke the following: ....”Most of us here have I think, a clear picture of Sir ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás, of his dignified figure walking thoughtfully in our streets, of his courteous and gracious manner, of his kindness, of his love for little children and flowers, of his generosity and care for the poor and suffering. So gentle was he, and so simple that, in his presence, one almost forgot that he was also a great teacher and that his writings and his conversations have been a solace and an inspiration to hundreds and thousands of people in the East and in the West.”...

Others who followed spoke in appreciation of the work and life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The following are only a few extracts from their addresses:

“A voice calling aloud from Tīhrán, echoed from ‘Iráq, sounding in Turkish lands, swaying the Holy Land which hearkened to its melody, and wherein it rose, developed and deepened, till at last its reverberations resounded throughout Egypt, stretched across the seas to the West and thence to the New World.

“A voice summoning mankind to love, to unity and to peace; a voice the source whereof, had it been anything but purity of motive, could in no wise have succeeded in sending its waves with the swiftness of lightning throughout the world.

“Hail to ‘Abbás, the pride and glory of the East, in an age that has witnessed the rise of knowledge and the fall of prejudice; he who has attained the glorious summit of greatness; he whom the Standards of triumph have hastened to welcome; he whose star arose in Persia, shedding its light upon the minds of men, the signs of which have multiplied in the heaven of glory till it set in full radiance on this our horizon; he whose principles have humbled the peoples and kindreds of the world even as Bah himself had done before him...

“I believe and firmly believe, that he whose loss we now lament, having lived eighty years in this world below counselling the peoples of the world with his tongue, guiding them by his pen, setting before them a goodly example by his glorious deeds, has now chosen to lead and guide them by his silence.

“Let us then in our thoughts and meditations pay our tribute to him. And though the other day at his door I made you weep, yet now it is my duty to appeal and ask you to forget your sorrow and refrain from lamentation and cease from shedding tears. Truly, Sir ‘Abbás departed from us in body, but he ever lives with us in his abiding spirit, in his wondrous deeds. Though he has passed away, yet he has left for us a glorious heritage in the wisdom of his counsels, the rectitude of his teachings, the benevolence of his deeds, the example of his precious life, the sublimity of his effort, the power of his will, his patience and fortitude, his steadfastness to the end.”

And now finally let us turn to the writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bah, to His words of farewell, His counsels, His prayers, His appeal and His prediction. His detailed and powerfully written Will and Testament reveals the following words of general counsel to all His friends:

And now finally let us turn to the writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bah, to His words of farewell, His counsels, His prayers, His appeal and His prediction. His detailed and powerfully written Will and Testament reveals the following words of general counsel to all His friends:

“O ye beloved of the Lord! In this sacred Dispensation, conflict and contention are in no wise permitted. Every aggressor deprives himself of God’s grace. It is incumbent upon everyone to show the utmost love, rectitude of conduct, straightforwardness and sincere kindness unto all the peoples and kindreds of the world, be they friends or strangers. So intense must be the spirit of love and loving kindness, that the stranger may find himself a friend, the enemy a true brother, no difference whatsoever existing between them. For universality is of God and all limitations earthly. Thus man must strive that his reality may manifest virtues and perfections, the light whereof may shine upon everyone. The light of the sun shineth upon all the world and the merciful showers of Divine Providence fall upon all peoples. The vivifying breeze reviveth every living creature and all beings endued with life obtain their share and portion at His heavenly board. In like manner, the affections and loving kindness of the servants of the One True God must be bountifully and universally extended to all mankind. Regarding this, restrictions and limitations are in no wise permitted.

“Wherefore, O my loving friends! Consort with all the peoples, kindreds and religions of the world with the utmost truthfulness, uprightness, faithfulness, kindness, good-will and friendliness, that all the world of being may be filled with the holy ecstasy of the grace of Bahá, that ignorance, enmity, hate and rancor may vanish from the world and the darkness of estrangement amidst the peoples and kindreds of the world may give way to the Light of Unity. Should other peoples and nations be unfaithful to you show your fidelity unto them, should they be unjust toward you show justice towards them, should they keep aloof from you attract them to yourselves, should they show their enmity be friendly towards them, should they poison your lives, sweeten their souls, should they inflict a wound upon you, be a salve to their sores. Such are the attributes of the sincere! Such are the attributes of the truthful...

“O ye beloved of the Lord! Strive with all your heart to shield the Cause of God from the onslaught of the insincere, for souls such as these cause the straight to become crooked and all benevolent efforts to produce contrary results.”

Regarding the afflictions and trials that have befallen Him in this world and His desire for martyrdom, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá reveals the following:

“O God, my God! Thou seest this wronged servant of Thine, held fast in the talons of ferocious lions, of ravening wolves, of bloodthirsty beasts. Graciously assist me, through my love for Thee, that I may drink deep of the chalice that brimmeth over with faithfulness to Thee and is filled with Thy bountiful Grace; so that, fallen upon the dust, I may sink prostrate and senseless whilst my vesture is dyed crimson with my blood. This is my wish, my heart’s desire, my hope, my pride, my glory. Grant, O Lord my God, and my Refuge, that in my last hour, my end may even as musk shed its fragrance of glory! Is there a bounty greater than this? Nay, by Thy Glory! I call Thee to witness that no day passeth but that I quaff my fill from this cup, so grievous are the misdeeds wrought by them that have broken the Covenant, kindled discord, showed their malice, stirred sedition in the land and dishonored Thee amidst Thy servants. Lord! Shield Thou from these Covenant-breakers the mighty Stronghold of Thy Faith and protect Thy secret Sanctuary from the onslaught of the ungodly. Thou art in truth the Mighty, the Powerful, the Gracious, the Strong...

“Lord! Thou seest all things weeping over me and my kindred rejoicing in my woes. By Thy Glory, O my God! Even amongst mine enemies, some have lamented my troubles and my distress, and of the envious ones a number have shed tears because of my cares, my exile and my afflictions. They did this because they found naught in me but affection and care and witnessed naught but kindness and mercy. As they saw me swept into the flood of tribulation and adversity and exposed even as a target to the arrows of fate, their hearts were moved with compassion, tears came to their eyes and they testified declaring: 'The Lord is our witness; naught have we seen from him but faithfulness, generosity and extreme compassion.' The Covenant-breakers, foreboders of evil, however, waxed fiercer in their rancor, rejoiced as I fell a victim to the most grievous ordeal, bestirred themselves against me and made merry over the heartrending happenings around me..."

Touching the importance of teaching the Cause of God, these are His words:

"O ye that stand fast in the Covenant! When the hour cometh that this wronged and broken-winged bird will have taken its flight into the Celestial Concourse, when it will have hastened to the Realm of the Unseen and its mortal frame will have been either lost or hidden neath the dust, it is incumbent upon the Afnán, that are steadfast in the Covenant of God and have branched from the Tree of Holiness; the Hands, (pillars) of the Cause of God (the glory of the Lord rest upon them), and all the friends and loved ones, one and all to bestir themselves and arise with heart and soul and in one accord, to diffuse the sweet savors of God, to teach His Cause and to promote His Faith. It behooveth them not to rest for a moment, neither to seek repose. They must disperse themselves in every land, pass by every clime, and travel throughout all regions. Bestirred, without rest, and steadfast to the end, they must raise in every land the triumphal cry "Ya Bahá'u'l-Abhá!" (O Thou the Glory of Glories), must achieve renown in the world wherever they go, must burn brightly even as a candle in every meeting and must kindle the flame of Divine love in every assembly; that the light of truth may rise resplendent in the midmost heart of the world, that throughout the East and throughout the West a vast concourse may gather under the shadow of the Word of God, that the sweet savors of holiness may be diffused, that faces may shine radiantly, hearts be filled with the Divine spirit and souls be made heavenly.

"The disciples of Christ forgot themselves and all earthly things, forsook all their cares and belongings, purged themselves of self and passion, and with absolute detachment scattered far and wide and engaged in calling the peoples of the world to the divine guidance; till at last they made the world another world, illumined the surface of the earth, and even to their last hour proved self-sacrificing in the pathway of that beloved One of God. Finally in various lands they suffered glorious martyrdom. Let them that are men of action follow in their footsteps!..."

"Whosoever and whatsoever meeting becometh a hindrance to the diffusion of the Light of Faith, let the loved ones give them counsel and say: 'Of all the gifts of God the greatest is the gift of Teaching. It draweth unto us the Grace of God and is our first obligation. Of such a gift how can we deprive ourselves? Nay, our lives, our goods, our comforts, our rest, we offer them all as a sacrifice for the Abh Beauty and teach the Cause of God.' Caution and prudence, however, must be observed even as recorded in the Book. The veil must in no wise be suddenly rent asunder..."

As to the foundation of the faith of the people of Bahá:

“...This is the foundation of the belief of the people of Bahá (may my life be offered up for them): ‘His Holiness, the Exalted One (the Báb), is the Manifestation of the Unity and Oneness of God and the Forerunner of the Ancient Beauty. His Holiness the Abhá Beauty (may my life be a sacrifice for His steadfast friends) is the Supreme Manifestation of God and the Dayspring of His Most Divine Essence. All others are servants unto Him and do His bidding.’ Unto the Most Holy Book every one must turn, and all that is not expressly recorded therein must be referred to the Universal House of Justice. That which this body, whether unanimously or by a majority doth carry, that is verily the truth and the purpose of God Himself. Whoso doth deviate therefrom is verily of them that love discord, hath shown forth malice, and turned away from the Lord of the Covenant...”

Regarding the loyalty of the people of Bahá to sovereign authority and the laws of the country He reveals:

“O ye beloved of the Lord! It is incumbent upon you to be submissive to all monarchs that are just and to show your fidelity to every righteous king. Serve ye the sovereigns of the world with utmost truthfulness and loyalty. Show obedience unto them and be their well-wishers. Without their leave and permission do not meddle with political affairs, for disloyalty to the just sovereign is disloyalty to God Himself. This is my counsel and the commandment of God unto you. Well is it with them that act accordingly.”

He concludes one of the sections of His Testament with this prayer:

“O God, my God! I call Thee, Thy Prophets and Thy Messengers, Thy Saints and Thy Holy Ones, to witness that I have declared conclusively Thy Proofs unto Thy loved ones and set forth clearly all things unto them, that they may watch over Thy Faith, guard Thy Straight Path and protect Thy Resplendent Law. Thou art, verily, the All-Knowing, the All-Wise!”

And now, turning from His Will and Testament to His epistles and Tablets, we read the following, a word of caution, which He reveals in His last general Tablet to His loved ones all over the world:

“O ye beloved ones, guard the Cause of God! Let no sweetness of tongue beguile you nay, rather consider the motive of every soul, and ponder the thought he cherisheth. Be ye straightway mindful and on your guard. Avoid him, yet be not aggressive! Refrain from censure and from slander, and leave him in the Hand of God...”

A clear and unmistakable prediction which He made regarding the glorious unfolding of the Cause in the not distant future is forcibly revealed in a letter He wrote whilst under the threat of the Committee of Investigation during the darkest days of His incarceration in Acre:

“Now in the world of being the Hand of divine power hath firmly laid the foundations of this all-highest bounty and this wondrous gift. Whatsoever is latent in the innermost of this holy cycle shall gradually appear and be made manifest, for now is but the beginning of its growth and the dayspring of the revelation of its signs. Ere the close of this century and of this age, it shall be made clear and evident how wondrous was that springtide and how heavenly was that gift!”

A similar and even more definite utterance, prophesying the rise of the Movement, He makes in a Tablet revealed after the Great War [World War I] to a Kurdish friend, resident in Egypt. These are His very words:

“Now concerning the verse in Daniel, the interpretation whereof thou didst ask, namely, ‘Blessed is he who cometh unto the thousand three hundred and thirty five days.’ These days must be reckoned as solar and not lunar years. For according to this calculation a century will have elapsed from the dawn of the Sun of Truth, then will the teachings of God be firmly established upon the earth, and the Divine Light shall flood the world from the East even unto the West. Then, on this day, will the faithful rejoice.”

Confirming and explaining further the hidden meaning of the above mentioned verse, He reveals the following in one of His earlier Tablets:

“O servant of God! The afore-mentioned thousand three hundred and thirty-five years must be reckoned from the day of the flight (Hegira) of His Holiness Muḥammad, the Apostle of God, salutations and blessings rest upon Him, at the close of which time the signs of the rise, the glory, the exaltation, the spread of the Word of God throughout the East and the West shall appear.”

In one of His last Tablets, counselling the company of the friends of God, He breathes this fresh, encouraging spirit:

“Regard not the person of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, for he will eventually take his leave of you all; nay, fix your gaze upon the Word of God. Should it rise and be exalted, rejoice, be glad and thankful even if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá be under a drawn sword, be confined or be cast into bonds. For that which is of transcending importance is the Holy Temple of the Cause of God, and not the mortal frame of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The loved ones of God must arise with such steadfastness, that should in one moment hundreds of souls, even as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá himself, be made a target for the darts of woe, nothing whatsoever shall affect or lessen their firm resolve, their intention, their ardour, their enkindlement, their service to the Cause of God.... This, O ye beloved of the Lord, is my counsel and my exhortation unto you. Well is it with him whom the Lord aideth to do even as bidden in this pure and sanctified Tablet.”

The circular letter published on the occasion of the Master’s departure from this world by the Spiritual Assembly of Ṭihrán, contains extracts of a Tablet revealed fourteen years ago by the pen of the Centre of the Covenant, some of which are the following:

“O ye My faithful loved ones! Should at any time afflicting events come to pass in the Holy Land, never feel disturbed or agitated. Fear not, neither grieve.

For whatsoever thing happeneth will cause the Word of God to be exalted, and His Divine fragrances to be diffused. Make firm your steps and with utmost steadfastness arise to serve His Cause.... The Spirit of God and His glory rest upon him that is firm and steadfast in the Covenant!"

Among His utterances regarding His passing away from this world, He assures us as follows:

"Remember whether or not I be on earth, my presence will be with you always."

Again in a Tablet addressed to one of the friends in the United States of America, He depicts the future glory of the Sacred Tree of God whereof He is the Most Great Branch:

"Fear not if this Branch be severed from this material world and cast aside its leaves; nay, the leaves thereof shall flourish, for this Branch will grow after it is cut off from this world below, it shall reach the loftiest pinnacles of glory, and it shall bear such fruits as will perfume the world with their fragrance."

His very last Tablet, graciously revealed for His loved ones in Stuttgart, conveys His reflections upon this transient world, and His counsels to His loved ones that dwell therein:

"O ye beloved of the Lord! In this mortal world, nothing whatsoever endureth. The peoples of the earth dwell therein and spend a number of days uselessly, ultimately descending neath the dust, repairing to the home of eternal silence, leaving behind them no achievement, no blessing, no result, no fruit. All the days of their life are thus brought to naught. Whereas the children of the Kingdom sow seeds in the fertile soil of Truth, that will eventually spring up and bring forth many a harvest and shall forever bestow upon mankind its increase and bountiful grace. They shall obtain eternal life, attain unto the imperishable bounty, and shine even as radiant stars in the firmament of the Divine Kingdom. The Glory of Glories rest upon you!"

And now, what appeal more direct, more moving, with which to close this sad yet stirring account of His last days, than these, His most touching, most inspiring words?

"Friends! The time is coming when I shall be no longer with you. I have done all that could be done. I have served the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh to the utmost of My ability. I have labored night and day all the years of My life. O how I long to see the believers shouldering the responsibilities of the Cause! Now is the time to proclaim the Kingdom of Bahá! Now is the hour of love and union! This is the day of the spiritual harmony of the loved ones of God! All the resources of My physical strength I have exhausted, and the spirit of My life is the welcome tidings of the unity of the people of Bahá. I am straining my ears toward the East and toward the West, toward the North and toward the South that haply I may hear the songs of love and fellowship chanted in the meetings of the faithful. My days are numbered, and, but for this there is no joy left unto me. O how I yearn to see the friends united even as a string of gleaming pearls, as the brilliant Pleiades, as rays of the sun, as the gazelles of one meadow!

“The mystic Nightingale is warbling for them all; will they not listen? The Bird of Paradise is singing; will they not heed? The Angel of Abhá is calling to them; will they not hearken? The Herald of the Covenant is pleading; will they not obey?

“Ah Me, I am waiting, waiting, to hear the joyful tidings that the believers are the very embodiment of sincerity and truthfulness, the incarnation of love and amity, the living symbols of unity and concord. Will they not gladden my heart? Will they not satisfy my yearning? Will they not manifest my wish? Will they not fulfil my heart’s desire? Will they not give ear to my call?

“I am waiting, I am patiently waiting.”

New York, 1932

On July 9th, 1921, I sailed on the Greek ship "King Alexander" from New York to the Land of Desire with Jenab-i-Faḍil Mazandarani, the distinguished Persian sent to the United States by His Holiness, "Abdu'l-Bahá. For over eighteen months Jenab-i-Faḍil had lectured in this country and Canada, expounding most eloquently the Universal Teachings of the Bahá'í Revelation to large and appreciative audiences. He was my companion on a voyage full of dramatic incidents, for the war between the Turks and Greeks was in full swing. Finally, however, after strange scenes at sea and stranger experiences on land, we arrived at the station of Haifa, Palestine. Jenab-i-Faḍil and myself were greatly fatigued by the last trouble-some stretch of our journey. For example, we stood for nearly two hours before a little window which I dubbed "postage stamp" because of its size, and which was most annoyingly out of my reach by two or more feet. The impatient crowd, composed of many nationalities, swayed this way and that around me, demanding attention. Behind the window was only one man to serve this mass of a hundred or more persons, all bent upon pushing their passports through the little opening. It was confusion worse confounded! The poor

Frenchman at the window, sweltering in the heat, mopped his dripping brow, frantically expostulating to the indignant crowd that he could serve but one at a time. This acted only as a spur, for they continued to push only the more desperately until they came to blows and imprecations of an assorted variety. It was past midnight when I finally carried our passports, duly vised, in triumph to the Guarantee Officer, leaving many waiting ones behind. This triumph had been won by a little ruse which I felt to be justifiable. I was tired and almost fainting, and a happy thought was expressed in the following: "O Monsieur, s'il vous plait voici une dame tres malade: veuillez l'assister!" This brought the desired result, for the French are ever ready to assist a lady in distress. The business was at once dispatched, and very soon there-after Jenab-i-Faḍil and myself were conducted to our train.

It was extremely hot, as the thermometer had registered 120 degrees throughout the day, but now a furtive breeze relieved the heat from time to time. My companion was placed at one end of the car and I at the other. We said "Good Night," although it was morning, but this was only in keeping with many other paradoxical experiences of the journey. Now I found myself in a very comfortable compartment with an excellent berth and every convenience. It is due to the French, who are in occupation here, that much has been done for the comfort of the traveller. I was somewhat dismayed as I read a notice by which one was warned not to leave the window open as one's baggage might disappear. Too tired to care very much, my bump of caution, however, causing me to lock my valise in the closet, I murmured a sleepy "Allāh-u-Abhá" and was soon beyond the pale of mortal disturbances. Sleep was interrupted by a medley of jolts, bells and bellowings until, consulting my watch, I found it was five a.m. and the first flush of dawn was tinting the horizon. The train was speeding rapidly along; the landscape was uninteresting, a flat desert-like waste, not a bush nor a habitation to be seen. But for the lovely tints in the sky everything was barren and dreary. We were now in Palestine, though the mountains were not yet in sight. I gazed out of the window dreamily for an hour, then arose, made a hasty toilet, and went out in search of my travelling companion. I found him waiting with a huge bunch of luscious grapes, which we enjoyed, as they furnished both food and drink. Much refreshed, we sat silent for a long time, realizing we were coming nearer and nearer to the most sacred spot in the world! We could see now the glorious mountains in the distance. Egypt was far behind, and the scenery of Palestine was more animated, if still quite monotonous. A camel, a donkey, some cows in a seemingly bare pasture, an Arab now and then striding along, dotted the roadside which was bordered with immense cactus trees loaded with large purple thistles, the fruit of which was adorned by prickly thorns. I asked one of the guards on the train whether Palestine used this fruit for fodder as in California where the science of Burbank has made this possible. The guard stared at me, exclaiming "Mon Dieu, Madame!" and then at length explained that it was not used for cattle, but that the natives used it as a staple food, and sometimes during the war period it was all they had. The outer layer of the fruit was stripped off, the spikes with it, leaving the solid part and the juice. I found it cool and refreshing later when some was procured. I learned too that the juice is boiled and made into an excellent syrup not unlike our maple syrup.

My heart-beats increased perceptibly as Jendb-i-Faḍil announced that we were now less than an hour from Haifa; indeed, my heart galloped as though trying to reach there before the rest of me!

“Haife, Haife, all out for Haife!” cried the guard, and everybody scrambled, collecting baggage, and endeavoring to get a carriage. We were fortunate in securing a vehicle and, our baggage beside us, we proceeded on our way through the narrow streets and stony road leading to the House of the Master, “Abdu’l-Bahá. What strange sights greeted our eyes! The people seemed clothed in fantastic garb, and every color of the rainbow was flaunted before one; a red fez, a purple scarf, a green head-shawl, a yellow sash, a white or creamy coat, and a gunny-sack on the form of a black boy mingled in kaleidoscopic fashion among the chattering throng. And quaintly worded signs fastened on doors and window blinds—these also varied in color from gaudy pink to cerulean blue and saucy reds and henna, with old grey weatherboards showing here and there. Advertising in western fashion was attempted heroically. Here was the “new” struggling with the “old.” In bold black lettering in English the advantages of the “Hotel Jerusalem” were announced. The hotel was an old stone house with a narrow, arched door, before which stood a donkey laden with formidable sacks, containing, no doubt, the provender for this hotel; patiently it waited to be relieved of its burden, meanwhile flicking off the troublesome flies buzzing about it. In front of the hotel small tables were arranged at which men were seated, laughing and talking in loud voices, and drinking thick, black coffee from tiny cups, eating and smoking between times, and clapping their hands when anything was to be replenished.

Our carriage wound its way slowly in and out of the melee of animals, carts and human beings on the main street until at last we turned the corner, and this varied picture, like a “movie screen,” vanished from sight. The sun, the brightest and hottest we had ever known, greeted us with an intensity characteristic of the East, making us burn with impatience to get to our journey’s end. Five minutes more and we were at the Master’s House. Being informed that “Abdu’l-Bahá was not in just then, we went with Dr. Luṭfu’lláh to the Pilgrim House across the way. Here we found Fugeta in charge. We were greeted most heartily and shown to our rooms, where we removed the dust of travel, and after changing our garments, we joined the friends in the dining-room where we were refreshed with tea. A general talk ensued. Jenab-i-Faḍil was the centre of attraction. He had been absent for more than two years. Among the guests was a young Egyptian who was visiting the Master for a few days before returning to Paris for further study, having met the Master there twelve years before. An Arabian government official, who, among other duties, vised passports and who came to dinner by invitation of the Master whenever his train stopped at Haifa, was also there. He was handsome, of powerful physique and his twinkling eyes and ready smile showed the good humour behind a rather stern mien in repose. He was a Muḥammadan and loved the Master. In the midst of our chatting and tea drinking Fugeta announced, "The Master is coming!" Another moment and His resonant voice was calling to us: "Bismillah! Bismillah!" Welcome! Welcome! Taking us each by the hand He exclaimed: "We have been looking for you for some days. You should have wired us of your arrival and we would have sent our carriage to the station for you." Turning to me He said: "You must rest; you are very tired. Now you are at home. This is your home. Here you must rest and be very happy. Bismillah! Bismillah!" and the Presence, like a tonic breeze, vanished. I retired and rested for an hour. What heavenly peace! — a tender vibration, soft, silent, blissful! My soul was steeped in it.

"Praise be God!" sang my heart. "May I become worthy of this bounty"

Every evening at eight o'clock the Master holds a meeting lasting an hour or more, during which He discourses upon intricate problems concerning the Cause. The Master is seated upon the large porch in front of the house to which ten white stone steps lead from the broad gravel path. A white stone coping borders the path on each side, providing seating space for fifty or more people who constitute the audience.

View with me the majestic Figure in white flowing garments seated before us, locks lifted gently by the breeze; the beautifully moulded hands emphasizing the discourse with impressive gesture. After the address, a Russian refugee Bahá'í teacher chants in exquisitely modulated tones, the prayers of Bahá'u'lláh. It is impossible adequately to describe the scene. The writer became conscious of new emotions, the awakening of something so subtle, so elusive, that one could not capture it, yet so impressive that everything was cast into oblivion except the immediate present. The fragrance from the gardens on either side wafted a different scent on each breath of the night air. Roses, orange blossoms, lemon buds, tuberoses, jasmine, honeysuckle — each in turn left its definite sweetness as a fresh odour entranced one and vanished.

O that I might impress this scene upon the heart of the world! To me it is as though all eternity could not efface it — that majestic white Figure seated on the broad stone platform like a king enthroned, the setting of natural beauty so befitting His spiritual station — the gardens, the sea, the starry heavens, and the millions of gleaming points of light reflected below. Shadows deepen under the trees, while at their tops the leaves glisten and glimmer like sparkling gems. The murmur of the sea is just beyond, the waves in ever repeating undulations, coming nearer and nearer to caress the shore. The melodious chanting, the deep silences, the seated figures with bowed heads and devoted hearts.

The chant ends. In a few moments the Master rises and goes into the house. Everyone rises also and salutes in the beautiful eastern fashion, hand touching the forehead and then the heart. The spell is broken! Then again the Master comes, descends the steps, finds me, and motions that I precede Him into the dining-room, an addition built recently for the entertainment of guests. This is a large room having a very high ceiling, as have all the rooms in the East, and there are seven large windows. Everything is white. A long table is in the centre of the room laid for fifty or more people. The Master placed me at the head of the table on the right, and thus He placed me throughout my visit. He always inquired in English after my health and would urge me to eat more, saying again and again : "Too little, much too little," when I assured Him I had eaten abundantly. On several occasions my replies to the Master's loving solicitations in English were in Persian, a few sentences, but He was pleased and amused, I think, judging by the merry light in His eyes. He said to the big Arabian official, who spoke only Arabic : "See, here is an American lady who speaks correct Persian. You say you cannot learn it and you hear it every day. She does not hear it often but she has learned." The Master would ask, "What is this ? What is that ?" indicating things on the table, and say approvingly, "Brava, Brava! You know everything that is useful to know. That is very good." The big man eyed me with astonishment at what seemed to him a wonderful performance, but he was not aware of my limitations, nor of the fact that in asking His questions the Master chose only such things on the table, the names of which I knew in Persian! Indeed, this did not dawn upon me until afterward and I felt quite proud of my accomplishment. How tenderly the Master seeks to have one feel of some account in the world, and of course one longs in return to become as dust beneath His Blessed Feet! On the first Sunday in Haifa I was told to be ready at 5 p.m. as the Master was to take me to the Holy Tomb of the Báb, situated about half-way up Mt. Carmel, the Mountain of God, as the He-breus call it. The Master placed me at His side in the automobile, jenab-i-Faḍil and several of the small grandchildren making the driving party. The other men pilgrims walked. When all had arrived and were seated fronting the Tomb,—there were over fifty in number,—we were served with tea, after which we sat in profound silence. The scene here also was most impressive. The sun was travelling toward the west, tinting the clouds with gold and mauve. "See the sea!" said the Master. "So is the bounty of God to-day flowing like the waves of this sea. We must try to appreciate His Goodness, His Power and Glory." His beautiful voice echoed vibrantly through space, giving clear-cut teachings as He sat there on the mountain. "Take prejudice, how it grows. First a few people say something disparaging about a person, and, generally there is a fragment of truth in what they say. The story grows, is spread, the circle widens, discussions are indulged in, inharmony results, schism takes place, what a waste of precious time that could and should be used for constructive work!" Then He spoke of sincerity. "There are degrees always in every-thing. Until a man is freed from ego he may be positive and certain about many things that are not so. He spoke of tests. "Tests are not sent as punishment, but to reveal the soul to itself. Suffering unfolds both the strength and the weakness. Tests are sometimes creative of grateful surprise also; for in the midst of our trials we are amazed at the fulness of our strength and our resources, and so the heavy discipline is creative of assurance; the trial becomes the source of greater confidence, faith and trust. It strengthens and confirms." 'Abdu'l-Bahá'í has a teaching, an apt illustration for every phase of life; a guidance for every issue and crisis, a solution for every problem and an answer to every question voiced or silent. Tea was served, and the "Tablet of Visitation" was chanted by a sweet-voiced worshipper whose name I cannot recall but whose soul was revealed to me in the ardour of that heavenly chanting. How long we knelt there I do not know, but when I raised myself I was alone in the Sacred Tomb. A moment after someone touched me on the shoulder and beckoned, and silently I followed him out of the shrine. Of this wonderful experience I almost hesitate to speak. I had been lost in deepest contemplation and prayer. It seemed to me that all the souls that had ever worshipped here, together with all the "Friends of God" I had ever known, were congregated in this holy spot. A wonderful Company! Faces known and unknown rose before my inner vision, and as my soul breathed a supplicating thought for loved ones far or near, the faces would appear, just in a flash, radiant and wreathed in smiles. The meaning of the reality of "Oneness" dawned upon my consciousness, never again to be forgotten! This inner consciousness was unfolded later in relation to a subsequent experience. The Master had been waiting for me. As I hastened to the auto-mobile in which He was seated and took my place beside Him, He said: "I shall take you to the summit of the Mountain of God." I could not speak, and the Blessed One said nothing more, but in the silence we drove on and on, and I knew the Master read my heart,-its longing to reach the summit of consciousness in service to the Cause. Every afternoon from four to seven during my stay, I visited the ladies of the "Holy Household." On Wednesday afternoons a "Woman's Meeting" is held in the large central room, secluded from the masculine gaze of the many visitors the Master receives at all hours of the day. Bahá'í women living outside also attend these gatherings, where one of the Master's daughters reads or chants the prayers and tablets of Bahá'u'lláh. Tea is always served with Persian cookies and grapes. The Master, if He can spare the time, generally looks in to greet the assembly, say a few words and make them all happy. The Master's household numbers more than a hundred persons, not counting the children of the believers and His own grand-children. How wonderfully significant, as an example to the world, is this living service so cheerfully given by each member of the family! There is such harmony and unity in this household, where all the machinery of every-day life is carried on without a break. Every emergency is provided for; unexpected visitors are always entertained with a composure and sincerity unbelievable unless witnessed day after day as I saw it. Where in this wide world could a parallel be found, even approximate to this? No complaint, no friction amidst a variety of temperaments and of different stations in life. It is a garden of variegated flowers growing in the utmost loveliness! The contrast to family life in the outside world is so great that the observer marvels, and the conviction deepens that here is a miracle of miracles that only love, spiritual love, could make possible. What models to the world these holy women are, can be known only to those who witness their lives of sacrifice and service,-second only to the life of the Exemplar, their Teacher and Educator, 'Abdu'l-Baba, the Master, the Possessor of all perfections, the embodiment of all virtues, the helper of the poor and needy, the Counsellor of the afflicted and sorrowful,-He who is God's Covenant to the people of the world! How can my feeble pen worthily record such a life of untiring service and devotion as that of "The Greatest Holy Leaf," sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá? From early morning till very late at night she is in demand, and with the assistance of the Master's daughters, she carries out every detail of this formidable household. The women of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family are the precious flowering of the spiritual civilization inaugurated at the dawn of the New Age, where every faculty of the mind and heart has been quickened by the Divine Breath of the Gardener, who has nourished and sustained them through all the vicissitudes that result from such heroic living. No complaint is ever audible, and yet I read in the depths of their wonderful eyes a real tragedy, and this is unconsciously voiced in their desire for their children; they long for nothing for themselves, but yearn to give the children the advantages of modern knowledge and education, of which they, through long years of exile and confinement behind prison walls, have been deprived. "For ourselves," they say, "we ask nothing; we are grateful for the wonderful spiritual bounties we have had, for we have learned the meaning of sacrifice, which is not to do without things, but if, for some reason, one is deprived, then to accept willingly and uncomplainingly; but for our children we do desire and pray for education that they may be of greater service to humanity, and open the way to self-support for the women of the East." Someone has said of 'Abdu'l-Baba, "He is the practical mystic," and certain it is that in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the unity of all life is constantly emphasized. "The law of human life is unceasing interaction between mind and body. "In accidents a surgeon is called to adjust injured members as nearly as possible to the original pattern by scientific means. Nature, in obedience to a spiritual principle, inherent in every living thing, brings into operation the healing power to the lacerated parts. This is true cooperation between organic and spiritual forces. Life's healing power is spiritual, but its operation in behalf of an organic body is by adjustment to the workings of organic law. Waste of vital and nervous forces through working at cross-purposes with law, - the failure to recognize the oneness of life in every phase, physical, mental, moral and spiritual, is largely the cause of the world's suffering and inefficiency." The Master's daughters, so imbued with these principles, naturally desire the education of their children in the balanced ratio, so that one set of faculties may not be exalted above others. The Bahá'í teachings recognize that all faculties are expressed in the same organism and so are inter-dependent for the ill or good of humanity. "Nothing is true education that does not fit the human being for constructive living. For twenty centuries men have clothed a spiritual ideal in the garment of ecclesiastical pomp and ceremony, and have preached an established form of traditional and superimposed authority. But of the daily living of the ideal of the spirit of Christ there is but little evidence save among a few choice souls. Of an inner consecration to justice, to right, to moral initiative, to equity in practical affairs, altruistic conduct toward humanity en masse, the spiritual dynamics of the life of Reality,—the world has had slight evidence. But now, Praise be to God, in this century of Light the practical advantages of social, ethical, and industrial relationships based upon other ideals are beginning to be recognized and dealt with accordingly. Statesmen are glimpsing the fact that the world must be reconstructed in the new spirit of understanding commensurate with this advantage." Such were the conversations with the daughters of the Master during this memorable visit. O women of the West! I beg of God that your hearts may be touched and stirred as was my heart by the hunger-cry of these Eastern mothers, representing as they do thousands who are yet hopelessly in the grasp of the ancient fanatical ideas and customs from which the woman of the West has been emancipated to a large degree and is still pressing forward! We cannot, nay we dare not let the wail of our Eastern sisters remain unheeded. In that blessed shrine, the holy Tomb of Bahá'u'llah, the most earnest supplication of my soul was that my Western sisters might respond and assist the womanhood of the East, that we might co-operate in the building of a school for girls at Haifa, and equip it with volunteer teachers. Now I must refer to a personal matter in order that my story may be intelligible to the reader, a matter which concerns my having been called by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the Holy Land. Briefly there had been some misunderstanding as to the interpretation of certain Bahá'í teachings. Some of the friends understood them in one way and some in another. This had created confusion and I became very ill. In this crisis I was called to make the visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and just before leaving the United States a goodly number of the friends,—some of one opinion and some of another, — called upon me and I was requested to bring back something very definite from the Master. It was the custom of 'Abdu'l-Bahá each morning at about ten o'clock to visit the Pilgrim House and talk to me, Mírzá Bahadur usually interpreting. The Master would begin with "How is your health?" — which of course refers to the spiritual condition; and then, "Are you happy?" then "Perfectly happy?" Now I knew I was not "perfectly happy" so long as He had not given me the definite instructions which the friends had desired me to bring back. After a most heavenly day with the Master and His Household, I would see the faces of the friends before me at night and they seemed to look sternly expectant. He had given ample illustrations and examples that should have satisfied one not under the spell of acting as ambassador for a group of people and who felt the responsibility. Finally one morning, in answer to the question "Are you perfectly happy?" I said, "Yes, dear Master, I am perfectly happy but for one little thing that remains in my consciousness; not for myself do I desire something definite, but for others," and then I proceeded to give some details. But the Blessed One ignored it as before, and calling my attention to some clouds above our heads, He said, "You must be like these swift-moving, luminous clouds. They move, nothing hinders them. I shall pray for you that you will be like these clouds. Let nothing hinder you. Speak always of the Love of God. Teach the people what the Love of God is. Give them the Glad Tidings. Let nothing hinder thee; let nothing touch thy spirit which is not in conformity with the teachings of the Blessed Beauty. Be ever engaged in the service of the Kingdom. Do not let the unpleasant things annoy you. You must be as far removed from them as these clouds are above us. The important thing is to spread the Teachings, to show love and compassion, to be kind to all, and not wound the feelings of others. If we do not like to associate with some people, very well, it is not compulsory. We can let them alone and become so busy with constructive work, that there is no time to waste upon such matters. We do not waste our time in discussing non-essentials. Neither must you do this. Forget every unpleasantness of the past; speak only of constructive work, of the Love of God, of the compassion and mercy of God. Seek to make others happy." And so would end the teaching of one day, perfect, except for the one little thought which I deemed so important! "O God, help us to be severed from all but Thee!" It is an amazing experience when one first meets "Abdu'l-Bahá. Many have tried to express it; many have partially expressed it. Some, though feeling deeply, cannot express it at all. What the Master says so simply, — seemingly, as it strikes the ear, if it reaches the inner being, contains ever-deepening truths. One marvels at the beauty and wisdom, and at the dulness of the surface consciousness of the merely human.

The first meeting with "Abdu'l-Bahá never startles. It thrills one with a new sense of vitality. It quickens. It is healing. It recalls: "He cometh with healing in His wings." It is penetrative. One cannot possibly remain the same as before the meeting, because the Divine Ray has touched the creature and somehow, somewhere, sometime, the creature will know.

In this day electricity is the agent used to restore weakened vitality and most successful are some results reported. To my spirit 'Abdu'l-Baba is a new discovery in Spiritual Science. He is pure Radium. His Spirit is the Spirit of Light, of life in the highest degree. It is creative. A new energy radiates from Him to the recipient and makes him vital and alive. Blessed is the one who has been treated with this Divine Current. "The age of miracles is past." Often we hear this statement from the press, the people, and even from the pulpit. The Higher Criticism interprets the miracles of the ancients as symbols and symbols only. It is true that many instances recorded in the Holy Books are symbols of spiritual conditions, truths and universal principles, but that is not to deny the performance of miracles, even literally upon this plane, by the Manifestations of God. What significance is there in the fact that the prophecies of the ancients are daily fulfilled, at this time in a literal sense? "Greater things than these shall ye do" was uttered by the Christ nineteen centuries ago, referring to the miracles of this age. Greater miracles are performed in this Day of God, because: "It is the Day of Maturity for the sons of men." Miracles upon all the planes of life are performed because a New Spirit adorns the world of mankind. Blessed are they who have eyes to see and ears to hear! How kind is the Compassionate Lord to His creatures! In the year 1890 I was a victim of a car accident in the city of Washington, D. C. The injury was so severe that life was thought to be extinct for several hours. The spinal column was twisted and pushed out of alignment to such a degree that a portion of the vertebrae lay upon the left ribs, forming a protrusion the size of an infant's head. The right ribs were crushed and splinters of bone were removed. The right hip was out of the socket, not perceived at first by the doctors, and the left arm could only be partially raised. I lay unconscious at the hospital for many days, taking no nourishment whatever, not even water, and undoubtedly would have been buried, had the period lengthened, but for the fact that some friends informed the physicians that in childhood I had also been "in a trance" for nineteen days, so the interment was postponed. During this unconscious period, that is to say unconscious to all earthly surroundings, my soul was very much alive on inner subjective planes. In these experiences I met with a Wonderful Being, - whom I afterwards learned was 'Abdu'l-Baba, who gave me spiritual instructions and taught me the mysteries of life, saying: "Many of these things thou dost comprehend only in part, for thou must live them and then teach the people of the world. This is for future harvesting." (From "The Two Paths.")

For thirty years this crippled body suffered untold agony. For years I had tried to live according to the Divine Teachings of the &hal. Revelation, before coming, on the outer plane of life, into the knowledge of the actual embodiment of my Lord and Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In 1901 He accepted me as a servant in His Holy Vineyard, and from that time my humble services and my life have been dedicated to Him for His Cause. Now it is opportune to relate the remarkable experience after my visit to the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. It was on August the ninth, 1921, that seven pilgrims started for 'Akká to visit the Holy Shrine. Jenab-i-Faḍil Mazandarani and myself were of the party. The Master's carriage conveyed us to the station of Haifa, where we took the train to 'Akká, waited there for an hour, had some refreshments, and another vehicle was secured from a Bahá'í friend to finish the journey. It was late when we reached the house of the caretaker of the Holy Tomb. The moon had risen and was shining above the mountains, pillowed on a vast bed of fleecy clouds, whose silvery edges appeared as an immense etching against the midnight depths of marvellous blue. Earth and sky literally "embraced like two lovers." Again we were refreshed by tea, and when we gathered on the front piazza built of the white stone that is so much used in this part of the country, another marvellous scene was presented to our view. At our feet lay the sea, or more accurately perhaps, the Bay of "Akká. The Tomb on the right and the Holy Mountain of Carmel loomed like Giant Hands upholding in majesty the Cause of God. What an atmosphere! O the calm of that Holy Place! Night had flung her jewelled stars most lavishly abroad. The whole was of magic splendour. The heart was entranced by such concentrated beauty. No one spoke above a whisper lest a harsher note disturb the celestial vibration. As the night was far spent the seven pilgrims silently proceeded through the garden laden with the sweet breath of flowers richer for the dews of night. We entered in single file that Holy of Holies, and each pilgrim knelt in adoration. When we emerged it seemed that hours had rolled on toward eternity! It was long past midnight. We supped lightly and retired. Sleep did not come. The few hours were spent in communion, potent and exhilarating yet conducive to self-examination and repentance. Tears flowed freely as we supplicated for the "cleansing of the sanctuary" within the self, and many of the beloved friends were remembered in the supplications poured forth that night in the Holy Shrine. At dawn the seven pilgrims again made the blessed visit to the Holy Tomb of Him whom God made manifest. Seven pilgrims, each from a different part of the world, strangers before, now bound by the firm rope of Bahá'í love and friendship, realizing their kin-ship and unity as the children of the Household of Faith in the Revelation of God in this Great Day! Strange paradox! We came to the Tomb for Life! "There is no death" has now a new meaning. We realized it as we came forth, clothed with the garment of Reality. And now to complete the pilgrimage we were to visit the Riḍván, or Garden of God, about two and a half miles from the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. It was early morning. We had breakfast and at six o'clock we were ready to start; but to our dismay, no vehicle was to be found. The man who had conveyed us from the station could not come; he had been called away and had gone to Haifa. What were we to do? The men could walk, but it was difficult even for them in the heat and the dusty road. The caretaker, after a thoughtful moment, came to our rescue. He proposed that I ride the Master's white donkey. It was pure white, handsome, and full of life. As I surveyed the locomotive power before me I had some misgivings as to the success of the venture. The pilgrims seemed to sense my hesitation and asked: "What do you think of it? Will you ride him?" "I have never mounted anything more lively than a wooden hobby-horse in childhood" was my answer, "but as there is no other way, I shall have to attempt it, for I must go to the Rīḍvān with you." An improvised saddle was brought, depriving the house of a solid pillow of generous dimensions. This was held in place by a rope passed around the body of the donkey, who protested quite vigorously at the unusual equipment. Although the caretaker assured me that he was very gentle, I confess the prospect did not appear alluring. However, I mustered up courage, and as a chair was brought to assist me to mount, I was finally seated sidewise and the reins were placed in my hands. The donkey was led by the caretaker's son, a kindly youth who cast sympathetic glances at my "perch."

The procession started quite briskly. I braced up as best I could for I did not wish to spoil the trip for the men-pilgrims by my timidity; but oh, the road was so stony, the pillow was slipping and I was doubling up on one side! The donkey went swiftly along, kicking every now and then to rid himself of the flies, while I trembled within, fearing every moment that he would get rid of me too. I prayed, "O God! Help me to keep on," for now there were strange snappings and crackings in my back, sides and shoulders. Pain, sharp pain, racked my whole body. It was growing unbearable and I was inwardly groaning with every forward step of the donkey, as it stumbled over stones and I grasped its mane. One of the pilgrims approached me and said: "Wouldn't it be better to rest a while? You are suffering, I see, and we have quite a long distance yet." I declined, trying to smile, and said: "I think it is best to go on, it would be too difficult to mount again." "Well, promise that when it becomes too hard for you, you will call and we will help you down to rest." He adjusted the pillow as best he could and I promised to call for help if needed. We started again. The heat was intense yet I felt cold, every nerve quivering with pain, and there was more snapping and tearing. What was going on, I wondered, in my spine and shoulder-blades? I felt as though I were being dismembered. Did it mean my death? The X-ray photograph of my body came vividly before me and the words of the surgeon were in my ears, — "Nothing can be done. If force is applied the bones will snap. Death will be the result." "Well," I thought at last, "what more beautiful could happen, — to die in the Holy Land, to be released from pain and suffering? Evidently my work was finished on this plane. For twenty years my humble service had been given to the Cause, more dear than life and now the Blessed One had sent for me to come to the Land of Desire; I had visited the Holy Shrines and now I would enter the Rīḍvān, the Garden of God," so ran my thoughts. I felt strangely relieved and calm. I could see the tree quite near that marked the entrance to the garden. The Doctor again approached with Jenab-i-Faḍil and they said: "We will help you down to rest before going in." A few minutes more and I stood on my feet, but not as formerly! I could breathe deeply, which had not been possible for thirty years. My hip, somehow, was in place, the projecting bow on the left side of my spine had disappeared. In a flash this was all realized. I threw up both arms and cried out: "O God, my God! This is a miracle that God hath wrought! Ya-Bahá'u'l-Abhá!" The other pilgrims were no less astonished than I, and joined me in fervent prayer and thanksgiving at what had been so strangely accomplished by the ride on the Master's white donkey. I mounted again with ease and sat as straight as a major on dress parade on the back of this white "surgeon" who was utterly un-conscious of the aid he had given me, and of the feeling I entertained for him as I reverently kissed his nose. The Doctor photographed our little group and then we proceeded into the Riḍván, and came to the blessed spot where stand the two mulberry trees so loved by Bahá'u'lláh, and in this vine-covered bower of beauty where He used to sit, we tarried, and here refreshment was brought us by the caretaker, who said: "Oh, you should have seen it before the war! It was the most beautiful spot in the whole world, — so travellers used to tell us. The Master will now have it restored to its former loveliness." At the end of the Garden on one side stands the little house containing the "treasures" of the time of Bahá'u'lláh; the wonderful table with lids holding in its depths many articles used by him. The precious chair in which He sat is preserved in a separate chest. Another photograph of us was taken at this historic spot, and all the while I seemed treading upon air, and would ask myself: "Can it be true? Is this really I, who can breathe and walk without pain, so freed? O God, wonderful are Thy ways!" And there in that garden, hallowed by the footsteps of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Baba, we lingered until it was time to leave for the train that was to carry us back to Haifa.

Everyone on the train seemed to stare at me. Was it because I was a stranger, or was it that they read the overwhelming joy of my spirit? I felt so elated, so buoyant, so intensely happy, I could only with difficulty control myself in silence. I longed to shout: "Glory to God! O people, if you could know the wonderful thing that has happened to me since yesterday you too would shout." My left arm was now entirely free and, again and again, I raised it above my head in sheer joy and wonder.

That night I lived over again the remarkable occurrences of the last twenty-four hours. The experience at the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh whither 'Abdu'l-Baba had sent me and the various phases connected with the "visit."

I did not sleep nor even try to. I realized a change in my consciousness, a marked change of attitude in my mind and heart toward former matters. I shouted in the stillness of my being at the glorious realization; I knew that the physical healing was the outer symbol of the emancipation of my soul. I was free not only in body, but what was far more important, I was free in soul, in mind and spirit. O Compassionate God! What a revelation came to my soul! I realized the darkened state of human consciousness,—of even such as believe themselves of the enlightened and faithful servants of God! I thought with pity of the former “foolishness,” — wanting something definite to take home to the friends. Wanting something which the Master had ignored. “The wisdom of man is foolishness unto God” was truly proved. Fervently came the prayer: “O Lord! Heed us not in our foolish requests. Sever us from our limitations. Bestow upon us the Light of Thy Wisdom so that we may become conscious of Thy Will!”

The joy, the happiness, the bliss, the peace now experienced can-not be conveyed. Rapture enveloped my whole being; for now I knew the meaning of the “Most Great Bounty” and the “Mystery of God.” The love of the Master in which all humanity is embraced had so surrounded and penetrated my being that the Light of His Wisdom had transformed my view into a vision of Reality. So are we “changed in the twinkling of an eye.”

The next morning I arose at six,—another, a different person. Fugeta, that most devoted and selfless servant who sees to the needs and comforts of every pilgrim, was setting the table for breakfast. “You must have slept soundly. I never saw you looking so well although it was an awfully hot night,” was his greeting to me. “No, I did not sleep at all, but it was not the heat that prevented me,” and then I told him of the wonderful change that had come over me during the night, and that now I was perfectly happy as the Master had wished; — that I saw everything from an entirely different angle. God had opened my eyes; with His healing He had given me insight; I was no longer “blind”; I did not want the Master to give me anything definite for myself nor for anyone else! The friends joined me at the breakfast table and rejoiced with me, for they had heard of my experience. All had remarked: “How well you are looking!” Doctor Luṭfu’lláh, who is of such valuable service to every visitor as well as to the blessed Household, and Mírzá Bahadur, that sweetly dignified and serious young man who has spent twelve years with the Master, is a linguist and most efficient in interpreting and translating, and that blessed soul, Jenab-i-Faḍil Mazandarani. In the midst of these never-to-be-forgotten companions breakfast was eaten and before we dispersed I said: “Please, Mirth Bahadur, when the Master comes this morning, tell Him the substance of what you have heard, and say that I am perfectly contented and happy now, that I do not desire anything definite for myself nor for anyone.” The Master did not visit us as usual that morning, but He had luncheon with us. He greeted us all in His ineffable way, paying no special attention to me. I was so happy and I wanted Him to know it. The meal would be over and soon He would be gone. “Please, Mírzá Bahadur,” I said: “Do tell the Master what I requested of you.” But before he could do so, the Master, in a voice thrillingly vibrant, said, as He turned to me: “Brava! Brava! Ah, now you are another Mrs. Watson! Now you are perfectly happy. Now you have something most definite to take home with you to the friends.” Tenderly His gaze rested upon me, radiating such love that I could scarcely bear it. Fervently I thanked God that I was able to register in my soul a portion of this Divine Elixir so potently and lavishly bestowed by this perfect Christ-type man, the Master of Haifa. Seventeen more golden days were spent with the Master and His holy family. Only too swiftly did they fly. Every day, two or three times as the occasion permitted, I saw the Blessed One. Now that I did not clamour for it, every explanation was given and made clear. Is it a wonder that my consciousness expanded far beyond the boundaries of my former limitations and that I utterly forgot them in the dazzling splendour of illumination from the Sun of Truth, the sign of which is 'Abdu'l-Baba, the Centre of the Covenant of God? Mírzá Siyyid Mustapha, from India, an old Bahá'í and a great worker in the Cause, was a guest of the Master and had been in the household for several months to recuperate after most arduous labours, having formed an Indian Bahá'í colony of about 150 souls. He was one of the pilgrims to the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh and a witness to my healing. His wish was that I might go to his colony and teach his people. He asked if I would go, and I said: "Yes, most willingly, if the Master permits." Then he said, "The Master loves you, will you not ask Him?" Again my answer was, "Yes, most gladly." Several times Mírzá Siyyid Mustapha talked with me about the colony, the work I could do there, and how happy it would make him to have me go. A few days after, I did ask 'Abdu'l-Baba and He said: "I have already told Siyyid Mustapha that if I should send you to India now, you would ascend in a short time to the Kingdom of Abhá. No, your body is not strong enough to stand the hardships such a trip and work would entail. I wish you to go back to America and give the Glad Tidings. Take to them the 'definite' things I have given you. You are a living sign of the Love of God." A few minutes later I told Siyyid Mustapha, and he said: "The Master told me yesterday. He knows best. I did not realize that you are not strong in body, your spirit is so alive." We both realized that the Master had answered his question before I had asked Him, — another proof of His power to read the heart's desires. A few days after this incident Fugeta came to my room and said: "The Master is coming to see you." It was not the usual hour. I was finishing some notes, and hastily putting down my work, I arose just as the Master came in. Behold Him with me. There He stands, this wonderful Being, His countenance radiating every phase of graciousness, love, beauty, sweetness and grandeur that the soul can conceive! He bore in His hands a silver salver covered with white jasmine. After greeting me He said: "I come to bring you my fare-well gift, these fragrant blossoms. May your deeds fill the world with like fragrance!" His "farewell gift"! I placed it on the table with a tumultuous heart. The Master continued: "In a few days you will leave us. Other guests are coming and it is my wish that you visit as many of the friends in Alexandria, Port Sa'íd and Cairo as possible. You will refresh them and they will welcome you with genuine Bahá'í love." Left alone, I wept. A thousand memories of His wondrous kind-ness rushed upon my soul and made real to me the divine outpouring of Love which the Christ manifested in the former time, but which the earthly consciousness of men has so obscured that scarcely a trace is visible in the majority of mankind to-day. Now in the dawn of this great cycle, the outlook is hopeful and inspiring, for the Christ Spirit has revealed a new Heaven of spiritual under-standing, bringing about the union of minds and hearts in thou-sands of ready souls, and a realization that this Christ Love must be applied in the life of the individual. The miracles performed daily by ‘Abdu’l-Baba could not be re-corded by human pen; the healing of the soul’s blindness, restoring the crippled in consciousness and the resurrection of the “dead” to spiritual reality. These are indeed miracles that the people of every nation, and every religion have seen demonstrated in this Day, as well as the wonders of physical healing. Bahá’ís do not make physical healing of paramount importance. “If, merely, the physical sight is restored the person will, in due time, pass out of the body, and no permanent benefit is gained.” Yet to me He said: “The adjustment of thy body is proof of the Love of God, and thou must be ever grateful for this bounty.” That afternoon, meeting with the Ladies of the Household, my eyes showed traces of weeping, and in answer to their solicitous inquiries, I told them of the Master’s wish that I should leave in a few days, and tears again came to my eyes. The ladies embraced me with the utmost affection, saying: “Dear sister, do not weep, your sadness makes us very sad too. We will ask the Master not to send you away. We all love you and wish you could remain here always. We will ask the Master to let you stay. You could teach us many things.” I was about to ask them not to speak to the Master, when He came in upon us unawares. We were standing in a group with locked arms and tear-stained faces, and endeavoured to separate, but He said, pushing us together again: “Nah, nah, this is good, very good.” Gazing with wondrous love upon us, before anyone had time to ask, He said: “No, she must go, she is too useful in the outside world to remain longer. She must go forth, spread the Glad Tidings, teach the people, demonstrate to them the Love of God.” “See,” He continued, pointing to the little group which now the younger grandchildren had joined, “See how they love you. We all love you. This is your home, but now you must go away from home. Thou hast eaten with us, not only material food, thou hast eaten with us spiritual food. The Heavenly Food consists of the Love of God, the knowledge of God, the bestowal of divine gifts. Thou must be very grateful for this wonderful bounty to thee and become radiantly happy.” After this I shed no more tears! The last day, August 27th, 1921, had arrived. Alláh-u-Abhás and good-byes had been repeated many times by the beloved friends, friends newly made, but eternal in realized consciousness. I did not see the Master that day in the Pilgrim House owing to His many visitors, but in His own house at dinner He was most kind and regretted that He had not been able to see me before. At the table He did not refer to my going away. But after dinner He beckoned to me and led me out on the broad stone parapet and had two chairs placed there. He motioned to me to be seated and gave me some instructions as to His wishes regarding my work in the future. Finally He arose and said: “As you leave at three in the morning, I will not see you again. This is my last farewell to you. I send you forth under the protection of Bahá’u’lláh, the Blessed Beauty. Be filled with His Love to overflowing. We shall pray for you always. Do not forget this.” He summoned Soheil to take me to the Pilgrim House and without another word, but with a strong pressure of His hand we parted. Silently I said: “Good-bye,” and going down the stone steps for the last time, I gazed upward, and, seeing the Master standing above, I seemed to feel and hear His benediction. Later I slipped over to the Master’s House to see the ladies once more as I had promised. The Greatest Holy Leaf gave me a rosary of lovely blue beads divided by exquisite blue pendants. She said: "I have strung these myself for you, and have prayed that you may be restored to perfect health and grow strong so that you may work many years for the Master." It was past midnight when, with many tender farewells, we parted. That last hour is engraved eternally upon my memory as a sacred ending of my visit of pilgrimage to the "Land of Desire."

On another occasion she asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá if he was the Christ. Immediately the figure of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was replaced by a tree in which stood a blazing fire.

She walked up Mount Carmel to the Báb’s Tomb. She prayed so earnestly that if this Message was the truth For God to send her a sign!

A dove flew to her and nestled on the bosom of her dress.

Mrs. Parsons ‘Abdu’l—haga told her to teach the poor; even those she could not reach. Then in a dream, it came to her that the “poor” were those of her own station in life. She won the co-operation of her natural associates in humanitarian work first, then won them for the Faith.

An American pilgrim spent two months in Haifa. There was one humble insignificant soul who never seemed to perform any service or partake of any of the meetings except to pour rose-water over the hands of the visitors as they passed out of the Master’s presence. The American said, “I’ve forgotten the faces of all the other’s present, except his face.”

Marjorie Morten:

Mrs. Morton visited Haifa when suffering greatly from ulcers.

Sitting at the Master’s table for her first meal, she wondered if she dared eat of the pilau which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had set before her. She struggled through it; then He set a second plate before her and told her to eat. This she felt sure would cause her great suffering, but she wished to obey her Lord. The third time, a plateful was set before her. She thought, “I will surely die obeying my Lord!” In the morning she awoke, free from pain for the first time in months money from some others. His own house at Haifa (jokingly called the 3aha'i Hospital of Mount Carmel by some of the friends) was where some of that money went, it was supposed, but there was never any sign of any hospital on Mount Carmel!

— he: ulcers had disappeared!

When met Georgie with Emogene I found out that she had divorced her husband and that he had married the other woman in the case, furthermore he had gotten hold of her inheritance and that of it, little if anything remained and that now she was almost wholly dependent upon the all irony which the courts allowed her, and that of late these remittances had ceased to come and she was in very embarrassed circumstances.

Besides meeting Emogene and Georgie several times during the two days my ship was in port and having long talks with them the most outstanding circumstance of the visit now in my mind was a long talk which Emogene and I had the one evening of my stay. We were in one of the parlors of the hotel and there was music and dancing going on in an adjoining room; however, we were far away in spirit from this gaiety. We were talking about the spiritual condition of the Cause in America And considering the outlook of things there.

Emogene and I had been together during the fight in Chicago in 1917 when the issue was up as to whether the Bahá'í Cause in America would stand for the admixture of other teachings (the other teachings, then in question was the Harmon Heresy, brand of Theosophy with much added to it).

The old and firm Bahá'ís won the day in Chicago and after struggle in Washington also, but New York in particular and even Boston a little bit, still resented the affair. In fact many friends in New York resent the affair extremely and even to this day (1927) have not gotten straight on the matter.

However the whole matter was hushed over and as best it could be, on the surface there was an armistice but underneath there were the former fixed complexes. Creating cross purposes, cliques and divisions, this condition was at the foundation of the unfortunate convention of 1920, when The Masters policies were so overthrown and the Temple went to Bourgeois and its many difficulties. This was fundamentally due to the underlying differences in the conception of the Center of the Covenant existing between the friends and which came to an issue from time to time in the relations between the New York and Chicago groups.

Emogene and I discussed this condition, that night at Parker's Hotel. We both saw that although the Chicago group with which we had worked and sympathized, had won out on the Struggle in the Bahá'í eye notwithstanding this apparent victory the New York attitude of laity and latitude in the spiritual matters of the Teaching was in reality gaining great ascendancy as we had all witnessed in the Bahá'í Convention of 1920. Although the outer struggle in that convention had been up on the grounds of the Architecture of the Temple, yet in reality the inner struggle of souls had been upon quite a different plain. It was a conflict of understanding of the Teachings.

As Emogene and I talked we seemed to see the spiritual down-d trend which the Cause in America was taking, for in this condition we saw a fatal blow given to the fervent fundamental faith of those who were firm in the understanding of all of the essentials of The Holy Cause.

As we spoke of this condition I recall tears came to my eyes, a most rare thing for me, for only a very few times, not more than five or six I should say, in my grown up life have I ever cried thus. Subsequent events in these seven years passed since then show me now that our vision was a true one for since that time there has been an ever increasing liberalism in the Cause which to date has been undermining the fundamental faith of many people in The Revelation.

The most recent development of which is The World Unity Movement founded and maintained by a ruling minority in the Cause which takes of its platform all of the popular principles and teachings of the Cause suppressing all mention of The Revelation and all name, and gives these teachings to the world under no name save that of the unknown World Unity.

Dear Emogene went with me down to the steamer the following afternoon and there on board to our surprise, we found Mrs. Morten, Mrs. Van Patten and her son a lad just out of school ready for college – pilgrims bound also for 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Holy land.

The company of passengers comprised people of the diverse nationalities, races and religions whom one usually meets going coming on those ships between Europe and the near Orient. Our party made the acquaintance of some of the people with whom we were able to speak of our mission to the Holy Land, and there.

All who knew the Master marvelled at His ability to work and to do this work in the midst of all kinds of interruptions and cross currents of the thought of the many people who surrounded Him. Besides all the affairs of the Cause and its believers, He had many people from the Moslem and Christian worlds coming to Him to solve their problems; for instance, if two men were in business trouble or conflict they would often come to Him asking that He settle their differences – all of this was a great burden upon His shoulders. An incident was told me of how one day a group of several men came to the Master asking, Him to adjust some transaction between them, upon which they were unable to come to an agreement. For a long time they told Him their woes and troubles one with the others. Then He suggested a solution which was accepted some but rejected by the others. Then He offered another arrangement out of the trouble but this was likewise objected to, and so on the matter went along, for the better part of the morning. Finally the men left the house, still in dispute. The Master weary with it all turned to some of Bahá'ís who were dear, remarking, "Verily it is easier to please God than to please these people!"

For some time I had been in Haifa, seeing the Master several times each day together with the several other pilgrims, but about the opportunity of talking with Him in private. I had some solutions of mine own, as well as those of a few others in America elsewhere, to be presented to Him. One day I asked one of the secretaries if he could arrange such an interview for me. He spoke with the Master who was then talking in the garden adjacent to the house. The Master walked over to where I was standing, saying that the next morning He would arrange to see me.

After breakfast the following day I stayed about so as to be on hand when the Master was free. I watched Him go to the stable on the top of which was a terrace with a small room built of wad with windows, having to the North a view of the Sea, and to the South and East a view of the garden. By an outside staircase He mounted to the terrace and stood before the door of the room. Seeing me at some distance away near the house He beckoned to me to come. I hastened to the place and shortly was joined by one of the Interpreters. We entered into the room and the moment of my long anticipated interview had come.

I began by offering to the Master several small packages envelopes containing gifts and souvenirs from friends in Europe, together with messages from them. Scarcely had I commenced one of the duster's sons-In-law entered with a telegram in which he presented to the Master; then before he left the room there arrived a friend from Persia, who was formerly Mírzá Nabibollah Shírází of 'Akká, whom I had known in Paris some years before. Now he came to Haifa on his way to Damascus as Persian Consul General to Syria. He was then going by one of those long Persian titles which I can't remember. When this friend left, my conversation with the Master was resumed for a few minutes when a Turkish gentleman came to call. The Master made him welcome and ordered coffee and a nargele or water pipe. He sat sipping his coffee and puffing away at the pipe, the water in the vase of which made a gurgling sound which suggested the name “bubble-bubble” by which this style of pipe is sometimes known. He talked with the Master intermittently in Turkish and as he didn’t understand Persian nor English the Master and I continued our conversation interruptedly for a short while.

It seems to me that during this time there were one or two minor interruptions, but the memory of these I somewhat hazy or mind compared with the final interruption which ended the interview. One of the older Persian believers – of a very humble and simple type came to the door of the room, his head tied up in handkerchiefs, moaning with the toothache. He was afraid to go alone to the dentist and had come to ask the Master to delegate of the friends in whom he had confidence to go with him to get treatment or to have the tooth pulled out. After disposing of his case the Master turned to me (His hands before him with up-turned palms as if to question) saying “Khaleh Mushkellās” (most difficult). Then He excused Himself, assuring me that He soon arranges for another time with me. And in due time I had a most satisfactory talk with Him and all of my business was accomplished.

While in Germany the currency of the country was depreciating of the situation, He said: “By their coming to the Holy Land prophesy is fulfilled!”

Although we were enjoying Jerusalem we wanted to return to the Master who was in Haifa, so after a few days my brother and Fugita and I took an early morning train that brought us to Haifa in time for the midday meal.

A day or two before this we had parted from Anna True Perron, Jane Appel and Mrs. Hauser, who had gone by train from Jerusalem to Cairo on their way to Alexandria where they were going ship for Europe on their way back to America.

One day not long after our return from Jerusalem the Master announced that the Bahá’í friends in the Colony down by the Sea of Galilee were in grave danger because of conditions arising from the political upset of the country and that it was necessary that He go to their help and assistance. The next afternoon He started with several of the friends in the big automobile – Arthur Redeen driving – their route being through Nazareth.

The roads were bad between Haifa and Nazareth – in one place not far from Haifa the ruts were so deep that the wheels of car suddenly went down so far as to let the bottom of the car (which was a very low-hung machine) down upon the roadbed with such force that the metal case covering the bearings was broken, all of the oil, dropping out, thus quite disabling the machine.

After some delay a carriage was found for the Master and his party returning to Haifa, reaching home at about dusk. The second day following, another start was made this time by a horse-drawn carriage. I went over to the Master’s house at about four A. M. The carriage was at the door and from the lights and the shadows in the house one could discern movements therein. Presently the Master came out into the darkness morning. One of the friends preceded Him with a lantern lighting His way down to the gate got into the carriage, greeting the few of us who stood by the gate as He passed. Getting into the carriage, and seating Himself, He looked about, lifted His hand in salute, said “Ya’llah!” to the driver, and the carriage drove off just as the first rays of light were appearing in the East, before the sun rises.

A day or two after the Master and His party left to Tiberias, came the Bourgeois party, they having left America some time prior, having spent some time in Paris and other parts of France, then Italy, and finally Egypt on their way to the Holy Land. The Executive Board of Bahá’í Temple Unity furnished him with $1,500 that he might make this trip in order to see some of great cathedrals and temples of the world, and to take his drawings to the Master.

We all went down to the station to meet the party. Bourgeois, Mme. Bourgeois and her friend Willard Ashton of Rockford, Illinois, and a Mr. Pemberton, an old friend, of Bourgeois’ who later wrote a book about the Cause. Bourgeois’ and I met in quite a friendly way, embracing one another. I have always liked him personally although we differ radically in our architectural ideals. One rather amusing incident I recall in connection with their arrival at the station in Haifa amid the usual crowd of howling natives. Bourgeois turned to one of us saying, “What is this Basshish that I hear all these people talk about? They talked about it all the time in Egypt, too!” We all burst out laughing and when the word was explained to him, he laughed too.

The party were lodged in the Pilgrim house where we were we were staying so we saw a great deal of them the next few days. Among their sundry pieces of luggage was a long roll containing the drawing of the Temple rendered in color by professional watercolorist, which later was hung in the Holy Tomb of the Master (This was reproduced in color on the post cards so much used by the friends).

That evening a group of many Bahá’ís came together in the hall of the house to meet these new-comers and to see the drawings. Mr. Pemberton told of how Bourgeois had been called of God to do this great work and that Bahá’u’lláh had chosen him as the instrument through which to reveal the new style of Bahá’í architecture for this new dispensation, and of the heroic sacrifices he and Mme. Bourgeois had made to accomplish this mission. I was a bit bored because I knew that Bourgeois had already been many times paid in money for this work. Then Bourgeois spoke, wring that Bahá’u’lláh has inspired him to do this; words were, “It is Bahá’u’lláh’s Temple, not mine” going on to state that it came up on him as a revelation without preparation nor study nor thought.

In 1904-5 many architects entered into a world competition for the Carnegie Peace at the Hague. Bourgeois and Blumenstein (the erstwhile partner of Bourgeois) also submitted designs. That their design made then was the Bahá’í Temple. It was published in “Architecture”, a popular architectural publication of the day, and as one compares that published design with the Bahá’í Temple, though here and there details defer, in general mass, principle and composition they are identical – the difference being that their Peace Palace had eight sides, whereas his temple has nine sides. It was years after this Temple was designed that Bourgeois first heard of the Bahá'í Cause!

The day after the Bourgeois party arrived, my brother Will and I went by appointment to Tiberias to join the Master. Muḥammad-‘Alí Bey, an Egyptian living in Haifa who had some governmental position on the railways of Palestine, accompanied us. We had seen much of Him in Haifa where he spent much time with the friends. We had pleasant run by rail from Haifa to a station on the south end of the Lake of Tiberias (Sea of Galilee). Here we took a rather rickety steamer for Tiberias. It seemed almost dangerous, that small boat drawing but little water and with two decks crowded with passengers. We felt that a squall might easily capsize her – but then on second thought we were going to see the Master! So what of danger!

There had been a certain persecution of His friends in Tiberias and the Master, for protection, told me not to let anyone know why we were there – to travel merely as tourists. In fact we were not even to appear to recognize our friends who were with the Master at the German Hotel, for it was there that we stopped also.

The Hotel was in view as we landed, but a few paces up the hill from the quay. There on the roof of the building was a sort of a penthouse or pavilion, one single room, where the friends had told me the Master lodged while in Tiberias.

We were soon settled in our rooms. In the lobby I saw Mountfort Mills with His wife; they had preceded us by a day or two from Haifa, but we exchanged no signs of recognition, strictly observing the Master's instructions. Later in the presence of some people lounging about the lobby, Mountfort casually asked me if I were making a tour of that country, whereupon I replied that I was, and we fell into a conversation which any two travellers of the same nationality might indulge in.

Having time on our hands before lunch, we strolled about the bazaars of the town. Suddenly the Master appeared in the distance with the group of the Persian Friends in attendance. We did not feel that we could possibly pass Him without recognizing Him, and by so doing we would not be adhering to the instructions; we were therefore turned down a side street and taking a roundabout way back to the hotel, we reached there just after He had entered.

After lunch we went to our rooms and shortly one of the Persian friends arrived to conduct us to the Master's room. We went down a corridor and up a narrow staircase into a low attic chamber under the roof which we crossed in order to reach the Master's quarters which as we entered we perceived to be a room of ample dimensions with a high ceiling; a long casement window gave access to a balcony from which one had a fine view of the Sea.

The Master greeted us with affection and explained to us that His mission there was an important one; it was to protect some of the Persian Bahá'í friends who lived on farm lands at ‘Abbásseyeh on the opposite side of the Lake. It seems that when the partition of former Syria took place the line between modern Syria and modern Palestine was drawn so that this farm district was on the Syrian side of the line, while the village in which many of these Bahá'ís lived was on the Palestine side. There were British troops and order on the Palestine side, but not on the Syrian side, for with the French Government, away off in Damascus, it was impossible to have police protection at this distant point.

The Nomadic Arabs of the Mountains to the East of Galilee saw here their opportunity to harass the governments in retaliation, for this partition of old Syria was much resented by the. With this in view they fell upon the properties of the Bahá'ís, despoiling their crops, stealing their cattle and anything else they could get their hands upon, and terrorizing the people, who fled to the village on the side of the line where they were under British Protection. I was told that one of these friends had been killed, while the others were in great danger.

The Master had come down to Tiberias in order to arrange with the officials for the protection of these, His people. Here we spent a few memorable days, there by the Sea of Gheserath reminded hourly of the great Spiritual Presence of both the ancient and present "Manifestation" who had frequented these shores.

The second day, the Master being occupied and there being no opportunity of seeing Him, Will and I made a long hike afoot to Magdella and Capurnium; the towns – rather ruins of towns – were materially not very interesting, yet the association and sentiment which hangs over them makes a deep impression upon the thoughtful pilgrim. The day was beautiful and the views out over the Lake and distant mountains toward the Eastward was brilliant. The waters seemed the clearest I had ever seen; at places the roadway was cut high up in the hills which come down frequently to the water on the Western side, and from these heights we could see down through the clear water to the bottom of the Lake, covered with small rounded stones for some distance out.

We also climbed up on some old ramparts and fortifications on a height to the Northwest of the Town from where we had fine vies. Another day, we hiked off to the west and a bit southwest over the hills where we found numerous caves in the rocks caused by erosion in the hillsides of softer rocks than those remaining. These served as shelters for the flocks, and in some cases the openings were walled up with stones without mortar. In one place we saw a manger fashioned out in the living rock, and we wondered if this might not have been the type of manger in Bethlehem in which the Christ Child was laid.

I had heard 'Azíz'u'lláh Bahadur speak of the hot baths of Tiberias. Once when he had been suffering intensely for some time with sciatica the Master sent him there for the cure. After the second day he was relieved and suffered no more.

The walk to these baths I should say was less than a mile south from tie Town. I took it alone one afternoon. The bath houses are very crude and simple, the bath chambers covered with tin, rough concrete domes in the thickness of which had been set the ends of quart bottles of various shades of glass through which light filtered. A Colony of Jews lived near there, curious types of the Orthodox School. They saluted me kindly as I passed.

On my way back to the Town I was walking near a deep ditch, perhaps twelve feet wide, in which a few inches of water stood or flowed. Suddenly I heard a woman scream, and looking ahead a few yards I saw a rough plank of wood spanning the ditch as a bridge, and on the middle of this plank a veiled woman, evidently a Moslem calling for help, standing terrified about to tumble into the water a few feet below. I rushed to her assistance, going out a step or two onto the plank and reaching out my hand which she sped as I led her across to the bank. Then she began to thank me loudly in the Name of Alláh and finished by kissing my hand. As her veil became a bit disarranged I saw that she was a very old woman. It was all over in a moment and I turned to go when I saw two turbaned Moslem men, possibly father and son from the evident discrepancy in their ages, running toward me. "Well, this is a pretty fix", I thought to myself, knowing how indignant Moslems get if any man approaches their women, but I did not worry long, for from their faces and gestures I saw that they had seen the old woman's predicament and my move, for they salaamed and smiled and bowed amid a torrent of voluble exclamations made by the old woman. I left the old couple there but the young man insisted on going with me until we reached the streets of the town, where he salaamed again before taking leave of me; the last I saw of him he was retracing his steps, walking along with that easy swing of the shoulders so characteristic of the Bedwins, his robes floating in the wind.

The Master having driven from Haifa down to Tiberias, retained his carriage the, a long wagon with three seats and a cover such as we in America call a mountain wagon. One evening just before sunset the Master and several of his sane of Oriental friends started out for a drive taking the shore road to the North. They could not have gone very far when something broke about the harness and the horses took fright; however Isphendier, the driver, hold them while the Master and the others descended. Shortly other carriage was procured and He returned to the hotel, remarking as He entered the house that God had been their fortress and sir protection.

The following day Will and I took leave of the Master. He called us to Him in that upper chamber of the German Hotel. Of the incident of the night before he spoke as follows:

"I could not see you last night on account of the accident. The Blessed Perfection protected me. We walked and it was very warm. My clothing became very damp and then it became cold. The wind was from the Sea. Bahá'u'lláh has always protected me."

The Master first said to me "Go to Germany for some days, then to Paris, and America."

"I want you to take the Glad Tidings of god from here to the German friends. Take with you to them a new spirit. The German friends are very pure, they are very spiritual. They have great capacity for spiritual development. The divine fragrances will refresh Germany. The reason that they are so pure and spiritual is that the abominable smell of violation has not reached that land. Had not this wind of violation blown over America the number of the friends by this time would have been over a million, but that retarded the spread of the Cause.”

He was very serious indeed, as apropos of nothing at all in my mind He launched into a philippic against the violators who spread such disaster in the Cause in America. Ifrahim Hkierellah and Farid He mentioned by names, but none others did He mention. He said that the Cause said that the Cause had been blighted in America by violation. In America all of our troubles He said were due to violation; thus He discoursed for some time, finally exhorting the people to arise and to protect the Cause from such infection and thaw who spread it.

“In the day when Khierella violated”, said the Master, “several hundred souls turned away from the Clause.”

I said, “Whenever I think of the violation in America I become distressed and disheartened.” He said, “It is of no importance. These violations cannot achieve any results. They cannot attract nor hold any souls. They simply poison same souls and cause them to wither. But it is temporary. In a short time you will see no trace will be left of them. Observe the life of Ibrahim (Khierella), how he was, and how he is. They themselves and their damage to the Cause are like the foam of the surf of the sea – ephemeral.

I have adopted you as my son. You have to appreciate this favor very much indeed. One should see that you are living according to the requirements of this sonship. You should be aware of your responsibilities. My prayers will help you. I always pray for you. At present take a new spirit of the German friends, and through this cause a greater harmony. Then after Germany, go to France, England and America.”

The Master asked about the number of the friends in Germany. I explained to Him that there had been 325 at one Feast in Esslingen, Will I had been there, but that new there were even more.

“You are under God’s protection. If I am not with you in body, I am in Spirit. Convey my attachment to the friends. I pray for all.”

Then He embraced us, kissing us both upon either cheek and upon our foreheads. We knelt to receive His Blessing and He placed hands upon our heads as if drawing down a benediction from a High.

We left by the little boat which brought us. As she put out Ito the Lake we kept ourselves fastened that little chamber on the top of the German Hotel until it was loot to sight. Little did I think that that was the last time I was to see my Master in this life:

On the return railroad journey we stopped off at a way-station, the nearest to Nazareth. It was late in the afternoon when we started out on the nine mile walk to the Town up in the Hills where Jesus spent His boyhood. Along the wayside we saw many young Jewish students in their latter 'teens and early twenties, boys and girls together working breaking stone to repair and to make the rows. We spoke with a group of these young people; they spoke English and French, and told us they were University students; without other means of a livelihood and were obliged to work thus. (At that time the Jews were returning to Palestine in such numbers that the entire economic plan of things was upset; the adjustment to the new condition had not yet been made.) They were happy and they sang and chatted and laughed as they worked; apparently their newly-born national spirit was strong with them and they revelled in its romance.

The nine miles seemed long. The road mounted high into the hills behind which nestled Nazareth. It was quite dark before we reached the Town, and an inky blackness it was, too, so dark that had the macadam road not been of an almost white stone we might not have been able to follow it. However, we finally reached the hotel which it turned out was kept by the German who had formerly owned the hotel in Haifa where I had frequently stayed in years gone by. He made us very welcome and comfortable amid plain but scrupulously clean surroundings, and after a good supper we went early to bed.

I had been to Nazareth years before but this was my brother's first visit there so we started forth early in the morning to see the few places of interest. First we visited the Church built over the house of the Blessed Virgin, kept by Franciscan Monks. One, Brother Sabastian, was formerly of the Franciscan Monastery at Brookland, District of Columbia; a picturesque, fat old Monk such as one sees in pictures, and an altogether delightful person. He sent some messages to his brother Monks in Brookland which I later delivered. (They asked me questions about him.) Then we visited St. Joseph's workshop, and finally an orphan asylum for boys, kept by French Order of Monks, high up on the Mountain back of the Town, where the brothers were building a Church in the Romanesque style, all in stone of attractive design. One of the Fathers took us up to a lookout point back of the Church, from whence we could see 'Akká, Haifa, Mount Carmel and the Sea in the distance. Coming down into the town I sighted the Moslem cemetery with the tomb of Shaykh Yousseff Ala though not a Bahá'í had befriended Bahá'u'lláh. On my first visit to Nazareth in 1908 I had met the son of the Shaykh who was the Governor of the Town. He had been extremely kind to me and had sent a servant with me about the Town, and one of the places I visited was this Mausoleum of his father, the late Sheikk. Now my brother and I entered the cemetery, and he took the accompanying photograph of the tomb.

Returning to the hotel after seeing the "Well of the Blessed Virgin" and other places of more or less question regarding their authenticity, we had lunch, after which a nap, previous to leaving for Haifa. We were about to leave hotel when we were surprised run into Curtis Kelsey, Fugita and Khusroe (of the Holy Household) who were on their way from Haifa, to Tiberias in the small automobile of the Master, called thither by the Master. We had but hurried visit with these brothers before taking our stage down the nine-mile distant station, on our way to Haifa where we arrived in time for the evening meal.

Haifa without the Master was indeed a dreary place, at least so it seemed to us on our return from Tiberias when we had a day or two to wait before taking our steamer for Italy. During our journey to Tiberias, Garibaldo Federici had been there for a few hours; his ship having made her round of Mediterranean Ports had touched again at Haifa. He had seen the friends, visited the "Magham" (Holy Shrine on Mount Carmel), and had left messages for me hoping to see me on my return to Italy on my way to America.

We were fortunate enough to get a ship from Haifa direct to Brindisi, one of the Lloyd Triestino vessels, a somewhat small but comfortable craft.

There was the usual affectionate goodbye of the friends in Haifa, and late in the afternoon we found ourselves on board with our luggage. We did not sail until about sunset and then under very slow speed. Our next Port was Jaffa, but a few hours away, where we arrived the next morning about sunrise.

We did not land at Jaffa. The sea was somewhat rough and it rained much of the day; in fact by five o'clock in the afternoon the wind was blowing a small gale from the West and the waves were as high as I had ever seen them along that coast. It was with considerable trouble that a British officer and his wife got out to the ship. They told us that they had difficulty in getting the boatmen to bring them out, so high was the sea, and these boatmen at Jaffa have the reputation of being the bravest of those of any Port.

In his room.

The Master first asked for all the friands in America, mentioning especially, Mr. and Mrs. Harris, Mr. Hoar, Mr. McNutt, Miss Thompson, Dr. and Mrs. Krug.

He then said that the reaso4 he underwent all the suffering and privation he did, was to teach the friends to love Bahá'u'lláh and that the only way to love Bahá'u'lláh was to love the friends; the more the friends love one another, the more they love Bahá'u'lláh.

Mírzá 'Azíz explained to the Master the situation about the McNutt house, explaining fully that Mr. MacNutt and the Committee had tried to come to some arrangement for purchasing the house for Bahá'í purposes, according to the wish of the Master, but that the Committee had not been able to agree to Mr. MacNutt's terms; the latter's financial need was great and there were opportunities to sell at the price he asked, but he wishes only to carry out the Master's will.

The Master said:

"Not at all Not at all! It will not be against my wish. He may sell it and adjust his affairs."

'Azíz Bahadur

He then spoke of the Egyptian friends, speaking, of their devotion.

He gave permission to 'Abdu'l Galil to visit him in the later Spring, "for your sake".

He then dismissed us with his blessing, a baptism of the spirit.

‘Azíz afterward, told, me that the Master suffers more from inharmony among the friends than from any other cause. This is not a pretty figure of speech, it is an actual fact and news of this kind makes him really ill. ‘Azíz felt his recent illness was caused by such news. When the friends are martyred in the Cause, he is sad, hut not sickened. He realizes that these things are in the path way of service and help the Cause. But differences 1 among the friends take his very life.

Tuesday, Feb. 22nd.

Adele spent the morning with the ladies and had a sip interview with the Master, Monover Khanoum interpreted for her.

After lunch we walked down town and made a few purchases for the Pilgrim House.

Later, the Master sent for a drive up the Mountain. Khrosso drove, with Arthur to instruct him.

*NOTE:

The Master seems most of the time to be in an inner state of communion with the Manifestation: a state of peace and joy that lifts him above the continuous petty annoyances that surround him – up to the mountain top.*

Feb. 22nd. P.M.

Meeting at the Master’s House in the evening.

The Master said:

You must be very happy, for praise be to God, it is the third time that thou hast com here. This is through the infinite bounty of God. God willing, its results will become apparent.

“Once, when I was at Tiberius, I saw a crowd bending over fourteen or fifteen stone and praying. They used incense and kissed the stones. I asked what it meant. They said. ‘Once upon a time, His Holiness Christ passed by here and sat upon one of these stones. But it is not known upon which one; therefore, we weep and kiss all of them, that perchance we may kiss the one upon which He sat.’ Now this is the third time you have made the pilgrimage to the Holy Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh.

“But those people at Tiberius spoke falsely. They have no love for Christ; they worship the name only, not Christ, Himself, they would act according to His wishes. They are completely indifferent to the reality of Christ. It is only His name that they worship. If Christ Himself, should come, these very people would kill Him, as was done formerly by the Jews who were praying for and expecting His coming. They were weeping and supplicating God that He might appear, but He actually came, they condemned Him to death, saying ‘This is the false Christ!’ And so great was their error that they even called Him ‘Beelzebub’, the Hebrew name for Satan. They actually did this. So it is clear that they did not speak the truth. They were not expecting their own superstition to come pass. As these were not realized, they objected. They were not expecting an oppression Christ; they expected a Christ who bore a sword in His hand; who was to come from an unknown place, not from Nazareth. They gathered from the sayings of the Prophets, that His Holiness Christ would appear with a sword and would conquer the whole world. Also, they were expecting His Holiness to come and sit upon the throne of David and reign; that He would conquer the whole world and bring all nations under the banner of the Jews. So they interpreted the Old Testament. Also, they expected that He would spread the religion of Torah, so that throughout the world there would be but one religion, the religion of Moses. So, too, they were expecting that justice would be extended from the world of man to the world of animals; that the serpent and the mouse would live together in one hole; that the eagle and the dove would lie side by side in one nest; that the wolf and the lamb would drink from the same spring; that the lion and the deer would graze in the same meadow. These were the signs of the coming of Christ in the Old Testament. These signs were correct; but the people did not understand. They wished them to be literally fulfilled and as they did not understand their real meaning, they were deprived of His Holiness Christ, verily, Christ did come from an unknown place – the reality of Christ, not the body. The reality of Christ came from heaven. The staff with which He tended His flock, was a sword—not a sword of steel, but the sword of His tongue, which severed, truth from falsehood. And the reign of Christ was real, everlasting, heavenly. It was not like the reign of Bonaparte, a worldly reign, for, if real sovereignty were sovereignty of this world, then, indeed, Bonaparte was Christ (who fulfilled literal prophecy of world – sovereignty: But the sovereignty of Jesus was a Divine Sovereignty. Consider how it still maintains its sway. Worldly sovereignty comes to an end, when the sovereign closes his eyes in death.

“The reign of the Manifestation of God is without end. Christ spread the reality of the Torah, not its letter. He spread the fundamental reality the foundation of the Cause of God. For example, consider that there are ten decrees capital punishment in the Torah. Why is this? Because his Holiness Moses dwelt in the desert and in the desert it is difficult to enjoy peace with comfort and safety. Harshness and severity are needed. They lived in a wilderness. For this ‘ reason, punishment of death is decreed in the Torah for ten offenses, But His Holiness Christ; appeared in Palestine and Palestine was a land of culture where There was no need of such severity. Therefore, He abrogated the decrees of capital punishment of the Old Testament. He spread its reality its spirit. To illustrate: In America, in a Jewish synagogue, I asked if it is possible to carry out these ten decrees now? They answered, ‘No.’ I said, ‘It is decreed in the Old Testament, that for the theft of one dollar the hand should be cut off; and if one stole one dollar, his hand was cut off. Today, would it be possible for the theft, not of one dollar, but even of one million dollars, to cut off the hand of the offender?’ They answered ‘No.’ Then I said that was the law- for life in the desert, not for the time of Christ. Likewise it would not be possible to enforce such a law today. Clearly, it was not meant to spread the letter of the Old Testament, but its reality.

“As to statement that justice and truth will attain to such an ideal degree that the wolf and the lamb will drink from the same spring; as long as a wolf is a wolf and ‘a lamb is a lamb, the lamb will re-main prey for the wolf. It is not possible to change this. One is a wolf, the other is a lamb. The real meaning of this passage is that human beings are like wolves and sheep, one is from the East and the other is from the West, and between the two there is complete separation, in race, in nationality and in customs. They are as the wolf and the lamb; friendship between them is impossible. But in the time of Christ, both became believers in Him and because of their mutual faith, became friends. The Jews, however, did not understand these prophecies. They said that these things are written in the Old Testament and as they have not come to pass literally, this Christ cannot be the Messiah. The Messiah must come from heaven, but we know that this Christ has come from Nazareth; we know his house. This is not the Christ. And so they rose against him. Today, again, the Christians believe that Christ is to come a second time. If He does, doubtless they will again deny Him, and in all probability, kill Him as did the Jews.

“A well known Protestant Christian, one of the founders of the College at Beirut, recognized as a man of culture – Dr. Van Dyke – talked with me some time ago. I said to him, “How do you expect Christ to come again?” He replied, ‘We believe He will come from heaven.’ I asked, ‘Do you expect Him to come from this heaven?’(pointing to the sky) ‘You are skilled in the science of mathematics and astronomy and well know that this sky is infinite and that there is no such physical heaven from which Christ could descend. Let us consider the matter further. When Christ came the first time, He came from Heaven. He, Himself, said ‘I am come from heaven.’ He further said that none goes to heaven save him who comes from heaven. The reality of Christ did come from heaven. It is written in the New Testament that the Son of Man descended from heaven. But apparently He came from the womb of Mary. In reality, however, He came from heaven and His second coming will be the same.’

“Dr. Van Dyke replied, ‘No, no, He must come this way,’ (pointing to the sky). I said, ‘If an illiterate person should say that I should understand, but that you, who are a scholar so speak, astonishes me.’ The doctor then began to laugh.”

Feb. 23rd., Evening. 1921

Master’s Salon.

The Master said to me, “How are you? We speak in Persian. Thou halt aged. When I saw thee last thy hair was black but now it is white. I know thy heart is young. You look young also. White hair is of no importance.”

M. "I hope I may be born, again."

Master. "God willing thou shalt be born again and become a new being. His Holiness Christ said, 'It befits you to be born again.'

"Before physical birth man is ignorant of this world. He knows nothing of it. After birth, however, he finds that this world is quite different of the world of the matrix (womb). It is luminous, it is cheerful. The embryo could never imagine such a world. Similarly, man in this world is in the womb of Nature, immersed in the darkness of the physical world. He has no conception of the divine realm. He is like other animals.

"When he attains to the second birth he becomes detached from the world of Nature and finds his natural propensities distasteful. He becomes heavenly, enlightened, divine and like unto a radiant star. This condition, in the language of the Manifestations of God, is called 'the second birth.'

Feb. 24th. 5 P.M. 1921

Master's Salon.

Mason Remey and his brother Will had returned from Jerusalem at noon and were present with Mrs. Mills and myself. 'Azíz interpreted.

The Master first asked Mason if they had visited the Holy Shrines at Jerusalem. Mason replied that they had visited all the places they were told were holy.

The Master said that second birth." "the place where Christ is said to be buried is authentic though not discovered for 300 years after His death. It was known as a rubbish heap for dumping by the Jews up to that time. After the grave was discovered, however, Queen Helena built a chapel upon it. The site is authentic. The Via Doloroso is also authentic.

A question how to attain the second birth was asked.

The Master answered:

"By entering into the Kingdom, which means to be detached from the propensities of Nature and to be characterized with divine virtues. Today almost all the people of the world are immersed in animal traits; shedding one another's blood, lying to one another, given over to avarice, lust and greed. These propensities must be abandoned and replaced by divine qualities."

Replying to the information that a cable had gone to Mr. MacNutt stating that the Master had no objection to the sale of his house, he said;

"No, it is not at all against my wish. My home is in the heart of MacNutt not in the house of stone, lime and wood. My dwelling is in the heart of the friends Houses built of brick and stone crumble and pass away, but my home is permanent in the hearts.

Material houses have no importance. Our property in Tīhrán is still in the hands of usurpers. But it is different with the Temple. (Mashrek ul Azkar) That is a means of bringing the friends together and is good. That is why I attach so much importance to the building of the Mashrek ul Azkar.”

‘Azíz then spoke of the success of Mrs. Hoagg’s work in Italy, Rome. The Master said: “I told her that she would be confirmed in her service. She has a sincere heart strength of faith and complex devotion.”

In speaking further of the Holy places in Jerusalem the Master said:

“Men of insight have their gaze fixed upon the future. Superficial minds are concerned only with the things immediately about them. Jesus, while undergoing every hardship and indignity, with a crown of thorns upon His head, saw the future downfall of Kings, their jewelled crowns toppling about them; while His own Kingdom became firmly established.”

*NOTE.

How being with the Master affects the outlook on life; the sky is bluer and more brilliant, the water and the mountains are transformed into a beauty of light and color indescribable. The people about you all seem different and within pulsates a joy and exaltation beyond description. Yet one goes about the daily tasks as usual. Is this, through him, the communion with Bahá’u’lláh he speaks of so often?*

Feb. 25th, 10 A. M. 1921

Our Room

Pilgrim House

The Master:

“What a lovely view of the Mountain from here. It is beautiful on the Mountain, too. The view from it is beautiful.”

Mrs. Mills said, “Yes, and we can see the Tomb of the Báb. We are going to walk there.”

The Master:

“Very good. But do you not ride every day? Ride to the top of the Mountain. The Prophets of God have prayed there. Christ prayed there. You go there and pray. It is God’s mountain, the garden of God. Karm-garden, il-God-Garden of God in the Hebrew. Two Hebrew words mean God – Yah and Il. For example, Elijah, Zacarias, Isaiah, Jerimiah etc., Gabriel, Israel.”

“Since you have come it has been raining but from now on we hope there will be sunshine and you will be happy.”

M. “When we are with ‘Abdu’l-Baháb we have the real sun.”

Master: "My title and name is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This name is beloved to me. Neither sun, nor moon or stars, only 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In Arabic there is a tale of a man and his beloved named Leila. They would call him as the son of his father, or the brother of so-and-so etc., but to those names he would not answer – he did not seem to hear. But when they called him by the name of the Servant of Leila, then he would answer. No other name could he hear. I love the name 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Once a year Leila used to prepare food and with her own hands give it to the people. She would fill their bowls with food from her own. But when her lover came she broke his bowl instead of filling it. The people began to laugh, saying, 'How is it that she broke your bowl instead of filling it as she did ours?' But her lover said, laughing, 'That is because she loves me and prefers me to you, that is why she broke my bowl,'

There are many more delightful stories among the Arabs. One that tells a man riding on a camel cried aloud, 'O God forgive my sins. If you do not forgive them, I will make you unpopular. You are the Forgiver, therefore you should forgive. If you do not forgive I shall ride about on my camel crying aloud, God is not God, for He does not forgive.'"

From the Bayán quoted from 'The Bábís of Persia'

11 J.R.A.S. Vol. 21 P. 931

"So worship God that if the recompense of thy worship were to be the fire, no alteration of thy worship of Him would be produced. If you worship God from fear that is unworthy of the Threshold of the Holiness of God So also if your gaze is on Paradise and if you worship in the hope of that, for then you have made God's creation a partner with Him."

Feb. 27, Sunday morning 1921

On the veranda of Monover Khanoum's house. In the sun.

Mrs. Mills was going to m11 on Monover Khanoum when thE Master came out of his and walked over with us.

A. went inside with Monover Khanoum and the Master insisted on my sitting outside with him, Jinábí Mírzá Abu'l Ḥasan, one of the Afnán a relative of the Báb and Mírzá Hádí. Later 'Ináyatu'lláh came and interpreted. Before he came the Master spoke of the beauty of the day, how much he loved the sun here compared the amount of fun here with London. I asked if he would go to London again he said no, but that he might to Switzerland this summer. When I said I hoped we might join him there, he said, "I should go to the Convention, I should leave in time to be there, He spoke of the similarity of many Persian words to English. Then 'Ináyatu'lláh came.

The Master said:

“What a beautiful day it was: that there would be a meeting this afternoon at the Holy Tomb on the mountain to which Mrs .Mills and I should go. Then he spoke of the convention and the many supplications that had been sent to him about the building of the Temple: that all these things he had referred to the convention, that he had written replies saying that everything about the Temple should be referred to the convention.”You are one of the committee of the convention and must be there.”

I told him of Roy’s letter saying that the clergy were objecting to the permit being issued and that probably this could not be now much, at all before the convention. He replied:

“In America you will have many objections to the building of the Temple but you must not be discouraged. These things are good for the Cause. For fifty years the body of the Báb remained without a tomb in Persia, carried from place to place. It was not safe to bury it there in Persia, the enemies would steal it. As a result of this persecution the Báb’s body now rests here on Mount Carmel in A site much more beautiful than any place in Persia. It is the Will of God that controls these things, not the will of the people. ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd and the Nasr-el Din, Sháh of Persia, had both opposed the building of the tomb here and placing the Báb’s body in it; but the Will of God had prevailed over them.

“The sarcophagus was brought from India. Opposition spreads the Cause. The Will of God will prevail.”

I spoke of Mr. Wilson’s book and its use against us. (I am not sure ‘Ináyatu’lláh got this question right.) The Master said that Wilson had offered as his own teachings, the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh, taken from the Master’s talks.

I told the Master some of the opposition was based on Bahá’u’lláh’s two wives.

He said that no Manifestation has ever decreed but one wife. In Abraham’s time, several was the custom. In Moses’ time, an unlimited number. Jesus said nothing on the subject except with reference to divorce. It was St. Paul who advocated one wife or none, and it was not 300 years after Jesus that Christianity under Constantine decreed but one wife. This was not according to Jesus’ teaching, but was the enactment of the practice of certain pagans (?) who had found one wife the most convenient practice and this was adopted by Constantine when he codified and made Christianity the national religion (*The practice of having pictures and images in churches was also taken from these pagans. It had not been done in Christianity before.)

Bahá’u’lláh’s permission of two wives relates only to cases such as extreme illness, insanity etc., where it is obviously unfair either to permit the desertion of the unfortunate wife or to compel the blameless husband to live alone. However, there would probably be not more than one or two such cases in any community. Surplus females over males as occasioned by the war is no justification of polygamy.”

I asked what should be done in the Maskrek el Askar. The Master said four things:

- 1- Reading Bahá'í prayers.
- 2 - Reading the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.
- 3 - Chanting together (all singing,) the prayers woo words etc. of both.
- 4 - Speaking, explanation etc.

In answer to a question about music in the Temple he said that would be decided by the Houses of Justice.

March 2nd 1921

Master's Salon

After supper.

The Master:

"The Bahá'ís in Persia have gone through many severe tests. The more the tests the more they have progressed. No doubt from this cup there is a portion for you in America so well. They will not let you alone. They will rise against you, they will shout at you, they will blame you, they will jeer at you – such things as those. It is my hope that you 4111 remain in union, firm and steadfast. If you leave a tree to itself, it will not when you trim it and around its roots, then it will grow; otherwise it will wither. It will not grow nor develope. In the time of Paul and Peter one day they went to a temple of idol-worshippers.

Above the door was inscribed, 'What person knows about God?' Paul said, 'we know about God,' and they began to teach.

"The Jews said, 'These people believe in the Torah, they say the Torah is the book of God. According to its text they have turned away from it. Of this, Christ of whom they speak, there are signs concerning His appearance. Those signs have not appeared. This is an unknown person of their own imagining.'

Briefly, they did and said so much that finally they fell to beating Peter and Paul until they fell down. Then they dragged them out of the city and left them. The two disciples lay there throughout the night. In the morning, Paul arose saying, 'Here is a place nearby where a market will be held. Let us go there today and teach.' But Peter said, 'Dear God, our bones are broken to pieces.' Paul replied, 'So, this very beating is good. Peter arose and they went to the market place and began to teach. At length they were Attacked again and severely beaten. From morning until night they were assaulted.'

However, you will not be beaten so severely. If you are attacked, be sure that the bounty of the Blessed Beauty will protect you in the same way that it protected us. I was a child when the Blessed Beauty was sent to prison. So many stones were thrown into our house my mother took me and my sister to Sangelak, another part of Ṭihrán. There in a side street she found a house which she rented for about a shilling a month. This shows that sort of place it was. My mother, sister and I and Mírzá Muḥammad Goli were there together without money for our needs. My mother told me to go to our aunt in Ekiyeh Ḥájí Rejabali and tell her we had no money and ask for some. I went, but she had no money either. After a diligent search she found five shillings which she tied in the corner of a handkerchief and put in my pocket. I was only about eight years old. As I passed through the district where she lived, Mírzá Aḥmad Kaj Damog (crooked nose) recognised me. There were a number of children about. It was during the time of Maharron (lamentation for Imáms Ḥasan and Ḥusayn). They were beating their breasts with stones.

“The Arabs have attacked places near Tiberius, the friends are in danger, so I am going to Tiberius to care for them, to prevent any danger to them. I will go tomorrow. I expect you come to me two by two, pass one night there and return. When you return you may leave for home.

March 3rd 1921

Pilgrim House

‘Azíz interpreting.

The Master first talked with Mason about plans for the new Pilgrim House.

He then said that in Tiberius there were some missionaries who were opposed to the Cause and that we must use wisdom when there. It would be better to come to the hotel as ordinary tourists, seeing the sights during the day and then coming to him in the evening. Otherwise it would arouse their jealousy and hatred and do the Cause no good.

In answer to a question as to how we should act with those who are opposing the Cause, particularly the Wilmette Committee, he said that as far as possible deal ___ in a friendly ___ try to convince ___ need and desirability of the Cause. The Mash___ Azkar is a universal . It is not for any one - it is for them also, ___ where all religions ___ can come together ideas and remove ___ standings; so being the Cause of removing prejudice and uniting mankind. Why oppose the building? That ___ does not make Bahá’u’lláh. They are made without such a building, which is ___ for service to humanity. ___ none has yet been built in Persia, still the Cause and number of Bahá’ís there has steadily increased during the 70 years of the Covenant. What will opposition have? Do you think to check the Movement’s spread this cannot be. The result will be a station on the honor of America, the first nation in the world to stand for complete freedom of race and religion. Now to be the first to prevent the construction of this universal temple will be a reflection on the principles and practice of the country. Even in Russia, then the most despotic and bigoted country in the world, the value of the principles taught by the Cause was appreciated and a Mashrek ul Askar permitted in 'Ishqábád. A Government architect assisted. It is impossible to believe that free America can oppose such a building. "In general opposition should be met with great wisdom, kindness and love. When John the Baptist and Jesus were asked if they were the Christ, they both said 'No' but went on healing the sick.

"The Temple is not a necessary part of the work of winning people to the Cause.

What work will go on in the future as it has in the past. The Temple is a means of service. You must use great I will pray for you."

Tiberius Hotel. 1921

Master's room, overlooking

Lake of Galilee

Afternoon.

The Master said he had not intended to see us until evening but he so longed to he had sent for us.

As always, he thought first of our comfort and inquired of our journey and if we were comfortable in the hotel.

Then he pointed out of his windows to the lake and mountains and clouds and sun, and said that this whole country was holy and filled with spirituality because His Holiness Christ had worked and lived there. It was just here (pointing to a church by a palm tree near the shore that his Holiness met Peter and others and asked what the doing. They answered, 'Fishing', and Jesus replied, 'Throw away your nets and follow me. I will make you fishers of men!'

"Now praise be to God, we have met here and I hope you will become fishers of men!"

"It is a very holy spot. I wanted to be with you here. During the life of His Holiness Christ none appreciated Him. His sufferings were very great. Today, so long after His death, He is worshipped. They crucified Him, now they worship Him. So it always is with the Manifestations of God. In their own days they are rejected – afterwards they are worshipped!

I asked that he would supplicate that our eyes might be opened and that we might appreciate what it meant to be with him in this spot.

He said that parents are kind to their children through their love but the child cannot understand or appreciate it and often cries at what the parents have done for him."But, praise be to God you understand and appreciate.

“As there is no train tomorrow- Sunday- you will stay here two nights, not one as first planned.”

I said that this was due to the accident to the Master which had delayed him one day in coming; that his suffering had resulted in our benefit.

He said: “I am always happy when my sufferings has help the friends. For fifty years I have suffered, but always it is a happiness, be-cause it is in the service of the friends. If I had not felt this happiness, I could not have undergone the hardships. I hope for you a happiness that is divine and without end.”

I then spoke of Dr. Guthrie and his love for the Master and interest in the Cause and asked that the Master would pray for him. He said:

“Give him my love and greetings.”

I explained that Dr. G. felt that many of the friends came from Christianity without a true understanding of Jesus and these misconceptions they brought into the Cause and now applied to the Master.

“This is not important,” he said. “So long as he has love for me, my love will enter his heart and will grow and will help that heart to grow. It is like rain falling upon the ground; it makes verdant and productive.”

I then asked if he would tell me for Dr. Guthrie just who Jesus was. He replied:

“Jesus was a Manifestation of God. Everything of Him pertained to God. To know Him was to know God. To love Him was to love God. To obey Him was to obey God. He was the Source of all Divine Virtues. He was a mirror of all Divine Qualities. In this mirror the light of the Sun of Reality was reflected to the world. Through this mirror the energy of God was transmitted to the world. The whole disk of the Sun of Reality was reflected in Him.”

March 5th. 1921

Later: Same Day. 8.30 P.M.

The Master:

Answering a question as to how best to serve the Cause.

1. Be steadfast and firm.

Live in accordance with the teachings.

“Then be sure that confirmations will reach you. I shall pray to the Blessed Beauty that success shall follow you. Through my prayers. I will reinforce you. Constantly I shall pray for you. Now that you are returning, I will breathe into you a new spirit, so that everywhere you may go-whether in America or Europe-you will impart the same spirit to anyone with whom you come into contact, whether Believer or non-Believer. Be assured thereof. I love you very much – very much. This is the third time you have come here. The first time was in the midst of calamities and, hardships when we could only meet at a distance. We spoke without word, but it was a fruitful visit. We spoke through our eyes and hearts and so communicated our thoughts and feelings.”

He then spoke of our new President. When I told him that the President’s policy was apparently to build up an association of nations about an international tribunal, he said that this was good. It was one of the principles of Bahá’u’lláh.

He said that if Wilson had become a Believer, he would have been confirmed. But he did not. So all his effort, the expenditure of life and treasure has without result.

He spoke, in answer to a question, about his tablet stating that friends should be chosen at the Convention for a visit to Persia. He said that he meant that this should be done only if deemed practicable – that at present the way to Persia was not open. Such a party should go via Constantinople and Baku, but that route is closed at present. When the way again opens, the matter can be taken up. The party should consist of at least six persons who are important, who appear well and can speak intelligently meeting and explain the teachings. But the time is not ripe for this visit.

Of the Races Congress at Washington, he said that this was most important, that unless this problem were solved, between there would break out a terrible conflict in the United States between these two races that would be devastating in its effect.

He said that if using the name Bahá’í, or that of Bahá’u’lláh kept important people from taking part, the Convention could be known as the Convention of Heavenly Teachings, which it is.

*Note:

(It would seem from this and his comment on Mr. Wilson that the Master feels it of great importance that activities toward establishing better social order should be directly associated with the religious or spiritual forces.)*

The Master:

“Say to this Convention that never since the beginning of time has one more important been held. This Convention, _____ for the Oneness of humanity, it will become the cause of the removal of hostility between the races, it will be the cause of the enlightenment of America, it will if wisely managed and _____, check the deadly struggle between these races which otherwise will inevitably break out.”

I asked the Master why it was that at times I felt so close to him and to the whole world filled with love _____ and yet at other seemed to be completely dead.

He said that this was as it should be; that there were _____ of intoxication, excitement, inspiration and joy, _____ then other moods when everything seems lifeless, _____ changing moods were necessary to progress, Sometimes one is awake, sometimes asleep, but in order to be awake, one has to be asleep at times. One cannot be always in one mood. It is impossible.”

_____ 1971

The Master’s room.

6:30 P.M.

The Master first spoke on the theme of how important _____ in the day of the Manifestation, are compared to those of other times; that five minutes today equal an hour of days. He pointed _____ one may write in a few moments today what former _____ many times longer; that one may _____ cover in a brief _____ today by carriage, motor _____ airplane, distances that _____ were, long journeys. So our nations today have such _____ effect than those of other times and should corres_____ be directed with great wisdom.

He then said that were about to return to the United States where the friends wore awaiting us in expectation of receiving new spirit and life. We should rest assured that confirmations would follow us. “Be assured of this,” he said, “My prayers will be ever with you.”

To Adele.

“You must go to America and be the means of quickening the souls whom you meet. I expect great results from your visit and look for good news from you soon. I expect very good news from you. You must go with heavenly glad tidings, must be very happy and give happiness to others. When you have been in a rose garden, when you return from it you cull a bouquet of roses and take them in your hand. When you have here, it must be that way. You must spread their fragrance along your path. Again see how much has been accomplished in this day in so short a time. Were it _____ the Day of the Manifestation _____ would have taken twenty year _____ you from the West, and me _____ the East, to have become acquainted. But now in how brief _____ we became acquainted. _____ will be happy, I promise you and I will pray for you.”

Asked what we should do specifically to help in the ____ of Bahá’u’lláh, that our efforts might not be wasted and might bring to the Cause the utmost of which we were capable, he said that we must live according to the precepts of the Blessed Beauty as he had pointed out. We should read the Hidden Words, the Ishrakat, the Tajallíyát and other writings of Bahá’u’lláh and live according to them. To live in accord with one verse of the Hidden Words would lift us above all _____ limitations. We must be spiritual, severed from all human dependencies, we should shine and give forth the heat and the light of the spirit. Consider the oil in the lamp. It is dead, without life, and in darkness until it comes in contact with the flame. Then it bursts into light which it gives forth forever after. It severs itself from darkness. Though the same oil, it is now light. So must you be.”

*Note:

It seems clear that the Master wishes to give his counsel only concerning the fundamental things, leaving to us to make the necessary specific application. And how much better this is than to give a specific direction (to impose his understanding) important probably for the moment but its importance, once outlived, one is left without foundation upon which to build again when the need arises. He seems to wish us to build firm on an _____ed base. If this were not possible, would his great love demand it?*

March 7th, 1921

The Master's room.

Before noon.

After inquiring for our health, he said his own was better and that we should tell the family at Haifa he was better here.

I said he must care for his health, so many people love him.

He replied that he could not give time to his health, he must do his work. During the war, the German doctor told him he could not recover from a disease that he had, that he must be very careful. But it was necessary for him to come to Tiberius where the heat was then intense and to remain there two months until the harvest was gathered and he could send the wheat _____ Haifa. People were starving there and he had to do . At the end of all this in his disease was cured. His doctor could not believe _ , Bahá'u'lláh had sustained him.

So, too, when he went to America he suffered from four _____ and at times it seemed impossible for him to go on, especially when he was in California. It seemed so far back to Haifa and he was so weak he did not see how he could make the journey alive. But he prayed to Bahá'u'lláh for support to reach the Holy Tomb once more and strength was given him; so that when he reached home he was cured of a malady-malaria-from which he had suffered twelve years.

So, too, he had been persecuted by 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd and various governors; his work opposed, especially in removing the body of the Báb to the Tomb on Mount Carmel, but he had labored on. He could have prayed God to remove these difficulties and his prayer would instantly have been answered. But he did not. It was necessary to overcome them.

“In one prayer I could have health the remainder of my life; but it is necessary for me to suffer to show to others that these things can be borne and overcome. I must first undergo all the hardships, then you will be able to. I must experience every difficulty that I may teach you to do like-wise. A weak tree may stand if there are no winds to oppose it. But the strong tree that withstands every attack has developed its strength only through resisting wind and storm. A weak light will go out with the slightest breeze, but a torch only glows the stronger as the storm attacks it.

“I must be an example that _____ learn to do the same _____ all difficulties that and steadfastness may . Strength will be to sustain work for God, _____ purpose is to aid Him.

“I saw the Jewish reporter again (A young Dutch Jewess, interested in the Zionist Movement and writing for its organ) She said she had visited several towns of the colony Jews and had seen doctors, lawyers, professors working on the roads, sacrificing all culture for the purpose of building up the Jewish Colony. I told her all this was _____, that such colonies had been built for ages past and always had crumbled and fallen, that the only permanent colony and it was for that they should work. See the Colony that Mary Magdalene had built – it was still growing. That is the kind of colony to erect. These material things of every kind have no permanence. Things of the spirit alone are permanent and worthy of our labor.

To me.

“Now you are leaving for America. You are my son. I have breathed into you a new life and spirit and power. Later you will see it, not now. When you are in the field of action, you will see it. In the embryo life is breathed into the child but he does not know it until he comes forth into the world of action. So you will not know until you enter the field of activity. You are my son and (to Adele) you are my daughter. Now you must act as my son and daughter. Be my real son and daughter.”

To Adele:

“You must build an _____ in the Kingdom of _____, “(referring to his talk with the Jewish reporter) “You must build such a colony as Mary built. Be sure that my prayers are constantly with you and that you will be confirmed. You are my daughter.”

Then he left us to receive a visitor.

He seemed to be trying to show us that the nature of his work and that of Jesus was the same and that both suffered as other men, though all the time having the power is remove their sufferings if they willed; but choosing rather to undergo them that, through their example we might learn to do the same – to turn only to the power of God as each new difficulty comes and so to strengthen ourselves more and more in the strength of the Spirit.

Of Taylor he said, “Bring them little by little into the Cause. Don’t try too much at once. In God only can truth be found, in the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh.”

Of the Maskrak ul Askar work, he said,

“I have left everything to the Convention. Many have referred various questions to me. Everything referred to me I referred to the Convention. Tell this to everybody.”

So I said no more.

---

He seems to be building up a structure among the friends to carry the responsibility of the affairs of the Cause in their own districts. To decentralize. 'Azíz tells as he is doing the same in Persia, referring questions in the Houses of Spirituality.

No successor!

March 7th.

Later, after waiting in his room until his visitors had gone.

He said he hoped he had not kept us waiting too long. I said I had been writing ever since he left but had not yet written all that he had said; that I could not seem to remember much of his Words.

He said:

“My words are like seeds sown in the hearts. Quoting the parable of the sower, some of my words have no effect, others have effect for a short time only – especially when people’s minds are filled with some material, worldly enterprise. But with others the seed falls on pure soil and bears a mighty . Now, thank God, these upon such soil. It _____ of matter if the words _____ are forgotten – they are lost in the soil. Afterwards they grow and bear fruit.

He then spoke to Mírzá _____ who had returned with __. Then he dismissed us. He shook Mrs. Mill’s hand and _ her God’s blessing. _____ my shoulder – with what infinite love and tenderness, and wished me the same, as we passed out he said, “You will come again” or “I will see you again.”

I said that I could not be grateful enough for that _____ - that it overlaid _____ he had told us.

He said:

“I know what is in your heart!” His look cannot be described. And we left.

Excerpts from the Notes of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Mattoon taken in Haifa

Mr. & Mrs. Edwin Mattoon

July 1 to 23, 1921

(The notes containing words of Ahdu'l-Bahá were taken in Persian by Dr. Luṭfu'lláh S. Ḥakím, and later written into English by him.)

..... when we entered 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence again in the east room of and other friends each evening. He welcomed us warmly again paying special attention to Florence. (Faraukh Khánum or the happy One as He named her was six years old at this time.) The baby Zievar, four months old, was fretting when we entered and the Master stroked her gently on the head and breast, repeating some words in Persian. She became quiet and He was pleased. Very soon however she started crying vociferously and He laughingly motioned her away. He pointed out chairs for us and had Florence sit in His right, talking with her and directing that candy be brought for her.

The room contained eighteen or twenty people including pilgrims from Malay, India, Persia, Russia, Turkey, and Egypt. We were the only Occidentals there during the three weeks we were permitted to stay.

The Master inquired about our health and asked if our journey had been pleasant. We said that the friends in Urbana and New York sent their Abba greeting and sincere devotion.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: I always pray on their behalf and supplicate heavenly confirmation for them. Today, he who is turning his face toward the Divine Kingdom, the confirmations will reach him continually. Today the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh is confirmed over all the world. He, who is attached to that Cause is confirmed.

How is Roy Wilhelm?

Edw.: He is well. He helped us very much.

A. B.: Is Mr. Mills there? (In New York)

E.: We met him at the Convention.

A. B.: How is Mr. Macnutt?

E.: We did not see him. . . . The Master is tired and we must not trouble Him longer.

A. B.: No, you are not the cause of trouble, but you are the cause of comfort. How was the Convention? Was it good?

E: It was very good. There were many people there. A meeting was held at the grounds of the Nashriq 'ul-adhkar. The workmen were digging the holes for the 9 great pillars and were near the rock. At this time the work is probably commencing on the Foundation.

A. B.: Very good! (Persian) Very good! (English)

Have not the people risen against you yet? Are not the preachers crying aloud? It is good that they have not yet excommunicated you. No doubt it is hard for the (Christian) ministers. The missionaries come here. They receive salaries so that they may convert one to their religion. They do not succeed. Now they see that you (the friends) gather together in such a way that they become angry and bitter against you. They will attack all of you; they will excommunicate you; they will rise up causing trouble for you. You will go through all of these for my sake. For My sake they will say wrong against you. They will oppress you. In the same way that it happened in Persia, it will happen there (in America) also. Those souls who were firm and steadfast, they will overcome for they are assisted.

The more these people rise against it, the more Cause will spread. The more they arise to extinguish this lamp, the more brilliant it becomes; because water for this lamp is like oil, it becomes brighter. They wish to extinguish it with water, but they do not know that the water will be changed immediately into oil in the same way that it happened before.

During the time of His Holiness Christ and after Him, how much trouble they gave. They wished to extinguish the Divine Light, but it became more luminous.

There is no doubt that there will be tests, so that the sincere and pure souls may be distinguished from those who are not so.

During the time of the Manifestation of His Holiness, the Spirit, for three hundred years there were continually tests. The followers used to be caught, to be beaten, to be martyred, to be exiled, and with any possible means that the people could find, the followers were persecuted.

They tried with every means to annihilate them. . . (Here Dr. Luṭfu'llāh did not get the first sentence or two of an incident relating the persecution of a beautiful Christian girl who became a martyr.) . . .

She was an excellent girl. Her parents were people of great rank. They persecuted her father, but it did not affect her. Her parents became cross and punished her severely, but to no effect. They wanted her to marry one of the influential persons of the country, but she did not accept. Then they beat her very much, but she remained firm. They put her in prison, but still she was steadfast. They put her in chains, but she was more firm. At last her father cut her throat. The father of the girl cut the throat of his own daughter. Notwithstanding this, the banner of Christ was raised.

Any cause that may appear in the world of existence, if it be not true, by itself it will become extinguished. It is like unto a tree which has no root; if one should put an axe to the root of the tree, as it has no root, it will become dry. But if it has roots and is firm, the more ye till around it, the more this will become the cause of its growth.

We have seen the days of much hardship. When we were in Persia, no one had the hope of being alive on the following day. As soon as one of the friends would be taken, they would kill him. They would put fire to his body. Notwithstanding this, the Lamp of the Cause became daily more luminous. The banner of Bahá'u'lláh was raised higher. It came to such an extent that they brought Him and put Him in prison with criminals. For twenty-five years He was imprisoned in the fortress of Aces. Under chains and in prison He raised His Banner. Now the Banner of Bahá'u'lláh is waving both in the East and in the West. . . . (Here a few words were evidently omitted again in the transcription.) . . .

. . . They brought one of the friends and gave him to the mounted soldiers, for they used to give one of them to the people of each calling or tribe so that they should kill him and have a share in the martyrdom. A thousand mounted men with swords rushed over him and cut him into pieces. The executioner shouted aloud, 'We have to gather up all these pieces and take them away'. At that time a baker who had a fire came forward and gathered up the chopped pieces of the body of that martyr, and took them and put them in his own oven.

There were such severe tests, but praise be to God that the Friends of God were in utmost firmness and steadfastness, and they were not shaken by fear or any agitation.

In the time of the Cause of his Holiness the Spirit, twelve times there was a general massacre of the followers. And at the end (the Oppressors) became defeated, and the Banner of the Standard of Christ was raised, and all of the oppressors were dispersed.

Mankind is like unto the ground; the more it is tilled, the more it is cultivated, the more it will yield blessings and progress.

. . . The blood that is shed in the Path of God will be the cause of nourishment and strength to the Blessed Tree.

(After these words the Master asked Mírzá Sohlir, one of the pilgrim from Persia to chant a Commune of Bahá'u'lláh. when the melodious chant was finished, He again shook our hands and bade us goodnight.)

The above notes were taken on the evening of July 1, 1921. Following is the Master's farewell talk to us on the morning of July 23, 1921. It is quoted from a letter addressed to us in St. Joseph, Illinois, by Dr. Luṭfu'lláh, and is a translation of notes which he made in Persian as 'Abdu'l-Bahá was speaking.

"You have journeyed from that long-distant region and have arrived in this Holy Land, and you have visited the two Holy Shrines. You must appreciate this gift. Not everybody has such a gift. You became confirmed in it with utmost sincerity and with your attention turned to the Kingdom of God completely. While you were here we were pleased with you and you with us. Visiting is good like this for it is of worship. This visit of yours is well accepted in the Kingdom of Abhá. Its results will remain for you forever. Therefore you should thank God that you attained to such great Bounty.

"Now that you return, your going should be like the breeze that comes out of a rose—Garden, — the breeze that has a very sweet fragrance. You who return should be in utmost joy and mirth, and with great glad-tidings be the cause of the happiness of the friends, that whoever meets you may become filled with joy. Convey to every one of the friends the message of kindness from me. You yourselves must be like letters, letters that speak. I wish to write to every one of the friends, but you see that I have no time.

"I am always with you: my heart is with you. I will never forget you."

May 1, 1921

On the morning of May first 1921. I sat in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his own room in the little house adjoining the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh at Bahjí. Our Lord sat upon the divan near the window, Monever Khánum and I on chairs before Him.

He asked me if there was anything special which I wished to mention, and knowing that He understood that in my heart I was troubled, I mentioned that I had been very anxious over the continues practice of “Number Reading” and things of that character which was sometimes indulged in, even at the time of the regular meeting hour by the friends in America.

Monever Khánum before interpreting this to our Lord commented upon it, and said that explicit directions had been given for the conduct of the meetings and the Feasts and she was surprised that they were not followed absolutely. She then turned to our Lord and told him what I had said.

He replied:

“Ask them where, in the writings of Bahá’u’lláh they find these things”

As He said this, his face wore that wonderful smile which showed me immediately that we must be all kindness in handling the matter but that it must be absolutely final, just as final of that in the writings of Bahá’u’lláh this things should not be found at all in any place.

Mrs. Stuart W. French (Nellie S.)

Confidential

(I also told Monever Khánum that in one Assembly I knew it to be a fact, that dancing was indulged in before and after the meetings, which I felt was a very serious matter and jeopardized the reputation of the Bahá'í Cause. Monever was shocked beyond expression, and saddened by this information. I do not know whether she ever referred this to the Master or not, we were alone at the time it was mentioned.)

Our Visit to Haifa during Riḍván

Left Pasadena March 3rd, 12 Noon.

Left New York "Critic" March 15th, Cancelled at Boston and Sailed from there March 17th

Azores and Gibraltar. Naples March 29th Bestolini. Sailed April 8th, Alexandria Apr. 11th Cairo, Luxor – till April 24th.

Haifa April 25th 1921

We left Cairo at 6:15 P.M. on Tuesday evening and travelled in 1st class day coach to Rautora on Buez Caval reaching K at 16 P.M. After difficult transfer of baggage and customs exuviations crossed pontoon bridge on foot and walked through deep sand to train with Sleeping car to Haifa. Praeic pulled out all 1 A.M. and trip Eong but not dusty though we race all night and part of the morning through the Sivai dessert. The wilderness of the children of Brigl. We took lunch on the train before reaching Haifa where eve arrive at 12:30.

No one met us at train and we secured a carriage and with some difficulty made the driver understand that we wished to go to the home of 'Abbás Effendi. We drove through the town and I was at a loss to record what to do but the carriage pulled up before a house and on the gate past a bright brass wave plate bore the magic house "'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás" in English and Arabic I got out of the carriage to ring at the gate when from the house just below which we had driven past. I heard my name called and Luṭfu'lláh and Fugeta followed by Arthur Redeen ran to meet us. They took our cargo and parcel and eve were there. Shown into the Pilgrim house and made welcome. After ____ to one comfort the “bags” left us to “wash up”.

While they went down to the sea for a service. The beach is some quite distance from the house. On their return we had some Persian tea and later Luṭfu’lláh asked us if we would like to see the Master’s garden. We all walked up a few steps and entered the gate and were at once in a mavelous tower of roses aced all kinds of flowers. Met the Master’s Gardener. Master in ‘Akká for Riḍván.

Returned and get canes and walked into Mt. Carmel to tomb of the Báḅ. There were many Persian Pilgrims outing there. One chanted at our request. We were then asked if we wished to visit the Tomb proper. I removed my shoes and went in. Luṭfu’lláh following. I remain perhaps ten minutes. I get to the Tomb we walked up a little path, quite steep but through flowery grass, almond fig and other fruit trees. On the level of the Tom building there is a lovely garden and the view of Haifa the Bay and ‘Akká are superb. We came down the road which is broad and steep and at the top ends in an avenue of Cypress trees. We returned to house at seven. Supper at 8:18. Persian dishes very good but very rich. Hat cake of black or dark bread made in the Master’s house from whole wheat. After supper a little visit with the boys and before supper at visit by Rúḥá Khánum ____ of the daughters of the Master.

Comfortable sleep. Breakfast – Fugeta, Arthur, Luṭfu’lláh, ourselves.

After breakfast and dishwashing. Arthur took us in town to the Bazaars and we bought jams, candy, preserves and a bathing suit for Stuart, a friar of dark glasses for myself and though we stopped at a German Bakery and got some cakes for our tea.

On return the ladies sent for me and I went for a visit in the Master’s house. Entered Vestibule through large central dining room bare except for large table (where all friends gather with faculty at supper when the Master is in Haifa). Entered smaller room at corner. Ladies seated in divans around ____ “Khánum” as the Greatest Holy Leaf is called sitting alone one side, and the others o the other side. All froze and shook hands. The Greatest Holy Leaf kissed me o both cheeks. I delivered little gifts. Conversation for about half hour. Two other Persian ladies present.

Returned home , read and wrote till lunch. Lunch at 12. Very good four courses while American or French food in every particular. No butter eve on table, but butter for cooking. Persian Noble and wife guests with us in house having returned from ‘Akká.

Persian Pilgrim house up on Mountain near Tomb of Báḅ. Many pilgrims now for Riḍván. It took them 103 days to come direct as possible from Persia. After lunch Tuesday 27th. Stuart and bays went to swim. I went up on Moun-tain Tomb alone found some Persian Pilgrims there among the brother of Zia Baghdádí keeper of Tomb served me Persian tea. Conversed in French with Baghdádí, wrote ____ in Pilgrim Book. The Evas permitted to enter sanctuary alone. Remained III time Tablet of Visitation. Persian ladies entered other side and chanted. I then put on my shoes and returned to Pilgrim House via road. Weather fresh and cool breeze blowing. Some bright and hot.

Tea at four – ‘Azíz’u’lláh (returned from ‘Akká), Luṭfu’lláh, Fugeta, Persian lady and gentleman Arthur Stuart. After tea rest and bath then I was summoned to house of Rúḥá Khánum for little visit before supper. Visit with Rúḥá alone.

One return visit from Mírzá Jalál.

Supper – same company at 8 o’clock.

Bed at 10.

Wednesday – Breakfast – boiled egg – tea, Persian bread toasted, olives, cheese, delicious preserves – apple and cardamom seeds. German coffee cake which we bought. 9:30 Stuart gone for a walk. ____ with dishes. Parrot - canary birds – two cats. Emogene and Georgia _ the household here. Grace and hospitality reign.

Put in the morning writing and at eleven I was sent for to come to the Master’s house to visit with the ladies of the household. I was accompanied by the little Persian lady who is the new to the Cause and speaks no English. She is well-known and very wealthy, the only wife of her husband who speaks English well and the two make very delightful table and house companion. On arrival at the house (only a step away). We were ushered into the room of the Holy Mother where all the ladies were assembled. The Holy Master is not well and He lay or sat propped up with pillows. I never saw a more beautifully sweet expression. Beside her sat “Khánum” and the daughter were all near. We visited for an hour, that conversation being devoted to ways of argument and approach in teaching certain individuals. I left at twelve and came down to lunch. Lunch and dinner at the house are very similar, much starchy food, no grew vegetables thus far. Another returned from ‘Akká where he was called to see about setting up light plant for Bahjí. After lunch, he and Stuart and Fugeta went for bath, I ____ and visited with Luṭfu’lláh. Arranged about heads.

At four went to meeting of ladies at Master’s house. About thirty ladies and many children. Tea made in ____ and served in small glasses very hot and sweet and very good. Interesting conversation with many. Rúḥá Khánum chanting tablets of Bahá’u’lláh. Ate Persian cookies. similar to ours. Very good. Great spirit of service everywhere. Returned at 5:30. Visited in porch with Fugeta, Stuart afterward Luṭfu’lláh. Another took Persian guests for a ride in car. Writing at 7:30. Supper at eight. Stuart reading Dr. Esselmont’s book proof.

No summons yet from the Master. Persian Pilgrims still in ‘Akká with him and Azziz returns there tonight.

Thursday. April 28th.

Rose at 7:30 and went to German Bakery for rolls for the bays. Breakfast at 8. Helped washed dishes. Little girl of one of the friends comes to make up some room, but I have done most four room _____. Went for a walk with Stuart on mountain. Had interesting conversation. Driven at twelve. After dinner bays went to tea back. I remained, took bath, dressed. Had tea at four then went to Master's house and visited a few moments with Zia Khánun and Holy Mother. After, went to Persian friends house for tea with Rúhâ Khamun. Most interesting time, four ladies and myself. Tea and cakes and Damascus Lupkish Delight, afterward lemonade. Discussed many customs. Asked permission to have enlarged pictures of ladies, also asked permission to contribute book case to Pilgrim House. Many sick people at Master's House and many commotion among ladies because they do not know how to care for new patients. Luṭfu'lláh sent to 'Akká to confirm with Master. Wrote Mother first letter from here.

Stuart drew design for book case and I am to order it made here for 15 pounds. No furniture can be bought here and _____ very expensive English drugs and groceries can be made, but no green vegetables even at this liason and no fish as people do not know how to catch fish here. We have little meat, it being very high priced. After supper, sat and visited till bed time.

Friday noon. April 29th.

Rose at 7 and had breakfast at 7:30. After that Luṭfu'lláh returned from 'Akká (hip raise 1 hour) and bought our summons to come to come there this afternoon on 5:45 train. We are warned of viher company on train. Old Persian believer called and eve has most interesting visit. I mended double cloth and prepared for visit to the Master. Stuart gone out for a walk. Fugeta suffering from bad cold but no complaint. He is on duty as usual with his intelligent fine face and moving loving service. Arthur also busy. Master dismissed Persian Pilgrims who had come so far at so great suffering their being in 'Akká left no roon for us that is why eve have been waiting to be at Bahjí with the Master at Riḍván.

Friday evening. April 29th.

Luṭfu'lláh accompanied us to train from Haifa to Bahjí and stayed with us until train pulled out as Mírzá Jalál (Grandson of Şubḥ-i-Azal) from Cyprus was . This young men has come and thrown himself in the Master's charity incurring expenses and being generally unworthy and unpopular. He is educated and speaks English well. My effort was to keep him away from Stuart and I occupied during train trip of one home. R-Road of his along sea and the air was fresh and lovely. We took third class in order to see the people. No glass in car windows. Many laborers returning to 'Akká from Haifa after dark. Arrived 'Akká station 6:15 P.M. No carriage. No one to meet us. I was obliged to ask direction of Mírzá Jalál. He said he was going and would accompany us!!! Nothing else to do in few minutes. We saw Hafil coming with Master's white donkey. He had but cushion on saddle for me. I declined not thinking I could sit a ride with my tight skirt. Haleel said, "It was Master's wish" of course so I climbed on by getting up on a stone wall first. Haleel guided donkey with bridle and I sat passive very thankful to have means of transportation in growing darkness and country road. Air fresh and lovely, hills green and rolling and here and there ruins of walls and fortress of uncertain antiquity. Off to the left the white walls of the Fortress, the "Most Great Prison". Home little distance away (1/2 mile). My riding left Stuart to walk with Jalál but I kept close match. We met some Arabs – first and then small groups of Persian Pilgrims. I shall never forget the reverence with which they stopped and with showed leads and hands crossed on breast they greeted us, "In the Name of God." I was wonderful!!!

When the night was almost entirely closed in, we saw lights Jalál and knew we were near the end of our journey. The end indeed! A large house showed up first and I thought it the Master abode but was unsecured. It is the home of the half brother Muḥammad-‘Alí. The Master’s house adjoins it but is only a series of one story norms. At one corner of the quadrangle this forneced is the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh.

We drew up beside a low doorway and I got down. ‘Azíz came out to meet us and said the Master would receive us directly. After a few flurried moments, ‘Azíz said we were to enter the first door on the left. We were then standing in the hallway of the house which is used for pilgrims. There was a dim lamp on a table, dirt floor, table with lamp – divans of very poor quality on three sides of room. As I entered I saw beloved figure not ten feet away dieting in the very corner of the room on divan on which was a cushion and rug. He rose and I saw the picture which I have always known come is life before me. The white turban, the brownish Abba and the being they enclosed. My presence of mind came to me most wonderfully and instead of falling at his feet as I felt I must I went forward to receive his greeting. He said "Oh Mrs. French, welcome, you are very welcome, and Mr. French, come, you are very welcome."

He then sat down and Stuart sat beside him while I sat directly in front in a chair which ‘Azíz placed. The Master began to speak at once and though no record was taken of any conversation during our entire visit he left such impressions that we shall always remember in meaning if not verbatim. At that time he spoke immediately of war and how not one newspaper had upheld the banner of Peace at the beginning of the 1914 struggle. He pointed out all the terrors and dangers of the world condition. ‘Azíz interpreted, Mírzá Jalál then came in. He received no special greeting. Haleel brought Persian tea in small glasses and cans to go with it. Three glasses were in the tray. Took one, Stuart one, and the boy Haleel looked at the Master to know for when the 3rd was intended. The Master raised hand and in a very positive manoeuvre indicated Jalál. We all took one tea. While the Master said a few words more then he arose and accompanied us to a room further down the hall. There he stopped and apologized for the simplicity and lack of comfort of the room. He said I might remain there or if I preferred I might got o the other house and share the room with Monevar Khánúm (the youngest daughter). I said at once I would prefer the latter so I left with Stuart and wash and went with ‘Azíz to meet Monevar Khánum and prepare for supper. The second house was where the Master slept, where Monevar Khánum stay and where the food is prepared. It is as simple as the first but larger. A large high hall (dirt floor) which served as dining room, the Master's had room on one side Monevar on the other. A very small inner court where there growing a small orange trees and some flowers and from the court the little primitive kitchen. Servants room and oriental toilet which is quite the most primitive variety I have ever seen. I greeted Monevar and then went to her room which I found we were to share together. This room was perhaps 25 x 25 feet, rough floor divan or stone ledge along one side by two windows which were in front of house. One divan a cushioned seat covered with small rug. A bed with close mosquito covering in one corner of room, a table in middle – noting else. A shallow brass basin was brought for me to wash in and a tin kerosene car served as pitcher. I changed my dress putting on a light grey one which was fresh and simple and seemed adapted.

This account was never finished. I found myself so engulfed in the mystery of the experience taht I could write no more.

Introduction

THE ASCENSION OF 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ, on November 28, 1921, marked for Bahá'ís the end of the Heroic, the Apostolic Age of their Faith. From 1892, when He was appointed by Bahá'u'lláh as the Center of His Covenant, the sole Interpreter of His Writings, and the Perfect Exemplar of His Cause, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had guided the growing Bahá'í community with his loving counsels and letters and examples. His sudden removal did, to many, make the world seem as if it had "lost its axis." But it also galvanized the dedicated souls who had learned well the firmness in the Covenant which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had striven so earnestly to instill in the Bahá'ís. 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself had departed this world, but His Writings remained and His Will and Testament provided continuing divine guidance in the Guardian of the Faith, Shoghi Effendi, whom He appointed as His successor. The editors of WORLD ORDER are happy to present herewith excerpts from a letter from an early Bahá'í who made her way from Italy to Haifa soon after she received a cabled announcement of the ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.[1] Henrietta Emogene Martin Hoagg - known to the Bahá'ís as Emogene - learned of the Bahá'í Faith in California in 1898 from Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, and after studying with Lua Getsinger became "the first confirmed believer in California." [2] In 1899, in Milan, she received her first Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in acknowledgment of her acceptance of the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh. In 1900, she visited 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Haifa, and afterwards, at His suggestion, studied for a month with the outstanding Bahá'í scholar Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Faḍl in Port Sá'id. In 1903, in California, Mrs. Hoagg aided Helen S. Goodall and her daughter Ella in establishing weekly meetings in Oakland. In November 1907, Mrs. Goodall being absent, she represented California at a consultation called in Chicago for the purpose of initiating the building of the first Bahá'í House of Worship in the Western world. Her dedication prompted Mrs. Corinne True to write, "Emogene's flaming spirit of devotion was one of the pioneer pillars to accomplish that great step in the progress of the Faith in this country." [3] Throughout her Bahá'í life, until her health began to fail in 1944, Mrs. Hoagg was a devoted teacher of the Cause. She made a six-thousand-mile trip through Canada and Alaska with Marion Jack in 1919-1920, traveled throughout the United States, learned Spanish and taught in Havana, and, in accordance with 'Abdu'l-Bahá's instructions, returned to Rome and Florence to visit those to whom she, had introduced the Faith earlier. In 1928, with Shoghi Effendi's approval, she joined Julia Culver in Geneva, Switzerland, to serve the International Bahá'í Bureau, subsequently becoming its co-treasurer. In 1931, Shoghi Effendi summoned Mrs. Hoagg to Haifa to type the lengthy manuscript of Nabil's The Dawn-Breakers which he was translating from Persian into English. When she died in 1945 at the age of seventy-seven, Shoghi Effendi cabled; "Deeply grieved passing staunch, exemplary pioneer Faith, Emogene Hoagg. Record national international services unforgettable..." [4] Those who knew Emogene have written of her character, her abilities as a teacher, her spiritual vitality, her sense of humor. But most frequently they mention her firmness in the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh - a quality which illumines the following excerpts from a letter written in 1922 to Nellie French while she was helping with the translation of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Will and Testament.

My dearest Nelly:

Your letter of December 14th has just reached me here in this blessed spot. Needless to say why I am here, for you will have realized that no other thought could have possessed me after getting the cable of the ascension of our beloved Master.

As you said you felt, I also felt. The world seemed to have lost its axis, and I seemed to be living without a support. I had planned to go to Genoa, but had no heart nor strength to continue the work at that time. I left Torino, from where I wrote you, returned to Milano and took the first steamer from Trieste which was on December 16th. The trip was a calm one and I arrived here on the 21st.

You may imagine the grief of the Holy Family. All was so sudden, so unexpected, that the shock to them as well as to all the friends was extreme. For the first week after getting here I had no head to use for anything, but since then have been very busy helping in the translation of some important Tablets. This has left no time for letter writing, which accounts for your not hearing from me before, as well as other friends whom I am sure are anxious for details. There is so much to tell it would take days to write it all, but later a full account is to be sent to all. Lady Bloomfield is here and is now compiling an accurate account of the few days prior to the Beloved's departure, of the cortege up the mountain to the Tomb of the Báb, and the fifth, ninth and fortieth days after the ascension.

When they expected the remains of the body of the Báb a resting place was made in the center of what is now the middle front room; but for some reason the Master had another place prepared in the room where the remains now rest. When it was necessary to find a place for the blessed body of the Master they thought of the place already prepared in the front room, and as the Master loved so much that position on the mountain, his remains were placed in that room, You will remember the front room of the Tomb where the believers always gathered and where the Master would speak to them when he went to the Tomb? It is in this middle front room that the Beloved body rests. It is hardly yet possible to believe that we shall not see him walking in and saying "Marḥabá, Marḥabá!"

The Visitation Prayer that we have in the little prayer book on page 70 is chanted at His Threshold. I have always loved this and said it much.

There is a belief among some of the oriental peoples that the soul is not entirely free from the body until the fortieth day after its ascension, so on that day a feast is always given. To carry out the custom the Holy Family gave a Feast on the Fortieth Day after the ascension of the blessed Master. They invited over two hundred guests and they were feasted in RúḥáKhánum's house. The tables were placed in every room and the food was prepared at the Big House. It was indeed a feat to do this, but it was beautifully carried out to the great astonishment of all the guests.

After the feast, as is the custom, all the guests gathered to give speeches in memory of the Master. The large central room of the Master's House had been prepared with beautiful rugs and with draperies, even the two end rooms of glass were thrown open and chairs and couches placed there, while at the windows were persian draperies. Chairs were brought from the town so that all were seated. A small raised place was made for the speakers. About twelve speeches were given, and some were most remarkable. Muḥammadan, Jew and Christian seemed to vie with each other in proclaiming the virtues and in expressions of admiration and love for the Master. Some of these speeches, if not all are to be translated and later to be sent in this account. The Bahá'ís had no chance to enlarge upon the speeches made by the others, for they expressed all there was to be said. One man proved by reference to the Qur'án, all the Twelve Principles as given in America. Often these men gathered would weep when one would give praises of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, or express his love and admiration. It was most touching to be present, even if one did not understand all that was said.

The day after the Feast, the Will of the Master was read, to a large number of the Bahá'ís who assembled in the same room where they gathered the day before, Again was the scene impressive. There are three parts to the Will of the Master, each written at a different time. This makes the Will very long. You will have before this reaches you, received the word sent by cable, that Shoghi Effendi, the eldest grandson of the Master, is appointed by the Master as the guardian of the Cause and the head of the House of Justice — Universal House of justice. I have just been helping with the translation into English. It is very strong, There is no doubt left as to the position of Shoghi Effendi. The Master says: "The one who opposes him (Shoghi Effendi) and opposes them (Universal House of justice) verily, he opposes God, The one who rebels against them, verily, he rebels against God. The one who antagonizes him, antagonizes God, The one who disputes with them, disputes with God. The one who resists him, resists God. The one who denies him, denies God. The one who turns aside and withdraws, from him, turns aside and withdraws and separates himself from God. Upon him be the wrath of God! Upon him be the anger of God! Upon him be the vengeance of God!"

The Master was not ill, we may say. He did not feel well on Saturday, November 26th, but that night at midnight all fever left him and he was normal. Toward one o'clock of Monday morning he remarked to one of his daughters who was near him, that he felt difficulty in breathing. Those were his last words and after a few moments his soul ascended, The parting was so calm, so without any evidence of struggle, that they could not believe he had departed. Dr. Krug confirmed the fact.

From various remarks made to the family at different times and which they now remember, but did not understand at the time, they realize that the Beloved knew he was going, A few weeks before his ascension he told them to send for Shoghi Effendi saying, that if he did not come quickly he would not arrive "for the funeral". Yet they did not understand!

I cannot feel that his work was really finished, but that for some divine mystery he departed now. He told the ladies of a dream he had in which he was entering the Mosque. He thought he would give the "call" which he did. He found that the people were entering and crowding around him. Then he thought he would commence the prayer that follows the "call". This he did and found that the people were following him, and continuing to gather around him. Then he went out of the Mosque, Outside he remembered that he had not finished the prayer, he considered for a moment then decided he would not return to finish it. This seems very significant.. .

In His Name,

Affectionately

Copy of Notes Miss Rosernberg on the reading of the will of ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ as given in a talk at the meeting of the London Spiritual Assembly. Feb. 2nd 1929 at the Home of Mrs. Romer 2 Sloane Terrace, Sloanne Square.

Miss Rosernberg said that the will was left sealed up in a packet, and addressed in ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’s own hand to Shonhi Effendi and nothing could be done until Shonghi Effendi came and opened the packet. A very solemn meeting was appointed for the reading of the will. There were old grey-headed men present, who had been in the Movement for many years and if there had been the slightest doubt of the authenticity of the Will, they would have known it. The whole document was in His own hand-writing. There were at least 200 people present at the reading of the will, and it was most impressive ceremony. Every time Shonghi Effendi’s name eas mentioned, the whole assembly arose and made obeisance.

The original appointment of Shonghi Effendi was made, when he was only 9 and ‘ADU’L-BAHÁ was in great danger. The three parts of the Will have different dates. There was not the slightest question at the time as to the validity and the very oldest members there acknowledge It. They had the Will photographed. Miss Rosenberg examined the Will and could see that it was old as it was stained from the dampness, as it had been put in a strong box and buried.

Monsieur Druyfus-Barney was there and he translated many things of ‘ADU’L-BAHÁ’s.

A Persian believer who had been with ‘ADU’L-BAHÁ many years said, that he was sitting by the Master at one time, when he was writing a Tablet for this believer to take to ersia, and he began to think, how everything depended upon the Master and it came to his mind “Whom can we have to succeed him?” and ‘ADU’L-BAHÁ called aloud, Shonghi Effendi and he came running very quickly to the Master, and the Master said to Shonghi Effendi “Here is a friend who very much wishes to see you.”

He said, that after ‘ADU’L-BAHÁ’s death he understood this incident. The reading of the Will was a most solemn affair. The Will is all in His own handwriting. At the solemn gathering, no one of all the Persian believers assembled, questioned It.

I had the privilege of visiting the Guardian, as 4 or 5, a group of Americans who made the first pilgrimage after Shoghi Effendi had been appointed to the Guardianship. When I was there, the Guardian was very ill and was still recovering from the terrific load he realised he would have to carry on his shoulders. .

. . . Everyone was thrilled to see this great light descend from Mt Carmel. It was very, very wonderful. And we had lots of fun because my mother asked Shoghi Effendi if there wasn't something she could do for him. And he said 'Yes, there is.' He said, 'You could take Curtis Kelsey and Fujita to Egypt and give them a vacation.'

Now, those of you who know Fujita, he used to be the chauffeur for Mrs True when they were all very young. He was a little Japanese man of about this height. He was the tiniest thing I have ever seen, just like a little gnome. And when he was in Haifa, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to him one day and started pulling his chin and He said, 'I'm going to give you a beard.' So every day, 'Abdu'l-Bahá pulled his chin and pretty soon he had a nice beard down to about here and it made him look very distinguished. He looked more like an elf than anything I'd ever seen. He was quite a gentleman. He walked with a cane and he wore a little bowler hat, a British top hat. Oh, he was very meticulous and he dressed beautifully. He was quite the time when we were there because he had fallen in love with a little Persian girl and he wanted to marry her very badly. They were all very excited about it, but the family stepped in and wouldn't let him, so Fujita was going through the depths of despair when we took him down to Egypt with us.

Both of my brothers were very tall and we went to Egypt and we took Curtis Kelsey and we took Fujita. We stayed at the Shepherd Hotel, that's one of the big hotels in Cairo and when we went in to dinner every night, people stood and watched us and watched us. Finally one night, the proprietor of the hotel, or the manager, the night manager, came up to me and he looked so distressed and he looked at these boys and asked, 'Is he the papa?'

So, we had a wonderful time because 'Abdu'l-Bahá had Fujita that someday they would stand him on a table and they would kiss that beard and that happened when we took him to Egypt. He met with the men one evening in a meeting where the women weren't allowed to go and he was very embarrassed when he came out to us and he said that they done just what 'Abdu'l-Bahá had said. They had stood him on a little card table and all the Persians had come around and kissed his beard because 'Abdu'l-Bahá had given it to him. . .

The Pilgrimage

I was staying in New York for a few days, after a meeting of the Executive Board held at the end of the first week in February, when Carrie Kinney called me up saying that she had a long distance telephone message from Mariam Haney to the effect that Shoghi Effendi had called me to Haifa through a cablegram sent to Zia Baghdádí within a few hours I was in possession of data regarding sailing, but before making definite arrangements I called up Zia Baghdádí in Chicago to ascertain definitely exactly what Shoghi Effendi had cabled regarding me. I was not able to ascertain much information by telephone, but in a letter- received from Zia Baghdádí several days later, I learned that he had received a message by telephone from a telegraph cable office in the name of Shoghi Effendi summoning me to Haifta. Fearful lest this message might have originated through the doings of some of the enemies of the Cause, not coming from Shoghi Effendi at all, he tried to verify it, but after visiting the Central Offices of the various telegraph cable companies in Chicago, he was unable to find any record of the message. In as much as I wished to be very certain that I was wanted in Palestine before I set forth upon such a long journey, I cabled Shoghi Effendi myself, asking for a confirmation of his message. Thus several days were lost in waiting, but finally I received word direct from Shoghi Effendi confirming his message to Zia, and telling me to come.

Three days later I left Washington, and on the day following I sailed from New York on board S. S. Adriatic, bound for a touring cruise in the Mediterranean, I having taken passage for Alexandria. The Kinneys and May Maxwell and my brother John came down to see me off, bringing with them letters for me to take to Haifa and :greet things for me to eat on the way.

To my surprise and pleasure I found several people on board whom I knew, so in company with these and others whom I met, the twenty days of the passage passed pleasantly. Our first stop was at Funchal, in the Maderas, where we spent a night and two days doing the usual sights including an evening reecation at the (lasino. Then came a day at Gibraltar, with an excurNiem and luncheon at Algioras a couple of days in Algiers – a day and, an evening at Monaco and Manta Carlo with a day in Genoa, one in Naples and one in Athens, giving us ample time for shore excursions. With the exception of Funchal I had already visited all of these places, so I took thin go easily; rather enjoying seeing a few things the second time, than trying to do so much as the average tourist on board was attempting.

As is my custom in starting on a sea journey, after settling myself in my cabin, and resting, I had a time of prayer, supplicating that I might be led to meet and inspired to speak with those people on board who were ready to know of the Bahá'í Cause and who would he attracted to its principles and its spirit. As the voyage progressed I saw how my prayer was answered, for from the outset I found myself unconsciously thrown with those whom I wished to meet. Next to me at table was a Miss Wing of Bangor, Maine, whose mother had a photograph of the Master in her room, she having hoard of the Cause through Claudia Coles. At the same table sat a Mrs. Kaminski of New York who had heard of the Cause through Mrs. Cook, recently returned to America from Haifa. With both of these ladies I was able to talk a good deal, and in turn they brought me to other people who listened. Mr. and Mrs. Edson Bradley of Washington, Ex Governor and Mrs. Loudon of Chicago and Ex Governor and Mrs. McCall of Boston, Mr. and Mrs. George Allen of Convent, New Jersey, all of whom I had known at home, were on board and I had various talks with them touching upon the Cause. The McCalls are particular friends of Stanwood Cobb, and it was through him that they heard of the Bahá'í Cause and met the Master while He was in America. The Master seemed particularly pleased with their daughter Katharine, and He commissioned Rhoda Nichols to keep in spiritual touch with her and teach her of the Cause. Professor Taussig of Harvard was on board had one talk about religion, but he seemed to be more interested with his subject, economics, than with spiritual thought.

With a young Italian, Guido Pignatelli, assistant purser on board, I had a number of good talks and he seemed quite prepared for, and attracted to the Cause. In Naples I met his parents and sister and received a very kind invitation to cell at their home, when next in that pert. Guido and I were together much of the time making various; shore excursions together, the most enjoyable one of which was the day spent in Athens exploring the ancient ruins. He was returning by the same ship to New York to a position in the White Star Offices, so I gave him a card to the Kinney family, and wrote them of him hoping that they would complete the Bahá'í work with him which I had only begun.

During the winter in Washington I met the Zaron and the Baroness de Fauconcear. Again on ship board I renewed their acquaintance and was delighted to find out that the Baroness was the sister of Raymond Almorall, the old Beaux Arts man who did some instructing in architecture at Cornell while I was there, and wives- advice to me at that formative time in my life – namely, that I go to Paris to continue my architecture – had a most profound effort upon my career. It was while I was at the Beaux-Arts in Paris that I heard of the Bahá'í revelation from May Maxwell and believed in the Master.

While in Naples I tried to get into touch with some of the Bahalis. Emogene Hoag was not there, but I had the address of Signorena Frontera. Unfortunately she was not at home, and as tide ship remained but a few hours in port I could not make a second attempt to see her.

The night before landing in Alexandria a young lad, Houghston McBain, with whom I had formed a speaking acquaintance approached me saying that his mother had heard that I was going to the Holy Land and would be pleased to talk with me about Palestine. During the short conversation which followed I found that Mrs. McBain and her son had planned to spend but a couple of days in Egypt, returning to Italy by the same ship. For some time she had been interested in Religious matters, and in her own way had figured out that now was about the time for a worldwide religious movement to go Forth from Palestine. I was thrilled by her thoughts and although the hour was late I was able to tell her sufficient about the Bahá'í Cause to Interest her very deeply. The result was that before midnight her plans were changed and accommodations secured so that she could sail from Egypt for Italy by another ship three weeks later, thus giving her and her son ample time to visit the Holy Land and the Bahá'í Shrines there and to meet the Bahá'í Friends. We parted the following morning after planning to meet some days later in Haifa. Guido Pignatelli and I planned to have some hours together ashore at Alexandria, but just as we were about to debark from the ship he found that being of the ship's company of officers he could not go in the same passenger boat with me. The result was that I landed at one dock, and he at another and we missed connections. I had given him a letter to Emogene Hoagg in Naples, who knew his Aunt there, the Marchese Pignatelli – so I trust he will be kept in touch with the Cause.

In Alexandria I also tried to meet some Bahá'ís but failed; the two men whose addresses I had were neither at their places of business when I called. As it turned out I had but three or four hours between my arrived and the time or leaving for Haifa. I had barely enough time to transact my necessary business for travelling, so I missed seeing the Bahá'í friends in Alexandria.

The journey from Alexandria to Haifa passed without particular incident. Travelling second class I was able to sleep with a certain degree comfort. The night was spent on the train at Kuntarah East and starting; at five o'clock in the morning I reached Haifa at about half past five o'clock in the afternoon. To express it frankly I dreaded reaching Haifa. How different it had all been when the Master was there. By experience I had known that he was my salvation and my protector and that whatever happened, and whatever mistakes I made. He would guard and care for me and guide me to His path. However, now with Him not there a certain dread hung over me – almost a fear – and as the train rounded the promontory of Carmel and I could look up the mountain and see the Holy Tomb of the Báb, where I knew they had laid the Master's body, my heart sank deep within me.

Rúhíe Effendi and Luṭfu'lláh met me at the station and we were soon driving to the Bahá'í Pilgrim House. On arrival I found several friends there from the Occident. Lady Blomfield and Miss Rosenberg from London, the Dreyfus-Barneys of Paris, recently returned from eighteen months in Indo-China, Emogene Hoagg of Italy, and Mountfort Mills and Roy Wilhelm from America in addition to Curtis Kelsey from New York, who was one of the residents there.

Within an hour or so Shoghi Effendi appeared and greeted me most kindly and affectionately. I had not seen him for eight years, and of course I was surprised at the change and development in him, for instead of the boy I had known there was now a man very young in years but premature in poise and depth of spirit and of thought.

After a brief general conversation with the several present Shoghi Effendi drew me aside with him for a stroll alone the foot of Mount Carmel. In learning that I had not seen a copy of the Master's testament, he gave me a typed copy of the English translation asking me to read and study it carefully, and to keep and guard the copy for myself, allowing any of the Bahá'ís to read it but for the purpose not to circulate copies of it.

During our talk Shoghi Effendi spoke briefly about the troubles in the Cause in America saying that about a week before he had written a long letter to the friends in America giving them instructions through the carrying out of which he hoped that joy and harmony could be established. He did not discuss any of the points of the questions in America except to say that it was his wish that all the past should be entirely wiped out and forgotten, and with the exception of those whom the Master had pronounced as violators that all should be received by all the friends. He said that Faríd, Khierillah, Shuah Ullah and Kirchners, all in America, were to be avoided, but that the Allen Dyars of Washington and Dr. Fernald and Mrs. Frye of Chicago were received by a 1 and really loved with true Bahá'í affection and the past obliterated. Then in addition this he said that the believers were to be very mindful and when anyone stirred up trouble it was to be reported to the Assembly of spiritual Consultation to solve – quietly and without general talk. Before Shoghi Effendi left me he gave me a copy of his letter dated March 5th written and sent a week before I reached Haifa to the Bahá'ís in America that I might read it at my leisure. Before leaving America several of the friends had asked me to explain in detail to Shoghi Effendi some of our difficult problems, but when I found that he had sent his instructions to America and that wished the matter closed and forgotten without more discussion, I was very glad to comply with his thought so I did not mention it again to him.

That night after the household had quieted down and all was still I looked out of my window up the mountain toward the Tomb of the Blessed Master. The tomb Chamber was lighted, and I could see the light shining out through the round window over the main doorway, and in thought I turned toward the Center of the Covenant in prayer and supplication for confirmation and steadfastness before reading the Most Holy Testament.

The substance of the Testament was, of course, most unexpected. no one could have anticipated its wonderful ordinances, but as one delves into it and imbibes its thought, he sees at once that; no other plan could have been made for the guardian and the preservation of the Cause save the one which the Master has given in His Will. Never have I read anything which gave me the joy and the inspiration that this Holy document produced in my heart. It filled my heart with assurance that the Cause was safely guarded and gave me a fixed direction toward which to turn and a continuous center about which we are all to revolve so long as we are in this world. I rejoice at the Bahá'í standard of excellence which it established for I have feared for some time the influence of the proletariat in the Cause but with the influence of the Bahá'í aristocracy so to express it, which the Master established, the influence of the mass in the Cause will find a balance, "Spiritual Democracy" is a catch-word which we hear often among the friends in America. Such terms are pleasing to us Americans because of our democratic politics. But this spirit has troubled me, for I have seen God's Kingdom as a Kingdom with a king, and not as a democracy where the people rule and now I see this is the Master's plan for the protection of the Kingdom here upon earth – a Kind of Kings ruling the world giving protection alike to kings, aristocracies and peoples. I presume that my home training in a certain measure has prepared me for this phase of the Bahá'í Cause. Although my parents are Americans of the eighth generation born in America they are not democrats at heart nor in consciousness. In fact my father frankly says that believes in the English form of government as opposed to our American rule of the people. For some time I have shared his views, and now I see that our Beloved Master has outlined a plan for the spiritual government of the world which is not dissimilar in balance, between a ruling class and a represented people, from the British form of government. how it appears in this Most Holy Cause that we find a line of Kings of Divine origin of which the thought of the mystical Divine origin of the Kings of the ages has been but the fore glimmer.

I feel that I feel that personality I know Shoghi Effendi but slightly and that from this personal standpoint there is no particular friendship nor affinity between us of which I am aware – never-the less, I am conscious of a very deep spiritual devotion to him because of the Master's Testament which is all the greater in its spiritual intensity because it lacks the human element which is changing and ephemeral. Although often I could neither understand nor follow in thought the reasons why Shoghi Effendi made certain decisions, nevertheless at all times I had an intense desire to serve him, to do his bidding and to support him in making his way as easy and tranquil as possible.

As I used to sit at table looking at Shoghi Effendi I was struck by his resemblance to the Master. In the shape and poise of his head, his shoulders, his walk and his general bearing. Then I felt the terrible weight and responsibility which had been placed upon that young boy. It seemed overwhelming that he, whose life was just starting, so to speak from the human worldly standpoint, should have had this great responsibility and care thrust upon him, a weight which would so consume him and place him aside by himself as to eliminate from his life the freedom and joy of the human side of life, which, though not eternal, has a certain call for each of us human beings.

One evening during the visit Shoghi Effendi brought with him to the Pilgrim House the original text of the Blessed Testament of the Master. We stood about the table as he reverently laid the package thereon, as he did so carefully, unfolding the envelop from a silk handkerchief in which it had been wrapped. Is he took the three Tablets from the cover we saw that each was in the handwriting of the Master – written as Shoghi Effendi called our attention to witness, without hesitation nor correction, and signed by Him in several places. We stood with baited breath in the presence of this document of documents in which is contained the direction of the world and the guidance of humanity for a thousand or thousands of years to come.

One evening Luṭfu'lláh told me many details regarding the ascension of the Master. For the most part those have been recorded in articles and published letters by the friends so I will not repeat the descriptions already current among the friends. Luṭfu'lláh described how on the afternoon after the departure, the blessed family gathered to prepare the Master's body for burial. The Mother – the four daughters and their husbands, Mírzá Baddie Bushrui and Luṭfu'lláh were present. Baddie chanted prayers during the entire ceremony, lasting two hours, which consisted of washing and bathing and enveloping the body first with clothing and then in winding it in five thicknesses of silk. Upon the Master's head they placed the high Taj of Bahá'u'lláh. When this had all been done and the body removed from the table to the bed, the Greetest Holy Leaf came into the room. Luṭfu'lláh described her grief most vividly. Before the blessed body was placed in the burial casket an "eiderdown" to use Luṭfu'lláh's exact words, was first spread inside, then the blessed body was placed therein, and anointed with oil of rose, and before the lid was sealed down, another "eiderdown" was placed over the body.

After the funeral speeches and ceremonies were over at the tomb, the casket was taken into the northeastern chamber of the building where the final work of sealing was done. It was three o'clock in the afternoon before the casket was lowered into the crypt, and during this interim of three hours or more Luṭfu'lláh and Baddie remained alone in the chamber with the blessed remains. Luṭṭfu'lláh spoke at some length of that vigil, and of what it meant to him.

Early in the morning following my arrival in Haifa I went up the mountain alone to visit the Tomb of the Master and that of the Báḅ. I found Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi within the tomb placing handfuls of freshly cut flowers upon the thresholds of the inner chambers. Removing my shoes I entered and had a quiet half hour of prayer supplicating, for my family, for the Cause in general in America, and for those friends who had asked me to remember them there, and most needed of all were my supplications for myself.

The arrangement of the three back chambers of the tomb, which constitute the tomb of the Báḅ proper, are the same as formerly, but the three front chambers facing the North, instead of being used for various purposes, as formerly, now form the tomb of the vaster. It seems that there is a large and deep crypt under the northeastern chamber of the building, white adjoining it on the subterranean level is a small crypt which is under the southeastern portion of the central Chamber of the north side of the building. It yea in this email crypt beneath the central chamber on the north side that the Master's body was laid. I was told that as soon as M. 'Abbás Choli heard of the Master's ascension he sent to work to open up this crypt below the northeastern chamber. The work vies continued throughout the day and the entire night previous to the funeral, so thick was the floor and the vault of masonry which had to be pierced. At present the casket rests upon to pieces of wood upon the floor of the smaller crypt, while directly above on the carpeted floor of the central chamber, is spread an embroidered green cloth marking the exert spot. Curtis Kelsey, who went to Haifa from America to install electric light plants at the Holy Tombs and in the 13ahati Colony, has made an artistic arrangement in his wiring of the Tomb upon Mount Carmel, and one quite in harmony with the lines of the present building. The former black iron lamps hang as formerly, but he has reversed the shades, giving the effect of an Indirect lighting system. The Venetian iron candelabra, in the inner shrine of the Báḅ, which the Master permitted me to make some years ago, is still banging as before, with candles used in it, save that now in the center where the sanctuary lamp formerly hung there is an electric bulb. A very powerful electric light is placed on the exterior of the tomb directly above the main doorway to the north. This is lighted every evening, and it forms a focal point on the mountainside which is directly in line with the main axis of the German Temple Colony visible for many miles out over the sea was pleased to see placed above the inner door of the Shrine of the Báḅ, in the western room, the brass escutcheon of the Greatest Name which George Latiner and I had made in April in 1914. It was a long time in reaching its destination due to the war and other obstacles. Mrs. Nourse kindly took it to the Holy Land for as but a few weeks prior to my visit.

Within the inner chamber of the tomb of the Báḅ facing the door, above which hangs this escutcheon, I found the memorial vase to Sandy Kinney which Herr Rentfle and I sent from Germany, an offering to the Master for the Tomb. M.

‘Abbás Gholi told me that the Master had brought it up the mountain by automobile and had placed it in that place with His Own Hands. Verily the divine blessings and bounties upon us unworthy servants are many and are beyond our comprehension.

While in Burma, twelve years ago, I learned that Agha Seyyed Ismail Shírázee of Rangoon had been permitted by the Master to make two marble sarcophagi – one for the blessed remains of the Báb – the other for the Holy body of Bahá’u’lláh. At that time the first of these had been sent to the Holy Land, while the second was stored in a building for funeral uses in the Bahá’í Cemetery in Rangoon. One day Agha Ismail took one to the cemetery and I saw the box in which this sarcophagus was temporarily stored awaiting Shipment to the Holy Land. While I was in Haifa I learned that Seyyed Mustapha Roemi of Rangoon was then enroute for the Holy Land bringing with him this sarcophagus. The news put an idea into my head. I went to Shoghi Effendi and asked to be permitted to design and have made and sent to the Holy Land a third marble sarcophagus eventually to hold the Master’s blessed remains, when the permanent resting place would be arranged, and the Master’s shrine built. To my joy and pleasure Shoghi Effendi granted my request. Then I discussed my thought with him regarding the sarcophagus, which was that it should have an inner shell or lining of glass and inside of this a hermetically sealed case enclosing the present burial casket. All of this was acceptable to Shoghi Effendi. Before leaving, Haifa I had an interview with Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi who gave me a description and the exact dimensions of the present casket. It is built of fine white wood four centimeters thick and has a zinc lining, the lid of which is fitted into a groove running about the box, and before the wooden lid was screwed down this groove was filled with olive oil in order to insure a good contact all around. The accompanying sketch of the casket with dimensions is a copy of the one which ‘Abbás Gholi gave me.

My thought is to make a design for the sarcophagus and a Model of the same, sending it on to Haifa for approval before having it made. In all probability the marble work will be done in Italy and shipped from there, while the crystal glass linings will be done in America. I spoke with Mírzá Munír Zayn about making an inscription of the Master’s name in Persian characters for the side of the sarcophagus, while my thought was to have the same in Latin characters engraved upon the other side. He very kindly offered to make this and send it to me as soon as I was able to send him the dimensions of the panel to be filled by Inscription.

Several times in the night after the household had quieted down Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím and I would climb up the mountain to the tomb of the Master for a few moments of prayer before the door of the shrine which at that late hour invariably was locked though the lights from within might have led one to imagine the building to be open.

As is customary in the Orient burial shrines are kept illuminated by night, thus the Bahá’í sacred Shrines are never left in darkness. I wish that I might adequately describe the spiritual experiences of those nocturnal pilgrimages. The beauty of the spot is beyond words. In the clear moonlight of the Orient the eye reaches many miles. From this Holy Tomb Mount Hermon, seventy or eighty miles distant with its snowy cap was distinctly visible on clear moonlight nights. About the Tomb are fragrant trees, shrubs and flowers. On still nights when there was little wind the air would often be heavy with the fragrance of orange blossoms as we knelt on the door still pouring out our hearts in prayer and supplication. I had much praying to do for the many friends who, learning of any journey, had written asking me to supplicate for them at the Master's tomb, while moot needful of all were my prayers for myself.

While I was in Haifa the weather was fine and clear and we had a series of beautiful moonlight and brilliant starry nights. On various evenings just before turning in at night Mounfort and Roy would take a stroll of twenty or thirty minutes. One of our favorite walks was alone the upper road outing west through the German Colony beyond which it joined the Jaffa Road on the right, and on the left the long straight inclined road leading up to Mt. Elias. On the north side of this road toward the farther outskirts of the Germany Colony, stood, a very, very old olive tree, its grotesque trunk knotted and gnarled. The Master said that Jesus, the Christ, had sat beneath that tree. Often we stood and looked at this tree in meditation and one night Roy went into the enclosure and broke off three sprigs of leaves which he shared with us. No one thereabouts but the Bahá'ís knew about that tree, and of course they were not speaking of it. Near it stood the house of one of the early German colonists who came there fifty years ago to welcome coming Lord! Often I wondered if these people had ever felt any particular influence in the near vicinity of that olive tree.

A few days after my arrival in Haifa I had a telegram from Houghston McBain saying that he and his mother would reach Haifa by train from Cairo on the following Friday and asking me to engage rooms for them. I found quarters at the German Catholic Hospice on the Jaffe road near the sea where they were more comfortable than they could have been at the hotel. The friends regretted that they could not ask them to come to the pilgrim house, but with the crowd there the place was quite filled up. Luṭfu'lláh went with me to the station to meet them, and he did everything he could do for their comfort, relieving them of troubles by attending to their passports and quarantine business. That afternoon they came up to the house for tea with us all, and while Emogene took charge of Mrs. MacBain and conducted her over to meet the ladies of the Holy Bahá'í Household, Houghsten and I took a walk up the mountain east of the Holy Tombs and from there on over the mountain and back by way of the Monastery of Mar Elias. Both he and his mother enjoyed themselves – she being particularly attracted by the Bahá'í spirit and by all which she heard and saw.

At Shoghi Effendi's invitation and arrangement the following day he sent me with the McBains to visit 'Akká and the Holy Tomb at Bahjí. It was a beautiful day and we made a most interesting excursion. The year before when I was in 'Akká the old prison was being renovated to be used as a military prison.

This time I found it in full swing and swarming with prisoners. Asking to see Captain Bryan, commandant of the prison, whom I had heard was very friendly to Bahá'ís, we were admitted and shortly graciously received by the Captain who kindly gave us an hour or two of his time taking us about through the prison and to the rooms occupied by Bahá'u'lláh and His early exiled followers, then taking us to the highest point of the keep from where we had a fine view of the city with its surrounding double line of ramparts, and ancient towers with the sea, the surrounding country and distant mountains.

Descending from the tower we were taken down into the casements and vaulted chambers beneath some parts of the prison and the surrounding buildings. One chamber in the Gothic style of the twelfth century was most interesting. It was evidently the work of Crusaders. The entire chamber had been filled up to a level a little below that of the street, the ribbed vaulting springing from about the level of the present floor. In one end of the large chamber an excavation was in progress which revealed the weathered capitals of huge columns and piers upon which the vaults rested, for centuries; the capital, of which were hidden below the present floor. Their bases must have been many feet below where we were standing. The history of 'Akká records that the peoples of successive ages have built there each on the foundations of their predecessors. Above this half buried pillared hall in which we were, towered a structure of the more recent date. Undoubtedly this chamber was built in turn over older buildings probably Roman or Phoenician.

From this chamber of imposing architecture we were conducted into some nearby vaulted casements of Turkish times recently opened, which were filled, compartment after compartment, with cannon balls of all sizes from those designed for large mortars down to the smallest of grape shot – hundreds of tons of this antiquated and useless war material had been forgotten here and was going to rust. In adjoining vaults we saw cannon, mortars, guns and other war engines rusting and crumbling all heaped together in a tangled mass of iron. In one place an attractive garden had been laid out in a space between the ramparts, flanked by ruined towers and barbicans, while adjacent to this was an ancient moat half filled with stones and rubbish. Turning these relics of the past we retraced our steps to the citadel and there thanking Captain Bryan for his kindness we made our adieus. The automobile took us out of the city by a newly cut way through the fortification and on along, the old aqueduct toward Bahjí. As is usual with visitors to Bahjí, tea was served us in the house near the Holy Tomb by the Persian friends who live there, and while we were there a group of Bahá'ís from 'Akká arrived on a visit to the sacred shrine. Our party visited the tomb before the others because we were returning to Haifa and it was getting late.

The following day I took Mrs. McBain to the Master's Tomb and to that of the Báb, and we also visited the Cave of Elijah in the Chapel of the Monastery of Mar Elias. Moreover, she had a record visit with the ladies of the Blessed Household and a talk with the Effendi so she and her son left Haifa or Nazareth, Tiberias, and Jerusalem, much pleased with their visit and I believe really attracted to the Cause and impressed by the kindness of the friends. We planned to meet on the S. S. Arabic two weeks later in order to return together from Alexandria to Naples, but as it turned out I was unable to get passage on that ship. We have not met since they left Haifa, though letters have passed between us. I am hoping that they have met Emogene Hoagg in Naples, and that they will be able to step to see the friends in Stuttgart in response to a very tram invitation given them by Consul and Mrs. Schwarz.

I had been in Haifa but a few days when word was received from Cairo that Consul and Mrs. Schwarz from Stuttgart were to arrive. I accompanied Luṭfu'lláh to the station to meet Their coming was an event for until then but one of the German Bahá'ís Frä. Johanna Hauff, had made the pile is from Germany. On account of European money values it is most difficult now for Germans to travel outside of their country. Consul and Mrs. Schwarz were very joyful and happy, and I was pleased to be there with them. We made excursions and took walks together, the Consul making various sketches of the Sacred places of Bahá'í interest.

One afternoon the Governor of Haifa, Colonel Symes and his wife came for tea with Shoghi Effendi. The gathering was held at Mírzá Jalál's home, and we pilgrims from the West were invited, together with Mírzá Baddie Bushrui, the Governor's private secretary, and a few others. I had a chat of a few minutes with the governor and found him quite as friendly to the Bahá'ís as the friends had stated him to be. One of the most striking proofs of his trust in the Bahá'í character is that he has appointed as his confidential Secretaries two of our Bahá'ís, Mírzá Baddie Bushrui and Toffee Effendi, son of Mírzá Hausain Yazdí. We discussed some of the Bahá'í problems in connection with the claims of Mírzá Muḥammad All and the Governor said he hoped that when the Universal House of Justice was established, that it, as an authoritative religious organization, could take over all sights and titles to the properties of the Bahá'í Cause now under dispute, which he thought could be accomplished, thus in the eyes of the world taking all these matters out from their present legal status, that of a family quarrel, and placing them upon the impersonal basis of a permanent religious organization.

The friends present discussed at some length with the Governor the problems of the seizure of the House of Bahá'u'lláh in Baghdád by King Faezel's government, which was brought about at the instigation of the Shish priestly element. At that time this matter was new to me and not very clear but I learned something about it. It seems that this house was purchased and restored and maintained by the Master, but the title to it was held by the Bahá'í custodian of the house – a devoted anti-trusted friend. This man died, and his widow left Baghdád and came to the Holy Land to live, whereby according to the Mussulman law the property reverted to the Moslem Church – recording to their legal terminology becoming “wakf”. Now the Shí'ah priests are old enemies of the Bahá'ís, while King Faezel himself, who is a Sunní, is a friend of the Cause. However the Sunnís are a minority in Baghdad and as the King rests none too securely upon his throne, the Shí'ah priest sure claiming for their own the Bahsai property was great enough to cause the seizure of Bahá'u'lláh's house. While I was in Haifa telegrams were went to King Faezel asking for justice fair and plans were also made for the friends in various countries to send similar dispatches. It was hoped that the property would be restored.

Roy Wilhelm and Mountfort Mills planned visits in Cairo, and in various parts of Europe, on their return to America, so in order to get in ell they had to do and to reach home in time for the convention, they left Haifa several days before I did. A few days before their departure Shoghi Effendi arranged an all day excursion for the four of us. Leaving Haifa at the very early hour, starting with the early dawn, we motored over the sands of the desert toward 'Akká. Karavans and travellers were already abroad as the sun arose above the mountains shedding its golden light over the plain and sea. At one point we sighted a large white wolf out alone combing the beach for his breakfast. Probably the sane one we had seen a few days before. Arriving at Bahjí a breakfast as served ne in the house near the tomb, where we visited the room which the Master used to occupy when he made visits there. Later we visited the holy tomb remaining there some time in prayer – Shoghi Effendi chanting a tablet in the original Persian. There was a certain amount of business connected with the installation of the electric lights which Shoghi Effendi talked over with Curtis Kelsey who was then at work on the plant with its wiring. The generator hart been installed in a building in one of the courts near the Bahjí Palace, and tights were being placed both within and without the building in which is the tomb.

The Náqidín in 'Akká and. Haifa wore then making great troubles for the Cause. The most previous of which seem to be centering about the Hey Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. Not long before my visit a group of Muḥammad-'Alí's friends went to the Shrine in a body and forcibly overcoming the keeper of the snored premises they took from him the key of the Tomb. When the affair was reported to the Government, a police guard was placed there on sentinel duty to prevent any further disturbances. These things necessitated the locking and cloning of the inner tomb chamber, so upon each of my three very recent visits to Bahjí we were able to penetrate only as far as the Court of the Tomb – the inner sanctuary being sealed. It seems that according to the Moslem law of that land the custody of the tomb of a father le in the hands of his eldest living son – therefore according to this law after the Master Muḥammad-'Alí is the legal custodian of Bahá'u'lláh's shrine. It was thought by some of the friends that a different interpretation teem this might be obtained when the Universal House of Justice was formed, on the grounds that Bahá'u'llah was the founder of a religious movement and that the organization of that movement as a body had the legal right of the custodianship of His tomb. Ls yet no one can forsee how the affair will come out. Shoghi Effendi is much troubled over the matter. While in Haifa I received a circular letter sent North from New York, signer by "Shua'u'llah Bahá'í" calling the Bahá'ís to turn to his father Mírzá Muḥammad-'Alí whom he declared was now the Center of the Cause. In Haifa, I heard that Shua'u'llah had arrived in Palestine to help his father bring claims against the blessed family for a share of the Master's estate. I was told that with the exception of some little money some few lands which were in the Master's name, He left practically no estate, for before His passing He disposed by gift to various of the friends of most of the properties which he had had. For example, the lands upon the Sea of Galilee at 'Abbáseyeh, sometime before His ascension, He gave to the Zoroasterian Bahá'ís who had lived there for some years working tilling the lands.

So far as the trouble over the Sacred Shrine at Bahjí is concerned I felt considerably more troubled over it than did apparently the other Western Baba 'is gathered in Haifa, because the thought came to me that in case Muḥammad-'Alí gained even a temporary control of the Shrine he and his followers might easily steal away and destroy the sacred remains thus leaving the tomb tenantless for the Bahá'í world. I confided my fears to Luṭfu'lláh, but he thought they would not dare to do anything so terrible. Notwithstanding his argument I had my fears. These people have naught in their hearts but the desire to destroy the Divine Edifice. I doubt if they could hesitate at doing anything which they knew would wound and distress the Bahá'ís.

Taking Curtis Kelsey from his work that he might enjoy the day with us, Shoghi Effendi conducted us from Bahjí northwards over the plain along between the aqueduct and sea Red Hill which rises from the plain not far from the sea from the summit of which we had a most extended view in all directions out over the plains toward Mount Carmel in the with the mountains of Syria on the Feet bending around toward the north, with the vast expanse of the Mediterranean on the West. It was here upon this spot that Bahá'u'lláh was want to pitch His tent, and it is recorded that on many occasions there He gathered about Him his followers.

We spent the better part of an hour enjoying the beauty of the Red Hill and meditating over the spiritual events which had transpired there. In my mind I saw arising there a great temple in the Oriental style of architecture surmounted by a dome and flanked by spacious loggias in which the people thronged and from which they gazed upon the beautiful scenery without. In all probability someday some such structure will be erected there to give emphasis to this spot hallowed by Bahá'u'lláh's presence because of which this is destined to become one of the places of pilgrimage for ages to come. Leaving the Red Hill we retraced our route as far as Bahjí, there striking off towards the garden of El Riḍván making a detour and a stop to visit the tombs of some of the early Bahá'í exiles which are situated not far from Bahjí on a knoll on the plain. Chiefest amongst these tombs was that of the Great Affnan – of a simple design in marble in the center of a square enclosure surrounded by a low wall.

For some time the Garden of El Riḍván has been falling into decay, but now this has reached a most deplorable state of delapidation, fences down – seats and benches falling apart and bridges unsafe, while the great villaire, built out over the river where the white peacocks were formerly kept, had collapsed and part of its superstructure had fallen through the flooring into the water below.

The flowerbeds had been kept free from weeds, however, and were a mass of blossoms, but dry rot was attacking many of the trees – in fact, the two great mulberry trees beneath which Bahá'u'lláh used to sit were quite riddled by decay and seemed to be so far past hope that the gardener had set out two new trees rear by, hoping, he explained to us, that those weed eventually grow to take the places of the two older ones. One of the matters of which Shoghi Effendi had told me was that he wished to consult with me about the reconstruction of this garden. As we walked about among the flower beds he questioned me as to my thought and suggestions. The only advice which could give was to reconstruct all as nearly as possible after the original design of 'he garden. Although almost everything was very dilapidated, there still existed among the fragments and debris sufficient of the old structures to make such a reconstruction possible of accomplishment. This plan seemed to please Shoghi Effendi, and he said that as soon as practicable he would take steps toward having it done.

While we were walking about the garden the gardener had spread a table under the mulberry trees on the terrace beside the river, and upon it had placed several large bouquets of flowers which he and his assistant, a young boy, had been busy plucking, and here our lunch was served from baskets which we had brought with us. After lunch we all visited the house on the southern end of the island – which Bahá'u'lláh used to frequent – (the garden covers an island in the river, access to it being over a bridge). His room with its table and chairs is kept as it was in His day. Mounting a flight of steps to a balcony we removed our oboes and entered the chamber, remaining there for some minutes before returning to the terrace where the gardener had by that time arranged a tea service with a boiling samovar about which we seated ourselves to drink our tea in the Persian fashion from small glass cups and saucers.

Leaving El Ridván we rode around to the main entrance of the Persian Garden of Fardoz tenanted by a family of Zoroastrian Bahá'ís. They had been told of our coming and were prepared for us. In the center of the garden was a large stone reservoir containing water for irrigation purposes. We mounted the thick retaining wall of the tank on the broad coping of which rugs had been spread for us to rest upon, and there Zoroastrian friends served fruit – oranges and pomegranates, as we sat and talked and enjoyed the view off towards the south over the well cultivated garden plot beyond which stretched the plain of Sharran or some nine or ten miles until it met the abrupt northern face of Mount Carmel.

After an hour or more at Fardoz we started forth again, this time in our return to Carmel. Near the gates of 'Akká, Curtis Kelsey parted with us to return to Bahjí and his work there – our way leading around the shore by the sands until we reached Haifa where we took the Mount Carmel road going up the mountain behind the Tomb of the Báb and then down over the Monastery or Mar Elias where we halted and walked out on the promontory where the light house stands.

Shoghi Effendi is considering this point as a possible site for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár to be built upon Mount Carmel. His thought was to place the Temple where the Light House now stands, which is four or five hundred feet above the sea, and making a series of nine terraces with retaining walls down the steepness of the mountain with the various auxiliary institutions grouped upon these terraces. There is no doubt but that this site has great architectural possibilities. From a practical standpoint the chief obstacle to this site would seem to be the fact that it is owned by the monks of Carmel and being so near to their. Monastery it – is but a few rode distant – they might not wish to sell – however this is God's Temple, and if it is to be built on that site, the site will be procured!

As we were turning back to towards the monastery a motor drove up and I recognized three familiar figures descend – Ex Governor and Mrs. McCall of Massachusetts and Michael, at Arab dragoman who had engineered our Bahá'í party of tourists about Jerusalem the year before. They wore on their way from Nazareth to Jerusalem. I presented them to Shoghi Effendi and he had a few minutes' talk with them, they speaking o: their meeting with the Master He was in America and in particular of one occasion on when they had dined somewhere with Him. Their interest seemed to be very casual, and this was a disappointment to me.

On parting with the McCalls we visited the chapel of the Monastery and went down into the grotto Elijah the Prophet which is beneath the High Altar. I asked on who escorted us where it was that the Prophet had called down the fire from heaven destroying the Priests of Baal, and he told me that that place was at the Eastern extremity of the mountain, the spot being marked by one of their monastic institutions. We wore about to visit some other parts of the monastery, but finding that the monk objected to Shoghi Effendi's wearing his cola (Persian hat) we gave up the visit and returned to Haifa, comfortable, tired and happy after in interesting day.

When Harry and Ruth Randall returned to America from Haifa, now over two years ago, Harry asked me to make for a house which he and Ruth intended building in the Bahá'í Colony in Haifa for the accommodation of visiting pilgrims from the occident – an offering from them to the Holy Cause. At that time Harry showed me a rough sketch which he had made on a sheet of note paper. As I was intending to go to Haifa in the near future, and as he had no other data regarding the site for the house, nor the size if the building, nor other necessary information, it was decided that I hoe better postpone the making of designs until I had been to Haifa and ascertained all or the necessary conditions.

I had been in Haifa but a for days last year, when the Master broached the subject of my making designs for the Pilgrim House, telling me about what was wanted, and showing me the site. This resulted in my preparing drawings under His direct supervision which He approved and then ordered me to send to Mr. Randall, which was done. In time I had word to the effect that the prints had been received. Nothing was said to me regarding the Construction of the building until I reached Haifa this time. Then I learned that during her visit of some days in Haifa before my arrival Ruth Randall had left a certain sum of money with Shoghi Effendi as a portion of the building expenses, to follow.

Early during my stay Shoghi Effendi called together several of the oriental Bahá'ís, who had had experience it building, and with them on different occasions came two reputable building contractors, both Germans. In order that someone from America besides myself should know exactly how the matter was being handled in case the Bahá'ís should want information, at my suggestion Mountfort and Roy were asked to attend these conferences, and they came to several of them. We went over and over the many details of the specifications, drawings and calculations and in the end the lower bidder of the two builders seemed to be the better man. The contract price was agreed upon together with the terms of payment and the amounts thereof – then Shoghi Effendi cabled Harry to know if he could meet the payments, and whether or not the contract should be signed and the construction begun. Up until the time I left Haifa no reply had been received.

When I took up this, work with Shoghi Effendi, one of the friends told me that Mrs. Randall wished three fire places – one in the dining room, and one in each the two round parlors, so arranged that all three could be seen as one stood at the center of the building. Furthermore, she wished porches or terraces arranged, at either end of the building, and suggested that the kitchen be placed in the cellar instead of on the main floor as my first design called for. These additions and changes were made and with them a few improvements of my own which did not change the general outlay of the house. In my opinion the building lot is decidedly not advantageous for as large a house as this one will be. In the first place the lot (which was at one time owned by Mr. and Mrs. Brittingham) was practically a square in shape. Then about a quarter of its area was taken out of one corner and Sydney Sprague built a small house upon it – thus leaving the present lot in the form of an L which is of course disadvantageous. Adjoining this lot to the north and fronting on the same street is a lot unbuilt upon which is of about the same size and shape that the lot in hand was before the quarter of it had been sold off. I advised the friends to try and get possession of this lot or our site, and if when I get to America I find that the Randalls have not yet arranged for the building to begin I think I will advise them upon this point. It seems bad to put a large fine house upon a site where it will always be cramped and awkward.

At one time there was some discussion between Mountfort and Ray on one side, and Mírzá Jalál and one of his brothers-in-law upon the other, as to the advisability of getting the property into Ruth Randall's name before beginning the building operations. She had expressed some wish to the effect that she wanted title to the property. Noun tort and Roy suggested this, but Mírzá Jalál did not think it advisable. It seems that the property was in the Master's name. I could not even ascertain positively whether or not his family had the deed to the property. Mírzá Jalál answered us that Muḥammad-'Alí could no way get a hold of this land since it was listed as Miri (country) land and that according to Moslem law he had no claim to that. There was something about the matter which I could not quite get at, but in the end I decided that the sons-in-law of the blessed family thought it was better for the title to rest with the family and not with Ruth Randall, and that this accounted for their stand.

It appeared that Mrs. Randall had spoken with some of the visiting pilgrims about furniture for the completed house, suggesting, I was told, that the furnishings be sent out from America. In the meanwhile Mme. Dreyfus-Barney had discovered a Jewish cabinet maker in the town who did good work at so reasonable a figure that she thought Mrs. Randall should know of him – therefore one day she took me to this man's shop, that I might see his workmanship and report to Mrs. Randall on my return to America. He gave me a list of prices which were without doubt at least fifty percent less than would be the cost of the same in America, together with the necessary transportation and customs duties. Although his workmanship was not as good as that of the first quality of American made furniture. From my point of thought it should hardly be desirable to put handsome furniture in this house for the reason that in the Orient there is not the same upkeep that we in America are accustomed to. Things are built and allowed to go to pieces and tumble down without being repaired – then time comes when a reconstruction is made, and so it goes along. Possibly I will suggest to Mrs. Randall that she have made there in Haifa some substantial but plain furniture in a conservative mission style, which to me seems to be most appropriate from many considerations.

During the first days of my visit Shoghi Effendi said that he wanted to speak with me of improvements about the Tomb of the Báb, but that he could delay this for a few days until some of the visitors had left with whom he was then occupied. From day to day, however, before we had our long talk, now and then he outlined to us in conversations his thought for the eventual placing near the tomb of the Báb upon Mount Carmel as a permanency the tombs of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. His thought was a high dome upon the elevation of land adjoining the Tomb of the Báb directly to the south where stands the cypress trees beneath which Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. Under this dome would be the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, while a little way lower down the mountain to the north from the Tomb of the Báb would be the tomb of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the three tombs to be so composed that they could form one composition in the grouping upon the three levels. Shoghi's idea, as he explained it, was that because in the Tablets of the Master was given all praise to Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb, so this thought should be incorporated into the arrangement of the Tombs of those three most Holy Personages by placing 'Abdu'l-Bahá's tomb on the lowest level. Once Shoghi Effendi asked me if I thought such an architectural composition was practicable and I replied in the affirmative having in my mind built upon design embodying something to the arrangement of the church at Lourdes in the Pyrenees, which when adapted to this solution of our problem would comprise a nonagonal temple surmounted by an oriental dome for the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, the roof of the Tomb of the Báb forming a terrace out in front of this temple, while below the tomb of the Báb, beneath a low dome, would be that of the Master – a double stair case in the form of a horse shoe curve, coming down around each side of the Master's Tomb could give access to the two higher tombs joining them with the staircases coming up the mountain from the main street of the German Colony. I felt that some such composition could be worked out with encases.

In speaking of the future Mashriqu'l-Adhkár upon Mount Carmel Shoghi Effendi said that it should not be placed above the Holy Shrine of the Báb. It was with this idea in view that he thought of the promontory of Carmel as a site for this Temple – He said, however, that the final decision of this matter of the tombs and the Temple would be made by the Universal House of Justice. One day after several of the pilgrims had left Haifa, and 6haghi Effendi was not rushed as he had been, he took me up the mountain side to talk about matters of architecture. On the way up he asked me to express my idea as to the arrangement of the Holy Shrines. This I was a bit reluctant in doing because my ideas were different from the thoughts which he had been expressing from time to time, but he urged me saying that he really wished to know my thought. Then I explained fully my first thought as it came to me and which had not changed, of placing the Master's Tomb on the top of Mount Carmel, for from the standpoint of architectural composition I felt that there was but this one thing to do. Although from the point of view of the spiritual symbology and significances mentioned by Shoghi Effendi I felt that those matters were entirely outside of and beyond my field. In explaining my architectural concept I pictured a series of stair cases with nine terraces going up the mountain to the Tomb of the Báb in line with the axis of the main street of the German Colony. Then from there on up the mountain, on a continuation of this same axis, another series of stair cases, with nine terraces, to a point upon the extreme summit of the ridge, to a great Temple which would contain the shrines of 3aha'u'llah if the Master's body was to be laid elsewhere, of the Master's body if the remains of Bahá'u'lláh were to remain at Bahjí, or of the remains of both Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá – side by side, if this was to be a double shrine for both. From this commanding point on the summit of the ridge of Carmel the Temple tomb could be seen for many miles in all directions, its great dome dominating the entire mountain, while the pilgrims would approach the summit by the way of the nineteen terraces – nine terraces from the Colony to the Tomb of the Báb – the one terrace around the Tomb of the Báb – then nine more terraces between that and the summit ( $9 + 1 + 9 = 19$ ). Furthermore, suggested that if advisable the Temple Tomb could be built in two parts - a script with the Shrine or Shrines below, and above that the great Temple which could be used as the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, while from that a center could be made to radiate nine avenues leading to various parts of the top of the mountain; between which could be placed the many auxiliary institutions.

While Shoghi Effendi and I were on the mountain we met Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi, keeper and guardian of the Tomb of the Báb, and Shoghi Effendi explained to him our mission that day upon the mountain. Then followed a long conversation between these two which I could not understand, save that it concerned the Master's instructions to Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi regarding the completion and the better development of the shrine of the Báb.

It seemed that upon three different occasions the Master told Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi, with great emphasis, not to allow anyone to be buried near the Holy Tomb of the Báb. This Shoghi Effendi translated for me, then he asked Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi if he would bring to me, on the following morning, the data and description for the completion of the Shrine as wished by the Master, and we concluded our walk by going down the mountain together. The next morning came Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi to the Pilgrim House with: a rough, though adequate, sketch embodying the Master’s completed plan for the shrine. Luṭfu’lláh translated for us, so was able to get a very clear idea of the general lines upon which the building was to be completed, although the Master had given but very few, only two or three, instructions as to details of design or style. Shoghi Effendi had told me some days before that the Master had often expressed his admiration of and liking for the architectural style of the Taj Mahal instinctively I felt that this was the style to be emulated as much as possible in the completion of the Shrine.

Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi’s description in general was as follows:

Three more rooms were to be built behind the present structure, thus making it a complete square with three rooms on each side ( $3 \times 3 = 9$ ) nine rooms in all. About that square is to be built a loggia with three semi circular arched openings (borne upon columns and glazed with glass set into iron framework) piercing each of the four facades of the building – making in all ( $3 \times 4 = 12$ ) twelve openings, three facing each point of the compass. Then on top of the building is to be erected a second story consisting of nine rooms, the central one of which is to be surmounted by a dome of importance, arranged in such manner that the visiting pilgrims can circulate about the central chamber by walking through the series of the eight surrounding rooms, which are to open one into the other.

Several months later an article appeared in the Star of the West telling of the stairway up the mountain to the tomb of the Báb, proposed by the City Engineer of Haifa and fathered by the Pro-Carmel Society. I believe it was furthermore stated that funds would be acceptable for this construction. One morning I called on the City Engineer and he explained to me in a general way his project. He had a survey of the site, of which he kindly gave me a tracing, but as yet he had no designs for the stairways. Thereupon I decided that I would include a design of stairways in my drawings for the Tomb of the Báb, then if Shoghi Effendi thought well of it I could offer a copy to the Pro-Carmel Society through the City Engineer.

A few days before the end of my visit, at Shoghi Effendi’s suggestion I made an early morning excursion with Mírzá ‘Abbás Gholi to the plain by the sea between Haifa and ‘Akká, to reconnoitre for a possible site for the Master’s tomb, in case that it would be decided to place it there. Luṭfu’lláh and Fugita accompanied us, with Esfendiar driving. We followed the beach as far as the half way house, now in a ruinous state, it having been a target for bombardment during the recent war. Here we left the carriage and proceeded on foot for a quarter or a half a mile in-land among the dunes until we were at a point about half way between the railroad and the seashore. This was the site which we chose – our thought being that the Bahá'ís should get a concession from the Government for a tract of land about one mile square. By planting trees upon it by degrees it could be brought into a state of cultivation. A fine park could be laid off with water ways and lakes, the nearby rivers on the plain on 'Akká forming an ample supply of water, while in the center of this outlay could be built a magnificent Temple Tomb on the order of the Taj Mahal, which as I have stated, Shoghi Effendi told me was the style of architecture admired by the Master.

From architectural viewpoint this site had fine possibilities. Before leaving the site we outlined a nine pointed star upon the ground and held a few moments' prayer. The thought of placing the Master's tomb in the sands of the plain of 'Akká was suggested by something which He said one day to the effect that it was His wish to be buried on the sands of the beach midway between the Holy Shrines of Bahjí and Carmel so that when the pilgrims paused along the beach between these Holy places that they could walk over His resting place. As I have already written, it remains to be seen how this call be interpreted and where and what the friends will decide to construct.

One day not long after my walk on the mountain with Shoghi Effendi when he talked about the improvements and completion of the Tomb of the Báb and of the location of the Tomb of the Master and that of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár Shoghi Effendi asked me to go to the top of the ridge of the Mountain in company with Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi on a prospecting tour to study the possibilities for a site for the Tomb of the Master on the axis of the German Colony directly above the tomb of the Báb which location I had suggested to him. Luṭfu'lláh accompanied us as interpreter and we were joined by another one of the Persian friends. Following the drive way along the north side of the top of the mountain until we found ourselves on the prolongation of the axis line of the main street of the German Colony upon which is the Tomb of the Báb (about half way up the mountain) we turned about at a right angle, following that axis line some rods to the north until we found ourselves on the highest part of the ridge from which we had a most extended view in all directions. According to my thought from architectural considerations of composition this was the place for a great Bahá'í monument of some description. A shrine, a Temple or a great Beacon Tower – in any event, a structure which would dominate everything within sight, visible from a great distance over land and sea, marking the location of the Sacred Shrines on Carmel.

Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi took a hasty survey of the land which was approximately a square extending between the two parallel roadways which here run East and West on the top of the mountain. He thought that it belonged to German people and that it was possible to buy it. This was about all which could be done then, so we returned to the Pilgrim House, and later reported our findings to Shoghi Effendi.

After talking with me on various occasions about his several architectural projects for the future development of the Bahá'í Holy places in the vicinity of Mount Carmel, one day Shoghi Effendi asked me to work up for him preliminary tentative drawings as follows:

- I. A design for the completion of the Tomb of the Báb upon the lines as contemplated and planned by the Master, including the stair cases of approach up the mountain from the German Colony.
- II. A design for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár upon the Promontory of Carmel carrying out Shoghi Effendi's own idea with a series of nine semi-encircling terraces around the mountain and coming down to the sea, upon which would be built the accessory institutions.
- III. A design for the Master's Tomb on the top of the ridge of Carmel on a line drawn up the mountain from the Tomb of the Báb, which would be a continuation of the main axis of the German Colony.
- IV. A design for the Master's Tomb on the plain where the valley of 'Akká meets the sea, half way between Mount Carmel and Bahjí.
- V. The complete design for the Girls' School to be built upon Mount Carmel.

Shoghi Effendi laid no restrictions upon me as to cost, style nor size of these buildings, but as already stated in one of our conversations he told me that the Master's preference of style was the Indian style. This coincides with what I heard from a number of the friends at home and abroad, including Zia Baghdádí's testimony as well as that of Mr. Woodcock and the Maxwells from America. My thought is to do this work in the Indian style.

One Sunday morning Miss Rosenberg, Emogene Hoagg, Rúháughise Khanonm (sister of Shoghi Effendi) Luṭfu'lláh and I started out in the family carriage (a three seated mountain wagon) for an excursion on Mount Carmel. Driving up past the monastery of Mar Elias we walked over rocks gathering wild flowers and heather and enjoying the views off to the south along the coast toward Athlit, Caesarea and Jaffa – then we continued our drive on to the German Hotel where we had coffee and cakes before returning by the ridge drive along the north side of the brink of the mountain overlooking Haifa, the Bay and 'Akká with the distant mountains, the most prominent point of which was Mount Hermon. Arriving directly above the German Colony we found ourselves near a mounted cannon placed there during the war to command the town and harbor. It was in a rather dilapidated condition but still could be revolved around upon its bearings. We helped Rauhanghise Khánumn and Emogene Hoagg up upon the gun where they sat as Luṭfu'lláh and I revolved it about on its bearings making it go as fast as we could. Suddenly Rauhanegise Khánumn saw a picnicking party approaching us and recognizing them a well known Páshá of Haifa she descended in great haste from her perch, lowering her veil as she did so and seeking refuge in the carriage, the rest of us following – thus ended our brief hilarity, for this was indeed wild hilarity for Haifa.

Rauhanghise Khánumn finished her education at a school in England, while Shoghi Effendi was studying at Oxford. She speaks and has a bearing quite like an English girl, and is a very attractive young lady – slender and graceful in her Oriental dress and veil, the latter usually looped back on either side of her head and somewhat after the style of the ancient Egyptians. She is very western in her ideas, but in the street her veil is lowered in order not to scandalize the moslem community. During the early days of my visit Shoghi Effendi was occupied much of the time in consultation with Mountfort Mills, Roy Wilhelm, the Dreyfus-Barneys, Lady Bloomfield, Major Tudar-Pole, and later when they came, with the Schwarzes. About the foundation of the Universal House of Justice, I heard in a general way of the matters Alláh they discussed. It seems that before the Universal House can be established the Local and National House must be functioning in those countries in which there are Bahá'ís. I understood that Shoghi Effendi had called certain friends from Persia and from India for this conference, but they did not arrive in time to meet with these friends from the West whom I have mentioned.

I was told that Shoghi Effendi commissioned the Schwarzes to establish local and a national House of Justice in Germany, and that he gave instructions to Mountfort Mills and Roy Wilhelm to give to the friends in America that for the present there would not be Houses of Justice in America, but that from now on our local Spiritual Consultation Boards would function as local Houses of Justice and that the function of the Board appointed by the annual convention should be so changed and altered as to make it the supreme legislative Bahá'í body in America instead of an executive body as before – thus from now on this body becomes as the National House of Justice in every respect except in name. Furthermore, I was told that as soon as Houses of Justice could be established in those countries in the orient where there are numbers of Bahá'ís, it was Shoghi Effendi's plan then to establish the Universal House.

During this visit I found a freedom among the friends in Haifa which did not exist in the days of the Master. How that the veil of the temple has been rent and He is in His Supreme Station upon High, people are seeing and understanding His Reality, and that of the Cause, to a greater degree than ever before. This has produced a change among the friends, they are speaking more openly about the Cause than has been possible heretofore, and a spirit of liberation prevails among them.

The Master's ministry was the time of mercy and forbearance when He, the Master, was carrying all the burdens and protecting the believers and also propitiating the unbelievers as well, and making easy their way hoping to bring them to the Kingdom. However, now is the day of Justice when all are cut to the test, believers and unbelievers, enemies and friends. The following anecdote illustrates this - it was told me by one of the friends in Haifa:

It was the Master's custom to receive every one who came to Him. Often the Moslem priests, the officials of the town, and other people not interested in the Cause would come to see Him for the pleasure of His company, spending hours in conversation, tea and coffee drinking and smoking. This was a great burden upon 'Abdu'l 3aha, but one which He bore ever patiently and with a reel love for these people, man' of whom in reality were His enemies and the opposers of the Cause. Thus he sacrificed His degree to be with the believers rather than to spend time with others.

One day, sometime after the ascension, Shoghi Effendi was busy in his home with the affairs of the Cause, when word was brought to him by one of the members of the family that s group of the Muftis (Moslem priests) had arrived to pay him their respects. Shoghi Effendi gave a message excusing himself on the grounds of being very occupied – whereupon that member of the family reminded him that the Master had always received these Muftis, also expressing the fear that they would be greatly displeased if he did not see them – whereupon Shoghi Effendi said that the time had gassed for such considerations and that he must devote himself undividedly to the Cause.

One day I went into Kelsey's room – he lived in the Pilgrim House – and I found a young American there with him, Clarence welsh who had Just landed from a large tourist chip that day, anchored in the harbor. He proved to be an admirer of Lorraine Hopper. I recalled having heard her and her mother speak of him. It was through them that he had heard of the Cause while et College in Urbana, and this gave him a great desire to visit the Master – a desire which resulted in his working for a year after leaving College and getting together enough funds for the voyage. He had word from the Master that his coming was welcome, but alas the Master had departed this life before he reached the Holy Lands! Clarence had come over steerage and was roughing it generally. With a camera and a large supply of films he proposed taking photographs in order to make his expenses. He had been tip the Bile end was planning an extended tour of the holy Land. I was only sorry that we could not have done some travelling together.

Last year when I was in the Holy Land I went up to Jerusalem for several days. It was a rare treat, and ore which I long to have again. If I could say that I had any rare treat about this recent visit it would be that my time was not sufficient for going up to Jerusalem. Another time I hope to make this visit again, and also one to Damascus where there are some Bahá'ís.

As usual there were gathered in Haifa Bahá'í pilgrims from various parts of the Orient, Persia, India, Turkistan, Arabia, and Egypt being represented. On several occasions, both with others and alone, I went up to the Oriental Pilgrim House on the mountain to call upon these friends, taking tea with them. One afternoon we Western pilgrims gave a feast for the Oriental friends at our pilgrim house. About seventy gathered in the central room of the House where tea and sweetmeats were served, the Oriental friends chanting the prayers and tablets, we friends from the West welcoming them – our words being translated into the Persian. It was a most spiritual gathering expressive of the Bahá'í spirit of unity between these people of the two hemispheres. When asked to speak, I quoted to the friends the cable ;ram sent to America by the Bahá'í friends in Tīhrán when they received the news of the Master's ascension, which were to the effect that the light of the Covenant had been transferred from the eye to the heart – telling them I was beginning to realise the significance of this spiritual message, for I had been very unhappy at the thought of coming to Haifa with our Lord not there, but in the Guardian of the Cause and in the love of the friends for one another. I was finding the living spirit of the Master, so my heart was being comforted and I was happier. Shoghi Effendi translated the remarks of the Western friends since none amongst us save the Dreyfus-Barneys spoke Persian.

On the morning of Norooz the believers both oriental and Occidental assembled at the Master's house to view the portraits of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. These were exposed to view in the southeastern room of the house, which adjoined the room which had been that of the Master. A large photograph of the Master was on view and beside it a miniature on ivory, the work of Miss Rosenberg. On former occasions during the Master's ministry only the portraits of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh were thus visited. Now as the friends gazed also upon the portraits of the Master they were much affected. Then we all went into the Master's room. Flowers had been placed here and – the room was just as it had been He had been there. The light filtered into the chamber through the closed blinds and plain white curtains falling upon the bedstead the curtains of which were closed. Here the grief of the friends overflowed, though always restrained. I was one of the last to enter the room – Emogene Hoagg and I were there together and for a few moments we knelt in prayer while our tears flowed in silence.

Later on in the middle of the afternoon we all gathered at the Pilgrim house on Mount Carmel for tea before visiting the Holy Tombs. Shoghi Effendi was there and he led the group to the Tomb. He poured rose water on our hands as we entered the shrine.

Visiting the tomb of the Báb first, we all stood while Shoghi Effendi chanted a prayer of visitation. Then we all went into the Master's tomb where we seated ourselves in Oriental fashion on the floor while two of the friends chanted in melodious voices from the Holy Words. After this we withdrew one by one from the building, going down the mountain singly and in small groups. This was also the usual Sunday afternoon program of spiritual meeting upon the mountain attended by the pilgrims and Bahá'ís of Haifa and by the few friends who could come over from 'Akká for the gathering.

While I was in Haifa in the winter of 1921 the Bahá'í School for Girls to be built upon Mount Carmel was under consideration. Some of the visiting women Bahá'ís were deeply interested in the work, and various conferences were held between them and the ladies of the Blessed Bahá'í Household. At the request of Munírih Khanoum, I made some sketches for the first building of the group to be constructed. These drawings were offered to the Master and He looked them over and approved the plans and elevations. Between Munírih Khanoum and Mírzá 'Abbás Gholi a site upon Mount Carmel has been given for the school. It is a tract of land fronting about 280 feet upon the road way near the Tomb of the Báḅ, and it turns up the mountain (to the south) to the road along the top of the ridge. My sketch contemplated a continuous layout of buildings in the Syrian romanesque style stepping up the mountain the terraced tops of each building forming terraces before the adjacent buildings higher up the mountain. These buildings so arranged as to enclose a series of three garden courts running up the mountain. At the entrance upon the lower roadway was the Administration building. Next above that came the recitation buildings, while highest up were the dormitories and the living quarters. The plan contemplated the building of the Administration building first, this being used for the school in its beginning until the funds were available for the construction of the other buildings of the group.

Recently in Haifa I learned that during the past year some funds had been sent from America for this building fund. Roaha Khanoam being the one who received these offerings. At her request this money was banked in Haifa in the name of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Shortly after the Master’s passing Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí filed a claim to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s property, and I was told that according to the Moslem law a brother could claim the third part of all town properties (including moneys) of another brother’s estate as his inheritance, and that this claim tied up the school money. The friends hoped that Mírzá Muḥammad-‘Alí’s claim would not be granted and that this money will be saved for the school.

One day Rúḥá Khanoum called me to her home and spoke with me about the school, suggesting that a committee be formed in America to receive and guard the funds, banking the funds in the United States until needed for building in Haifa. She explained that she and her sisters were greatly burdened with so many cares and duties, that they did not wish the added responsibility of handling these finances. Later on she consulted Shoghi Effendi about this matter, and I understood that his decision was that the offerings had better be forwarded on to Haifa as they came in, rather than be kept and handled in America. Just what arrangement was made, and to whom the funds were to be sent, I was not told.

Some years ago Hájíe Mírzá Ḥasan, the Cairo merchant from Khurasán, invested in a large tract of land on the high land in the eastern part of Haifa near the Jewish college. While I was in Haifa last winter, the Master had me subdivide this property into nineteen building lots to be sold in order to settle up the Khurasání estate in Haifa this time, Mírzá Jalál told me that he told his wife Rúḥá Khanoum had purchased one of these lots and wished to build a house upon it as an inheritance for their daughter. Moreover he asked me to make him a design for this house to be built upon semi oriental occidental lines – without the very large rooms characteristic of the Orient, but at the same time with rooms and hallways larger and more spacious than usual in Europe. In other words, a building particularly adapted for living conditions in Haifa. This was very pleased to do, making a series of studies for a house, which, when I reach America, I expect to finish off and send to him, giving a general outlay f house without buildings, gardens, etc. This is the first house to be built in this Khurasání addition, and undoubtedly it will be followed by others, so it is hoped to establish there a type of building which will be a credit to the Bahá'í Colony.

With us in proletariat America the term "lady" is used so promiscuously, thereby losing its original meaning, so that many of us prefer to use the term woman where formerly we were wont to say lady. So much so has this become the custom that now it often sounds strange to our ears when the term lady is used, as it still is in some foreign countries, in its former or original sense. It is in this sense, now all but obsolete in America, that the friends in the Orient always speak of the ladies of the Blessed Holy Household, for they are ladies in the social sense; they are of a glass above that of ordinary women. I feel that we will understand this distinction more as we grow in the knowledge of the Master's testament and institutions therein outlined, for it can easily be seen that as the Cause grows and develops the household of Bahá'u'lláh, who have remained firm in His Covenant, and in the Master's Covenant, will become the most reverend and respected family of the world.

At various times during my visit I caught glimpses and had conversations with the ladies of the Blessed Household. There is now so much more freedom for them than existed formerly that they are able to meet with the men of the Cause without fear of incurring difficulty and trouble from the feet that by so doing they are breaking away from one of the most time honored customs of the Orient which does not allow a woman even to be seen by any man but her husband and nearest male relatives. Not unfrequently one or more of the Master's daughters would drop into the pilgrim house for a call, and several times I saw them one or two at a time in one of their homes.

The day before leaving Haifa I have a message from Rúhá Khanoum telling me that her Aunt and Mother and sisters would be pleased to receive me at her home at a certain hour. This made me very happy because on that visit up until then I had not seen 3aheyeh Khanoum (the Greatest Holy Leaf), nor Munírih Khanoum. The former is very frail and delicate – and since the shock of the Master's passing has not been as well as formerly. I had a very pleasant visit with them all. Munírih Khanoum was not there having left a few days before in company with Emogene Hoagg and the Schwarz family for Europe for a change of climate and treatment for a run down condition of nerves precipitated by the shock and strain of the sad events of the few previous months. Rizewaneyeh Khanoum, the wife of Mírzá Hoosain Yazdí, and cousin to the Master's daughters, was also present. The ladies asked for various of the friends in America, talked much about the spiritual work waiting for us to accomplish in America, and sent their love and greetings to the friends in the United States and Canada. Moreover they spoke of the weight of work upon Shoghi Effendi, and expressed the hope that we in America would do all in our power to make his path easy and to bring joy and gladness to him in his labors in the path of the Master.

taining some of the precious blood and some of the priceless hair of Bahá'u'lláh, delivering this to me as a most treasured possession. The inscriptions upon the outer and the inner cover of this precious package read as follows: "Of all the remnants of Bahá'u'lláh's all sacred person, the most hallowed, the most precious confidentially delivered in the hand; of my brother and co-worker in the Cause of God, Mr. Remey.

(signed) Shoghi. March, 1922.

"Coagulated drops of Bahá'u'lláh's all sacred blood and ringlets of His most Blessed. Lock presented as my most precious possession to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's dear son, Mr. Charles Mason Remey, as a token of my Bahá'í affection and brotherly love.

(signed) Shoghi."

(sealed with the Greatest Name)

I have received many precious Holy relics of the Cause, but of all this is the most precious of my Bahá'í possessions.

While passing through Germany I had a silver case made to contain this treasure appropriately engraved with the Greatest Name and inscribed with the above words written by Shoghi Effendi. It is arranged to be carried in the inner pocket, and has a guard chain to go around the neck to insure its safety.

With an affectionate farewell Shoghi Effendi commissioned me to tell the friends in America that he was asking the friends in the Oriental Countries to collect and to send money to America for the building of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and that we might expect to receive these contributions before many months. Then he gave me two pages of partly burned candles from the Holy Tomb of the Master, to be distributed among the delegates to the coming convention, which packages I now have with me in my luggage.

Now deposited with other Holy treasures in the archives of the Bahá'í Cause. January, 1930.

Studying the mixture in spite of some rough days when four out of five persons were sick – actively so all over everything.

We are due in New York early tomorrow, Friday morning the 21st.

I expect to start as soon as possible for Chicago and the Bahá'í Convention, going via Washington where I plan to make a short visit of a few hours with my family.

In brief such were some of my objective experiences on my way to the Holy Land. However, in my inner thoughts a change was taking place, and this change began to objectify to me during the days of my voyage. Since the fall of 1917 a struggle had been on in the Cause in America. This had first been generally felt at the time of the violation at Chicago when a partial split formed over the Kirchner affair – a split which was never really healed, and which latterly has continued as a widening difference between those friends who champion “Reality” and its policy of supporting certain people as against those people who stand with the Washington and Chicago Assemblies against these people and their doings. Of late this has become a breach between the people of the New York Assembly upon one hand, and Chicago upon the other hand – the other assemblies throughout the country for the most part siding with Chicago.

These and many other matters I reflected over during the voyage and now before landing I have quite definitely made up my mind that I must get away from all this discord in order to find that peace of soul so necessary for Bahá’í Service.

Haifa, Thursday, February 23, 1922

Mountfort Mills and I arrived noon Tuesday and were met at train by Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney and Mírzá Jalál. Ruth Randall's steamer we could see in the harbour about a half mile from shore – but she did not land until late afternoon: very glad to find her recovered from the attack of flu which we found her in the midst of when we boarded her steamer in Naples. Last night she hurt her ankle in coming down the steps from a meeting in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house, and will have to keep off it for two or three days. Dr. and Mrs. Krug have gone to Italy and Germany – the Bosch's to Europe enroute to America. Lady Bloomfield is here as is also Miss Roseberg from London, who with Hippolyte and Laura and Mrs. Hoagg and Curtis we have quite a family. The food is cooked at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's home from where it is sent across the street to Pilgrim House and served to us by "Fudgo" and Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím. Yesterday afternoon we had an interesting gathering composed of Shoghi Effendi, Mons and Madame D-Barney, Mountfort, Mírzá Jalál, Dr. Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím, Rúḥá Effendi, Ruth Randall, Monever Khanoum and myself. In the evening we attended a meeting at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house at which there were about fifteen of the men, including one elderly gentleman who is a son of Şubḥ-i-Azal – so even the children of former enemies are now accepting the Cause. In the afternoon Hippolyte, Mountfort and one of the Persians visiting from Egypt and I went up to the Tomb – a good climb of perhaps 500 feet above the house. The faithful caretaker admitted us to both the rooms of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and The Báb lie beneath the floors which are covered with finest Persian rugs upon which are placed lamps and candelabra. 'Abdu'l-Bahá at various times has told the friends that it is very good to pray upon Mount Carmel.

We found Curtis Kesley busily engaged with an assistant completing the electric wiring. The lighting makes a great difference in the appearance of the rooms.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá once expressed a desire that a beacon light be placed upon the Tomb. It was a great surprise to see the power of even the small light now in place which makes shadows visible in the main street of Haifa a half mile or more distant. Mírzá Jalál stated that this attracted great notice, even the Government of Haifa saying it should be marked upon the Marine Charts. Curtis plans a new arrangement which will double and possibly treble the power so that this bedroom will be visible at a greater distance than the present small light-house being so much higher above the sea level.

This morning Mírzá Jalál called and took us to his home which the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and here we met the ladies of the Holy Household – The Greatest Holy Leaf (‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sister), the Holy Mother (His wife) and the four daughters. A few interesting two hours were spent with them – the daughters talking and also interpreting for the Holy Leaf is wonderful, in many ways much resembling that of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It possesses wisdom, tenderness and power. We are told she possesses, like ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, a rare sense of humor.

Among other things it was explained that by the terms of the Will and Testament, Shoghi Effendi must now be regarded as a young and tender shrub, and must be carefully nurtured and protected by all the friends of God. He will at times almost overcome by the thought of his great responsibilities which so suddenly have been placed upon him. This afternoon he and his cousin and secretary Rúhí Effendi took Mountfort and me a long walk during which affairs of the Cause were discussed and many questions asked about America. He has expressed upon Hippolyte, Mountfort and me that we must very carefully study the Will and Testament so as to become quite familiar with details. We are to await the arrival of other friends whom he has called for consultation from various parts of the world, among them Jenabe Faḍil and Herr Consul Schwarz from Stuttgart. Major Tudor-Pole is in Cairo but was prevented from carrying out his intention of coming with us by an attack of the “flu” from which we hope for his speedy recovery.

Shoghi Effendi asks that the Will and Testament be regarded as private – the details just for the Bahá’ís and asked me to cable this to Miss Lloyd who will receive the copy for America addressed to me late in January. He has also said that this Document is not merely for Bahá’ís but its import is for the whole world and gradually it will become known and effective. Plans for the organization of the House of Justice are being undertaken, but there is much to first be done. He made it very plain that all the friends of the world, and particularly those in America, must now devote their whole energies to teaching and spreading the Cause and to helping establish the principles of the Will and Testament. All lesser things he said must be subordinated to the “Most important work.”

Shoghi Effendi is a most interesting character study. He is I presume, about twenty-three, small of stature, a singular sweetness of countenance and character, possessing extraordinary brilliance of mind and perception, it seems to me, for one of his years. His quickness, too remarkable. He makes it constantly evident that he wishes authority to rest in the body of the Bahá’ís at large. It seems to me that we should as far as possible _____ him from the multitudinous perplexities which continually were presented and pressed upon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá from all quarters of the globe – else his sympathetic mind will be so overburdened that his health may not be equal to the strain, and in my event, his time and attention diverted from the most important matters – of bringing into operation the terms of the Will and Testament. This may be and probably is a pattern and standard for the formation of the only World Governments which shall survive these times. Another point upon which Shoghi Effendi placed great emphasis was that the Local Spiritual Assemblies are responsible for the spiritual affairs of the Cause in their respective centres and that likewise the Convention and the executive Committee are responsible for general spiritual matters. He said all this had become so well understood and established in Persia that there was no further question or trouble there; that while sometimes there were differing understandings about details – all were united in putting in first place the interest of the Cause itself. Tonight (24th) we had a most interesting experience – a meeting at which were present quite a number (nearly 20) of Persian s who recently arrived, some of the sled 6r weeks from interior cities. There were between sixty and seventy present - a number of the women of the Household and the Haifa friends standing in the hall outside the rom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house. These pilgrims represented various religions and classes some were light, others dark - some were merchants, other landowners or farmers they wore various kinds of costumes - some had red fezes, some black, some tall others short - one or two big turbans, another the head covering and bands, like the Sphinx. But their faces all shone. They expressed great love for us and asked us in turn to send their affection to America and to express the hope that as time goes on they may have the opportunity to meet American believers. Shoghi Effendi said that when arrangements are made for better contacts and closer acquaintances between America and Persia it would be productive of great good and make for spiritual progress in both countries.

After meeting the Household this morning the Greatest Holy Leaf sent to Mountfort and me a Bahá’í “boquet” which now adorns one whole corner of our room – it is 7 to 1 feet tall and nearly as wide a – whole tree top with about fifty beautiful mandarins (tangerines) large, juicy and not only sweet and flavory but as fragrant as the roses. The oranges are superb too – those of nearby Jaffa of the long “sheepnose” variety being known as among the finest in the word. I’m sure Mountfort would not want you to know how many of these wonderful fruits he surrounds in a day – for myself I do not usually eat more than three or-four at a time several times a day.

Friday 24th. Now I am in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s garden at his home - an abundance of golden mandarines hang on the trees - lighter colored lemons, bananas, oranges – this must be the best season for these luscious fruits. The flowers of many varieties are in bloom - roses large and small – white roses, red roses, large golden roses, violets growing along the paths – a number of kinds of smaller flowers such as one finds in the old fashioned country gardens – all these fragrances blend together into a wonderful symphony of color and sweet smells. We find here as great peace – what a contrast when one thinks of the world’s cities. One day at our home ‘Abdu’l-Bahá quoted from Bahá’u’lláh, “The city is the abode of bodies – the country is the home of spirits.”

Shoghi Effendi comes to the Pilgrim House and has lunch with us almost every day. and talks most interestingly about different problems connected with the Bahá'í Movement. He is quite ready to listen to the opinions of others, and often questions those at table as to what they think about certain questions. He speaks very directly and frankly, with a very dynamic quality. He has a quick sense of humour, and occasionally says things that might seem a, wee bit sarcastic, if one did not clearly realize the kindness of his attitude. But he evidently sees people, and their abilities and defects, very clearly. One feels very clearly his wisdom, his capacity and his power. Pie is very simple and friendly, so that one feels free to ask him all kinds of questions.

We have talked with him a great deal about the Spiritual Assemblies. He evidently feels that the local and national Assemblies are still in a very crude stage, and that until they begin to function more adequately it would be unwise to attempt to organize the Universal House of Justice. "It would simply be a farce," he said. The local Assemblies must be chosen by the friends, all voting for those who do the electing. Even though the Assemblies act unwisely he feels that he cannot step in, and use their power himself. He can simply suggest to the Assemblies that certain principles apply to certain situations, to which they have not been applying them. In selecting, the friends should put aside all personal dislikes, choosing those who will best serve the Cause. He quoted twice the Master's statement that when the majority of the Assembly had decided on a course of action, the other members and the Bahá'ís in general must abide by that decision even though it were wrong. Then he repeated it and smiled, and said, "That is what breaks one's back." He evidently realizes what difficult teaching that will be for most people to accept. He said, "If I had to choose a Bahá'í who was young in the Cause, and very sure in spirit, but with little experience, or one who was older in the Cause, less pure in spirit, and more experienced, I would be inclined to choose the former for a member of the Spiritual Assembly. But if all the members were of that type, the Assembly would suffer from lack of experience. Therefore it is necessary to compromise, and takes some of both kinds.” When the Universal House of Justice is organized, its decisions will be infallible, but this does not apply to the National or Local Spiritual Assemblies. However, Shoghi Effendi is very clear that the affairs of the Cause must rest in the Spiritual Assemblies, even though they make serious mistakes. For instance, if an individual is considering whether to enter on a given type of work, that might involve him in political disputes, he should first consult the Assembly before accepting or rejecting the situation. That is, wherever an individual’s conduct might have an influence on the Bahá’í Cause in a city the Assembly should be consulted. If a man thinks that his course of action has no relationship to the progress of the Cause, then he needs not consult the Assembly. If later it is found to be involving all the friends, he should discuss the matter with the Assembly, and abide by their decision.

One day Shoghi Effendi talked at length about the question of interfering in politics. Of course ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says clearly that Bahá’ís should not interfere in politics. The question is as to what is meant by interfering in politics. Shoghi Effendi said that it seemed to him to mean that one should never involve oneself with any person or any group which is working for selfish ends and personal advancement. One must always be ready to serve the good of one’s country, but one must not become entangled with parties which are exploiting the country for their own ends. Whether a given position under the Government will entangle the person in politics will to a certain extent be left to the judgment of the individual, but he will always be wiser to consult the Spiritual Assembly if there is any question at all about the wisdom of his engaging in a given course.

In connection with this discussion of interfering in politics, Shoghi Effendi said very emphatically that he had no use for considerations of expediency. If a given course of action would bring suffering to a given Bahá’í or even to a large group of Bahá’ís, and yet was contrary to some clearly understood Bahá’í principle, it should not be entered upon. Such a course of action would eventually bring trouble to the Bahá’ís, and would in the long run cause more suffering than it would avert. I have been very much impressed with the absolutely clear stand Shoghi Effendi takes for honesty and truthfulness on the part of the Bahá’ís. He never tries to avoid a difficulty; but comes at it very clearly and says, “Here is a problem to be solved.”

We were talking about conditions in America, and Shoghi Effendi spoke about the great importance of teaching. He said that the Bahá’ís who at present are in America would, for instance, have great difficulty in completing the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár; that we must have more Bahá’ís to help with that, and with all other Bahá’í work. We asked what was the best method of teaching in America, and he said that the most important thing for all the Bahá’ís to do was to so live that people would be attracted to the Cause by their lives, that such teaching was of much more importance than lectures and speeches. He emphasized the same thing another day when we were discussing the Spiritual Assemblies. The members of the Assemblies must be chosen by people who are as ours in heart and as unselfish as possible. Moreover, if it should happen that a given Spiritual Assembly was to act unwisely, the thing: for individual Bahá'ís to do is to live the very best they can so that the progress of the Cause may not suffer. It seems to me that Shoghi Effendi is very clear in his attitude that the first thing for the Bahá'ís to do is to make their own lives in accord with the Principles laid down by 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Bahá'u'lláh.

We were discussing the matter of money contributions to the work of the Cause. Shoghi Effendi said that of course Bahá'ís ought to contribute to Bahá'í work, according to their capacity. But he said very definitely that Bahá'ís should not be under compulsion to contribute. For instance, when the Assembly makes an appeal for funds, it should be done in such a way that a man who does not wish to contribute will not be made uncomfortable and ashamed if he does not. The needs of the Cause should be clearly presented, through speeches, through appeals, through articles published, etc. Then the friends should be invited to give money to help these different activities. But the pledging of money, for instance, should be done in private, so that the person who does not give, will not be made uncomfortable. If a person pledges to give each month certain funds for the support of the Cause, he of course has a moral obligation to make that payment, but if he does not pay, the Assembly should not try to compel him to pay. Shoghi Effendi said it would usually be well for a person who pledged money to give his pledge with the promise that he would pay it if he found no other use for it which he considered more important! I said, "But then the Assembly would say that was unbusinesslike. That under those circumstances they would never know on how much money they could count for the work of the Cause." And he replied, "Yes, I know. And that is true; they never can be able to count on definite sums each month. But that is of less importance than the harm that will come from trying to compel people to contribute." This interested me a great deal, for along with this he is perfectly clear that he understands how many of the activities of the Cause require money in order to make them effective.

January 2, 1924.

Yesterday Shoghi Effendi read us part of a long letter he had written for the Bahá'ís throughout the East. He read some paragraphs about the progress of women — first about the need of education for both boys and girls. Then, the recommendation that each Spiritual Assembly should appoint a special committee, which should concern itself with the progress of women. That every facility should be given the Bahá'í women for advancement and progress, so that as soon as the veil is removed they will be able to take part in all the activities of the Cause. He mentioned the fact that the process of removing the veil would be a gradual one, but that eventually it would be entirely taken off. Later, in talking of the removal of the veil, he spoke with approval of the way the Egyptian women are removing the veil, not taking it off at once, but gradually making it thinner and thinner, so that now the better class women wear the merest gossamer silk over their faces. From that it will be an easy step to take the veil off entirely.

One day he spoke about the growth of communism and Bolshevism. He quoted a Tablet of the Master written not long before his death, in which he said that such movements would increase in their influence. Shoghi Effendi seems to feel that surface conditions in the world may continue to grow worse for some time, and that only after a long period will the Bahá'í spirit triumph. No democracy can be successful unless it is founded on a spiritual basis. Up to this time democracies have attempted to exist on a purely material basis, and they have not justified themselves. Only when the Bahá'í spirit is infused into the world can we have real democracies.

Another time Shoghi Effendi spoke about the Master's will. He said that Dr. Esslemont had wanted to put in his book a chapter in which he would comment in some detail on the Will. But Shoghi Effendi told him that it was not yet time to do that, that people now have so little understanding of the Will, that comment on it is now premature. He said that the Master's Will is a great test for the Bahá'ís. Those who really accept and understand it have passed the test successfully.

He is continually emphasizing the importance of the Spiritual Assemblies. He seems to imply that we must accept the principle of such Assemblies, and their place in the Cause. And that even if present Assemblies do not function very well, we must all work with them and cooperate with them, for the sake of the principle and of what they will be in the future.

Yesterday, on January first, Mírzá Raḥím Arjumand, who has come to Haifa from Paris, gave a Feast for the Bahá'ís. There were about forty men present in the big central hall in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house. One of the Bahá'í teachers who has come from India gave a long talk. One of the Haifa Bahá'ís read the newest circular letter from the Haifa Assembly to the Bahá'ís in the East. Several Bahá'ís sang a song composed by Mírzá Maḥmúd of India, and another Bahá'í sang a song he had composed. The latter was evidently an ode in praise of Shoghi Effendi. He made no comment on its reference to himself, I think, but said very emphatically that all Bahá'í songs should have in them the name of either 'Abdu'l-Bahá or of Bahá'u'lláh, so that it would be evident to all who are the leaders and inspirers of the Bahá'í Movement. Another speaker referred to the Qur'án, and to the writings of the Báb in his talk, and Shoghi Effendi advised him always in his talks to quote from the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

January 8, 1924.

Yesterday at lunch we were talking about Bahá'í hooks, and about ways of teaching the Bahá'í Cause. Shoghi Effendi said to Mrs. S. that on her trip to India she should use Dr. Esslemont's book as a sort of text, that she should study it, and use it as a basis of teaching. Things not included in that book should not be taught, and everything in it should be taught. He said that when the Master read the first chapters in that book he made a number of changes, with a view to making it more acceptable to the person who is not a Bahá'í. For instance, in certain places Dr. Esslemont had referred to Bahá'u'lláh as the "Promised One". In every case the Master had crossed that out, and had written in its place, "the first educator of mankind." Shoghi Effendi said that in teaching new people one should not say things that would antagonize them; for instance, one should not speak of Bahá'u'lláh as being greater than Christ. One should not emphasize the position of Bahá'u'lláh as a Manifestation of God. On the other hand, one must be careful not to teach anything that would later be contradicted, even in seeming. One must use wisdom in the books given to beginners. He instanced some of the things in the Tablets to the Kings, as being too advanced for beginners. It would be better to have extracts from these, fitted for the person who knows little of the Cause. I inferred that he thought the Bahá'í Scriptures, for instance, was good for Bahá'ís, but not so good for non-Bahá'ís. He said that there were many hooks that needed to be written on the Cause, but that there were not enough skilled writers in the Bahá'í Movement to do the work. He had suggested to Mr. Dreyfus that he write a book about the life of the Master, as a man, and not as a Manifestation — something that would appeal to any one who would enjoy reading the biography of a great man.

Shoghi Effendi said that it was very important to have well trained Bahá'í teachers. Bad teaching may alienate people who would accept the Cause, if properly taught. There is great need of well educated Bahá'ís to teach intelligent people. A Bahá'í should not try to teach special aspects of the Cause to specialists in a given field, unless he understands well the field discussed. For instance, a Bahá'í should not try to discuss the economic teachings of the Bahá'í Movement with an economist, unless he is well informed of the whole field of economics, as well as of the Bahá'í teachings on that subject. He should refer the person to some one who can do the question justice. If there is no such person, refer him to the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Here one may encounter the difficulty that the best things have not yet been well translated. But one had better not try to discuss the subject, than to do it badly and give the listener the impression that the Bahá'í teachings are incorrect or incomplete. Bahá'ís should study all the great religious and philosophic movements of the world, so as to be able to intelligently present the Bahá'í teachings to the followers of those movements. We should not be exclusive, but should mingle with other groups, in an effort to understand them, and thus eventually to teach them.

Shoghi Effendi mentioned three things as being important for Bahá'ís to do; first, to make an individual effort to perfect their own characters; second, to study the Bahá'í teachings carefully, so that they can guide their own conduct, and teach others; third, to pray always for the assistance of God, that we may act wisely. In speaking of the question of individual effort, he said, "'Abdu'l-Bahá sometimes said that he would say to himself, 'you should do this, you should do that.' If the Master, with all his wisdom and capacity, did this, how much more do we need to make an effort in this way."

Thursday, January 3, 1924.

This afternoon at four o'clock just as I was getting dressed to go to Riḍvânia Khánúm's for tea, there was a knock at my door, and Sohiel Effendi said that Shoghi Effendi was going up to the Tomb and invited me to go with him, if I cared to do so. Of course a call from Shoghi Effendi has precedence over all other engagements, and so I hurriedly put on my hat and coat, and walked up to the gate of the Master's house where he was waiting for me. We walked slowly up to the Tomb, stopping for a few minutes several times, usually at points where Shoghi Effendi wished to say something that he wanted me to understand accurately. At the Tomb he spent a long time walking about the terraces, which are just being completed, talking about the plans for the future for the development of the terraces, drew my attention to the beautiful colors of trees, plants and lawn. After some time spent in going about the gardens, he asked if I would like to enter the Master's Tomb. We took off our shoes and went in, on the women's side. There was no one else in the Tomb, it was almost dark outside, and the lights in the Tomb were lighted. Shoghi Effendi knelt a moment at the threshold, and then stood for some time silently in front of the Tablet of Visitation on the wall. I thought he was not going to chant aloud, but after a few minutes he began, and chanted slowly and with wonderful sweetness. I could not but remember the first day I entered the Tomb, more than three years ago, a day when the Master stood in the doorway, while Rúhí Effendi chanted so sweetly. I remembered the weariness of the Master's face that day, and of how I felt that no sacrifice was too great to make to save the Master a little from weariness. I have fallen away most awfully from the resolutions of those days, but now I think those few days in Haifa have given me back a devotion that I have lost for a long time. And seeing Shoghi Effendi in prayer at the Master's threshold fills me with a desire to be of service such as I have almost never had before. What is it in Shoghi Effendi that so wins one: devotion! He is so simple, so young, so unassuming. And yet he has a power to win one to the Cause and its service, but is little short of miraculous. It is not that I see the Master in him, but more that his devotion to the Master is contagious. Of course, really I see the Master's spirit in him — the spirit of devotion to the Cause, to the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. As soon as he had finished chanting he knelt a moment at the threshold, and then went out. I followed him, as he went down to the terraces, to discuss with the Bahá'í workmen the question of where certain water-pipes are to be placed. There was a Bahá'í who has recently come from Yazd, and the care of the garden of Riḍván has been placed in his hands. Shoghi Effendi gave some instructions about the work there, and then said, "The care of that garden is all in your hands. Be assured that I will come and see the progress of the work in the garden." He is the personification of kindness and consideration; and yet, withal, is so direct and frank that I am continually being astonished by the things he says! After he had finished talking with the gardeners and workmen we came down the mountain. It was so dark that we came down by the road, talking until we reached the Master's house.

We talked of a number of different things. I asked him about his ideas as to my returning to Persia. He said that, of course, was entirely in my own hands, that at any time when I thought I could be of use there, to write him and he would arrange for me to return. Then he added that he thought I was probably right in thinking that now conditions were very difficult for my work, and that they very likely would become more difficult. From everything that he has said to me and that I have heard him say to others, he does not feel that now I am doing wrong in leaving Persia, but that he hopes I will return there later, when conditions will be more favorable for my work. I asked him about the advisability of beginning a small boarding department for girls in the Tarbíyát School. Such a department would have to be so planned as to be self-supporting. I also told him about Patoul Khánúm's being eager to undertake such work. Shoghi Effendi said that no doubt such a school would be useful, especially because children who were under the direction of the school all the time could be more systematically trained than those who were in the school for only a few hours a day. He wondered if it would be practicable to have girls come from outside of Tíhrán, because of the difficulties of travel. I told him that a few children did come and live with relatives in Tíhrán, in order to attend the school, and that with a boarding department in the school, others would probably come to that. He said that it would be a good idea for those at the head of the school to write him what they thought of doing, to state all the aspects of the problem, and that he would consider them. Then, if it seemed advisable to him, he would write to the Spiritual Assembly of Tíhrán, advising them what to do in the matter. He also suggested this method of procedure for any important thing that the friends wish to undertake; that they write him the details of the matter for consideration, and then he will make recommendations to the Spiritual Assembly of the city concerned. I suppose this procedure should be followed only in matters of importance, because certainly nothing should be done to unnecessarily multiply Shoghi Effendi's duties.

We spoke repeatedly of the necessity of the friends living the Bahá'í life so completely that people will be attracted to the Cause by the lives of the Bahá'ís. He says that the believers are of course accomplishing a great deal, but that this could be greatly increased simply by the Bahá'ís "living the life" more fully. He said that unity among the Friends depends almost wholly on the individual lives. I said, "But how are we to learn that our own opinions are not necessarily correct! We are all so sure that our own ideas are right!" He said. "If the Bahá'ís will really understand the way the Spiritual Assemblies should function, and then abide by that, this difficulty can be overcome. When one of the friends has an idea, he should present it to the Spiritual Assembly, and there should be full and free discussion. Each person should say exactly what he thinks about it. Then the Assembly should vote on it, and the decision should be accepted by all concerned." This of course implies that we must get away from the habit of having our feelings hurt if things do not go as we want them to do!

We talked about people who are attracted to the Cause, but who are not ready to call themselves Bahá'ís. He said that in teaching these people we should not do anything that would lessen their attraction — that is, we should not insist on certain teachings that the person cannot accept, to such an extent that he loses all interest. But the effort should be made to so attract him that finally he will be so attracted to some elements of the Movement that he will be willing to accept provisionally the things he does not fully understand. But he seems to me to be very clear in saying that we must not antagonize people, by giving them too early teachings that might antagonize them. This does not mean any attempt to conceal the real teachings, but simply that each person should be first taught the things that will be easiest for him to accept.

We were looking at the terrace-garden, and he was directing the work of the men. He said, "People in the East are so inaccurate, one must tell them every step in the work one must supervise constantly. I find that one of the things that the East most needs is a sense of neatness, accuracy and exactness." Then I heard him say to one of the gardeners, "Do the work in the way that will be quickest most easily done, and with the least expense." He was not, of course, suggesting any lessening of a high standard of work. But he was recommending economy of time, effort and materials.

He asked me whether I had any immediate family in America, and I told him very briefly about my father, and half-brothers and sister. He asked if my father is a Bahá'í, and I told him no, but that he is not unfriendly. He said, "I hope that he will realize the spread of the Bahá'í movement in America, that he will realize its greatness and will become a Bahá'í. I will pray that he will be more attracted, and that he will see now great a Cause this is."

To me, personally, he said, "When you return to America, I hope that you will serve the Cause in every way you can. You have had experience, you are intelligent, and you can be very useful. If you have suggestions as to the progress of the Cause in America, present these ideas to the National Assembly, and I am sure they will give them serious consideration. When the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is completed, and its departments are functioning, I hope you will be engaged in educational activities centering about it. But now that time is not yet come, and you must serve in other ways. Always so live that people will be attracted to the Cause by your life." Then he repeated the fact that the experiences I had had would make me more able to serve the Bahá'ís, and then he said, "I shall expect to hear that you are being of much service." I write down what he said to me, on this point, because I want to have a record on paper of his words as to what he expects me to do. Thus I shall have something to refresh my memory, if I find that I am losing my devotion, or am "growing weary of well-doing."

Shoghi Effendi is absolutely clear that the attention and financial capacities of the friends should be concentrated on teaching, first of all. We said very definitely that he would not be pleased by any attempt at present to collect funds for the Mount Carmel Girls School, or for the schools in Tīhrán. He said that the main purpose of the Mount Camel School must be at first to spread the power and dignity of the Cause, not to educate a few children in Haifa. He said that when I talked of these schools in America, I should tell as much as I wished about them, but that I should say, “Of course these schools need funds, but at the present time they are of less importance, and your financial assistance should be given to teaching, which is of first importance.” I asked him about my sending money that I earn to the school in Tīhrán, and he said that in my case, since I had worked in the school in Tīhrán, funds that I would send would be an indication of my continued interest in the work of the school, and that I might be considered as an exception to the rule. But the Bahá’ís in America should not be expected to contribute to the support of either of these schools at the present time. We told of a contribution that had come for the Mount Carmel School from some Bahá’ís in Manchester. Two of the friends there had entertained Avarih for some time, at their own expense. Afterwards one of the Bahá’ís who was comparatively wealthy, had given them a considerable sum of money to recompense them for the expense they had incurred for Avarih. This money they sent for the Mount Carmel School. It happened that these men were members of the National Assembly of England. They needed to go to London to meet with the other members of the Assembly. But they had no money to pay their fare to London. As a result, only five members of the Assembly were able to meet in London, and they were able to transact very little business. Shoghi Effendi said that if those men had used that money to pay their fares to London, instead of sending it to the school, they might have accomplished something of very far-reaching value. They might have planned a teaching campaign, for instance, that would have eventually brought in for the work of the Cause five or ten times as much money as they had contributed. Shoghi Effendi looks much farther ahead than most of the rest of us do. He sees the end we wish to attain, and he thinks clearly far ahead as to the best way to attain that end. He does not act on impulse, or through emotion, but he does the thing that will contribute to the progress of the Cause, in the widest sense. I thought of the same trait in connection with his plans for the gardens about the Tomb. He had evidently visualized the whole plan when it shall be completed — wide stretches of lawn here, borders of crimson flowers there, oranges and pomegranates gleaming amid the green of the trees, roses and jasmine covering the white iron fences, which now seem very bare and austere. All this he sees as it will be when it is completed, and directs the work step by step, that this ultimate ideal may be attained.

He spoke repeatedly of the beauty of the clear, fresh green of the young grass. Then he said, “The Master loved out-of-doors, and green grass and plants and trees. I remember how he used to love spring at Bahjí. The garden was not very well kept at that time, but he used to speak repeatedly about how he delighted in the green plants and trees.”

I noticed particularly Shoghi Effendi’s habitual consideration for people’s comfort. Two or three times he asked whether the walk up the mountain and about the gardens was tiring me. Two or three times he said “Take care. Don’t go too near the edge of that well. It is six meters deep!” He asked about the health of one man whom we met outside of the Persian Pilgrim House, and arranged that tomorrow he should go to the hospital to see the doctor. Then he said, “Afterwards come and tell me what he said. If he says you should not work for some days, tell me, and I will arrange to have your work done by someone else.”

I think it is impossible for us to realize how great a responsibility is placed on Shoghi Effendi. He seems to speak very freely of the problems and difficulties that confront him. He spoke of how much of his time must be given to reading all the letters that come for him. Then he said, “I really have to write a short message to each Bahá’í who writes to me. My assistants can write a full answer to the letter, but then I must write a few sentences myself. Otherwise the Friends will not be satisfied. I must look after all the activities here in Haifa, and see that everything is well done. Then I have to consider the affairs of the Cause all over the world. There is so much work that I cannot delegate to others because I must do it; and other work that there is no one who is now capable of having it delegated to him. It is difficult to find time for all these things. But I hope that with time and more experience I shall learn how to accomplish more.” I do not know what more effective spur one can have to activity in the Cause than to see the life of Shoghi Effendi and to hear him talk of his work. In a way, it is to me more of a spur than the life of the Master.

We thought of him on a plane so far above us, he had had so much experience — that it was easy to think that we could not even strive toward an ideal so high. Shoghi Effendi’s youth seems to bring him nearer to us. Of course he has a capacity and a source of inspiration that is beyond ours. But somehow he makes me feel tremendously that effort and accomplishments are possible, and that his own work with us makes us co-partners in a great endeavor. Of course one is always conscious of his utter devotion to the Master, of his own absolute obedience.

At the Master’s gateway, he said goodnight to me, and “I will see you tomorrow.” Then I walked up and down in the darkness a little while, and then went in to see the ladies, whom I had sacredly seen. Munírih Khánum talked to me for quite a long time, asking me to tell her what Shoghi Effendi had said to me. She said, “Did he say that he would go to America!” I said, “No, he didn’t. But of course all the American friends are longing to have him come.” “Yes, certainly, they want to see him,” she replied. Then we talked about the invention of writing, and of printing, of the early picture-writing, and of the tremendous advance made when men had a correct, easily understood method of writing. After a time I said, “You must be tired of talking now.” And she said, “No, I never get tired of talking when people talk about something that is useful. They do not need to talk always about the Cause. I like to talk about history, and about other things that are really useful. But when people talk only about what food they ate, what clothes they wore, and where they went, then I get tired very quickly.”

Everyone here rejoices in the happiness of a person who has had a talk with Shoghi Effendi. Mírzá Hádí came in, and said, “I think you are happy tonight, because Shoghi Effendi took you up to the Tomb with him.”

At dinner ‘Azíz’u’lláh Khán said, “You had a good afternoon, did you not? You went for a walk with Shoghi Effendi.” I begged Ridvânia Khánum to excuse me because I had not kept my engagement to have tea with her, and she said, “Of course. I understand, when Shoghi Effendi wants one that always comes first.”

The kindness and the sweetness of the ladies is impossible to describe. They are so good to me, that I could easily feel only my unworthiness of their kindness. But I realize how wasteful that would be! I understand a little of Christ’s story of the man who should forgive much, because much had been forgiven him — and of the command to forgive “until seventy times seven.” All the love people give me I deserve so little, that from it I learn a little of how much love I must give to others, even though it is difficult for me to see their good points. Certainly these ten days here in Haifa have put meaning into parts of the Bahá’í teaching that had meant little to me before. Especially the Prayer of Visitation for the Master’s Tomb has come to mean something it never meant before. My need of the mercy of “Thy Eternity” My love for the people here, which gives me a little understanding of the sentence, “Make me as dust in the path of the beloved.”

Now something about Western Pilgrim House

The building of this House was started by Charles Randall. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá warned him to give more care to his business affairs, but he did not heed. And so he was unable to finish the building. Time passed and then one day Milly Collins and her husband came to Haifa. Mr. Collins was a millionaire; he liked to travel by freighter, instead of steamer and at that time it was fashionable to take the trip down the Nile. So by steamer they went to Egypt and took the trip down the Nile; then to please Milly, they went to Haifa.

When they arrived he said “We will register at this hotel and then go up and leave our cards.” But it didn’t work out that way, because the Holy Family was watching and nothing would do but they must come in, So Mr. Collins met the Beloved Guardian. And that brusque business man liked him — he liked the Guardian.

Later on he asked Milli about that unfinished house and he felt that was not right for the Guardian; so he gave the money to finish building western Pilgrim House. But as he was not a Bahá’í he gave it to Milly and she gave it. He gave her a home up in New England; and the National got short of money; Milly sold it and gave the money to the Faith. And Mr. Collins never asked a question. Never mentioned a word about it. When he died, he left his entire fortune to Milly, knowing she would all give it to the Faith. He was proud of Milly. Proud because she had courage to something different.

The house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is diagonally across from the Western Pilgrim House, No.7 Persian St. and has orange trees in the grounds behind it. There was an olive grove near the Pilgrim House. There were beautiful flowering trees such as you find in semi-tropical climate

You step from the porch, as I remember, right into the large room; its long, not square, to the left end was the living quarters of Mr. and Mrs. Ioas. It was probably a sleeping and sitting room combined; he had a small receptions room; there was a desk; and a stove he had just bought from the United States. You see there was no such thing as central heating. They told us — Rúḥíyyih Khánum and Jessie and Ethel Revell, how they suffered for lack of heat when they first gent there, but they had become quite used to it.

Going to the left there was another room used I think a business office but also a bedroom; then, Jessie's room; then the two large doors; and the room occupied by Laura and me was next. Then you looked to your right and another large room at the end of the beautiful central room; d a large glass window and window seats; there was a stove and a large, round table in the center and it was there that the pilgrims gathered and waited for the call to go down to dinner with the Beloved Guardian. On that side was a bathroom, the descending stairs; some planks on some steps, the room it led to was used at that time as a store room. The large central room that you entered from the porch was beautifully furnished; there were pillars and an alcove.

The dining room, also, was like it; not square but long; there was a long table, with a beautiful linen cloth, exquisite china and silver. (Rúḥíyyih Ehanum told us there we many sets of dishes; the Holy Family, her mother's, Mrs. Ioas and more)

The guests at that time were Dr. and Mrs. Giachery, Mr. and Mrs. John Allen from Africa, M r. Allen brought the Guardian an automobile and he was running Mr. Ioas around to get things done. But the Guardian stopped that. He said Mr. Allen was not getting the spiritual value of his pilgrimage.

The Return to Meshed

In my account of the first three years of my Persian pilgrimage, I told in considerable detail the story of my experiences. I did this so that the purpose of the pilgrimage, and my way of working to achieve that purpose, might become clear. But since the pilgrimage was a long one, it will not be possible to recount so fully the events that occurred in the decades that followed. Also, from 1925 I was the member of a family, and my wife and children were fellow pilgrims with me. I would like to include their stories with mine. But if I did so, my book would become too large. I will therefore refrain from including much interesting material which I hope my children will one day record. I will have to risk the criticism of being egocentric by confining my story chiefly to what God did to me and through me in Persia. Now for the story of our journey back to Meshed. On January 3, 1925, two years after leaving Meshed, I sailed from New York with my wife and three children on the big ship Aquitania for England. In London the hotel rooms were very cold, and there was a terrible black fog that penetrated the hotel dining room, so that one could not see people on the other side of the room. I was glad to meet the head of the Scripture Gift Mission, who was a friend of the Haines family. During all the years that followed, this fine agency sup..

..rusalem, which may have been the one from which our Lord rose triumphant on the third day. As we drove northward in a car, we stopped to see the well where, it is thought, Jesus talked with the woman of Samaria and gave her the water of life. Then, after passing through Nazareth and climbing to the top of the hill from which the angry people wanted to cast Jesus, we came to the Sea of Galilee. There we spent a beautiful and restful Sabbath. It was the best day of our trip. There we could almost see Jesus Christ walking by the shore and calling the fisher-men to rise up and follow him. We proceeded to Haifa, climbed up on Mt. Carmel, and looked out to the west at the beautiful blue Mediterranean Sea, as Elijah had done many centuries ago when he prayed for rain. I did not stop to see the Bahá'ís, as I had done two years before. After a night in Haifa, we drove through the orange groves and gardens of Tyre and Sidon and arrived in Beirut in Lebanon. In Beirut we made arrangements with a man who was to take two new Studebaker cars to Baghdád to sell to travel in his cars. So At we went in his fine car, climbing up from Beirut over the high Lebanon mountains, then across a wide valley and again climbing over the Anti-Lebanon range, and down into Damascus where we spent the night. We were able to see some of the sights of this ancient and once beautiful city. Early next morning we were off for Baghdád. At that time no proper road had been laid out across the hundreds of miles of desert country that separated Damascus from the Euphrates River and Baghdád in 'Iráq. But there was a rough trail, and the owner of the cars decided to follow it. All that day we rode and bounced along through a region in which there was no sign of life anywhere. It was Al bare desert, and the ground was hard. Toward evening, very black clouds gathered in the sky, and the driver feared that if the rain fell on us, the desert would become a sea of mud, and we might get stuck in it for days. And so he drove on through the night. We stopped only to repair a punctured tire..

Conversations with Shoghi Effendi

May Maxwell

You will like to {{p1}} hear something of the daily life and more intimate impressions of our beloved Guardian from those who have had the privilege and blessing of being near him for many months.

Shoghi Effendi does not wish us in any way to dwell on his personality, but to turn our heart's love and longing, as he does, to the Infinite Sun of Truth, to the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu 'l-Bahá, and through adoration of that Divine Beloved to attain perfect love for one another, because this is the sign of real faith and sincere devotion.

Every form of separation or division, of classifying ourselves or one another, of having a group consciousness, or of thinking of the Bahá'ís in terms of duality, is a reflection of the material world of today, and not of that realm of truth and oneness which the Bahá'ís are destined by God to reflect and manifest.

He says we must entirely banish from our thoughts all such limited concepts and realize that absolute oneness is the Bahá'í consciousness. It is not necessary that all Bahá'ís should think and feel exactly alike, but that all should unite in obeying the divine instructions, and in active co-operative service to the Cause of God.

We must never speak or think for a moment of these limited ideas, but create in ourselves and in each other a oneness and solidarity of thought and action, which shall constitute a mighty spiritual power subduing unto itself all the limited, narrow and negative concepts and conditions of the world.

It is this Bahá'í attitude, this closely knit and united Bahá'í body in America, rather than any organized plan of action which will profoundly affect the people and constitute a magnet drawing to itself all those who are seeking spiritual happiness and tranquility for themselves and for mankind.

Thus the standard of life and conduct of Shoghi Effendi for the believers is very high, and his family told us that he is not satisfied with anything short of perfection. {{p2}}

He wants the Bahá'ís to so live amongst themselves and in their communities that they will show forth the light of Bahá to the world.

Rúhí Khánúm told me the following significant words spoken by the beloved Master to His Family. He said in substance as follows: "I am a loving and indulgent Father to all. I am very kind. You know only my love, my mercy, my forgiveness, my leniency, but it will not be always so. The time will come when I shall not be here to pour this love so freely, because you must be trained and disciplined and become obedient and attain to the divine standard."

The sweetness of the Master's love on which He nurtured us for years would have been sufficient and would have created in us an entirely new life and condition had we been more pure and selfless, had our capacity for this celestial food been greater.

But certain spiritual sickness and weakness crept in among us for which the remedy lies in the hands of our Guardian.

One day he said: "I know it is difficult to reconcile the teachings and instructions of the Master."

"In one case He exhorts us to be brave and courageous and on the other hand to be prudent."

"He commands us to exercise justice, on the other hand to be merciful. He wishes us to be frank and direct, at the same time to be discreet."

"How can we reconcile these things?"

"It is very difficult, I realize that it is difficult, but as the believers grow in spiritual strength and maturity they will find the perfect balance of truth and justice, they will attain to wisdom."

Shoghi Effendi discusses the affairs and conditions of the Cause with astonishing openness and frankness, he does not like secrecy and told us many times that this openness, frankness and truthfulness among the friends constitutes one of the great remedies for many of our difficulties, and he sets us the example of free and open consultation.

With a modesty and simplicity which one must see in order to appreciate, because it is foreign to our American temperament, he invites suggestion and consultation from the visiting friends and from those around him. {{p3}}

He listens to every suggestion with the utmost courtesy and seriousness and then brings to bear upon it the light of his wonderful lucid mind, his clear all-comprehensive thought, his powerful and penetrative judgment.

The spirit of criticism is abhorrent to Shoghi Effendi, he will not permit a breath of criticism of one believer of another and although he wants to hear the truth of every matter this must be based on sincerity of purpose. He instantly detects the least insincerity of motive or effort to influence him in any way.

He is never influenced or swayed in the divine authority with which God has vested him, but exercises a perfect protection and tender guardianship over every soul.

In speaking of a certain matter which was troubling him at the time he said, “You see I wish to know the motive behind these actions,” and then with his beautiful young face full of laughter, “I do not like to be put off and put off and have the matter delayed and when they are dealing with an impatient person like myself it becomes very difficult.”

He laughs at his own impatience for action, for the growth of the Cause, for the deep results of real unity and one of the highest terms of praise from his lips is — “He is active” — or — “She is an active Bahá’í.”

One day in discussing the question of submission to the authority of the Spiritual Assemblies Shoghi Effendi said: “The Master has not left any latitude for personal opinion, it is not a matter of reason, it is a matter of faith.

“Some of the instructions and commands may seem unreasonable, but if we believe we have faith in them and the sign of faith is obedience. The whole question resolves itself into a matter of faith and obedience is the proof of faith, it is the result of faith, if we do not obey it is because we have not faith in the commands of the Master.”

“I cannot see it in any other way.”

“When a certain believer was here the question was put to the Master very plainly; supposing that in a Convention the {{p4}} will of the majority, the decision of the majority is against my individual conscience, suppose that my conscience cannot agree with their decision, must I submit my conscience to the will of the majority?"

"The Master answered that the individual conscience must yield to the majority. He left no room for doubt on this point. He not only gave the command, but He explained the reason for it. He said that if each one followed his own conscience there would be no result, confusion would reign as no two consciences agree, therefore we must follow the will of the majority."

"At the present time this institution, this organization is absolutely necessary, it may not always be so but now it is necessary, and all must follow it without any exception."

It is a Divine Organization, the Institute of God for the establishment of His Kingdom upon earth. Shoghi Effendi said that this Institute is perfect, although its functioning and operation is necessarily imperfect in our present state of development and understanding, but as the Bahá'ís become matured and perfected, it will be found to be the most perfect Institute the world has ever known.

The energy of our Guardian is inexhaustible, and as he retires at one or two o'clock in the morning, his working day is very long.

His strength and vigour never flag, the stress of work, the magnitude of the complex problems pouring in daily in voluminous mail from every corner of the earth seem to serve to renew his forces, the progress of the Cause is reflected in his joy, his buoyancy, his eager enthusiasm and absorbed interest.

But when the welfare or progress of the Cause is menaced through the lack of love and harmony among the believers in any part of the world, when this sad news reaches him, his divine happiness suffers eclipse, his strength ebbs away.

On another occasion Shoghi Effendi said in substance that he had written explicitly to America saying that the work of teaching was first in importance and overshadowed everything else, even the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. {{p5}}

That as we teach and spread the Cause and many new souls arise they will help in this important work.

He said that the believers should grasp the essential and important things at this time and not diffuse their energies in many directions. He dwelt on the necessity of teaching and maintaining a strong teaching fund, the contributions to which must be entirely free and voluntary.

I then told him that some of the friends felt that sending out teachers and paying their expenses was not desirable, tending to affect the dignity of the Cause in the eyes of the world and creating what in time must appear as a priestly order.

In stating this I quoted the exact words of some of the friends in America. Shoghi Effendi said that there were three elements which constitute a priestly or paid order of teachers and that by entirely eliminating these three elements the Bahá'í contributions for the expenses of traveling teachers bore no resemblance whatever to a priestly order. These three elements are:

I. Obligatory contributions II. Contributions made at regular intervals III. Contributions made for a definite person

If a certain amount is given at a certain definite time for the expense of a definite person, this is a priestly order, but if free and voluntary contribution are forwarded to the National Spiritual Assembly or to the teaching committee to advance the work of teaching and of sending out teachers into the field, that this is active co-operation in the Cause of God. "How else", he said, "is the work of teaching to be carried on? If the friends do not do this the Cause of God will suffer. How do you suppose", he continued, "that Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá carried on the vast work for years? Was it not through the active support and co-operation of all the friends in the East? " Then I said that some of the friends felt that the teachers who go out in the field should be self-supporting, using Martha Foot as a shining example of this principle, who is able by her pen and other means to support herself in her far-reaching travels in the Cause of God. {{p6}}

He said this was very good wherever a person combined the qualifications of a teacher with means or ability to be self-supporting, this was very acceptable.

But he said, "Suppose some one is a good teacher who has a wife and family to support, or who is free to travel but has neither the means nor the ability to support himself, should we refuse him and say, 'No, we do not want you.' We must avail ourselves of every means to spread the Teachings, otherwise the Cause of God will suffer. Some teachers are very frugal, others are less so, some have the strength and ability to support themselves while traveling, others have not. We must believe them when they say they have not, we must trust them. Everything depends on this trust in one another. The friends must trust the National Spiritual Assembly with their problems and with their money. As this trust in one another grows and deepens the Cause of God will grow stronger. The friends in the East have great trust and confidence. I hope that the friends in America will attain this same trust.

With his dazzling smile He left us, saying: "I am very busy. My time is full. Now I must go with Mírzá 'Azíz'u'lláh Khán and go through some writings and papers. At three o'clock Miss L (an American pilgrim) is coming to see me. She is leaving tomorrow and I want to talk with her. Then Mons. R (a pilgrim from India) is coming. Then I have to go over the manuscript of Mírzá Maḥmúd, an important book he is writing on the Cause. Afterwards I go to the Shrine on Mount Carmel to oversee the excavating, the garden and the new pump which is sending water to the upper level. I will attend the men's meeting tonight and before retiring go through all my mail."

If I could only convey to you the spirit of his words, how vividly he pictures the true Cause of God on earth, the association, solidarity, co-operation and mutual support of all the friends!

Shoghi Effendi says that the burning question before us is the means of spreading the Cause and the most perfect and wise way to present the Message to the people.

Mankind in general is ready and eager for the divine teachings and the principles of Bahá'u'lláh meet with universal response and supply a universal necessity.

But this is not sufficient. {{p7}}

The high standard of Shoghi Effendi is not satisfied with this wide-spread attraction and sincere admiration. He says, "We must make real Bahá'ís, those who will become active supporters and ardent adherents to the Cause of God."

Then he said: "There are certain things one must accept in order to be a Bahá'í; a faith and belief in the Manifestation of God, in the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. People will say this is dogma; certainly this is dogma, we must not be afraid of dogma, which is a statement of certain unchangeable truths.

"The Principles of the religion of Bahá'u'lláh which are being spread in the world today, are only a part of the Bahá'í religion. To believe in these principles, and to teach these Principles, is not sufficient. It is necessary to teach these Principles of Bahá'u'lláh, because through them the world will become awakened and true civilization will become established, but it is only through the belief in the Manifestation of God Himself, through the recognition and adoration of the Source of the Light, that the world will become regenerated."

The working of this mysterious power is not seen at once, its signs steal over the earth like the finger of dawn setting all things in unconscious motion, and in the vast outer changes, the crumbling away of old social systems, the breaking of political crystalizations, the growth and expansion of a new born consciousness in mankind sweeping away barriers and limitations of the past, seeking new, wider and deeper forms of expression, — these are among its visible signs.

As I write one of the last incidents come to mind: I was in the home of the Blessed Master that home of perfect divine love, and had been with the dear members of His Family when Shoghi Effendi entered.

He said to me: "You are most fortunate to be so near the Greatest Holy Leaf, bodily close to her. I hope that you will be able to receive something of her spirit to take to the friends in America. Her spirit is the remedy for all their troubles." {{p8}}

---

Again we are at Bahjí — the strip of intense blue sea, the distant lapping of the waves, the sunlit olive orchard and that all-surrounding peace and stillness broken only by the occasional soft note of a bird, and into this outer chalice of nature pours continually the emanations of the Shrine, a subtle, divine afflatus, permeating earth and air and sky, so that one feels that here and on Mount Carmel alone, earth is connected with heaven.

On this holy mountain the soul frees itself from earthly entanglement and the cloudy mortal atmosphere is dispelled in the beaming rays of light and truth.

Such divine thoughts and feelings are engendered in the human heart near these Holy Shrines as cannot find their true expression in words, but must be translated into the beauty of character and into a life wholly dedicated at the altar of God.

In closing I want to say to all my loved brothers and sisters that Shoghi Effendi's hopes and wishes for us, his explicit instructions are contained in his Epistles to America, but that in sharing with you these notes and impressions — alas! so inadequate — it is my hope to bring us all nearer to that glorious life of servitude and sacrifice, to the beloved Guardian of the Cause of God, the visible Sign of our invisible Lord.

In 1924 and 1925 Fred made return visits to Haifa to meet Shoghi Effendi, with whom he developed a close relationship. After their first meeting, Shoghi Effendi referred to him as “My beloved Fred, that living torch, lit by the spirit of our departed Master [‘Abdu’l-Bahá]” and as a “zealous and promising disciple of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”<sup>4</sup> Shoghi Effendi readily recognized Schopflocher’s “clear understanding of, and entire devotion to, the interests” of the Bahá’í Faith,<sup>5</sup> and Schopflocher gained a devotion to Shoghi Effendi that was “immediate and lasting.”

Pilgrim Notes

Corinne True

Mrs. True having just returned from Haifa, related some of her experiences and talks with Shoghi Effendi.

Shoghi Effendi told me I could stay as long as I wished and by having a long time we could take it easy and when convenient for him to talk about things we could take a walk to the sea, or go to the Shrine, and. I gained a great deal more that way than to go for only a week or so and feel I must rush. There is so much to be absorbed and to talk about. Shoghi Effendi is very well.

The first pilgrims from Australia and New Zealand came while I was there. Martha Root is being sent to Europe, to Geneva, by Shoghi, will be located at Geneva for the summer where there will be many congresses. Shoghi Effendi says the work in Europe is very is very necessary just now.

All the big tourist ships now stop at Haifa making it their chief port, so that there are thousands of American tourists who land at Haifa, Gook has an agency in Haifa and his man asked Shoghi Effendi if he could have the privilege of Showing the Shrine to the tourists and this was granted, and this may be an avenue. There is a drive around the city and they always take them around the Shrine and gardens, and the people from the town come there on Sunday afternoons. 500 people visited the Shrine One Sunday, they do not enter, only on special request. Such changes are going on. Haifa does not know itself. Shoghi says that through the Zionists Haifa will be very wonderful. He is very much in favor of the Zionist work in Palestine a brilliant pearl. One reason is this. It has been a Muhammadan country and Syria the same way but through the coming of the Jews they, with the Christians, are in the majority and then progressive movements will be produced and Palestine will go far ahead of Iyrist because it has a Muhammadan majority.

In speaking of the work. Mr. Mills had done at Baghdád in connection with the houses there, Mrs. True said he had wonderful letters of introduction to many people and it was surprising to them that a man like Mr. Mills was interested in the movement and it opened their eyes to the fact that the people of the lost were really taking such an interest in the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh and Mr. Mills did great good in meeting these prominent officials.

Shoghi Effendi is very busy. The greatest Holy Leaf built him a lit apartment on the Master's house, an office, bedroom and bath. He has maps of different countries, marked with red ink and dots for every city where there are Bahá'ís. You can see right away in what part of the country the work is being done. Germany and Australia are doing more for the Cause, it is spreading fast in these two countries, more so than in any other country. Shoghi would be very happy when we as get matters established and relieve him of a great deal of work that should be taken care of by the different assemblies. He has a tremendous correspondence. He dictates letters and then adds a few words by hand. His sense of justice is wonderful. Today is the day for Rouse of Justice. Justice is a marvellous characteristic he has. He feels he cannot write to anyone for justice demands then that he write to all.

Shoghi Effendi talked a great deal to us about teaching by living the Bahá'í life. Each one of the great Manifestations of God have brought a springtime in the spiritual world when they came and there are certain things they bring and teach us by living which have not been given before, and it is very essential that the Bahá'ís live the life that Bahá'u'lláh has taught and 'Abdu'l-Bahá has explained, and then the deeds that would follow a life according to their teachings would be like new fresh flowers, not like last year's flowers but would have a newness and a fragrance, and an attractiveness of the new spirit then we would attract more people to the Cause, because they leek new spring flowers and come and ask for them and in that way we could quicken the whole earth. Shoghi Effendi said it would be advisable for any soul who felt Gilled, upon to do so to arise and go forth and teach and he wished the friends could fulfill the Divine Plan and follow those teachings. Go forth and spread the teachings as broadly as possible.

They are expecting to elect a National Spiritual Assembly in Egypt an April 21st that was before Mrs. True left.

One thing Shoghi said about organization was, to go ahead and get your organization created and when you have created do not forget the object of that organization. There might be a little tendency to give too much time to perfecting the organization and forgetting the object behind it which is to spread the Cause. Es laid great stress on the point of being sure that the organization performed its function. Through these committees Shoghi himself will be able to promulgate the Cause. Ever have before your mind – how are we going to further the Cause. Have frequent meetings and make business if you have no business. The less often you meet the less business you have but do not forget what the organization was created for primarily. We are not trying to establish a perfect organization in the world but are establishing an organization to promulgate the Cause. We need machinery but not machinery without a soul.

Shoghi spoke of how we should name spiritual assemblies. On letterheads, speaking of National Assemblies, they should be called. NATIONAL SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY, in large letters, and in small letters, of the Bahá'ís of the United States, etc. Local – THE SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY in large letters, of the Bahá'ís of New York, in small letters. The spiritual assembly in any city means the nine elected members for that city.

Shoghi does not change anything of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's. The master made two kinds of statements in his Tablets, one was for temporary expediency and the other permanent. Where it was temporary, when the time came to change that, Shoghi has the privilege to make that change. In Persia he found two or three Tablets about electing committees that were different. He found these differences and is making a uniformity and has sent instructions to elect committees once a year. He changes those that are temporary according to the expediency of the time and its requirements but those that are permanent – nothing on the face of the earth could change these things.

Shoghi says the Bahá'í is a person who is attracted to the principles of the Cause but a believer is one not only attracted to the principles but knows the station of the station of the founders and source of these teachings and who turns to the source for his strength and is detached from the world attracted from the world to the Cause. Try from among those who are attracted to make more believers for the work of promulgating the Cause falls on the believers. They are the ones who are spreading this Osage. It is necessary to make believers for the Cause will never be establish ea if we make only Bahá'ís. It is necessary to male believers of those pure souls who are attracted and who will give all their time to the Cause and then the Cause will rest on the shoulders of those people. If they are only attracted they will not serve or put their hands in their pockets and the Cause will never become an established Cause. Shoghi Effendi wants all the spiritual assemblies all over the country to get very closely united with each other and exchange speakers and visitors and get closer to each other.

Took up point with Shoghi, what Aḥmad we do if the members of our local assembly cannot act. He said it might be very good idea to elect a few extra members and only all on them at specific times but each assembly could decide that for itself.

Shoghi is not pleased because the Temple work has been neglected. We must not push the Temple work now as it would out off the channel of promulgation of the Cause. We must build up the body of the Cause and must make some believers and that will build the Temple. One reason he is stressing teaching is that the, Temple is a wonderful instrument for attracting and after you have attracted them they must be instructed in the teachings. The Temple must not be neglected. He wants a complete statement of exactly how things are and any indebtedness. Wants everything cleaned off and then he will tell them what to do.

Shoghi also says we have now the right to ask for reduction in travelling expenses of teachers on railroads and the N.S.A. should take ogee of this.

We had a visit with the Greatest Holy Leaf, she gave us each a. ring and said she did not think she was going to be with us very much longer and that if God allowed her to attain the Kingdom – she hoped and prayed she would succeed in obtaining the Kingdom, she wanted. God to allow her to be an emisary to Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá to tell them of the faithfulness of the friends after the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

At the 19-Day meeting April 28th, Mrs. True spoke at the Library and while some of the foregoing was repeated the following inspiring messages were given us.

Loving greetings from Shoghi Effendi and the holy Family. I received so much in this visit. Shoghi gave me things that satisfied my heart so that now I can work with understanding. He says we must get under-standing and be happy and joyous in our work and unless we know what we are doing we cannot be happy and joyous in this work.

He talked at the necessity of living the Bahá'í life according to the Bahá'u'lláh. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says there was many a spiritually minded woman when Christ came to this world who did not know the Mouth-piece of God so that she failed to attain, she was living the law of Moses.

So today, we have gone into still another and higher degree. Bahá'u'lláh has brought this wonderful new message, such a message as the world has never seen. We must live the life of the Bahá'í teachings. This message has come to the world and it has a mighty potentiality and the only way we can know what that potentiality is, is by the way those who come under these teachings bring auto action those great teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. We must do something to prove to the world that it is a new springtime. Unless the trees do some sprouting, or you find violets you would not know that it is a new springtime, so unless the Bahá'ís show such qualities the people would not know that a new springtime has come into the err spiritual world. If we want to attract hearts to our Manifestation, the one of our day, we have to prove At through the teachings emanating from our teacher, we have to prove the teachings of this day. We want new, fresh, fragrant, spring flowers of our day.

After talking about the individual lives of our teachers, he talked about our teaching work. It is not enough to broadcast this message and simply proclaim the principles because the majority of the people Will agree with you on them, but every place you go, when you have given them the principles, train them and turn them to the founder of the movement and teach them to tarn to the founder as their Isar*e of inspiration.

Again referring to that Shoghi said about Bahá'ís, that a Bahá'í is a person attracted to the principles of the Cause but a believer is one Who is not only attracted to the principles put knows the station and foamier and the source of these teachings and turns to the source for his strength, Shoghi said, try from among those who are Bahá'ís to make some believers for the work of promulgating the Cause falls upon the believers, An effort must be made to train as many souls as possible to become real Bahá'ís so they will arise and give all their energy and time to the Cause. More work should be done for this than to spread the Owls.

Shoghi wants us to demonstrate to the world that we have something the world has not. We must prove to them that there is some reason why 'hey should seek this movement in preference to others. Then you will find it will become a magnet.

Shoghi's wisdom and justice are wonderful. He will not do a thing that violates justice. There is a tie between Shoghi and the Greatest Holy Leaf that we on our plane cannot understand. They belong to a higher plane and they have a communion which we cannot understand which is most beautiful, to see. She is very feeble and said she did not think she would be with us much longer.

Dear Friends and Co-workers,

I am again late in writing my letter, but as you know I try to do the most important things first, and I had quite a number to do the last week.

Yesterday, we had a young American lady and her mother to dine with us. She has been sent by the St. Stephen College, Missouri, to investigate the various Religious Movements in the East, as she came to see Shoghi Effendi. She was a very nice girl and showed that she was very spiritual as well as intellectual, and it was very interesting to hear her speak on the new broad methods they are trying out in their college. They have been observing the students to ascertain whether they have been observing trend or whether they are void of it, and they find that they are really spiritually inclined, but this is the time when Religion must go hand in hand with Science. They have been working along the lines of a broad and sane interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount, and their endeavour has been to try and give a reality or life to each student & faith, thus they try and urge a student to go back to his community and put vitality into it. They certainly have received the rays of the Sun of Truth, not knowing from whence they come. Probably after her interview with Shoghi Effendi this morning, she may be able to recognize the source.

Rúhí Effendi and I represented the Bahá'í Community at the Service held at the little War Cemetery here to commemorate Justice Day, and on behalf of Shoghi Effendi placed a wreath on the Cenotaph, also a wreath of Gum leaves for the 28 Australian and the one New Zealander who lie there.

Mrs. Hoagg leaves for Italy on Saturday morning. We shall miss her very much.

Shoghi Effendi received a copy of the "Herald of the South" this week, and he was very pleased with it, and urges its Editor to try and develop and expand its scope. He was pleased to see that the friends in Australia and New Zealand are corresponding with other countries.

Today, we celebrate, according to Muḥammadan call, the declaration of the Báb and the birthday of the Master. We will visit the Holy Tomb this afternoon. Shoghi Effendi went and spent the night with Bahjí. I wish to ask the friends if they send any papers to Shoghi Effendi, to please mark the article they think he would like to see and if possible underline the paragraph that has any bearing on the Movement etc. He spends so much of his valuable time searching over papers to see what the friends have sent them for. You have no idea what a stupendous task it is to cope with his mail. Personally I think it is better not to forward papers unless they have something vital pertaining to the Cause.

Shoghi Effendi was pleased to the reference to the Persecution in Persia written by Mr. Brewer and also the article (I think Mrs. Blundell sent me the paper containing it) in the Auckland paper which gave Martha Root's account. He has forwarded the reports to the Ṭihrán Assembly.

I trust that you are all keeping together in a united little band and doing your utmost to assimilate and put into practice these teachings which are certainly the solvent for today's problem.

As yet we had no rain, and it is badly needed now. The Gardens at the Holy Tomb are getting more beautiful everyday and should in a short time be full of bloom.

Shoghi Effendi and the Holy Family desire me to send you their love and Greetings in which I heartily join.

In His Name.

Your loving Sister and Co-worker.

Part Three

William Sears

April 1-11, 1954

The Pilgrims House,

HAIFA, PALESTINE

29th March, 1925.

To Melbourne, Adelaide & Perth Assemblies,

also Tasmania and Sydney.

To my dear Co-workers and Friends,

We have been in Haifa just a little over two weeks and the days and nights have been so crowded with wonderful things it has been impossible to find time to write. It is getting quite late now but I must make a beginning as we think our boat leaves next Friday. We will not know until tomorrow whether we can get berths though. We will be very loath to leave. It is heavenly to be among these dear people. One cannot realise what self-sacrifice means until one comes in contact with them. I must start and give you as best I can all that has transpired since I last wrote to you and posted by the "Jervis Bay". I think I wrote to Father and Mother and told them of our trip up the canal etc., so will just continue about landing at Port Sa'id. We reached there at daybreak on Thursday 12th March at 6.30 A. M. Martha came on board. We were surprised to see her. Her boat had been delayed so she waited for two or three days and came to meet us and then travel with us to Haifa. Three Persian Bahá'ís were with her and gave us a warm welcome. It is lovely to see Martha, and she is looking so well. We had breakfast on board and then went ashore. Had to go through the Customs House. After a lot, of wrangling our luggage was put on a conveyance and taken to the hotel where Martha was staying. Here Monaver Khánúm the youngest daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and wife of Mizza Malumed

Yardi came to see us. She is very sweet and gave us such a beautiful welcome. After lunch Monaver and a friend called on us again and some of the Bahá'ís. One Muḥammad Mustapha offered to accompany us as far as Kantara E. (that is the station you change at for Haifa) and see us safely into the train for Haifa. We left P. Said at 0 P. M. and reached Kantara at 6.45 p. a. Here we had to go through the customs and we saw what thought and kindness of heart Mizza Mustapha had. He interpreted for us at the Customs etc. saw all our baggage loaded on the ferry and finally had us at Kantara E., where we had to settle down and wait till midnight for the express to Haifa. He had to leave us at 9.30 P. M. to return at P. Said wanted to stay and see us safely off and then spend the night at the Railway Station and return early in the morning, but of course we would not let him. We had a very good journey and reached Haifa at 10 A. M. Friday 13th. Fugeta met us at the station. He is a bright merry hearted little fellow and gave us a hearty welcome. He certainly is a fine Bahá'í general and soon had his little band of happy pilgrims marshalled and in order. We were installed into carriages and driven to the Pilgrim House in Persian Colony, which is opposite the Masters House. Here we received another warm welcome from an American Bahá'í Mrs. Corinne True. You all would just love her.

Shoghi Effendi sent greetings to us and asked us to come and see him before lunch. We had a wonderful interview. To me it was a wonderful meeting. His step is quick and decisive also his manner of speech, but the sweetness of his countenance and the bright alert expression of his eyes conveys to you a wonderful tenderness of heart which radiates to you such graciousness and simplicity, you feel at once at your ease as if a weight has been removed from your heart and a great peace reigns, you feel a great happiness in his presence. He inquired about you all and Australia and New Zealand. He said the essential point is to speak of and teach the principles but first and most of all live them. After giving principles, give the history of the cause. He promises to visit Australia, I said we would like him to come, and his answer was "Surely I will," After lunch Mrs. True took us for a walk down Carmel Road. The Holy Tombs are right opposite this road on the mount. Every night just as it gets dark a wonderful light (electric) is lighted just above it. Just after Shoghi had it installed some ships were coming into port and they were so confused with this new light looked on their charts and couldn't pick it up. They had the light house on Mt. Carmel and the one at 'Akká but not this one, so they were afraid to come in and stayed out at sea till daylight. They complained about the confusion, but the British Government instead of ordering the light to be removed had it marked on the chart.

Saturday 14th we visited the Holy shrines with Mrs. True. 'Abbás Kuli keeper of the Tombs chanted the prayer of visitation revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It was beautiful. Shoghi Effendi is endeavouring to keep those shrines in the greatest simplicity. Everyone who is visiting saws what wonderful improvements Shoghi has made with the laying out of the gardens. If you could only see the rock lime stone that Mt. Carmel is composed of you will see what a stupendous work has been undertaken. He could only do one side because it was so expensive but four young Bahá'í men offered their services free and are working there excavating the stone and carrying soil. It is a labour of love.

How everyone serves is a lesson to all. They prepare at the Masters house food for eighty or ninety people each day. Each one doing his share with such love and joy. At the Tomb we saw the .ton Cyprus trees under which Bahá'u'lláh pitched his tent and stayed for some time. In the afternoon we visited the ladies of the household. The Greatest Holy Leaf, The Holy Mother and Holy Leaves are charming. So simple and sweet with hearts over flowing with love for you all so eager to hear news of you. To see with what sweetness, and patient submission they have borne all the trials and persecutions heaped upon them and not one trace of embitterment towards those who were the cause of their sufferings is hard to comprehend. The only recompense to them is our faithfulness to the cause so dear to their pure hearts. Let us make fresh efforts to bring the unity and concord and be the cause of comfort and promotion of humanity.

Mr. Mountfort Mills arrived this evening. He had been on a special mission for Shoghi Effendi. He has a charming manner and is so full of fun. It was nice hearing him talk with Mrs. True and Martha.

Sunday 15th went and spent the morning at Rúhá Khánum's home. It is next the Masters house, she gave us a beautiful talk about Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She told us how the Master when war broke out started the cultivation of cereals in a village near the Jordan River where it flowed into sea of Galilee which belonged to him. Grew barley, wheat, lentils, beans etc., so that the poor could be fed. Rúhá's husband went there (Mizza Jelai) also 'Abdu'l-Bahá aid during the hottest months he showed them how to irrigate and cultivate the soil. Spent 3 months there. He had the grain brought to Haifa and distributed to all classes not only Bahá'í. An incident where a woman came to the Masters house in the middle of the night – poor, ill and weak. He arose, had her brought in and attended to, found a woman to look after her and hired a room for her to live in. She lived for three months then passed away peacefully. Told us how a Russian Bahá'í brought furs to make a coat for him but he made 20 caps to keep old folks heads warm. Told us Bahá'u'lláh's wife was only daughter of 2nd vizier of Shaly. She was very wealthy and had a wonderful trousseau. It was sold to buy food for them when they were exiled to Baghdád. Her wedding dress was all embroidered with pure gold thread. She would cut portions of it and sell it to the goldsmith to procure bread. Purest Branch was 2 years old and very ill and she had to leave him with her Mother. He did not join thorn till he was nine years old always very delicate. He used to write tablets as Bahá'u'lláh dictated them when in prison at 'Akká. He went the evening, he met with his accident to Bahá'atllah but Bahá'u'lláh said "I will not meet you tonight." He then went to the roof top to pray and became so absorbed in his devotions that as he was chanting he fell down the opening to the stone floor below (we saw this place when we visited the prison). Bahá'u'lláh and his mother heard the noise and Bahá'u'lláh said "That is my Masdi he has been sacrificed. They went out and he was lying on the floor with his bones broken. They carried him to a room and put him on a couch. Bahá'u'lláh asked him that whatever he desired he would grant but he said, "There is nothing that I desire but that my life may be a sacrifice, so that the doors may be opened to the Friends, and Bahá'u'lláh said it should be as he wished. He died 24 hours afterwards. They had nothing to procure necessities for his funeral except one of their carpets so that was given to one of the soldiers to sell at one of the bazaars. They were not permitted to go to the funeral, four soldiers took the body and it was not till 2 years afterwards that they were allowed to visit his grave outside the city walls of 'Akká.

She told us of the great shock Shoghi Effendi received at the news of the Masters death. Rúhí said about a fortnight before the Masters passing he called Shoghi Effendi's mother and said for her to write and tell him to come home, that she was not to say anything to other members of the family to alarm them. He also told his Father, who said "Perhaps we had better telegraph", but 'Abdu'l Bahá said "No:" Shoghi's mother wrote but the letter did not reach him before the telegram that they sent when 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed. So as not to alarm him they had sent, "Master ill, come home quickly". Shoghi Effendi was in the library at Oxford studying when he was called to receive the telegram. He hastened to the office of major Tudor Pole. He was out but on his table was an open telegram announcing the passing of the Master. When the Major returned he found Shoghi lying unconscious on the floor. It was over a month before he could get his passport and start for the Holy Land.

In the afternoon we visited the Men's Pilgrim House which is situated in Mt. Carmel just near the Holy Shrines. We were invited to take part in a Bahá'í marriage celebration. We were all asked to speak about our different countries and how the work was progressing there. I conveyed your greetings to them all and they sent their love and to you all. You cannot imagine the pleasure and joy they get when news comes from the friends of other countries. Their faces just shine with light and devotion. I shall give you a full description of the wedding when I return it would take a long time to write, but according to Eastern custom the men and women do not meet together so we then went to the home of Abbál Kuli (keeper of the tomb) and visited the women and congratulated the bride, after partaking tea we went with Rúhí and Yaiba Khammi to the Holy Shrines to pray. It is Father's birthday today, so I asked a special blessing on his work.

We had a talk with Mr. Mills and Mrs. True tonight, Monday 16th. Had an interview with Shoghi Effendi. He again emphasised the fact of speaking on the principles whenever opportunity arises and then give short outline of the history. In speaking of the cause our great object and mission is to create harmony and unity. If differences arise we must consult with one another and when decision of a just settlement is arrived at go to the ones with whom it has arisen, and tell them in great kindness and love, advise them of your decision. Do not force or insist but leave it to them to meditate on, and then pray earnestly that they may see things in the right light.

Literature on cause must be distributed in a dignified and tactful manner. Must not be made cheap. Not given out at doors or put on park benches. It is necessary to be careful in giving out propaganda. Tells me not to visit America but to see the friends in London and then return as soon as possible and help Father and Mother Dunn with the work in Australia. His heart is very laid at the progress of cause in Australia. We must make every effort to continue the good work and not let him be discouraged. Where ever we are he says our object is to make a firm believer instead of just interesting a lot of people, it is not sufficient. We must concentrate our efforts to make a firm believer who will be capable of carrying on the work when we are not there. We must strive to study the teachings and to impart truth fluently. And with conviction not superficially. Must devote as much of our time as we can so that we may grasp the inner meaning of the teachings and be able to satisfy without hesitation, and referring to books questions asked. This afternoon we went for a walk with Mrs. True she took us to see an old olive tree planted by the Romans about 2,000 years ago. 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit very often under this tree. Had afternoon tea with Holy Mother and family.

Tuesday 17th. - left for 'Akká at 1.15 A. M. Passed the Keshon River where Elijah slew the priests of Baal 400 in number I think. We visited the house where 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived. It is now a hospital. He was there 4 years and not allowed out of the walls of 'Akká. Then we went to the house where Bahá'u'lláh was for seven years. Then the Most great prison. This is being renovated and the part where Bahá'u'lláh his family and followers were imprisoned is now a hospital for tubercular prisoners. The window of the room where Bahá'u'lláh was, has been enlarged, with a photo of it outside to show you, the difference. We saw where they were put the first night they arrived. Next went to the pilgrim House at Bahjí Bahjí is outside the city walls about hour's walk. The Pilgrim house is the one 'Abdu'l Bahá lived in, his half brother is still in Palace of Bahjí. We visited the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. Had tea then visited shrine again. In the house where Bahá'u'lláh was Imprisoned for 7 years, we saw the room where Kit-bel-ad Kas was written, also the Bath, built in great love for Bahá'u'lláh by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Sleeping at Belijeh Pilgrim house tonight.

Wednesday 13th. - Margaret and I slept in the room at-Pilgrim House where 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed part of the Divine Plan, had breakfast, visited the shrine and we repeated our Prayers in English. We then went to the garden of Rizuan which is about 2 miles from Belyels Palace. It is a beautiful little spot. We lunched under the two huge mulberry trees where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit. Margaret photographed the seats. I took a photo of the carriage (we would call it a waggonette, it holds 9 people), 'Abdu'l Hahn drove in when he was knighted. He drove us to the Ridván in it and to the Station. Schiel who accompanied us (he is 'Abdu'l Bahá's grandson, son of Youba Khánúm and Ghogli's cousin) told us about the Master being knighted. It was not his wish but the British Government wished it so he consented after refusing Once or twice. he has a beautiful carriage someone presented him with, but he didn't wish any fuss so he drove An this waggonette to the governor's residence - didn't go by the main entrance, just entered a little gate at the back. Everyone was waiting for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to drive up in great pomp and ceremony. The walk to the governor's louse was lined with soldiers ready to make the guard of honours, when to everyone's surprise 'Abdu'l Hahn quietly came in at the back and took the seat allotted for him. He graciously received the papers of knighthood etc. then when the ceremony was over just went out the way he came and drove off in the old carriage, we saw the room where Bahá'u'lláh used o stay in the garden of Ridván. They have left it just as it was. We sat in there and felt such a wonderful peace. I prayed for every one of us that we will be firm to the cause and be the means of establishing It In our land. We returned to 'Akká at 4 P. M. caught the train hack to Haifa. Travelling 3rd class deluxe as Fugeta put it. I walked through the streets of Haifa instead of going home in a carriage. They are very quaint.

Thursday 19th. Ronlia Khánum visited us just after breakfast and gave us a beautiful talk on the life of the Master. find there is so much to write to tell you I cannot possibly finish for the mail, so I will try and write you the rest of our visit to date when we are on the boat. We expect to leave Friday 2nd. April. All the holy family and Shoghi Effendi wish me to send their love, in which we all join in His name.

Your co-worker,

EFFIE.

Effie Baker typified the Australian female who sacrificed the path of marriage and family to pursue her love of art and life. She was born 25 March 1880 in Goldsborough near Ballarat, to parents whose immigrant British families had been drawn by the excitement and promise of prospecting on the Victorian gold-fields. Her grandfather, Henry Evans Baker, who had left his native Kent for North America as a young man and met and married a Scottish girl, EuphemiaMcLeash, in New York, captained a sea-collier into Melbourne in 1852 and had been unable to muster a crew with which to depart. Sensing adventure, Baker sold his boat and joined the rush. EuphemiaMcLeash's brother William subsequently joined Baker, and with partners Robert Dodd and Samuel Crozier the four discovered the Bealiba Reef, also known as the Queen's Birthday Reef, and registered their claim on the last day of 1863.

Effie's maternal forbears were also British. Her mother's father, James Cully Smith, arrived in Australia aged eighteen, and married Eliza Ball in Adelaide in 1845. Having for a time worked a bullock team in South Australia James brought his family to Goldsborough, where the Ball's daughter Margaret married John Baker, son of Henry and Euphemia, in December 1879.

Effie, the first of their eleven children, was born the following year. As the family expanded she was sent to live with her grandparents in Ballarat. It was here during the formative years 1886-1890 that grandfather Baker imparted to Effie a life-long fascination with scientific instruments, an aptitude for creativity, and a sense of inquiry. She attended Mount Pleasant State School, Grenville College, Ballarat East Art School, Carew-Smyth's Art School, and finally Beulie College. After receiving a thorough grounding in colour and composition, Effie became increasingly interested in the new science of photography. With a quarter-plate camera given to her by an aunt, she took photos while on holidays in Perth in 1898 and around the Ballarat district in 1899, which she developed, printed, and presented in photo albums as gifts to her parents.

In 1900 Effie moved to Black Rock in Melbourne, to live with Henry Baker's sister Euphemia, a school headmistress, and one of the first women to obtain entrance to the civil service university course in Victoria. Undoubtedly, aunt "Feem"'s independence and success in her career left a lasting impression on Effie. In 1914 Melbourne printers T.H. Hunter published a booklet of seven of her photographs as Wild Flowers of Australia which proved immediately successful and went into second (1917), third (1921), and fourth (1922) printings. The booklet, among the first of its kind in Australia, was bound with green ribbon, and the mounted photographic plates (5&3/4 inches x 4 inches) were interleaved with tissue paper. A Melbourne newspaper said the colours were "faithfully reproduced with exquisite softness through the medium of hand-coloured photographs" and recommended the booklet as an ideal Christmas gift. In addition to this colour photography, Effie sold intricately worked wooden "Australian toys", made doll's houses for charities, and depicted Australian wild-flowers in water-colours. While living at Beaumaris in 1922 Effie and her good friend Ruby Beaver began attending meetings of a "New Civilisation Centre" based on New Thought, a philosophical and mental therapeutics movement that had evolved in North America that was being promoted in Australia by a Californian medical doctor, Dr Julia Seton Seers. Although inspired by Christianity, New Thought was a philosophic rather than a religious movement, the appeal of which lay in its emphasis on the power of constructive thinking, on the imminence of a "new age", and in its free discussion of religious ideas. Effie and Ruby first heard of the Bahá'í Faith at Dr Seer's Centre, and Effie was the second in Australia, after Sydney optometrist Ostwald Whitaker, to become a Bahá'í.

Both had met Hyde and Clara Dunn, an English-Irish couple who had become Bahá'ís in California and had arrived in Australia in 1920 to promote their religion, which had its origins in Nineteenth Century Persia. Effie found Hyde's address to the Melbourne New Thought Centre captivating. He spoke of the need at this time for world unity based on racial equality and inter-religious understanding, and for individuals to investigate religious truth for themselves rather than be led by tradition; and referred to such fundamental teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, founder of the Bahá'í religion, as the equality of the sexes, and the essential complementarity of the great religions. Effie was convinced by the "humble sincerity and faith" with which Hyde spoke, and her acceptance of the Bahá'í Faith rapidly changed the direction of her life's work.

In 1923 she travelled with the Dunns to Tasmania and to Western Australia, and in 1924 visited New Zealand with internationally renowned Bahá'í teacher and Esperantist Martha Root. Effie learnt while in Auckland that four New Zealand Bahá'ís were making a pilgrimage to the Bahá'í holy shrines in Haifa, Palestine, and accepted their invitation to join them. She was suffering lead poisoning as a result of many years of wetting her paint-brush with her tongue rather than in water, and this proposed three-month journey was an opportunity to take a curative sea-voyage, as she had been advised. The pilgrims departed Adelaide in January 1925 and it was eleven years before Effie returned.

When she re-visited Haifa, following pilgrimage and then several weeks holiday in England, Effie accepted the invitation of Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith, to remain there to act as hostess of a newly completed pilgrim hostel for Western Bahá'ís. She had made firm friends with the women in Shoghi Effendi's family and had no major commitments waiting in Australia, and residence in Haifa brought the opportunity for practical service to her Faith (for she did not regard herself as a public speaker like Hyde Dunn, or Martha Root), as well as the opportunity to meet fascinating people from the East and the West.

Within a short period Shoghi Effendi came to appreciate Effie's talents as photographer and model-maker. Her good fortune was to commence residing in Haifa when he was preparing the first Bahá'í Yearbook, a publication chronicling Bahá'í activities world-wide which continues to the present time as the Bahá'í World. Early volumes include numerous of her photographs of the Bahá'í monument gardens on Mt. Carmel, widely regarded as the most beautiful in all Israel. Also, Effie made models of landscapes to assist Shoghi Effendi in his planning of new sections of the gardens.

Her hardest assignment came late in 1930, when Shoghi Effendi was urgently seeking a photographic record of numerous locations associated with the origins of the Bábí and Bahá'í religions. Haste was required to photograph many towns and buildings which were being razed in the Persian government's rapid modernisation program. Furthermore, Shoghi Effendi was nearing completion of his translation of Nabíl's Narrative, an epic account of the religions' origins, and required the photos to accompany the first edition.

At a time when European women could find little protection in the region, Effie travelled by train and car through 'Iráq to Persia, where living conditions swung from the brief luxury of Tīhrán Hotels to bitterly cold night-riding on heavily laden mules across steep and stony terrain. A three month commission extended to eight as she moved between locations, keeping well hidden her No1 A Kodak, and her half plate clamp camera with triple extension, and often herself completely covered in a black "cuddor".

The complete lack of photographic supplies in the country, and her need to check her work before leaving each location, tested Effie's photographic abilities to the full. In the absence of dark-room or running water, she developed film at night, ensuring that she had at least one good print from the snaps of various apertures taken at each site before moving on. She returned to Haifa with above one thousand good prints, some 400 of which have been published.

Effie returned to Goldsborough in February 1936, where she remained until moving to Sydney in 1963. She constantly shared with friends prints of her photos and art-works, although she shied from publicity and from any celebration of her unique life experience and achievements. In the remaining years of her life she enjoyed the love of the growing Australian Bahá'í community, and especially of children who received from her undeserved gifts and tales of adventure. She died in January 1968, her photographic accomplishments little-known beyond her circle of acquaintances. In 1981-82 her work was included in a national exhibition, Australian Women Photographers 1890-1950, and it has since begun to attract wider attention.

Letter No. 1, from Miss Effie S. Baker (“The Toymaker of Australia” while on pilgrimage to Haifa, Palestine to Melbourne Bahá’í Assembly.)

March 29th, 1925

We have been in Haifa just a little over two weeks and the days and nights have been so crowded with wonderful things, it has been impossible to find time to write. It is getting quite late now but I must make a beginning as we think our boat leaves on Friday. We will not know until tomorrow whether we can get berths though. We will be very loathe to leave. It is heavenly to be on those dear people. One cannot realize what self-sacrifice means until one comes in contact with them. I must start and give you as best I can all that has transpired since I last wrote to you and posted by the “Jervic Bay.”

I think I wrote to Father and Mother and told them of our trip up the canal and so will just continue about landing at Port Sa’id. We reached there at daybreak on Thursday 12th March at 8:30 A. M. Martha (Root) came on board. We were surprised to see her. Her boat had been delayed so she waited for two or three days and came to meet us and then travel with us to Haifa. Three Persian Bahá’ís were with her and gave us a warm welcome.

It was lovely to see Martha and she in looking so well. We had breakfast on board and then went ashore. Had to go through the Customs House. After a lot of wrangling our luggage was put on conveyance and taken to the Hotel where Martha was staying Here Monevor Khánum, the youngest daughter of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and wife of Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí came to meet us. She is very sweet and gave us such a beautiful welcome. After lunch Monover Khánum and a friend called on us again and some of the Bahá’ís (also). One Muḥammad Mustapha offered to accompany us as far as Kantara E. (that is the station you change at for Haifa) and see us safely into the train for Haifa.

We left Port Sa’íd at 6 P. M. and reached Kantara at 6.45 P.M. Here we had to go through the Customs and we saw what thought and kindness of heart Mírzá Mustapha had. He interpreted for us at the Customs and saw all our baggage loaded on the fen and finally had us a Kantara E. where we had to settle down anti wait till midnight for the Express to Haifa. He had to leave us at 9:30 P. M. to return to Port Sa’íd. He wanted to stay and see us safely off and then spend the night at the railway station and return early in the morning, but of fours° we would not let him.

We had a very good journey ad reached Haifa at 10 A.M. Friday (March 13th). Fugeta met us at the station. He is a bright, merry hearted little fellow and gave us a heart welcome. He certainly is a good Bahá’í General and soon had his little band of happy pilgrims marshalled and in order. We were installed into carriages and driven to the Pilgrim House in Persian Colony which is opposite the Master’s House. Here we received another warm welcome from an American Bahá’í, Mrs. Corinne True (Chicago). You would all just Love her.

Shoghi Effendi sent greetings to us and asked us to come and see him before lunch. We had a wonderful interview. To me it was a wonderful meeting. His step is quick and decisive also his manner of speech but the sweetness of his countenance and the bright alert expression of his eyes conveys to you a wonderful tenderness of heart Which radiates to you ouch graciousness and simplicity you feel at once at your ease, as if a weight has been removed from your heart and a great peace reigns. You feel a great happiness in his presence. Hs inquired about you all and Australia and New Zealand. He sold the essential point is to speak of and teach the principles but first and most of all live them. After giving principles, give the history of the cause. Ho promises to visit Australia. I said we would like him to cone, and his answer was, “Surely I will.” After lunch, Mrs. True took us for a walk down Carmel Read. The Holy Tombs are right opposite this road on the Mount Every night Just as it gets dark a wonderful light (electric) is lighted just above it.

Just after it was installed, some ships wore coming into port and they wore so confused with his new light. Looked on their chart and couldn’t pick it up. They had the Lighthouse on Mount Carmel and the one at ‘Akká, but not this one, so they were afraid to come in and stayed out at sea till daylight. They complained about the confusion, but the British Government instead of ordering the light to be removed had it marked on the chart.>

Saturday (March) 14th: We visited the. Holy Shrines with Mrs. True. ‘Abbás Kuli keeper of the Tombs, chanted the prayer of Visitation revealed by ‘Abdu’l-

Bahá. It was beautiful. Shoghi Effendi is endeavoring to keep these Shrines in the greatest simplicity. Everyone who is visiting says what wonderful improvements Shoghi Effendi has made with the laying out of the gardens. If you could only see the rock made of limestone that Mount Carmel is composed of, you would see what a stupendous work has been undertaken. He could only do one side because it was so expensive but four young Bahá'í men offered their services free and are working there excavating the stone and carrying soil. It is a labor of love, how everyone serves; all one sees is a lesson to all. They prepare at the Master's House food for eighty and ninety people each day. Each one doing his share with such love and joy.

At the Tomb we saw the tall cypress tree under which Bahá'u'lláh pitched his tent and stayed for some time. In the afternoon we visited the Ladies of the Household.

The Greatest Holy Leaf, the Holy Mother and Holy Leaves are charming. So simple and sweet with hearts overflowing with love for you all, so eager to hear news of you. To see with what sweetness and patient submission they have borne all the trials and persecutions heaped upon them and not one trace of embitterment towards those who were the cause of their sufferings, is hard to comprehend. The only recompense to them in our faithfulness to the Cause so dear to their pure hearts. Let us make fresh efforts to bring the unity and concord and be the cause of comfort and promotion of humanity.

Mr. Mountfort arrived this evening. He had been on a special mission for Shoghi Effendi. He has a charming manner and so full of fun. It was nice hearing him talk with Mrs. True and Martha.

Sunday (March) 15th: Went and spent the evening at Rúhí Khánum's home. It is not the Master's House. She gave us a beautiful talk about Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She told us how the Master when war broke out started the cultivation of cereals in a village near the Jordan River where it flowed into the Sea of Galilee, (This land) belonged to him.

He grew barley, wheat, lentils, beans, etc", so that the poor could be fed. Rúhí Khánum's husband (Mírzá Jala) went there also 'Abdu'l-Bahá and during the hottest months he showed them how to irrigate and cultivate the soil. Spent three months there. He had the grain brought to Haifa and distributed to all classes, not only Bahá'ís. And incident where a woman came to the Master's House in the middle of the night, poor, ill and weak. He arose, had her brought in and attended to, found a woman to look after her, and hired a room for her to live in. She lived three months, then passed away peacefully.

(Rúhí Khánum) told us how a Russian Bahá'í brought furs to make a coat for him ('Abdu'l-Bahá), but he made twenty caps to keep old folks heads warm. Told us Bahá'u'lláh's wife was only daughter of 2nd Vizír of Sháh. She was very wealthy and had a wonderful trousseau. It was sold to buy food for them when they were exiled to Baghdád.. Her wedding dress was all embroidered with pure gold threads. She cut portions of it and sold it to the goldsmiths to procure bread. (Rúhā Khánum told us) Purest Branch was two years old and very ill and she had to leave him with her mother. He did not join them till he was nine years old. He was always very delicate. He used to write tablets as Bahá'u'lláh dictated them, when in prison at 'Akká.

He went the evening he met with his accident to Bahá'u'lláh, but Bahá'u'lláh said, "I will not need you tonight." He then went to tile roof top to pray and became so absorbed in his devotions that as he was chanting he fell down the opening to the stone floor below (we saw the place when we visited the prison). Bahá'u'lláh and his mother heard the noise and said "That is my Masdi; he has been sacrificed."

They went out and he was lying on the floor with his bones broken. They carried him to a room and put him on a couch. Bahá'u'lláh said to him that whatever he desired he would grant, but (the Purest Branch) said, "There is nothing that I desire but that the doors may be opened to the Friends," and Bahá'u'lláh said it should be as he wished. TV died twenty-four hours afterwards. They had nothing to procure necessities for his funeral except one of their carpets, so that was given to one of the soldiers to sell at one of the bazaars. They were not permitted to go to the funeral, four soldiers took the body and it was not till two years afterwards that they were allowed to visit his grave outside the city walls of 'Akká.

(Rúhā Khánum) told us of the great shock Shoghi Effendi received at the news of the Master's death. Rúhā Khánum said that about a fortnight before the Master's passing, he called Shoghi Effendi's mother and said for her to write and tell him to come home, that she was not to say anything to the other members of the family to alarm them. He also told his father who said, "Perhaps we had better telegraph, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá said "No" Shoghi Effendi's mother wrote but the letter did not reach him before the telegram that they sent when 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed. So as not to alarm him they had sent, "Master ill, come home quickly." Shoghi Effendi was in the library at Oxford studying when he was called to receive the telegram. He hastened to the office of Major Tudor-Pole. He was out but on his table was an open telegram announcing the passing of the Master. When the major returned, he found Shoghi Effendi lying unconscious on the floor. It was over a month before he could get his passport to start for the Holy Land.

In the afternoon, we visited the men's pilgrim House that is situated in Mount Carmel just near the Holy Shrines. We were invited to take part in a Bahá'í marriage celebration. We were all asked to speak about our different countries and how the work was progressing there, I conveyed your greetings to them all and they sent their love to you all. You cannot imagine the pleasure and joy they get when news comes from the friends of other countries. Their faces just shine with light and devotion.

I shall give you a full description of the wedding when I return. It would take a long time to write it but it was according to Eastern custom. The men and woman do not meet together so we then went to the home of ‘Abbás Kuli (keeper of the Tomb) and visited the women and congratulated the bride. After partaking of tea we went with Rúhá Khánúm and Túbá Khánúm to the Holy Shrines to pray. It is Father’s birthday today so I asked a special blessing on his work.

We had a talk with Mr. Mills and Mrs. True tonight.

Monday, (March) 16th: Had an interview with Shoghi Effendi. He again emphasized the fact of speaking on the principles whenever opportunity arises and then give short outline of history. In speaking of the Cause our great object admission is to create harmony and unity. If differences arise we must consult with another and when decision of a just settlement is arrived at, go to the ones with whom it has arisen and tell them the great kindness and love, advice them of your decision. Do not force or insist but leave it to them to meditate on, and then pray earnestly that they must see things in the right light.

Literature on the Cause must be distributed in a dignified and tactful manner. Must not be made cheap, not given out at dens, or put on park benches, It is necessary to be careful in giving our propaganda. Tells me not to visit America but to see the Friends in London and then return as soon as possible and help rather and Mother Dunn with the work in Australia. His heart is very glad at the progress of the Cause in Australia. We must make over; effort to continue the good work and not let him be discouraged. Wherever we are, he says, our object is to make a firm believer instead of just interesting a lot of people, it is not significant. We must concentrate our efforts to make a firm believer who will be capable of carrying on the work when we are not there. We must strive to study the teaching to impart Truth fluently and with conviction, not superficially. Must devote as much of our time as we can so that we may grasp the inner meanings of the Teachings and be able to satisfy without hesitation and referring to books questions asked.

This afternoon we went for a walk with Mrs. True. She took us to see an old olive tree planted by the Romans about 4000 years ago. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá used to sit very often under this tree. Had Afternoon tea with Holy mother and F’amily.

Tuesday, March 17th: Left for ‘Akká at 8:15 A.M. Passed the Kishon River where Elijah slew the priests of Baal. 400 in number I think. We visited the house where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived. It is now a hospital. He was there four years and not allowed out of the walls of ‘Akká.

Then we went to the house where Bahá’u’lláh was for seven years. Then the Most Great Prison. This is being renovated and the part where Bahá’u’lláh, his family and followers were imprisoned is now a hospital for tubercular prisoners. The window of the room where Bahá’u’lláh was has been enlarged. I took a photo of it outside to show you the difference. We saw where they put the first night they arrived. We next went to the Pilgrim House at Bahjéh. Bahjéh is outside the city walls about one-half hour. The Pilgrim House is the one ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lives in, his half brother still in Palace of Bahjéh. We visited the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. Had tea, then visited Shrine again. In the house where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned for seven years we saw the room there Kitáb-e-Aqdas was written also the bath built in great love for Bahá'u'lláh by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Sleeping at Bahjáh Pilgrim House tonight.

Wednesday, March 18th: Margaret and I slept in the room at Pilgrim House where 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed part of the "Divine Plan." Had breakfast, visited the Shrine and we repeated our Prayers in English. We then went to the Garden of Ridván which is about two miles from Bahjáh Palace. It is a beautiful little spot. We lunched under the two huge mulberry trees where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit. Margaret photographed the seats. I took photo of the carriage (We would call it a wagonette - it holds nine people) 'Abdu'l-Bahá drove, in when he was knighted. We drove to the Ridván in it sad to the station. Sohiel who accompanied us (he is t grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, son of Rúháh, cousin of Manta Effendi) told us about the Master being knighted. It was not his wish but the British Government wished it, so 'Abdu'l-Bahá consented after refusing once or twice. He has a beautiful carriage someone presented to him but he did not wish any fuss so he drove in this waggonette to the Government Residents. He did not go by the main entrances just entered a little gate at the back. Everyone was waiting for 'Abdu'l-Bahá, to dive up in great pomp and ceremony. The walk to the Governors house was lined with soldiers ready to make the guard of honor when to every one's surprise, 'Abdu'l-Bahá quietly came in at the back ma took the seat allotted for him. He graciously received the paper knighthood and then, when the ceremony was over. Just went out the way he had come and drove off in his old carriage.

We saw the room where Bahá'u'lláh used to stay in the garden of Ridván. They have left it just as it was. We sat in there and felt such a wonderful peace and prayed for every one of us that we will be firm to His Cause and be the means of establishing it in our land. We returned to 'Akká and at 4 P.M. caught the train back to Haifa. Travelling 3rd class de lux as Fugeta put it. I walked through the streets of Haifa instead of going -home in a carriage. They are very quaint.

Thursday (March) 19th: Rúháh Khánúm visited us just after breakfast and gave us a beautiful talk on the life of the Master.

I find there is so much to write and tell you, I cannot possibly finish for the mail, so I will try and write you the rest of our visit to date when we are on the boat. We expect to leave Friday and April. All the Holy Family and Shoghi Effendi wished me to send their love in which we all join.

In His Name,

Your co-worker

(Signed) Effie (S. Baker)

Letter Number 2, written by Miss Effie S. Baker (The Toymaker of Australia), to Melbourne Bahá'í Assembly, from her Notes taken in Haifa.

S. S. Esperance Bay,

9th April 1925.

I finished me letter rather than abruptly to you on the 9th, March, as I wished to catch the mail or at least try to do so. I will start where I left off.

19th March: Rúḥá Khánum came to see us this morning and gave us a lovely talk on the life of the Master which I shall try to relate to you.

First she told us of her Aunt's (The Greatest Holy Leaf) account of the landing at 'Akká.

In 1868 the boat first came to Haifa. No landing, sea rough, the Turkish boat very dirty. They fixed up anything they could to try and make a little privacy for Bahá'u'lláh who was very sick. There was no accommodation on the boat for them. They were put into small boat from the ship and rowed near shore. They carried the woman and children on a chair. The people of 'Akká heard some prisoners were coming and along the seashore to see them arrive. They numbered about seventy altogether (We saw the room they were put in for the first night. It was a privilege. Fugeta told us they rarely show it now. Of course the prison authorities allow you permission to visit the part of the Barracks where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned, but you cannot go without a permit.)

The Governor of the prison had no idea there would be so many and he did not know where to put them. Had not place ready for so many. There was so water except foul stagnant water from a round (?) well in courtyard (which we also saw). They had to strain it through bits of cloth before they could drink it. They all got fever. Master nursed them. Greatest Holy Leaf couldn't drink, ill with fever. Many died just two months ago (Agha Ḥusayn, cook of Bahá'u'lláh) who was one of these seventy followers imprisoned with Bahá'u'lláh. (We met his son at the Pilgrim House at Bahjíh, pronounced Ba-ghee). Greatest Holy Leaf is only one left of those who went into prison with Bahá'u'lláh in 1868.

Shoghi Effendi had notes taken down from this man which are now in Persia for translation.

Master was about twenty-five years old when he went into prison. Prison was foul and dirty. Conditions are altered now. We really couldn't realize it. After two years, the Barracks were wanted for soldiers, so they were removed to a house where they stayed four months, then house (which we visited) in which Bahá'u'lláh was kept seven years. The followers were there too.

In beginning it was only one house. "Abdu'l-Bahá had to live in room with Mother and Greatest Holy Leaf. After leaving Barracks 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Mother had to live in room with his Uncle, her brother.

Bahá'u'lláh wished 'Abdu'l-Bahá to marry. There was no room so the next door neighbor who owned the house they lived in, saw why marriage could not take place. He had a room in his house made with den connecting to Bahá'u'lláh's house, and prepared it for 'Abdu'l-Bahá and offered it. It was accepted and 'Abdu'l-Bahá was married. "My mother was called by Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "What Bahá'u'lláh wished me to do, I will do."

When taken out of prison some Azeles came. They were much against the Clause. Took 'Abdu'l-Bahá first and for three nights put him in dungeon with chains. Then they took him to interview Bahá'u'lláh. He tried to hide the chains from his Mother's sight. Pleaded with them when they took Bahá'u'lláh to put him in the upper room and not the dungeon. They agreed, He went into the dungeon himself and became ill from being in such a foul, damp place.

The last time he was brought before court, he was commanded not to leave 'Akká. He said to them, "I have news to make you happy. I am very happy this order is given. Now I really will have a good rest. My imprisonment is not my sorrow but the unfaithfulness of my followers." She (Rúhí Khánum) then told us how he used to go and visit Bahá'u'lláh after he was allowed the freedom of the surrounding few miles of 'Akká and then want to live in Palace of Bahjíh, four or five miles out of the city. He used to go and see Bahá'u'lláh every Friday. Would put on old Aba and go on foot, chanting prayers, praying slowly as if walking to his Beloved. Would rest in shade of old aquaduct with stone for a pillow (we saw the spot on way to Bahjíh). Bahá'u'lláh would only from early morning at his window watching for him and as soon as he saw in ho would send the friends and pilgrims to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá, sayings "The Master comes. Go and meet him!" It was a beautiful sight to see them meet. Such wonderful love, such kindness 'Abdu'l-Bahá would recount his work to Bahá'u'lláh. Then Bahá'u'lláh would direct his next week's work. Bahá'u'lláh would say, "How happy you make me. You bring might and happiness to my heart." Then Bahá'u'lláh would tell them all to leave the room and he and the Master would have a private talk for a while.

Bahá'u'lláh received so many letters. He would give them to 'Abdu'l-Bahá to answer. 'Abdu'l-Bahá would bring the ); flowers and read them to him. Bahá'u'lláh would be pleased and raise 'Abdu'l-Bahá for the way in which he answered them. Rúhí Khánum told how 'Abdu'l-Bahá would go to a room in Inn (across from house where Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned for seven years) called Master's drawing room. Here he would receive people, Bahá'ís and non-Bahá'ís and give them advice both spiritually and materially. At twelve o'clock would come and have lunch with Bahá'u'lláh and tell him all that transpired during the morning. Would go to the Barracks in the afternoon and write in little room (sentry box for soldier). Had no room where he could go to write privately. He would come back and again so and visit and help people. (Rauha Khánum) spoke of the pilgrims coming on foot and the journey taking four and sometimes six months to complete. There were nine pilgrims once who came this way (Ismael, Bahá'u'lláh 's Gardener) who is still living was one of them).

They were very poor, nothing else to offer, they brought a white lily in a basin or pot and carried it on their heads, each taking their turn. Bahá'u'lláh said when they offered it to him, "It was the best present kings or queens could ever get," though the valley of Bahjíh was full of lilies, it was their love that counted.

In the afternoon we spent some time with the Holy Family Greatest Holy Leaf who had a cold is little better. Dr. Esselmont is better also.

Friday 20th March: Shoghi Effendi sent for Margaret and myself and he had a talk with us regarding work in Australia. He wishes me to proceed to London with the party and visit the Friends there. Said it would be encouragement to them to meet a friend all the way from Australia. Does not wish me to proceed to America, there is no necessity for me to go. He wishes me to return to Australia and continue to work with Father and Mother Dunn a have done before and spread the teachings in Australia. He looks with Great expectations to Australia. Speaking on getting in touch with the Source, he said:

1st, We must have purity of intention.

2nd, We must have detachment.

3rd, We trust have concentration.

Afterward I went down town with Mrs. True and on the way met Ḥusayn Rúḥí who had just arrived by train from Jerusalem. Had come up for the week end to celebrate Naw-Rúz Feast. He related his father's life story for us just after lunch which shall try to give as he gave it.

"My father Ḥájí Mullá 'Alí of Tabriz accepted the Cause when Bahá'u'lláh was in Adrianople. He witnessed the martyrdom of The Báb. He was a teacher of religion (a mullah. A leader of the Shi'ite sect from Suffi School (Suffi's discovered the date of The Báb's coming) and thought himself Greater than any theologian in Persia. (He was very learned and proud). He came to Nosul where he met a man, a believer (who afterward became a nac (?). My father was sitting in his shop. He offered to the man a cup of coffee and told him about the teachings, but my father said it was not worth while arguing with him, so he took my father to his father (Mírzá Honeer) and he in turn took him to Jinábí Zain (one of the old believers) who was a copier of tablets of Bahá'u'lláh and also the Master. What he wrote was true (or correct – never any mistakes. His writings are very valuable now. They are perfect.)

When in father want to him he said: It is no good talking (They knew each other as teachers of religion). My father said he had scan writings of The Báb and thought he could write just as well. Said he wanted to see writings of Bahá'u'lláh. Jinábí Zain gave him the Íqán. My father went to his hotel to read it. (He) spent whole night reading. At dawn he took a cup of tea, went to Jinábí Zain and said, "Tell me where is the One who revealed this Where is He! He is God! These are the wards of God! He (Jinábí Zain) said, He is in Adrianople. My father went to see Bahá'u'lláh and became a believer.

Bahá'u'llah said to him to go to Tabriz, and go to Egypt and stay until they would meet again some Where in Syria. My father went, and a few year later Bahá'u'lláh was exiled to 'Akká and my father had the pleasure of meeting him once again. My father was the first one to take the teachings in the Ottoman Empire. He was sent by Bahá'u'lláh. My father returned to 'Akká and then went on to Baghdád, leaving believers in each village. I was two years old when my father went to Aleppo and from there to Aintab in Khurdestan (a few miles from Aleppo) There he received a tablet from Bahá'u'lláh in which he plainly told him that it was time to stop teaching and that he must go to the place in which he had to drink the cup which he was, longing for. So my father (I was told by a certain Bahá'í) left taking no food or clothes. He went to Diarbakr in Khurdistan. The place which he had frequented as a merchant of indigo and carpets. There my father used to go to the Armenian church to teach the priests. Same time attended mosques and explained Qur'án. The people doubted his belief and finally discovered he was a Báb term only known then as follower of The Báb). They set some people to meet him at the gate of the city, who knocked him to the ground. I was informed by one who had seen that (which was related to me word for word by the Master) and began to break his bones with cudgels. They broke the bones of his arms, legs, robbed him of his belt of money and left him alone. At that night a caravan going into the city heard him moaning. They brought two boards and carried him into the town to the room in which he used to live. It happened that three believers were coming from Baghdád on the way to the Holy Land (whose names I didn't quite get, but they were soothing like these. He put it thus: No. 1 Darvish Aba, No. 2 Hájí Núr, No. 3, All-Isphan.) Some people informed them that one, a Bábí whose bones were broken was in an Inn and wanted to see them.

"My father told them, a related by Hájí Núr, that two of them should so on and one remain with him. His advice was carried out because the caravan was on the move toward 'Akká. My father said to man who remained with him that he would depart at dawn, and that he should take him to a certain spot just by the gate of Mardin (one of the gates of Diarbakr) and bury him there.

I finally discovered that this spot is the last place in the country at which Bahá'u'llah stopped on his way to Constantinople. The way I discovered my Father Tomb: I had supplicated that I might be permitted to build the tomb of my father at Diarbakr. Reply was like this, "You are permitted to go provided facility or things are all right"

On the day of the arrival of the reply, I had $500.00. I was a teacher in school and it was not possible for me to go then as the school session was not finished. I was glad I had the money but I did not realize necessity of keeping it, and when vacation came I had spent it. This annoyed me. I didn't know why I had spent it. I had to continue another year. I supplicated again. The reply came. "You are permitted to go at once before his grave is lost in ruins."

At time of reply I had no money but at the end of session I had $500.00, so I started for 'Akká taking my family with me. I left (as guests at the Holy Home my mother, aunty, wife and little child). I asked the Master to give me a letter to No. 2 Heji-Núr (who was at Aintub at that time as a watchmaker) because he knew where the grave was. He had visited it on his way back to Persia. MThe Master also gave me something to inscribe on the Tomb which reads as follows: “Verily the tranquil soul Heji Mullá ‘Alí had drunk the cup of Eternity from the hand of the Water Giver of – away from his home, while he was spreading the fragrances of God, and devoted to the Beauty of God.”

Master told me before I left that I would find my father’s grave. I want to Aintab and to make a long story short, took my friend No. 2 Hájí-Núr to Diarbakr. He took me to whereabouts of grave and for four hours we were searching in not more than ten square yards for grave. I said the Master said I was going to discover it, better let us go and find a grave digger and ask if he knew about it. Seeing an old grave digger for over 40 years. I was glad to hear this. I asked him if he could show me any graves of Persians in that part of the country. He said there are only two, pointing to first one, he said this was made over 15 years ago, but the other only five years ago. Being there more than seventeen years of age, I know the first was my father’s. I began to clear away the debris and looking on it I read this inscription:

“He is Alloha-Abba

This is the tomb or grave of

Hájí Mullá ‘Alí of Tabris”

I discovered the man who put this on my father’s grave was a believer (working at Persian Consulate). He had put it on his own account and expense and was the man who had stayed with my father and had seen to his burial. I brought masons and built the tomb. On the day that the Tomb was finished the wife of the Governor of the city died and as the funeral processions passed my father’s Tomb, the people stopped and recited introduction of Qur’án. Quite surprised to see a boy from Egypt in Diarbakr (not less than twenty days from Cairo) building Tomb of his father. I gave them a drink made from liquorice-root in the name of my father.

When I returned with the picture of my father’s Tomb for the Master, he took it and kissed it and passed it to the believers present and then related the martyrdom of my father word for word as the grave-digger had related it to me.

In afternoon, Martha (Root) and I went for a walk and present and went to the Holy Shrines. Went and had afternoon tea with the Holy Leaves and saw the Greatest Holy Leaf for a while.

Saturday, 21st March: Naw-Rúz Feast today. It in the beginning of the New Year of the Bahá’í Calendar. Had a visit with the Ladies of the Holy Household. Holy Mother gave us a Persian silk handkerchief and ringstone blessed by the Master.

Went to new Pilgrim House and partook in another wedding festivity. These two weddings are the first to be celebrated since ascension of the Master. After visiting Shrines we came to see drawing room. She is very pretty and he is very good looking also. They were not so shy as the First ones were.

Sunday, 22nd March: Visited the home of Mírzá Anayatullah Esphani. He showed us wonderful pictures of funeral of “‘Abdu’l-Bahá. We had a lovely time there

In afternoon, visited Mírzá Badi‘ Bushruhi’s home. He is Governor of the province and such a fine man. His wife is very sweet and charming. They put on the phone record of the Master’s voice. It was wonderful.

Went next to visit the Holy Family. The Greatest Holy Leaf is much better. We went in to see her and she gave us each a Bahá’í ring. Then we went in to see the room where “‘Abdu’l-Bahá passed away. His White Fez lay on the pillow. One felt in the Holy Presence and we all knelt at the bedside and prayed.

We are leaving in morning for a four day tour of Palestine. Mrs. Blundell is kindly taking me. She has hired a seven-seated Studebaker car and a Bahá’í Mr. Yannous(?) is to arrange the tour. It is his business taking parties on these tours. He has a line of cars called the ‘Jerusalem Express’. As this car has just returned to Haifa with a party we are to go straight to Jerusalem tomorrow and return in Nazareth and Tiborias way on the return journey. I will give you the trip from leaving Haifa till return.

Monday, 23rd March: Left Haifa at 9 A.M for Jerusalem. Passing the plain of Jezrial where River Kishon flows into the Sea.

This is the river where Elijah slew the priests of Baal, 400 in number, I think.

We are now 21(?) miles from Haifa speeding mountain side and looking down on plain of Ecdernelon. It looks very fertile land and is under cultivation. On the hill side are anemones, blue corn flowers and a pink flower resembling exalis. Passing a village called Jaffa – near Nazareth. The reading are while and winding(?). Meet canal trains, Arabs driving herds of cattle. Flocks of sheep and goats. The country is hilly and mountainous and very stony. They are composed of volcanic shala. Passing home of Jezabel and Ahab; See Mount Tabor and Little Hermon. Can see Jordan Valley in distance and Mount Jebrah, where King Saul was killed. Passing village-jewish settlement. Plain of Esdraelon, cultivated and looks so green with young crops. Arabs ploughing with oxen and primitive wooden ploughs. Plenty of storks in fields. They have red bills, heads, neck and part of body white, wings partly white and partly black, black tail. Very handsome birds. Not allowed to kill them as they keep fields free from grubs, etc. We keep passing small Arab villages. Passing scene of British camp during war. Old tractors lying about. One viewing the stony mountainous districts all around can understand “the high places” spoken of so often in the Bible. Passing Arabs drawing water from well at roadside to water their flocks – very picturesque. All along the way you see women in the fields weeding the crops. They have a very hard life, have to help in the fields and do the house work and look after the children. Passing the Hill of Dotham where Joseph was sold by his brethren. Passing Arab village of Sileh. Plenty of fig and olive trees, can get a glimpse of Mediterranean Sea from here, also Plain of Sharon in distance. Passing lentil fields – an old Roman aqua duct and hills of old Samaria. Can see ruined gate of town of Samaria built by King Ahab. Reached Nablus (new city). The old name is Shechem. It is associated with earliest 'period of Jewish settlement in Palestine. Here Abraham pitched his tent on entering the country to set up the first altar to Jehovah. Joshua led Israelites after miraculous passage of the Jordan and on slopes of Mount Girizim and Ebal recited the Laws of Moses. Also from Mount Girizim and Ebal were pronounced blessings and cursings. They are high barren and rugged looking. Here the Samaritans owe to keep the Passover (which takes place beginning April. They offer the sacrifices on Mt. Girizim).

We lunched and left Nablus at 1:20 P. M. Passing Tomb of Joseph and remains of house of woman of Samaria whom Jesus met at Jacob's Well. They are building an orthodox church over this well, but it is only partly erected, cannot finish an account of lack of funds. Passing stone erected to show the boundary between Samaria and district of Jerusalem. Here we are beginning to see vineyards. Passing village of Shingel or St. Giles, founded in time of Crusades. British and Turks fought a battle here during the last war. Passing Villages we are now passing are mostly Christian faith, much cleaner and prosperous looking than the Arab villages. The lake Birziet (called well of oil) is surrounded by hills, all the sides of which are terraced and olive trees growing on them. The hills just seem to be layers of stone strata. The people build up the terraces to keep the soil from washing away. Each house here has its oil press and little underground well to store the oil, hence its name. Passing Shiloh where the Ark of the Covenant stood. People used to visit it annually. Bethel (ancient) Here Jacob had his vision (ladder from heaven with angels ascending and descending).

Ancient Beiroth where the parents of Jesus returning from Jerusalem to their home missed him. They had to return to Jerusalem to look for him and found him teaching in the Temple. Saw American friends (quakers) Mission School. Fine buildings. Can now see in distance two towns on Mount of Olives, and part of city of Jerusalem to the right. Passing Bedouin Arabs moving camps. Can see high hills with Mosque. It is Tomb of Prophet Samuel and called Mizpah. Minaret on it was destroyed by British during war. They have rebuilt it. Passing landing place for aeroplanes, English mail service between Cairo and Baghdad. Passing ruins, excavation of House of Saul. Ancient Nob (place of good vision). Can see garden of Gethsemane. Passing Damascus Gate. We are outside of the old city and will be staying at the Hotel Casa Nova in the Modern Christian portion of the city. Reached hotel at 3:30 P.M. Had a little rest then Mr. Tannous who is our guide came to take us to see the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is situated in North-western corner of old city. All is so quaint and interesting. One has forgotten modern civilization. We are gazing on scenes hoar, antiquated those in authority no doubt are doing their utmost to keep its original state. You can see by its vaulted bazaars, narrow winding streets, steep alleyways, stone-paved, planked on each side with ancient architecture that no change has taken place for centuries. It is indeed very picturesque but lack of cleanliness detracts from the scene somewhat. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was originally a group of small separate churches rising in the holy site in the 4th century and afterwards received its present form from Crusaders who built one large Romanesque Church to embrace the chapel covering holy sites. In this church which is circular in form are separate chapels allotted to different sects of Christianity. Orthodox Greek, Roman Catholic Armenians, Coptic PO (?) and Fc (?) It is the same of many different rituals and ceremonies and endless sectarian strifes. On entering the door you see the altar of stone of motion in which Jesus and the piece of stone which Jesus was anointed after crucifixion. The Tomb of Joseph of Aramanthea and Nicodemus hewn out of the rock. The place where Mary met Jesus and thought the gardener (had taken him away). The prison where Jesus awaited his trial. Place where family of prisoner visited them. Pillar on which Jesus sat and Jews mocked him. Place where soldiers sash lots for his garments. Place where suppose St. Helena found crosses, nails and crown of thorns. Tomb of legions soldier who pierced Jesus' side. Calvary where Jesus was nailed to cross and crucified. Painting by Murillo, his masterpiece of Christ and his Mother. This is a wonderful place of work. It depicts the Holy Mother holding her hand under the head of Jesus and gazing into his face just after he has been taken from the cross. The portrayal of the serene calm, physically beautiful face of the dead Christ, the look of anguish and untold grief in the face of the mother as she gazes at her son's lifeless form is indeed a masterpiece of art. The statue of the Virgin Mary, this too, is a wonderful work of art. The face is beautiful. She seems to be in a kneeling posture. Is included in glass case, her robe from neck to knee is literally covered with jewels. Her arms from wrist to shoulder, with bracelets. Enormous jewels over her head, watch chains, watches modals, etc., covering whole figure. They have been gifts of people who have come to pray to her for healing and the value is estimated at five million pounds. Here is wealth untold meeting your gaze while just outside the doors of the edifice holding this wealth your eye meets the scenes of abject poverty and misery and much of it caused in the name of religion. It is one certainly that has lost its life-giving properties.

26th March: Visiting Mosque of Omar in area known as 'The Haram (The August Sanctuary)'. The two principle edifices being "Dome of the Rock" on a raised platform in the middle and the Mosque of Al Aqsa against the south wall. On the left along east wall the double portals of Golden Gate appear. On every side trees break the prospect which lends a peculiar charm to the scene. The site is one of the oldest in the world. Its sanctity dates from the earliest times. Its identity with the sites of Solomon's Temple is beyond dispute. This too, is the spot according to universal belief on which "Daniel built there an altar to the Lord and offered burnt offerings and peace offerings (2 Samuel 24th)" The Mosque of Al Aqsa built in commemoration of Prophets miraculous ascension.

It is said that Muḥammad was miraculously caught up in the clouds while riding his charger and then landed at this spot.

Returned and had lunch, then started for Mount of Olives. Passed hospice built by certain German Emperor, now residence of Sir Robert Samuels, Governor of Palestine appointed by British after war. Can see Dead Sea from here. Visited Carmelite Convent. Here we entered a courtyard supposed to be the spot where Jesus gave the disciples the Lord's Prayer. Saw on walls surrounding this courtyard the prayer in thirty-four different languages. Nuns of this convent never see anyone after they enter it. Visiting Church of Nativity. Passing Plain, where King David meet Philistines on way to Bethlehem. Bethlehem is five and one-half miles south of Jerusalem. Birthplace of Jesus and of King David. It stands 2500 feet above sea level and has about 6000 inhabitants mostly Christians. It is the scene of the story in the book of Ruth and in Old Testament times is famous for association with House of David. Can see Mountains of Hoab and Hills of Judea. Passing Rachel's Tomb. See fields of Boaz where Ruth gleaned and where shepherds received message of the "New Born King". Church of the Nativity is the outstanding monument of Bethlehem and is built over the spot where the Inn stood that Jesus' parents came to and where he was born in the stable and put in the manger. Built by Constantine in 330 A. D. Church consists of a nave with double aisles, of a wide transept, and semi-circular aspect. The nave and aisles are separated from one another by four rows of monolithic columns surrounded by Corinthian capitals. Like Church of the Holy Sepulchre it is shared by several communities, orthodox, Greek, Armenians, Coptic, etc. Went down a sort of underground grotto where you are shown, what is believed to be the spot where the star showed through the stable roof, then the spot where the manger was (of course all these places have altars erected on them). We were much amused here. Saw a politician sitting with handcuffs beside him. Our guide told us they have to keep one there all the time to keep peace between the Greek, Armenians, Roman Catholic Coptic, etc. One sect does not dare put his foot on portions of another sect or there will be a fight.

We are going to see the Dead Sea, Passing Bethany, home of Mary and Martha, Lazuras, Simon the leper. Can see old original road on our right. The road to Jericho on which we are travelling was prevented by thieves (it is a very lonely road winding round the hill sides, no habitation anywhere) and robbers and is very unsafe to travel. But since under British control this has been put down and it is quite safe now. Jericho is 18 miles distant. Roads in along aides of the Hills of Judea. They are mostly composed or strata s of lime stone, and are very barren as no rain fall here.

Passing Apostles Spring where Jesus and disciples rested on way from Jerusalem, wayside in at this spot. Passed Inn of Good Samaritan, Reached Dead Sea. It is ten miles wide and 47 miles long over 1200 feet below sea level. Its water is very bitter and salt to taste. River Jordan flows into it three farther up from where we ar standing. Can see village of Modern Jericho in distances. Looks like, oasis in desert it is so green. We are at bank of Jordan River where Jesus was supposed to have been baptized. Plenty of Poplar and Tamarack trees growing along its banks. Water very muddy colored (turbulent stream here) Passing through modern Jericho. Here are banana and orange groves everywhere. Visited site of old town. Jericho was scene of victory of Israelites in Palestine. Sacked by Joshua. Subsequently rebuilt and forced part of inheritance of Benjamin. It was here that Elisha performed the miracle of rendering the bitter spring sweet (the people told him they had found water but it was bitter so he put a handful of salt in it and it turned sweet). People from all parts come here to draw water from it. When British Government have built a long oblong cement basin around it. You can see it bubbling up gushing out at one end of basin. This basin fills up and then they left it out to irrigate the land round about. That is why it is so green. When we were inspecting the walls of old Jericho I found a piece of broken pottery embedded in the mud, etc., evidently used in those days.

Of the old town there is little to see beyond the excavations of the German Oriental Society which laid bare braces of the old masonry and walls. The walls were composed of irregular stones and sand (o no 'Fonder they fell down when the High Priests and People marches round them blowing trumpets, etc).

We then started for the return to Jerusalem and reached there at 7:30 P. M.

March 25th: Lord Balfour is entering Jerusalem this morning and much bitterness Arab community. They are making a stop work demonstration to show disapproval of the Jews coming into Palestine. Lord Balfour is coming in connection with opening of a Jewish University. For fear of trouble our guide advises not to leave Hotel till comes. No cars or vehicles to run in streets and shops closed. Mr. Tannous who is a Bahá'í and has lived here all his life has warned us for our safety. We are having a novel experience. Stayed in all morning. No demonstration, so are continuing our tour. We called on Houssain Rúhí (Inspector of Education) then returned to Hotel to prepare to leave for Nablus where we will spend the night. We heard guns firing just before or at noon and thought perhaps a riot had occurred but not so. Found it is the beginning of Muḥammadan feast. It starts with new moon. The first who sees it has to get a witness and then they go and tell High Priest. A gun is fired to let the rest of the community know.

At 4:30 P. M. we are starting for Nablus. It was a wonderful drive from Jerusalem to Nablus. Looking down on the Plains with some of the rich red soil just followed, some under crops, the different variety of cereals and giving contrasting hues or green. Hills outlines with winding terraces of white stones, patches of sombre gray green of olive, the brighter tint of fig and almond trees was a site not to be forgotten. The sun's genial rays giving over varied tones added to the panorama before our eyes. Great patches on the hill sides of scarlet and blue and pink flowers causing a riot, of color and hard to depict. It gave the impression of a huge Persian carpet, rich in coloring and of wonderful, tracery spread to meet our gaze.

26th March: After a good night's rest, we are leaving for Tiberias. Again reach Nazareth. See the Church of Melchites which is claimed to be the Synagogue Jesus taught. From Plain south east of Nazareth is the dome shaped Mount Tabor. Can see Horn of Hittim where Christ gave the sermon on the Mount. Plain where he fed 5000 and 7000 people. At noon reached Tiberias on Sea of Galilee. It is 681 feet below sea level and lies on west bank of Sea of Galilee.

Scene of miracle of Canal (St. John 2). It built of basalt a black looking stone like blue stone and this gives it a very sombre appearance. It is very old and street very crooked, narrow and dirty. Had lunch in Municipal Gardens outside of city. Had a row in boat on the Lake on Sea or Galleli. We then went to Bethsaida. Passed home of Mary Magdalene, home of Jonah. We then returned to Tiberias, back to Nazareth and then to Haifa. Travelling from Nazareth to Haifa we get the view of the other side of Mount Carmel famed from Old Testament time for its beauty. It is one of the most attractive regions of Palestine. Its highest point is 1800 feet the miracle of Elijah took place (The offering the sacrifice, the place of burning recorded in 1 King 18) with priests or Baal. The River Kishon in the Plain below winding its way to the Sea where Elijah slew the Priests of Baal 400 in number.

Haifa is situated on the other side of slope of Mt. Carmel and has 34000 inhabitants. So you see it is not a small place. We reached there at 5 P. M.

Mother will see this by narrative that "Smart Aleck" plied the guide with a few questions and put them down tersely and have just written up the events as I could remember, so if we made a few mistakes in recording, excuse them. It has been quite a long task writing this. The boat has been rolling a good deal. I wish to post it on board tonight so that it will go straight away.

This Journey to Jerusalem has left a lasting impression for one has indeed seen the full demonstration of the words of The Báb. "You have the forms and credits but have lost the spirit of your religion." One recognizes how necessary it was for the appearance of the Father Himself to come and purify the channels of spiritual thought from the superstitions of man-made creeds and dogmas. One's return to Haifa was certainly a return to a pure crystal spring of spiritual thought, effervescent with life and energy turbulent muddy streams and stagnant pools polluted with sectarian strife, superstitions and human ideas and thoughts, absolutely void of essential life giving properties "The Love of God."

It was a happy home coming to be once again with the dear souls whose lives are one continual sacrifice and service to humanity.

I think I shall end this now as it will be quite, perhaps more than you can read at one time. All the Holy Family, Shoghi Effendi and the Friends wished me to convey their love to you whenever I write. Mrs. Blundell and family and Margaret also join me in love to you. It won't be so long before I return to be with you once more. Love to you all.

Yours, in His Name,

Your loving co-worker,
(Signed) Effie S. Baker.

S. S. "Esperance Bay"

April 5th 1925

March 19th. My dears, my last letter was up to the 18th and finished off in hurry just as we were going to Jerusalem, so I will go on from the 19th. Not much of importance to tell you today. Towards the morning of the 19th we were awakened by a great noise amongst the fowls, Ethel, Effie and I got up and awakened Fugeta and he went out and found that a roost-board had fallen down and some of the fowls must have been under it for a while – they made a fearful row. Before we got to sleep we had a thunderstorm but very little rain. Rain is badly needed, especially between Haifa and Jerusalem. They are afraid the wheat crop will be a failure and in parts where they are dependent on rain water for drinking and everything, they do not know what will happen. After breakfast Rooha tm one of the ladies came to see us and she was telling us all about their early days, it was so interesting.

20th. Not feeling very well today – sick, etc. The food, though so delicious is very rich. Effie and I went over to see Shoghi Effendi at 10 A. M. and had a delightful interview and I came back feeling a good deal better and just took creamed rice for lunch. In the aft, a Persian Bahá'í, Ḥusayn Rúhí, a school inspector came in from Jerusalem. He talks English very well and he told us the story of his Father who was a martyr in the Cause. We hear that Monever Khánun (the one we met on arrival at Port Sa'íd) has arrived and we are looking forward to meeting her again. She is the youngest daughter and is so pretty and sweet. Later – we have been over to see the Household and as 'Abdu'l-Bahá's sister was better we saw her too, sitting up in bed.

21st. This is the Persian New Year's Day. After lunch we had snaps of our party in Pilgrim House and then went up Mt Carmel. You can read what you like aloud, this page is private about Bahá'í talk. I just told you that this is the Persian New Year's Day – Naw-Rúz Feast Day and the let day of Bahá'í Calendar. We went over to see the Ladies of the Household. Did not see the Greatest Holy Leaf as she was not well enough, but we saw the Holy Mother and three of the daughters (Holy Leaves as they are called). There were other visitors too - Arabs, Turks, etc. (ladies of course, no men, except those of the Household are admitted here). The Holy Mother gave us each a beautiful silk handkerchief and a ring – stone, which had been blessed by 'Abdu'l Baba, as a Naw-Rúz gift (a custom here to give its on this day). After lunch we went up Mt. Carmel - first to the men's meeting. Western ladies are admitted, but the Eastern ladies have a meeting of their own. It was the Feast of Naw-Rúz and the table was filled with good things. The room they: have is like this and as soon as we appeared the men all rose and we were gives the seats of honour round the semi-circle near the table. As soon as we were seated we were given Persian tea in delightful little glasses and biscuits, then there was some chanting. Then we were introduced to the bride roots for another wedding was on and then the feast begs and we were each supposed to take what was offered. So we all had to take it home, for we could not possibly have eaten it then. After that we six ladies were each presented with a bz.mch of flowers. Just before we left for Mt Carmel a cable arrived, we suppose from the Auckland Assembly to the Haifa Ass, and to the Family, so it was read out at the meeting. They were very pleased and decided to send a cable – asked add and we gave them Mrs. Axford, as she was Secy. And also shortest add. I suppose you got it all right, We then visited the Shrines and after coming down the Hill, called in at the Household to be introduced to the bride, and witnessed the ceremony, In this case they were not nearly so shy. She looked very nice.

22nd. We visited the home of Mírzá Anayatullah Estafahani, He showed us wonderful pictures of the funeral of 'Abdu'l Balls and told us many interesting things. His wife could not talk English, but dispensed the usual Persian tea and cakes, in the aft we visited (both these places by invitation) Mirsa Badi's home. He end his wife are a lovely pair, the light just shines from them. We heard a one record of the Master's Voice – it was wonderful. Then went to visit the Holy Family. Had a talk with Monever about her trip to Switzerland last year. Then went to see the G. H. Leaf, she was sitting up on her bed, a good deal better. She gave each of us a Pabst ring as a Naw-Rúz gift. We were then taken to the room where 'Abdu'l Babe passed away This room is kept just as it was then.

23rd. Left Haifa at 8:45 A. M. for Jerusalem. We hired a motor amongst us for a four day's trip from a Mr. Tannous, a Bahá'í friend of Ash's and either he or his partner went with us everywhere and explained everything to us. This made the trip so much more enjoyable. It was a beautiful drive, the scenery was so very interesting and the wild flowers wonderful, daisies, (white and yellow), cornflowers, poppies and red anemones, cyclamen etc. sometimes a big patch would be red, sometimes blue and sometimes yellow, and at other times mimed. Well, as to our journey – after getting away from Haifa we passed the Plain of Jezrael which looked very fertile and is under cultivation, chiefly by Arabs.

Passed a village called Jaffa near Nazareth, The roads are very winding and white and we all had to put on our dark glasses, We met many camel-trains, Arabs, sheep, goats and donkeys and the road is very stony and mountainous. At 10 A. M. we passed Nazareth and at 10:20 passed Little Hermon and Mt. Tabor and a little later Mt. Jebboah where Saul was killed. 10:30 passed Jezrael village. I have never seen such stony country – some of the hills seem composed of stone and everywhere there are stones. Many of the hills are cultivated and this seems strange after what I have said, but for generations I suppose, work has been going on and some of the hills are now beautiful terraces, stones have been gathered and these are used to keep the terrace in position, reinforced as it were by stone walls, especially during the wet season. Every available spot has crops or olives, fig trees and almonds and they are most beautiful. The crops are such a wonderful green and you know the colour of the olive trees, a grey-green and all the different shades with the grey stone is a wonderful sight. Then the valleys – they are something to remember all one's life. Mr. Tannous compared them to a carpet and it was a happy simile. Some of them were like wonderful Persian carpets. One particular one I have in my mind's eye at present; but I must tell you that the valleys are owned by many people and each one puts in his crops, - there are no fences, but when one is near can see that stones mark off the plots. These crops are perhaps put in at different times and so vary in shade, some dark green, others light while some of the plots are only ready for crops and the ground is chocolate red. These plots are not uniform in size, but a lot of them are oblong in shape, so ran your picture at all what it looks like? (When we were on our return journey when we passed some of these valleys, it was when the sun was setting and the result was just wonderful, indescribable.) The Arabs plough with very primitive ploughs. We saw many storks in the fields, and many Arab villages – the Arabs live in mud huts or tents. At 10:40 we passed a British Camp used during the war and at 10:45 the Village of Jenner and saw the Arabs drawing water from a well at road-side to water their flocks. We do not meet many women, but occasionally see them weeding their crops in the fields. At 11:10 we saw the Hill of Gotham where Joseph was sold by his brothers. At 11:30 got the first glimpse of the Mediterranean since we left Haifa. The scenery here was most beautiful, great valleys, rocky mountains, olive trees and green crops. Next, saw the Plain of Sharon in the distance and passed fields of lentils and wheat. At 12 noon, saw an old Roman Aqueduct – saw many of them during the trip. Then came to the Hills of Old Samaria, on the side of which was the ruin of the old gate built by King Saul. At 1:20 passed new City of Nablus – Mt. Gerizim and Mt. Ebal, where the Samaritans go every year at this time (first week in April) to keep the Passover, as they used to do in olden times. We had lunch at the Hotel Palestine at Nablus and at 1:25 passed through Sheehan where Christ met the woman from Samaria, the tomb of Joseph and Jacob's Well, 2 P. M. saw the remains of a motor truck used in the late war and also a stone marked S. J. showing the boundary between Samaria and Jerusalem. At 2:25 we passed a village called Ainsenia which had been bombarded during the war, because it came in the way of their march. The ruins now remain, but even so, we saw that part of it was used by Arabs. After this, the villages were cleaner and richer, for as our guide said they were owned by Christians. We passed Ancient Bethel where Jacob had his vision or dream. At 2:40 Passed Ancient Beireth (?) where the parents of Jesus, when He was 12 yrs. old, missed Him and went back to Jerusalem to find Him. We saw a school about here called, the Friend's American Mission School and the Hill of Mispah where the tomb of the Prophet Samuel is. We then saw a big piece of cleared flat ground and it was so unusual. We asked what it was, and found it was for the use of airplanes, made by the British for air service. Passed excavation of home of Saul built 4000 years ago and later Damascus gate and reached Jerusalem about 3:30 P. M.

Mr. Tannous had arranged for us to stay at the "Casa Nova Hotel" – outside the old city, a Christian part and it turned out to be quite good, clean and comfortable. We started almost at once sight-seeing with Mr. Tannous, first going through the old bazaar, very quaint but also dirty to visit the Holy Sepulchre Church. This Church is very magnificent and was built by Queen Helena about 300 years A.D. over the spots connected with the crucifixion of Christ. On first entering we were struck with the magnificent windows etc., gold in abundance, but I have not time to go into detail about it. After leaving this main part had to go downstairs and were first shown the stone of unction where Christ was anointed after the crucifixion, then the tomb of Jesus, which you remember Joseph of Aramathea gave for His burial and also a piece of stone which is said to be wart of the stone which was rolled in front of door. After Joseph of Ar gave his tomb to Jesus, he had another hewn out of the rock for himself and family and with lighted candles we went into this dark place. Then the place where Mary met Jesus and thought him the gardener, the place where the soldiers cast lots upon His garments, the place where Queen Helena found three crosses, and crown of thorns, the pillar upon which Christ sat as the Jews mocked Him Calvary where Christ was nailed to the cross and crucified.

We saw a most beautiful painting by Murillo, of Mary and the departed Jesus, said to be the artist's masterpiece, and a statue of the Virgin in a glass case, This statue, has a most beautiful face and is life size (1/2 length). It is almost covered with jewels, rings, bracelets, necklaces, indeed of almost every description, most valuable stones, altogether worth 25,000,000. These have been given by Pilgrims. All this and many in Jerusalem almost starving.

We then went to the Russian Church which is built over part of the old wall of Jerusalem (wall built in time of Solomon) and which we saw inside the building, Leading from the road is the door or gate through which Christ left the city to go to Calvary, passed the "needle's eye" – there are really two of them (these gates) fairly close together and one much larger than the other, but even the larger one would not allow a loaded camel to pass through, it would have to be unloaded. We then walked along a piece of old road, (which has been left intact), on which Christ must have walked on His way to Calvary. We went down a sort of underground portion and here we saw, what is believed to be the spot where the Star shone throes and then the spot where the "Manger" was. (Mr. Tannous said they could not tell exactly each spot, but that they were certainly about right and some were quite correct.) In this underground part, (that is below the main entrance,) parts of the church are allotted to the different nationalities – Greeks, Arabs, Armenians, R. Catholics etc. and near this portion we were astonished and amused too, to see a policeman sitting - armed. We were told that he was there all day long – to keep the peace in case of the different sects quarrelling. There is a very bitter feeling against the Jew's in Jerusalem and no Jew is allowed even to enter the courtyard.

After lunch at Hotel we visited the Garden of Gethesemene and the Mt. of Olives. Then we passed a large building or Hospice built by the German Emperor and Empress and what is now the residence of the Governor of Palestine – Sir Herbert Samuel: then saw the Carmelite Convent, from which the nuns after entering behind its doors, never come out. Here we entered a Courtyard built over the spot where the Lord's Prayer was supposed to be given by Christ. Around this covered courtyard are hung large tablets on which the Lord's Prayer is printed in about 36 different, languages, At 3:15 we passed Bethany, the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus. Saw parts of the old road to Jericho. The new road, on which we are now travelling, used to be very dangerous owing to bandits or robbers, but now since the British control is quite safe. The roads all along here (the aides of the Hills of Judea) are very ceding and barren and are composed of limestone. Except for a call shrub, very sparse in parts too, after passing the hills it is all deserts, white sand and is of course trying to the eyes. Hyenas etc, infest these parts. The winding roads put me in mind of our N.Z. roads, say between New Plymouth and Te Kuiti and any such places, only on our roads it would be dense bush instead of desert. At 3:30 we passed the Apostles Spring where Christ and His disciples rested, on their way to Jericho from Jerusalem. There is now a wayside inn at this point. In going over all these parts in a comfortable motor-car, I could not help thinking of all the rough, weary walks Christ and His disciples had. How they got over that rough, stony or sandy ground I know not. They must have been very weary and tired.

At 4:15 we reached the Dead Sea, which is 1200 ft. below sea level. It is from 10 to 15 miles wide and about 47 miles loam and is 9 times saltier than any other sea water. Of course we had to taste it, it was terribly bitter and salt. We gathered a few small shells and stones. The R. Jordan flows into it, but it does not rise and fall much, though it has no outlet, owing to the great evaporation. From here we saw the village of Modern. Jericho in distance – an oasis in the desert, it was beautifully green. At 4:50 we reached the Banks of the R. Jordan and got a bottle of its water and I took a couple of snaps. Here there are many banana and orange groves. At 5:40 got to the Spying of Elisha in Modern Jericho, Th4s is the spring that was bitter and Elisha put a 11Pmdflal of salt in it and it became sweet. The British have built a huge cement basin round it and the water just gushes into it and the people are able to irrigate their lands – hence the lovely growth of bananas, oranges etc. People come from long distances to get water from here, Old Jericho, of which nothing but portions of the old walls remain, is just above Modern Jericho, We saw parts of the walls, they were built of irregular stones and mud P110 it was no wonder they fell down when the priests and people tramped round 7 times blowing their trumpets. We poked round and found bits of the ancient pottery. From here we drove back to Jerusalem arriving at 7:15 P. M. On our way home saw a most beauties sunset.

25th. Lord Balfour is entering. Jerusalem this morning, is coming for the opening of the New Jewish University, There is a lot of ill feeling about this between the Arabs and the Jews and a strike is feared, so Mr. Tannous has advised us staying in Hotel all morning. So we are employing our time writing letters and P. Cds. Later – After lunch Mr. Tannous came again and said everything was quiet, that the strike was a peaceable one – all closing shops, schools and they hung black flags up to show they were mourning, so we went out with him for a walk and then went back to the Hotel for our things and started on our homeward journey. We went as far as Nablous, where we spent the night, arriving there about 7 P. M. Tannous had phoned for rooms and they had a good dinner ready for us at the Hotel Palestine which was very clean and comfortable. We were very tired but were glad to be on our way back to Haifa. Next morning started off again – passed Dothan where Joseph went to see his brothers, and they put him in the well; Sulam, the home of the Shumaite woman; Jezreel where Jezebel was eaten by dogs; Naim, where Christ raised the only son of a widow; Ender, home of the witchwoman; and Plain of Ezdraelon. We then went through Nazareth the home of Jesus; passed the Virgin fountain; Cana of Galilee; the Horns of the Hittites; where Christ gave the Sermon on the Mount; and the Plain where Christ fed the 5000 and 7000 people. We arrived at Tiberias at 12:30 quite ready for the good lunch prepared by the Hotel people at Nablous, and which we ate in the gardens there. After lunch, went out on the Sea of Galilee in a boat for about of an hour. The day was Perfect end after we started on our journey again and got higher up, we will never forget the view we got - the beautiful blue Sea, almost surrounded by hills which were reflected in the sea. Mt. Hermon snow capped in the distance and the town of Tiberias nestling on the shore It was a wonderful sight, We then passed Magdala, the home of Mary Magdalene; Bethsaida; the home of Jonah; and the forest where Debora killed Sisera and then passed through the same parts we had been through on our outward journey, but seen from the opposite direction, gave a different outlook. Needless to say we enjoyed our trip immensely, but we were very glad to get back to Haifa about 5 P. M.

27th. A German Bahá'í lady arrived this morning from Stuttgart, in time for breakfast. She is a Miss Horn, who has come for a week's visit and she too is to stay at the Pilgrim House. Effie and I have been into town with films and after lunch some men Bahá'ís came to visit us – two Arabs from Baghdád, an Indian from Bombay who lives in Persia and a Persian. Soheil tells us that nearly all the Arabs from Baghdád are most earnest Bahá'ís and that the two who came to see us are pure bred Arabs; they are such fine looking, big men, beautifully dressed and – with such bright happy faces. They had heard we were coming to Haifa and were most keen to meet friends from such a long distance. They are all so polite and though they could not speak a word of English, we got on all right through an interpreter. So you see we were a unique company - Arabs, Persians, American, German, Australian and N.Z. and all meeting as brothers and sisters. This day Shoghi Effendi and Dr. Esslemont came and had lunch with us.

28th. Three Bahá'í ladies came to see us; one of them with two beautiful children, is a widow and is a sister of the wife of Zia Baghdád in America. The two boys (7 and 5 years old) recited to us in French, English and Arabic and Pension. One of the ladies, have mentioned before, Khánum Zia (where we heard the phone record) speaks English well so we got on all right. Shoghi Effendi and Dr. Esslemont came again to lunch and Shoghi Effendi gave us a beautiful talk, which he always does, whenever we meet him. In the afternoon we visited Madam Yazdí with Tooba Khánum and Monever Khánum. She Madam Yazdí is a cousin of the family and is a most charming, sweet and loveable woman. We all love her very much - she too talks English very well. Before we left she chanted to us so beautifully and though the chanting is in Persian, we get the spirit of it and appreciate it.

29th. Sunday - Shoghi Effendi sent for Effie and me to go over for another interview, but we had not been there very long before Schell came to say they were waiting at the Pilgrim House to take our with the Arabs, Persians, etc. We were taken in the dining room. I then took the two Arabs alone. in the afternoon again visited the Household and this time saw the G. H. Leaf, glad to say she is about again, she looked so sweet - one just its to sit and look at her. We then drove up Mt Carmel in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's carriage (waggonette with 3 seats we would call it) and first visited the ladies afterwards going to the men's meeting, Shoghi Effendi was there. As usual we were given the seats of honour and tea and biscuit. One of the men chanted a prayer and then we all went to the Shrines and Shoghi Effendi chanted so beautiful. He has a lovely sweet voice6 Everything is done so reverently, and as said before, we can feel the Spirit of it.

30th. In aft visited ladies and Effie and went up Et Carmel. It is a beautiful walk - there are two ways of going up, one is shorter but each rougher. The better road is longer and was built by 'Abdu'l Bay for the good of the town, with money presented to Him which He would not accent for Himself.

31st. This is our last day in Haifa and very sorry we are, we do riot want to leave at all, but must go to catch our boat at Port Sa'íd, we leave early tomorrow morning. Effie and I went up Mt. Carmel and took photos, visited the Shrines and when we came down hill, found we were to leave next morning, we thought we had a day longer. In aft, we visited Shoghi Effendi and He told us we were to see the pictures of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb and 'Abdu'l Baba, which we did. Shoghi Effendi had told us he would meet us up Mt Carmel, so after seeing the pictures we went up in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's carriage. Shoghi Effendi chanted for us and gave us flowers. Some of us walked home with Him and He talked so beautifully. Soon after we got home He sent for Effie and me to say good bye - this time we went upstairs to His room where he does all. His work and which looks right out on the big light on the Shrine. We had a lovely – time and I asked him if He would read a prayer to us in English, which He did. He did read it so beautifully de then said good bye to Him and He assured us of His continued prayers and also for each one in our different assemblies. While we were having our evening meal, Mr. and Mrs. Badi‘ Bushivi ( he Is Governor of the Province) came to bid us good bye and then we packed and got to bed about midnight.

April 1st Up at 5:45 A. M. Rooha Khánun came to breakfast and afterwards went to Household to pay our farewell visit, which was very touching, and though so early the G. H. Leaf was up. As we were going out of the garden Effie and I saw the H. Mother sitting on her verandah and went up to her for a minute - she, the dear, was quite overcome. We all drove down to the station in the carriage (our luggage having gone on before) and Martha and about eleven Bahá’ís came to see us off, they are all such dears. ‘Azíz’u’lláh came in the train with us as he is going to Germany for treatment for his hand, He had pernicious 7m7aria p_na the Dr gave so many injections that his wrist has become paralised0 This railway line was built by the British during the war to be used for transporting their mend Before we got past Mt Carmel (which by the way is not one Mt but a range and one particular point, is called Mt. Carmel, the rest Carmel Mts.) we saw lots of olive trees which Axis said must be 3 or 4000 years old, then the Church which is built over Elijah’s cave. When we came to Haifa it was a night trip, but now it is daylight so we can see what we did not before. We passed beautiful fields, just golden, others red with wild flowers. We saw several mirages, also many orange groves – the famous Jaffa oranges (and how we have enjoyed them). In one part of the desert we saw such quantities of date palms and in this part the Arabs dig deep in the sand till they reach moisture and plant vegetables and some looked quite nice. When we got to Kantara where we have to change trains and cross the canal, we were surprised to see Fugeta (who was on holiday at Port Sa’íd) and Muḥammad Mustapha at the station. (M. Mustapha was the one who was so kind to us at P. Said before and who came with us to Kantara). It was good to meet them again and needless to say they were of great help to us. We had to wait 3 hours for our train so had tea and toast on the platform. We at last got on the train for Port Sa’íd – the Canal divides Palestine from Egypt, so now we are in Egypt, and arrived at Port Sa’íd about 10:30 P. M. where several Bahá’ís were waiting for U.S. We went to the “Hotel de la Poste” and were glad to get to beds which were clean and comfortable.

April 2nd. Effie and I wrote letters till lunch, then went into town. We saw a Greek funeral, which was most impressive – a girl of 22. Went back to Hotel and found -the boat, (Es Bay) was delayed owing to a storm – was held up in the Canal. By this delay we were able to go to the Bahá’í meeting, but we were rather late as the rain was so heavy. At last we went in motor car and were received by about 30 men - all sorts of nationalities. We were given tea and biscuits and after some talk we were asked to speak. Effie and I both said a few words and Effie said a prayer in English by request, and Mrs. Blundell read out of the “Hidden Words”. ‘Azíz gave a lovely talk and a man chanted and several of the men spoke. Of course all had to be interpreted. It was a beautiful meeting so peaceful and they were all so pleased to have us there. When we got back to Hotel we found two Bahá’í ladies waiting to see us, one the wife of a Bahá’í and the other his sister. They brought us a beautiful bunch of flowers and a box of sweetmeats made by the wife – an Amyrian.

3rd. We were called at 1:30 A. M. and were told we had to go on boat. Got up and dressed and Hugh and ‘Azíz went off in pouring rain to find out particulars and found that the boat was not leaving till 8 a.m. so we went back to bed till 5:45. Had a cup of tea and went to the customs office (Chad to pay a little on camera) and then went over to boat in a small boat to find that she was not leaving till noon. Mr. Mustapha, ‘Azíz and M. Norhongati all came on board with us and were most kind. Well, we left at noon and almost immediately got into rough water and after our lunch got into our bunks and there stayed till the morning of the 3rd when the storm had abated. Almost everybody was sick. 5th Sunday – A beautiful day and everybody well again – ship quite steady. This ship - Esperance Bay is not nearly as nice as the Larg’s Bay – it was so clean and comfortable, but we must take into consideration that the Larg’s Bay had only about 180 passengers and this one has nearly 800. 6th. Had a thunderstorm through the night but it is beautiful today – quite a strong wind blowing, but the boat is quite steady. 2:30 P. M. We are just passing Malta, can see it quite plainly.

April 11th Nothing of much importance since I wrote the above and I must finish off because a mail closes tonight. It was pretty cold in the Mediterranean, we could see snow on mountains on both the African and European coasts. We passed Gibraltar yesterday at noon and had a splendid view, as it was nice and clear. I took some snaps. We are now in the Atlantic Ocean and at present going through the Bay of Biscay. It is wonderfully calm, but a fair Ocean swell. We are due to reach Southampton early on Monday 13th Inst, so it won’t be long before we get to London now. We won’t be sorry – though we have enjoyed our trip, it has been so long, over three months since we left Auckland. With much love to everybody, to each one at meeting.

I remain,

Your loving sister,

Margaret B. Stevenson

March 20th, 1925

My dear Amy and Lillas,

I have now been a week in Haifa, but I will start as from the 11th the day I last posted to you, 11th. We arrived at Port Suez quite early and anchored outside to enable our boat to get oil and water. About 18 passengers went ashore to visit the Pyramids, but I do not think it was worthwhile as they would be so hurried as they have to join the Largs Bay at Port Sa'id. 12th, we all expected to meet Martha at Haifa but to our great surprise about 6 A. M. at Port Sa'id she appeared at our cabin door. There was great excitement and hurry to dress and get on dealt where she said three Bahá'ís, men were waiting to greet us. One of them, Muḥammad Mustapha, who is in the telegraph department at Port Sa'id could talk English quite well, so that heaped us. They gave us such a nice welcome. They went ashore and after we had breakfast we went on deck to say good bye to the friends we had made on our journey. By this time there were herds of natives on board selling things and Oh, how they did jabber. We then went off in a little boat and getting through the customs was something to be remembered. Fortunately Martha had a letter from someone which enabled us to get through without anything being opened, but it was the confusion and jabber that made it terrible.

We at last got to the Hotel where Martha had a room and she told us that Monever, one of the Holy Leaves, the youngest daughter of 'Abdu'l Baba, was in Port Sa'id and that she was to see us at eleven o'clock. She came and she was just delightful. She greeted us with such love and said 'hello' they were all looking forward to meeting us. All the daughters are very sweet and can talk English fairly well, - but this is going ahead, I must go on with my narrative.

She had with her a sister of her husband's, this sister's husband and their daughter. Monever was the only one who could talk English, but she translated for them and us. We had a lovely time, talking and they chanted for us. After a picnic lunch in Martha's room Monever came again, as I was to take a snap of her (do hope it will come out well). When she came, the others of our party had gone out or were busy, so I had the good, fortune to have about – Írán hour's talk with her, and I did so enjoy it.

At 2.30 Muḥammad Mustapha (who had met us at the boat) came again and brought with him two other Bahá'ís. They are all so eager to meet the travellers from such a distance and one and all make you feel at home and as if the pleasure was all on their side.

After getting some tea at the Hotel (cold ham and eggs) we went off to the train for Haifa. Muḥammad Mustapha met us there and came as far as Kantara with us, for which we were very thankful as we had to change trains here — not only that but we had to cross the canal in a punt and as we were then entering another country (had been in Egypt) we had to get our luggage through the customs again, but Martha's letter again came in useful. Muḥammad was able to do all the talking for us and so we managed all right. We crossed the canal about 7.30 p.m. and our train did not leave till midnight, M. M. waited with us till about nine when he had to go for his train, but he would willingly have waited longer if we would have allowed him and stay all night in Kantara. Such is the devotion of the Bahá'ís here, nothing is too much trouble for them. Our train came to the station at 9.30 so we all got in and had a rest before other passengers came. We did not sleep much, but the train was quite comfortable. As soon as it got light we were able to see something of the country and the nearer we got to Haifa the more cultivated and interesting it became. The camels and donkeys, the Arab villages (mud huts and tents) orange graves, and even the sandy desert were all very interesting, 13th, Haifa. Yes, we have got to our destination, reached here about 10 a.m. Fugeta, the little Japanese Bahá, who served 'Abdu'l-Bahá for two years before His passing was at the station waiting for us with three carriages, (Fugeta is pronounced Fu gee ta.) and took us straight to the Pilgrim House, where we are the guests of the Greatest Holy Leaf, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's sister. We were there met by Mrs Corrine True from Chicago, U.S.A. and several of the Bahá's. Mrs True is the financial Sec. of the Mashrokalaska and is very nice, we all love her. After a rest and lunch we were taken by Mrs True over to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's House to visit Shoghi Effendi. He gave us a very warm welcome in the room where 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to welcome the friends, and after talking to us for a while, he went out of the room and sent the ladies in the Holy Mother ('Abdu'l-Bahá's wife) and one of her daughters. They too gave us a very warm welcome and said how they had been looking forward to our coming. It seems they were so afraid that after the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that the friends would not come to see them, and so they are so delighted, to welcome them. They gave us tea before we left, in beautiful little glass tumblers on a glass saucer and little Persian cakes. After dinner we went to bed as we were all very tired.

14th. Had a good night's rest — lire Blundell and Ethel in one room, Martha, Effie and I in another big one (three 'beds) and Hugh in another. Everything is plain but very comfortable, and the food beautifully cooked. Everything is cooked in ‘Abdu’l Belies house and sent over. They cook for about 80 people, I was afraid I might not like the Eastern dishes but they are very nice, just a bit too rich, but nice to eat. The trouble they go to is wonderful, sometimes 4 or 5 courses for dinner. Fugeta waits beautifully. He is a wonderful man, so obliging and always so harpy — he is just giving up his life to service, to loving service. He is so jolly too and many a joke we all have. He is a great gardener and was just delighted with all the seeds. Martha brought some from S. Africa, Effie from Australia and Ethel and I from N.Z. Fugeta is very small — you will see his photo later. Well, after breakfast Mrs True took us up Mt. Carmel to visit ‘Abdu’l Baba’s and the Báb’s Shrines and a wonderful walk it was, walking up the hill that the Prophets of old, Christ and His disciples, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walked on. They all take off their shoes before entering the Shrines, so of course we adhered to their custom. It was so peaceful and quiet and beautiful. In the afternoon, we again visited the Ladies, where we met the Greatest Holy Leaf and three daughters, when we again got a loving welcome. The Greatest Holy Leaf, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sister is very frail, but Oh, such a sweet lovely woman. Indeed the whole family are just beautiful, so sweet, so loving and they are all so spiritual and we have many beautiful, helpful talks with them. They tell us about the early days which are most instructive and I hope when we get back to 3.Z, we will be able to tell you many things. Shoghi Effendi is not very well so we did not see him. Mr. Mountfort Mills from New York arrived today. He is a lawyer and a very fine earnest Bahá’í. Dr. Esslemont (the writer of The New Era) is also in Haifa, but he is in Hospital getting over asthma. We went to see him, he seems to be a very fine man.

15th Sunday. We went to visit Rosha Khánun, one of the daughters this morning. She lives next door to the Household, which is about 3 minutes walk from this place. She told us a lot about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s early life, so very interesting. Oh, how they all love Him and they are so devoted to each other. It is beautiful to see them together. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sister and wife cannot talk English except to say a word or two and “I love you” and they say they are so sorry as they would like to talk directly to us. The feeling in the house is very wonderful, so peaceful. This aft we went up Mt. Carmel and first we went to the men’s meeting (the women are not allowed to be with them). We were allowed in and it was very interesting. (I am writing with an indelible pencil). They chanted and even though we did not understand, it was lovely. We were all asked to speak to them and one who spoke English, interpreted. Several of the men spoke to us, saying how pleased they were to meet us and giving us a message — this of course through the interpreter. I must tell you that there was to be a Bahá’í wedding this aft, and having met the bridegroom the day before he invited us to the wedding and we were delighted to accept. A custom here, amongst the Persians, is that the bride and bridegroom do not meet before marriage. To us this is terrible, but they say it generally turns out all right. However, the Bahá’ís are not so particular and sometimes see each other a good deal. In this particular case, the pair lived in Alexandretta and had not seen the girl since she was a child and unveiled. He came here and the girl's mother invited him to dinner the day before the marriage and introduced them.

Well to go on with our aft up Mt. Carmel – After we left the men's meeting we went over to the woman's meeting house where all the women and children were and we all met the bride. She looked very nice, but Oh so shy. She was very pale and her hands were so cold - she had a beautiful dress on - white satin, embroidered with gold coloured sequins and beads – looked, very handsome, then she wore a lovely veil of I think, chiffon or ninon. After some talk we were asked to lead her to her bridegroom and I had the honour to give her my arm (just because I happened to be nearest to her.) We took her to the bridal chamber where the bridegroom was waiting for her. He was standing near the door not looking at anybody. There were two chairs placed near the window and the bride was seated on one and the man :The was to perform the ceremony which is very simple, brought the bridegroom to the other seat and joined their hands and said something which of course we could not understand. It was so strange to watch them - they were both so shy, when he was asked something – (I suppose if he would have her) he answered with his head turned from her and when she was asked, this, I suppose same question, she did not answer at all, but just turned her head over her shoulder – (it was funny) and had to be asked again, when she did answer in a very subdued shy voice. Then some money was given to the bridegroom which he passed to her, for it is the custom that a man must give his bride money After it was all over we said good bye to them and they were left alone for a while, and we went back to the other room and had Persian tea, cakes and sweets, after which we went home. (I forgot to say that each of us took the bride a little gift). When we were passing the room where we had left the bride and bridegroom, he had one over to the men's meeting room and she had numbers of her friends round her. We visited the Holy Shrines before going home. I think I told you that Shoghi Effendi was not very well. I am glad to say he is a good deal better; but the Greatest Holy Leaf is not well - has, they think, (or rather the Doctor does) slight pneumonia, so they are all very concerned.

16th. We went to Cook's this morning to get some Egyptian money, then left some films at the photographers and when we came home got word that we were to go and see Shoghi Effendi and we had a lovely talk with him. I am taking notes, which you will see later. After this Mrs. True took us to see an old olive tree which was planted by the Romans about 2000 years ago and Effie and I took snaps of it. There is a seat under it, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit under it many times. We had aft tea with the ladies again. We always enjoy this time as we get such a lot of information from them. Sometimes one of them will come over here, and we get a lovely talk from her.

17th. This morning we started off for 'Akká. Shoghi Effendi had planned all the trip. We left Haifa in the 8:15 a.m. train, and it was quite interesting. First we crossed the R. Kishon where Elijah slew 360 Priests of Baal, saw camels, sheep, Arab huts and tents, and sand hills. I must tell you that 'Akká is exactly opposite Haifa, both are on the sea shore in a big Bay (Aces. Bay) like this 'Akká Haifa. When we got out of the train (about an hour's journey) the carriage 'that 'Abdu'l-Bahá need and the same one He went in when He went to be knighted, met us. It has three seats, so holds quite a number. Our party consisted of the 3 Blundells, Martha, Mrs. True, Effie and myself, Fugeta and the cook and her little daughter. The journey was most interesting then. We first visited the house Bahá'u'lláh lived for seven years, it faces the sea and has a beautiful view - I took one snap. This house was really composed of two joined together, the back portion being occupied by another family. As the family of Bahá'u'lláh were so crowded, it was impossible for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to get married, so the man who was in the other part of the house, offered to out a door through the wall and give Him a room. This was done and He got married. We then went to the Baracks or the Most Great Prison, where the whole family and the followers who were banished to Aces were first brought. The authorities did not expect such a number of prisoners and so the first night they (about 70) were placed in the basement of this prison, but after that they, the family, were given the upper part and the rest of them given another part. These parts of the barracks are new used as a hospital for prisoners. We then went on and arrived at the Pilgrim House at 'Akká. Soheil arrived later on horseback and later still Mr. Mountfort Mills and 'Azíz'u'lláh, one of Shoghi Effendi's Secretaries, and who has his meals with us, as does Soheil. Soheil is a grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and also Shoghi Effendi's Secretary. The Palace of Bahjí, which is ne.7t door to the Pilgrim House, was where Bahá'u'lláh went to reside during the last years of His exile and where He passed away. After Bahá'u'lláh's passing 'Abdu'l-Bahá rented a house for Himself and this is now the Pilgrim House -there we stayed, still rented. The room (quite a big one) where Mrs. Blundell, Ethel, Effie and I slept in (separate beds) was I understand where 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote "The Divine Plan". Muḥammad All, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's half-brother (the leader of the Náqíḍins) lives in the Palace with his wife. Bahá'u'lláh's Shrine is built adjoining the Pilgrim House. There is a beautiful little garden in the Shrine a' all the sow was carried there by 'Abdu'l-Bahá and some of the Believers. We all gathered some flowers from it and also from the beautiful garden outside, which we have pressed and when dry I will send some.

18th. After a good night's rest and breakfast, we visited the Shrine, and we all repeated prayers, Hidden Words etc. in English. Then we started off for the Riḍván Garden, but before we started Effie took snap of us in carriage and Soheil on horseback. (I took snap of 'Abdu'l Baba's donkey). This is the garden 'Abdu'l Baba made and the' beautiful now, is much better a little later in the season. Spring is just beginning here, so the trees are only beginning to burst their leaves. We were sorry the leaves were not further advanced, because there was not much shade and unfortunately a Sorocco wind was blowing and it was very hot. We had lunch under the two mulberry trees under which. Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit. In this trip everything was so beautifully arranged for our comfort and enjoyment - it was wonderful. We came home again by train - Effie and I wanted to go and get our films from the photographers, so we walked back from the train, and Fugeta came with us and took us through the business streets.

March 23rd. My dears, I cannot write no mores as we are all off to Jerusalem etc. this A. M. leave in an hour, just after breakfast; but want to post as we will not be back here till Saturday (28th). We have hired a motor and dividing expenses. Such a lot I want to tell you, but more anon. We are all very well — hope you all are. We were so glad to get the Cable we surmised it was sent from Assembly. It came just as we were going to the men's meeting — so was read out and they were to send a reply. Amy, we are thinking of you today — many, many happy returns and heaps of love and all best wishes. All send love and birthday wishes to you Amy. My dear love to you three dear sisters, all relations and friends. Will you read descriptive part to assembly please and I will not have time for more. Also to any friends and relations.

Ever your loving sister,

Margaret Stevenson

So much going on here, we have little time for writing, so friends etc., must excuse.

Mrs. Sarah Blundell was ‘born in Bur-well, Cambridgeshire, England in 1850 a year sacred in Bahá’í history as that of the Báb’s martyrdom, and was destined to become one of the pioneers of the Bahá’í Cause in New Zealand. She received her early religious training from her “Non-Conformist” father, a man whose strong convictions led him to withdraw his seven year old daughter from religious instruction classes at her boarding school. The feeling of isolation which followed caused her to think for herself and she had the rare distinction of being one of the first women to enter the Cambridge University Examinations in an age prejudiced against the education of women.

In 3886, with her husband and seven children, she arrived in New Zealand where she endured hardship and difficulties in a strange country. She persisted in her unfettered search for truth and rejected several dogmas until, with an open mind and a prepared heart, she read in “The Christian Commonwealth” of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to London in 1911 and sent overseas for additional literature. When Mr. and Mrs. Dunn arrived in Auckland in 1922-3, Mrs Blundell invited them to her home, “Lymbury”, Ridings Road, Remuera to meet a group of twenty people whom she thought might be interested. This was the first Bahá’í meeting in New Zealand and shortly afterwards Mrs. Blundell accepted the Bahá’í Faith.

On hearing from Martha Root that Shoghi Effendi and the Ladies of the Household were eager to welcome the New Zealand friends, Sarah Blundell arranged to make the journey to the Holy Land in 1925 to visit the Holy Family, and the Shrines of the Bah, Balla’u’llah. and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and to meet in person many other Bahá’ís — this was “a crowning gift to one whose spiritual path had been travelled alone”. She returned to New Zealand after first going home to England to see her relatives and, at the Guardian’s suggestion, make personal contact with the English Bahá’í community. She continued to work unsparingly in New Zealand to serve the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh until her passing at the age of eighty-four years on December 20th, 1934.

A PILGRIMAGE TO HAIFA

Albert Joseph

BEFORE THE MANCHESTER ASSEMBLY: FEBRUARY 20TH 1926.

Mr. Albert Joseph said that he set out from Manchester, feeling that he was representing us all on this sweet pilgrimage. For a long time he had felt an ardent longing to visit the Holy Places, and especially to see Shoghi Effendi again. Leaving Manchester on Saturday, December 26th 1925, he passed through London. Paris, Marseilles; touched at Bizerta, on the N. African Coast: and arrived at Alexandria from whence he took trip to Cairo and visited the great Pyramid that Ancient symbol of true Religion which is still one of the wonders of the world.

From Cairo, he took train from Haifa in Palestine, yet as he approached the Holy Land, he felt something a sense of “overwhelming”. He could not analyse his feelings, but thought that if anyone had told him to return home, he would have done so. However, the machinery was in motion, whatever his feelings might be, and the train was swiftly moving towards the city, he had so joyfully set out to reach. He arrived in Haifa during the morning of January 4th 1926, and on that day, he had the pleasure of meeting again and chatting with Rúhí Effendi, who made him feel at home in Haifa and was very kind to him. Later, at about four o'clock, he had the privilege of a most interesting interview with the Beloved Guardian; after which, he, in company with other visitors visited the Shrine of the Blessed Báb and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá upon Mount Carmel, catching the spirit of the Holy Place and breathing the pure air from the historic sea.

He said that those few hours waiting to meet the Beloved Guardian were like twelve months to him. When he met Shoghi Effendi, he seemed overwhelmed. He was in the presence of one quite different from the one we met in Manchester in 1921. The same bright face; eyes that shone even radiantly; but a spirit intensified. He was in the presence of a personality different from us.

The pilgrim said “I do wish everybody who is interested in Shoghi Effendi were able to come to Haifa and visit him”. He also said that Shoghi Effendi answered his questions without his having to ask them for in the things he said to Mr. Joseph the questions were answered. During this interview, the Beloved Guardian gave him this counsel for us all – emphasising it – that we must all keep united; that we must meet as often as possible; and that we should do everything after consultation together: i.e., when all are agreed. The Beloved Guardian also counselled us to send forth regularly as circular letter to all the groups and assemblies. This, he said, keeps all a united whole; keeps all the movement alive and quickens again the assembly that sends it forth, East & West are too Far apart; therefore correspondence takes the place of visiting and brings them close together.

Each day, Mr. Joseph visited the Shrine and prayed for us and for the Bahá’í Movement. Several times he visited the Holy Shrine of Bahjí (the resting place of Bahá’u’lláh outside the age-worn and war-worn little city of Aces). The description he gave of the shrine may be known from so many Bahá’í books and pamphlets and yet we saw it more clearly than ever; the inner shrine no pilgrim is allowed to enter; the other rooms with their brilliant lights and Persian Carpets and rose-gardens. What impressed us most was his attempt to describe the indescribable: one with a better command of the English language would have found it beyond him! – The intense feeling of sanctity which the Holy Places awaken. The atmosphere is one of holiness; full of a quality which reduces the lover to tears while filling the soul with wonderful

My dear Friends and Co Workers,

I have the good news that our Beloved Guardian is once again in out . He assured yesterday (Friday, 15th Oct.) and is very well and happy. The receiving of fam___ news are the How is Bahá'u'lláh in Baghdád has greatly cheered him and the dear friends here. ___ alive and certain that the government will appropriately ___ the property, so it will be out of the hands of the ___ who have made it a shame to one of the believers and thus it may be possible for the Bahá'í to acquire it, though it may not be for a long love yet. It is gratifying to ___ that it will be out the hands of faucilical Muslims. He also received a very beautiful letter from Queen Maria of Romania and includes to quote one or two Passages in the letter of the friends so you will receive that He is delighted with the ___ Martha has accomplished. Let us pray that this spiritual minded Queen will soon be conscious of the Station of Bahá'u'lláh and become one of the true and faithful believer's form of steadfast in the Covenant and Testament and ___ proclaim to all she comes in contact with the teachings of the Great Revelation Bahá'u'lláh for the New Age. Shoghi Effendi's first enquire was for news of the dear friends in Australia. He asked me when writing to tell you how happy he was to receive your individual letters while he was away and express the wish that he hopes you will still continue to correspond with him even if he may not be able to send replies individually and to assure you each one of his earnest prayers for you. He told me he had replied to each letter he had received from you during his vacation. He is anxious to hear both from father and mother Dunn about their link of activities. I told him they have mentioned in my letter that they had refrained from writing because he had so much ___ patience, but he said, 'Give them my earned love and tell them I desire to receive letters from them both. Please ask them to write to me, I am glad to tell you, that our dear brother Bahi Effendi _____ who corresponds with you from the local assembly here has made _____ factory Progress from the severe operation and will in a few days leave here to spread a few work, _____ Lebanon to recuperate before resuming his _____ duties as Governor of Tiberias.

The Local Spiritual Assembly at their meeting _____ week chose the name 'Nairani' for our new pilgrim house, which means full of light. Is it _____ a beautiful name? New heal the electricity _____ metallated it is indeed full of material light when necessary, _____ way its halls and rooms even be persuaded with the luminosity and light of the great Sun of _____ the light of love which _____ us to see and love one another in _____ and accord and become co-workers and mirror _____ this Divine light from our hearts to all _____ come in contact with Shoghi Effendi sends you his warm love and greetings and also the _____ of the Holy Family ever answering you of their _____ prayers for your spiritual growth to material welfare and that you may be richly blessed in all your activities for the Beloved Cause. My dear Bahá'í Friends,

I feel ashamed to write to you, though I have been _____ so long I leave _____ you or even _____ and always remember you. I visit the Holy Shrine. Procrastination that there is certainly a hue proverb (in my case always). I knew _____ well in your charitableness heart will forgive _____ for my time has been fully occupied ever since and Esselmont returned then his illness and passed away was a great _____ then the Pilgrim House seems to leave _____ a _____ instead of a quiet house every American Pilgrim for their scion seemed to be a _____ and came here to recuperate. The last three _____ sick nearly all the _____ of their visit. They _____ last week from Qr Said and Shoghi Effendi was _____ for them to depart so he could leave for the . He left today midnight and the friends went to with the many _____ and perplexities of the Cause. So necessary for the friends to _____ the _____ in unity and harmony and give him cooperation. I have just received a _____ from _____ telling me that _____ well I do she is better _____ this. We _____ the Holy Shrine on the night of the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh Bahjí and I prayed specially for you all and I wont ever _____ with Zia Khánúm and her husband and again supplicate at the Holy Threshold especially for _____ I am afraid the sad news which awaits and you was a great _____ and _____ Rúhánquíz _____ to me then I spoke to Shoghi Effendi and said he hadn't receive any and so I did _____ to write. I wrote and asked Margaret and if it were true convey my love and sympathy to you, and I am _____ did. I received a letter from her some time ago _____ the sad news and also from Mother Dunn. It is needless for me to say anything foe I knew that you are _____ your dear son and brother has been called to _____ service, I am sure by the account I have heard of _____ he was a beautiful true rich in blossom and fruit for _____ garden. I picked some of the white flowers creeper at Bahjí and placed it in the Holy _____ to send specially to you to place on his _____ when you leave the opportunity to visit it. Mrs. Greenleaf asked Shoghi Effendi of the Bahá'í Cause was not a great spiritual democracy? He said: "Yes, in that the governing body is elected by a free and absolutely free ballot; that the delegates were elected by the people and that in turn they elected the members of this body." He said: "However, after the body is elected, it is supreme." He used the word "supreme". Then he said, "If there are any questions after the election, they should hold over in abeyance until the following year, but there must be absolute unity and loyalty to the body once elected. There, must be the utmost loving kindness. That unless, everyone's heart was in the utmost loving state, we could not have the full expression of the Will of Bahá'u'lláh. That there was a unity existing that was not expressed." "The test of loyalty is loyalty to the Assemblies."

Palestine 8th May, 1925

Mrs. S. Blundell

c/o Andrews Bro. Prop. Lt

5th Milton St. London E.L.2

Alláh-el-Abhá!

Dear Bahá'í Sister,

Shoghi Effendi was very pleased to receive this morning your letter of 28th April, but we were very sorry to hear you have been ill and hope your health will soon be completely restored. It was nice that you saw Shoghi's sister and Sohiel's brother in London.

I forget whether I gave you the address of Mr. and Mrs. King of Messes Hafnan and King, 202 year old Christ lurch Rd. Bournemouth. They are very kind hearted Bahá'ís and will be delighted to see any of you if you call. Both of them work in the business and you are more likely to see them if you call there. They live alone the shop.

I gave your sister Challi's address at West-Moons (Herndon Lodge). You can get there by bus from _____. (She keeps a nursing home) or you can go by train from West-_____ to West Moon station which is within 5 minutes to Herndon Lodge. I hope you will be _____.

As I write, the Greatest Holy Leaf is on a visit to the Shrine of the Master. It is over a year, I think, since she has been able to visit the shrine and until now she has not seen the new Gardens, in the trying out of which Shoghi Effendi has taken such a deep interest. The Gardens are looking lovely now and it is easy to imagine how delighted she will be. One day during the feast of Ridván she and the Holy Master were alike to visit Bahjí and the Garden of Ridván.

I have quite recovered from my pleurisy now and am steadily regaining my strength.

Shoghi Effendi is still tired. I hope he will soon be able to take a rest.

All the friends here join in loving greetings and best wishes to yourself, your son, daughter, Mrs. Stevenson and Effie Baker. With warmest greetings, your brother o the service of the Beloved.

J.E. Esselmont.

My dear precious sister in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

I was so glad to hear from you directly and learn of your improved health and meeting with the English Bahá’ís. I need not assure of my ardent prayers for your happiness, happiness and continued success in the service of the cause. I hope and pray you will be enabled by the guiding spirit of the Master not only to stimulate the interest of your friends and relatives in this cause out to make of some of _____ interest and whole-hearted believer and supporters of the Faith.

Dear Spiritual Sister:

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated Jan. 24, 1926.

He hopes that after the long vacation you have, had you are ready to begin again spread the Cause in New Zealand with even greater energy than before. The people here seem to be brave in their outlook, receptive to any idea which helps the human family from decreasing its burden.

Shoghi Effendi was most chagrined to hear of the sudden death of your son and wishes me to extend to you his deepest live and sympathy.

There is no special new here except that, we have removed to the new pilgrim-house. Miss Baker is well and very busy entertaining the friends and arranging the new home.

Shoghi Effendi as well as the other members of the family are well and send you their love and greeting. They earnestly pray for your success and hope to hear, before long, the ___ in many of your victories in the field of service to the Cause.

Please convey my loving greeting to your son and daughter.

Yours most sincerely,

Rúhí Afnán

My dear fellow worker;

I wish to express in person my deep sympathy in the heavy loss you have sustained. May the Beloved comforter strengthen you and sustain you in your bereavement. The memory of your visit to the Holy Land is still fresh and vivid in my mind and I pray and supplicate at the Holy Shrines that your labours in the Cause may yield an abundant harvest. Your sympathies another.

My very dear Mrs. Blindell:

Shoghi Effendi has been in receipt of your interesting letter dated June 7, 1926. It is a great pity that your health has more or less handicapped you in your service to the Cause. We, however hope, that this weakness will soon vanish and your health and strength be fully restored.

The case of the teacher who has been in Palestine is one really to be lame. All such persons instead of procuring their information from the very sources, when they are so near to it, they go to the missionaries who are undoubtedly biased. They are immediately told that the cause is nothing more than a sect of As the Holy Land please assure ____.

My dear fellow worker:

I rejoice to learn that your dear sons are rallying gradually the significance of this unique and mighty cause, and my constant and fervent prayer is that you may witness ere long the friction of their slow yet sure spiritual evolution. Persevere in your labours for I entertain and cherish the brightest hopes for the future awakening of promising New Zealand. I shall ever remember the memorable visit of the first New Zealand believers.

Islám; a movement that may do immerse good to the Muḥammadan world, but far from ranking with Christianity or satisfying its needs. Then they refer this ignorant and innocent person to books such as Brown's. It is their fault for having gone to the wrong sources for proper information, but once they have gone, it is not their mistake to have been misled. We have heard of such many instances and there is absolutely no remedy except to place them until they find the truth for themselves. We can only pray for their guidance.

Shoghi Effendi always prays for you as well as the other. The other Auckland friends, so that I bought your combined effort the Cause may prosper there and obtain a strong position in the life of the people. I am not the least familiar with the social condition there, but I am sure there is a ready field for active service.

Yours in His Name,

Rúhí Afnán

Haifa, 23-10-1926

Dear Spiritual Sister;

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 11-9-26. He was most grateful to learn that the Cause is becoming more and more known and appreciated by the people in New Zealand. This is as important as the actual increase of the number of friends for it means that the principles are gradually permeating the thoughts of the people and making them more ready and receptive to the full identification of their beliefs with the precepts of the Cause.

Shoghi Effendi wishes me to assure you of his prayers for you as well as the other friends in New Zealand. He hopes that they will increase both in number as well as in spiritual understandings insight. The reports that we occasionally receive from there are most encouraging and hopeful. It seems that the people there due to their breadth of mind and lack of traditional drawbacks show better project than many other places.

With deepest loving greetings.

Yours in His Name

My dear co-worker;

Your letter rejoiced my heart. I request you to persevere and renew your splendid efforts for me. Consolidation of the work already achieved. I have great hopes in the herald of the south and trust the the editor will be guided strengthen in his noble undertaking – he obliged if you send me any copies of newspapers that may publish anything on the Cause as I am preparing a collection of them in the Holy Land. Please assure the friends in New Zealand of my continued prayers at the Holy Shrines for the success of their pioneer work.

Your _____ brother.

FAMILY AND EARLY LIFE

Keith Ransom-Kehler was born Nannie Keith Bean in Dayton, Kentucky, across the Ohio River from the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, on 14 February 1876. Her parents were William Worth Bean, who used the courtesy title “Colonel” often adopted by descendants of Confederate officers, and Julia Bean (née Julia Belle Keith). Nannie Keith, who came to be known solely by the family name Keith, had a younger brother, William Worth Bean Jr. (b. 1880). The family lived in the Cincinnati area, where from 1880 to 1889 Colonel Bean owned a horse-drawn rail line that ran on the Kentucky side of the Ohio River. Keith received her early education at the Bartholomew English and Classical School for Girls in Cincinnati and later attended Miss Grant’s School in Chicago.

In 1889 Keith's parents and maternal grandparents moved to the Saint Joseph-Benton Harbor area of southwestern Michigan, where her father and grandfather were among a group that bought the streetcar system. Shortly thereafter, Colonel Bean formed the company that brought electricity to the twin cities less than ten years after the invention of the electric light bulb. His pioneering ventures caused him to be recognized as one of the area's leading citizens.

Keith Bean attended Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, New York, an outstanding tertiary educational institution for women, and received a bachelor's degree in child psychology in 1898. In 1901, at the age of twenty-five, she married Ralph Ransom, a young painter from Saint Joseph who had attended the Art Institute of Chicago. She spent some time with him in Paris, where he studied with the influential American painter and etcher James McNeill Whistler, completing his studies at the Académie des Beaux-Arts in Paris in 1906. Meanwhile, Keith Ransom continued to pursue her own interests. Her file at Vassar College indicates that she attended Albion College in Michigan in 1903-04, earning a master's degree in 1904, and then taught English literature there in 1904-05; she also studied at the University of Michigan (1904), the University of Arizona (1907), and the University of Chicago (1910). On 11 February 1907 she gave birth to a daughter, Julia Keith Ransom. A little over a year later, on 5 June 1908, Ralph Ransom died, apparently of tuberculosis. His mother, Mary Ransom, who lived in Saint Joseph, appears to have played a role in raising young Julia when Keith Ransom was traveling (to Europe with her father, for example, in 1908-09), studying, or working in Chicago.

In October 1910 Keith Ransom married James Howard Kehler, a successful and innovative advertising executive with an office on Michigan Avenue in Chicago. She retained and hyphenated her married names, thus becoming known as Keith Ransom-Kehler. In 1913 she gave birth to a stillborn infant. The couple had no other children together. Jim Kehler, who was divorced, had three offspring from a previous marriage: two sons, Stewart and Gordon, and a daughter, Elizabeth (who married Robert Llewellyn Wright, youngest child of Frank Lloyd Wright and Catherine Wright, in July 1933).

James Kehler and Keith Ransom-Kehler enjoyed a high social position in Chicago and friendships with such people as the architect Frank Lloyd Wright. Ransom-Kehler also had an association with Jane Addams, founder of Hull House and of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, established in 1915, of which Ransom-Kehler was a member. In 1914 she became a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution, tracing her ancestry back to her maternal great-great-grandfather, a captain in the Revolutionary War.

Well-educated and independent of spirit, during her two marriages Ransom-Kehler settled into neither domesticity nor a conventional career. In addition to teaching at Albion College, at various times she ran an antique shop, a tearoom, and a chicken and fruit farm, and, after taking a course in design, served as chief consultant for the interior decoration section of the Carson Pirie Scott department store in Chicago. From 1918 to 1922 she led the Liberal Religious Fellowship in the Chicago area. She divided her time between Chicago and New York City, where Jim Kehler had opened an advertising agency on Fifth Avenue by 1915. In 1917 the couple gave up Deer Lick farm, their estate in Deerfield, north of Chicago, and for the next several years lived in apartments and hotels.

A friend, Marion Hofman, recalled: “Because both were temperamentally ‘high powered’ (my recollection of her description of both), they had separate flats (apartments) in N.Y., but I had no doubt of their love for each other.”<sup>1</sup> Their independent arrangement ended when Kehler’s health failed in 1922. Ransom-Kehler nursed her husband through a long illness, from which he seemed to be recovering when he died unexpectedly of a heart attack on 19 June 1923 at their home in Chicago’s northern suburbs; he was only forty-seven years old. His death brought Ransom-Kehler, twice widowed, long-lasting grief.

In 1925 Ransom-Kehler became ill and went to Louisiana to recuperate. After she recovered, she was often on the move, maintaining the Vassar Club in New York City as her permanent address. A small income gave her freedom to travel widely as a lecturer, speaking on child psychology, philosophy, the role of women in modern life, interior design, comparative religion, and the Bahá’í Faith.

BAHÁ’Í ACTIVITIES, 1921–29

Ransom-Kehler became a Bahá’í in May 1921, but her first documented encounter with the Faith occurred a decade earlier, when she met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in London on 13 September 1911. She mentioned the meeting in passing in her diary twenty years later, but no account of the occasion has been discovered. She may have learned of the Bahá’í Faith when she lived in Paris, where the new religion gained attention in expatriate and artistic circles around the turn of the century. May Maxwell, the focal figure in the early Bahá’í community in Paris, was a friend of Ransom-Kehler’s in the 1920s and 1930s, but an earlier connection between the two women has not been established.

Shortly after becoming a Bahá’í, Ransom-Kehler gained recognition as a Bahá’í speaker, writer, and administrator. In 1924–25 she served as secretary of the Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of Chicago—the local governing council (See Administration, Bahá’í. Institutions of Bahá’í Administration. Local Spiritual Assemblies)—until ill health led her to leave for Louisiana. In July 1925 she chaired a session of the Bahá’í Congress held in conjunction with the national Bahá’í convention (See Administration, Bahá’í. Bahá’í. Institutions of Bahá’í Administration. National Spiritual Assemblies) held at Green Acre, the Bahá’í school and conference center in Eliot, Maine; the topic of the evening was “The Economic Foundation of World Brotherhood.” She traveled and lectured on a variety of Bahá’í topics, speaking at a series of meetings in Montreal in mid-1925 and, later that year, addressing meetings of the National Association of Teachers in Colored Schools held in Durham, North Carolina. In New York, between 1926 and 1929, her speaking commitments frequently took her to Harlem, where she assisted with a regular interracial “fireside,” as presentations on the Bahá’í Faith involving questions and discussion are called.

Ransom-Kehler established a reputation as one of the most outstanding Bahá’í speakers of the era. Her talks were described by a contemporary as “well organized, strongly presented, intellectually based.”<sup>2</sup> Her writing was equally well received. She contributed articles to Bahá’í periodicals (among which were forty-six for The Bahá’í Magazine: Star of the West, including three on Bahá’í administration written at Shoghi Effendi’s request).

Early in 1926 Ransom-Kehler went on pilgrimage to the Bahá’í holy places in Mandatory Palestine (See: Bahá’í World Center). She was deeply touched by the authority, majesty, and youth of Shoghi Effendi and by the immense burdens he carried as head of the Bahá’í Faith; in particular she found him “nearly crushed” by a “stupendous avalanche of personal correspondence,”<sup>3</sup> much of it from American Bahá’ís who wrote to air their dissatisfactions and complaints against individuals and spiritual assemblies.

After her pilgrimage, at Shoghi Effendi’s urging, she wrote a letter to the delegates gathered at the annual Bahá’í convention for the United States and Canada in which she described his work poignantly and conveyed a plea for unity that he had expressed to her. “What we need is not so much devotion to the Cause for this has been already abundantly proven,” she quoted Shoghi Effendi as having told her, “but this love. . . must be translated into love for one another. If this Cause cannot unite two individuals how can we expect it to unite the world?” Moreover, the “greatest lesson” for the American Bahá’ís to learn, he had told her, was “spontaneous, full and hearty support of the Spiritual Assemblies,” not because their decisions are “sacrosanct” or “infallible,” but because such support is “‘the only means by which the Cause can be safeguarded.’”<sup>4</sup> In response to this letter, the delegates passed a resolution intended to stem the tide of negative correspondence from American Bahá’ís to Shoghi Effendi.

On returning from her pilgrimage in the spring of 1926, Ransom-Kehler intensified the pace of her activities. She conducted study classes in New York City for hundreds of inquirers attracted by the professional lecturer Orcella Rexford, who gave series of talks on topics of current interest and invited her audiences to separate Bahá’í meetings. Ransom-Kehler’s efforts met with such success that the New York Bahá’ís were encouraged to lease a larger center and launch an ambitious teaching program-involving “a progressive presentation of the Bahá’í Cause, a public forum with invited speakers, and fortnightly meetings addressed by leaders of various liberal and humanitarian movements reflecting the Bahá’í principles”—in which Ransom-Kehler herself participated.<sup>5</sup> She also helped with a series of world unity conferences organized by the American Bahá’í community in 1926–27.

WORLD TRAVELS

In 1929, the year that her daughter graduated from Vassar,<sup>6</sup> Ransom-Kehler made a trip to the West Indies, concentrating on Barbados. She went to the Pacific Coast in 1930, spending almost a year visiting cities in California, Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia. In 1931 she embarked on an extended world tour as a lecturer and an advisor to Bahá'í communities on the emerging pattern of Bahá'í administration. Her itinerary included Hawaii, Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand, Java, Singapore, Burma, and India.

Ransom-Kehler made a deep impression wherever she traveled. Despite her feelings of inadequacy as a Bahá'í teacher, she found that the Bahá'ís she visited always wanted her to remain longer than planned. She usually had to extend her stay beyond the departure date that she had originally set.

Even though her schedule was often hectic, Ransom-Kehler managed to keep detailed accounts of her travels. Her diaries reveal a truly elegant, upright soul. Because of her quick temper, intellect, and wit, she often restrained her tongue, revealing her thoughts to her diary instead; but these same qualities made her an ardent defender of her beliefs, which included an uncompromising commitment to the advancement of women. She relied on prayer with implicit faith and told friends that she was as emotive with God as she was with people. She said that, when she prayed, “they know there’s something doing in Heaven.”<sup>7</sup>

She loved literature and took comfort in remembered fragments of old poems, which one finds sprinkled throughout her letters and diaries. She was a passionate lover of beauty with eclectic tastes and a deep interest in the cultures she encountered on her journeys. Her diaries and letters abound with observations of cultural practices, art, and food. She seemed especially taken with Japanese culture and customs. One of her “Letters Home” published in the Bahá'í Magazine was devoted entirely to the beauty of the mountain city of Nikko, with its historic temples and shrines, which she found “elegant, sumptuous, magnificent.”<sup>8</sup> Her contact with the Maori of New Zealand left her with lasting impressions of “a nation of poets and artists” who brought “the impress of beauty” to virtually “everything they touched”—sometimes with delicacy, at other times with “an opulent vigor of detail. . . that bespeaks a robust and dramatic taste.”<sup>9</sup>

Ransom-Kehler’s appreciation of beauty and harmony extended to her own grooming, from her carefully waved hair to her thoughtfully chosen accessories. She was, to the end of her life, an elegant dresser who noted in her diary the ensembles she wore for lectures and social events. The mountains of luggage that she took on her historic journeys included sable wraps, chinchilla coats, and Chanel ensembles, as well as souvenirs she purchased when she occasionally found time in her busy schedule for shopping. Packing before departure was a lengthy ordeal. Even as a lone passenger on a freighter bound from China to Australia, sailing through tropical seas, she always dressed for dinner. She once told a friend “that if she were invited to Buckingham Palace ‘tomorrow,’ she had the clothes.”<sup>10</sup> Yet she was also down to earth and capable of adapting to difficult and dangerous conditions.

While Ransom-Kehler was in India in May 1932, Shoghi Effendi cabled her, asking her to visit Haifa in preparation for a special assignment in Írán. She was “thunderstruck” by this request.<sup>11</sup> After years of exhausting travel, Ransom-Kehler did not see herself as a standard-bearer; rather, she described herself as “a poor, feeble, old woman.”<sup>12</sup> She had no idea of the high regard in which she was held by Shoghi Effendi, who later described her as an “INVALUABLE COLLABORATOR,” an “UNFAILING COUNSELOR,” and an “ESTEEMED AND FAITHFUL FRIEND.”<sup>13</sup>

In Haifa, Ransom-Kehler learned that her mission to Írán was twofold. As the representative of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States and Canada, North America’s Bahá’í governing council, and on behalf of Shoghi Effendi, she was to petition Riḍá Sháh Pahlavi (reigned 1925–41) to remove the ban on the entry and distribution of Bahá’í literature in Írán and also to secure the lifting of all the limitations that had for years been imposed on the Iranian Bahá’í community. Since gaining sovereignty in 1925, Riḍá Sháh had instituted social, educational, and legal reforms that had raised the hopes of the hard-pressed Bahá’ís. In 1929 Shoghi Effendi had encouraged the Iranian Bahá’ís to seek permission to publish and distribute literature, but they had not succeeded in gaining the government’s approval. By 1932 the government still proved intransigent, and periodic recurrences of anti-Bahá’í violence—arrests, murders, expropriations, and sacking of properties—continued to plague the Bahá’í community. Shoghi Effendi found in Ransom-Kehler the strength, courage, and audacity that he hoped would persuade the shah to emancipate the Bahá’ís. In addition, Shoghi Effendi gave her a second mission: to instruct the Iranian Bahá’ís in the proper functioning of Bahá’í administration.

During Ransom-Kehler’s short stay in Haifa, Shoghi Effendi personally tutored her in an intensive study of Islám and briefed her about Írán. As always, she learned well, earning the appellation Mu’allimih (Teacher) given her by BahíyyihKhánum, Bahá’u’lláh’s daughter. As Ransom-Kehler was about to leave Haifa for Írán, BahíyyihKhánum—who had never returned to the homeland she left as a child—told her to greet every Bahá’í on her (BahíyyihKhánum’s) behalf and to enter Ṭihrán in her name. BahíyyihKhánum died on 15 July 1932, a few weeks after Ransom-Kehler reached Ṭihrán.

Ransom-Kehler traveled widely throughout Írán for more than a year. She was deeply touched by the loving welcome the Bahá’ís gave her in every town and village she visited. Her arrival at the village of Saysán, for example, was “a triumphal progress so extravagant that it will remain forever, not an episode, but an acute emotional experience.”<sup>14</sup> The experience provided a new appreciation of unity: the real meaning of Bahá’í solidarity suddenly penetrated me. Here were Persians speaking Turkish, fixed in a tiny town in the mountains of Adhírbáyján, and I. . . ; but we were bound together by ties “more lasting than bronze and higher than the exalted site of the Pyramids.” For knowledge of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and knowledge of His All-enfolding Covenant is not a question of locality, education or preferment but an unshakable spiritual reality that welds those who know it into an indissoluble human brotherhood. Here is a true solidarity that can withstand all the forces of disruption in the universe.<sup>15</sup>

Ransom-Kehler's interactions with the Iranian government were far less rewarding, however. Even before the end of 1932, initial hopes had been dashed, and some hint of the fruitlessness of the primary goal of her mission had become apparent. Soon after she reached Tīhrán, bearing with her a written petition to the shah from the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada, she gained-remarkably-an audience with 'Abdu'l-Ḥusayn Khán Teymourtash, Riḍá Sháh's first Minister of Court and closest political advisor. Teymourtash assured her that the ban on Bahá'í literature would be lifted immediately. When she asked if she could have her Bahá'í books mailed to her, he gave her firm assurance that she could. She cabled the National Assembly several days later, on 20 August 1932, "Mission successful."<sup>16</sup> But apparent success soon gave way to frustration. The ban remained in effect, and customs officials refused to allow her books into the country. She was unable to meet with Teymourtash again. He fell from his eminent position, being dismissed by Riḍá Sháh late in 1932 and then arrested, and died in prison in October 1933.

Ransom-Kehler addressed seven long, incisive letters to the shah and tolerated many sessions with officials whose insincerity was all too evident to her. She knew that the shah was probably never apprised of the contents of her letters. She received no reply.

Although she was unable to win basic freedoms for the Iranian Bahá'ís, Ransom-Kehler's determination was unwavering. "I have fallen, though I never faltered," she wrote in one of the final entries in her diary. "Months of effort with nothing accomplished is the record that confronts me. If anyone in future should be interested in this thwarted adventure of mine, he alone can say whether near or far from the seemingly impregnable heights of complaisance and indifference, my tired old body fell. The smoke and din of battle are to-day too dense for me to ascertain whether I moved forward or was slain in my tracks."<sup>17</sup>

Even as her mission in Írán came to an end, Ransom-Kehler was full of plans for the future: she would return to India, and Shoghi Effendi had also asked her to go to Europe. But her efforts to obtain the emancipation of the Bahá'ís in Írán had worn her down. Because she was an open, astute, highly sensitive, completely frank person, she found it frustrating to deal with authorities who repeatedly said one thing and did another. She was fifty-seven years old and suffered from sciatica and other ailments. She had traveled tirelessly throughout Írán for over a year; indeed, she had been traveling almost continuously since 1929. She was malnourished, for health problems prevented her from eating much of the food she was offered, and had been adversely affected by the harsh climate. She had endured periods of extreme hardship. Once, for example, stranded by floods in rural northern Írán, her party "spent three nights, cold, bedraggled, covered with fleas, without removing our clothes, half suffocated with wood-smoke, on flimsy cots.” Although the group remained “remarkably cheerful and happy,” Ransom-Kehler was so tired that, when they reached their destination, she “rudely left them to bathe and sleep the clock around.”<sup>18</sup>

Thus, exhausted and weakened, she left Tīhrán, planning to visit several cities in the southern part of Írán before leaving the country. In Iṣfahán she maintained her usual busy schedule until she suddenly fell ill on 9 October 1933 after a full day of activities. Exposed to smallpox, possibly by cuddling a child recovering from the disease, she had no physical resistance. She died two weeks later, on 23 October.

The Bahá’ís of Iṣfahán arranged an impressive funeral. Ransom-Kehler was buried in the Bahá’í cemetery near the graves of two distinguished brothers, Mírzá Muḥammad Ḥasan and Mírzá Muḥammad Ḥusayn, executed for their faith in 1879, whom Bahá’u’lláh had designated the King of Martyrs and the Beloved of Martyrs. Shortly before becoming ill, she had paid an emotionally charged visit to the cemetery and had prayed and wept at these graves.

Horace Holley, writing on behalf of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States and Canada, compared the last year of Ransom-Kehler’s life to “a wave whose concentrated force breaks upon a rocklike obstacle, then recedes to be gathered into the body of the sea. While the obstacle remains, the force has not been spent in vain. In future years the effect of this valiant faith will be fully disclosed.”<sup>19</sup>

A week after Ransom-Kehler’s death, Shoghi Effendi cabled the North American Bahá’ís a touching tribute: “KEITH’S PRECIOUS LIFE OFFERED UP SACRIFICE BELOVED CAUSE IN BAHÁ’U’LLÁH’S NATIVE LAND. ON PERSIAN SOIL FOR PERSIA’S SAKE SHE ENCOUNTERED CHALLENGED AND FOUGHT FORCES OF DARKNESS WITH HIGH DISTINCTION, INDOMITABLE WILL, UNSWERVING EXEMPLARY LOYALTY. MASS OF HER HELPLESS PERSIAN BRETHREN MOURN SUDDEN LOSS THEIR VALIANT EMANCIPATOR.” Describing himself as “SORROW-STRICKEN” at her loss, Shoghi Effendi called her the “FIRST AND DISTINGUISHED” American Bahá’í martyr and appointed her a Hand of the Cause of God, the first woman and only the second westerner to achieve that distinction: “INTERNATIONAL SERVICES ENTITLE HER EMINENT RANK AMONG HANDS OF CAUSE OF BAHÁ’U’LLÁH.”<sup>20</sup> He sent a representative, Abú’l-Qásim Faizi, to lay a wreath on her grave and to tell the Bahá’ís of Írán that Ransom-Kehler had “solidly welded the Bahá’ís of the East and the West” and had “glorified and exalted God’s cause.”<sup>21</sup>

In 1940 Shoghi Effendi named her, along with May Maxwell and the indefatigable international teacher Martha Root, as one of “three heroines of the Formative Age of the Faith of Bahá’u’lláh” to whom the Bahá’ís owe a debt of gratitude that “future generations will not fail to adequately recognize.”<sup>22</sup> Writing in God Passes By, his history of the first hundred years of the Bahá’í Faith, 1844–1944, he mentioned several times “the fearless and brilliant Keith Ransom-Kehler,” citing her “tenacity and self-sacrifice” as one of the “[m]any and diverse forces” that urged the North American Bahá’í community to “strong action” during the first Seven Year Plan for expansion (1937–44), which brought the Faith’s first century to a close.<sup>23</sup>

1926, May Stebbins

May Stebbins

With my daughter, 15 years old, we spent the year in Paris and our first Bahá'í contact was a Mr and Mrs Edwin Scott, whose address Mason Remey had given me. Mr Scott is an American artist, who has lived in Paris 30 years, and a very successful teacher and painter. He was tall slender and white-haired, very handsome with a beautiful face. His students adored him. He gives most constructive criticism. He has his money invested in government bonds so cannot get it out of the country. He has a summer cottage in Brittany near Cherbourg, where he takes his students from May to October. Mrs. Scott is an artist also, does Miniatures. Mrs Scott became interested in the Bahá'í movement before Mr Scott. After some years Mr. Dreyfus came over and talked to Mr. Scott and he became interested from that time on, and has given a great deal of his time to arranging meetings at his home, public and others and interests himself in students, and in every way is devoted to the Cause. Mrs Scott says he used to worry a great deal about his work and about finance, is a nervous temperament. But now he has stopped all worry and pays no attention to financial affairs, but has never lost anything by it.

I wanted to get in touch with a persian student who would teach Isabelle Persian. I asked Mr Scott and he put us in touch with 'Abdu'l-Ḥusayn Ikbāl and Ḥasan Safa Baghdádí, cousins and nephews of Dr. Baghdádí of Chicago. Mr Ikbāl who had studied more English than his cousin, consented to start Isabelle in Persian. He was free Saturday afternoons and Sundays. So she began and continued through our stay in Paris which was about four months before we went to Haifa.

He had no beginning books and could not get any, so it was more difficult then it would have been with the proper books. Then he was part Arabic and his mother Turkish so he was not a pure Persian, and his writing was mostly Arabic. His grandfather had been a follower of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh and had suffered many hardships. His father was devoted to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and had hundreds of Tablets from Him. He told us many things about the Holy family and the writings, and the life in Beirut where he was educated. His father had a large family about 12 children, and then an uncle died and he had to take his children and care for them. He had been well off but became poor.

The Bahá'í meetings are held on Saturdays, at 5 P.M. at Mr Scott's and at 8:30

P.M. at Mr Dreyfus's house. They are conducted in French, though there is some English conversation afterwards as almost all the friends understand and speak English. There is an average of 12 or more in attendance, perhaps there are 20 or more here, but this is only a guess.

The meetings are informal with reading of Tablets and letters from Shoghi Effendi. They pass around translations and pamphlets of various kinds. There are no prayers, and not much discussion. The meetings seem rather cold and stiff. Visiting Bahá's are not asked to say anything and there are many always coming to Paris. This year they have emphasized the fact that the meetings are for Bahá's only.

Madame Hesse is a very devout and beautiful Bahá'. She lost her husband and a son in the war and came into the Cause through her suffering. Mr and Mrs Mills took her to Haifa with them in 1923 I think. They were gone about 3 months, spent some time in Egypt. She has just finished translating the Paris Talks into French.

During the holidays for about a month, we had a visit from SorayaAfnán, a granddaughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, 23 years old. She is attending Bradford College, London. She is studying English Literature especially. Madam Hesse brought her back from England where she had been with an American Bahá'. She, Soraya, stayed a few days with Madame Hesse, and then came over with me to our pension, as madameHesse had Mrs Millsand a maid with her and had not room. I was very much pleased with the arrangement, and we had many long talks in my room in the evenings. A cousin, another granddaughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Miriam Jalál, 18, lived near us and she wanted to be with her as much as possible during her vacation from the Sorbonne. Still another cousin, a sister of Shogi Effendi, was studying in the Lycee Victor Duruy, MehrangeseRabanni, 18 or 19. So the three cousins had a good time together.

Soraya spoke very fluent English. She had been in an American Mission school in Cairo for 6 years. She told us much of her school life and Egypt. She is a very bright girl, an intelligent type, and knows much of American history, literature and geography. She is under the care of Mrs Claudia Coles in London, and Mrs Coles is very enthusiastic about her doing translation work from Persian to English. She talks very well too and I think would make a good speaker. I was astonished to find how much she knew. I almost felt as if I were in Haifa to here her talk. It was a great privilege to be so intimately associated with her for so long. I was away nine days however on the Riviera and was sorry to have to take the time out.

Since Soraya has gone we have been having Mariam Jalál over here twice a week, and we exchange English for Persian lessons. She has studied English for two years in school but has not had much practice in conversation. She is a very sweet bright girl an excellent student. When she graduated from the Lycee she ranked 2nd. She and her cousin Mehrangese have both been here for four years and that are very homesick to go back to Haifa. They expect to go next summer when school closes.

Mr and Mrs Scott took dinner with us the last Sunday we were in Paris. We sat in the small dining room and talked about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It was wonderful to hear all they had to say about Him when He was in Paris. Mrs. Scott told how she felt when she first saw him and how she burst into tears. He told her not to cry and held her hand all the time she sat by him. Mr Scott said he felt electric shocks go through him when 'Abdu'l-Bahá took his hand. He said 'Abdu'l-Bahá told him to walk a little out doors after eating, so he always did that. He said it would settle his meal. Then we talked some more about Him after we went upstairs. Mr Scott told about his experience with the prefecture of police, and told him about the Bahá' movement and gave him a no. 9.

Florence, Italy

Sunday afternoon we walked over to Mrs Hoagg's, 55 via Nazionale and had a very nice visit with her. Miss Jack came in later and we stayed until almost dark. Then Miss Jack took us home to show us her portraits of Mother Beecher, Mrs Moody, and Mr Gregory; also a profile of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and various other pictures, many of Greenacre. The next afternoon we went to tea with them.

Sailed from Brindisi, Mar. 8, 1926.

I wrote from Alexandria to Ḥusayn Esphany, the son of Muḥammad Taqí Esphany, telling him that Soraya Afnán had told me to write him and that he spoke English and would help us to get around Cairo. We had to stay in Alexandria the first night, Friday Mar. 12, because the boat got in so late. But we left the next morning for Cairo at 9 o'clock, after going to the boat for our baggage, to the customs etc. with the agent of the Bristol Hotel. He charged me 99 piastre and then asked for a tip. I gave him 15 piastre, thinking each one was one instead of 5. Prices are very high in Egypt. We paid $5.00 a day apiece at one of the smallest hotels in Cairo, the Bristol. Saturday evening after dinner we had a call from A. H. Iṣfahány. He is a very bright and interesting young man. speaks English fluently. Gives lectures at the University, but is now engaged with his father in Commerce. He is to give a lecture tonight on the "tarbush" or red fez that all the Egyptians wear. There is a movement among the students to discard it for the European hat and he is in favor of it. He said the tarbush was introduced here by Greece who got it from the Turks and has only been used about 100 years. They have two Muḥammadan priests in their Spiritual Assembly. They are trying to teach the Bahá' principles to their students and reshaping their lives gradually as best they can.

We met 'Abdu'l Rahman Rushdy of Alexandria, who was down here for a few days visiting his brother 'Abdu'l Fattah Sabry who lives in Cairo. The two of them together with one of the Bahá' Moslem priests took us out for a whole day. First we went to the pyramids and then to the Exposition. We had a very enjoyable day, all rode camels up to the pyramids. The priest has a very nice intelligent face, and was quite young, but he could speak only Arabic. So we did not have much conversation with him. He was very eager to learn English though. His father had died recently and left him a large family to look after, so he had to continue his duties to make his living. He had also very recently been married. A. R. Rushdy had 3 small boys.

March, 19, 1926, on train to Haifa.

Yesterday about 4:20 we distinctly felt and saw an earthquake. I saw the two beds in my room with canopie wave back and forth and I was rocked back and forth on the sofa on which I was sitting. I was rocked four or five times at least.

Mr Rushdy came to see us about 5 min. before 5 and we had not finished packing our suitcases so had to keep him waiting. He had been to Alexandria and came back with his wife and 3 children and came right over to see us. He did not stay long but said he would see us at the station. The night before ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn Iṣfahány came over to see us with Muḥammad Said. This was the first time I had seen him though we had been at his house with Mr Rushdy when he was not at home. He is the head of a school very nice middle aged man. I did not have much chance to talk to him as he sat nearer Isabelle and talked with her, then Mr Iṣfahány talked so much that there was no chance for him which I was sorry.

The best happened at the station. When we got down there, about three quarters of an hour before the train started, we saw Mr Rushdy first and stood talking to him. Then in a few minutes an old man came up and Mr Rushdy spoke and shook hands very cordially with him then introduced us. It was Muḥammad Taqí Iṣfahány. He spoke only Persian and Arabic, so Mr Rushdy had to interpret for him. He felt sorry he hadn’t been able to come and see me, but he was tired in the evening. He looked at least 70. Isabelle thought about 80, but he was only 60. He saw Bahá’u’lláh many times and it was He who sent him to Egypt. He has suffered many things for the Cause. I will hear about him in Haifa. His face was so strong and noble and his manner and words so beautiful that I could not keep the tears back, and could hardly speak. He made me think of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and I felt that it would have been much like that if I had been talking to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He had dark eyes, such a noble nose, straight, large firm yet fine, one of the strongest faces I have ever seen. Pretty soon, from some where he brought forth two large bouquets of flowers, and he got on the train with them, and when we sat down he presented them to us, one to Isabelle and one to me. We tried to thank him as best we could. Then Isabelle talked to him and his son interpreted. I said I only regretted that I had not been able to come to Haifa sooner, so as to have seen ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He said yes, but Shoghi Effendi had the same spirit and was carrying out the will of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the same way He would have done. That in every way he was following in His footsteps. That he was a wonderful young man. I said I was so glad to have met him (Muḥammad Taqí) for he had done great things for the Cause, and without such men as he, the Cause would not be where it is today. He said it was not he but Bahṣ'u'llṣh and 'Abdu'l-Bahṣ who had done the great things for the Cause, and had caused it to grow. Then we all shook hands very firmly and they had to get off the train. We stood by the open window and talked a little longer, shook hands again and waved good bye. It was a wonderful feeling to be surrounded by friends like that in a strange land. Mr Rushdy was very anxious for us to come back to Alexandria for a few days when we sailed from there and probably we shall.

We left Cairo at 6 P.M. Thursday March 18, changed at Kantara on the Suez Canal (going through customs, a mere formality, but lots of rushing around with baggage). Crossed the z on a ferry boat and went to the other station (east) and got on the train. Our passports were examined twice and our tickets twice. The train left at 12 M. We had a ladies compartment to ourselves and slept on the seats fairly comfortably. Had breakfast in the dining room next morning, but took a lunch with us last night. The ladies compartment is at one end of the car and right over the wheels so very joggly. Should reach Haifa at 9:40 but a little late. Friday, Mar. 19.

Friday, March 19, 1926.

As the train drew into Haifa I looked out and saw Mt Carmel and buildings on it and guessed that that was what it was. I asked an official and he said it was. Before the train had quite stopped I saw a Persian on the platform who looked as if he had come to meet us. He kept his eye on us too. Then in another minute Fugeta was on the train smiling and I knew him in a minute. I said "Is this Fugeta?" and he said "yes", and went for our baggage. The Persian was Rūḥí Effendi who was meeting us, Soraya's brother. He talked and looked so much like Soraya that we were fascinated with him. He is very good looking. We drove quite a little distance through the town to the Pilgrim house. There Miss Effie Baker met us as we got out of the carriage. She has charge of the Pilgrim House. There is a large oblong room in the center with a long table, flowers everywhere and hammered brass vases and bowls for containers.

RūḥáKhánúm came over in the morning to see us. She brought roses for each of us, Miss MacKinney, Isabelle and I, all of whom had arrived that morning. She wanted to know about Mariam and Mehrṣngese and we talked until almost lunch time. Then she went home and Dr and Mts Guthrie came in. They were leaving by boat that afternoon. They had lunch with us. Dr Guthrie talked a great deal also Mrs Keith Ransom-Kehler. After lunch we sat around and waited for our room to be made ready for us. We were to have the room Dr and Mrs Guthrie had had. We had just begun to unpack when Fugeta came in and said the ladies of the household would like to see us. We hurried and got a few things in order then went over with Miss McKinney.

They were all there, the Greatest Holy Leaf, the Holy Mother, whom I sat next to, _____ Isabelle and all four daughters. They kissed us all on both cheeks and were very sweet and lovely. We stayed a long time and had tea served to us in little thin _____ with glass saucers. It was delicious. Later after sunset, glasses were brought for the rest of them who were keeping the fast. The Holy Mother seemed much interested in Isabelle and wanted to talk to her but couldn't say much except through one of her daughters as interpreter. All the daughters speak English, Zia Khánúm the least well of all. At supper and all the meals we sit around the table a long time and talk.

Saturday, March 20, 1926

We started out this morning to take a walk, and I was going to get some butter as they don't use any here. We walked down the road thru the German settlement and down Carmel Ave. to the sea. There we walked out on a long curving pier and looked across the blue sea to Acre and the line of white sand along the shore. We could look up Carmel ave to the Tomb and see the terraces leading up to it. The whole of Mt Carmel looked very beautiful. As we started walking back I noticed a lady sitting down on the wharf by some steps and I looked directly at her face it was so familiar. Then she began to beckon me and I went over and found it was RúhâKhánúm and Mrs Keith Ransom-Kehler. So we sat down and talked for some time. Then as the sun was getting pretty hot, we got up and walked home. We found a new arrival when we got home; a Mrs Osgood from N.Y. an interior designer or painter. She had just come from the "Adriatic" which was out in the harbor.

This afternoon about 3:30 we and some others walked up to the Tomb of the Báb. The view over the sea and Haifa kept getting more and more beautiful as we went up. Then when we reached the terraces and flowers it was so beautiful and fragrant that I could do nothing but look about. The rest went into the Tomb of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I was not ready and wanted to be saturated with the surroundings first. I felt that I should break down. It was too sudden an approach to that sacred spot Tomorrow being Naw-Rúz, or the Bahá' New Year there will be a service in the afternoon in the Tomb to which all will go.

Sunday, Mar. 21.

Sunday morning when we went to breakfast, we all had cards with a New Years greeting and a picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house in Acre. Mine was the clump of cypress trees behind the Tomb, where Bahá'u'lláh had rested and revealed a Tablet. All the cards were made by Effie Baker. A little later flowers and cookies and New Years greetings were sent over from the Holy household. There were lovely big violets, pansies and other flowers with beautiful green trailing vines. Later in the morning we were summoned over to the Household to see the ladies and had a beautiful hour. I talked mostly with ToobaKhánúm about Soraya of whom she is very proud, the only daughter and 3 boys. Afterwards Rúhí Effendi said I must not praise his sister too much, because she already has too good an opinion of her (jokingly). We met several other ladies; a sister of the Holy Mother and her married daughter living here. She, Riḍvāneh, chanted for us afterwards in a beautiful voice. She has a daughter studying to be a doctor in Munich. In the afternoon there was a Men's meeting in the Oriental house, Persian, the Naw-R•z feast to which we were invited.

Naw-R•z feast in Oriental Persian house..

Different ones spoke and Rúhí Effendi translated. Then cookies and tea were passed, a Persian sweet with nuts inside called "nohn", very good, then large delicious oranges. After that we went to the Tomb of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It was brightly lighted, beautiful oriental rugs covered the floors. The men entered a room on the west side the women on the east. The Báb was buried in a room in between. A beautiful white and blue chandelier brightly lighted hung in the center. Lighted candles were on each side. The men chanted prayers. Then after kneeling at the threshold and bowing their head down on it they passed out of the door into another room to the Tomb of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. That also was covered with fine Persian rugs, both the outer and inner room. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is buried under the floor, so no casket appears, but beautiful flowers and lights, and the large picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá hangs on the wall. After chanting several prayers and kneeling on the threshold the men passed out.

We had ridden up to the Tomb in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's carriage (a wagon carriage with 3 seats, each holding 3 people. His old coachman drove. We also road down, and Fu'ad had appeared from somewhere and was on the front seat with the driver. He greeted us all by saying Alláh'o'Abhá! It was a full day and a very beautiful one. Monday morning RúhíKhánum came over to see us, and we had a lovely talk.

Tuesday, Mar. 23, 1926

This morning we packed up our things to be moved over to the new pilgrim house, while we were to go to Bahjí for a couple of days. An Italian doctor was to move into the old pilgrim house, which the Bahá's here have arranged to buy. We were all delighted to know that it was not to pass into the hands of strangers. RúhíKhánum and MoneverKhánum were to accompany us, also RidvánéKhánum a cousin. Her mother is a sister of the Holy Mother. We all went in the carriage with the Indian driver who had taken 'Abdu'l-Bahá on so many trips. It was a beautiful drive along the shore on the sandy beach. The horses walked in the water most of the time where the sand was hard. We saw many caravans of camels, donkeys, bedouins etc. The sea was very blue and very wide with the fine white sand. Just before we came to 'Akká we turned off to the right and took the road for the Bahjí palace, two miles from 'Akká. It was about one o'clock when we reached there (2 hours drive) and we had lunch and then went out under the trees with blankets, matting etc. and sat and talked until sunset when we went to the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. That was a beautiful and impressive experience.

A rectangular room with high windows around the top, and plants and flowers in the center. The walls were white and nothing else in the room but the exquisite Persian rugs on the floor. Two long green ones on either side of the rose ones at the ends. Of course we took off our shoes on entering the building. Another room opening off of the main one was covered with two long rose rugs which just covered the floor. A table with many beautiful lamps was in that room. The room where the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh was opened off of a corner of the main room. It had candelabras, lamps, large vases of flowers and two large crystal candelabras hanging from the ceiling. It was all brightly lighted as we went in, and the threshold, raised, was covered with jasmine flowers of the most exquisite perfume. I shall never forget the impression of that first visit. The beauty and the fragrance of it all, the quiet and solemnity. The bowing of the head in that soft bed of jasmine and breathing in the sweetness of it all. (holiness)

Three others came in the afternoon by train, MonaverKhánum, Riḍvānea, and Victoria Bedikian. The second day we went to 'Akká and spent the day. Saw the prison or part of it where Bahá'u'lláh was confined, and where the pilgrims from Persia used to come and look at him from outside the walls of the prison yard. The part where Bahá'u'lláh was confined was being used as a hospital and we were not allowed to go in without special permission from Jerusalem. We saw the window of the prison, however, where Bahá'u'lláh was confined, and where the pilgrims from Persia used to come and look at him from outside the walls of the prison yard.

We had lunch in the house where Bahá'u'lláh lived with his family and where 'Abdu'l-Bahá was married and all the daughters were born. He lived in the back part without any outlook except onto the streets for 7 years. Then he was given a room in the next house facing the sea and had a balcony where he could walk and look at the sea. This house was bought by Mr and Mrs Dreyfus and given to the family. There is a caretaker and it is kept for visitors. The owner, a Christian, was kind to the family and built a room connecting the two houses, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá so that he could be married. His fiancée had been waiting in 'Akká several months to be married, but they were too crowded until this room was built. We saw also another house where the family lived many years and were very happy. All the daughters were married from this [house].

We walked through the bazaars of 'Akká and bought a few things. We looked at the narrow winding streets with arches across them, balconies etc. The old walls around the city and the gate are very ancient and interesting. It is 5000 years old. Napoleon besieged this unsuccessfully and said "If it had not been for that speck of dust "'Akká" I would have changed the map of Europe. Some sayings about 'Akká, "Blessed is he who is bitten by the fleas of 'Akká." "Blessed is he who passes a night in 'Akká."

That evening Rúhí Effendi came out, and the next morning he wanted to go to the Riḍván. I was making Orange Marmalade, so we could not start very early. Rúhí Effendi, Mrs Osgood and Isabelle went on ahead, and we came later. Still later the lunch came and we were eating about 3 o'clock. We saw the benches where 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Greatest Holy Leaf used to sleep when they spent a few days at the Riḍván. We looked at the mills grinding flour by water power in the old fashioned way with two round flat stones, took pictures and went home by donkeys. My first experience on a donkey and the first for most of the others. It was great fun and very exciting trying to stick on.

The third day we went on donkeys to a Druse village, Abu-Sinnan, where ‘Abdu’l-Bahḥ and his family lived for about 10 months during the war when Haifa was being bombarded. We went to the house of the Shaykh (where the family had lived) and were most hospitably received. They knew and loved the Master very much. Their religion is a secret. One time a man stole one of their books and tried to sell it to a library. The Druse leaders appealed to ‘Abdu’l-Bahḥ to get their book back or their religion would be violated. He saw the man and by sheer force of moral argument compelled him to return the book. They have been very grateful to him ever since. The people are Arabs but they believe in a prophet who came some 300-800 years ago. They are very conservative but intelligent and hospitable. They marry in the family among themselves, cousins if they have them. The women wear a head-dress which comes over their mouths, and think it very improper to show their teeth. The women were very pretty and the men very fine looking. They would not allow us to take their pictures, except one young man, the son of the shaykh. The women brought one of their nice costumes and tried it on Isabelle, and she had her picture taken in it with the son of the shaykh. This village was up in the hills and the view from the balcony of the house was wonderful. The house itself was very beautiful, large long rooms, marble floors and mural decorations by an Italian artist. They had a large oriental rug given them by ‘Abdu’l-Bahḥ. The ride home by moonlight on the donkeys was very lovely. The sky was so beautiful with lovely light clouds, the moon peaking out behind them and the stars shining brightly.

We had two horses among the donkeys that were guided only by ropes like the donkeys, and they had a fight just before we got to the village. The woman on one was thrown, and the other slipped off. The horses reared up and bit each other and then tore around the fields. Nothing serious happened, but we were frightened for a while.

The next day RúḥáKhḥnum wanted to go to ‘Akká to make some calls and Edna McKinney and I went with her to see a little more of ‘Akká. She found us a young man for a guide and we went to two Mosques and through the market. Back to Bahjí at noon. The last three days there we just sat around and talked under the trees.

April 6, 1926

We have met Shoghi Effendi three times at lunch. He has been away at Tiberias I think resting during the Fast. His older sister was with him I believe. She sometimes acted as his secretary. The first day at lunch Keith Ransom-Kehler was there, and after some generalities, asking about each of us, the conversation was mostly with her. Shoghi Effendi spoke about the telegrams from Mrs Schopflocher and said he was sorry to get it. Keith said she was very glad. He asked if it would change her plans and she said Oh yes, entirely, but that it was all right. (Telegram was that Mrs Greenleaf would go to the Convention at San Francisco instead of Keith. He told Keith that she was eminently fitted to speak and write for the Cause. Keith said that Mrs Osgood had been a believer for 25 years. He turned to Mrs Osgood and asked if she had made many Bahá'ís during that time. She said she was afraid she had not, she had been too busy making her living (much embarrassed). He asked us how we liked Paris and how we like Egypt or rather Cairo.

The second time he came to lunch we talked about the Plan for unified action of the N.S.A. of America. He asked if I had seen it, as well as Mrs Osgood, and when we said no, he said he would send it over for us to read, which he did that same afternoon. He said he thought it was very good and that the chief thing now was for all the believers to support the spiritual Assembly in carrying out his plan. He emphasized that more than anything else. That the whole plan would fail unless we gave our whole hearted support to it. He said three Bahá'ís had already given their quota of $9.00 a month for three years the whole sum in advance. He said if others follow their example we would not have to wait 3 years to collect the money before beginning on the first unit of the superstructure of the Temple. He said perhaps it could be collected in 2 yrs, so that the contract could be let. He seemed to think that every thing depended upon the believers supporting this plan of the N.S.A. Otherwise the work would fall through and there would be no progress. He could not emphasize it enough that we must work with our assemblies and not individually in our own way.

The 3rd luncheon I did most of the talking. The principle topic was languages. In regard to Isabelle he said to put Persian first, that is if we were able to get the Persian, otherwise specialize in German, German was a scientific language and very important for the Cause etc.

April 10th.

Shoghi Effendi has been sick since last Sunday, Apr. 4th. He talked at the men's meeting on Sunday and chanted at the Tomb. Also talked to some groups of Beirut Univ. students, who have been visiting here during their spring vacation. He was sick night and we haven't seen him all week. He has been in Haifa working since the first of Sept. and he is about worn out. The doctor was finally called and he said unless he stopped completely and rested for a while he would have a nervous breakdown.

We went to Nazareth and Tiberius one day this week. Drove by auto and stopped at Nazareth and saw Mary's well, Mary's house (home of the Annunciation) and a synagogue where Jesus used to teach. I bought some lace doilies of a woman. At Tiberius we saw the hotel where 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to stay. Rúhí Effendi had some business there so we waited for him for some time. He and Soheil have planted some of the farm land that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá bought on the shores of the sea of Galilee. Their wheat was very high and in flourishing condition. We had had three days of rain which was fine for the crops. Then we drove to Capernium and had our lunch out on a pier in the lake of Galilee. Capernium is a ruin. Isabelle lost her gloves off of the pier and Rúhí said if we would go away he would get into the water and swim out and get them which he did. He said he had a fine swim and said he wished he had stayed in longer. Then we drove to the other end of the lake and crossed the Jordan and saw the outlet to the lake. Galilee is about 600 ft below sea level, and the Jordan runs down to the Dead sea. We also passed by Cana on the way to Tiberius. The fields were full of wild flowers of every color and variety, red poppies, red anemones, yellow daisies everywhere. We went up over mountains and saw great plains below, cultivated and green.

Sunday we saw Rúhángíz. Shoghi Effendi’s older sister for the first time. She looked very pretty, in European clothes except for a black veil over her head. Had been sick for a few days and looked delicate. Zia Khánum (mother of S.E.) was very dignified looking as she came in.

April, 16th.

Shoghi Effendi is better and came over this noon to lunch, 4th time. It was the last day for Edna McKinney and Mrs Berthelin Osgood as they are leaving Saturday morning. Shoghi Effendi sent for Miss McKinney just before lunch and she had a very happy talk with him. At lunch we talked about the plan of the N.S.A. Plan of unified action. Shoghi Effendi said it was more important to support the National Assembly than the Local because the National Assembly, was larger, touched more people and was more important. He also emphasized the fact that this plan was not compulsory, but voluntary, though the believers were urged to contribute. He said if this plan did not go through, he did not know what they would do or what plan they could make. It would retard the growth of the Cause for many years.

April 17, 1926

Shoghi Effendi sent for me and Isabelle this morning about a quarter before 12 O’clock. We went over and were shown into the living room of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house. Shoghi Effendi came in very soon. He asked Isabelle about her Persian (she had been having lessons with Rúhí) and how she liked it. He said she must not study too many languages at the same time. But when she had completed one to take up another. It was possible to study two foreign languages thoroughly, but not much more. She should give Persian first choice, after the German. It was better in learning a language to hear it talked rather than study it out of books.

I talked about Miss Jack (who had asked me to ask S.E. what she should do when I saw her in Florence). He said it was very good that she was painting these portraits of the Bahá'ís, and that she ought to send copies if not the originals, to the National Bahá'í archives for preservation. He said if she found that she could help Mrs Hoagg in her work, she should stay there, but after a thorough trial, if she saw she was not making any progress, to go back to Greenacre and her painting.

I read Mrs Scott's letter to him and he was very much pleased to learn that their meetings had been unusually beautiful and spiritual lately.

I showed him my Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá (but he asked immediately for the original). Unfortunately I had not brought that. He read it eagerly and asked about Robert. Asked what he was interested in, what he was going to be etc. He said I should try to teach him very tactfully, and get him associated with some Bahá'í young people, perhaps at Greenacre and they would have much influence with him. Try to please him and not oppose him, make him happy.

Fugeta came and announced lunch. So we got up and I handed him the envelope and said that was a little gift. He took it and immediately said, I accept it, but I want you to give it to the N.S.A. of America in my name. It is mine, I take it, and I want you to give it in my name to the National Fund. I said if that is your desire I will do it.

We also talked about Mr Vail. He said Mr Vail took things too literally. There had been some disagreement between him and the Teaching Com. of the N.S.A....that too much was allowed for the Star, and that the contributions should be under 2 headings, the Temple fund and the Teaching fund and should be voluntary. That 'Abdu'l-Bahá had said that contributions should be to these two funds.

Shoghi Effendi said this new plan supplemented and enlarged what 'Abdu'l-Bahá said. That when He said that there was no NSA and no Mashriqu'l-Adhikár building. He said if I saw Mrs Vail to talk to her about it. He had just recently received a letter from her. Shoghi Effendi came to lunch with us, Isabelle, Soheil, Effie Baker and I (5th lunch). Shoghi Effendi did not come to lunch Sunday, Apr. 18, but chanted in the Tomb of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Apr. 19, 1926.

Shoghi Effendi came to lunch today. Isabelle sat opposite to him. He asked her if she could count in Persian. She said yes. Then he asked her to say 345 in Persian. She said it with corrections from him as to pronunciation. He said very good.

Then I asked him how he thought I could go about teaching the Cause in Madison. He asked about the people I was associated with. I said University people entirely. He said to tell them about the principles first rather than the personalities. He said not to call it a universal religion, but a universal movement to unite or synthesise religion. He said to talk about the economic principles. I said I would get acquainted with some professors of economics and give them the Bahá'í literature on the subject and ask them what they thought of it. He said that would be good and they could send their questions to Rúhí Effendi to answer. Rúhí said he had the subject on his thesis all decided upon. The political program of the Bahá'ís. He wants to be a writer on the political program of the Bahá'í religion. We said it was a little too soon to write much.

When we were leaving and went to say good bye to Shoghi Effendi, he said he did not know that we were going — that we did not have to go. We wanted to stay but others were leaving and we thought we ought to go too. We had been there a month, a little over 4 weeks. No one had given us any encouragement to stay before. The daughters want Isabelle to stay for a year. But I couldn't quite see that. Then Shoghi Effendi said "You may feel free to write to me Mrs Stebbins, don't hesitate to write to me. (There had been a lot of talk about too many people writing to the Guardian, his correspondence was getting to be a burden, and Keith brought up the subject at the Convention next year.)

May Stebbins.

Dear Horace,

The Colonial Office have taken the stronger stand we hoped for, so it does not seem wise to ask the convention for a very drastic resolution of criticism or condemnation. Results, though, are what we wish and we _____ yet foresee what this stronger position we produce in Baghdád, so I suggest that the convention be asked to adopt a resolution expressing its _____ disappointment at the unexpected delay in the settlement of the matter and winging the incoming National Spiritual Assembly to leave _____ within its power undone to _____ the British and 'Irâq Governments to see that their property restored to the Bahá'í _____ the earliest date possible. You will know just how best to word the resolution.

My idea is that this will be just as effective for use by the N.S.A. with the British and 'Irâq people or for publicity later on, if it should become necessary, without embarrassing things at the moment where it seems as if the Colonial Office anyway is doing the right thing. The difficulty has been in Baghdád where, on the _____ line, is nearest be remembered what we want done is by no means easy, further complicated, too, by these delicate and important _____ with , which to then loom so much larger than our matter. I must confess, though, that here in London official's attitude has been all we could ask and has gone too few in our own direction to doubt its sincerity. But the is to get the 'Irâq government to _____ against the largest and most influential group of its own citizen, the Jhiaks, who also beside over the State Religion, a bad combination to antagonize and a most difficult task. We must be patient. Please regard this information as confidential to the N.S.A. It should not be allowed to get beyond them until the flaw is well going, with the 'Irâq government started, or else has foiled. I'll keep you advised, but it will be slow. Baghdád is a long way off.

I have written Shoghi Effendi of this suggestion to you and said that I would ask you to do nothing about it unless he cables you his approval of the ____ resolution.

As you see, all this can mean quite a stay over here for us if Shoghi Effendi should wish it. At his direct cabled instruction. I am here now, and this immediate work will ____ me beyond the date of the convention, as I feared would be the case when I last wrote. With all this uncertainty and the used of having members of the N.S.A who can be ____ at meetings and vote if my name should come up for election, will you kindly explain and have it withdrawn?

And because give my dearest love to all the members of the N.S.A. be sure I freely know my lost in having missed this year of fellowship with you all as you have gone onward and upward together in your devoted service.

And, if you think it all right, please give my love to all the friends at the Convention and tell them how closely my heart beats with them as they are gathered there together, in gratitude for the blessed privilege of being there, in joy and ____ in all our N.S.A has done for the Cause this year, and in humbly praying for His blessing in our efforts through the coming year before us.

As ever, In His service, Mountfort.

Notes

Confidential to you and Roy. N.S.A if you think best.

March 26, 1926

Dear Horace,

Just a line for 15 days mail to tell you I am back here again and at Shoghi Effendi's cabled request to do a little more work on the Baghdád matter. Nothing has gone wrong, but in the course of trying to _____ through the _____ decided on by the authorities some unforeseen questions have come up that made it seem harsh to the guardian to have me at this end. It's a difficult problem at best, enmeshed in Iraqi politics and complicated by the wish of the mandatory power nor interfere more than absolutely necessary with the stumbling of its _____ in its efforts to stand up on its own feet and take its place among grown-ups. The British are with us but hope to find a way to do it without too much strong arm work. With our better knowledge of the folk they are dealing with, through our friends there, it looks as if eventually a stilter course must be adopted. I am glad to say there has never been a suggestion that we are outright nor a doubt expressed but that a way to give back the property must be found. So we have every reason to believe in ultimate success. The problem is to hurry it on.

It may be helpful for the convention to take some action that could be communicated here and to Baghdád. I'll consult Shoghi Effendi and either he or I, if he wishes, will let you know. I've only just arrived.

Unfortunately, I was very heard down and out during a good deal of the time here – strehtoeocie poisoning, was the high sounding name thus gave in. I couldn't throw in off in this _____ , but did finally get back to Paris, but only to get what I hope was its final kick that completely flattened things. I was just coming too in the sunny South when a cable came from Haifa asking me to return here instead of going on there which I was about to do. So here I am. See this self stuff to explain seeming neglect of your honourable official communication and more in , lack of _____ to your kindly personal letters of sympathy and – more than you know – encouragement and cheer.

And now there seems no chance for me of San Francisco. From the guardian's letter following the cable it will probably be Haifa after here, unless a _____ unlooked for success results sooner than there is any reason to expect. It's a rashing handicap in line to be so far away from Baghdád. But that's that and it has to be taken as it is. My desire for San Francisco was all selfish for reasons you will realize. Over here is 99% desert in the things we know most count and I did long for and, God knows, do need, the blessed benediction of fellowship for a while with all you who have been so quick with service this past year. And you know what our conventions – yes, everyone of them – do for us. Well, take a deep draught for me, assimilate it as you so well can and send it along over here.

I'm particularly sorry not to have talked over with the guardian the many things you asked me to. I shall; of course, when I see him, if be chance that should be in reason, I'll get word to you at San Francosco.

You ask my plans. I have none. Hopes, yes, but every time I try] a plan of late the heavens – I hope it's the heavens – upon and it is no more.

God bless you – everyone of you and all your _____ did work!

As ever,

Mountfort

One day Rúhâ came over to me. It was morning 11:30 o'clock lying on any bed weeping, longing to see the Holy Sisters. "Why are you unhappy, Auntie?" she said, "you must be very, very happy, you are great work for Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and you are a great help to Shoghi Effendi. You must be happy. The Greatest Holy leaf sends her love to you. She says she is always thinking of you, she never forgets you, but prays for your success in all your activities, all your work. You must be very, very happy."

One day, I had promised to give Shoghi Effendi's little curly-haired brother a ball, a big ball, colored, with which all the children of the Holy Household might play. We had played with a small ball, but it was hard to catch. So that day I went down town and purchased one, which I knew they all liked. Having promised the ball they waited beyond the pilgrim House wall and when I brought it out I saw Zia, the mother of Guardian, and Monever beckoning me to come. They were taking a walk and wanted me to go with them. So we walked out to the Zionist City at the edge of Mount Carmel and the Sea. Passing the Catholic monastery we saw a band of monks moving toward the other monastery on the top of Mount Carmel and I quoted the word, of Amos in the Bible; and the top of Carmel shall wither." Then Zia said that the main duty of the Bahá'ís was to teach. And I told her I could not so around and teach, that I could not hear the people. But Zia said that to speak: I need not hear, that people should listen to me, that I should speak to them as write letters. That I should unite the hearts. "You are able to teach, for your vision is good and your heart is pure and belongs to Bahá'u'lláh. In the Zionist Colony we looked for a suitable design for a bungalow to be built in a property for the Holy Family. On our way home we sat down to rest but a Jewish officer sent us away. The Queens of heavens were not recognized in this Zionist Colony, but still they came here to meet the Holy Ones of God! Jesus too had been unknown and despised, that comforted me so I took the arms of my Holy Sisters and pressed them to myself. Zia asked me about Mardiros. She said I should be hopeful, that even in Persia, men, who had for years not believed became good Bahá'ís and good husbands to their wives. She asked me if I prayed for my husband in the Holy Shrines, and I told her I had come here to pray for the salvation of the world and not for individual happiness. And she said, SHE would Pray for him. We were very tired coming home, for, we had walked far.

One day, when new Pilgrims had come we started to visit the Holy Shrines It was three o'clock I had been ill and for some days had been unable to go up but I tried and walking a short distance was obliged to turn back. Passing the Holy gate Tooba saw me and beckoned me to go in with her. The Greatest Holy Leaf was sitting over a charcoal fire and asked me to share it. She took my hand in utmost love, and the look in her big blue eyes took all my pain. I longed to stay with her forever. Rúhâ and Tooba then asked me to go riding with them. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's carriage was waiting outside and I sat down with Esphandiar, while the Holy Mother took the middle seat with Tooba and Monever. Rúhâ and the sister of the Holy Mother and Ridvánieh in the last seat. We climbed Mount Carmel this out into another section to the left I had very prosperous and in great earnest here. Magnificent houses, parks and streets are coming into being; pleasant stores and eating houses were everywhere. Some laughed at the sight of these Persians dressed so black, so veiled and mysterious. I too had thrown my silk prayer shawl over my head, one indeed with this party of love, my heart bounding in ecstasy because I was permitted to be with them. I was made very happy and shall never forget this joy of nearness, crossing the Carmel of God with His Divine Women. The Holy Mother, at one time thinking me cold, took the wrap from her knees and threw it over my shoulders, but I could not stand that and laid it once more on her Holy knees. She said that I must be careful of my health that great work was awaiting me and must have strength for it. I could only turn around and gaze silently in her wonderful face, tears sobbing, for love at my heart-strings. Monever, Ridvánieh and Rúhâ often inquired: "Auntie, are you alright? Are you Happy? You must be very happy.

Another ride we took that same evening in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's carriage. Only the Holy Mother's sister left us and we drove down the main street of Haifa and Zia and Tooba looked in at a German carpenter shop in the German colony. We passed the House of Bahá'u'llah and all the Blessed Ones gazed at it long. What emotions and remembrances this house must bring to them in which the Father of all the world lived just two years. Monever called to me: "Auntie, in that house Bahá'u'lláh lived," And I told her I knew it. For the Pilgrims had pointed it out to me, and daily I passed it looking at it with longing eyes and yearning heart. It is now part of a hotel, well-kept and prosperous looking. Some day the Bahá'ís will have it. There is no doubt about that.

On our way, we ran down a girl on a bicycle, but the girl escaped injury miraculously. The wheel dashed before the frightened horses but Esphandiar managed well and during all this incident not a sound came from the Holy Women. It was a lesson for me to learn. Afterwards, when I turned around and petted the knees of the Holy Mother, all smiled and asked: "Are you alright, Auntie?" Looking at me with those eyes that thrilled me so.

We rode to the Haifa Baseball track. It is a fine field, more beautiful than those I have seen in America. Esphandiar held his hordes and we washed the hundreds of people pass. All races had enjoyed the sport; and all looked eager, happy and full of contentment. Zia said to me: "See, Auntie, these are all new people, they come on every boat, filling up Palestine day by day." And I remembered the prophecies, and nodded to 'Divine Zia, the angel of our Guardian, Shoghi Effendi. I knew what she wished to convey.

One Day Monever, Effie Baker and I went up Mount Carmel. It was moonlight and we had come down from the Monastery of the top of Mount Carmel. Effie was picking flowers and Monever and I, having walked in silence for a long time motioned to me to sit down beside her. I would do anything she said at all times. So we sat there upon a stone of Carmel holding hands. Suddenly Monever took off her shoes and shook the sand out of them. She asked me to do the same. And I did. Then we sat in silence again was thinking of my love for her and where it lead me to. And Monever exclaimed: "Do you love me, Auntie?" I looked at her, not able to speak did I love her?" O God, Monever, don't ask that, and I arose and walked out she following and taking my arm. "Monever, I want to be with you forever, when we are in the other world, will you come down where I am and take me with you?" Monever said: "But Auntie, if I can find you! You have done such great service to the Cause, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá are so satisfied with you, and I may not be able to reach you, Auntie dear." I knew that she said this only to comfort me, for I was weeping for love of her. I told her I would never leave her, that I loved her too much. And the youngest Daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá held me closer and our friendship deepened much that moonlight night. Effie came and we walked home together.

It was on the 2nd of March that I gave to My Angel-Mother, the Greatest Holy Leaf, my Bahá'í Village Plan. I sent it over to her thro Fugeta after I had explained it to her during a mutual talk with Monever as interpreter, in her own sacred room in the front of the Holy House. She had called me to come to her, for she must have felt my yearning to see Her, embrace Her, the greatest queen the world has ever known. I lay upon Her Mother Breast and she fondled my head, my arms and hands a long, long time, and I felt new life flow in me and I could answer all her questions she asked about my work, and then. I told her how closely all activities were interwoven in this Bahá'í fellowship of hearts the world over. She told me over and over again that I shall succeed, and I leaned on her breast and asked her if I could always lean on her, who was such a life to my soul. And Bahiyyig said that I could lean on her, that she had helped Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá during all their years of sorrow and trials and that I too, could lean on her, that she would ever pray for the success in my work and happiness. That I went home, and that same day sent to my Guardian letters about the Temple, summoning the Bahá'ís of the world to the "Unified Action to Spread the Bahá'í Cause Plan" but my Guardian went away that day to fast all alone and I did not see him until the day before I went away from Haifa.

But Bahíyyih kept my plan nine days. I was writing innumerable letters north south east and west, summoning all to build our Temple and follow the plan for unified action to spread the Bahá'í Cause. All else was forgotten and I felt powerful prayers by my side and support and comfort every hour. On that ninth day something happened, inexplicably spiritual, I had learned to write with a new hand, and a letter to the Bahá'í Fellowship Committee and to the teaching Committee in America were the result. Something had taken place and I felt free, new born I wrote as I have never written before and I knew it was the prayers of the Greatest Holy ideal guiding all. I had just finished one of the letters in intense ecstasy of spirit and ended with the words: "in His Greatest Name", when Fugeta entered and brought me the plan and a beautiful ringstone wrapped in a rose scented piece of cotton- from the Greatest Holy Leaf , and I knew that the ringstone contained the Greatest Name, and that her prayers had been answered that all shackles had fallen from my life. But to do the will of God, unconditionally that loomed before me to do. That I could do row through the power of the power of prayers. Berthaline Osgood gave me an old silver ring of hers in which to fit my stone. She is good to me.

One day we went to Elija's Cave. It is at the base of Mount Carmel near the Zionist Colony, owned by the Moslems. Zia, the mother of our Guardian, Mon- ever, 'Abdu'l'-Bahá's Daughter, Rúhánquíz, the sister of our Guardian, Effie Baker of the Pilgrim House, and I. It was cold and Rúhánquíz returned home, while we wended our way past Brother Esslement's grave, up to the Cave of Eli- jah. A great his mintyn from solid rock. Zia took my hand and explained to me. I saw the long tallow, lit to burn long days. It was kept alive by a moslem whom we did not see. The walls were in places green and dripping, and I imagined the old prophet here dreaming of these hallowed days, when the nearest kin of the greatest Manifestation should come to his cave and speak of him. Time had leaped ahead, though, I was indeed the culmination of all times, all prophecies, all fulfilment, and I was sharing it so closely, so heartfully! By the sides of the Daughters of this Majesty of Fulfilment I could wander and share with Thom His Day! Then I was taken out and shown a wing of the structure adjoining the great cave. "Here," said is "though Master lived for several months, writing tablets and supplicating to 3od. It was after He had been In Tiberias that He came here, just thirty years ago, and this is the first time I have been here since then, now with you. I looked at the latticed windows she pointed out to me to have been the Master's. The door was locked above the little staircase and we could not go in. When I gazed at Zia her vision seemed far away and I could read thoughts of remembrance and suffering upon her glorious features. Tears filled my eyes for these Holy Women, who had suffered so much for the Cause.

I laid my hand on Zia' arm and said: do not be sad, my Zia, you are wonderful, I love you, Zia, and took my hand and helped me down the steep road without a word but with a glance that I shall never forget. One needed not to talk when one was with Them, spiritual conversation was oftentimes was paramount. My heart, for love of them trembled, constantly when I was with them but always did I fear separation from them. We walked very far that night. Too far, and it was cold and windy. Arriving at the German Templar's Colony we rested on a stone wall within the Street of Carmel, near the house of Bahá'u'lláh. Monever was too tired and she lay down on the wall and placed her head in my lap."Will you let me rest on you, Auntie dear", she said, I am very tired and my feet hurt so." What happiness to hold 'Abdu'l-Bahá's child in my arms, what a reward from Him to this poor sinners So I said: I want you always to be near me, I may go to Germany, will you go with me?" And Monever said: "Yes, Auntie, I will go with you if you go, I. should like to go to Germany or anywhere with you. I shall always be sisters, Auntie, we love each other very much."

The next day Monever was sick, she had caught cold, so I was asked to pray for her at the Holy Shrines. God, how I prayed. She soon got well, having gone with us up to the Shrines the following Sunday.

I shall never forget that Sunday. It is hallowed, it is sacred for we were along, all alone, just Tooba, Zia, Monever, Rúhánquíz and Rúhâ and I. We prayed there early, before the other sisters had come to the room there we always meet. It is the caretaker's place, closely adjoining the Holy Shrines a few steps up the Mountain. Above the main story is a sort, of tower, one room, which had belonged to the Master, where He sometimes lived when He needed quiet meditation and prayers for He climb up Mount Carmel is strenuous for some of us. Had it not been for great love of the Tombs I should never have been able to climb up daily and sometimes twice, daily, but the urge for prayer there was creator than the hardship to get there. This day we went up with the Holy Family, those mentioned and we did not wait for Tooba felt weak and we entered the Holy graves' silence. Monever was ill, and Rúhánquíz looked frail and Zia was tired and sad. There we knelt and stood in prayer, and these sisters of Heaven forgot for a while all but their father, their earthly father, who was now dead, who had fondled them, cared for them, instructed, them. They looked long and weeping at His picture and at last all bowed down in submission, to the great parting. Rúhâ told me that the only comfort over the parting was to serve His Cause and never rest, but day by day to do some act to bring the wishes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá nearer to fulfilment. But that solemn hour I felt with them the grief of the child for the father, all my heart wept with them, I prayer God to comfort them how could I pray, thus for these angels of light, but my love let me pray for them. We walked home over the road 'Abdu'l-Bahá had walked so often, a longer road past the men's pilgrim house, and Rúhâ and Momevor showed me the fig tree under which they said the Master had so often rested while going to and from prayer in the Bá'b's Shrine.

Thus ended our Sunday, and I went back to the pilgrim house and had supper with the pilgrims and with Rúhí and. Sohíel, the sons of Tooba, the daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bada. Sohíel and Rúhí Afnán always eat with us, and our Guardian has noon day dinner with us most of the time. Sometime He is away, or ill from overwork. I was always so eager to help Aim, and was rejoiced each time He sent me letters and articles to translate from the German, into English. I shall study German well until next year, when I hope to do more to help my Guardian. I love His so. I must learn Esperanto too. Monever said that these two languages for me would help Shoghi Effendi.

At the first luncheon I had in Haifa, Shoghi Effendi was present. I came in the room later and Keith said a few words I thought were 'Azíz' ullah Bahadur. Nellie Loyd had asked me to especially greet 'Azíz from her. "Are you 'Azíz'u'lláh Bahadur?" I asked turning to the brother opposite me. Poor Keith looked horrified and cried: "Why no, this is Shoghi Effendi" And my Guardian sailed happily when I told Him how glad I was at last to see him... how far I had travelled just to see Him and the Greatest Holy Leaf. "You shall see the Greatest Holy Leaf tomorrow, she will be glad to see you." Whom did you write to on the Steamer?" he asked. I had written to my husband many letters and I told Him I had written my diary of the trip.

I love macaronis. Every day, on the ship the table stuart gave me a side dish with macaronis. Keith said:"I think I must learn to eat macaronis because you love them so. And strange to say, the first dish, during the first meal in the pilgrim house with Shoghi Effendi was a dish of macaroni. My Guardian handed me the dish and smilingly looking at me asked: "Do you like this dish?" "Well, how do these get here!" I exclaimed, and we all laughed. In just little things, and then greater and greater things, my Guardian was being revealed to me, until now He is my every hope and prayer, and thought I want to please Shoghi Effendi, I want to serve Him!

Keith, a thoroughly educated woman, precise and a first grade psychologist, did not often are with me. Wheat sae laid down her set principles on psychological terms I always become confused. We get nowhere, while I am of the defensive, she thinks she is too, and we get nowhere already after our discussions, and embracing in Bahá'í love after each talk we decide not to try to get to the "psychological bottom of things." So it was one day about a letter I had written to Mr. Lunt, chairman of new Fellowship Committee in N.Y. It was one of thousands of letter I had written, and one of hundreds I had written to Mr Lunt. But it was the first one Keith had seen. She came in my room and I happened to show it to her and sae said emphatically:"But you do not intend to send that letter?" I said:"Why yes, Keith, it is the way I write." "Then I must write too," that letter needs an explanation." Confused and unhappy, I ran over to the Holy Home and asked the letter to be given to my Guardian to read, and He came to luncheon with it in His pocket. During the meal He drew it out upon comment from Keith and said there were just one or two changes I might make. And I, terrible unhappy began to weep and was obliged to leave the table. I had lost trust in my letters and in myself. My Guardian wanted me to come out but I could not face Him that day, and I put that fatal letter back in His pocket and kept it there for days. I feared I could write no more letters on earth and my head swam with tears and anguish. I wandered up Mount Carmel and got lost. I did not care. All was over a big storm was travelling over the Mediterranean right towards me. I was on the top of Mount Carmel at that time. Hours had past. And the rain began to pour and pour, was wet and did not feel it. Toward dusk I started back for the Tombs. O; only to tell my Darling 'Abdu'l-Bahá about this, to ask Him to guide me, comfort and not leave me now I realized my nothingness, my terrible faults, and I came to His Holy Shrine and sank before His Threshold. In 'the twilight I lay upon His Tomb, crying as if my heart would break. At last all grew still within me. The Temple was there before me and it seemed as if many voices were singing and peoples were crowding around that Edifice, happy and triumphant. Angels came to comfort me and the burden seemed to slip away. I thought of my Guardian and of His marvellous goodness and longed to see Him again. So I got up and walked down past the men's pilgrim house towards 'Abdu'l-Bahá's fig tree, and towards me came my Guardian. I tried to evade Him, He should not see one like this, now, bedraggled, wet, red of eye and broken in spirit, but He would not let me climb the mountain but came to me and pulled me down and took my hand and holding it in His strong clasp, said: Are you feeling better now? You must not be sad, you must be very, very happy. Do you dear? You must be very, very, happy. I wanted to fall in the mud before Him, or weep, or cry out, but He held me, and I could but smile through my hot, trembling lips and murmur: "Yes, I am happy, my Guardian." And He said: "Go home now and rest, and be very happy..." "And it was a benediction. For days I did not write, but it was a turning point of my spirit until one day He came to luncheon again and drew from His pocket a little booklet and handed it to me. "Have you seen this?" asked my Guardian. I said "No." "Then you must read it, and study it, and live it back to me when you are through with it, for I wish to have it translated into Persian, You must support it and encourage it so for days I read and reread the booklet: "Plan for Unified Action to Spread the Bahá'í Cause" I loved every word the National Spiritual Assembly had written in it. This was my ideal and they had expressed it. Could I help it? And my Guardian, pointing to it saying: "Read it, study it, and then write. And so it happened that through His Guidance the way to the Adhkar had been opened to me, Great teaching scheme with all Bahá'ís in the world. To unite them through the building of the Temple, through building and teaching, that was what I loved to do. And he had found the key to happiness in service for me, and had received me into His administration, using me as I so much desired to be used. He knew, and cared all along what a Fast and a visit on Carmel meant for such as I. And closer and closer the circle grew, until all else faded and only the Temple stood aloft, looming over every activity, beckoning to all mankind to come and enter the portals of the Mashriqu'l Adhkar in Wilmette! Wilmette, the Beautiful!! The Temple! The great Center for absolute Unity of nations!

One day Monever asked me to go to the hospital with her... It was raining and the streets were full of mud. But that did not keep this Holy One from her round of love and comfort. First we went into the private garden where oranges of delicious fragrance hung in rich clusters we picked them dripping with rain-drops and laid them beside some flowers Effie had picked the day before. Then we walked under one umbrella, Monever and I, so happy to be together once more. The hospital, Italian, is a good one and the little mother who was ill had been treated and operated on. I had met her frequently in the Holy Shrines for prayer, and we loved each other. The last time we all had met there the daughter was weeping, afraid that the operation may turn out fatal, but I went over to her and assured her that all would be successful and she would come out alright. I prayed for her mother as I had promised and after the successful operation I was called to visit her mother in the hospital. Monever and I were with her quite awhile. I was silent and praying, and happy just to be near Monever. If in a dungeon wither I should be happy. So much I love her. This love is madness I know, a heavenly love taken form on fallible earth. When they had spoken awhile in Persian together Monever turned to me and said: "Speak Auntie, speak." Often he said this when I was silent. Arid I answered: "I am speaking, Monever, my spirit is speaking." And sae smiled so sweetly and handed me the flowers to arrange in the vase by the invalid's bedside. Then I arranged the oranges on the table so that the little mother might just reach them. We then sat there a long time, and all of us knew the others we praying. We were so happy together. Monever turned to me and said: "Sister is happy that you have come. She loved you all along and now you have prays for her. When you pray, your prayers are always answered, because you are so spiritual and so near to Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. You must always pray for us, for you help us." We walked past the beds of the sick on our way out. All doors were open and all the sick could be seen, men and women. Silently we walked home through the mud, speechless, but in our hearts we knew that someday we would work together, Monever and I. That this was only the beginning.

Turning the corner of Main Street up the Carmel Slope toward old Pilgrim House, and sighting the new one beside it, asked Monever what we would do with the old one. She said we did not know it. I was much upset, because I had imagined this someday to be an art center, an industrial and educational spot so near the main thoroughfare to attract the youth and Genius of the city. I expressed this, going on in vision to see fountains gushing and rose gardens blooming between the old and the new pilgrim houses. Monever looked at me, thoughtfully, for quite a length and her little hand on my arm pressed t tenderly. But she said not in Mon we had moved a few weeks later into the new Pilgrim House, Effie Baker told me that Rúhí had mentioned to her that the old pilgrim House had been purchased by the Holy Family and that it would belong to the Bahá'ís. My heart stood still with delight, and I remembered Monever's look and the pressure of her little warm hand on my arm.

When Monever and I walked together we went arm in arm. Monever is very short and I am very tall. She is dark and I am light. She was dressed in Persian fashion and I in Western mode. One day Rúhí Afnán looked at us and laid and said: "You both look so amusing together Auntie, you and my Aunt. She is so short and you are so tall." "Don't laugh at us, Rúhí we love each other, we are one, forever, even one flesh, for we 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He has united us, and no earthly looks shall separate us. And thoughtfully looked away. He laughed no more, and Monover said: "You are right, Auntie, we are one forever." I have decided when I come back next time, I shall wear Persian dress.

Then I was in Bahjí I could not eat. The Spirit of Bahá'u'lláh was upon me, and I forgot earthly food because of the Spiritual Food that filled me. At table I was placed between Rúhí and Modever, and they fed me, laying bits of fine morsels on thy plate. This always warmed my heart for much love I had never known before. Beside the great love I bore them, the great tenderness and motherliness overwhelmed me. Each morsel was a remedy, a cure, a benediction. I was like a babe in Bahjí, helpless and always in tears. They understood. I knew!!

Toward the end of my stay I did not appear at table. A terror possessed me because on the east and west. I was but a pilgrim, they rested behind closed doors, slept in Eastern fashion, while I was but, a pilgrim, going back home, a visitor treated with utmost kindness and consideration. My heart was breaking. I yearned for the intimacy of these sisters; I knew happiness only beside them, hearing their voices although not understanding half they said on account of my poor ears. Like a faithful dog I wanted to lie at their feet always, tag them every moment and look up into theirs. Why this love? Why had God created it for me? Just to take it away from me again as all things I loved, have been taken from me? Must I conquer this love or may it in years to come be cultivated, broadened, multiplied so as to bear at fruits and responsibilities? Time will tell I only know I love them so...

How did it happen that I was to come again next year, God Willing? We had just prayed in the Holy Shrines of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Spirit of Abhá had surrounded us. It was towards the end of the blessed Fast. Leaving the Tombs we all climbed to the big room of the caretaker's house. There tea was served, and oranges, sandwiches and cakes. We were all entranced by the Beauty of Bahá, and I wept for happiness to sit there with these Holy Women. Zia had the center armchair, I sat between Rúhí and Tooba and Monever sat beside Zia. Ridvánieh had chanted again, her sweet voice like that of an angel. Zia turned to me after a silence and said: "How are you Auntie? You are everybody's Auntie. You have so many children in Persia and they all love you. Your work is very good." I replied: O Mother Zia, my brain is the Temple, my head is its dome. It seems all things material are drawing up and inward as if a magnet were drawing them in, upward and out upon a plan of the spirit, just like the New Jerusalem between the heavens, and the earth. "Zia looked at me thoughtfully." And I do not think I can part with you." The Rúhí said: "Auntie, I promise you that you are invited to come again to pray within the Holy Tombs during the next Fast." And all 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Daughters nodded, they meant it, they said. And I threw myself before Zia, asking her to be my mother, asking her to lay her hands on my head, and she did so, and I felt her blessing in my soul. I could return, be back, pray again with them, probably enter the Holy Home to be their servant, clean their shoes, brush their clothes, scrub their floors! Anything, but separation from them!

“You shall be our own dear sister when you come again” said Monever one day. “We shall live together, travel together to Persia, etc, and shall part no more.” Was I happy now? God! Happy! There is no word for it. I can wait for that. I can work for that! Bahá’u’lláh be praised!

Mardiros’ Dress:

This is an incident of a black silk dress. Just before I left America, on my journey to the Holy Land Mardiros sent in a Jewish merchant with a box of dresses for me to choose from. I had longed for this happening for weeks, and at last disappointed, gave up hope, thinking Mardiros did not intend to buy me clothes. So I fixed up what I could, bought myself a cheap dress or two, and said no more. But just the day before I left this surprise came. Naturally, as a good bargain-hunter, Mardiros had old-fashioned and ill-fitting specimens of apparel, but I was glad to have these and laid out about four which I thought I might use. There was one, black silk, the goods very fine, but much too small for me. Mardiros liked this dress and asked me to take it. I said it was too small. And then to my surprise he said: Keep it, and give it to the GREATEST HOLY LEAF!” Of all people, to Her, I thought, and I looked at my husband dumbfounded. Never in His life had he so much as mentioned one of these holy Women, and here was a dress I should give from him to the Greatest of Angel-mothers, the Greatest Holy Leaf, the daughter of our Father Bahá’u’lláh. Suddenly the significance of it came home to me and I exclaimed: “Mardiros, what you have said just now will save your soul! These words you have spoken will save your souls. And he said nothing, but walked away and there the America incident ended.

But in the Holy Land it had not even been I had, when got to Haifa, many gifts for children. One by one they were given to the little ones of the Garden of God. How they loved these American toys, handkerchiefs and nicknacks. The children of the Holy Household were supplied over and over. There is the little boy of Tooba, Rúhá’s little boy, the brother of our guardian, and Baghdádí’s sister’s two boys. There were the children of the cooks, and servants of the Holy Household, and some of their playmates who lived up the narrow walk towards Carmel, and some who lived near the Bahá’í maiden Maranquiz, near the Holy Tomb on Carmel. All had presents: but there was one gift I had not the heart to give, the black silk dress for Bahá’íyyih from my husband, Mardiros. I kept it and kept it, until the very last moment just before I went away. I was saying good-bye to the pilgrims and had told May Stebbins to take it over and give it to the Greatest Holy Leaf. She did, and that, while I was over there saying farewell. Zia had kissed me, without a word, but her kisses spoke volumes to my heart. On both cheeks she kissed me, long. I could not bear it and passing the greatest Holy Leaf I tried to flee out of that Holy Home. But Monever drew me into another room near the Holy Mother's room and trembling I wrote my address for her, for which she asked. She gave me again the address of the little baby she had given to me, for I had sent tier five dolls to use for this baby and our other ones in 'Akká. At the verge of parting we gazed speechless into each other's faces, she holding my hand tightly between her two soft and loving ones. I had noticed that the Greatest Holy Leaf had joined us and was leaning upon an old chest just beside us. I dared not look at her. I felt my will to remain brave, crumbling. So i suddenly arose and fled out of the House of God., down the steps of marble, over the shell-covered walk towards the Holy Gate and out. But Monover and Riḍvānieh followed and Rúhí called me from the auto in which I had taken refuge without hat or coat. "You must go back, Auntie, the Greatest holy Leaf wants you!" he said. And I returned and met Monever who handed me two large handkerchiefs, one grey and the other white, perfumed and precious by hand-weave and care: "Auntie, these are from the Greatest Holy Leaf for your husband. She says she will pray for him, and she thanks him for the silk dress very, very much. These clothes lay upon the Holy Tomb and were blessed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Give them to your husband with all our loves." Thus, spoke the holy daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the gate of Holiness, and these were the last words from those sacred, loving lips. "O! Yes! O I thank you..." these were all the words I could utter and I hastened into the auto which whizzed me away God knows where... back to the man the Greatest Holy Leaf is praying for. May my life be a sacrifice to these Holy Women.

Thus closed the two incidents of the black silk dress, but its consequences will be for-reaching and everlasting, for the Greatest Holy Leaf, the Daughter of our Father Bahá'u'lláh, is praying, praying... praying!

Why, after but two months' sojourn in Haifa did I happen to return home? O, it is a mystery to me, but must have been guidance and the will of God.

My love again is the cause of my departure. It was on the ninth of February that the seed of my departure was sown. We had gone to Bahjí for a day and night. No one knew it was my birthday.(?) I had told no one. But my birthday was celebrated in Bahjí, the most precious place for it. Even 'Abdu'l-Bahá's donkey kicked and scampered in joy, colored beads placed around her neck by Sohiel and the Master's saddle on her back. We climbed the donkey and even Elizabeth Greenleaf got on it and had Effie take her picture. We roved the red anemonie fields far into the hills of Bahjí, and Monover and I walked ahead talking of all kinds of glorious things. We rested and had tea under the Pines and I laid my head on Zia's lap and she petted my head with her tender hands. Her voice was like my mother's and I was happy to be permitted to lay my head on the lap which had held her son, our Guardian of the Cause. What an honor to be so close to this mother-heart, fondled by the holy fingers so lovingly. I wished eternities would pass like that... she spoke so many things to me, I cannot relate them now... All were there but our Guardian who was always busy. The burden of the Cause ever pressing Him to work and labor for us. But I never forgot Him, nor did I forget to pray for Him, ever. I know that help will come to the world through Him alone, therefore is He so busy... very busy. Ridvánieh, Rúhánquíz, Zia, Tooba, Rúháh, Monever, Sohíel, Rúhí, Mother Greenleaf, Keith and I. This was the party on my birthday. All day we were together, and the time came for departure. I wished we could stay here forever, but we had to go back to Haifa. I sat beside Zia and Monover. Zia held my hand a long time at intervals. I did not move for fear she would draw her hand away, this was heaven for me, to hold the warm hand of the Mother of the Guardian. I received strength and hapuness thus, and thoughts unspeakable crowded my spirit and lifted me to the heavens of joy..

Arrived at the Holy Gate in Haifa, the Holy Family passed through and the “pilgrims” entered the opposite pilgrim house. All went after their various occupations. Keith wrote, Effie set the table etc, but I. What did Victoria do? Why, Victoria’s heart was pumping against her breast like a wild thing, her brain was whirling madly, for she could not beat the separation from those Holy Women! Tears flowed from her eyes and her body trembled for longing. What was to become of her? Could she endure this much longer? It seemed so hopeless. Here she was, only a pilgrim. Over there was the Holy Home, and a high, cold, stone wall was between her and those she loved so dearly. It could not be endured and Victoria knew this. Victoria could not go to them, for Effie and. Keith said it was not proper, that it was even rude to attempt to go over unless one was invited. I would start sometime, and Effie followed and asked where I was going. I remembered the nights I had done out into tide night and leaned against the pillars of the gate only to be near, to probably get a glimpse of the white cloth of the head of the Greatest Holy Leaf or of the Holy Monever, or even of one of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Daughters. Could this be Dome much longer?

So I went in to Keith and I wept and told her I could not bear my unhappiness, that I would like to go home with her and how it might be done. She said she had no money to loan me but that she would write to my husband to send me return money. I nodded and said, alright. And Keith wrote. And as tae days and weeks passed, I realized I must go home soon, as a consequence of this ninth of February. I dreaded it and was sorry of my weakness, because now I realized that only to see the Holy ones now And then was better that to be far away with oceans rolling between us. And a cable was received from Mardios enquiring when Keithkehrer was leaving. Keith cabled return “6th of April, Lapland” and one day in March another cable came from Maridos to Shoghi Effendi that”Victoria come home, with Keithkehrer, sending 400 dollars.”And a short time afterwards the sum of money came, and my fate was sealed, to return. The way the news of the telegram reached me I shall never forget. It was sent to Shoghi Effendi. I was told the Holy Family wished to see me. I went over and the Greatest Holy Leaf and tae Holy Mother seated me between them. Each took one of my hands. “Good news has come for you,” said the Holy Mother. “You must be happy, for your husband wishes you to return to him,” kindly said the Greatest Holy ;par, and she took my arm and held it to her heart, 06ndling my wedding ring and rubbing my hand softly, looking in my eyes with her great and loving ones. For some time, these Holy Ones spoke to me, trying to break the news they knew would affect me so, for I had told them I wanted to stay with them always. At last I could bear their great love no longer. Speechless I arose. I laid down on the table the cable the Daughter of Bahá'u'lláh had given to me. They invited me to stay longer, but I said I must go now, that I would come back. I wanted to go somewhere, alone and cry, call out, forget! Over the rocks of Carmel I hastened, not caring where. Up and down and up, until I came to places I had never seen. I landed near the shores of the Mediterranean where many little children were at play. They were sliding down a wall sitting on pieces of tin. Bare-foot and half dressed I learned from them the lesson of happiness. They knew their mothers were near. Their home was there, all they loved, their little beds, their food.

And homeless I sat and watched them. I wished for a moment I BELONGED somewhere in one of those dingy passages, in one of those equally rooms, loved and "belonging"- But instead, I was a wanderer, must go on and on, unwanted, waiting only on my Lord, whom I loved. Maybe, in the realm of the golden shores - shall find a haven, a place where I am needed. Wanted permanently. That would be very well indeed. May God grant me a PLACE... Stumbling back to Carmel I picked flowers which covered my pathway in profusion, red, purple, white pink and yellow. Wild flowers! Keith said I was a wild-flower, that I needed grafting. Maybe, I was now in the process of being tamed, that was maybe what was the matter. I had one my own way so long. I was being fastened to the trunk of the Will of God. That would be good, and I would gladly bear the pain. I stumbled on up toward the Holy Shrines. They beckoned like heaven and my acme. The thought came to me that would like to lie down beside 'Abdu'l-Bahá forever, just rest there, forget all but rest...

So I went there to pray, to be alone a long time I was there until dusk began to fall. Then I started down Mount Carmel, past the glorious gardens of flowers of all hues and varieties. I wanted to lay my beating and burning dead into the classy beds, and cool my aching eyes in the lovely spark-fountain. Some of our Carmel Garden children met me ten and one of them gave me more flowers. "I picked them for you, Auntie, to give to the American Gardens" she said. And a cure came over me, a tender tugging of hope at my heart. They cared, these children, they were so dependent on love, just as I was, and they came to comfort me. They were not surprised to see my weeping, for they had often seen me thus. This is my period for weeping, the load of the world's sorrow reflects back upon my heart, and it must be wiped out. Somehow, the power of Bahá'u'lláh and the strength of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I knew that a battle must be won; that the enemy must be conquered before peace can dawn. Well the battle was on, and victory was not far, but the enemy was there, the flesh, still firm and stubborn, he must be vanquished!

Passing the Holy Gate, I felt I could not face the Holy Ones again that day. So I hastened to pass. But Rúhí was watching for me. They had missed me. They had been anxious for me. And he said, his "Aunts" were awaiting me. Tooba met me at the marble stairs and. Monever in the marble alcove inside. Both led me into the room of the Greatest Holy Leaf where she sat enthroned like the Queen of heaven as was, upon her couch. The Holy Mother and Zia, the Mother or our Guardian were seated on another couch and they drew me down beside them and took my hands and told me to be happy, that I was coming back soon and that they would be waiting for me. That the Holy Cause needed me in America and that I must now go out and help our Guardian to teach and assist the friends. A long time Zia held me in her arms and I could hear her mother-heart beating and her eyes were like the mystery of the stars of heaven. One cannot explain Zia's eyes. I have never seen such depths to eyes before. It must be the spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that is within them, they make me quiver for love of her. Zia! Mother Zia I need you now.

Before I left, when all others went out, the Greatest Holy Leaf beckoned me to come over to her couch. I kneeled before her. She wanted me to sit beside her pointing to a place near her right side, but I knew my unworthiness and remained at her feet. She put her thin aged hands on my head and whispered Persian words; I felt happier then and resigned, left her presence.

The wild flowers I had picked, laid before the holy Shrine, which were touched by Zia and the Greatest Holy -wear, these I pressed and sent to the Gardens of the world as "Prayer Flowers" to make happy and inspire those who love such things with sweet memories. While in Haifa, from the 29th of January to April 3rd, I have written more than three hundred letters, all for God, His Unity and His Love. May my life become a sacrifice to Bahá'u'lláh and my Guardian.

The Nacazeen Donkey:

Muhammad-'Alí, the Nacazeen, lives in Bahjí, in the Palace of Bahá'u'lláh. Men had taken possession of it after Bahá'u'lláh's Ascension the Bahá'ís let him remain there. It is our hope that he will return it, and we are awaiting a favorable decision, soon. If we get it by next year, Monever says we will live there awhile. That we may take some of our children there. I had always seen children there, in my vision. I do not know why I should have, but it so happens.

One moonshine night I left the others in the house adjoining the Palace and walked toward the Pines. We had been there only a couple of nights. The black prayer shawl was cast over my dead and I stood there looking toward the Holy Tomb I had just left and up to the moon. I thought of the symbol of the moon, the Muhammadan meaning and its meaning in the bible. Two men came towards me, one in oriental dress and the other one European suit and red fez. At once I knew it was Muhammad-'Alí and his associate. They stopped and I looked at them. We were silent for some time one engrossed in thought over the other. We felt a chasm between us and a secret fear. Then Muhammad All spoke up: "Who are you, what do you want?" Pointing to the lights near the palace I said: "I live in there and I am looking at the moon." Muhammad-'Alí stood like petrified not being able to look from my face. The black shawl had fallen from my dead and the moon bathed my face in its beams. While looking at aim I prayed for him, prayed to Bahá'u'lláh for this troublesome Naccazin. Slowly, speechlessly they stepped back into the road and disappeared in the darkness. The spell was broken. But my heart knew no hate, only pity.

Now we needed another donkey. It was the next morning we discuss it at breakfast table, just before leaving for the Druse Village. One more donkey must be supplied and Monever said: "We must get a donkey from the Nacazins." All the pilgrims exclaimed they would not ride a nacazin donkey, they would rather not go. Then I spoke up. I'll ride it Monever, I'll make a good Bahá'í out of it. A donkey at any rate has more 'sense' than being a Nacazin, even if it is obliged to serve them." Ho! 'Auntie would ride the Nacazin donkey! And all was well, we could start. Strange to say, I never rode that donkey. Everybody wanted it. In the end Berthaline Osgood took it. Poor little mule, so patient, so weary looking, so gentle. How aloof animals are from the sins of their owners! I rode a horse.' it was the first time I had alighted one since my girl-hood in the wild west of the Rockies in America. I managed well and we got along famously. It was a wild, horse, no longer young, but manageable. The fight it had later on with the other one was beyond its control. They hated each other and I had been warned. I got off before the, fight by Goes Comeand and taro Bahá'u'lláh's power. During the whole terror of the situation the Holy sisters, Rúhâ and Monever were silent, and when the danger was over they bade us all sit down and enjoy some fresh lettuce. But I read in their faces their feelings, their constant trust and prayer. I spread my coat on the grass for them to sit down on. They did. And we smiled up into each other's faces, theirs unfathomably tender and loving. "Auntie, is near to Bahá'u'llaa, she needs fear nothing, ever, for He Himself is guiding her. He hears her prayers and helps her." Said Monever You must always pray for me and my children, Auntie," said Rúhâ "you are very near to God. He hears you, indeed."

I leaned against her breast and sae patted in love my hair. I was happy. Next to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's donkey, the finest trotter was the Nacazeen.

These Holy Ones, let Muḥammad All live in Bahá'u'lláh's Palace. There is a constant light in the room where 3ahatutllah ascended to the Supreme Concourse. Will they not soon have learned their lesson of obstinacy that it is of no account? These Sisters ride their donkey and let them live in their houses, under their shelter and free from harm. Will they not awaken soon to the truth of Bahá'u'lláh? This day I was even at peace with these Nacazeens and cried: "God forgive them, for they know not what they do." And the Holy Ones treat them accordingly. Someday, thro this treatment all evil and darkness shall flee. -"raise God and His Alpha Love.

"You are everybody's Auntie. We are all your nieces. You are the children's Auntie and the Auntie of all of us. Shoghi Effendi's Auntie, too, for He has just said to me: "Did you go over to see Auntie already?" These words spoke to me, Monever that night she came over to me for the last time. "Shoghi Effendi has never spoken to anyone as He has spoken to you, today, Auntie. He said among other things that you are His "Special helper." This should make you very, very happy. You are helping Shoghi Effendi. He has placed you in the Temple and He wishes to guide you step by step Do as He says, and you will always be happy. Very happy. You will come back to us next year, God willing, and you will help us and Shoghi Effendi. You will be one of our own family, and very dear to all of us. Shoghi Effendi wants you to take care of your health, for He will need you a long time you are His special helper, did you not hear Him say so? Therefore you must be happy.. happy.. happy, do you hear? You must be happy Auntie..” And thus continued Monever, kissing, petting and loving me. You know now we love you, need you, do you now feel our love? You must: Promise me lot to weep anymore...” And like a babe the Holy One of God covered me up just as a mother would, tucked me under until I felt peaceful and quiet. She was but an angel then, no longer human there in the dusk the white cloth on her head seemed like light, her dark hair a hallow and her big black eyes flashing like the stars into my consciousness. Never have I seen her so. She was transformed. And the love of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came over me as of yore only upon her head it rested: O Monever, how I have loved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and now He has given me His Child!” I whispered. And she kissed me again and again, laying her cheek against mine a long time:” You are mine, you are ours. You do not belong to your husband, nor to anybody but to us, you must be happy now and sleep...” Lifting her face she gazed at the window “Which window shall I open? You have too many covers, you will be too warm.” Tenderly she drew one coverlet back then went to the window. No did she open the one towards the Tombs, but opened the one facing the flower garden, where Fugeta’s beautiful flowers were waiting fragrances to us. Then I watched this angel pass my bed and heard her softly close the door... and I went to sleep, not awakening until the ear-1 y dawn, the Easter Dawn of Raster Morn., the day of parting. I went to the Holy Shrine once more, then to Jerusalem per auto, with Keith. But the benediction of ‘Abdu’l baha’is Daughter remains with me, it shall be eternal, everlasting, as if spoken to me by the Master Himself. It is now with me as I write these lines, on the Lapland, the steamer which bears me back to Montclair in America, further and further away from my Homeland Carmel.

Shoghi Effendi said that last day: “I read those letters you sent to me, those Temple letters about the plan. They are very good, did you mail them?” I told my Guardian that I had written about three hundred similar letters while tie had been gone. And he praised the work and said it was confirmed by the Master. When I told Him was nothing, He said I was an instrument in the Masters Hand, doing His will because I have come near to Him.” But you cannot do all this work. It is too much for one person to do. You must take care of your health. I will guide you from now on. One thing at a time will be accomplished. I will always let you know what to do next. Now work for the Temple. Especially urge the East to help America build the Temple. See am giving 95 dollars every month, so earnestly do I desire to see the Temple built. Others are following my example, and I am placing you in the Temple, your work shall come out of it.” “But what shall I do if other disconnected activities come and separate the people? It I asked my Guardian. “Just write to them urging them to turn to the Temple, to help it and the Plan for unified Action—This will unite you then, for all activities shall gather around this Edifice In the end there shall be no divisions. Let all the activities you have started go on, encourage them, but give all your time to Temple work, this will establish you there and all your troubles will disappear. will instruct you from time to time what to do next. I will let you know, you will be helping me. O, if you do THAT it will be very good. I shall write about your work to the National Spiritual Assemblies. They should send you the addresses of all the loyal Spiritual Assemblies in each countries. That will make you happy? Yes? “ And I clapped my hands and said that I shall be happy to work for tae Temple, that it was art, beauty, and benevolence. “Just urge in your letters, do never demand. Your power is in your humility and faith. Invite all assemblies to unite make the Temple a great center for all activities. Get together all the aster said about it and place between your paragraphs Picture and photos you can print with reviewing.

Thus spoke my Guardian. “You wish to go to the Holy Shrines now?” I had been just thinking that would like to and nodded. Then I will not keep you longer. Be Happy, you must be very happy.” He said My Guardian: may come again for the next fast. May I be here with you and help you? “ Yes, you can come, be happy, God willing “ Ile clasped my hand, and I saw my Guardian no more. Monever and Rúhâ urged me not to go to tile Shrines this night. That it was too late and I must rest. I sat at their feet, and Monever brought me orange juice...” do home and lie down, I will come later, said Monever.

Fugeta has a Parrot. He laughs and calls and shrieks. He eats oranges and candy and bread. Fugeta tells me that he is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s parrot, that he had been with Him in ‘Akká. That interested me, and since that time I like this screeching polly; it is green, partly red. Once it was a prisoner in ‘Akká. Now it is free to appearances, but still a prisoner in its cage. There are freedoms and double freedoms. Sometimes we think we are free but we are still prisoners we are used to the bars of our cages and imagine they are not Unless a door is opened to us we cannot discover it. So it is good, even if imagining ourselves free We can look for double and threefold freedom and find it we do not look for it we cannot discover freedom. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says that the earth is a prison for heavenly souls. We must believe him and in faith look for heaven. There must be a spiritual freedom that breaks all shackles, material and spiritual. Then this is found there will be complete freedom from earthly things, love for them will have faded away, possessions will become mediums for service and all actions will become selfless and pure. The nearer we come to God, the freer we become, the nearer the spiritual world. From one freedom to the other we must express His praise, just as His parrot does. Effie gave me some feathers of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s parrot. I will keep them always. Born in a cage it thinks itself free. We are like the parrot.

The first day of our arrival in Haifa, Fugeta met us at our tender. He sent me on ahead in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s carriage while he and Keith went back to the boat to help the custom officers look through our trunks. Arrived at the pilgrim house

I was assigned my room overlooking the Holy... Shrines and Mount Carmel and the Home of my Lord. I stood at that window 'overlooking these much-longed for scones and wept and wept. W4 Haifa right from the beginning got all these, tears Is beyond my comprehension. I seldom if ever wept at home. I was a comfort to others there, I was resolute and brave. But here I was a babe, like a helpless child, needing comfort. Keith said that I sobbed so loudly at the Shrines that all heard .me, so I tried to hide my sobs, and after some practice I learned to sob without a sound. Then when the tears kept on rolling over my cheeks Keith said that I was keeping away the good that might be mine if I were happy.. So I tried not to let her or others see my tears anymore. I went to Carmel and to the Tombs alone then when I had to weep and plead and pray for humanity and the world. It was this thought that made me long so for prayer, to help make the world one. Thro prayer, I knew, that all shall be come flew, and I tried to help but I had to stop, meantime. No one understood my tears but the Holy Ones. Keith thought that my contact was not so fortunate as my letters. But Monever said that all AI do was good. Another one who always wept was Riḍvānieh, therefore did we understand each other. I told her to weep on, that all her tears were pearls in her spiritual crown. This made her happy. Riḍvānaieh is the daughter of the sister of the Holy Mother, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Wife. Sue chants like an angel. And is one. I love her.

On this day, after some time, Monever came over.

Monever was the first one of that Holy Band, I met. Then Rúḥá, both Daughters of the beloved Master. I cannot express my feelings when I laid eyes on now I felt. The flow of their spirits flailed my expectant soul and entered my heart. I threw myself at their feet and wept. They knew how to comfort. They were the daughters of my Lord and His spirit was within their bosoms. I had come to the rigs t place for comfort and knew it. They drew these tears out of my eyes, these tears which had been stemmed for years and years waiting to be released. Like a dam, its waters held, suddenly let loose, rushing in torrents over the chasms of reserve and over the dry lands.

"We have waited a long time for you," said Monever, months and months we have expected you and thought you would never come." We are glad you are here now, it is a great blessing to come here."

After all these weeks of happiness I realize most fully the "blessing" Monever mentioned. This "blessing" cannot be expressed in words, nor analyzed, but it is a con scious reality, hovering over my spirit every moment. it is my Protection from all harm. The guide in all my wanderings. I am satisfied.

I was the only one that fasted in the pilgrim house. Effie was not strong. Fugeta had to work too hard. Keith was too far advanced in years. So I told them I would fast for all of them. Sohíel and Rúḥí could not fast, but our Guardian fasted to the end. No one saw Him during fasting time. Sometimes He would not eat for days, said Rúḥí. Rúḥá and Monever fasted in the end. It is not easy to fast, but I have always kept the fast after Agnes Alexander dad told me of it in Montclair that first year I became a Bahá'í. In that first year, 1919 it was hard for me to fast from sunrise to sunset, for such a thing had never been experienced in our family, but my love for 'Abdu'l. Bahá made me overcome all this. I was foolish to fast, said my people. That these ideas were of the past. But, still I fasted because it was the Bahá'í command. And kept at it till now. In Haifa it was easy to fast. The first days I fasted twenty-four hours but the Greatest Holy Leaf asked me not to wait that long. So I ate before sunrise and after sunset. Sometimes the Greatest Holy Leaf sent me a Piece of bread, and cheese with much to break the fast. Sometimes she and the Holy Mother sent cookies with a white or red rose, a bunch of violets, some pansies, from their sacred hands. I would gladly have fasted forever with these signs of appreciation. All the Holy Family asked me to pray for them, for their children. Tooba asked that I pray for her and Soheil, and Rúhí. Rúhí asked me to pray for her husband and her four children. That her children become pure servants of Bahá'u'lláh and a blessing to the Zia asked me to pray for her and my Guardian. Ridváníeh asked Prayer for her mother, her two children and herself. Here I was, a sinner, to pray for the holiest of Families and although unworthy, out of sheer love I could bend my knee and pray to the Grandfather and to the Father of these saints of God to keep them, give them their hearts' desires, just because of love, only love. They believed that my prayers were heard. So I prayed. May God forgive me.. may my life be a sacrifice to them.

Never had the holy Another appeared so immaculate and glorified as that last time I saw her. She stood alone in the great foyer of the hall in the Holy Home. I had just come out of 'Abdu'l. 1.ahals room, where I had fallen before His bed where He had slept and died. A white turban was on His pillow, and while I lay there I thought of Muníreh, this Holy wife of His who had given Him and us these glorious Daughters, shining Torches in this dark world. Her significance came home to me, and when I left the sacred room I beheld Muníreh, and I could but fall to her feet and grasp them with my arms around them. I looked up into her face which shown as never before and she understood. Took me in her arms and kissed me.

This was the last time I saw the Holy Mother.

May I behold her like that next year, God willing!

Rúhánquíz is the daughter of Zia, and the sister of Shoghi Effendi, our Guardian. Rúhánquíz is 26years old, a wonderful woman, beautiful, glorious, and a right and to our Guardian. It was she who wrote me the last letter to America inviting me to come: R. Rabbání is her signature, and. I had thought it was Rúhí who had written until he had told me he had not written and Rúhánquíz had had told me she had and disguised it thus she work hidden, but a torch to the, Holy Cause, lightening our Guardian's burden every day. Rúhánquíz is frail and I did not see her often. Sometimes she walked with me up Mount Carmel , sometimes we came home together from the Holy Shrines. She is gloriously interested in everything that pertains to the Holy Cause and she asked many questions about the American friends. In Bahjí one day she asked me about my work. I drew the outline for her in the sand where we sat under the fig trees. She was much interested and asked many questions. She was sure our Guardian would help me in this work, the work of uniting tae hearts. The following Sunday we went to 2rayer together in the Tombs. I had told her about our young people in Chicago, and about the list of thirty two of them who had sent in their names. I asked her to pick some violets from the wonderful patch in front of the tombs and she did so, and I told her I would send each one a violet from her the was happy over this The we went in to pray. Two times Rúhánquíz gave me violets

When I left Haifa Rúhánquíz was not there. She had been with Shoghi Effendi during the Fast, and now she was spending her time in the little plot the Holy Family had bought on Mount Carmel. I pray Rúhánquíz becomes strong again. She is so pure, so helpful to Shoght Effendi. I miss Rúhánquíz. I love her.

Now and then we had a womans' meeting in the Holy Home. The pilgrims also were invited to come. The Persian Bahá'ís would chant and converse, and when the pilgrims spoke one of the Holy Daughters-would interpret. Often the Holy Mother and the Greatest Holy leaf told us stories. about the lives of Bahalutllah And 'Abdu'l-Bahá, of their hardships, suffering and imprisonment Their sweet voices were like balm to my soul although: I could not understand much because I could not hear. But I was happy and all the women understood, for the pilgrims had the words interpreted by Rúhá or Monever. Toward six o'clock tea was served in little glasses which looked like amber it was good tea and everyone partook of it Dainty cookies baked by members of the Holy Household were served sometimes. Farewells came in the end, always and they were hard for me, although I looked forward to the kisses of the holy 4iother and of the Daughter of Bahá'u'lláh, Bahíyyih, and the embraces of the Daughters of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Little things the Holy Ones gave me I have still. I have saved them all. I shall always save them. One is the rind, of an orange. We were sitting in the Riḍván garden in Acre. It was very comfortable on the clean soft mattresses under the great .pines there. We were lolly and happy. We had just finished some lettuce and Monever took an orange and divided it among us I took my share as I have always taken everything out of Monever's hand, with utmost humility and gratitude. Monever was laughing heartily I knew not why. But when I put the slice of orange in my mouth and bit upon it I knew. It was terribly bitter and cast it from me."O Monever, this is the first bitterness you have given to me. You have fe me like a mother with sweets end good things and this is of so bitter!" And Monever said.

One sunrise, in the Holy Shrine of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the spirit of. God descended upon me and the picture of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár grew until it covered the walls with many colored beauty. Crowds hastened toward the nine portals and I watched from a high mountain. Children of all nations sang around this edifice of glory, and its meaning grew and a wakened in my consciousness its inexplicable rejoicing. My tears were dried and my heart sang with the tunes of the Lord of Host, adoring and praising the power of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-

Bahá, I fell upon my face, and the voice of God called and the spirit of my Lord spoke unto me; saying:

“Maid servant of Bahá, Victoria, let all things suffice thee. Be hold thou the Temple that thou shalt build! Go thou forth into the New Work and summon the nations to turn their faces in that direction, for the uric and affiliation of the nations shall be spread by your hand. Invite thou them to the Banquet of Thy King, the King of Harass, within the nine Gates which are around My Temple. Declare Thou unto them My Will and speak unto them My Command through thy love and thy pen. Make thou known unto them what hath been revealed unto thee on this Day by the Spirit of Bahá, in the Most Holy Shrines of Carmel and Babe. Fear not, for I am with thee. Behold, I shall never forget thee. I am Thy Lord and Helper!”

April 3rd, 1926.

And again the Lord spoke unto me, saying:00 thou maidservant of God! Soon shall all the peoples turn towardst he Holy Spot of Wilmette which is My sacred and Holy Ground. I have et set ay Feet upon it and My Aeart is in My Temple. I shall not forsake nor forget it, and I Shall glorify it among the nations of the earth. I have appointed thee an instrument in My Hands to go forth and summon the faithful servants unto the ends of t.: earth to arise and assist thee in the erection of My Temple, and thou shalt not be alone, nor shall thy heart despair , for I am Thy God, and I shall sustain and uphold thee. I have placed thy feet on the base of My Temple, thy head under the round dome of Holy Temple, and thy heart and hand upon the cornerstone of My Temple, Fear not, I will sustain thee!”

Bahjí, April 1st. 1926.

And the Lord said unto me in the twilight of the Tomb on Mount Carmel: 0 thou beloved maidservant! Thou art thy hand and with thy pen shall write. Thou art y Voice, and through thee shall I be heard. Thou art my in and I shall use thee, and enlighten thee, and help thee. Hasten ‘thou from My Holy Shrine and call thou out into the regions of the earth My Will Summon thou the servants of Bahá untpthe Table of the Lord in the Holy Place of Wilmette, for there shalt thou I abide until the end of thy days and thou shalt not go out from it, nor shalt thou be forsaken. For I am the Lord, thy God, I am thy Helper and thy Guide.

O, those Voices of the Tomb, where Life was evident and death was not! O those fragrances borne to my nostrils from the Flowers of the Divine paradise! Wide became the walls of the Holy Shrines in the sunrise and the twilight. All things seemed to draw together in the mist of His Divine presence! All material things moved toward my heart. Downwardly from the ends of the earth they moved to my feet, up to my loins, upward to my heart, over my brain, into the breezes of his Will between the earth and the heavens. And there they spread out, far, far, and a new city appeared through the mist and the New Jerusalem took form and all material civilization became divine through this drawing upward into the air! Into the air, as prophesized, into the AIR! There hovered the Paradise of Abhá on earth, there lay the City four-square, and through the hollow reed came the Voice of God saying 'I have built unto myself a City, a Temple! I have adorned it with the Blood of the Saints and, of the Lamb!! I have gathered together my own into the nine entrances of my Temple. They come from North, south east and west through the Nine Portals and worship My Name! I am the Lord, their God!

"Auntie, you must like the bitter things I give you too, and you must know that all I give you is through my love. I shall make a juice of these oranges for our lettuce, it is very good." She prepared two bowls one with sugar and one with salt. One juice was bitter and the other sweet. When they were mixed by passing around we would make faces over the sudden change and Monever laughed so heartily, Monever was so happy that day, I shall never forget!

That same day we had dinner on the long table near the river where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá dwelled do often. Everything appeared as if by magic. I wanted to help and said that I wished to serve. Auntie, you must not, you must rest now, you are our guest, when you go Lime you can serve again."If Monever has pressed a knife in my heart she could not have hurt me more: It was a first warning that I must return home soon. I think I wept several days over these words and Keith noticed it and I told her, and she exclaimed: Victoria, you must learn that no one is favored here. The longest time we should stay here is nine or nineteen days. All of us are treated alike, no exceptions are made. They are kind to us and do their utmost to please us, because they wish us to go out into the world and give the Message. No one has lived in the Holy Household, and you must not be expected to be favored. What they say to you they say to me, only you do not hear." These words almost made my heart stop. The business of this as Keith took it, was not for me. I wanted to be loved, only loved by these Holy lines, wanted not to be a pilgrim but a member. o their care, their tenderness and pity. I could not go and come like the others, my heart would not stand this I wondered how Keith could look at it this way, but she had gotten to the psychological meaning of our visit. To me the stone walls which encircled the Holy Home were prison bars, they were awful fortresses, I thought of Paradise Lost" when Peri stood outside lamenting. Forbidden ground, the portals of heaven closed. If there was a heavenly place awaiting me in the land of God, why not now, just now, could heaven be opened to me. Why did I yearn like that. Was I not only a pilgrim, come to receive orders, pertaining to the progress of the Cause? Why then did I fall in love with the Holy Women? Was it not for LOVE of them that drew me to their shores? Would that love be stilled by high impenetrable walls, conventional explanation, and exclusiveness? Others may be satisfied, but my love is different, it is boundless, end-less, obstacle-removing! Shall it be conquered or shall At increase? My Lord alone can answer me. I know nothing. I wish I could feel like the pilgrims do. But if my great love is reciprocated, the Flames of our Mutual Love will bridge the chasms, remove

-tine walls and usefulness and happiness will come through it manifold.

I told Monever that my love was like an hurricane. She said “Yes, Auntie, your love is very great. It will bring you back to us. I will not forget you for a minute.”

1927

The Will had been buried for safe keeping, when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life was in great danger.

While Shoghi Effendi was at Oxford he had a dream, and he was told to put on the Master’s coat.

The Will was read after Shoghi Effendi returned from Oxford to the Holy Land. Lady Blomfield and Miss Rosenberg, with about 200 others were present; I heard these words from Miss Rosenberg’s own lips, while in London.

“There were 200 present and every time Shoghi Effendi’s name was mentioned, the whole company arose and made Obeisance. Shoghi Effendi was about 25.

He has always been so kind to me. He said “There will be a Meeting at the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, Sunday at 12, I wish you to be present.” I said Shoghi Effendi that will be impossible, it is just the time may ship is sailing.” He sent messengers hither and yon and called that Meeting for 12 Saturday so I could be present.

There were English and Americans staying at the Pilgrim House. Some drove over, others going by train 3-class which we filled. We were requested to sing “Nearer My God To Thee” a great favorite of the Master’s. No one seemed quite sure of the words, so we rehearsed an the way over. Finally the conductor came to get tickets, and down went the veils, with a bang, as soon as he was out of sight, up they went again. One of the daughters, said to me you know we do not want to wear these veils, but it is the custom of the country, so we must. Now they are a thing of the past.

The Tomb

Finally every one arrived. It was the first time Shoghi Effendi had been there since the passing of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and as he stood on the steps leading to what we would call a chancel, his face looked the picture of woe, then he began to chant, and I have never seen such a transformation, he looked like an angel, and he certainly chanted like one. Then the English and Americans sang “Nearer My God To Thee”, it was most impressive, and there was many a wet eye.

The place was beautifully, decorated with flowers, and as I was about to leave Shoghi Effendi, who had collected them into a large handkerchief, said, “I must find the most beautiful one to give to you.” It was a tea rose, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s favorite. When I returned to Washington at Madam Delagnet’s Meeting, I tore it a part, and gave each one a leaf, and anointed each one-with a drop of rose water, made by the dear hands of the Greatest Holy Leaf.

Part I Brightening Horizons of Israel

Part II Our Guardian Speaks

Part III Afterglow of Haifa

The following are notes of table conversations given by the Beloved Guardian in the presence of Rúhíyyih Khánum and the members of the International Council who heard them all. Most of these Notes were given when Ruth Moffett was the only remaining pilgrim. The notes are not verbatim and not in sequence but verified by Rúhíyyih Khánum and members of the International Council at the table after the departure of the Guardian, and checked each night until midnight by Jessie Revell from her stenographic notes to be sure that the content be correct, and expressed as accurately as possible in the words of the Beloved Guardian.

Rúhíyyih Khánum wrote that if the friends could realize the selfless devotion, justice and loving forbearance of the Guardian, "They would love Him with a consuming, weeping tenderness and devotion tenderness and devotion, as indeed so many of them do. He is so golden-hearted, so pure-hearted, that sometimes when I catch a glimpse of it, I am stunned" As was this pilgrims.

Now that our Beloved Guardian has gone to his great reward in the Abhá Kingdom, every word of his is more important and precious than ever and should be so soul stirring that we rise and spread the great, glad message of Bahá'u'lláh as one soul in many bodies.

Our Guardian Shoghi Effendi had, on Ruth Moffett's first visit, asked the Greatest Holy Leaf, the only daughter of Bahá'u'lláh for the spiritual names of Ruth and Robert Moffett. She said, "For Ruth, Rúhíyyih, which means spiritual beauty." And the name of Robert is Ḥabíbu'lláh, which means "beloved". Then the Guardian said it is good to use these spiritual names as much as possible as it puts that spirit out into the others.

Part II A. OUR GUARDIAN SHOGHI EFFENDI, SPEAKS

The Guardian greeted Ruth with unusual warmth and the first night, placed her at the head of the table, which is a courtesy given to each incoming pilgrim. As he did so, he said, "Welcome, it has been a long time that we have looked for your return to Haifa. You will find things much changed from the time that you were here before. Did you see the Shrine of the Báb. I hope you can go there tomorrow. How are the friends in America? How is the Assembly in Chicago functioning now? What progress is there now? I hope that all friends in America are progressing."

+ # The Obligatory Prayers

Bahá'u'lláh gave two commands which we should fulfil as closely as we ease can: One is in regard to the Fast. As far as possible the Nineteen day Fast should be observed. That is a command not just a suggestion. It has a tremendous influence on others. (March 2nd - 20th inclusive) Second in regard to prayer, We know that Bahá'u'lláh gave us three obligatory Prayers: One a very long one to be observed with prostration bowings etc once in 24 hours, more especially adapted for the Oriental peoples. The second one is the medium length prayer, which is to be used at morning, noon and evening, and that has some of the bowing but not as much as the other. The third is the short prayer. This is to be observed every noon religiously between 12 and one o'clock; and that is especially adapted to our Western believers.

I told Shoghi Effendi, it was very hard for me to think of it between 12 and one o'clock that I would think of it earlier and then forget. He said: That is one of the tests. The reason Bahá'u'lláh gave us obligatory prayers as a Command, is one of the tests for the believers.

So if we think of it in that way, I think we will try harder to remember it just at the right hour, because BAHÁ'U'LLÁH ASKED US TO DO SO.

Shogi Effendi said: In the day of the Báb, there was physical martyrdoms of the believers. We toast realise that we are being tested in ways that we have never been tested before. We must be wise. We must hold out our arms welcoming these tests, knowing that they are for us, that we may become stronger and able to meet the great ones and greater ones ahead of us, thereby becoming LIGHTBEARERS for those who are weak, and they will solely need our help, Remember the story of the Lightbearers:

God invited all humanity to a Feast, and when the time came for the guests to leave, He gave to each one a little saying, it will guide your steps on the way home. Someone said; It is bright moonlight, and threw the lamp aside. Some held their lamp so close to themselves, that it did not light one step ahead.

A storm came up and many lights were blown out, only a few held their lamps high above their heads to give light to all around who were stumbling. Many missed their way completely and were hopelessly lost in the wilderness.

Then God looking down in compassion sent his messenger to relight the lights that were blown out and guide the wandering ones. And then another day, and again many threw away their lamps. So when the night was come. God sent another Messenger to save them. But again they forgot when it was day. This happened again and again,. At last God knowing there was to be a long dark night, sent his best beloved Messenger (Baba'u'llah).

Baba'u'llah gave two commands which we should fulfill, as closely as we can. One is in regard to the Fast, as far as is possible; and that is a Command, not just a suggestion. As to the Fast, it has a tremendous influence upon others.

Regarding the prayers: We know Baba'u'llah gave us three Obligatory Prayers: one very long one to be observed with prostrations, bowings, etc., three times a day, more especially adapted for the Oriental peoples. The second one is just a medium length prayer, which is to be used at evening; that has some of the bowings, but not so much. The third one is the very short prayer. This is to be observed every noon religiously, between 12 and 1 o'clock; and that is especially adapted to our Western believers.

I told Shoghi Effendi it was hard for us to think of it between 12 and 1; that I would think of it at 11 o'clock and then forget it. He said "That is one of the tests: The reason Baba'u'llah gave us obligatory prayers as a Command is one of the tests for the believers". So, if we think of it in that way. I think we will try harder to remember it just at the right hour. Because Baba'u'llah asked us to do so.

Pilgrim Notes

Sadie Oglesby

Arrival in Haifa March 11, 1927.

During our first visit with Shoghi Effendi, which was a few hours after our arrival in Haifa, Shoght Effendi having greeted us (the American pilgrims, five in the party) and having asked of the American believers as to health, unity, etc., He turned to me and said he was very pleased that I had come to visit Haifa, that I was the first colored believer to visit there during his time, etc, Then proceeded to ask how many colored believers there are in America.

I told him we were very few. He then asked about the number of colored believers in Boston, New York and other centers. He said the master loved the colored people very much and that the Cause needs the colored people and cannot be established without them.

He said, "The believers should practice great kindness and show great love so that the colored people may be attracted to the Cause until the doors are opened and the colored people are attracted into the white people who are not believers will not have confidence in the sincerity of the friends and will not enter The Cause. The friends should practice all the teachings and not only a w the colored people to The Cause.

At another time he said, "He is not pleased that so few colored people are in The Cause" and that special effort must be made to attract them. He asked if I had been urgent in this matter, if I had been forceful in explaining this feature of the teachings to the understanding of the believers.

I told him I thought that if we should meet together, read the teaching and practice, great love, doing all possible at the same time to draw others into the Cause, all other matters would adjust themselves and perfect amenity among believers would ultimately be attained.

He said I should be insistent and urgent upon this matter. That I should be persistent and not quiet so that the believers may learn of this great need, He told me I had been negligent, indifferent and had done my duty upon this subject.

I told him Mr. Oglesby had often been persistent in speaking to the friends upon this subject but that I had just as often tried to keep him quiet. He said, "Mr. Oglesby's way is the better way."

I told him I had, tried all I could to be in harmony and amity with the friends. That I had understood the Master to say we must give on the right and accept the wrong for the sake of harmony and unit then said, "Yes, the Master said that and the Waster wrote that but was then. This is another time. It is important that we have center in America composed of colored and white believers, where all differences are removed. A center established upon the teachings of the Master. This is most important.

"Continuing, he said, "Racial unity and harmony cooperation and freedom from racial prejudice is the first principle. If we will not keel' the first principle, how can we hope to keep the following principles. We must find unity and harmony upon the principles. If we find unity and harmony other than upon the principles we will establish that which is not the Cause."

I told Shoghi Effendi that I thought the friends of America loved him very much and I believed if they knew how anxious he was upon this matter that they would do all they could to satisfy his desire.

He said when I should have returned to America, I should seek no lest but be constant and urgent. That the importance of this matter should be understood by the friends. That I should be fearless and compelling. I expressed my great sorrow to him but told him I was quite unprepared, unqualified for the work he wished me to do. I said to him, "I have no strength or importance in America. I am so sorry"

To this, Shoghi Effendi said, "When you return to America do as I have told you. Be fearless and know that the invisible concourse will assist you and I will supplicate at the Holy Shrine in your behalf."

Another day when Shoghi Effendi had talked upon this subject I said to him, "Shoghi Effendi, it presents itself to me thuswise: since the infancy of the human family, races and nations one after another have arisen and fallen in their long march around the cycles and to maturity and at this time, the oldest race represented upon the earth is the colored race while the youngest or last to have attained a high civilization is the white race and in order to lose this cycle and save the civilization of this day, the oldest and youngest or first and last, that is the white and colored, or outer ends of the cycle must link together, then the inner, or intermediate races will automatically take their places in the circle.

Thus the family of Bahá'u'lláh will be established. Shoghi Effendi said, "That it true but if we fail to do this, lie will be dispersed."

Again Shoghi Effendi said, "The believers must establish in America a center composed of white and colored people who are living in perfect harmony and unity having settled all their differences through the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, thus when the people have suffered and are tired and weary ready to seek hope and comfort, the attention of the ruling heads of the nations may be called to this center in America and upon investigation, they will gather around this center and establish the world of Bahá'u'lláh, but if we fail to establish such a center, the people will find no hope anywhere.

One day at dinner with the pilgrims, both eastern and western, Shoghi Effendi, as he discoursed upon the matter of unity between the white and colored people, was interrupted several times and to each of those who sought information upon other matters he said, "That is not important," but urged the need of a center in America composed of the two races saying, 'Ind4a has her problem, Germany has her problem, Persia has her problem, the other nations each has its problem but America's problem is the establishment of unity and harmony between the white and colored people."

He said, "Racial prejudice and differences on the part of non-believers should astonish the world by their fellowship and cooperation with the colored people. This, he said, is an open door of service in which the Bahá'is will not be molested.

March 23. During the dinner period, Shoghi Effendi said a colored believer should be elected upon each committee even if it required that the same one should be elected upon each committee. I then asked him this question. "If after having gone into the meeting for election, we prayed for spiritual guidance, proceeded to vote and no colored believer was elected, what should we do in such a case? He said, "To pray for spiritual guidance is not sufficient, we should also study the needs of The Cause, discuss the needs of The Cause at the nineteen day feasts, speak of the needs and the qualifications, committees require (not at the time of election), discuss it during the year so that the friends may be informed. At present, the colored are overwhelmed by the white."

Shoghi Effendi asked, "Had the friends read the master's teachings upon racial amity? Have they enough teaching upon this feature of The Cause? Do they understand its great importance? Do they know of the master's fearless example in His attitude toward Mr. Gregory in Washington and elsewhere?

I told Shogh Effendi I had often heard the friends read the master's teachings upon this subject, in the meetings. Then he said, "I have never written upon it, I will write."

March 27. As I sat with Shoghi Effendi in the raster's parlor, he said to me, "My charge to you is that when you go back to America, tell the friends to look within themselves and find there the reason of so few colored people being in The Cause. Until this is removed, The Cause cannot grow. If we wish the Cause to grow in America, that which is the cause of so few colored believers must be removed. This is vital.

“I told Shoghi Effendi I had believed that since the colored people were not responsible for this breach or chasm, never having desired a separation from the white, that the white believers would be the ones to work upon this feature of The Cause, Shoghi Effendi said, “Yes, but we must help them.

“I asked Shoghi Effendi if it would not be well for us to have prayer meetings. Answer, “Yes, it would be very effective if the believers should gather and engage in prayers from different friends even as many as would take part. It would no doubt be of much benefit in bringing about amity and harmony but this should not be forced won anyone.

One day I asked Shoghi Effendi if a Bohai should have in a la and testament a desire to be cremated and it were in His the power of the reasonably to deny this request and enter according to the teachings, should this be done. Answer, “Undoubtedly, to enter according to the teachings is most important and will be a favor to the departed.”

Shoghi Effendi said that when I felt I had done all I could upon the feature of racial amity among the believers to take trills South and teach there. The South is in great need of the teachings.”

During my last interview with Shoghi Effendi, he said; “You must be earnest and constant in your effort to press to the understanding of the believers the vital need of a perfect unity between the white and colored people, Be eager, earnest and forceful in this matter and be assured that the invisible concourse will assist you In your works and I will support you, I will pray for you, I will pray for you at the Holy Shrine, I will pray for you. Be confident.

An extract from a discourse given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Howard in Washington, D.C. April 23, 1912.

“For the accomplishment of unity between the colored and the white will be an assurance of the world’s peace. Then racial prejudice, national prejudice, limited patriotism and religious bias will pass away and remain no longer.”

Extract from Mrs. Watson’s tablet from The Master.

“This question of the union of the white and black is very important, if it is not realized, ere long great difficulties will arise and harmful results will follow.

“Therefore, the believers and the maidservants of the merciful must exercise the utmost endeavor to bring affiliation of hearts between the white and the black, and seek the confirmation of The Holy Spirit.”

while visiting Shoghi Effendi, in Haifa, Palestine,

March, 1927

As I first saw the beloved Guardian, it seemed somehow as though was a long way, yes miles, from him, yet gazing at him in wonder and astonishment. This lasted it seemed for some hours, but I am sure it was only a few moments and as he began to talk to us, I suddenly felt so very near to him and perfectly at home with him.

He asked first of our health and then the query was of individual friends of America, then friends in general and different groups or Assemblies. Then, suddenly, he turned to me and asked about the colored Bahá'ís of America. I told him we are not many, naming, so he desired, as near the number in each Assembly as I could, not knowing exactly. He asked for my opinion as to the reason of so few colored in the Cause? answered: "Having so long felt the force of unwelcome among the whites, the chasm is very deep and wide and is very difficult, and having acquired the habit of expecting unfriendliness from the whites, the colored people generally came among the Bahá'ís looking for shortcomings and flaws, and soon fell away. Were it possible to get them to read enough to cause them to stop looking at the creatures, and look for their guidance to the Teachings alone, they surely would become confirmed believers, but there is the trouble." Shoghi Effendi said: "The Bahá'ís should practice so much kindness, and manifest so much love that the colored people would be drawn to the Cause." He said: "We are not pleased that so few colored people are in the Cause, the Cause needs them and cannot grow without them." He said "The friends should practice all the Teachings and not just a part, and in that way the colored people would be attracted, that will draw this group into the Cause. The first Principle is to abandon all prejudice, how can they hope to do the following if they will not do the first." I told him that for people to accept this seemed to be the hardest of all but that I believed the friends did not altogether mean to be unkind or neglectful, but acted rather from force of habit, but in their hearts they meant to be friendly. To this he said: "The friends must remove every trace of prejudice from their hearts and bring the colored in. They must remove every idea of superiority from their minds, and accept the colored in every way on an equality with themselves. In many instances the colored are far superior to the whites, and they have not yet had an opportunity to prove themselves Shoghi Effendi said: "When the believers get their hearts free from prejudice the colored people will come into the Cause, and when the colored people come in and are made -welcome, then the whites will come flocking in." He said: "The white people of America are watching to see what the Bahá'ís are going to do with the colored people; when they see the white Bahá'ís treating the colored Bahá'ís as themselves, then they will believe they are sincere." Then he said "The people of the East are watching to see what the Bahá'ís of America are going to do with the colored people, and unless the Bahá'ís remove the prejudice and establish a center where brotherhood and justice is practiced toward colored people, there will be no center to which to turn when the world is in its great turmoil, and the nations will be brought low.

March 12 1927. This morning Rúhíyyih Khanum ('Abdu'l-Bahá's daughter) called upon the Western pilgrims, and talked beautifully of the American friends and of the Cause. Her heart, too, is full of a longing to hear of a growing unity between the two races. She ever talks of this race question and reminds one always of how 'Abdu'l-Bahá manifested in actions towards Mr. Gregory how this contact should be done; how ardently anxious the Master was always during His lifetime to see this brotherhood practiced.

Afternoon: We visited with the ladies of the Holy Household (the Greatest Holy Leaf, Monover, Rooha, Zia, Rúhángise and Niehrangise). This was a glorious hour, great spiritual fragrance was enjoyed. The Holy Mother talked altogether in Arabic, while Rooha interpreted for her; she spoke much of the sacrifice to be in suffering for love, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had for the Western believers, and how He with them as much as possible during His life, of his patient suffering for the sake of the Cause...

Sunday, March 13, 1927. To the Shrine of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The surrounding gardens were in their glory, the morning delightful. Afternoon we met at the Shrine with the Bahá'í ladies, perhaps about two dozen of them. So sweet they were just watching and looking at us with tender smiles, and we knew they were longing to talk with us, as we with them, but differences of language barred us. The Beloved chanted as usual and so sweet is his voice and marvelous in its pathos, one wishes he would chant forever. Come to supper.

Monday, March 14, 1927. A very pleasant visit with Tooba Khánun. She has just lost her husband and is not well. She talked of the grace and beauty of the Master His great love and devotion. She has a splendid daughter and two manly sons. In the late afternoon Shoghi Effendi arranged for us an auto drive over Mt. Carmel such wonderful scenery from the mountain top. We entered Elijah's Cave, and school and other interests.

My personal interview with Shoghi Effendi, because of his questions, was entirely of the Race question. He said he is not pleased that so few colored people have entered the Cause, and that special effort must be made in order that they can come. Precaution should be entertained that prospectants of color be prepared and trained in the Teachings before they are invited to a meeting with the friends. They must be trained in the Teaching so that they can stand the tests as the believers are still like babies, and are not perfect. He told me to form a class of colored people alone in my home, and there train them well before allowing them to go to a meeting with the whites.

Question as to prayer meetings: Answer: Shoghi Effendi said: yes, it would be good and very effective, were the friends to gather together and engage in prayers from as many as would participate, it would no doubt be of much benefit and bring about great unity and harmony and great spiritual growth, but this should not be forced upon anyone.

Question: Should a Bahá'í die, leaving as a last will and testament a desire to be cremated and it were in the power of the Bahá'ís to reasonably deny this request, should this be done? Answer: He said undoubtedly; by all means do it according to the Teachings. It is most important, and will be a favor to the departed one.

He spoke of how difficult it is for preachers to turn to the Teachings. Also of the use of aeroplanes to unite the East and West.

March 27, 1927. This morning I was in the presence of the beloved Shoghi Effendi. He asked of my comfort... He then asked lots of questions about the colored people. If they intermarry with whites out of the Cause, if they got along well when thus married? If the presence of the colored people in the Cause would keep the whites out, etc. Then he said the Master made it clear that the great need of the friends of America is the coming together of the white and colored races, this, he says, is vital and urgent. He said; "My charge to you is, that when you go back to America you tell the friends to look within themselves and there find the reason why so few colored people are in the Cause, and remove this reason; until this done the Cause cannot grow, if you wish the Cause to grow in America, the thing that keeps the colored people out must be done away with. The life and growth of the Cause depends upon this. England, Russia, Germany, etc. has each her individual problem and vital need; but the American believers must open the doors and let colored people become a part of the Cause, otherwise we shall suffer dispersion. He asked If I had been insistent that the white believers urgently seek colored believers and try to make them feel welcome? I told him I had not tried to insist upon it, but, rather, for the sake of harmony and unity, tried to be patient. To this he answered: "Racial unity and harmony, perfect cooperation, and freedom from racial prejudice, is the first Principle. How can we hope to keep the following Principles if we do not k(p the first Arrive at unity on the Principles, but never off or outside of them. Should we arrive at unity outside the Principles we are not practicing the Teachings' H e says that inter-marriage must take place, so that we arrive at the station of oneness. He said: "Racial prejudice on the part of the non-believers is a problem, but there should be no racial problem on the part of believers. There is race prejudice in the hearts, and it should be wiped out." Shoghi Effendi said: "There should be a colored believer on all Committees, even if one has to be elected several times, owing to few in number. Shoghi Effendi's wish is that all Committees, including the Spiritual Assembly, should be as universal ms could be made.

The last parting with Shoghi Effendi seemed like the deepest death, for a few moments, but as we realized the commission he gave us we surrenders and looked with longing hearts toward the time when we shall begin our work with the newer understanding, feeling confident we are resting in the prayers of the Beloved Guardian, supported by the knowledge of his desire, which is no other than the Will of God. Shoghi Effendi's lat words to me: "Be urgent and insistent in pressing this vital truth upon the understanding of the believers. Be forceful and do not lose courage, I will pray for you, I will pray for you, I will pray for you."

Notes of Mr. Allen McDaniel Taken at Haifa

Feb. 6, 7, 8, 9, 14,16, 1928.

Arrival

Monday, Feb. 6, 1928.

We arrived at Haifa at 10 A.M. and were met at the station by that remarkable “magor domo” of Bahá’í life at the Persian Colony, Pugeta. Under his guidance we were piloted, out of the clamoring throng of porters, dragomen, hotel representatives and vendors to a motor care Seated amongst our nine varieties of luggage, we were soon whisked an a picturesque winding road along the hillside. A sudden turn in the road brought us our first view of Mt. Carmel, and in a moment we were descending from our petrel driven vehicle in front of the Pilgrim House. Here we were welcomed by cheerful greeting of Effie Baker, whose cordial hospitality soon made us feel very much at home.

Pilgrim House

The interior of the Pilgrim house expresses in a simple dignified and beautiful way the spirit of this consecrated place. One enters a central hall, flanked on either side by white marble columns, and thru which one has a vista of the hall beyond. Opening off of these side halls are the bed rooms, and at their ends are the sitting and writing rooms and the library. At noon we were welcomed by our beloved Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, His radiant smile and loving greeting immediately won our hearts and put us completely at ease. He inquired after our health and of our trip; expressing great joy at our arrival and the hope that we could make an extended visit. We extended to Shoghi Effendi our humble expression of joy at this blessed privilege, and also the loving greeting and devotion of the friends in the U.S. and Canada( as well as of the friends in Paris) and Egypt, whom we had met on our way to the Holy Land.

#10 Temple Basement

During the conference of about 50 minutes prior to lunch, at the Pilgrim House, our Guardian discussed with us in a genera' way the activities of the Cause in America. Among other things he stated: He had received a cable message, from the Chicago mid-year Convention of Jan. 22, 1928 stating that 410,000 had been voted by the delegates for the completion of the Temple Basement so that meetings could be held there. He expressed surprise at this news and a question as to whether the money had been raised by special contribution at the Convention or the vote was to appropriate this large sum from the General Fund. In view of the limited resources in the Fund and the failure of the believers to raise about 4300,000 in the two years that have elapsed since the Plan for Unified Action was established, He expressed doubts as to the wisdom of this action. He initiated that it would have been well to have referred the matter to him before any definite action was taken, involving a matter of such a great importance and so large a sum.

Temple Basement for Meetings

With relation to his recent suggestions – made to Mrs. True and the States – concerning the use of the Temple basement for meetings.. our Guardian stated that. He had expresses the desire that the basement room should be made available as far as practicable under existing conditions and limitations of resources. In no way, should the Chicago Spiritual Assembly interfere with the authority of the National Spiritual Assembly concerning the administration of the Temple.

Shoghi Effendi emphasized the importance of the supervision of the local Spiritual Assemblies over all local activities, and similarly of the National Spiritual Assembly over activities of a national character and scope. This method of administration be urged as of the greatest importance to being about unified action and the truest and best utilization of our time, efforts and resources.

Our Guardian expressed joy at learning of the recognition of our organization under the Declaration of Trust by the United States Treasury Dept. He stated that he believed this document to be excellent in its clarity, comprehensiveness and expression. Copies are being made in Persian and Arabic to be sent to the Assemblies to the Eastern Countries to serve as a model for similar instruments in their respective communities. He expressed especial approbation of the simplicity of the form and language used in the Declaration of Trust. Our Guardian's earnest wish is for the early completion and adoption of the complete instrument of administration including the Declaration of Indenture, and the recognition of this document by the Federal Government.

Mish S. School Races

We told our Guardian out the development of the Sunday School in Washington, and of the Young Peoples' class. Shoghi Effendi inquired, as to whether the colored children attended with the white. He urged the association of the races especially among the young children, with whom racial prejudices were lacking or undeveloped. As to association of the races, he urged caution and wisdom so as to avoid the arousing of antagonisms and misunderstandings. Believers rusticate in our hearts all racial prejudice as a preliminary step for racial amity.

Advisory Group

The discussion of the work of the N.S.A. on the national incorporation led our Guardian to suggest the national and local assemblies employ and utilize the best talent available-outside of the Cause if necessary – in order to carry on most effectively the activities. For example the N.S.A. might find it advisable to have an advisory group of able business men, on purely technical matters. The advice of such a group should be considered but not necessarily adopted.

March 28, 1931

Well we are on our way back after a most glorious visit at Haifa where had the privilege of seeing much of the Guardian. We certainly were blest because Shoghi Effendi on account of our stay being so short asked us out to Bahjí and we spent the whole day with him. Shoghi Effendi is very pleased to have the prayers of the believers. No one can be disappointed in meeting Shoghi Effendi – so young, so sweet and yet so much dignity. One feels that speaks “with authority” as did Jesus and at about the same age as Jesus when crucified, a little older, for Shoghi Effendi is 24. The last evening he called Emma and me over to the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, into the room where the Master used to receive His guests. His face was illuminated and afterward, the next morning when I woke up it came to me that, that night he looked like end of pictures of Bahá’u’lláh, which the Greatest Holy Leaf. (Shoghi Effendi says the correct translation is “Exalted”) – had shown in the afternoon. He was so sweet always to Emma and insisted on her sitting next him at the table.

We went to Nazareth, Tiberias, Bethsaida (on sea of Galilee) and to Capernaum where Jesus said there wouldn’t be one stone left upon another, and there are all those broken columns of this once beautiful synagogue. They have restored a little of it to show that it once was. Was glad to dip my hands in the _____ Church of Annunciation at Nazareth – visited place supposed to be the _____ Mary and Joseph.

April 13, 1931

Many preparations being made for war abroad. Shoghi Effendi is expecting war, but says it is not immediate.

Had a most wonderful stay in Haifa. Shoghi Effendi never seems to forget promise and I am sure what be promised for you will not be forgotten. One marvels that he doesn't forget he has so much to think of – many responsibilities. We had dinner with him at Bahjí. Emma, Jackie and I sitting in the dining room where 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to sit and looking into the great open court with a garden in the center, where stands a tree laden with yellow _____ – each one worth their weight in gold, to us. They do not pick them only use them as they drop for 'Abdu'l-Bahá loved to look upon them. In a stable opening out of this court yard is where Naz the grey donkey lives daughter of the Naz outdoors she has to walk through the dining room. This arrangement holds throughout the East, that the animals may not be stolen but it seemed strange to us. After lunch we rested and Shoghi Effendi went with Jackie to the porch of the Mansion where she was painting the view to be seen from them on a four foot canvas. Her picture is to be placed in the Hall of the Mansion and it will certainly be a lasting monument to her for it will be a great happiness to the believers of the future, for the view necessarily will change as the years go by as regards trees, buildings, etc.. although Mt. Carmel in the distance and 'Akká at its foot and the blue Mediterranean will continue to with-stand time, but Carmel will change also for beautiful buildings will be erected there. The prison of 'Akká and the Mosque with its round green dome and minaret are plainly visible from the porch and in a distance one has a glimpse of the Ridván. Late in the afternoon Shoghi Effendi ordered a carriage and took s to the “Red Hill” not far from Bahjí and where Bahá'u'lláh loved to go and pitch a tent and receive His friends. This hill in the spring is covered with red anemones and later, red poppies – hence its name. Returning from the Red Hill we went with Shoghi Effendi to the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh where he chanted for us and asked Him to recite the “Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh”. Then he had to return to Haifa but we stayed overnight and returned to the Pilgrim House in Haifa early the next afternoon and the Greatest Exalted Holy Leaf showed us the picture of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh. Then that same evening, Shoghi Effendi sent us to come over to the house. He received us in the room where “'Abdu'l-Bahá used to receive His guests. The next morning we left for Jaffa to take our boat.

Shoghi Effendi's Table Talk

Mabel Hyde Paine

Nov. 10 to Dec. 2, 1931

Bahá'ís are loyal {{p1}} to the government. Bahá'ís should seek administrative positions, but must not accept political positions, and must explain why. Some Bahá'ís hold important administrative positions in Persia. One Bahá'í is chief Magistrate of a city; one is head of an imperial bank. This kind of thing will eventually happen in America. In Persia the Cause is prominent enough so that civil authorities look to Bahá'í methods of administration as models.

Bahá'ís are not to meddle in politics. One meaning of this is that they are not to seek political office, but may, administrative. They do not hold political office because holding such office involves corrupt practices. Non interference in politics is very important (this principle is new and unique; other religious bodies make the mistake of interfering in politics). An example of the evil of interfering in politics was a Persian ('Alí-Akbar) in Moscow, the most capable Bahá'í in Russia. He was quite friendly with the chief officials of the Soviet government for a time. Finally he became involved in politics, lost favor with the officials in power and was exiled to Siberia. Bahá'ís in Russia have been suspected by officials of having dealings with parties in Persia desiring to oppose the Soviet government. They were able to convince the government that they did not do this, and that it was a principle of their religion not to interfere in politics.

When asked whether Bahá'ís should vote he answered that it was better for them not to. If questioned about their position in this respect they have a good opportunity to explain their attitude of loyalty to the government. Their position in regard to voting is a little like that of many good people in England, who had achieved [eschewed?] party politics but voted for the national party in the last election because the country was in such a plight.

This principle of non interference in politics would be a guide in deciding such questions as whether Bahá'ís should sign the petition circulated by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. Bahá'ís should question such enterprises and find whether they are political. If not, they should sign.

Bahá'ís are not conscientious objectors because the conscientious objectors disregard the good of the world and seeks only to be at peace with his own conscience. Bahá'ís, on the other hand, state their position as loyal members of the state who yet seek exemption from military service. If this is granted, good; if not, they obey the government. Bahá'ís must be wise and courageous in taking their own stand before the world. Bahá'ís will have their courage tested in such matters. The Bahá'ís should find out whether they could gain exemption from military service in something the same way as the Quakers.

There is to be another war. This will involve the world world. This is necessary, because a new political structure is needed and cannot be erected until the old structure is destroyed. The nations are not yet ready to give up their sovereignty. England is not more ready that the United States to relinquish her sovereignty, in favor of the League of Nations. Shoghi Effendi does not see any immediate prospect of war. {{p2}}

President Wilson gained the ideas for his 14 points from the Bahá'í writings, but did not advance to the point of accepting the Bahá'í Cause. He was right in trying to lead the United States into the League. The United States must give up its policy of isolation. Wilson saw this but was hindered by politicians. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that Wilson's work was the dawn of peace and Bahá'u'lláh's ascendancy would prove to be the rising sun. Bahá'ís must show their admiration for Wilson and his ideals though such ideals are unpopular in America. The Bahá'í teaching about a universal league of nations is now unpopular, but we should be loyal to it.

The Mandate Commission of the League of Nations has recommended to England expropriation of the Baghdád property. England has recommended the same to the government of 'Iráq. They recommend destruction of the houses on the property and making the land into a park. This, Shoghi Effendi deplures.

Most of the Persian representatives in foreign capitals are against the Cause and misrepresent it.

The Catholic Church is weak on the whole, but strong in America. They have just received a heavy blow in Spain. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said that eventually all the sects will scrap their differences in order to oppose the Bahá’í Cause.

A letter from Queen Marie explained how she was prevented from visiting the Holy Shrine and Shoghi Effendi, and how she regretted it. She wrote something for the Bahá’í World which will be reproduced for a frontispiece.

[^] Her sending this contribution to the Bahá’í World will be an answer to those who say that she did not wish to visit the shrines.

Bahá’u’lláh says that constitutional monarchy is the best form of government. This does not mean necessarily that all governments will adopt this form, but probably there will be a tendency this way, especially so there seems already a reaction from democracy. Some pomp is necessary in order to impress people with the majesty of kingship, but England spends too much in this way.

The principle of obedience to a just government meets something of a problem in Russia, as some might say the Russian government is not a just government. Shoghi Effendi thinks this government should be obeyed, as the Russian people and most of the other governments recognize it.

Russia and Germany have each a great future. Russia will discard Sovietism. In answer to a question as to whether it will be by a gradual development or sudden change, he replied that there will be a destructive phase and new institutions will evolve. Two disruptive forces are now at work, Sovietism (extreme left) and irreligion. A reaction will come in favor of religion and against democracy. The right catchword in regard to government is: “Government of the people, for the people, by the best of the people.” The common people are not intelligent enough to make pure democracy successful. England will soon see that the seeming victory of democracy is not lasting. There will be a reaction and Labor will get in. All this will show a lack of stability in a popular electorate. England has the most democratic government in the world; i.e., the government is most immediately responsible to the electorate.

Bahá’í organization {{p3}} is not very different in form from other organization. The difference is that Bahá’ís have the principle of loyalty in greater degree than others. They have the principle spirit of faith, e.g., the Esperantists tried to spread Esperanto through the world. They didn’t succeed, but when the Master wrote one line to the Bahá’ís in Persia telling them to study Esperanto, not because it would be the universal language, but because it was a universal language, they studied it.

The supposed quotation from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that the Bahá’í Cause is not an organization should be; “You cannot limit the Bahá’í Cause to an organization.” The Bahá’í Cause must be organized, just as anything must be organized. Institutions are necessary. Most institutions are now decadent, but without institutions you have nothing but anarchy. Bahá'ís regard institutions not as ends, but as means.

Bahá'í government is neither purely democratic nor autocratic. It is half way between. The House of Justice is not responsible to the electorate but to God. The two state election diminishes the democratic element. The Guardian cannot legislate. He has only one vote in the House of Justice. He interprets the Sacred Books. The House of Justice is responsible to God and is inspired. How far this is applicable to national and local bodies is not so clear.

Some one said that some think that the N.S.A. is elected by those who vote by mail. The Guardian replied that the few days of the convention is too short a time for delegates to make acquaintance of the friends. They should seek all through the year to do this. He does not think the reading of all names voted for, an especially good procedure.

National committees should not dictate but should consult the desires and talents of individuals offering their services.

The N.S.A. is in the peculiar position of being absolutely dependent on voluntary support of the believers. Any appeal given out must be dignified.

Local Assemblies should advise believers in regard to private affairs, although Persia carries this custom too far. To the question as to whether local Assemblies should take up private problems of an individual believer without being asked, he said probably not unless the matter was affecting the interests of the Cause.

Bahá'í literature cannot go into Persia. It is kept out by the government.

In each country the Bahá'ís have an especial problem. In America it is racial. The main thing is to show the Negro in social ways that we have no prejudice. Make sure that the whole Bahá'í group in a given place is unprejudiced. Let them then determine their methods and policy. Bahá'ís are not courageous enough in this matter. Bahá'ís are really the only ones that have the ideals and sincerity. Discrimination should not be exercised on color lines, although it may be necessary on intellectual lines in such matters as appointing committees for Bahá'í work.

World Unity was one of the divisive elements in the Cause which has passed away. I asked if the failure of this experiment indicated that the indirect method of teaching should not be used. He said that in some cases one had to be cautious and not use the Bahá'í name, but generally it is better to use the name.

Keirella and Muḥammad-‘Alí headed another schism which failed. Mrs. White another. She is mentally unbalanced and Shoghi Effendi does not consider her responsible. The New History Society is another such movement. This is kept going by Mrs. Chanler's money and Aḥmad's personality. Both will pass. Schism is impossible in the Cause because Bahá'u'lláh provided against it in an unmistakable way. The New History Society does what they criticize the Bahá'ís for doing. They have much more organization than the {{p4}} Bahá'ís. Aḥmad Sohrab is dependent on others for money. He is also clever. Mrs. Chanler was sincere at first but became too much influenced by Aḥmad. The best of the people in the New History Society will eventually learn the Truth. This episode is hard for New York and they are not over it yet. Berlin also had a very bad start. It has often happened that the Bahá'í movement has had a bad start in a given city. Shoghi Effendi was very much pleased to receive a letter signed by about fifty believers in Berlin.

Mrs. Ford is well liked in London. In other places as well.

Bahá'ís will have little to do with establishing the new world order. Of course this fact should not prevent them from serving the Cause to the utmost of their ability. Unity among the Bahá'ís of the U.S. is much better than it was seven or eight years ago. The tasks they now face are teaching the Cause and building the Temple. The new plan of Unified Action is good and practicable. The local and national assemblies are important as foundations of the new political order. Obedience to the majority must be established.

Soon there will be a chain of Bahá'í centers between Constantinople and Paris connecting East and West. Pilgrims to Haifa can visit these. Sofia, Albania, Dresden and Vienna have believers. The believers in Constantinople are timid about organizing. He asked me especially to tell the American friends about these places, so the pilgrims can plan to visit them.

If a group of about four American Bahá'ís go to Persia they should be united, a working group. There would be advantages for any individual who should go to Persia. He or she could master the language in about a year. A study of Nabíl's Narrative will be advantageous to anyone going to Persia. A study of Persian in America is not practicable now but eventually America will have to have a teacher of Persian.

In reply to questions from a young person as to choosing a profession, Shoghi Effendi said that the ideal is to give half one's time to the Cause and half to earning one's living. He advised a young person who wishes to help in spreading the Bahá'í teachings to master the Íqán and the Answered Questions. Select passages for memorizing so as to be able to quote without referring to books. Persian teachers do this. Someone spoke about memorizing whole Tablets and all the Hidden Words. He said it was better to make selections for memorizing.

It is all right to make use of outlines in studying the teachings, but one should not make a creed of what any teacher gives out.

Nabíl's Narrative will make us more conversant with the early history than the Persians. Their knowledge is fragmentary. We should memorize the most important proper names in this book. It was written between 1890 and 1892. Bahá'u'lláh encouraged Nabíl to write it and made some suggestions about the book. 'Abdu'l-Bahá revised certain passages.

Prejudice will be overcome only through suffering.

No religion is final, not even the Bahá'í. In the Hidden Words Bahá'u'lláh says that in this revelation only two letters are given; B and H. This indicates further revelation. Progressive revelation is the basis of Bahá'í Teachings. Unity of mankind is the distinguishing feature of the Bahá'í revelation

When asked whether he felt rested after his vacation he said that he came back rested, but already begins to get tired. He has worked very hard this fall. The Bahá'í work is still highly centralized although the National Assemblies have taken {{p5}} over much. He said that the amount of service rendered by the American Bahá'ís, particularly those on the N.S.A. was remarkable when we consider that those Bahá'ís carry on their own individual professions too.

Bahá'ís should understand that there is no interdiction of marriage with non-believers. (In fact such marriage with a non-believer may be good. The Bahá'í may win his mate to be a believer..) But Bahá'ís must claim the right of their religion, must be free to exercise their religion just as members of other religious bodies are. This is very difficult in case of marriage with Catholics.

The so-called marriage Tablet in the blue prayer book is probably only a report of a talk to an individual. The ceremony for a Bahá'í marriage is in the Aqdas. When this is translated it will be required of all Bahá'ís in addition to civil marriage. Also consent of both parents must be gained for a Bahá'í marriage. This will make a testing ground in the future. On points like this, Bahá'ís will have to show their loyalty; i.e., Bahá'ís will sooner or later have to take firm stand as members of a corporate religious body.

In regard to keeping the fast in a family where some members are not Bahá'í, he said that firmness, tact, and faith would enable one to do this. The fast is of such duration. If a doctor is consulted he should be one that both people have confidence in.

Then someone asked about prayer he said; "Pour out your heart to God freely and fully. Then do something. God cannot work through you unless you act. In case of illness consult and expert doctor." One person said she prayed for a professor to become a Bahá'í. He said to pray not only that a professor but other capable people become Bahá'ís, those who are position to attract those whom we cannot. Difficult ties in a group will not be removed by prayer alone. All must rise to consult and act to remove difficulties.

Directions about obligatory prayer are as reported by Mrs. True and Mrs. Moffet. The only obligatory group praying is a burial prayer which is not yet translated.

The Bahá'í idea of God is of a personal God, not an idea of God as a blind force. A personal God is a conscious God, but not an anthropomorphic God. This came out in a discussion of Dr. Forel and his relations to the Bahá'í movement. Dr. Forel did not fully understand the Bahá'í idea of God.

Regarding someone who claimed to get messages from 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the other world, Shoghi Effendi said that she should not impose her supposed messages on anyone else. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had said that most of such communications is imagination. Psychic experiences are an especial temptation to spiritual people, and if they gain strength this way and don't impose their communications on others, it is all right. They should be willing to admit, however, that about 80% of such supposed communication is imagination. It is very hard to draw the line between psychic and spiritual. Psychic activities if carried to excess lead to bad health and insanity. The Tablet on psychic forces addressed to Anna Mason Hoar, (Star, Vol. 10, p344,) Shoghi Effendi thinks poorly translated, overstated. He would like to see the original.

Having teachers give all their time to the Cause is an exceptional occurrence. This one half time plan (of dividing one's time between service to the Cause and to one's profession) enables one to observe both kinds of worship and tends to keep one balanced.

Visit to Bahjí

Between the sand dunes and sea runs a road, wave-washed and uncertain, which lead from Haifa to the ancient city of ‘Akká in Palestine. Here Richard the Lion Hearted fought across the mighty ramparts, against whose side the persistent onslaught of the sea still makes war. Near here Napoleon laid siege from an artificial hill, which he constructed in order to reach over the double walls of the city. There still remains the moat through which the strength of the sea used to be turned in times of war. It is outside of the walls of this town that the ‘Most Great Prison’ stands, bleak and forbidding, and in this place Bahá’u’lláh and his family and followers were imprisoned. One can see the windows from which he gazed at the first pilgrims, who could only look at him from a distance and be content to return many miles on foot with that precious memory. In a courtyard near the prison building is the long staircase up the outside of the house which leads to some rooms where the family were permitted to move later. Here came the first European visitors to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and it was here that “Some Answered Questions” were written. There is another house in ‘Akká where they were moved later, but this is a different story from the one I want to tell, for mine deals with the aftermath of these terrible and uncomfortable years, and, it is with great comfort and joy that one can now turn toward Bahjí.

After driving through the country outside of ‘Akká, and _____ under an old arch of a Roman Aqueduct and through a forest of eucalyptus trees, we at last arrive at the place where Bahá’u’lláh spent his last and happiest days. On the left, as we approach, is a walled-in area with cypress peering over the _____, and a cluster of old farm houses; on the right, a lovely sweep of cultivated fields and a distant range of mountains. At this point the old mansion at Bahjí looms into view. Indeed it

PILGRIMAGE TO HAIFA APRIL 15 - 23, 1957

by Alice Dudley

I took off from Orly Field, Paris, at 1:00. a.m. April 15, with a 45 minute stopover in Rome, the next stop being Lidda Airport, Israel. My seat companions during the night were a Jewish couple from Chicago who had been to the Temple on 2 occasions – once to a lecture. They asked me to tell them more about the Faith. They had dreamed for years about coming to Israel and as the plane landed on Israeli soil, tears flowed down their faces. The official welcome to Israel was a delicious glass of orange jive which is served to all incoming passengers. From the weather man we got a searing welcome of 98 degrees with a hamseen blowing.

As I sat waiting my turn to go through customs, LeRoy Ioas came into the room. He had come to meet Mrs. Collins who was arriving from the States on another airline. As he did not know I was coming, he was terribly surprised. Sylvia Ioas was in the waiting room and we had a lovely visit while waiting for Mrs. Collins' plane. When the officials at the airport learned I was a Bahá'í they gave me a special welcome and one said, "Why didn't you say you were a Bahá'í in the first place, we wouldn't have kept you waiting. Another said when I wrote down #10 Persian Street, Haifa, as my address, "You are a Bahá'í!"

Presently Mrs. Collins arrived after a journey of many tiring delays and we started for Haifa in the Guardian's car (a Chrysler) driven by his chauffeur Carlo. Never did I dream that when I arrived at Lidda I would be taken to Haifa in the Guardian's own car. Along the highway to Haifa there were orange groves in blossom, the scent filling the air. Cypress, Eucalyptus and 'Akkássia trees stood in rows and farms and orchards and olive groves dotted the landscape. Although the wild flower season had passed its peak, there were many scarlet poppies, golden buttercups, marigolds and white daisies dotting the hillsides and roadside.

Along the highway were all kinds of transportation – trucks, cars, donkeys, bicycles. We passed by an Arab village and people along the highway waiting for transportation were dressed in garments of all descriptions – flowing Arab robes and colorful garments worn by people from Algeria, Morocco, and other eastern, countries.

LeRoy pointed out the beginning of Mt Carmel which is a very low mountain about 25 miles long. Just as we came to the outskirts of Haifa I had the first glimpse of the Dome of the Shrine of the Báb. The gold was gleaming against the blue and white sky. Presently we arrived at the beautiful western pilgrim house which was designed by Mason Remey. The outside is of yellow sandstone and the interior is Oriental in design, with white and black marble pillars circling the large central room – Moorish arches, high ceilings, with small circular windows near the top to let in light. Beautiful Persian rugs cover the marble floors and a series of sitting rooms branch off on 3 sides from the large central hall. Beautiful silken hangings are on the wall as well as Japanese etchings and other paintings.

Conversations Preceding the Writing of “Dispensation”

May 12, 1932

Shoghi Effendi said: The Bahá’í Revelation has two Manifestations, the Báb and Bahá’u’lláh. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the perfect exemplar, the Center of the Covenant of mankind, the true interpreter of His Words, a perfect human being. To give ‘Abdu’l-Bahá a station comparable to Bahá’u’lláh is absolute heresy.

The whole opposition of Muḥammad-‘Alí was based upon his insistence ‘Abdu’l-Bahá claimed to be the divine successor of Bahá’u’lláh, occupying a cognate station. Muḥammad-‘Alí declared: “Never so long as I live will I cease to agitate against this imposter who claimed that before the expiration of one thousand years to occupy the same station as Bahá’u’lláh.”

The misguided attitude of the friends in attempting to maintain ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in this station was the basis of the whole persecution by the covenant breakers. Again and again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote disclaiming any station beyond that of Exemplar, Interpreter and Center of the Covenant; but Muḥammad-‘Alí said: “This was only a blind, that while openly stating this he was secretly encouraging his followers to maintain and accept him as the Manifestation.” Those who overestimate the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are quite as reprehensible and have done just as much harm as those who underestimate.

Lorol Gaspard: Do you mean that those who have considered ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as a Manifestation are equally as bad as those who have opposed and denied Him?

Shoghi Effendi replied: Yes, that is what I mean, for they continuously furnished the enemy with proofs for their false statements. When the Will and Testament was produced, various believers said Muḥammad-‘Alí could no longer deny the full import of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s meaning, for surely in his last documents (Will) left to voice His directions and desires in perpetuity he could not have failed to claim this exalted station if all His life this had been His aim and intent. When shown the Will Muḥammad-‘Alí said this was negligible compared to the insidious work which had left this impression of Him on the hearts of the believers.

Keith: Shoghi Effendi, what so we do with the Tablet of the Branch? In which Bahá'u'lláh says of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "He is myself, the Shining Place of My Identity?"

Shoghi Effendi: Most certainly Bahá'u'lláh is not referring to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I must see the text.

We: Opening the Scriptures we pointed out the passage, "He is Myself," with an asterisk and the words, "'Abdu'l-Bahá."

Keith: It certainly reads that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Self of God.

Shoghi Effendi: This does not refer to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This means the Voice of God, referring to Bahá'u'lláh, not to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Turning to the Will and Testament we find the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá about the Two Manifestations, the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh and the servitude of all else toward them.

Keith asked: But how does this statement come to be in the Scriptures?

Shoghi Effendi: This book was printed without my knowledge. I was not consulted about it. Sometime after its publication I received a copy which was the first I had ever seen. It is full of errors, many quotations from the writings of Bahá'u'lláh have been cut without putting the dotted line to show this has been done. Had I been consulted I certainly would not have permitted these errors to have occurred.

Keith: How then shall we present the Master? What about the prophecy "The Son shall come in the glory of the Father, and that no man cometh unto the Father save through the Son." How can Bahá'u'lláh represent the second coming of the Son?

Shoghi Effendi: The Son, the Christ that was in Jesus has returned in Bahá'u'lláh in its fullest station. God is the Father, the essence unmanifest. Man cannot know Him or comprehend Him. He can be known only through his Manifestation, the Son, Bahá'u'lláh. That Manifestation of the Son has come in the full glory of the Father. This idea about 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that the Son is the Father and the Father the Son, is a reversion to Catholicism. These ideas are pure superstition and could have no basis in reason. You ridicule the Roman Catholics for their irrational ideas and would yourselves fall into the same error. Since Bahá'u'lláh has made 'Abdu'l-Bahá the infallible interpreter of his Words, which then would have the superior weight?

Keith: Bahá'u'lláh, holding the idea that since He was the Manifestation and 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not, the former would then be superior to the later.

Shoghi Effendi: Not at all, the Interpreter is the one whose word we must take for He has the power to tell us just what the speaker means. Therefore we must turn to the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to determine this question of stations. In writing to America about the qualifications for voting I quoted from the Will and Testament and referred to 'Abdu'l-Bahá as the true Exemplar. What did the believers take that to mean? Of course I used the utmost delicacy for it might do great harm to have this question too suddenly projected.

Keith: But Shoghi Effendi, we would be considered uninformed and unfit to teach in America if we did not make the Covenant of God equal with the Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh.

Shoghi Effendi: This is unwarranted. In the light of the Masters' continuous denials how can the believers think this?

Keith: Owing to the passage in question in the Scriptures, where it reads that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Self of Bahá'u'lláh, and for another reason that it is a universal belief among the teachers. At a New York Assembly meeting Horace Holley said, "In the Will 'Abdu'l-Bahá was presenting Bahá'u'lláh to the complete effacement of Himself, leaving no testimony and giving no divine station to Himself," which horrified Mrs. Kinney and Archbishop Barrow.

Shoghi Effendi: Horace and I are in full agreement in this matter. Horace, who evidently holds my view, put that foot-note in the Scriptures below the Tablet of the Branch, having taken it bodily from Esslemont's book. (The same evening Shoghi sent Rúhí with a copy of the Tablet of the Branch in Persian to show that this passage did not occur in the original).

Lyle: Are you aware to the what extent the American believers teach these ideas and dogmas? While we are on this subject, may we have another question made clear to us, that has to do with your station?

Keith interrupted: We are told in the Will and Testament that your shade is the shade that shadoweth all mankind, and that to dispute with you is to dispute with God, etc. Surely after reading those words cannot consider you just an ordinary human being.

Shoghi Effendi: But I am. I am a human being like you or anybody else, and I have no divine station. I am under the protection of Bahá'u'lláh. The Master promised to protect me from error, likewise the House of Justice. No one is justified in looking upon me as other than another human.

Keith: According to the Will and Testament, your decisions are binding and your words binding.

Shoghi Effendi: Only to a certain extent. How far does my independence extend with the House of Justice, and what is my relation to it?

Keith: You are its Chairman and Interpreter of the Book of Laws, the Aqdas.

Shoghi Effendi: Yes, but as Chairman I have only one vote, as has any other member. If my vote happens to be with the minority I must cheerfully follow the will of the majority though it be contrary to my wish and conviction.

Keith: Your word is infallible when it comes to interpreting the text.

Shoghi Effendi: Yes, the Guardian alone can determine whether the condition is covered in the Holy text. It is promised that the Guardian is protected by God from making mistakes in these decisions. But apart from that I am like anyone else.

Keith: I have been teaching that is wrong to think of you as a human being. I have been teaching that you know the end from the beginning and have a spiritual status that endows you with super-human knowledge.

Shoghi Effendi: This is entirely wrong. I am a human being endowed with the unfailing protection of Bahá'u'lláh. To proclaim for me a station different from that of humanity or to consider me endowed with superhuman powers is quite unjustified. For example I have no idea what is going on in America at present. I must depend on information for such knowledge.

Keith: The Master tells us your utterances are infallible.

Shoghi Effendi: Under certain explicit conditions. In many instances I give human opinions and suggestions.

Keith: Undoubtedly you speak with unchallengeable authority and we must consider your words authoritative and infallible.

Shoghi Effendi: (smiling) I leave that to your own judgement.

Keith: If I mention this conversation to any of the friends who like me have looked upon you as divinely endowed, they would at once say, "How utterly lacking in spirituality she is, that Shoghi Effendi completely conceals his station from her. If she was spiritually awake he would without doubt reveal his true divinity to her. 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to say the same thing to the believers. They had themselves to know His station before He confided it to them, so likewise the Guardian is testing you with His denials."

Shoghi Effendi: (positively amazed) Do the believers believe that 'Abdu'l-Bahá would deliberately disavow Himself and mislead them? You must utterly disregard such casuistry on the part of believers. (Again and again throughout the long interview he said how dangerous it would be to precipitate this discussion or release this knowledge of the station the Covenant and the Guardian among the believers considering their present conception. Several times Shoghi Effendi said we must use the utmost delicacy, we must make this known very gradually, we must not publicly announce this. Similar warnings were continuously repeated.)

Shoghi Effendi: If the House of Justice should decide that the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh would be removed to the top of Mt. Carmel the remains of 'Abdu'l-Bahá must be removed from the Shrine of the Báb. 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself would feel that it was very unfitting that he should share the Shrine with a Manifestation of God. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's original plan was the building of nine rooms with the Báb in the center. The three new rooms for the archives completes 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wish for the Shrine of the Báb. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was placed in the Báb's Shrine by the decision of the holy household before my return from England. Undoubtedly 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be removed to another resting place. (Here Shoghi Effendi described the nine terraces that would lead from the foot of Mt. Carmel to the Shrine of the Báb and the nine that would lead to the top whether Bahá'u'lláh was placed there or not.)

Keith: In the light of what you have said, 'Abdu'l-Bahá I presume would be placed at the bottom.

Shoghi Effendi: Undoubtedly that would be His wish.

Lyle: It has always been impossible for me to believe that 'Abdu'l-Bahá station was equal to the station of Bahá'u'lláh the Supreme Manifestation, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the teacher.

Shoghi Effendi: Now you are going to the opposite extreme. Yesterday there was overstating, now you are understating. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is not a teacher, an apostle, or a chosen one, for there might be others. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is quite apart and different from anyone who has ever appeared on earth before. A perfect human being! Can you conceive a perfect human being? The phrase that best expresses 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the True Exemplar, the Center of the Covenant. It is just as grave a mistake to over-estimate 'Abdu'l-Bahá as to underestimate Him. 'Abdu'l-Bahá never claimed to be a Manifestation; all His life He suffered from that assumption. But we must never go to the other extreme and confuse anybody else with Him or His station.

Keith: Is that why Bahá'u'lláh calls Him the greatest mystery of God?

Shoghi Effendi: Just so, His station is a mystery.

Lorol: Then if he is just a human being can we evolve to the same station in time?

Shoghi Effendi: No, no one can ever attain to the station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Lorol: But surely humanity will sometime reach perfection.

Shoghi Effendi: No. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that humanity will evolve and develop infinitely. To reach perfection means that advancement stops; that there is nothing further to be attained, mankind will ever continue his development towards perfection but no one will attain to or occupy the station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. If you are asked to explain this you must say it is a mystery. A mystery is not irrational, it does not run counter to reason, it transcends reason.

Keith: You mean just as science sees a mystery in the great primal energy becoming ninety-two chemical elements?

Shoghi Effendi: No, the mystery of nature may later become manifest, a spiritual mystery can never be grasped by the human mind.

Keith: Then I have been teaching wrong all these years.

Shoghi Effendi: It astonishes me that these ideas are so prevalent in America.

Keith: When Elizabeth Greenleaf and I were here six years ago why was this not explained to us?

Shoghi Effendi: The subject was not breached and I did not realize that these were your conclusions. You must not worry for having taught this way, it will right itself. As new believers come into the Faith this idea will be forgotten. Nothing can be done about the past. The past is over. Devote yourself to giving the right conception to those you teach from now on. It would do incalculable harm to try to rectify this impression now.

Lyle: The old believers would put any one out of the Cause who dared spread this teaching.

Shoghi Effendi: Undoubtedly, but our eyes must be turned toward the throngs that will come into the Faith in the future, not toward the present believers. We must endeavor to teach the new generation of believers, not the present one. If the friends are not clear on this question ask them to write me. I have so far approached this question with the utmost delicacy, as in the qualifications for voters. No one has ever questioned me about this. If they had I should have been constrained to answer fearlessly and fully. If the friends write to me I will give them the same answer I am giving you.

Keith: Reverting to yesterday's discussion I want to get this matter clear. If you are a human being just as muddled, veiled, confused and [coping] as I am why is it according to the Will and Testament we must obey you? Why is it when I receive a cable from you to come to Haifa would I rather throw myself into the bay than refuse? Why did I not explain this then go down to Poona and conduct my class?

Shoghi Effendi: In human affairs I make suggestions and recommendations. When I interpret the Words I am guided by Bahá'u'lláh.

Keith: Why does 'Abdu'l-Bahá call down the fierce indignation of God upon those who disobey you?

Shoghi Effendi: That is only when I insist or command, then my interpretation is infallible. The believers must distinguish between what I recommend or definitely state.

Keith: Can you imagine the friends refusing to follow your recommendations?

Shoghi Effendi: They must discriminate.

(We then brought up the question of praying to 'Abdu'l-Bahá.)

We: Many believers pray to the Master. Is this proper?

Shoghi Effendi: Bahá'u'lláh is the source we must pray to naturally.

Keith: (insisting) Is it wrong to pray to 'Abdu'l-Bahá?

Shoghi Effendi: No, it is not wrong to pray to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in an intercessory capacity.

Keith: Like the Roman Catholics pray to the Virgin Mary?

Shoghi Effendi: Yes.

Keith: Then it is not actually wrong to pray to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá?

Lorol: No, if you want to be foolish enough to do so.

Keith: Is that true Shoghi Effendi?

Shoghi Effendi: That is much too strong. It would not be foolish to pray to the Master but the next generation will have forgotten to do it. It is only those who know and revered ‘Abdu’l-Bahá who will hold to this practice, but it will later be discarded.

Lorol: There are those who pray to you Shoghi Effendi.

Shoghi Effendi: This is absolutely heretical. Such things are not permissible. It is wrong to address me as Lord or Master, or Thee or Thine. I had to send a very abrupt cable to the friends in Bombay to prevent them from celebrating my birthday. If this starts now there will be no end to it. The first Guardian’s birthday, the first Guardian’s death, the tenth Guardian’s accession. They would have 400 Guardian’s celebrations in 365 days. Nor must they refer to me as His Holiness. These things have no place in our Faith, they savour of popishness.

Keith: There is a picture of you in the Bahá’í hall at Karachi, labeled “His Holiness, Shoghi Effendi.”

Shoghi Effendi: (emphatically) Then they must take it down.

Keith: Oh my! I should not have mentioned this!

Lorol: Why not if it is wrong?

Shoghi Effendi: I have requested, I have suggested, but now the time has come when I must insist in no unmistakable terms that these things must cease. For instance this is what we have been speaking about when I say I am infallible, that is, when I insist. In this I am infallible.

Lorol: When did Bahá’u’lláh declare Himself?

Shoghi Effendi: He declared himself three times, first as the Báb predicted in certain odes in 1852-53, where the Báb makes veiled references to Bahá’u’lláh’s station as Supreme Manifestation. You will remember in “The Son of the Wolf” how Bahá’u’lláh speaks of His first intimation that He is the Promised One. It was as if a fire ran through His veins and He was consumed with a power that overmastered Him. The second declaration was to a few friends when He was leaving Baghdád, according to the Báb’s second date, in 1863. Then in Adrianople between 1864 and 68 He proclaimed it to the world in His epistles to the Kings. In “Some Answered Questions” we learn that the Manifestation was chosen from birth but was not conscious of it until the time His Mission approached. Many fought against it at first, but all Manifestations went through this long struggle of preparation, such as Moses in the Burning Bush, Jesus in the Wilderness, Buddha under the Bo Tree, and Bahá'u'lláh in the mountains of Sulaymáníyyih, who spent a longer time than others because His preparation was greatest. Bahá'u'lláh spent two years in the mountains alone. He was also went to leave Şubḥ-i-Azal free to try to establish his cause. I assign preparation for His ministry as one of the reasons for His self-imposed exile. The greatness of Bahá'u'lláh's Manifestation is shown by His having a Manifestation as a forerunner, but He is greater than the Báb for He came for the whole world. We must never give out the impression that one Manifestation of God was greater in power or wisdom than another. They are only greater in what They manifest.

(We constantly use the words Cause and Movement and Shoghi Effendi asked us to try and eliminate these words as they did not convey the deep significance of the Bahá'í Faith or World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, and advised us to teach new believers to use these two expressions and never to permit anyone to use the name "Bahá'ism.")

Prayer

Shoghi Effendi: We can trace the evolution of the Bahá'í Faith by the terms adopted, then changed. First organization was adopted, then administration, now it will take on "The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh."

We: In many places the believers use the healing prayers continuously in regular meetings. Many object to this practice.

Shoghi Effendi: No one in any assembly should insist upon saying the healing prayers, but we must acquiesce if someone should want one. When we have general rules, we become dogmatic and inflexible. But friends who do not care to sit through long prayers regularly may go or stay as they wish. This does not determine anyone's spirituality but there must be no criticism or controversy on the matter. Great patience is required to unite the differing elements in our Faith. Time is the best healer. These differences of opinion will disappear with time. We might remember the words of St. Augustine, "In essentials unity, in non-essentials diversity, in all things charity."

Government

Shoghi Effendi: The attack that was recently published by the Soviet Government has done more to spread the teachings of the Bahá'í Faith than years of teaching to disseminate. Regarding the League of Nations: The principle under the League of Nations will break but the institution will develop; whether this League or another. This change will be brought about by the coming war which is inevitable. The greatest benefit of the First War was the bringing about of the League of Nations. Unlike the last war the coming war will be a war to end war. The problems brought about by the last great war have been beneficial to humanity as they are bringing nearer the disintegration of those institutions contrary to the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. Since Bahá'ís cannot purify politics you must keep out of them for they are based on fraud, rivalry, and secrecy, which is against our principles. Their practices are foolish, childish, and mischievous. Bahá'ís cannot vote in political parties. They are against our principles. Believers may hold administrative but not political posts.

Lyle: What do we do when we are compelled to vote as honest citizens? It is demanded of every American citizen to vote and serve the country in time of war. How can we obey the laws of the United States and not vote or fight in case of war?

Shoghi Effendi: The Quakers had this same non-political policy. You must ask for exemption as conscientious objectors. If a penalty is incurred such as prison or fine, then you must obey, but you must offer to serve in any capacity other than actually killing your fellow-men. Apply to your government for exemption from service in case of war.

League and Loyalty

Shoghi Effendi: Bahá'ís must make every effort to have America enter the League of Nations, but with the rightful purpose. America must uphold the League to exercise sovereign power. We must conform to the requirements of our government to the extent that the assemblies in Russia, when they were told that they must give secret information, to close the schools, stop printing Bahá'í literature, cease foreign correspondence. This was not disloyalty to the Bahá'í Faith, it was only a temporary dislocation and interruption. But if the believers are requested to recant or give up their Faith, this would be absolute disloyalty to the Faith, and they would rather be martyred.

Shoghi Effendi: Today the Americans are leading the Bahá'í world. The East has enthusiasm and devotion but no training. Unless the East takes on courage, directness, and straightforwardness, which is what the West can teach the East, the center may shift from the East to the West.

Lorol: Just how is America leading the Bahá'í world?

Shoghi Effendi: America is the first country to formulate the declaration of trust and obtain legal recognition, which is a model for all the national spiritual assemblies in the future to follow. Even some of your local spiritual assemblies, like New York and Chicago have been incorporated. It was excellent thing for Horace Holley to have suggested copywriting the name Bahá'í.

[^] The idea that there could be an exclusive right to use the name Bahá'í in the USA was overturned in court action in the late 1930s

Keith: Under the declaration of trust the Bahá'ís now have legal status. We can appeal to the government and receive their protection can we not?

Shoghi Effendi: Certainly: This gives Bahá'ís recognized legal status.

Keith: This legal status will also protect us against those who wish to proceed against the Bahá'í Faith. Meaning that if anyone tried to set up another Assembly in the same city the Bahá'ís would be protected by law against opposing persons.

Lorol: There is a general belief that you can prophesy, that you did definitely assure Mrs. Mathews or her immediate family by cable that she would recover. This at a time when all hope had been abandoned by the finest specialists in America.

Shoghi Effendi: I have no knowledge of making any definite statement for Mrs. Mathews recovery. I assured them of my prayers and faith. I do not think I sent such a cable, but if they can produce it then I must have been guided. But I do not believe such a positive assurance can be produced.

Lorol: For many reasons I have lost interest and enthusiasm in teaching and do not feel qualified to attempt again to offer myself as a teacher. Will you kindly pray for me that I may be able to overcome the antagonism I feel toward certain so-called Bahá'ís. I feel that I cannot teach now.

Shoghi Effendi: You must not allow yourself to be touched by this chatter of idle minds. You must go ahead and teach. I am deeply grateful for the unique manner in which you have served the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh and will pray and supplicate that divine bounty will reassure you and lift these burdens from your heart. I shall never forget the services you have rendered the Faith and am deeply appreciative.

Lyle: Have you any suggestions to offer regarding the future operation of Nine Gables? For instance would you advise specializing in anything or experimenting with two or three lines such as orcharding, vegetable growing or perhaps adding sheep or other cattle?

Shoghi Effendi: I should advise more than one enterprise. Have you any pictures of Nine Gables? I would like very much if you took some films of N.G. and sent me some copies, also of Mount Salvat.

Persia

[this is presumably addressed to Keith who was going there]

Shoghi Effendi: While in Persia endeavor to impress upon the Persian believers the non-political character of the Bahá'í Faith.

Prominent Persians wish to occupy high political positions. The administrative offices which we may occupy are secondary, while the Persian craves position, power, prestige, glory. They must discipline themselves and restrain these ambitions. You must not be afraid to speak clearly on this subject. Courage, directness, and straightforwardness is what the West must teach the East. While very tactful present these subjects with clearness, firmness, and frankness. Do not mention this directly but intimate that unless the Orient can take on those characteristics the center may shift from East to the West.

Helen Bishop's letter to Mr. Lunt.

My Dear Mr. Lunt,

It is a great experience to go to Haifa, and one changes one's point of View on many matters. The Guardian is an example of how intellect can serve the spirit in a manner we of the West have never known. 'There is nothing emotional about the Guardian; he is a perfectly controlled and mature personality. I have never heard him recite an incident in which he was the major figure or say anything which would in any way give him a chance to steel. This may sound very naive but the point is that Shoghi Effendi simply refutes all those theories with which our academies are surfeited; that every ego is trying merely to maximize itself.

Shoghi Effendi is very impersonal and he speaks only of the Word and of Faith. His speech is rapid and his English is stunning; when he speaks, the hours pass tirelessly. I should say that his most obvious characteristic is Power, but there is nothing arbitrary or even personal about it. Again and again he seems to convey to one that the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh will reach its aim and that we have only to be superlatively faithful and to be active and obedient. There is something about him that makes one believe that one can do anything if he requires it; for example, he told me to write, and somehow I simply must begin to do it.

Shoghi Effendi says that great world events will establish the Faith. It depends only partly upon the Bahá'ís. The war is inevitable and great changes will result there from. Great Britain will lose her colonies. At present, the British Commonwealth is the greatest obstacle to the Commonwealth of Bahá'u'lláh.

Russia will experience a change in regime. From America much can be expected. The form of the Administration established in America will become the form for the entire world. Also Germany has a great destiny. In an era of persecution they will exhibit a loyalty and devotion which makes them comparable to the Persians. Scholars, teachers and technicians from Germany will contribute much to the Bahá'í Cycle.

Isn't this fascinating?

(Signed) Helen Bishop.

Pilgrim Notes

1936

Notes taken by J. Bolles, May 1936, in the presence of Shoghi Effendi.

(copied from Carbon provided by H. E. Dahl)

May 16, 1936

Prejudice is still hampering standing in the way of the successful teaching of the Bahá'ís. Different prejudices in different countries, such as class prejudice in England, political prejudice, race prejudice, etc. in Germany. In America it is the white believers have to struggle in their relations to the colored. In Austria political. The Austrians have been a great empire and are very proud. They are now however a small country. They resent being included with the Germans, this is natural, also because they are politically free. In England class prejudice is pronounced, the upper classes wish to remain aloof. Everywhere in the world exists religious prejudice. The Guardian hinted that the believers must overcome all of these prejudices.

The Guardian spoke of the new Yearbook and mentioned with apparent pleasure that the queen had again written a preface to it, and that she had referred to Bahá'u'lláh as the Father. He said the "coming of the Father" meant the return of the Son in the "station" of the Father, but we must be very careful explaining that station. God, for instance cannot be contained in the "form" of man, but the coming of Bahá'u'lláh means the coming of the "Father spirit" to a world rapidly growing into maturity. That now the world is still like a young man restless to do things, to accomplish more. Like a young man at the threshold of maturity, the world is restless feeling its maturing, its "coming of age" He seemed pleased by the message of the Czechoslovakian singer that she wished to serve him and quickly replied: He who serves the Cause is giving at the Holy threshold...

The American friends has a tendency to confuse the station of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá; they often spoke of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as the prophet, whereas he is the sole interpreter of the teachings, the center of the Covenant; he was not a prophet, nor a Guardian, but his station was unique, it never before existed in religious history. The Báb was first a prophet and second a forerunner to the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

In Palestine there are now recognized, Bahá'í marriages. The formula (certificates) is obtained from the government. Four certificates are used. One is given to the wife, one to the husband, one the Local Spiritual Assembly receives and one to the government. The actions of the Bahá'ís have to be extremely cautious in Palestine. They are strictly neutral in their attitude towards the political and religious struggle of the Arabs and Jews. They are closely watched and there are enemies of the Cause watching for a chance to prove that the Bahá'ís sympathies are with the Jews or the Arabs.

May 21, 1936

Bahá'ís all over the world must comply with the fundamentals of the World Order.

In non-essentials, however, that is in details, national development is encouraged, traditions, characteristics and the individual.

There is no use having a Youth group before having a local assembly. France, England and Germany have Youth groups which should be developed. All their activity must be under the supervision of the Local Assembly. There must never be a conflict of authority. The National Assembly is supreme in national affairs and the Local Assembly. The Youth Committee may be regarded as a sub-committee. If it was otherwise they would become a rival of the Local Assembly. An Assembly must not unduly interfere in the activities of a believer, but at the same time it is held responsible for any mistakes. Every Bahá'í activity must be under the supervision of the Assembly. Discipline is vital and important.

The Western Pilgrim house is owned by the American National Spiritual Assembly (Palestine Branch). Its value is about 20,000 pounds. The American N.S.A. (Palestine B.) owns besides the Pilgrim house 250 to 260,000 square pica (approx. 30,000 square metres) of land and a small tract of land between 'Akká and Bahjí. It took three years to establish the Palestinian Branch of the American National Spiritual Assembly. It is now legally incorporated in Palestine with seal and stamp. As yet there are only two braes established, the American and the Indian, but in the future all the National Spiritual Assemblies will own property. In apse of war, complications will set in through this world ownership.

Every Bahá'í transaction in Haifa has to be signed by the son of Muḥammad-'Alí, Mustapha Bahá'í. He has created nastily difficulties for the Guardian in regard to these transactions, but over thirty of them have been completed (that is, transfer of land to the name of a National Spiritual Assembly).

The ownership of the land by the N.S.A.'s of the East and West consolidated the area around the shrines, The government is very pleased about the terms of the Bahá'ís who agree not to build on their property ,etc. because Haifa is “growing up” Mt Carmel. A monastery on a large property almost reaching to the sea had to pay such a large tax that it was necessary to sell a part of the property (they insisted on selling this property to Christians.)

All Bahá'í property is exempt from taxation in the Holy Land. The reason other religious property is not exempt is because they build on their property and commercialize their land.

The teachings in general are translated Into 36 languages. There are seven or eight N.S.A.'s in the world. In Persia there are over 500 local communities, but they are not yet functioning properly. The number of N.S.A. is of no importance. As soon as the Caucasus and Turkestan have their N.S.A.'s, the International House of Justice will be formed. There are no believers In Spain, in Greece or in Poland. (There is no Polish literature). To have someone in these countries is necessary an anchor, even if only one believer, however incompetent however or the executive ability may be.

The Americans should think of South America, Mexico and Europe, not the Orient or Africa.

Notes Taken in the Presence of Shoghi Effendi

April 22 to May 12, 1937

Message to the Americans.

They have a {{p1}} twofold task of promoting first: teaching and second the completion of the Temple ornamentation; the seven year plan to the end of the first century. If they cooperate and persevere they will succeed. Mr. Schopflocher has offered $100,000 and the remaining amount would be $30,000 per year (for the seven years). It is very easy to achieve this if the friends persevere and cooperate. Two more units are needed. If cooperation is sustained to the end — and the teaching work must not suffer and must be established before the end of the first century, at least a group in every state, and if a group is not possible, then one residential believer not only in every state and province in America, but in every republic in the American Republic. (?) and the eight islands of Hawaii, a residential believer on each island, is a part of the World Plan. Every nation in the Bahá'í World must direct its attention to the neighboring countries. In every country it is possible to {t}each the Cause. If you know how to teach you can find a few receptive souls. Germany must establish the Cause in Balkan States. In the future there will be service through Greenland to America.

Just before leaving Haifa the Guardian sent for me and again spoke of the American friends. He said they have a twofold task only eight years time and repeated “time is short” that they must make a tremendous effort in teaching and a tremendous effort to finish the second and third units of the Temple by the end of the first century and inauguration of {the} second century — that it was 25 years time since the Master laid the corner stone. It will be 32 years in erecting and more than that would be detrimental to the friends. By the first century they must be through with the ornamentation and particularly as this will enable the friends in Persian to start the third Temple. He said the Master laid the corner stone in Wilmette before there was any plan and the Persian friends could do the same. He quoted the Master’s words that another Temple could not be built until the one in Wilmette was completed.

April 22.

Palestine is the heart of the world, the uniting place of three continents. No country in the world has such a unique place as the meeting place of three continents. (Africa, Asia and Europe)

Any person considering to become a believer must make up his mind to give up drink. Bahá'u'lláh says, “Do not approach it”, that is, you must not drink it. A believer is expected to accept the law of Bahá'u'lláh without question. We have no perfect Bahá'ís, only the Master was perfect. A Bahá'í is a person who accepts the law with entirety. The Jews were fanatically attached to the Sabbath and the laws of Moses, but Christ did not compromise, he was very severe. We must have implicit faith in the wisdom of the Manifestation and accept all that he reveals. The teachings themselves are the standard of justice, Gl. pg. 175. {{p2}}

The Bahá'í Faith is more than a religion, it is not a re-statement, it is a civilization which would blend East and West. The past Faiths could not establish a civilization. We can't compare it to previous religions and World Order is another word for civilization. God's plan for humanity in this revelation is fully unfolded. It was only partially unfolded in the past.

The Nineteen Day Feasts.

'Abdu'l-Bahá stressed the Spiritual side but not the Administrative side. Now we stress the Administrative side.

There is nothing in the teachings that the Nineteen Day Feast should be held on the first Day of the Bahá'í month. It is only the custom. Give freedom in non-essentials. In essentials, unity; in non-essentials diversity and in all things, charity.

Those who deliberately violate a Bahá'í law cease to be voting Bahá'ís.

The vast majority centers in Persia are villages 600 localities and out of these 500 are villages.

You cannot compromise an Administrative principle. The local Assembly must intervene when the Cause suffers. In purely administrative matters, if a voting member disobeys a Spiritual Assembly he should cease to be a voting member.

The institutions of the International House of Justice and the Guardianship have different revenues. The Master and Bahá'u'lláh have both stated that each have their specific revenues. Bahá'ís are free to offer endowments to the local or the national or the international, conditional, or unconditional. We must discourage labeled contributions, but individuals are free to give all their property to a non-Bahá'í.

If anyone disobeys an Assembly he ceases to be a voting member if he has been repeatedly warned.

£1,000,000 has been spent on Haifa Port. Jerusalem is the religious center in Palestine and Haifa the commercial port. Formerly Jaffa was the leading port, but now Haifa has taken its place. The position of Haifa is much more favorable than Jaffa.

Sometimes it is very difficult to say what constitutes legislation and constitutes interpretation. If the woman is not given the right to divorce, it is not equality of men and women and therefore it would not be according to Bahá'í law.

Arabic beautifies and enriches the Persian language. 'Abdu'l-Bahá called them milk and honey.

Obligatory prayer originated in Islám. "Strengthen thou my hands", means to help us from acting dishonestly. The law of God is sustained by two pillars, — prayer and fasting. {{p3}}

Haifa will be the terminus of a train line and Calcutta the other terminus. And another line will run from Haifa to Cairo and to the Sudan, and from there will be extended to Central Africa and Cape Town.

In the East the reforms are very superficial, — they change dress but not their hearts. Bahá'u'lláh speaks of cleanliness — The Bahá'ís of Persia must introduce these things — bath, etc.

(The Guardian said in regard to a Japanese Buddhist priest that he could not be a Bahá'í and remain a Priest, that he should make every effort to find other means of livelihood even tho it were less money, and that it should be explained to him:)

Bahá'u'lláh is the bearer of a New Revelation which abrogates the old, — the Founder of a New Dispensation. We must not be members of any organizations, but we must cooperate with all, provided cooperation does not imply acceptance. We must do just what others do who enter our meetings, — reciprocate like people who address Bahá'í meetings but do not join us. Our Faith abrogates the laws of previous revelations, therefore we cannot join other associations and affiliate.

Summer Schools

The Summer Schools should invite non-Bahá'ís. It is a place of association as well as study.

The Bahá'ís must make a Will by the law of Bahá'u'lláh, and if no Will is left, then it must be divided according to the law of Bahá'u'lláh.

The Master laid two conditions on the Temple: — it must be circular and have nine sides. The element of sacrifice vitalizes the contribution. It must be alike for the rich and poor. The structure will then have much greater power.

The Gleanings were taken from about 12 books, some of which were in manuscript.

Eighty percent of the Guardian's time is devoted to correspondence and eighty percent of that to individuals. There are so many problems now that the Guardian has not time enough for them all.

Divorce although permissible is highly discouraged. The Assembly should solve such cases, and then they should obey and if not they must cease to be voting Bahá'ís. They should first not live together for one year. Smoking is not as serious as divorce. Smoking is highly discouraged but not prohibited.

The Bahá'í Revelation is to promote unity. Marriage without the consent of the parents does not promote unity and also there is another reason.

Frankness and courage must be adopted by the Bahá'ís in Persia with the Government. In the Assemblies, the Bahá'ís must discuss how to win the Government. Secrecy breeds suspicion. Never make any statement which is against truth, but we cannot disobey the Assembly. An order from an official on behalf of the Government must be obeyed before the Assembly. {{p4}}

The Bahá'í constitution is not an American constitution, it is a Bahá'í constitution. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá said the light from the East will go to the West. In "America's Spiritual Mission" 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote: "The continent of American is the land where the lights of the Faith will first be revealed — the continent where the mysteries — "The Faith was born in the East and the Child ushered in, in the West. The Faith now has a child (administration) and the World Order is the birth of civilization. The term World Order was first mentioned by the Báb in the Bayán and Bahá'u'lláh used the same term. Aḥmad Sohrab disassociated the writings of Bahá'u'lláh from the World Order. The Bahá'í Faith is more than a religion because it has institutions established by the Founder of the Faith which makes it a civilization. The Kingdom of God is this World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. When it is established the prayer, "Thy Kingdom come," will be fulfilled.

The religious institutions are trembling because they were not established by the Founders. On these ruins will be established the Bahá'í institution which is established by the Founder.

After the world war, there will be a reaction in favor of the Cause but the whole world will not immediately become Bahá'í.

The largest dome in the world is that of St. Peters, the second is St. Pauls; third, the cathedral of Seville; fourth —, and the fifth the dome of the Temple in Wilmette.

$150,000 just for the dome. $120,000 for structure $150,000 for ornamentation

'Abdu'l-Bahá said that always from the beginning until now it has been the case that the light of God has been shed from the East to the West. He referred to the Christian dispensation which was shed from the East but was more powerful in the West. The administrative center always shifted from the East to the West. In this Cause the Spiritual and administrative center will always be here in Palestine. The Christian to Rome, — the Muslim from Mecca to Medina, Damascus, Baghdád, Egypt and at last Constantinople.

Gleanings, pg. 175. "Ark of God" is the Ark of His Cause. "His Laws" is the House of Justice which will be on Mt. Carmel. From the "Tablet of the World", pg. 23. "Say O Friends! Why fear and whom shall ye dread."

This is the "coming of age" of this planet. Just as America was discovered, so other planets may be discovered and in conjunction with them we may become a member of a greater entity.

Hinduism and Buddhism are the only existing true religions of the Far East today.

After the next war the U.S. will unite with other nations. Wilson was ahead of his age, he brought vision. {{p5}}

Bahá'u'lláh has said nothing about the punishment of the child. The House of Justice will have to decide that in the future. Refrain from severe punishment but to some extent punishment is required; not necessarily bodily punishment. Severe punishment paralyzes the faculty of the child. Discipline though is necessary. Society cannot function without the principle of punishment and reward given by Bahá'u'lláh in His Tablets. Discipline always implies punishment and reward. Justice depends on punishment and reward. Encouragement is not sufficient. Encouragement without punishment spoils the child, and punishment without encouragement kills initiative. To punish without encouragement makes the child stiff. Severe punishment kills the initiative, — keep the balance between the two. Much depends upon the child and the environment, etc. The mother should be active in instilling Bahá'í principles in the child, and warn it from following the standards of fellow students. Teach the child truth before everything. Truth is the foundation of Faith.

The Boshes have rendered great service to the Cause. The spirit which animates them is the greatest. They have surrendered their will and all to the Cause. Whatever we offer to the Cause we should cease to oppose the will of the Spiritual Assembly. Green Acre is not as prosperous as other Summer Schools. If the whole property should become National property, it would solve the problem.

The effects of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Tablets to the blind in Japan we are now beginning to witness. The braille committee has been internationally extended. The blind should be told that the Cause will be the greatest comfort and the words of Helen Keller should be quoted and they should be told what the Bahá'ís are doing for the blind, in particular that it is international in scope. There will be many more blind after the war.

The Oneness of Humanity stress in almost every newspaper article. It is the call of humanity and the unity of mankind. We must identify it with the coming of age of the whole race. This is a new teaching which the world is now ready for. "He will guide you into all truth" the maturity of the age. The forces are now released and are preparing humanity to attain that stage. The principle of oneness of humanity is the corner stone of Bahá'í civilization. It is the call to the Bahá'í teachings. Unity of mankind is new. Christ could not have given it. The world was not ready. Forces have now been released and are preparing humanity to attain that stage. The Child is not yet born. The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh was the stage of conception. Now is the stage of incubation. The Child is world civilization.

The immediate future in Japan is very dark. Japan is going to suffer. The time is not now for great headway. The Pacific will become a great storm center in the coming war, — great suffering. What we require in Japan is the recognition of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and of His Station. A Bahá'í teacher must be active in searching for those who will be spiritually minded, religious, not orthodox. The method of approach depends on the individual. Do not lose time with those who come out of curiosity or for personal gain.

Bahá'ís should be careful in their investments. All will be affected. {{p6}}

The future is very dark. Consult experts in investments. The whole world will be involved. We know two things, — suffering will be intense, and all will be involved. The last war was the great war, the next will be the greatest war. The last was only a prelude to the next. A greater war will be required to give birth to a true League of Nations. If we can remain in a foreign country during the war, that is, have enough money to do so, we should remain. There will be a tremendous reaction afterwards. The Lesser Peace will be of non-Bahá'ís. The Greater Peace is referred to in the Tablet to Queen Victoria. As the Cause develops the governments will embrace the Cause and embrace peace. The greater war will end war. The Bahá'ís must be loyal to their governments and if the government says to keep silent on peace, as in Germany, keep silent.

Christian Science may be a stepping stone but that does not mean the founders are instruments of God. They think they believe in truth but it is imagination. Many of these new movements are tainted by politics. Like the teachings of the church which have no relation to Jesus. The greater movements are disintegrating and the people seek Christian Science, etc. Christian Scientists are sincere but misled. What the Catholics, Christian Scientists, Theosophists teach is superstition.

The Master was the perfect Bahá'í. He was the perfect mirror. He has the element of a prophet but not his rank. He is a human being which is perfect, yet human. That is why He is a mystery. He is all knowing and yet not a prophet.

The other world may be the physical universe, or the spiritual real. There are remarkable teachings in “Gleanings” about both the physical and the spiritual world. Sir Oliver Lodge is ahead of the scientists but he will never be able to analyze or reveal the spiritual world. Most of men's visions are pure superstition or fancy. There is only one spiritual world. The nature of other worlds may be discovered because they are physical but we shall never know the spiritual realm. {while on this plane} [The braces in this case are included as part of the handwritten note. — ed]

There were 12 photos of Bahá'u'lláh distributed by Him in Adrianople, The Master's photo is quite different from that of the Báb or Bahá'u'lláh, which must not be exposed, but friends could own them.

The Cause is so much above personalities, — it will survive all attacks, etc. It is providential Sohrab left the Cause. In a mysterious way these things help the Cause. Mrs. Chanler is hypnotized by him. He may have been sincere but has lost his faith.

The enemies in Palestine are the Muslims, Christians, Muḥammad-‘Alí's party. It is only the beginning of the opposition of the church. This opposition will gradually increase and spread to the Church of England and afterwards will affect the Catholic religion and will bring the downfall of the Pope. The religious opposition is shifting to the West beginning with the politicians. The West starting with the religious leaders there is an increasing opposition of the {{p7}} church and later on it will affect the State. Be confident that whatever happens will eventually be for the good of the Cause. The Bahá'ís must ask to be given administrative positions, that is, secondary posts and prove their ability to administration. They must be well informed and read the books of the enemies as well as Bahá'í books and be prepared to refute arguments. The challenge will be intellectual. What the Cause requires is perseverance.

The Hebrew University in Jerusalem, (300,000 books in library) the largest Hebrew University in the world, is open to all religions. Prof. Norman Bentwich of this university referred to the Bahá'í Faith as the fourth faith in Palestine. (see Bahá'í World, pg. 345) Professors have now been forced to come from Germany, but in the future they will come from America and England, and the Christians and Arabs will attend this university.

Íqán — The last translation is an attempt to approach the unattainable God [goal?].

The Arabs had a kind of culture, that is, a literary culture before Muḥammad. They composed poetry but couldn't write. It is the task of the Bahá'ís to interpret the Qur'án, according to the Bahá'í teachings.

The site of the manger in Bethlehem is the only authentic (Christian) site in Palestine, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said.

Jerusalem. Two reasons for visiting there. First to see the holy places and second to contrast them to those in Haifa and Bahjí. Jerusalem will be the last stronghold of Christianity. There are very powerful forces now at work there allied with the government. Some of the members of the government in Jerusalem are missionaries. They are first imperialists and then missionaries.

Faith is a great gift of God. Character and faith are different but both are necessary. They are complementary. Man may have faith in God and yet not have character. A Bahá'í is a person who feels the necessity to give up a habit, — he must make an effort. Not to drink is a conscientious obligation which is left to the individual. It is breaking a law to drink. We must not make a compromise. Bahá'ís must prove by their action that their religion is alive. The adherence of Bahá'ís to their laws has great influence. Character and adhering to the laws of Bahá'u'lláh is different, that is, Faith is different from Character.

Some of the Báb's laws were severe, as the Báb wished to bring the Muslims from their old beliefs. The laws of the Aqdas cannot be abrogated, at least for 1000 years. There is no rigidity except with the laws which Bahá'u'lláh has already revealed, that is, prayer, fasting, drink, marriage. There are three classes of laws in the Aqdas. First, such as social crime, — bigamy; second, spiritual obligation; third, advice, such as smoking.

There is a decline of morality all over the world, especially in {{p8}} Persia. In Japan a certain quality of character restrains them. In the meantime the Bahá'ís must not follow with the current. This decline is providential; it must set in, in order that the people will learn through bitter experience. It is a preparation for the Cause. God has offered the Cause to mankind for a 100 years. In the “Hidden Words”, “A great calamity followeth you and a great retribution awaiteth you.”

The Báb was like the sun at the vernal equinox, the spring. Bahá’u’lláh was like the middle summer, the sign of Leo. The Light of the Cause is different from the splendor of the Dispensation.

Christ’s birth. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá explained in a Tablet in Persian first what has been the usual way, the germ in man, but said, as to Christ, He was born from the Spirit of God through a breath of His Spirit in an extraordinary manner different from the way which is universally known rule. “Christ”, the Spirit of God, was born through a breath of His Spirit in an extraordinary manner.” There is one passage in the Íqán and two in Some Answered Questions. Every revelation has its mysteries....

The ideal way is for Bahá’ís to work one-half of their time for their living expenses and give the other half of their time to the Cause.

We must not imitate the missionaries in our chanting or singing, but make it something new. We must not imitate under any circumstances the Christians. Be original. In the East there is extreme fundamentalism. In the West extreme liberalism or extreme orthodoxy. The Master said that before his death Prof. Brown would realize his mistake. (In being influenced by the Azalís). Nicolai believed that the Báb was a prophet of God. Gobineau and Nicolai believed that Bahá’u’lláh usurped the Báb’s place. Gobineau has not changed but Nicolai has realized that the Bahá’ís are the friends of the Báb. The enemies of the Cause had a very powerful subtle influence on people. We mustn’t be either provocative nor be too submissive. Ventilate our feelings with frankness and moderation. The tone must be moderate and we must be very frank with friendliness. Firmness and at the same time frankness can be combined. To be brave is different from being cautious. Over cautiousness is a defect. We must ponder before we take action. Audacity in teaching, but not in applying the principles of Administration. We must be absolutely loyal to the Administrative principles. It is difficult because it involves personalities. Spiritual principles do not involve personalities. We must disregard personalities.

The “Hidden Words” are translated and printed in 12 languages.

(Someone at the table spoke of a cake made with alcohol. The Guardian said:) “Alcohol is alcohol whether in cooking or drinking and the Bahá’ís should know this.” Speaking of wine in more than one Tablet Bahá’u’lláh has said, “Do not approach it.” (Shoghi Effendi has the originals of these Tablets.) Women particularly {{p9}} should refrain from wine. They should go to parties and enjoy the rest, and why not write to the hostess and say, “We are not drinking wine.” We must not be ashamed. One extreme is to stay away, and the other extreme is to drink. Be frank, reasonable and brave. It often happens that what to us appears to be an embarrassing situation turns out to be to the advantage of the Cause. Timidity is an evidence of lack of faith. If faith is strong, one is full of courage and audacity. Association is a fundamental principle of the Cause, as in the Words of Bahá'u'lláh, “Consort ye with all,...” Association does not imply affiliation. Do not collaborate with them. In a political party we may associate ourselves but not accept membership. The reason why women cannot be members of the House of Justice will be revealed to us. The Master in a Tablet has said it will become clear as the sun. Sometimes we cannot find the reason for things, but it is a challenge to our faith itself. A revelation implies a wisdom which transcends the human mind.

The Bahá'ís should express gratitude for what the British Government has done. 1st Service. Gen. Allenby received an order from Mr. Balfour that when they entered Haifa, ‘Abdu'l-Bahá should be protected. He gave directions to Gen. Allenby and to the military official in charge and the first one Gen. Allenby called on was ‘Abdu'l-Bahá. It surprised everyone in Haifa. He asked the Master what He desired and He replied just one word to cable to Persia that He was safe, and it was the military official who sent the cable and then Gen. Allenby and his wife drove with the Master to ‘Akká, and it was a great surprise. 2nd Service. The British Government established the fact that the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh was the property of the Bahá'ís in 1922. Muḥammad-‘Alí's party seized the key forcibly from the Gardener at night and for over a year the police were stationed at the Shrine. The High Commissioner of Palestine received letters and telegrams from all countries — The British officer was ordered by the High Commissioner in Jerusalem to deliver the key from the police to the same gardener. 3rd Service. Muḥammad-‘Alí is owner of 1/6 of the Mansion through bribery and they hoped to get the rest, but failed. They are very well off but they wouldn't restore the Mansion. Muḥammad-‘Alí, although he owned 1/3 (in ‘Abdu'l-Bahá's time) lived in the Mansion for 40 years and ‘Abdu'l-Bahá allowed him to do it, but now they cannot occupy it. The British Government guarantees the place as a sacred place, so Muḥammad-‘Alí's share in it is not only useless but a loss to him. The 4th Service was that the British Government recognized the place and exempted it from taxation. Also all the property in Haifa.

During 300 years 12 generations of Bahá'u'lláh's family — He is from Abraham — one of his sons who migrated to Central Asia and established himself in Khurasán — he was neither Ismael nor Isaac — He is also from Jesse, the son of David who is from Isaac.

Zoroaster conversed with the Jewish prophets 1000 years before Christ. He lived at the time of the Jewish prophets who were not endowed with constancy. The Sabian religion existed before Abraham — just as Christ appeared among the Jews — In the Qur'án Zoroaster was mentioned but not by name — Rass. Prof. Jackson is the leading authority on Zoroaster. {{p10}}

Hidden Words: “The comb I have ...” meaning what I have given you to use as a means of — misusing. Religion has often been misused by the leaders of religion and “comb” means religion or the writings of Bahá'u'lláh, which should be the instrument for the establishment of peace — The misinterpretation of the writings of Bahá'u'lláh.

On the whole it is much wiser to invest in real estate remote from the centers of population (that the bombs may not fall) and the friends must not be misled by temporary prosperity — for the crash will come later.

The Master's photograph should be circulated amongst the Believers. Bahá'u'lláh should live in the minds of the Believers rather than to see a photograph — Then there is always the fear of worshipping the photograph. The Bahá'ís must concentrate on the spirit and not on the form — Even the Master used to refer to Himself as the channel.

Nationalism and militarism are all instruments that God is utilizing for the use of His purpose — This turmoil is a preparation — The coming war will weld the nations into a Kingdom of God. The Bahá'ís are preparing the way at present for this great fusion.

To teach the Cause is the paramount duty of the friends. Every Bahá'í should teach — if not publicly, by their action. The more they teach the more manifest the confirmations will come — they are suspended between earth and heaven and what is required is a magnet and that magnet is the actions of the Bahá'ís. They are ready to descend and it is the deeds of the Bahá'ís which will attract as a magnet these confirmations which are suspended ready to fall. It is not what we achieve but the purity of our motive.

American Bahá'ís effect of the Divine Plan of the Master's Tablets. Like Nabíl's Narrative — it was not appreciated at the time.

I am urging the American Bahá'ís now to scatter as the Master did in His Will, to settle and stay to the end of life and never feel discouraged.

Shoghi Effendi's Question

Emeric Sala

1937

Between 1937 and 1938, there being no air travel, very few North American Bahá'ís could afford the time or cost to make the journey to Haifa. I had to sail to Europe on business in December 1937. Mrs. May Maxwell persuaded me to extend my trip, which I did, by train and bus, to visit the Guardian. I shall be eternally grateful to her for this privilege.

Throughout 1937, only two North Americans made the pilgrimage, Mrs. McCormick from Chicago and I from Montreal. In contrast, today about a hundred pilgrims arrive every fortnight, mostly from the Americas. This is one more measure of the growth and strength of the Bahá'í Faith.

The Guardian told me that the main purpose of my pilgrimage was to visit and pray at the shrines and holy places. In my own mind, my main purpose was to visit Shoghi Effendi. Actually, I never met Shoghi Effendi. However, having been the only Western pilgrim, I had the undivided attention of the Guardian for about three hours of each of the five nights. Gradually, I gained the feeling that Shoghi Effendi, the man, had sacrificed himself long ago for the Faith and the Guardianship. I have never before or since met a human being who had given so much of himself for the Faith, obliterating all personal desires and aspirations.

One evening while discussing the subject of infallibility the Guardian explained that the derived infallibility of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was much inferior to that of Bahá’u’lláh, the prophet, while his own was infinitely inferior to that of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He admitted that his powers were limited to the interpretation of the Writings, having as its purpose the preservation of the unity of the Faith. When I asked him how do we know when he speaks to us as the Guardian and when as Shoghi Effendi, Rúhíyyih Khánum, his young bride, who was sitting next to him, asked: “I would like to know too; which is which?” The Guardian did not answer my question.

I asked the Guardian many questions, most of them prompted by my immaturity, having been a Bahá’í only ten years. One night Shoghi Effendi asked me a question, which I could not answer, nor did I understand its significance at that time. {{p189}} Shoghi Effendi asked me: “Since after the martyrdom of the Báb the authority of the Faith was passed on to Bahá’u’lláh, and after his passing to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, to whom was it transferred after the ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá?” I answered, of course, to Shoghi Effendi. He said no. I then said the Guardian. He again shook his head. I then ventured the Universal House of Justice. He again said no, and I could see from his expression that he was disappointed with my inability to answer his question. Then he asked, are the friends not reading my letters? The answer, he said, is clearly stated in The Dispensation of Bahá’u’lláh. It is divided into four parts: Bahá’u’lláh, the Báb, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and the fourth part entitled the “World Order of Bahá’u’lláh,” which is the answer to his question.

The Guardian spoke a beautiful Oxford English. I spoke English with a terrible Hungarian-Canadian accent, which the Guardian found difficult to follow. Rúhíyyih Khánum, who had known me for nine years, had to interpret on several occasions.

After returning to Montreal, I wrote seven pages of the usual pilgrim’s notes, but I did not mention the above question, as I did not see any importance in it. As time passed, I could not forget his question, nor the sad expression on his face for my inability to answer. I was also puzzled as to why he had asked me that question.

As the years advanced, especially after his passing in 1957, I realized increasingly that the greatest lesson I learned was not during the many hours of exclusive conversations, most of which were based on my questions, but it was the question the Guardian asked me and which I could not answer. For the last forty years or so, I have asked the friends the same question on four continents, at untold firesides, summer and winter schools, and I received, with one single exception, the same wrong answers that I gave the Guardian as far back as January, 1938.

It is obvious that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his Will and Testament stated very clearly that all Bahá'ís should turn to Shoghi Effendi, that “whoso obeyeth him not ... hath not obeyed God” and again, “He that opposeth him hath opposed the True One...” It is also indisputable that Shoghi Effendi was the head of the Faith during his ministry of thirty-five years. Yet, he wanted to impress upon me at that time, that the authority of the Faith did not rest upon him but on the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, which was based on two pillars: The Guardianship and the Universal House of Justice. His vision of the future went far beyond the Guardianship, and our failure in all these years to visualize the significance of his question should indeed make him feel sad.

[^] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá (Wilmette: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1968) 11.

Our Faith was centered in the Guardian as a father figure, oblivious of the other pillar and its implications, which was a distortion if not a mutilation of our vision of the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. {{p190}} Shoghi Effendi described this condition as follows:

To dissociate the administrative principles of the Cause from the purely spiritual and humanitarian teachings would be tantamount to a mutilation of the body of the Cause, a separation that can only result in the disintegration of its component parts, and the extinction of the Faith itself.[^]

[^] Shoghi Effendi, Guidance for Today and Tomorrow (London: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1953), 99.

These are strong words. Shoghi Effendi told me in Haifa that the Bahá'í Faith was founded by two prophets, the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh, and rests on two Orders, that of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the Administrative Order, which has two pillars that are absolutely indispensable to each other.

ADMINISTRATION AND WORLD ORDER

Also Activities Related To Them.

Uniformity in {{p2}} principles and essentials and insist, not only allow, insist on diversity in secondary matters. There is a mysterious power within the administration that maintains this uniformity. The Germans tried to get changes for Germany, changes regarding the regime, etc., He just absolutely refused.

If an N.S.A. or local S.A. gives out instructions to teachers or groups, that are against the teachings, we must obey, but we can communicate with the Guardian. If we do not obey the ruling we would be weakening the administration. So the only way is to communicate with the Guardian and he must take it up with the N.S.A. or local S.A.

The duty of every American believer outside the United States is to keep reporting to their N.S.A. Working in German Territory the believers should report to both N.S.A.'s.

Justice in social relations, mercy in individual relations. Facing responsibility is a sort of spiritual sustenance. They (Assemblies) must welcome the difficulties, the problems, and not shrink or transfer them.

There are laws and principles in the Faith and the principles are sub-divided into spiritual and administrative.

The Divine Plan is the soul of the administration, but for the Divine Plan the administration would be stagnant. The administration is the body and now the soul must function in the body, the machinery of the administration. The Temple is an organ of the administration. Now that all these organs have been established the soul must animate the body. Had he (Shoghi Effendi) not stressed the Divine Plan the friends would spend all their time perfecting details of the administration. When this teaching work advances sufficiently a new stage of the administration will be reached which will be international. The "Bahá'í World" should be printed here in Haifa by an International Committee. Then we have to think of perfecting the International Administration.

However destructive, whatever is happening, in some mysterious way is helping us, helping the very administration we are building.

Answering a question where all nine members of a local Assembly no longer functioned, he expressed this view:

Before everything else they (believers of that particular city) must deal with the situation of the S.A. It must be made complete — 9. The general principle of an Assembly is to be 9. Before everything else, even teaching, the local Assembly must be properly organized and function well. Prefers 15 members in a group and a strong S.A. than a hundred with a poorly working S.A., as it may all disappear over night.

The correct term is the Administrative Order, which will in future become the World Order. The Administrative Order as it functions has its own administration; in other words the machinery which the body of the Cause employs for its own development. Administrative Order is the institution itself, the body of the Cause itself. The Administrative Order is born in the formative period of the Cause, it will evolve until it emerges into the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh in the Golden Age. The system of Bahá'u'lláh has upset the material equilibrium of the world, tremendous power has been released (science) but it will never be properly utilized until the world becomes spiritualized, and this will be done by the spread of the Cause.

Christmas ceases as an institution for us. We do not observe Christmas even as Baptism is quite out of place for us. Bahá'u'lláh has abrogated these sacraments, Communion, Baptism, the celebration of Easter, etc., also New Year. The Zoroastrian and Muḥammadan, Bahá'ís have given up their former religious observances for the Bahá'í observances, why should not the Christian Bahá'ís do the same? We have our own feast days.

The Ordinances of the Church must not be associated with Jesus, they being man — made. A Bahá'í cannot identify himself with an ecclesiastical organization or post, as he then must support the ordinances of the Church.

Regarding membership in Free Masonry, etc., the Bahá'í should withdraw. Also they should ask the N.S.A. regarding membership in other societies, and if the N.S.A. is not aware of the aims, purpose, methods, etc., of a society they must investigate and then guide the individual.

We should refer to qualifications for members of the N.S.A. but never mention personalities, no application to individuals; even if we are asked for our opinion we should say, "I prefer not to mention any names." What we should remember is their qualifications. Almost everything in America is exemplary except their election, (refers to Bahá'í election here) the reason for it is that everything is so corrupt and it influences us, but we must fight against it (we American Bahá'ís.) It is a weak point in our community. That is why the relation of the Convention to the N.S.A. is very delicate; he revolts immediately at any attempt of the N.S.A. to interfere with the rights of the Convention. But if the N.S.A. considered a question and conscientiously decided by majority vote that the Convention shall not discuss such and such a thing, then they must obey (the Convention must.) The Convention ultimately must obey the N.S.A. but all he can do (Guardian) is to appeal to the conscience of the N.S.A. members to deal with the Convention justly. Delegates have the right to ask the N.S.A. to justify itself on any course that has been taken. This is the chief purpose of the Convention, but the N.S.A. has the right to refuse discussion if they feel it is premature or bad for the Cause. As a rule, the delegates are free to bring any subject that they wish to the Convention, and it is very very rare that the N.S.A. might interfere or forbid it and their decision must not be prejudiced, they must not abuse that power of deciding if a subject can be discussed or not. It is a very sacred responsibility, especially when the Convention is in session, and to curtail the sacred rights of the Convention, is a great temptation to the N.S.A. to usurp the rights of the Convention, because ultimate authority abides with them because they have been made the Interpreter of the By-Laws. {{p4}} They must ask themselves that question: Was there a sufficient need in the Cause for them to curtail the rights of the delegates? The friends must not think the N.S.A. does not err. We must not believe that they do not make mistakes — they make lots of them. The Master says they will commit mistakes, but they have to be obeyed even if they do make mistakes. Only the International House of Justice and the Guardian are under the direct guidance of God.

The greater their authority, the more careful they must be in exercising it.

In answer to the question: Do the local and National Spiritual Assemblies pray enough?

"I would prefer they would curtail the program of the Convention and devote more time to prayer. To realizing they are not infallible. I agree they do not pray sufficiently."

We have to discuss the teachings informally among ourselves. But discussion must not lead to controversy. We should encourage one another to express ourselves. We must encourage all classes in the community to express their views; the most humble, the most illiterate, the least significant. Whatever they say we must listen to dispassionately. After all Peter was the most stupid of the Apostles and yet he was the successor.

Eventually all N.S.A.'s will have a Palestine Branch, owning property and this will show our unity and protect the property; also they will have other branches in other nations, giving great solidarity to the Bahá'ís all over the world.

The Bahá'ís must develop their fund until it can help in the community help non — Bahá'í interests, whether scientific, social, humanitarian, etc. The local fund must be divided into two sections: specifically Bahá'í, and community interests. At present this is not possible, but in the future the National Bahá'í Fund will be made up of these two things. If a friend, a non-Bahá'í wishes to contribute to the Bahá'í fund we must make it plain we accept it only for the second or municipal fund. We regard our Temple, Summer Schools, etc., as gifts to humanity. When you give a gift you do not accept money for it from the recipient. We want everyone to know that the Bahá'í institutions are supported by people who whole-heartedly accept Bahá'u'lláh, are believers. This protects the Cause from calumny, misrepresentation, etc. Non-believers are always welcome to give money to the fund for the humanitarian purposes directed by the believers. The Bahá'ís for instance, could establish where there was a need for it, a hospital, one run by them but not for Bahá'ís and not considered as a Bahá'í Institution.

Believers may inquire regarding both spiritual and material affairs from their local and national S.A.'s, encouraged to do so. There must be no interference however, under normal circumstances, in the affairs of the individual on the part of the S.A., but if they ask for help the S.A. must not disappoint them, if they turn to them. {{p5}} The S.A. function is to help the community if they need advice, financial support, help, the S.A. must help, especially if the individual is alone. If appealed to they must settle disputes between individuals and non-Bahá'ís, between families. In Persia they go to one extreme, in America to the other, (in appealing to the S.A.) The S.A. has not only the right but the obligation to settle disputes if referred to them. If the individual, of his own accord, refers the matter to the S.A., they must handle it not shirk it. In Persia the friends go with any problem to the S.A. In America they do not do it enough, particularly if the dispute affects the Cause. The duty of the S.A. is to interfere in order to safeguard the Cause, the interests of the Cause have precedence over the interests of the individual and in such a conflict the individual must abide by the decision of the S.A., besides the S.A. must acquire enough experience to become a Bahá'í Court, a Bahá'í Government in the future. The greater the difficulties the stronger will be the spiritual constitution of the S.A. It nourishes them — the difficulties that arise. The first thing is to face, not shirk responsibilities; second is to base all their verdicts on justice, be animated by justice. Justice and not tempered by mercy. In future they will be called, not the House of Mercy, but the House of Justice. Bahá'u'lláh said: "But for the law of God, I would have kissed the hand of my would-be murderer and would have shared with him a part of my possessions, but the Law of God restrains me, and I have no possessions to share." This is a very significant statement, it indicates that as an individual He is personally inclined to forgive but the Law of God is higher than His Will and restrains Him. Even the Manifestation Himself has to forget His personal inclinations and obey the Law of God. This is an example to local, National and International Houses of Justice. Stability and order are based on two pillars, punishment and reward, and not on forgiveness; He excludes forgiveness. The person who has been injured, aggrieved, harmed, can beg for the forgiveness of his enemy. If on the part of the aggrieved person he pleads for mercy, then the Assembly can take the plea into account. Justice will solve all the problems of the world. "Righteousness and Justice filleth the earth as the waters cover the sea." Referred to in both the Gospels and Islámic tradition. Unerring, undeviating, uncompromising Justice. Nothing can bring the lamb and the lion together unless they are sure justice will rule. The small and big nations will never come together as in the League unless they are sure it is based on Justice.

He does not mind if the N.S.A. knew they can and do err in their judgments. Only the International House of Justice is infallible, under the guidance of God direct.

In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "B / See A."

The leaders in most of the countries (refers to the Bahá'ís) are weak, the masses are strong. (leaders: members of S.A.'s, etc.) They are often led by the masses without realizing it. {{p6}} But for the reaction of the masses they would have erred more.

The administrators (in the Cause) as a rule have capacity, ability, but their devotion to the Cause, their characters as Bahá'ís, is not as great as some of the others. Some of the others have the devotion, but not the education and experience required for administrators.

If a believer has any doubt as to what constitutes an alcoholic beverage, he must ask his N.S.A. who must enquire of the American Government what their ruling regarding prohibition was.

When the believers refer to the Guardian a decision of the N.S.A., if the question at stake is purely national he must refer it back to the N.S.A. and ask them to reconsider their decision. The N.S.A. must do the same with all local affairs, unless they are very important, refer them back to the local S.A.

The Bahá'ís don't stop to reflect whether their partisanship in some organization might not affect the Cause. Social organizations may or may not be suitable for us to belong to. We should refer these questions to the consideration of our local S.A. The Americans do not do this enough; the Persians too much.

The dangers that surround the Cause in these days are much greater. Ecclesiastical and political economics; these, as the Administrative Order develops, will oppose us more and more, vigorously and openly oppose the Cause. In the early days of the Cause, the Master chose certain individuals to act as an intermediary between the body of the believers, but now that we have the administration, the S.A.'s play this part. It is only logical, this new step has been made. Then one member of an Assembly makes a motion and it is carried, he must not say this was suggested by him, he must only let it be known as a decision of the S.A. Even in cases of teachers doing work, the more they associate their work with an Assembly, the better. He admires the person who, after making a splendid suggestion which was unanimously accepted by the others, leaves the meeting and says the S.A. have decided so and so, and gives no hint that he made it; just as the person who contributes a large sum to the community and does not mention it as being from him. Secrecy is a very bad thing, but some things must be kept absolutely secret. The S.A. should decide after a meeting what is secret and then not mention this, but when they come to decide this they should not exercise undue secrecy. They must resist the temptation of undue secrecy. He is the first person to say that the local and National S.A.'s make mistakes, but he is the first also to say that the majority on the S.A. and the whole community must obey their decisions. We believe the International House of Justice is guided, the National and local make mistakes, the International is under the guidance of God. We must not live in a fool's paradise by thinking all their decisions (local and National S.A.'s) are guided.

[^] Editor's note: see Vol. 2 page 8 paragraph 4 regarding confidentiality, and page 12 paragraph 3 regarding demands for disclosure by the authorities in Russia.

When a spiritual Assembly is established, they can then establish the 19 Day Feasts. The S.A. is the first Bahá'í institution in any locality, before its establishment they can hold meetings with non-Bahá'ís, but as soon as the S.A. is established they start the 19 Day Feasts for believers only. {p7} They can hold meetings before the establishment of the S.A., on the feast day, but it cannot be considered a 19 Day Feast. They must not be too harsh, if a non-believer happens to come to a 19 Day Feast we must not force him to leave. But generally the Feasts are for believers only.

But for our prejudice the progress of the Cause would have been much more rapid. (racial, etc.) If someone wishes to become a believer and accepts the station of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb, the Master, and the Administrative Order, and all this implies, and they conscientiously make an effort to approach the standard of Bahá'u'lláh, we cannot ask more. Character has nothing to do with membership; if a person is willing to do their very best and strive, it is a question of good will. We should be satisfied with the bare statement, the resolution.

The 19 Day Feast is not something we have to be too rigid about, (attendance of Bahá'ís.)

Obedience to the N.S.A. and S.A. is required, even to the sacrifice of personal conscience. If a local case is reported to the N.S.A. they must ask, is this a local issue? If so, refer it back to the local S.A. The same thing applies to the National and International Body.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “A / See / B”.] The rank and file of the Cause influence the spirituality of their N.S.A. by their own progress spiritually. The masses are strong, the leaders are weak, in most of the countries where the Cause is established.

The Bahá'í village as outlined by the Master is a more or less tentative scheme. There is a great danger in America to crystallize something that is fluid, tentative. It has not only 7 revenues but 7 expenditures.

The laws of inheritance were given by the Báb and modified by Bahá'u'lláh. He changed the percentage inherited by the children to 1/3 and thus increased the share of the children.

The Bahá'ís own one million dollars' worth of property on Mount Carmel, one quarter of this is owned by the American N.S.A., about 35 acres. Muḥammad-‘Alí's son, Moussa Bahá'í, had to sign all the deeds which went to America as he is on the land commission. When they wanted to transfer the property in the name of the N.S.A. of America, through a power of attorney, Moussa Bahá'í said the N.S.A. was not recognized legally in Palestine. Shoghi Effendi went to a lawyer, who recommended forming a Palestine Branch. A new power of attorney was sent and the property transferred. This pilgrim house (Western) belongs to the N.S.A. of America, also a plot of land near ‘Akká. Shoghi Effendi's plan is to have all the N.S.A.'s of the Bahá'í world own property here on Mount Carmel. This will impress the authorities and protect the property. The “endowments of the Bahá'í Faith in America” would be a better name than “property of.” There are National, International and {{p8}} local endowments. The endowments here in Haifa (‘Akká, etc.,) are International. The Temple, etc. is a National endowment, and local endowments must also be obtained. The Ḥazíratu'l-Quds is the Administrative center for a city. The N.S.A. should move their headquarters to Chicago — C (See D.) — and call it the National Headquarters of the Bahá'í Faith. The Temple is a spiritual building. The Ḥazíratu'l — Quds is only one of the dependencies of the Temple. In future this will be built up. In the Temple only prayers will be offered and meditations in the form of prayer. Prayers from the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, ‘Abdu'l-Bahá and the Qur’án, the Bible, etc., but only holy prayers and meditations.

As to music in the Temple, he is awaiting a tablet of the Master, written to the Bahá'í of ‘Ishqabád on this subject. The S.A. of Tíhrán have bought 500 acres of land for a Temple. Now they must find an original design. If in Persia they cannot create something original, then instead of copying a former architectural style, they may have to copy the Chicago Temple.

The trouble with Greenacre is that it was an institution established before the Administration, it then had to be adopted, whereas Geyserville is a child of the administration. All Summer Schools are National institutions and should be owned by the N.S.A. Now is the time for the friends to offer if they feel the urge, local endowments, no matter how small; real estate or building or a fund, to the local incorporated S.A.'s. None as yet have local endowments. Now that the National endowments amount to over two million dollars, it is time the local endowments were made. — An N.S.A. can decide if an endowment is local or National. — In India it has already been done (local endowments.) It is preferable the endowments should be unlabeled. An endowment could take the form of a local headquarters. He thinks now the friends are justified in communities, especially where they are incorporated, to support the local fund and give it favor. It is a great service to the Cause to have local endowments established.

Every effort should be made by the local Assemblies to solve their own problems and not refer them to the N.S.A. He thinks contributions to the local fund should be as secret as voting. Is it necessary even for the treasurer to know? The name and amount of the contribution should be kept a secret by the local and National Spiritual Assemblies. There is nothing to be ashamed of in calling certain things a secret in a Spiritual Assembly. Secrecy [confidentiality?] is sometimes necessary for the efficient conduct of Bahá'í affairs. They must be secret in the true sense of the term. There is a danger, however, of introducing an atmosphere of secrecy into an Assembly, which would be very bad. He prefers that contributions should not be given at 19 Day Feasts, and if they are given, be kept a secret. We must learn to be discreet. The treasurer must keep nothing private, the unity of the Spiritual Assembly must be complete in all matters. There is too much National organization in the United States and not enough local. Why have they incorporated local Spiritual Assemblies? To enable them to own property. Then why should not a local S.A. seek exemption from taxation on grounds of a place of worship? When a local community becomes the owner of a tax-bearing piece of land, etc., it stimulates it to meet taxation, to carry the burden. All local Spiritual Assemblies in the United States must eventually incorporate. First, have By-Laws copied on the New York Communities By-Laws then incorporate, then transfer property which becomes local endowments, then manage this property. This should be done in all local Spiritual Assemblies. If they cannot raise taxes, etc., why not apply to the Government and say this is not only an administrative headquarters, but a place of worship? If he, Shoghi Effendi, is pleased by local endowments, then why shouldn't a local S.A. have its Palestine Branch and own property here? It will neutralize the localization of power.

Individuals who wish to add to a Bahá'í institution can specify what they would like the money to be used for, but at the same time leave the N.S.A. free to decide and be willing to do so, and accept the N.S.A.'s decision gladly.

In every country the National Bahá'í Administration must come first and then the local (i.e., a National Temple, magazine, summer schools, etc., before the local ones.)

Geyserville is the child of the administration and reflects the spirit of the administration impersonally. This is essential, to the administration, that the Summer Schools should not be a burden to the National Fund. The National Fund must be fed by publications, summer schools, local funds, etc., and then go to the teaching fund, etc., and not vice versa.

Geyserville is an example to all summer schools, the way they have effaced themselves (those responsible for it.) Although they have financed the whole thing, committees do everything. An individual should offer his property to the Cause and then be satisfied with the way the committee handles it — be entirely severed from it.

The oneness and the wholeness of mankind are good to refer to. When we refer to unity we must be careful not to give the impression we mean uniformity, unity in essentials, diversity in non-essentials.

He thinks the Archives in the future will have a part that will be shown and a part that will not be shown, but the whole institution is under the N.S.A. Every believer who presents something to the Archives, should have it done in his name, the name of the giver — unless he does not wish it — the name of the person, town, and the country should be connected with the gift. Personalities should be given due recognition so long as they do not weaken or confuse the operation of the administration or a vital principle of the administration. Files, books, relics, etc., will not all be shown. Eventually there will be a local Archives in every nation, village and town; even in every hamlet there will be an Archives. {{p10}} We must not require individuals to offer their relics but urge them, when they do offer them, to offer their relics without making any conditions such as where they will be exposed, if they shall be exposed or not, etc. There should be no pressure, even no hint, brought to bear on the individual to give their relics.

What the friends have not yet got in the West is a National Headquarters; one division a meeting place for the N.S.A., another division Archives, another for its Convention. The ideal thing would be to shift it to Chicago, — D. (See C.) — under the shadow of the Temple. The N.S.A. must first decide if it is practical to shift from New York to Chicago and then decide on the site, etc. There are three reasons why it should be in Chicago; first, the first Temple of the West is there; second, the first group of Bahá'ís was in Chicago; and third, it is the geographical center of America; just as Haifa is the heart of the world geographically, it is the meeting place of three continents: Europe, Asia and Africa.

He does not consider a local Bahá'í news wrong if they have first contributed to the National Fund; then to the local teaching work and the local administrative activities. Then if they have done all this and have a certain amount of money left, there is no reason why they should not have a local newsletter.

The N.S.A. of America is a model in regard to the way they keep in close touch with isolated believers. The friends must realize that not until the national institutions function and acquire both the administrative and spiritual capacity to elect the International House of Justice, can this election be held, especially is this true of newly organized countries. The administration is not enough, we must have the spiritual foundation. The Guardian said; "They send me my co-workers, I have no voice in it, I must give them full liberty, I have no voice in their election and have no right to intervene." Such a body is elected by the N.S.A.'s direct. Nor the Guardian, nor the delegates, nor the individual, have any right in this election. They must (the N.S.A.'s) do it conscientiously, think of the Cause alone, elect the most qualified irrespective of their country, even if they all come from one country. It is quite unique, nothing like it has ever been attempted before. His task is to watch very carefully that they do not get out of their sphere of activity, legislation. This is solely his responsibility: to define what is legislation. If the Master has said such and such must be done it is binding regardless of the fact it is not written by a Manifestation of God.

The principle is this: do not restrict the freedom of the individual unless the Manifestation has done it, and when he has laid down something, then by all means enforce it. There is nothing in the teachings for or against contraceptives. But Bahá'u'lláh has said the primary purpose of marriage is to have children. All these details are questions for the International House of Justice to decide. If there are States in the United States that require both civil and ecclesiastic marriage, then, through the N.S.A. we could state that we are not church members, and make an effort to obtain their consent of our use of a Bahá'í marriage certificate. {{p11}} In other words, it must be done by the National Spiritual Assembly, who could communicate with the Guardian on the subject, etc.

(In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "E / See / F") The Bahá'ís think that the spirit suffers by coming in contact with non-Bahá'í experts, on the contrary, it benefits.

The legal committee is one of the most important to protect the Cause. The legal committee should have an advisory committee of legal experts, non-Bahá'ís. In fact many Bahá'í committees will need expert advice and they in turn must report to the N.S.A. They must not believe they will be guided, they must have expert advice, — F. (See E.) — and they must not feel that a non-Bahá'í cannot advise Bahá'ís. The consciousness of the orthodox element in the Cause has been banished by the administration. Both elements have made concessions. The orthodox element in the Cause gave the Master a station equal to the Manifestation, the liberal gave him practically no station or a confused one. The old problems have disappeared and now there are a new set of problems; the relation of the Cause as it evolves within the state. The first stage of oppression and persecution is passing, we are now in the second stage of emancipation. The stage of recognition will be the third stage. He has thought about this but not yet written about it. Oppression (persecution,) emancipation, recognition.

We are now in the second stage. When the Egyptian, Indian, or Persian Government accepts a Bahá'í Court, we will enter the third stage, recognition by civil authorities. When the International House of Justice is established, the formative period will be over.

Unification can only be established on a basis of equality. In the United States a small state has its rights just the same as a large state: equality. East and West, large and small powers, must all come together on a basis of equality. The West is declining, the East advancing. The Bahá'ís in Persia are being opposed because the Government thinks they are planning one day to seize power. We never use force, violence is against our principles, we never use it. {{p12}} The end does not justify the means, we never lie to protect the Cause, because the Cause is based on truth and we must never revert to a method which is against the Cause to promote it. Immediately an institution, Islámic or Christian, begins to oppose the Cause it will release the forces that will lead to its own disintegration. Opposition strengthens the Cause and precipitates the downfall of those who attack it. These are the two effects, whether religious, political or individual, in nature of attack.

In Persia the Bahá'í Faith was born, in America the beginnings of Bahá'í civilization. The beginnings of the Bahá'í civilization is the Bahá'í Administration.

The Administration first and foremost is the declaration of Trust which is international and applies to all countries. Whatever is not therein is secondary. Non-voting in political matters is universal. The German N.S.A. should have circulated a copy the American N.S.A.'s ruling in this matter. The Bahá'ís must not vote when their vote will identify them with a particular political party. There are things in the Nazi program that are splendid, but when we cannot wholly support a political party, then we cannot give it our support. If the Government should force the Bahá'ís to vote they must obey, but if it should force them to recant they must never do so. There is a difference between something that affects the progress of the Cause and something that affects its integrity. Even to the forbidding of the N.S.A. we should obey. Would it humiliate the Cause? No. But if one individual recants it is more humiliating to the Cause than to have all the institutions of the Cause forbidden. In Russia the authorities went to the members of the S.A. and said you must give us a detailed report, secretly, of all your S.A.'s transactions. The Russian Bahá'ís refused, Shoghi Effendi said they did wrong, they had nothing to deny, to be afraid of, they would only be telling the truth.

The Bahá'ís live in 40 countries all of which are opposed to each other. If the Bahá'ís identify themselves with the policy of one Government, the other Governments are displeased with the Bahá'ís.

An incident occurred in Moscow illustrating this: The central authorities summoned an S.A. member and said: "We have heard there are many Bahá'ís in Tíhrán, also some in the Persian Foreign Office, is this so?" At that time Persia and Russia were opposed to each other. The Russian Bahá'í guaranteed that no Persian Bahá'ís were in any way employed in political posts. This action (assurance) saved the destruction of the Temple in 'Ishqabád, and the assurance of our non-political stand enabled the friends in Russia to have more freedom.

If our government forbids us to teach the Cause, we must obey — but never recant. Anything that dishonours the Cause we must not obey, but anything that retards the Cause, we must obey. The only way we can reconcile the “obey our Government” and other things in the Cause is to see whether it is an administrative thing at issue or a spiritual one. {{p13}} We are not ashamed of what might retard the Cause, but we cannot have it humiliated.

If each one followed the dictates of his own conscience in war time, what would happen to the Government? The minority must submit to the majority. We as Bahá'ís advocate this, we must practice it. Even at the front lines there must be no half-hearted loyalty; then we would be traitors. We must go to war if required, if no other way is possible into active service, and there do our duty. If we give the right to the minority to challenge the rule of the majority, and if they, this minority should come into power, then they too must give the minority the right to challenge the majority; this would make society unstable, chaotic. Dictators appeal to the right of conscience and as soon as they come to power they deny that right to the minority who then might feel the same as they did when their party was the minority. Anyone who claims the right to follow his own conscience challenges the stability of society. Majority rule involves the stability of society. This does not mean the minority must not try, through legitimate means, to change and influence the majority; they must try to persuade the majority — let them be preachers. While the minority is carrying out the rule of the majority, they have the right to persuade the majority. When there is 1 against 8, he can try to persuade the 8. A member of a Committee can bring his point to the S.A., who can, if they deem fit, bring it up for discussion at a 19 Day Feast, or let him bring it up himself at the 19 Day Feast. Individuals can write to the S.A. and express their ideas or objections, or criticisms. When the time for election of the S.A. comes, the Community must not be swayed by the outgoing S.A.'s convictions, they, in their functions as electors, are responsible to the voice of their conscience alone. The electors are invested with the authority of independent election; the S.A. of independent decision. Bahá'í elections must be three things: 1, universal: 2, free — no one must influence or be influenced by another — and 3, secret, a written ballot.

The political stand of the Bahá'ís (nonparticipation in politics) was given by the Master first to the Persian Bahá'ís. At that time it would have been premature for the West. How could it be possible for a world-wide community to allow its members to participate in political affairs in other countries, often antagonistic to each other? Shoghi Effendi explained this to the Governor and he quite agreed, saying it would “split the Cause from top to bottom.”

The Bahá'ís have every right to tell their Government, “We do not agree with all your principles,” but this does not prevent our obeying our Government, it does not justify our disobeying them. We are loyal to them although we disagree with them. In other words, all other forms of government are deficient. Communism is militant atheism.

In administrative matters we must obey the Government, in spiritual matters we need not obey. If the Government says don't meet such a person, we must obey. It does not mean we have antagonism towards him, but if the Government requires us to denounce him, speak evil of him, this is violating a spiritual principle. The law may say we discourage you from doing such and such a thing — we need not obey — we must obey what is prohibited. {{p14}} We are weighing the two; discouragement by Government and a spiritual principle.

But as soon as you prohibit it, we obey, (if it does not dishonor the Faith in any way.) We will never obey in violating a spiritual principle, even if the law commands it. If the Government lays down a law that the Bahá'ís must denounce a Jew, we will never do it, but if the Government says we must avoid him, we obey. We must not rely on the Interpretation of others. We must get the text of the law. Who has laid it down? A responsible person? It often happens in Persia that a law is laid down by a self-appointed authority, subordinate officials, etc. This is a corruption — we must be sure of the text of a law. “I must say that the Bahá'ís have not got sufficient courage — but this does not mean they should be unwise.” Look up the law, be sure it is a law. Let them be imprisoned. In spiritual matters we prefer to suffer martyrdom rather than obey our Government. That is why we have had twenty thousand martyrs in Persia. Obedience to the Government in spiritual matters dishonors the Cause, is a stain on the Cause. Let them be put to death — it will create excellent publicity for the Cause provided they are right. It would be a manifestation [humiliation?] for the Cause if they were in the wrong.

We should be ashamed if one individual sacrifices a vital spiritual principle in order to obey his Government, but there is no disgrace when the whole community obeys the government regarding Administrative principles if they close our meetings, forbid our correspondence, etc., we are weakened but not humiliated.

Individuals are free to vote in elections so far as they feel they can do so without riding with any party. His belief is that it is not possible to vote in America without involving identification with a political party, however, he leaves it to the individual to conscientiously decide[.] Party politics, party policies, it is clear we must keep out of. The individual must conscientiously decide if by voting they are not siding with a party, and if this can be done, they are free to vote. The general principle is that we must ride with no party. A Bahá'í can never be a Republican or a Democrat, because when we call ourselves a Republican or a Democrat, it means we sacrifice to the party platform, if there is one item only that does not coincide with the Cause, that precludes our supporting it. We believe in World State Authority, that is one thing that precludes a Bahá'í from supporting any party, because all Governments believe in their national sovereignty. So long as they do not identify themselves with the party in Germany by voting, they may exercise participation in the vote. Participation in the vote in political affairs is different from voting as a man, if we can vote for an individual and not identify ourselves with the party in so doing we may vote. If they vote for Hitler (in reference to the Bahá'ís and the National vote of 1936 in Germany) it means they find him the least objectionable candidate. Although we are not departing from a Bahá'í principle by voting (in manner he specified) it is better not to vote, it is safer not to vote, because it might lead to complications. If a believer cannot make up his mind regarding voting and party complications, he can refer to his local S.A. We are above parties and not against parties. {{p15}} Sooner or later there will be a labor Party in the United States. We cannot belong to that either.

FAST, CALENDAR, HOLY DAYS

Also Abjad System.

Vahid means unity in Arabic (literally “one”.) {{p16}} And the word Vahid has a numerical value of 19, 19x19 Vahids making one Kull-i-shay. The Báb wished to emphasize the unity of God, the unity of the Prophets, the unity of man. Hence He chose this number, 19x19. The nineteen Letters of the Living were to emphasize this idea of unity. The numerical values are according to the Abjad System; each letter of the alphabet having a numerical value. It is Muslim in origin and has no relation to the teachings except that certain prophecies had words which gave dates when marked out according to this system. This was the inspiration of the prophet and not because the system in itself was divinely inspired.

The beginning of the Bahá'í Calendar is the Year 60.

The Bahá'í day starts at sunset, not at midnight, and is like the Muslim system and the Jewish system. If the normal equinox starts one minute before sunset on March 21st, then March 21st is Naw-Rúz, but if it is one minute after sunset, we celebrate the Bahá'í new year on March 22nd, and all the Bahá'í anniversaries as well as the first day of the month will shift accordingly. Our Greenwich time is Tíhrán, when the equinox occurs in Tíhrán will be the criterion for the whole Bahá'í world.

The month of Alláh is the month of the Fast and under all circumstances is only 19 days long, therefore we start our Fast one day later if Naw-Rúz will fall one minute after sunset of the 21st Bahá'u'lláh says. Naw-Rúz immediately follows the last day of the Fast, therefore we must find out before the Fast when it is due; if due the 22nd of March, we begin fasting the 3rd instead of the 2nd of March. Then the intercalary days will have one more. All Bahá'í months have 19 days, any variation is taken up by the intercalary days. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in a letter to a believer in Nayriz has clearly defined our 9 Holy Days. In that same Tablet He says it is not obligatory to celebrate the 28th of November, Day of the Covenant. The Master did not want the friends to commemorate this day on the day the Kitáb-i-‘Ahd was revealed, but six months later, in other words, the furthest day from the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. In view of what the Master stated in this letter, Shoghi Effendi says the ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is also not to be regarded as obligatory, a Holy Day, but not a holiday. The question was put to Bahá'u'lláh whether the friends should fast on the birthday of the Báb and of Himself, when they fell during the Fast. He replied no, not to fast on these days. Every thirty three years it shifts around again because these days are the 1st and 2nd days of the lunar month of Muharram. {{p17}} The Master says the question of these differences between dates in Eastern and Western calendars, lunar and solar months, must be settled by the International House of Justice. But Bahá'u'lláh in the Aqdas says that the birthdays of Báb and Himself are consecutive.

HOLY DAYS

First of Ridván Ninth of Ridván Twelfth of Ridván Naw-Rúz Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh Martyrdom of the Báb Birthday of Bahá'u'lláh Birthday of the Báb Declaration of the Báb

(Day of the Covenant) (Ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá) {{p18}} are anniversaries which should be observed, but not days on which work is forbidden.

THE TEMPLE

We must not allow the teaching fund to indefinitely postpone the Temple fund and its completion. {{p19}} The friends must not expect the prophecies of the Master regarding the Temple to be fulfilled until the entire superstructure is completed.

All he asks is that before the lapse of seven years the outside ornamentation be completed. Just that we think of it, not lose sight of it, so we cannot say he did not let us know in time. The Temple must have a body of experts to advise — non — Bahá'í experts — they may have one or two Bahá'í experts, if they are good enough. Three bodies: N.S.A., its Committee and the Committee's advisory body of experts. The Persian Temple will never be even started or considered before the outer ornamentation of the American Temple is finished. The Master referred to the 3rd Bahá'í Temple being in Persia. So it is in the hands of the American believers. The land is bought, but it will not be begun till after the American Temple's exterior is complete.

He would call the Temple and its dependencies the symbol of this new civilization of the Faith. The Faith is the begetter of this new civilization, its symbol, the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Germany is the heart of Europe, Frankfort A/M the heart of Germany. If the German believers are forced to copy the American administration, He gives them absolute freedom to choose their own Temple design, but if they choose something unoriginal, then they will have to copy the American design. It is according to the Master's wish that the third Temple be built in Persia. After Persia will be either Palestine or Germany.

The completion of the Chicago Temple and the start of the first Persian Temple would be wonderful at the beginning of the second Bahá'í Century. The friends have purchased one million square meters of land near Tíhrán for their Temple.

The first Temple is on a plain, the second by a lake and the third will be one a mountain side. The dependencies of the Temple are the administrative social and humanitarian side of the Cause. Worship and service are both symbolized in the Temple institution and dependencies of the Cause.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is a place of prayer and meditation, even the Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh are quite out of place there.

The important thing is for the rich people to contribute to the extent of sacrifice. The rich give out of their abundance — but do they sacrifice? They should make some sacrifice, to forego some material comfort or benefit, some degree of sacrifice. When there is an element of sacrifice, however small, that contribution has a great spiritual effect. It is not only that the rich give more, it makes the element of sacrifice universal. Two requirements: it should be wholly supported by believers and entail sacrifices from rich and poor, then the Temple will exert a tremendous influence. Otherwise the influence will not be as great. It comes in a mysterious way both materially and spiritually: giving. {{p20}} If a contribution of one dollar has a great sacrifice behind it, and someone has given ten thousand dollars, the one dollar, if the sacrifice is greater, is greater.

SPECIFIC REFERENCES TO CERTAIN NATIONS

American Germany Egypt Jews Palestine Persia France Czechoslovakia Russia Canada

Missions of Certain Nations.

The Egyptian Bahá'ís mission is to establish the Cause in Abyssinia, Sudan and Central Africa, thus uniting with South Africa and establishing a chain across Africa, just as the American Bahá'ís mission is to carry it to South America. {{p21}} The Persian's mission is Afghánistán, Baluchistan and Russia. The mission of the Irak Bahá'ís is to establish the Cause in Arabia, Yemen, Hijáz and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. China and Japan fall under the care of the Indian Bahá'ís and also the Americans, Germany, Scandinavia and the Balkans.

Research for the Germans, execution for the Americans, contemplation for the Persians.

America.

The relation of children to parents and wives to husbands is too extreme in America.

The loyalty of the American believers is marvellous, exemplary. Germany is following, but we cannot say that of England. Our weak point (Americans) is race. The friends must not seek popularity, criticism is often good for the Cause.

The faults of America are lawlessness, prejudice and corruption. The salvation of America lies in her close association with the Nations of the world. Wilson in a way could not but fail; a man who is ahead of his times is doomed to failure. Wilson was inspired, not only through what he may have read from the Bahá'í books. He was an instrument of God's purpose. It is through Wilson's efforts that the dawn of the Most Great Peace has broken, but its sun will shine and appear through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. He clarifies these things so that the believers may have the courage to state these things. To realize that Wilson was misunderstood by this generation, who were unfair to him. The Bahá'ís who do not accept what the Master said about Wilson are fearful, of little faith, like the Muḥammadans who changed the text of the Qur'án to agree with the Ptolemaic system — (see "Explanations of the Sacred Writings." [Vol. I page 30 paragraph 4] ) When the American people realize they must participate in world affairs, they will have a greater appreciation of Wilson. Through his (Wilson's) efforts the dawn of universal peace will arise. Wilson was the greatest man of his generation. He stood for a very high principle, but he failed to achieve it.

The Bahá'ís in America, due to the fact that they are tainted with race prejudice — and he understands this because of the general prejudice in America — overestimate the effect of public opinion. In Germany the prejudice is the Jews, in England against the lower classes, the commoners. We should associate informally, but not always on public platforms. {{p22}} Regarding races and other prejudices, we must discriminate in our association and attract the better elements. (Referring to Louise and Louis Gregory's marriage.) The Master brought it about, was not what He did right? Can we criticize His actions? Is not He our example? But let them do what the Master did occasionally, just to stir people up. He didn't do these things every day, we must follow Him. The friends are only scratching the surface now with trembling hands. The thing to remember is that in spite of the imperfect instruments, the Cause is forging ahead.

Among new problems in America our most important one is non-participation in Political bodies, non-partisan political posts. Political offices are not to be accepted, etc. With political societies we must not accept affiliation, but association is good.

There is a great danger in America (in the Cause) to crystallize something that is fluid, tentative.

Considers that the Munroe doctrine has become obsolete. America cannot isolate herself from the world situation. America, to save herself and the world, must unite herself with the world and Europe. The sooner the better. The American Bahá'ís, like the believers of every other country, have become to a certain extent prejudiced by the traditional thoughts of their country. (Quoted Master's words to Congressman in "Goal of a New World Order.") Japan and Europe, on either side of America, will come closer and closer, she will find herself forced to adjust her relations to them. America will have to associate as closely with Europe as England has to the Continent. Science will force this to happen.

It is for the National Spiritual Assembly of America to appoint a committee to study where, in what States and how they can help the Negroes and work in such a way as to not antagonize the whites and help the Negroes.

The Persian believers, the Dawn Breakers, have ushered in the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh, now the American believers are ushering in the civilization of Bahá'u'lláh. The American believers chief mission is to usher in [usher in?] this civilization. They are the spiritual descendants of the Dawn Breakers, and usher in what they have commenced.

The Most Great Peace implies the political association of the United States with Europe. Has hopes that the United States will take the initiative after the coming war of establishing the true League of Nations. Any Bahá'í that thinks America will help the world by staying out of European affairs is acting contrary to the Spirit of the teachings on the subject. (See Master's words to a member of Congress on the subject in: "Goal of a New World Order.") When we say our salvation is in keeping aloof, it is exactly contrary to the Master's words. The very fact that the American people are now acting so differently from the Master's teachings may lead to a great reaction after the coming war and they may take the lead. We should observe without being misled the thought and tendencies of our nation. {{p23}} He believes we are quite wrong in being afraid to adopt [adapt?] the Constitution of the United States. The economic changes require its change and modification. He should not be surprised if the United States became in future a unitary State, like Germany. In the United States principles are following personalities and not personalities following principles.

GERMANY

Germany is half Oriental, hence the Master's reference to them as being like the Persian Bahá'ís.

Anti-Semitism is a disease. Germany is the center of modern philosophy which is based on Socrates' wisdom who received it from the Jewish Prophets. The German Bahá'ís must accept this sequence: divine revelation from the Prophets of Israel; Socrates expounding them, the German philosophers elaborating Socrates.

Frankfort A/M will become in future the center of the national Bahá'í institutions. Stuttgart is like the Chicago of Germany: the oldest center. Berlin will become like the New York of Germany.

The Germans are too analytical, too inquisitive. It is good to be analytical but not too analytical.

The German race is a very promising race, they have a great future both materially and spiritually. Scandinavia is already receiving help from Germany, (Bahá'í) the Balkans from Germany. The knights of Bahá'u'lláh, the warriors of the Faith. But they must give up their pagan gods. He thinks the Germans may be able to help the Russians too. We have no Bahá'ís in Russia proper. The ones in Moscow dispersed after the revolution; in Caucasus and Turkistan there are believers, mostly Persian.

Germans are a happy medium between the East and the Far West. They are not as crude as the Orientals and not as sophisticated as the Far West. Munich and Innsbruck will act as links between Vienna and Germany. Salzburg, Munich and Vienna are important centers and should become vital spiritual centers. They are destined to be powerful Bahá'í centers in the future. What we need are the young men in Germany who will enter the administration and seize the reins, battalions. A Bahá'í — a teacher — especially an International one, must teach the principles of the Cause, both spiritual and administrative. Germany will be the focal center of the spiritual forces, they will radiate from Germany to Europe. In Sofia, the one who really established the Cause (in Bulgaria) Herr Benke, was a German. Leipzig has already rendered a historical service in that Herr and Frau Benke established the Cause there and Herr Benke died there. Similar to Keith, sacrificing in a foreign land and dying there. So we see numbers do not count, it is the vitality of their souls rendering great services. {{p24}} German Bahá'ís must not get the tendency of making too many laws, copying the system of their Government, making it too rigid — the administration of the Cause — being a slave of conventions and rules. The Bahá'ís must pray for their government, nor must they think this implies criticism or otherwise, if the N.S.A. tells Assemblies to pray for the Government this does not imply the Government is wrong and we are praying for correction. We must be clear in explaining a ruling or instruction when it is given.

He does not think the German believers help the Austrian believers enough in sending teachers and corresponding more frequently. When we do anything under false pretenses we are violating the principle laid down by the Master of loyalty to Government, (regarding the crossing of the frontier on an excuse, not the real reason.) The friends seem to think (not specifically just Germany,) that because a Government may be unjust or corrupt or dishonest, it changes their attitude of loyalty towards it. We must be loyal to any established form of government.

The North German centers must try and send at least one or two friends, delegates and non-delegates, to the Convention. The N.S.A. could perhaps arrange to help with train fare from the Northern Centers; the National Fund could easily defray this expense. On one hand we must emphasize the authority of the N.S.A. and on the other hand it is not infallible. It has taken almost fifteen years to establish the Administration in Germany. Germany had to have something equivalent to Dr. Khayru'lláh in America. Germany did not have this until after the Master's passing, with Herrigal. In their teaching work there must be no hesitation whatever in going ahead with the fireside meetings, these, as they exist in America, are excellent. Publicity is unwise at present. Dresden is a very important center, the first thing is to have a local assembly there.

Nurnberg is also important. Hanover should also have a center and Konigsberg in East Prussia. East Prussia is very important.

Centralization is now amounting to persecution in Germany. Hitler is under the influence of the extremes, whether military or regarding religion. Germany will remain a unitary state. {{p25}} Her destiny is to join the larger whole — Europe.

EGYPT

All courts in Egypt which deal with marriage, divorce, inheritance etc. are religious; Jewish, Christian or Muhammadan. Islám has now pronounced the Bahá'í Faith not a sect of itself but a separate religion believing in different founders, hence the Bahá'ís now have in these matters no local recourse. All Bahá'ís marrying now can only do so under the marriage certificate of the S.A. which has as yet no legal status, hence legally they do not exist. As missionaries are continually circulating the claim that we are an off-shoot of Islám, a sect of Islám, this denial of Islám and her casting us off officially is a great proof that we are not an Islámic sect. Islám is now doing in spite of us what the Bahá'ís should have achieved long ago but were too timid and hesitating.

The declaration of trust, a petition, and excerpts from the laws of the Aqdas, have been given to the Egyptian Government three years ago, but they refused to reply. The first step has been taken, the enemies of the Cause, the Muslim leaders, have proclaimed our independence — we should have done this. The Egyptian Bahá'ís difficulty is that they have no civil courts in Egypt. The authorities can either give us our religious court rights or tell us to go back to the old relationship with the Muslim ones, they may also, in the meantime establish civil courts. He hopes this will not be done, as he wishes our recognition as an independent religion with full rights.

The N.S.A. of Egypt is the first to own legal property in its name in the East.

JEWS

The Zionists constitute a political movement. We should be very careful what we say regarding the prophecies in order that the Jews may not think that we sympathize or partake of their political aspirations. If we should show that passage (page 76 “Answered Questions”) “All Palestine will become their home,” to a Jew, a Muhammadan would say we are political. But in America it would be a great help in attracting the Jews to show them this passage written 40 years ago also a help in Germany. Believes the Jews will overflow in part of Syria and Trans-Jordania.

The Jews threaten that if the different Governments do not help regarding their regaining a Fatherland, they will promote revolution.

The Zionist Jews are a majority; they are in sympathy with the Cause. There is a section in the University library in Jerusalem devoted to Bahá'í literature from all countries. They are friendly toward the British Government who has helped them to establish a National Home. {{p26}} (See “Answered Questions,” page 76, “All Palestine will become their home.”) Other Jews, (a minority in a Jewish state) are against the British Government and the Bahá’ís.

Hitler’s policy is another link in the chain of the destiny of the Jews. The Balfour declaration made it possible for the Jews to build a home. The British Government drove away the Turks and the Mandate made it possible for the Jews to come.

PALESTINE

Sir Herbert Samuel said he believed Palestine could support six millions. Now the population is a little over one million. There are about 13 or 14 million Jews in the world. Now if they concentrate on a small country like Palestine, think of the possibilities. In Gleanings, page 116-117 refers to the future, also “Spread thy Skirt, O Jerusalem” refers to the Christian Revelation, and when it spreads over the Jordan symbolizes it will reveal itself more fully through the Bahá’í Revelation, extending the bounds of previous Revelations. The Jews will be instrumental in laying down the material foundation which the spiritual structure of the Cause requires. The Jews are doing this for Palestine with Jewish blood, Jewish money and Jewish personnel.

There are two great forces working hand in hand to prepare this country for what it is going to become which is the world administrative center of the Cause, the British administration and Government, and Jewish capital and enterprise. The publicity which the Cause will attain here in the future through the visits of princes, prominent figures, etc., will open the eyes of the Jews to the Cause’s importance and they will accept it. The war was the first, then the Balfour declaration and now Hitler’s policy are the three factors in sending the Jews back to Palestine. The war made it possible for the British Government to be established in Palestine, to drive away the Turks. The Balfour declaration made it possible for the Jews to come and establish their home, Hitler is a means of making them migrate.

One of the benefits of the last war was the Jews’ return to Palestine. Unlikely that Palestine will become a Jewish nation. There are three kinds of prophecies related to Palestine: one is fulfilled by Bahá’u’lláh’s coming to Palestine, to Haifa and ‘Akká. The second is the return of the Jews, this is in the process of fulfillment. The third is the establishment of universal peace, this is not yet fulfilled.

Haifa in the future will be the terminus of three great railway lines. To the south it will go to Cairo, then through Central Africa to Capetown. {{p27}} To the East to Calcutta, direct line from here to Baghdád, then across Persia to Afghánistán and then to Calcutta. A north line going to Beirut, Aleppo, Constantinople and linking with the European route to Calais, and the Jews have been raised up by God to construct such a material center. After 2000 years of punishment the boundy [bounty?] of God will allow them to do this. England and the Jews are instruments raised by God to bring about the development of Palestine. The money of the Jews and the order of the British Government, law, order and experience in administration, and the well-known financial power of the Jews. This was foretold by the Master 40 years ago: "all Palestine will become their home." They will become the envy and admiration of their friends and their foes. This does not mean they will have a political state here, but a cultural one.

The Port of Haifa cost one million pounds, the money was raised in London and guaranteed by the British Government.

Haifa is the nerve center of the Cause. The more powerful the center the greater the tests. Anything in the Bahá'í World that happens is immediately felt here and vice versa.

The Bahá'ís should be very appreciative of all that the British Government has done for us here at the World Center of our Faith, ever since the British occupation of Palestine. Mount Carmel is the heart of the world and the Shrine is in the heart of that heart. Haifa is the heart of the world geographically; it is the meeting place of three Continents — Europe, Asia and Africa. 'Akká and Haifa are the twin cities. They will be joined in the future. 'Akká is the heart of the Faith, the Qiblih of the Bahá'í Faith. The Arabs and the missionaries are against the Cause and make obstacles for it.

PERSIA

Bahá'u'lláh says that Arabic and Persians [the Arabic and Persian languages?] are like milk and honey. Bahá'u'lláh has set an example to the Persians in matters of language and style. This present generation in Persia is much too overwhelmed by the forces of nationalism to overcome the corruption of the language.

The state of emancipation (of Cause) in Persia and Irak will come when the state and church become separate.

Believes that the establishment of the administration in Persia is due to Keith's stirring them up spiritually. She died before seeing this achieved. Persia has 600 local Spiritual Assemblies. The National Spiritual Assembly has divided the entire country into 21 administrative units from which 95 delegates for the convention are elected. Truthfulness, the Persians are very weak in this respect. It is due to Sa'dí; (the poet) he has corrupted the Persian character. The principles of his philosophy are un-Bahá'í. {{p28}} (The Guardian copied out the following verse as an example of this:

"A lie which serves a particular interest is better than the truth which causes turmoil." Sa'dí.

FRANCE

After Lyons is an assembly, Lucienne must be sent elsewhere to establish a third S.A., and then he guaranteed France will have a National Spiritual Assembly. Then the French can take part in the international elections for the House of Justice. This does not mean a Bahá'í from France could not be elected to it in any case, but France would have no part in the elections. The elected members to the International House of Justice are to be chosen from the whole Bahá'í world. The important thing is to establish a local Spiritual Assembly in Lyons and see that it does not disintegrate.

France has to play her share in the great federation of nations, she is a great nation and has a vital part to play, an important share to contribute to the world civilization which Bahá'u'lláh will create. Germany, England, France, Russia, in the order of their future importance. First is national civilization, such as England and France have and Germany is developing, then comes European and Pan-American civilization, and then comes world civilization, world unification.

(To Mother) What she has done in Paris is the introduction of the Cause to the latin races.

Terrible corruption in French politics. Sooner or Later there may be revolt. Corruption may lead to revolt and civil war. The Communists are ready to ferment a civil war. They are more active in fermenting a civil war than in a larger war. As soon as they find factions, they work to create a civil war.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Czechoslovakia has a great future in the Cause, he is sure of that. {{p29}} There is relatively little prejudice there.

The President of Czechoslovakia is a great admirer of the Cause.

RUSSIA

The Soviet Government published, three or four years ago, a pamphlet against the Cause. The Government, by attacking the Cause, its spiritual and social principles, was distributing the knowledge of the teachings. They claim that religion fosters superstition, also they believe in equality and we don't [Editor's note: See Vol. II page 31 paragraph 11]; the Master referred to society as an army needing generals, captains, privates, etc. The authorities have required the Bahá'ís for a number of years to not vote by secret ballot in their elections, which they obeyed, but now they have modified their constitution and allow the Bahá'ís to vote by secret ballot. The Bahá'ís now rent the Temple from the Government, who claim to be its legal owners. Many Bahá'ís have been imprisoned, deported and sentenced to death by the Government. He communicated with the American N.S.A. who through the Ambassador to Russia received commutation of the death sentence; (See "Bahá'í World.") There are a lot of Bahá'ís in Ṭihrán now who may not return to Russia. In Russia it is improving; in Persia getting worse. This is a stage in the evolution of the Cause.

CANADA

Canada will in the future have her own National Spiritual Assembly provided she is not politically united with the United States; {{p30}} she only needs to get strong enough to have one.

A canadian summer school would be a good thing, but the N.S.A. must be first consulted as to its locality, etc.

GENERAL TOPICS

The National Spiritual Assembly of Egypt is incorporated as a commercial, not a religious body.

We should use the name of Ṭáhirih in referring to her and not Qurratu'l-'Ayn. {{p31}} She translated the writings of the Báb from Arabic into Persian.

The Íqán was not written in one night.

We must always tell the truth, our first purpose we must say, in visiting Haifa is to visit our World Center, our sacred Sites, no reference to personalities. So when the Persian Bahá'ís say this they do not receive permission, but this is only temporary. "Tablet, revealed word, and revelation" should be confined to the writings of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh and not applied to the Master's writings.

Shoghi Effendi was asked if it were not a waste of time to devote oneself to Art in these days, and he agreed that, unless one had genius, it should only be a pastime.

(In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "A / See / B / And / C") The New Commonwealth Society in England is perhaps the nearest to the Cause of any society, yet he has asked the friends not to identify themselves with it. He is having a newspaper clipping on the New Commonwealth Society translated into Persian for the Haifa Newsletter.

Ruth White sent a letter and cheque to the High Commissioner of Palestine, asking him to investigate the Master's will. He returned the cheque and said it was a purely private matter and she must hire a lawyer.

First Bahá'í school in Palestine is organized now in Adasiyyih. They are Zoroastrian Bahá'ís, they learn three languages, Persian, Arabic and English.

At the Shrines they have given out thousands of copies of pamphlets, but never one unless it was asked for.

Don't refer to the name of the system, Communism, Fascism, Nazi, etc., directly but indirectly; not by name and not to its political leader, but to general principles and compare them with ours such as that equality is impracticable in society and this is a rejection of communism, (in teaching and public.)

(In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “B / See / A / And / C”) Regarding membership in W.S.D.A.P. Frauenschaft. Even the New Commonwealth Society in England, which is far nearer the ideals of the Cause than any other group, he has dissuaded very strongly the friends from joining. They may associate with groups if they like, exchange speakers, etc., but there must be no affiliation with either religious, political or social organizations. {{p32}} With scientific, humanitarian, industrial, educational and civic affairs we can affiliate.

What we really require are endowments for teaching to enable people to settle, travel and teach etc.

The superficialities of the West are spreading in the East.

The Dunns established a pillar of the universal House of Justice in Australia. We need workers in Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Baltic States, Finland, Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia.

To us (Bahá'ís) the cross is a sacred symbol of the sufferings of Jesus, we do not worship it as the Christians do, we revere it.

He always encourages people to settle, not in favor of these short visits and voyages. Martha Root is an example of an itinerant teacher. The Dunns as settlers are exemplary. Mr. and Mrs. Dunn are unique in what they have achieved in Australia. They had no work and were friendless; they read the Divine Plan, sold their property in California and went to Australia and now we have centers in all the leading cities of Australia and in addition they have established a National Spiritual Assembly and have incorporated most of their local assemblies. India and Burma have all their National Spiritual Assemblies incorporated.

Asked whether the treatment of sexual perverts by imprisonment was right, Shoghi Effendi replied it was no use, that they must be converted, spiritual reform must take place.

Shoghi Effendi has received to date 12 volumes of Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb and the Master, all authenticated by the local assemblies from Persia, etc.

The “Bahá'í Scriptures” are full of mistakes.

The shrine of the Greatest Holy Leaf will be the future center of the international buildings.

No buildings will ever be erected around the Shrine of the Báb, as a sign of respect. The Government has been assured that this land will never be sold, rented or built upon, hence they have made it tax exempt, also all the land from the top to the bottom of the mountain owned by Bahá'ís. The tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, the Mansion, the house of Bahá'u'lláh in ‘Akká and the Garden of Ridván and the Pilgrim House are exempt. These are the only properties in Palestine that are exempt.

All 20 Tablets (to Bahá'u'lláh and the 19 Letters of the Living) reproduced in Nabíl's narrative, were among the Master's papers. How He got them we do not know.

Superstition is the negation of fact, while a miracle is a fact which we can never explain.

One's intention can often be almost as good as the deed itself.

Human motive is never entirely pure, one cannot expect it to be. {{p33}} We must not dwell on or grieve over things we did not do exactly right as it does no good.

Purity of heart, detachment and intention is more important to him than brilliancy of action.

Faith breeds courage, but when it is not well enough grounded it is timid. God's mercy over-shadows all kinds of criminals, even Covenant breakers.

The more teachers we have in Europe the better, He encourages friends to settle in Europe.

There is a tendency to introduce new mysteries into the Cause. We have a few mysteries in the Cause, we must not introduce any man-made ones; in order to satisfy our desires or emotions, we produce mysteries. Sometimes our emotions are bad, they can go too far. A desire is either corrupt or wholesome. But a wholesome desire, a love, a devotion to the Faith which is in itself a wholesome and good thing, even that if not restrained leads us to excesses. What is Fanaticism — it is devotion to the Cause carried to an extreme. Devotion to the Cause, if carried to excess leads to fanaticism. (Bahá'u'lláh refers to this in "Gleanings" Pages 216, 342-3, regarding excess.)

The relation of children to parents and wives to husbands is too extreme in America. Bahá'ís must have the consent of all four parents in marriage, whether the parents are Bahá'í or not. But obedience to parents in all things is not required by Bahá'u'lláh.

We must not identify ourselves with different systems; political beliefs, theories or evolution, etc.

Considers the separation of church and state in England inevitable. The last to fall will be the Catholic Church.

We must expect these things, our tests and trials, and when we get into these states of depression we must have confidence and persevere. It is the effort that one makes that gives one the susceptibility to receive more. Some suffering is self-inflicted, but that is sometimes providential. Martha's faith and effort, daily effort, is a magnet that attracts the confirmations suspended between earth and heaven. It removes the barriers between God and herself. Perseverance in effort will attract the power which will sustain us. Love is the greatest force and the mainspring of all effort.

The grandson of Náṣiri'd-Dín-Sháh came to Haifa and begged, literally begged him, (Shoghi Effendi) to give him an introduction to the National Assembly of Persia. He informed him the Bahá'ís are absolutely non-political, explained their stand on this subject, etc., and the Sháh's grandson went away satisfied, but never came back. {{p34}} The British Government asked the Guardian if this had happened, and he told them the whole story.

Also the grandson of Sulṭán 'Abdu'l 'Azíz, Sayfu'd-Din, called on the Guardian and asked for financial aid. Shoghi Effendi gave it to him — twice, and also gave him Esslemont in the Turkish language, printed in Latin characters. It is astonishing that the grandson of Sulṭán 'Abdu'l 'Azíz should come asking for financial help and the grandson of Náṣiri'd-Dín for political help. 'Abdu'l 'Azíz was the greatest enemy the Cause ever had.

If the followers of Muḥammad-'Alí repent it will be due to the effect of the prayer in the Master's Testament: the prayer was the means of forgiveness, the denouncing of the enemies to point them out for our protection.

Sales Qur'án is the most authoritative, Rodwells, the best.

The statement of Queen Marie, wherein she refers to “the Father” is the greatest test of all to the Christians. Also for Muḥammadans her reference to Christ, Muḥammad and Bahá'u'lláh as Prophets, is tremendous.

Numerology has no organic relation to the Cause but was used by the Seers to foretell the Báb's coming. Numerology, astrology, palmistry, etc., is left to the individuals. They should be left free as far as possible, as long as they don't associate these ideas with the Cause.

Queen Marie is both granddaughter to Queen Victoria and the Czar of Russia, to both of whom Bahá'u'lláh revealed Tablets.

The Íqán was written by the request of the father of the great Afnán (chief builder of the Temple in Ishqubad) who was the maternal uncle of the Báb. He went to Baghdád and asked Bahá'u'lláh certain questions which were answered in the Íqán.

Bahá'í ring stone has B and H on it, the Arabic letters for Bahá. The five pointed star symbolizes the temple of man, head, arms, legs, the body of the Cause. When God willed it, His Revelation appeared “be and it is”. (In a former translation of a prayer it says, “by which the letter kaf was linked with the letter noon.”) Kaf and noon form the word “Kon” which means “be” — be and it is.

Many terms used by Bahá'u'lláh came from the Qur'án, also from the terms used by the Báb, Sun of Truth, Sun of Righteousness, World Order, are terms used by the Báb.

Trade is paralyzed between the nations, this is what makes them poor, politically they are divided, but economically they form an organism. The economists wish to unite the world, the politicians to divide it. Nationalism is causing this.

The standard of living in the East is too low, in the West too high, too much luxury. {{p35}} Germany is half way between. Comfort is different from luxury. He objects to luxury, not comfort. Importance is attached to non — essentials and not essentials. Peoples differ as to what are essentials. It is alright to maintain a high standard when there is not want and destitution around you. People are the slaves of convention, they could reduce their standards and help the poor, but their conventions prevent them — they do not have the moral courage. Germans are a happy medium between East and far West. Not as crude as Orientals and not as sophisticated as the far West.

The “Most Exalted Leaf” is really the correct translation of the title of Khánúm. The word Holy has been added, does not exist in the original. Her resting place has been chosen as the center of the International Institutions, a woman, not a man, has been chosen for this.

Apart from certain restrictions in the teachings, men and women are indistinguishable. As far as the teachings are concerned this is so. It is the immutable law of god and not for us to question; the Imáms, the 12 Disciples, the Prophets in the Mosaic dispensation, etc., were all men. The Guardians are all men. In the West in almost every way, in teaching, in the administration, etc., the women are taking the lead, and this is the Will of Bahá’u’lláh. He would not be surprised if soon the Persian women become like their American sisters: “one of the distinguishing features of the Bahá’í dispensation is that the women are showing more courage, more initiative than the men,” said the Master. We have Bahá’ís now in 40 countries and more than half of these have been opened, have been conquered by the American believers. Most of those who have opened these countries have been women, not men. Jackie in Bulgaria, Agnes in Japan, the Noblocks in Germany, Mrs. Hoagg in Italy, Martha in so many countries, Leonora in South America, Fanny Noblock in South Africa, Mother in Paris, Johnanna Shubarth in Norway, Mrs. Cropper in London, Mother in Canada, not only American believers, but women.

If anyone asks about the equality of the sexes, we must tell them equality, except in certain cases. (The Imáms, the Guardians, etc.)

The 13th Letter of the Living came to ‘Akká and met Bahá’u’lláh. He was the only one who called on Him after He revealed Himself. He also accepted Him.

Characteristic passages of the “Hidden Words,” “The Íqán,” and other books, should be committed to memory. The right quotations made at the psychological moment have a great effect, great power. He does not think the teachers do this enough.

When Bahá’ís have visions and try to get others to act accordingly, it is un-Bahá’í and very dangerous and pernicious. The individual himself is left free in such matters. {{p36}} We must tell them it is mostly imagination, but they are free. However they must not seek to influence others.

He wants the Catholic Church aroused but it must not be done artificially, but through the natural spread of the Cause. We have to combine courage with tact. We must not be unnecessarily provocative.

The Bahá'ís should adopt Esperanto at present as a universal language, even if only a temporary one.

Modern philosophy is based on the teachings of Socrates. Plato enlarged the philosophy of Socrates, Aristotle went further. Even the philosophy which Socrates established was based on the religious teachings of the Prophets of Israel, which proves that the essentials of philosophy were based on religious teachings. Socrates taught the existence of the immortality of the soul. (See same subject under "Germany." [Vol. II page 23])

Regarding violators we must not be fanatical. It is going too far to believe we are contaminated by being in the same room, etc., with them. But we must not associate with them. There is no difference in civil rights. The rights of a violator are as sacred as those of any believer. If we have a business dealing with one we must settle our dealings with him. We must have no dealings with violators, but if circumstances should be such that we happen to have a dealing with one, we must settle it normally and have no future dealings. If they happen to have written a book, either on the Cause or anything else that has a value, we must admit the value of anything they may have accomplished, even if they are against the Cause. If they have rendered any service in any sphere, we must recognize it. "Justice, equity, is loved above all." But that does not mean we must associate with them under any circumstances. Herrigel rendered great services (in Germany) we must admit this, but also see that his later opposition nullified it; it has darkened the record of his previous services. We must not belittle what he did once accomplish, admit what was good and correct, but relate it to what he did later.

(Countries to be opened up to the Cause and developed.) First comes Germany, then the Balkans, then Scandinavia, then Western Europe, then Italy and Spain. Community life is now confined to Germany in Europe. In England it is just a skeleton, just beginning to move. England is similar to France, not as bad but similar. The English are very proud, very dry. They are very shy and conservative in matters of religion. Americans think too much of personality. Principles are not for personalities, personalities are under principles. It is a challenge to the Bahá'ís to rise above their environment, be totally different from it. The believers today are being adapted to the administration it is being imposed upon them. {{p37}} They are not born into it.

Hitler is a national leader, but does not have the sense of world politics that is required — such as Briand's, Stresemann's, who had much greater world vision. Stalin is not a man of principle he is ruthless, unlike Lenin who had principle but whose principle was wrong. First Wilson, the greatest of the men of his generation; he stood for a very high principle, but he failed to achieve it. Second was Lenin, his principle was wrong but he carried it out with great vigour. Third Lloyd George who had no principle, neither right nor wrong. A leader must lead the people and not be led by them, he must have courage.

The trouble with the world is the leaders have great vigour, but their principles are wrong.

The Catholics and the Shí'ahs, the two most dogmatic sects in Christianity and Islám, claim that the study of abstract science is a waste of time.

Haifa Notes and Mary Maxwell

Miss May Maxwell

Jan. — Mar. 1937

Uniformity in principles and essentials and insist, not only allow, insist on diversity in secondary matters. {{p2}} There is a mysterious power within the administration that maintains this uniformity. The Germans tried to get changes for Germany, changes regarding the regime, etc., He just absolutely refused.

If an N.S.A. or local S.A. gives out instructions to teachers or groups, that are against the teachings, we must obey, but we can communicate with the Guardian. If we do not obey the ruling we would be weakening the administration. So the only way is to communicate with the Guardian and he must take it up with the N.S.A. or local S.A.

The duty of every American believer outside the United States is to keep reporting to their N.S.A. Working in German Territory the believers should report to both N.S.A.'s.

Justice in social relations, mercy in individual relations. Facing responsibility is a sort of spiritual sustenance. They (Assemblies) must welcome the difficulties, the problems, and not shrink or transfer them.

There are laws and principles in the Faith and the principles are sub-divided into spiritual and administrative.

The Divine Plan is the soul of the administration, but for the Divine Plan the administration would be stagnant. The administration is the body and now the soul must function in the body, the machinery of the administration. The Temple is an organ of the administration. Now that all these organs have been established the soul must animate the body. Had he (Shoghi Effendi) not stressed the Divine Plan the friends would spend all their time perfecting details of the administration. When this teaching work advances sufficiently a new stage of the administration will be reached which will be international. The "Bahá'í World" should be printed here in Haifa by an International Committee. Then we have to think of perfecting the International Administration.

However destructive, whatever is happening, in some mysterious way is helping us, helping the very administration we are building.

(Answering a question where all nine members of a local Assembly no longer functioned, he expressed this view:) Before everything else they (believers of that particular city) must deal with the situation of the S.A. It must be made complete — 9. The general principle of an Assembly is to be 9. Before everything else, even teaching, the local Assembly must be properly organized and function well. Prefers 15 members in a group and a strong S.A. than a hundred with a poorly working S.A., as it may all disappear over night.

The correct term is the Administrative Order, which will in future become the World Order. The Administrative Order as it functions has its own administration; in other words the machinery which the body of the Cause employs for its own development. Administrative Order is the institution itself, the body of the Cause itself. The Administrative Order is born in the formative period of the Cause, it will evolve until it emerges into the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh in the Golden Age. The system of Bahá'u'lláh has upset the material equilibrium of the world, tremendous power has been released (science) but it will never be properly utilized until the world becomes spiritualized, and this will be done by the spread of the Cause.

Christmas ceases as an institution for us. We do not observe Christmas even as Baptism is quite out of place for us. Bahá'u'lláh has abrogated these sacraments, Communion, Baptism, the celebration of Easter, etc., also New Year. The Zoroastrian and Muḥammadan, Bahá'ís have given up their former religious observances for the Bahá'í observances, why should not the Christian Bahá'ís do the same? We have our own feast days.

The Ordinances of the Church must not be associated with Jesus, they being man — made. A Bahá'í cannot identify himself with an ecclesiastical organization or post, as he then must support the ordinances of the Church.

Regarding membership in Free Masonry, etc., the Bahá'í should withdraw. Also they should ask the N.S.A. regarding membership in other societies, and if the N.S.A. is not aware of the aims, purpose, methods, etc., of a society they must investigate and then guide the individual.

We should refer to qualifications for members of the N.S.A. but never mention personalities, no application to individuals; even if we are asked for our opinion we should say, "I prefer not to mention any names." What we should remember is their qualifications. Almost everything in America is exemplary except their election, (refers to Bahá'í election here) the reason for it is that everything is so corrupt and it influences us, but we must fight against it (we American Bahá'ís.) It is a weak point in our community. That is why the relation of the Convention to the N.S.A. is very delicate; he revolts immediately at any attempt of the N.S.A. to interfere with the rights of the Convention. But if the N.S.A. considered a question and conscientiously decided by majority vote that the Convention shall not discuss such and such a thing, then they must obey (the Convention must.) The Convention ultimately must obey the N.S.A. but all he can do (Guardian) is to appeal to the conscience of the N.S.A. members to deal with the Convention justly. Delegates have the right to ask the N.S.A. to justify itself on any course that has been taken. This is the chief purpose of the Convention, but the N.S.A. has the right to refuse discussion if they feel it is premature or bad for the Cause. As a rule the delegates are free to bring any subject that they wish to the Convention, and it is very very rare that the N.S.A. might interfere or forbid it and their decision must not be prejudiced, they must not abuse that power of deciding if a subject can be discussed or not. It is a very sacred responsibility, especially when the Convention is in session, and to curtail the sacred rights of the Convention, is a great temptation to the N.S.A.

to usurp the rights of the Convention, because ultimate authority abides with them because they have been made the Interpreter of the By-Laws. {{p4}} They must ask themselves that question: Was there a sufficient need in the Cause for them to curtail the rights of the delegates? The friends must not think the N.S.A. does not err. We must not believe that they do not make mistakes — they make lots of them. The Master says they will commit mistakes, but they have to be obeyed even if they do make mistakes. Only the International House of Justice and the Guardian are under the direct guidance of God.

The greater their authority, the more careful they must be in exercising it.

(In answer to the question: Do the local and National Spiritual Assemblies pray enough?) “I would prefer they would curtail the program of the Convention and devote more time to prayer. To realizing they are not infallible. I agree they do not pray sufficiently.” **

We have to discuss the teachings informally among ourselves. But discussion must not lead to controversy. We should encourage one another to express ourselves. We must encourage all classes in the community to express their views; the most humble, the most illiterate, the least significant. Whatever they say we must listen to dispassionately. After all Peter was the most stupid of the Apostles and yet he was the successor.

Eventually all N.S.A.’s will have a Palestine Branch, owning property and this will show our unity and protect the property; also they will have other branches in other nations, giving great solidarity to the Bahá’ís all over the world.

The Bahá’ís must develop their fund until it can help in the community help non — Bahá’í interests, whether scientific, social, humanitarian, etc. The local fund must be divided into two sections: specifically Bahá’í, and community interests. At present this is not possible, but in the future the National Bahá’í Fund will be made up of these two things. If a friend, a non-Bahá’í wishes to contribute to the Bahá’í fund we must make it plain we accept it only for the second or municipal fund. We regard our Temple, Summer Schools, etc., as gifts to humanity. When you give a gift you do not accept money for it from the recipient. We want everyone to know that the Bahá’í institutions are supported by people who whole-heartedly accept Bahá’u’lláh, are believers. This protects the Cause from calumny, misrepresentation, etc. Non-believers are always welcome to give money to the fund for the humanitarian purposes directed by the believers. The Bahá’ís for instance, could establish where there was a need for it, a hospital, one run by them but not for Bahá’ís and not considered as a Bahá’í Institution.

Believers may inquire regarding both spiritual and material affairs from their local and national S.A.’s, encouraged to do so. There must be no interference however, under normal circumstances, in the affairs of the individual on the part of the S.A., but if they ask for help the S.A. must not disappoint them, if they turn to them. {{p5}} The S.A. function is to help the community if they need advice, financial support, help, the S.A. must help, especially if the individual is alone. If appealed to they must settle disputes between individuals and non-Bahá'ís, between families. In Persia they go to one extreme, in America to the other, (in appealing to the S.A.) The S.A. has not only the right but the obligation to settle disputes if referred to them. If the individual, of his own accord, refers the matter to the S.A., they must handle it not shirk it. In Persia the friends go with any problem to the S.A. In America they do not do it enough, particularly if the dispute affects the Cause. The duty of the S.A. is to interfere in order to safeguard the Cause, the interests of the Cause have precedence over the interests of the individual and in such a conflict the individual must abide by the decision of the S.A., besides the S.A. must acquire enough experience to become a Bahá'í Court, a Bahá'í Government in the future. The greater the difficulties the stronger will be the spiritual constitution of the S.A. It nourishes them — the difficulties that arise. The first thing is to face, not shirk responsibilities; second is to base all their verdicts on justice, be animated by justice. Justice and not tempered by mercy. In future they will be called, not the House of Mercy, but the House of Justice. Bahá'u'lláh said: "But for the law of God, I would have kissed the hand of my would-be murderer and would have shared with him a part of my possessions, but the Law of God restrains me, and I have no possessions to share." This is a very significant statement, it indicates that as an individual He is personally inclined to forgive but the Law of God is higher than His Will and restrains Him. Even the Manifestation Himself has to forget His personal inclinations and obey the Law of God. This is an example to local, National and International Houses of Justice. Stability and order are based on two pillars, punishment and reward, and not on forgiveness; He excludes forgiveness. The person who has been injured, aggrieved, harmed, can beg for the forgiveness of his enemy. If on the part of the aggrieved person he pleads for mercy, then the Assembly can take the plea into account. Justice will solve all the problems of the world. "Righteousness and Justice filleth the earth as the waters cover the sea." Referred to in both the Gospels and Islámic tradition. Unerring, undeviating, uncompromising Justice. Nothing can bring the lamb and the lion together unless they are sure justice will rule. The small and big nations will never come together as in the League unless they are sure it is based on Justice.

He does not mind if the N.S.A. knew they can and do err in their judgements. Only the International House of Justice is infallible, under the guidance of God direct.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "B / See A."] The leaders in most of the countries (refers to the Bahá'ís) are weak, the masses are strong. (leaders: members of S.A.'s, etc.) {{p6}} They are often led by the masses without realizing it. But for the reaction of the masses they would have erred more.

The administrators (in the Cause) as a rule have capacity, ability, but their devotion to the Cause, their characters as Bahá'ís, is not as great as some of the others. Some of the others have the devotion, but not the education and experience required for administrators.

If a believer has any doubt as to what constitutes an alcoholic beverage, he must ask his N.S.A. who must enquire of the American Government what their ruling regarding prohibition was.

When the believers refer to the Guardian a decision of the N.S.A., if the question at stake is purely national he must refer it back to the N.S.A. and ask them to reconsider their decision. The N.S.A. must do the same with all local affairs, unless they are very important, refer them back to the local S.A.

The Bahá'ís don't stop to reflect whether their partisanship in some organization might not affect the Cause. Social organizations may or may not be suitable for us to belong to. We should refer these questions to the consideration of our local S.A. The Americans do not do this enough; the Persians too much.

The dangers that surround the Cause in these days are much greater. Ecclesiastical and political economics; these, as the Administrative Order develops, will oppose us more and more, vigorously and openly oppose the Cause. In the early days of the Cause, the Master chose certain individuals to act as an intermediary between the body of the believers, but now that we have the administration, the S.A.'s play this part. It is only logical, this new step has been made. Then one member of an Assembly makes a motion and it is carried, he must not say this was suggested by him, he must only let it be known as a decision of the S.A. Even in cases of teachers doing work, the more they associate their work with an Assembly, the better. He admires the person who, after making a splendid suggestion which was unanimously accepted by the others, leaves the meeting and says the S.A. have decided so and so, and gives no hint that he made it; just as the person who contributes a large sum to the community and does not mention it as being from him. Secrecy is a very bad thing, but some things must be kept absolutely secret 1. The S.A. should decide after a meeting what is secret and then not mention this, but when they come to decide this they should not exercise undue secrecy. They must resist the temptation of undue secrecy. He is the first person to say that the local and National S.A.'s make mistakes, but he is the first also to say that the majority on the S.A. and the whole community must obey their decisions. We believe the International House of Justice is guided, the National and local make mistakes, the International is under the guidance of God. We must not live in a fool's paradise by thinking all their decisions (local and National S.A.'s) are guided.

[^] Editor's note: see Vol. 2 page 8 paragraph 4 regarding confidentiality, and page 12 paragraph 3 regarding demands for disclosure by the authorities in Russia.

When a spiritual Assembly is established, they can then establish the 19 Day Feasts. The S.A. is the first Bahá'í institution in any locality, before its establishment they can hold meetings with non-Bahá'ís, but as soon as the S.A. is established they start the 19 Day Feasts for believers only. {{p7}} They can hold meetings before the establishment of the S.A., on the feast day, but it cannot be considered a 19 Day Feast. They must not be too harsh, if a non-believer happens to come to a 19 Day Feast we must not force him to leave. But generally the Feasts are for believers only.

But for our prejudice the progress of the Cause would have been much more rapid. (racial, etc.) If someone wishes to become a believer and accepts the station of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb, the Master, and the Administrative Order, and all this implies, and they conscientiously make an effort to approach the standard of Bahá'u'lláh, we cannot ask more. Character has nothing to do with membership; if a person is willing to do their very best and strive, it is a question of good will. We should be satisfied with the bare statement, the resolution.

The 19 Day Feast is not something we have to be too rigid about, (attendance of Bahá'ís.)

Obedience to the N.S.A. and S.A. is required, even to the sacrifice of personal conscience. If a local case is reported to the N.S.A. they must ask, is this a local issue? If so, refer it back to the local S.A. The same thing applies to the National and International Body.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "A / See / B"] The rank and file of the Cause influence the spirituality of their N.S.A. by their own progress spiritually. The masses are strong, the leaders are weak, in most of the countries where the Cause is established.

The Bahá'í village as outlined by the Master is a more or less tentative scheme. There is a great danger in America to crystalise something that is fluid, tentative. It has not only 7 revenues but 7 expenditures.

The laws of inheritance were given by the Báb and modified by Bahá'u'lláh. He changed the percentage inherited by the children to 1/3 and thus increased the share of the children.

The Bahá'ís own one million dollars' worth of property on Mount Carmel, one quarter of this is owned by the American N.S.A., about 35 acres. Muḥammad-'Alí's son, Moussa Bahá'í, had to sign all the deeds which went to America as he is on the land commission. When they wanted to transfer the property in the name of the N.S.A. of America, through a power of attorney, Moussa Bahá'í said the N.S.A. was not recognized legally in Palestine. Shoghi Effendi went to a lawyer, who recommended forming a Palestine Branch. A new power of attorney was sent and the property transferred. This pilgrim house (Western) belongs to the N.S.A. of America, also a plot of land near 'Akká. Shoghi Effendi's plan is to have all the N.S.A.'s of the Bahá'í world own property here on Mount Carmel. This will impress the authorities and protect the property. The "endowments of the Bahá'í Faith in America" would be a better name than "property of." There are National, International and local endowments. {{p8}} The endowments here in Haifa ('Akká, etc.,) are International. The Temple, etc. is a National endowment, and local endowments must also be obtained. The Ḥaẓíratu'l-Quds is the Administrative center for a city. The N.S.A. should move their headquarters to Chicago — C (See D.) — and call it the National Headquarters of the Bahá'í Faith. The Temple is a spiritual building. The Ḥazíratu'l — Quds is only one of the dependencies of the Temple. In future this will be built up. In the Temple only prayers will be offered and meditations in the form of prayer. Prayers from the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Qur'án, the Bible, etc., but only holy prayers and meditations.

As to music in the Temple, he is awaiting a tablet of the Master, written to the Bahá'í of 'Ishqabád on this subject. The S.A. of Ṭíhrán have bought 500 acres of land for a Temple. Now they must find an original design. If in Persia they cannot create something original, then instead of copying a former architectural style, they may have to copy the Chicago Temple.

The trouble with Greenacre is that it was an institution established before the Administration, it then had to be adopted, whereas Geyserville is a child of the administration. All Summer Schools are National institutions and should be owned by the N.S.A. Now is the time for the friends to offer if they feel the urge, local endowments, no matter how small; real estate or building or a fund, to the local incorporated S.A.'s. None as yet have local endowments. Now that the National endowments amount to over two million dollars, it is time the local endowments were made. — An N.S.A. can decide if an endowment is local or National. — In India it has already been done (local endowments.) It is preferable the endowments should be unlabelled. An endowment could take the form of a local headquarters. He thinks now the friends are justified in communities, especially where they are incorporated, to support the local fund and give it favour. It is a great service to the Cause to have local endowments established.

Every effort should be made by the local Assemblies to solve their own problems and not refer them to the N.S.A. He thinks contributions to the local fund should be as secret as voting. Is it necessary even for the treasurer to know? The name and amount of the contribution should be kept a secret by the local and National Spiritual Assemblies. There is nothing to be ashamed of in calling certain things a secret in a Spiritual Assembly. Secrecy [confidentiality?] is sometimes necessary for the efficient conduct of Bahá'í affairs. They must be secret in the true sense of the term. There is a danger, however, of introducing an atmosphere of secrecy into an Assembly, which would be very bad. He prefers that contributions should not be given at 19 Day Feasts, and if they are given, be kept a secret. We must learn to be discreet. The treasurer must keep nothing private, the unity of the Spiritual Assembly must be complete in all matters. There is too much National organization in the United States and not enough local. Why have they incorporated local Spiritual Assemblies? {{p9}} To enable them to own property. Then why should not a local S.A. seek exemption from taxation on grounds of a place of worship? When a local community becomes the owner of a tax — bearing piece of land, etc., it stimulates it to meet taxation, to carry the burden. All local Spiritual Assemblies in the United States must eventually incorporate. First, have By-Laws copied on the New York Communities By-Laws then incorporate, then transfer property which becomes local endowments, then manage this property. This should be done in all local Spiritual Assemblies. If they cannot raise taxes, etc., why not apply to the Government and say this is not only an administrative headquarters, but a place of worship? If he, Shoghi Effendi, is pleased by local endowments, then why shouldn't a local S.A. have its Palestine Branch and own property here? It will neutralize the localization of power.

Individuals who wish to add to a Bahá'í institution can specify what they would like the money to be used for, but at the same time leave the N.S.A. free to decide and be willing to do so, and accept the N.S.A.'s decision gladly.

In every country the National Bahá'í Administration must come first and then the local (i.e., a National Temple, magazine, summer schools, etc., before the local ones.)

Geyserville is the child of the administration and reflects the spirit of the administration impersonally. This is essential, to the administration, that the Summer Schools should not be a burden to the National Fund. The National Fund must be fed by publications, summer schools, local funds, etc., and then go to the teaching fund, etc., and not vice versa.

Geyserville is an example to all summer schools, the way they have effaced themselves (those responsible for it.) Although they have financed the whole thing, committees do everything. An individual should offer his property to the Cause and then be satisfied with the way the committee handles it — be entirely severed from it.

The oneness and the wholeness of mankind are good to refer to. When we refer to unity we must be careful not to give the impression we mean uniformity, unity in essentials, diversity in non-essentials.

He thinks the Archives in the future will have a part that will be shown and a part that will not be shown, but the whole institution is under the N.S.A. Every believer who presents something to the Archives, should have it done in his name, the name of the giver — unless he does not wish it — the name of the person, town, and the country should be connected with the gift. Personalities should be given due recognition so long as they do not weaken or confuse the operation of the administration or a vital principle of the administration. Files, books, relics, etc., will not all be shown. Eventually there will be a local Archives in every nation, village and town; even in every hamlet there will be an Archives. {{p10}} We must not require individuals to offer their relics but urge them, when they do offer them, to offer their relics without making any conditions such as where they will be exposed, if they shall be exposed or not, etc. There should be no pressure, even no hint, brought to bear on the individual to give their relics.

What the friends have not yet got in the West is a National Headquarters; one division a meeting place for the N.S.A., another division Archives, another for its Convention. The ideal thing would be to shift it to Chicago, — D. (See C.) — under the shadow of the Temple. The N.S.A. must first decide if it is practical to shift from New York to Chicago and then decide on the site, etc. There are three reasons why it should be in Chicago; first, the first Temple of the West is there; second, the first group of Bahá'ís was in Chicago; and third, it is the geographical center of America; just as Haifa is the heart of the world geographically, it is the meeting place of three continents: Europe, Asia and Africa.

He does not consider a local Bahá'í news wrong if they have first contributed to the National Fund; then to the local teaching work and the local administrative activities. Then if they have done all this and have a certain amount of money left, there is no reason why they should not have a local newsletter.

The N.S.A. of America is a model in regard to the way they keep in close touch with isolated believers. The friends must realize that not until the national institutions function and acquire both the administrative and spiritual capacity to elect the International House of Justice, can this election be held, especially is this true of newly organized countries. The administration is not enough, we must have the spiritual foundation. The Guardian said; "They send me my co-workers, I have no voice in it, I must give them full liberty, I have no voice in their election and have no right to intervene." Such a body is elected by the N.S.A.'s direct. Nor the Guardian, nor the delegates, nor the individual, have any right in this election. They must (the N.S.A.'s) do it conscientiously, think of the Cause alone, elect the most qualified irrespective of their country, even if they all come from one country. It is quite unique, nothing like it has ever been attempted before. His task is to watch very carefully that they do not get out of their sphere of activity, legislation. This is solely his responsibility: to define what is legislation. If the Master has said such and such must be done it is binding regardless of the fact it is not written by a Manifestation of God.

The principle is this: do not restrict the freedom of the individual unless the Manifestation has done it, and when he has laid down something, then by all means enforce it. There is nothing in the teachings for or against contraceptives. But Bahá'u'lláh has said the primary purpose of marriage is to have children. All these details are questions for the International House of Justice to decide. If there are States in the United States that require both civil and ecclesiastic marriage, then, through the N.S.A. we could state that we are not church members, and make an effort to obtain their consent of our use of a Bahá'í marriage certificate. {{p11}} In other words, it must be done by the National Spiritual Assembly, who could communicate with the Guardian on the subject, etc.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "E / See / F"]
 The Bahá'ís think that the spirit suffers by coming in contact with non-Bahá'í experts, on the contrary, it benefits.

The legal committee is one of the most important to protect the Cause. The legal committee should have an advisory committee of legal experts, non-Bahá'ís.

In fact many Bahá'í committees will need expert advice and they in turn must report to the N.S.A. They must not believe they will be guided, they must have expert advice, — F. (See E.) — and they must not feel that a non-Bahá'í cannot advise Bahá'ís. The consciousness of the orthodox element in the Cause has been banished by the administration. Both elements have made concessions. The orthodox element in the Cause gave the Master a station equal to the Manifestation, the liberal gave him practically no station or a confused one. The old problems have disappeared and now there are a new set of problems; the relation of the Cause as it evolves within the state. The first stage of oppression and persecution is passing, we are now in the second stage of emancipation. The stage of recognition will be the third stage. He has thought about this but not yet written about it. Oppression (persecution,) emancipation, recognition.

We are now in the second stage. When the Egyptian, Indian, or Persian Government accepts a Bahá'í Court, we will enter the third stage, recognition by civil authorities. When the International House of Justice is established, the formative period will be over.

Unification can only be established on a basis of equality. In the United States a small state has its rights just the same as a large state: equality. East and West, large and small powers, must all come together on a basis of equality. The West is declining, the East advancing. The Bahá'ís in Persia are being opposed because the Government thinks they are planning one day to seize power. We never use force, violence is against our principles, we never use it. {{p12}} The end does not justify the means, we never lie to protect the Cause, because the Cause is based on truth and we must never revert to a method which is against the Cause to promote it. Immediately an institution, Islámic or Christian, begins to oppose the Cause it will release the forces that will lead to its own disintegration. Opposition strengthens the Cause and precipitates the down-fall of those who attack it. These are the two effects, whether religious, political or individual, in nature of attack.

In Persia the Bahá'í Faith was born, in America the beginnings of Bahá'í civilization. The beginnings of the Bahá'í civilization is the Bahá'í Administration.

The Administration first and foremost is the declaration of Trust which is international and applies to all countries. Whatever is not therein is secondary. Non-voting in political matters is universal. The German N.S.A. should have circulated a copy the American N.S.A.'s ruling in this matter. The Bahá'ís must not vote when their vote will identify them with a particular political party. There are things in the Nazi program that are splendid, but when we cannot wholly support a political party, then we cannot give it our support. If the Government should force the Bahá'ís to vote they must obey, but if it should force them to recant they must never do so. There is a difference between something that affects the progress of the Cause and something that affects its integrity. Even to the forbidding of the N.S.A. we should obey. Would it humiliate the Cause? No. But if one individual recants it is more humiliating to the Cause than to have all the institutions of the Cause forbidden. In Russia the authorities went to the members of the S.A. and said you must give us a detailed report, secretly, of all your S.A.'s transactions. The Russian Bahá'ís refused, Shoghi Effendi said they did wrong, they had nothing to deny, to be afraid of, they would only be telling the truth.

The Bahá'ís live in 40 countries all of which are opposed to each other. If the Bahá'ís identify themselves with the policy of one Government, the other Governments are displeased with the Bahá'ís.

An incident occurred in Moscow illustrating this: The central authorities summoned an S.A. member and said: "We have heard there are many Bahá'ís in Tīhrán, also some in the Persian Foreign Office, is this so?" At that time Persia and Russia were opposed to each other. The Russian Bahá'í guaranteed that no Persian Bahá'ís were in any way employed in political posts. This action (assurance) saved the destruction of the Temple in 'Ishqabád, and the assurance of our non-political stand enabled the friends in Russia to have more freedom.

If our government forbids us to teach the Cause, we must obey — but never recant. Anything that dishonours the Cause we must not obey, but anything that retards the Cause, we must obey. The only way we can reconcile the "obey our Government" and other things in the Cause is to see whether it is an administrative thing at issue or a spiritual one. {{p13}} We are not ashamed of what might retard the Cause, but we cannot have it humiliated.

If each one followed the dictates of his own conscience in war time, what would happen to the Government? The minority must submit to the majority. We as Bahá'ís advocate this, we must practice it. Even at the front lines there must be no half-hearted loyalty; then we would be traitors. We must go to war if required, if no other way is possible into active service, and there do our duty. If we give the right to the minority to challenge the rule of the majority, and if they, this minority should come into power, then they too must give the minority the right to challenge the majority; this would make society unstable, chaotic. Dictators appeal to the right of conscience and as soon as they come to power they deny that right to the minority who then might feel the same as they did when their party was the minority. Anyone who claims the right to follow his own conscience challenges the stability of society. Majority rule involves the stability of society. This does not mean the minority must not try, through legitimate means, to change and influence the majority; they must try to persuade the majority — let them be preachers. While the minority is carrying out the rule of the majority, they have the right to persuade the majority. When there is 1 against 8, he can try to persuade the 8. A member of a Committee can bring his point to the S.A., who can, if they deem fit, bring it up for discussion at a 19 Day Feast, or let him bring it up himself at the 19 Day Feast. Individuals can write to the S.A. and express their ideas or objections, or criticisms. When the time for election of the S.A. comes, the Community must not be swayed by the outgoing S.A.'s convictions, they, in their functions as electors, are responsible to the voice of their conscience alone. The electors are invested with the authority of independent election; the S.A. of independent decision. Bahá'í elections must be three things: 1, universal: 2, free — no one must influence or be influenced by another — and 3, secret, a written ballot.

The political stand of the Bahá'ís (nonparticipation in politics) was given by the Master first to the Persian Bahá'ís. At that time it would have been premature for the West. How could it be possible for a world-wide community to allow its members to participate in political affairs in other countries, often antagonistic to each other? Shoghi Effendi explained this to the Governor and he quite agreed, saying it would “split the Cause from top to bottom.”

The Bahá'ís have every right to tell their Government, “We do not agree with all your principles,” but this does not prevent our obeying our Government, it does not justify our disobeying them. We are loyal to them although we disagree with them. In other words, all other forms of government are deficient. Communism is militant atheism.

In administrative matters we must obey the Government, in spiritual matters we need not obey. If the Government says don't meet such a person, we must obey. It does not mean we have antagonism towards him, but if the Government requires us to denounce him, speak evil of him, this is violating a spiritual principle. The law may say we discourage you from doing such and such a thing — we need not obey — we must obey what is prohibited. {{p14}} We are weighing the two; discouragement by Government and a spiritual principle.

But as soon as you prohibit it, we obey, (if it does not dishonor the Faith in any way.) We will never obey in violating a spiritual principle, even if the law commands it. If the Government lays down a law that the Bahá'ís must denounce a Jew, we will never do it, but if the Government says we must avoid him, we obey. We must not rely on the Interpretation of others. We must get the text of the law. Who has laid it down? A responsible person? It often happens in Persia that a law is laid down by a self-appointed authority, subordinate officials, etc. This is a corruption — we must be sure of the text of a law. “I must say that the Bahá'ís have not got sufficient courage — but this does not mean they should be unwise.” Look up the law, be sure it is a law. Let them be imprisoned. In spiritual matters we prefer to suffer martyrdom rather than obey our Government. That is why we have had twenty thousand martyrs in Persia. Obedience to the Government in spiritual matters dishonors the Cause, is a stain on the Cause. Let them be put to death — it will create excellent publicity for the Cause provided they are right. It would be a manifestation [humiliation?] for the Cause if they were in the wrong.

We should be ashamed if one individual sacrifices a vital spiritual principle in order to obey his Government, but there is no disgrace when the whole community obeys the government regarding Administrative principles if they close our meetings, forbid our correspondence, etc., we are weakened but not humiliated.

Individuals are free to vote in elections so far as they feel they can do so without riding with any party. His belief is that it is not possible to vote in America without involving identification with a political party, however, he leaves it to the individual to conscientiously decide[.] Party politics, party policies, it is clear we must keep out of. The individual must conscientiously decide if by voting they are not siding with a party, and if this can be done, they are free to vote. The general principle is that we must ride with no party. A Bahá'í can never be a Republican or a Democrat, because when we call ourselves a Republican or a Democrat, it means we sacrifice to the party platform, if there is one item only that does not coincide with the Cause, that precludes our supporting it. We believe in World State Authority, that is one thing that precludes a Bahá'í from supporting any party, because all Governments believe in their national sovereignty. So long as they do not identify themselves with the party in Germany by voting, they may exercise participation in the vote. Participation in the vote in political affairs is different from voting as a man, if we can vote for an individual and not identify ourselves with the party in so doing we may vote. If they vote for Hitler (in reference to the Bahá'ís and the National vote of 1936 in Germany) it means they find him the least objectionable candidate. Although we are not departing from a Bahá'í principle by voting (in manner he specified) it is better not to vote, it is safer not to vote, because it might lead to complications. If a believer cannot make up his mind regarding voting and party complications, he can refer to his local S.A. We are above parties and not against parties. {{p15}} Sooner or later there will be a labor Party in the United States. We cannot belong to that either.

FAST, CALENDAR, HOLY DAYS, Also Abjad System.

Vahid means unity in Arabic (literally “one”.) {{p16}} And the word Vahid has a numerical value of 19, 19x19 Vahids making one Kull-i-shay. The Báb wished to emphasize the unity of God, the unity of the Prophets, the unity of man. Hence He chose this number, 19x19. The nineteen Letters of the Living were to emphasize this idea of unity. The numerical values are according to the Abjad System; each letter of the alphabet having a numerical value. It is Muslim in origin and has no relation to the teachings except that certain prophecies had words which gave dates when marked out according to this system. This was the inspiration of the prophet and not because the system in itself was divinely inspired.

The beginning of the Bahá'í Calendar is the Year 60.

The Bahá'í day starts at sunset, not at midnight, and is like the Muslim system and the Jewish system. If the normal equinox starts one minute before sunset on March 21st, then March 21st is Naw-Rúz, but if it is one minute after sunset, we celebrate the Bahá'í new year on March 22nd, and all the Bahá'í anniversaries as well as the first day of the month will shift accordingly. Our Greenwich time is Tīhrán, when the equinox occurs in Tīhrán will be the criterion for the whole Bahá'í world.

The month of Alláh is the month of the Fast and under all circumstances is only 19 days long, therefore we start our Fast one day later if Naw-Rúz will fall one minute after sunset of the 21st Bahá'u'lláh says. Naw-Rúz immediately follows the last day of the Fast, therefore we must find out before the Fast when it is due; if due the 22nd of March, we begin fasting the 3rd instead of the 2nd of March. Then the intercalary days will have one more. All Bahá'í months have 19 days, any variation is taken up by the intercalary days. 'Abdu'l-Bahá in a letter to a believer in Nayriz has clearly defined our 9 Holy Days. In that same Tablet He says it is not obligatory to celebrate the 28th of November, Day of the Covenant. The Master did not want the friends to commemorate this day on the day the Kitáb-i-'Ahd was revealed, but six months later, in other words, the furthest day from the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. In view of what the Master stated in this letter, Shoghi Effendi says the ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is also not to be regarded as obligatory, a Holy Day, but not a holiday. The question was put to Bahá'u'lláh whether the friends should fast on the birthday of the Báb and of Himself, when they fell during the Fast. He replied no, not to fast on these days. Every thirty three years it shifts around again because these days are the 1st and 2nd days of the lunar month of Muharram. The Master says the question of these differences between dates in Eastern and Western calendars, lunar and solar months, must be settled by the International House of Justice. {{p17}} But Bahá'u'lláh in the Aqdas says that the birthdays of Báb and Himself are consecutive.

HOLY DAYS

First of Ridván Ninth of Ridván Twelfth of Ridván Naw-Rúz Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh Martyrdom of the Báb Birthday of Bahá'u'lláh Birthday of the Báb Declaration of the Báb (Day of the Covenant) (Ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá)

are anniversaries which should be observed, {{p18}} but not days on which work is forbidden.

THE TEMPLE

We must not allow the teaching fund to indefinitely postpone the Temple fund and its completion. {{p19}} The friends must not expect the prophecies of the Master regarding the Temple to be fulfilled until the entire superstructure is completed.

All he asks is that before the lapse of seven years the outside ornamentation be completed. Just that we think of it, not lose sight of it, so we cannot say he did not let us know in time. The Temple must have a body of experts to advise — non — Bahá'í experts — they may have one or two Bahá'í experts, if they are good enough. Three bodies: N.S.A., its Committee and the Committee's advisory body of experts. The Persian Temple will never be even started or considered before the outer ornamentation of the American Temple is finished. The Master referred to the 3rd Bahá'í Temple being in Persia. So it is in the hands of the American believers. The land is bought, but it will not be begun till after the American Temple's exterior is complete.

He would call the Temple and its dependencies the symbol of this new civilization of the Faith. The Faith is the begetter of this new civilization, its symbol, the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Germany is the heart of Europe, Frankfort A/M the heart of Germany. If the German believers are forced to copy the American administration, He gives them absolute freedom to choose their own Temple design, but if they choose something unoriginal, then they will have to copy the American design. It is according to the Master's wish that the third Temple be built in Persia. After Persia will be either Palestine or Germany.

The completion of the Chicago Temple and the start of the first Persian Temple would be wonderful at the beginning of the second Bahá'í Century. The friends have purchased one million square meters of land near Tíhrán for their Temple. The first Temple is on a plain, the second by a lake and the third will be on a mountain side. The dependencies of the Temple are the administrative social and humanitarian side of the Cause. Worship and service are both symbolized in the Temple institution and dependencies of the Cause.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is a place of prayer and meditation, even the Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh are quite out of place there.

The important thing is for the rich people to contribute to the extent of sacrifice. The rich give out of their abundance — but do they sacrifice? They should make some sacrifice, to forego some material comfort or benefit, some degree of sacrifice. When there is an element of sacrifice, however small, that contribution has a great spiritual effect. It is not only that the rich give more, it makes the element of sacrifice universal. Two requirements: it should be wholly supported by believers and entail sacrifices from rich and poor, then the Temple will exert a tremendous influence. Otherwise the influence will not be as great. It comes in a mysterious way both materially and spiritually: giving. {{p20}} If a contribution of one dollar has a great sacrifice behind it, and someone has given ten thousand dollars, the one dollar, if the sacrifice is greater, is greater.

SPECIFIC REFERENCES TO CERTAIN NATIONS

American Germany Egypt Jews Palestine Persia France Czechoslovakia Russia Canada

Missions of Certain Nations.

The Egyptian Bahá'ís mission is to establish the Cause in Abyssinia, Sudan and Central Africa, thus uniting with South Africa and establishing a chain across Africa, just as the American Bahá'ís mission is to carry it to South America. {{p21}} The Persian's mission is Afghánistán, Baluchistan and Russia. The mission of the Irak Bahá'ís is to establish the Cause in Arabia, Yemen, Hijáz and the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. China and Japan fall under the care of the Indian Bahá'ís and also the Americans, Germany, Scandinavia and the Balkans.

Research for the Germans, execution for the Americans, contemplation for the Persians.

America.

The relation of children to parents and wives to husbands is too extreme in America.

The loyalty of the American believers is marvellous, exemplary. Germany is following, but we cannot say that of England. Our weak point (Americans) is race. The friends must not seek popularity, criticism is often good for the Cause.

The faults of America are lawlessness, prejudice and corruption. The salvation of America lies in her close association with the Nations of the world. Wilson in a way could not but fail; a man who is ahead of his times is doomed to failure. Wilson was inspired, not only through what he may have read from the Bahá'í books. He was an instrument of God's purpose. It is through Wilson's efforts that the dawn of the Most Great Peace has broken, but its sun will shine and appear through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. He clarifies these things so that the believers may have the courage to state these things. To realize that Wilson was misunderstood by this generation, who were unfair to him. The Bahá'ís who do not accept what the Master said about Wilson are fearful, of little faith, like the Muḥammadans who changed the text of the Qur'án to agree with the Ptolemaic system — (see "Explanations of the Sacred Writings." [Vol. I page 30 paragraph 4]) When the American people realize they must participate in world affairs, they will have a greater appreciation of Wilson. Through his (Wilson's) efforts the dawn of universal peace will arise. Wilson was the greatest man of his generation. He stood for a very high principle, but he failed to achieve it.

The Bahá'ís in America, due to the fact that they are tainted with race prejudice — and he understands this because of the general prejudice in America — overestimate the effect of public opinion. In Germany the prejudice is the Jews, in England against the lower classes, the commoners. {{p22}} We should associate informally, but not always on public platforms. Regarding races and other prejudices, we must discriminate in our association and attract the better elements. (Referring to Louise and Louis Gregory's marriage.) The Master brought it about, was not what He did right? Can we criticise His actions? Is not He our example? But let them do what the Master did occasionally, just to stir people up. He didn't do these things every day, we must follow Him. The friends are only scratching the surface now with trembling hands. The thing to remember is that in spite of the imperfect instruments, the Cause is forging ahead.

Among new problems in America our most important one is non-participation in Political bodies, non-partisan political posts. Political offices are not to be accepted, etc. With political societies we must not accept affiliation, but association is good.

There is a great danger in America (in the Cause) to crystalize something that is fluid, tentative.

Considers that the Munroe doctrine has become obsolete. America cannot isolate herself from the world situation. America, to save herself and the world, must unite herself with the world and Europe. The sooner the better. The American Bahá'ís, like the believers of every other country, have become to a certain extent prejudiced by the traditional thoughts of their country. (Quoted Master's words to Congressman in "Goal of a New World Order.") Japan and Europe, on either side of America, will come closer and closer, she will find herself forced to adjust her relations to them. America will have to associate as closely with Europe as England has to the Continent. Science will force this to happen.

It is for the National Spiritual Assembly of America to appoint a committee to study where, in what States and how they can help the negroes and work in such a way as to not antagonize the whites and help the negroes.

The Persian believers, the Dawn-Breakers, have ushered in the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh, now the American believers are ushering in the civilization of Bahá'u'lláh. The American believers chief mission is to usher in this civilization. They are the spiritual descendants of the Dawn-Breakers, and usher in what they have commenced.

The Most Great Peace implies the political association of the United States with Europe. Has hopes that the United States will take the initiative after the coming war of establishing the true League of Nations. Any Bahá'í that thinks America will help the world by staying out of European affairs is acting contrary to the Spirit of the teachings on the subject. (See Master's words to a member of Congress on the subject in: "Goal of a New World Order.") When we say our salvation is in keeping aloof, it is exactly contrary to the Master's words. The very fact that the American people are now acting so differently from the Master's teachings may lead to a great reaction after the coming war and they may take the lead. We should observe without being misled the thought and tendencies of our nation. He believes we are quite wrong in being afraid to adopt [adapt?] the Constitution of the United States. {{p23}} The economic changes require its change and modification. He should not be surprised if the United States became in future a unitary State, like Germany. In the United States principles are following personalities and not personalities following principles.

GERMANY

Germany is half Oriental, hence the Master's reference to them as being like the Persian Bahá'ís.

Anti-Semitism is a disease. Germany is the center of modern philosophy which is based on Socrates' wisdom who received it from the Jewish Prophets. The German Bahá'ís must accept this sequence: divine revelation from the Prophets of Israel; Socrates expounding them, the German philosophers elaborating Socrates.

Frankfort A/M will become in future the center of the national Bahá'í institutions. Stuttgart is like the Chicago of Germany: the oldest center. Berlin will become like the New York of Germany.

The Germans are too analytical, too inquisitive. It is good to be analytical but not too analytical.

The German race is a very promising race, they have a great future both materially and spiritually. Scandinavia is already receiving help from Germany, (Bahá'í) the Balkans from Germany. The knights of Bahá'u'lláh, the warriors of the Faith. But they must give up their pagan gods. He thinks the Germans may be able to help the Russians too. We have no Bahá'ís in Russia proper. The ones in Moscow dispersed after the revolution; in Caucasus and Turkistan there are believers, mostly Persian.

Germans are a happy medium between the East and the Far West. They are not as crude as the Orientals and not as sophisticated as the Far West. Munich and Innsbruck will act as links between Vienna and Germany. Salzburg, Munich and Vienna are important centers and should become vital spiritual centers. They are destined to be powerful Bahá'í centers in the future. What we need are the young men in Germany who will enter the administration and seize the reins, battalions. A Bahá'í — a teacher — especially an International one, must teach the principles of the Cause, both spiritual and administrative. Germany will be the focal center of the spiritual forces, they will radiate from Germany to Europe. In Sofia, the one who really established the Cause (in Bulgaria) Herr Benke, was a German. Leipzig has already rendered a historical service in that Herr and Frau Benke established the Cause there and Herr Benke died there. Similar to Keith, sacrificing in a foreign land and dying there. So we see numbers do not count, it is the vitality of their souls rendering great services. {{p24}} German Bahá'ís must not get the tendency of making too many laws, copying the system of their Government, making it too rigid — the administration of the Cause — being a slave of conventions and rules. The Bahá'ís must pray for their government, nor must they think this implies criticism or otherwise, if the N.S.A. tells Assemblies to pray for the Government this does not imply the Government is wrong and we are praying for correction. We must be clear in explaining a ruling or instruction when it is given.

He does not think the German believers help the Austrian believers enough in sending teachers and corresponding more frequently. When we do anything under false pretenses we are violating the principle laid down by the Master of loyalty to Government, (regarding the crossing of the frontier on an excuse, not the real reason.) The friends seem to think (not specifically just Germany,) that because a Government may be unjust or corrupt or dishonest, it changes their attitude of loyalty towards it. We must be loyal to any established form of government.

The North German centers must try and send at least one or two friends, delegates and non-delegates, to the Convention. The N.S.A. could perhaps arrange to help with train fare from the Northern Centers; the National Fund could easily defray this expense. On one hand we must emphasize the authority of the N.S.A. and on the other hand it is not infallible. It has taken almost fifteen years to establish the Administration in Germany. Germany had to have something equivalent to Dr. Khayru'lláh in America. Germany did not have this until after the Master's passing, with Herrigal. In their teaching work there must be no hesitation whatever in going ahead with the fireside meetings, these, as they exist in America, are excellent. Publicity is unwise at present. Dresden is a very important center, the first thing is to have a local assembly there. Nurnberg is also important. Hanover should also have a center and Konigsberg in East Prussia. East Prussia is very important.

Centralization is now amounting to persecution in Germany. Hitler is under the influence of the extremes, whether military or regarding religion. Germany will remain a unitary state. {{p25}} Her destiny is to join the larger whole — Europe.

EGYPT

All courts in Egypt which deal with marriage, divorce, inheritance etc. are religious; Jewish, Christian or Muḥammadan. Islám has now pronounced the Bahá'í Faith not a sect of itself but a separate religion believing in different founders, hence the Bahá'ís now have in these matters no local recourse. All Bahá'ís marrying now can only do so under the marriage certificate of the S.A. which has as yet no legal status, hence legally they do not exist. As missionaries are continually circulating the claim that we are an off-shoot of Islám, a sect of Islám, this denial of Islám and her casting us off officially is a great proof that we are not an Islámic sect. Islám is now doing in spite of us what the Bahá'ís should have achieved long ago but were too timid and hesitating.

The declaration of trust, a petition, and excerpts from the laws of the Aqdas, have been given to the Egyptian Government three years ago, but they refused to reply. The first step has been taken, the enemies of the Cause, the Muslim leaders, have proclaimed our independence — we should have done this. The Egyptian Bahá'ís difficulty is that they have no civil courts in Egypt. The authorities can either give us our religious court rights or tell us to go back to the old relationship with the Muslim ones, they may also, in the meantime establish civil courts. He hopes this will not be done, as he wishes our recognition as an independent religion with full rights.

The N.S.A. of Egypt is the first to own legal property in its name in the East.

JEW

The Zionists constitute a political movement. We should be very careful what we say regarding the prophecies in order that the Jews may not think that we sympathize or partake of their political aspirations. If we should show that passage (page 76 “Answered Questions”) “All Palestine will become their home,” to a Jew, a Muḥammadan would say we are political. But in America it would be a great help in attracting the Jews to show them this passage written 40 years ago also a help in Germany. Believes the Jews will overflow in part of Syria and Trans-Jordania.

The Jews threaten that if the different Governments do not help regarding their regaining a Fatherland, they will promote revolution.

The Zionist Jews are a majority; they are in sympathy with the Cause. There is a section in the University library in Jerusalem devoted to Bahá’í literature from all countries. They are friendly toward the British Government who has helped them to establish a National Home. {{p26}} (See “Answered Questions,” page 76, “All Palestine will become their home.”) Other Jews, (a minority in a Jewish state) are against the British Government and the Bahá’ís.

Hitler’s policy is another link in the chain of the destiny of the Jews. The Balfour declaration made it possible for the Jews to build a home. The British Government drove away the Turks and the Mandate made it possible for the Jews to come.

PALESTINE

Sir Herbert Samuel said he believed Palestine could support six millions. Now the population is a little over one million. There are about 13 or 14 million Jews in the world. Now if they concentrate on a small country like Palestine, think of the possibilities. In Gleanings, page 116-117 refers to the future, also “Spread thy Skirt, O Jerusalem” refers to the Christian Revelation, and when it spreads over the Jordan symbolizes it will reveal itself more fully through the Bahá’í Revelation, extending the bounds of previous Revelations. The Jews will be instrumental in laying down the material foundation which the spiritual structure of the Cause requires. The Jews are doing this for Palestine with Jewish blood, Jewish money and Jewish personnel.

There are two great forces working hand in hand to prepare this country for what it is going to become which is the world administrative center of the Cause, the British administration and Government, and Jewish capital and enterprise. The publicity which the Cause will attain here in the future through the visits of princes, prominent figures, etc., will open the eyes of the Jews to the Cause’s importance and they will accept it. The war was the first, then the Balfour declaration and now Hitler’s policy are the three factors in sending the Jews back to Palestine. The war made it possible for the British Government to be established in Palestine, to drive away the Turks. The Balfour declaration made it possible for the Jews to come and establish their home, Hitler is a means of making them migrate.

One of the benefits of the last war was the Jews' return to Palestine. Unlikely that Palestine will become a Jewish nation. There are three kinds of prophecies related to Palestine: one is fulfilled by Bahá'u'lláh's coming to Palestine, to Haifa and 'Akká. The second is the return of the Jews, this is in the process of fulfillment. The third is the establishment of universal peace, this is not yet fulfilled.

Haifa in the future will be the terminus of three great railway lines. To the south it will go to Cairo, then through Central Africa to Capetown. To the East to Calcutta, direct line from here to Baghdád, then across Persia to Afghánistán and then to Calcutta. A north line going to Beirut, Aleppo, Constantinople and linking with the European route to Calais, and the Jews have been raised up by God to construct such a material center. After 2000 years of punishment the boundy [bounty?] of God will allow them to do this. {{p27}} England and the Jews are instruments raised by God to bring about the development of Palestine. The money of the Jews and the order of the British Government, law, order and experience in administration, and the well-known financial power of the Jews. This was foretold by the Master 40 years ago: "all Palestine will become their home." They will become the envy and admiration of their friends and their foes. This does not mean they will have a political state here, but a cultural one.

The Port of Haifa cost one million pounds, the money was raised in London and guaranteed by the British Government.

Haifa is the nerve center of the Cause. The more powerful the center the greater the tests. Anything in the Bahá'í World that happens is immediately felt here and vice versa.

The Bahá'ís should be very appreciative of all that the British Government has done for us here at the World Center of our Faith, ever since the British occupation of Palestine.

Mount Carmel is the heart of the world and the Shrine is in the heart of that heart. Haifa is the heart of the world geographically; it is the meeting place of three Continents — Europe, Asia and Africa. 'Akká and Haifa are the twin cities. They will be joined in the future. 'Akká is the heart of the Faith, the Qiblih of the Bahá'í Faith. The Arabs and the missionaries are against the Cause and make obstacles for it.

PERSIA

Bahá'u'lláh says that Arabic and Persians [the Arabic and Persian languages?] are like milk and honey. Bahá'u'lláh has set an example to the Persians in matters of language and style. This present generation in Persia is much too overwhelmed by the forces of nationalism to overcome the corruption of the language.

The state of emancipation (of Cause) in Persia and Irak will come when the state and church become separate.

Believes that the establishment of the administration in Persia is due to Keith's stirring them up spiritually. She died before seeing this achieved. Persia has 600 local Spiritual Assemblies. The National Spiritual Assembly has divided the entire country into 21 administrative units from which 95 delegates for the convention are elected. Truthfulness, the Persians are very weak in this respect. It is due to Sa'dí; (the poet) he has corrupted the Persian character. The principles of his philosophy are un-Bahá'í. {{p28}} (The Guardian copied out the following verse as an example of this:

"A lie which serves a particular interest is better than the truth which causes turmoil." Sa'dí.

FRANCE

After Lyons is an assembly, Lucienne must be sent elsewhere to establish a third S.A., and then he guaranteed France will have a National Spiritual Assembly. Then the French can take part in the international elections for the House of Justice. This does not mean a Bahá'í from France could not be elected to it in any case, but France would have no part in the elections. The elected members to the International House of Justice are to be chosen from the whole Bahá'í world. The important thing is to establish a local Spiritual Assembly in Lyons and see that it does not disintegrate.

France has to play her share in the great federation of nations, she is a great nation and has a vital part to play, an important share to contribute to the world civilization which Bahá'u'lláh will create. Germany, England, France, Russia, in the order of their future importance. First is national civilization, such as England and France have and Germany is developing, then comes European and Pan-American civilization, and then comes world civilization, world unification.

(To Mother) What she has done in Paris is the introduction of the Cause to the latin races.

Terrible corruption in French politics. Sooner or Later there may be revolt. Corruption may lead to revolt and civil war. The Communists are ready to ferment a civil war. They are more active in fermenting a civil war than in a larger war. As soon as they find factions, they work to create a civil war.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Czechoslovakia has a great future in the Cause, he is sure of that. {{p29}} There is relatively little prejudice there. >

The President of Czechoslovakia is a great admirer of the Cause.

RUSSIA

The Soviet Government published, three or four years ago, a pamphlet against the Cause. The Government, by attacking the Cause, its spiritual and social principles, was distributing the knowledge of the teachings. They claim that religion fosters superstition, also they believe in equality and we don't [Editor's note: See Vol. II page 31 paragraph 11]; the Master referred to society as an army needing generals, captains, privates, etc. The authorities have required the Bahá'ís for a number of years to not vote by secret ballot in their elections, which they obeyed, but now they have modified their constitution and allow the Bahá'ís to vote by secret ballot. The Bahá'ís now rent the Temple from the Government, who claim to be its legal owners. Many Bahá'ís have been imprisoned, deported and sentenced to death by the Government. He communicated with the American N.S.A. who through the Ambassador to Russia received commutation of the death sentence; (See "Bahá'í World.") There are a lot of Bahá'ís in Tīhrán now who may not return to Russia. In Russia it is improving; in Persia getting worse. This is a stage in the evolution of the Cause.

CANADA

Canada will in the future have her own National Spiritual Assembly provided she is not politically united with the United States; {{p30}} she only needs to get strong enough to have one.

A Canadian summer school would be a good thing, but the N.S.A. must be first consulted as to its locality, etc.

GENERAL TOPICS

The National Spiritual Assembly of Egypt is incorporated as a commercial, not a religious body.

We should use the name of Ṭáhirih in referring to her and not Qurratu'l-'Ayn. {{p31}} She translated the writings of the Báb from Arabic into Persian.

The Íqán was not written in one night.

We must always tell the truth, our first purpose we must say, in visiting Haifa is to visit our World Center, our sacred Sites, no reference to personalities. So when the Persian Bahá'ís say this they do not receive permission, but this is only temporary. "Tablet, revealed word, and revelation" should be confined to the writings of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh and not applied to the Master's writings.

Shoghi Effendi was asked if it were not a waste of time to devote oneself to Art in these days, and he agreed that, unless one had genius, it should only be a pastime.

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "A / See / B / And / C"] The New Commonwealth Society in England is perhaps the nearest to the Cause of any society, yet he has asked the friends not to identify themselves with it. He is having a newspaper clipping on the New Commonwealth Society translated into Persian for the Haifa Newsletter.

Ruth White sent a letter and cheque to the High Commissioner of Palestine, asking him to investigate the Master's will. He returned the cheque and said it was a purely private matter and she must hire a lawyer.

First Bahá'í school in Palestine is organized now in Adasiyyih. They are Zoroastrian Bahá'ís, they learn three languages, Persian, Arabic and English.

At the Shrines they have given out thousands of copies of pamphlets, but never one unless it was asked for.

Don't refer to the name of the system, Communism, Fascism, Nazi, etc., directly but indirectly; not by name and not to its political leader, but to general principles and compare them with ours such as that equality is impracticable in society and this is a rejection of communism, (in teaching and public.)

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "B / See / A / And / C"] Regarding membership in W.S.D.A.P. Frauenschaft. Even the New Commonwealth Society in England, which is far nearer the ideals of the Cause than any other group, he has dissuaded very strongly the friends from joining. They may associate with groups if they like, exchange speakers, etc., but there must be no affiliation with either religious, political or social organizations. {{p32}} With scientific, humanitarian, industrial, educational and civic affairs we can affiliate.

What we really require are endowments for teaching to enable people to settle, travel and teach etc.

The superficialities of the West are spreading in the East.

The Dunns established a pillar of the universal House of Justice in Australia. We need workers in Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Baltic States, Finland, Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia.

To us (Bahá'ís) the cross is a sacred symbol of the sufferings of Jesus, we do not worship it as the Christians do, we revere it.

He always encourages people to settle, not in favour of these short visits and voyages. Martha Root is an example of an itinerant teacher. The Dunns as settlers are exemplary. Mr. and Mrs. Dunn are unique in what they have achieved in Australia. They had no work and were friendless; they read the Divine Plan, sold their property in California and went to Australia and now we have centers in all the leading cities of Australia and in addition they have established a National Spiritual Assembly and have incorporated most of their local assemblies. India and Burma have all their National Spiritual Assemblies incorporated.

Asked whether the treatment of sexual perverts by imprisonment was right, Shoghi Effendi replied it was no use, that they must be converted, spiritual reform must take place.

Shoghi Effendi has received to date 12 volumes of Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh, the Báb and the Master, all authenticated by the local assemblies from Persia, etc.

The “Bahá'í Scriptures” are full of mistakes.

The shrine of the Greatest Holy Leaf will be the future center of the international buildings.

No buildings will ever be erected around the Shrine of the Báb, as a sign of respect. The Government has been assured that this land will never be sold, rented or built upon, hence they have made it tax exempt, also all the land from the top to the bottom of the mountain owned by Bahá'ís. The tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, the Mansion, the house of Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká and the Garden of Ridván and the Pilgrim House are exempt. These are the only properties in Palestine that are exempt.

All 20 Tablets (to Bahá'u'lláh and the 19 Letters of the Living) reproduced in Nabíl's narrative, were among the Master's papers. {{p33}} How He got them we do not know.

Superstition is the negation of fact, while a miracle is a fact which we can never explain.

One's intention can often be almost as good as the deed itself.

Human motive is never entirely pure, one cannot expect it to be. We must not dwell on or grieve over things we did not do exactly right as it does no good.

Purity of heart, detachment and intention is more important to him than brilliancy of action.

Faith breeds courage, but when it is not well enough grounded it is timid. God's mercy over-shadows all kinds of criminals, even Covenant breakers.

The more teachers we have in Europe the better, He encourages friends to settle in Europe.

There is a tendency to introduce new mysteries into the Cause. We have a few mysteries in the Cause, we must not introduce any man-made ones; in order to satisfy our desires or emotions, we produce mysteries. Sometimes our emotions are bad, they can go too far. A desire is either corrupt or wholesome. But a wholesome desire, a love, a devotion to the Faith which is in itself a wholesome and good thing, even that if not restrained leads us to excesses. What is Fanaticism — it is devotion to the Cause carried to an extreme. Devotion to the Cause, if carried to excess leads to fanaticism. (Bahá'u'lláh refers to this in “Gleanings” Pages 216, 342-3, regarding excess.)

The relation of children to parents and wives to husbands is too extreme in America. Bahá'ís must have the consent of all four parents in marriage, whether the parents are Bahá'í or not. But obedience to parents in all things is not required by Bahá'u'lláh.

We must not identify ourselves with different systems; political beliefs, theories or evolution, etc.

Considers the separation of church and state in England inevitable. The last to fall will be the Catholic Church.

We must expect these things, our tests and trials, and when we get into these states of depression we must have confidence and persevere. It is the effort that one makes that gives one the susceptibility to receive more. Some suffering is self-inflicted, but that is sometimes providential. Martha's faith and effort, daily effort, is a magnet that attracts the confirmations suspended between earth and heaven. It removes the barriers between God and herself. Perseverance in effort will attract the power which will sustain us. Love is the greatest force and the mainspring of all effort.

The grandson of Náṣiri'd-Dín-Sháh came to Haifa and begged, literally begged him, (Shoghi Effendi) to give him an introduction to the National Assembly of Persia. He informed him the Bahá'ís are absolutely non-political, explained their stand on this subject, etc., and the Sháh's grandson went away satisfied, but never came back. {{p34}} The British Government asked the Guardian if this had happened, and he told them the whole story.

Also the grandson of Sulṭán 'Abdu'l 'Azíz, Sayfu'd-Din, called on the Guardian and asked for financial aid. Shoghi Effendi gave it to him — twice, and also gave him Esslemont in the Turkish language, printed in Latin characters. It is astonishing that the grandson of Sulṭán 'Abdu'l 'Azíz should come asking for financial help and the grandson of Náṣiri'd-Dín for political help. 'Abdu'l 'Azíz was the greatest enemy the Cause ever had.

If the followers of Muḥammad-'Alí repent it will be due to the effect of the prayer in the Master's Testament: the prayer was the means of forgiveness, the denouncing of the enemies to point them out for our protection.

Sales Qur'án is the most authoritative, Rodwells, the best.

The statement of Queen Marie, wherein she refers to "the Father" is the greatest test of all to the Christians. Also for Muḥammadans her reference to Christ, Muḥammad and Bahá'u'lláh as Prophets, is tremendous.

Numerology has no organic relation to the Cause but was used by the Seers to foretell the Báb's coming. Numerology, astrology, palmistry, etc., is left to the individuals. They should be left free as far as possible, as long as they don't associate these ideas with the Cause.

Queen Marie is both granddaughter to Queen Victoria and the Czar of Russia, to both of whom Bahá'u'lláh revealed Tablets.

The Íqán was written by the request of the father of the great Afnán (chief builder of the Temple in Ishqubad) who was the maternal uncle of the Báb. He went to Baghdád and asked Bahá'u'lláh certain questions which were answered in the Íqán.

Bahá'í ring stone has B and H on it, the Arabic letters for Bahá. The five pointed star symbolizes the temple of man, head, arms, legs, the body of the Cause. When God willed it, His Revelation appeared "be and it is". (In a former translation of a prayer it says, "by which the letter kaf was linked with the letter noon.") Kaf and noon form the word "Kon" which means "be" — be and it is.

Many terms used by Bahá'u'lláh came from the Qur'án, also from the terms used by the Báb, Sun of Truth, Sun of Righteousness, World Order, are terms used by the Báb.

Trade is paralyzed between the nations, this is what makes them poor, politically they are divided, but economically they form an organism. The economists wish to unite the world, the politicians to divide it. Nationalism is causing this.

The standard of living in the East is too low, in the West too high, too much luxury. Germany is half way between. {{p35}} Comfort is different from luxury. He objects to luxury, not comfort. Importance is attached to non — essentials and not essentials. Peoples differ as to what are essentials. It is alright to maintain a high standard when there is not want and destitution around you. People are the slaves of convention, they could reduce their standards and help the poor, but their conventions prevent them — they do not have the moral courage. Germans are a happy medium between East and far West. Not as crude as Orientals and not as sophisticated as the far West.

The "Most Exalted Leaf" is really the correct translation of the title of Khánum. The word Holy has been added, does not exist in the original. Her resting place has been chosen as the center of the International Institutions, a woman, not a man, has been chosen for this.

Apart from certain restrictions in the teachings, men and women are indistinguishable. As far as the teachings are concerned this is so. It is the immutable law of god and not for us to question; the Imáms, the 12 Disciples, the Prophets in the Mosaic dispensation, etc., were all men. The Guardians are all men. In the West in almost every way, in teaching, in the administration, etc., the women are taking the lead, and this is the Will of Bahá'u'lláh. He would not be surprised if soon the Persian women become like their American sisters: "one of the distinguishing features of the Bahá'í dispensation is that the women are showing more courage, more initiative than the men," said the Master. We have Bahá'ís now in 40 countries and more than half of these have been opened, have been conquered by the American believers. Most of those who have opened these countries have been women, not men. Jackie in Bulgaria, Agnes in Japan, the Knoblochs in Germany, Mrs. Hoagg in Italy, Martha in so many countries, Leonora in South America, Fanny Knobloch in South Africa, Mother in Paris, Johnanna Shubarth in Norway, Mrs. Cropper in London, Mother in Canada, not only American believers, but women.

If anyone asks about the equality of the sexes, we must tell them equality, except in certain cases. (The Imáms, the Guardians, etc.)

The 13th Letter of the Living came to ‘Akká and met Bahá’u’lláh. He was the only one who called on Him after He revealed Himself. He also accepted Him.

Characteristic passages of the “Hidden Words,” “The Íqán,” and other books, should be committed to memory. The right quotations made at the psychological moment have a great effect, great power. He does not think the teachers do this enough.

When Bahá’ís have visions and try to get others to act accordingly, it is un-Bahá’í and very dangerous and pernicious. The individual himself is left free in such matters. {{p36}} We must tell them it is mostly imagination, but they are free. However they must not seek to influence others.

He wants the Catholic Church aroused but it must not be done artificially, but through the natural spread of the Cause. We have to combine courage with tact. We must not be unnecessarily provocative.

The Bahá’ís should adopt Esperanto at present as a universal language, even if only a temporary one.

Modern philosophy is based on the teachings of Socrates. Plato enlarged the philosophy of Socrates, Aristotle went further. Even the philosophy which Socrates established was based on the religious teachings of the Prophets of Israel, which proves that the essentials of philosophy were based on religious teachings. Socrates taught the existence of the immortality of the soul. (See same subject under “Germany.” [Vol. II page 23])

Regarding violators we must not be fanatical. It is going too far to believe we are contaminated by being in the same room, etc., with them. But we must not associate with them. There is no difference in civil rights. The rights of a violator are as sacred as those of any believer. If we have a business dealing with one we must settle our dealings with him. We must have no dealings with violators, but if circumstances should be such that we happen to have a dealing with one, we must settle it normally and have no future dealings. If they happen to have written a book, either on the Cause or anything else that has a value, we must admit the value of anything they may have accomplished, even if they are against the Cause. If they have rendered any service in any sphere, we must recognize it. “Justice, equity, is loved above all.” But that does not mean we must associate with them under any circumstances. Herrigel rendered great services (in Germany) we must admit this, but also see that his later opposition nullified it; it has darkened the record of his previous services. We must not belittle what he did once accomplish, admit what was good and correct, but relate it to what he did later.

(Countries to be opened up to the Cause and developed.) First comes Germany, then the Balkans, then Scandinavia, then Western Europe, then Italy and Spain. Community life is now confined to Germany in Europe. In England it is just a skeleton, just beginning to move. England is similar to France, not as bad but similar. The English are very proud, very dry. They are very shy and conservative in matters of religion. Americans think too much of personality. Principles are not for personalities, personalities are under principles. It is a challenge to the Bahá'ís to rise above their environment, be totally different from it. The believers today are being adapted to the administration it is being imposed upon them. They are not born into it.

Hitler is a national leader, but does not have the sense of world politics that is required — such as Briand's, Stresemann's, who had much greater world vision. {{p37}} Stalin is not a man of principle he is ruthless, unlike Lenin who had principle but whose principle was wrong. First Wilson, the greatest of the men of his generation; he stood for a very high principle, but he failed to achieve it. Second was Lenin, his principle was wrong but he carried it out with great vigour. Third Lloyd George who had no principle, neither right nor wrong. A leader must lead the people and not be led by them, he must have courage.

The trouble with the world is the leaders have great vigour, but their principles are wrong.

The Catholics and the Shí'ahs, the two most dogmatic sects in Christianity and Islám, claim that the study of abstract science is a waste of time.

RELIGION {{p2}}

One woman was always singled out in every religion.

Sarah Abrahamic Asiyih — Mosaic Maryam — Christian Fāṭimih — Muḥammadan Ṭāhīrih — Bábí Bahíyyih — Bahá'í

The Greatest Holy Leaf's name will be added by Shoghi Effendi, The Virgin Mary (Maryam) did not recognize the full station of Christ till after His Crucifixion.

All things proceed from God. God is the origin of all things, including human characteristics.

Why did God allow evil to exist in the world? A satisfactory explanation has never, and can never be given. Surely God could have created some other scheme that would have allowed less evil. His motives, the way He works, are beyond us.

It would cease to be a Revelation if Americans could resolve all these mysteries — it would be a product of the American mind.

The Protestant movement is a protest against the abuses of the Catholic Church and, being a protest, it is negative.

Social reform is of great value, but its area is very limited. It is the influence of religion on the individual that can bring about the results. Any philosophy that is based on materialism is fundamentally defective. This does not mean social reform has no value. Its value is restricted.

REVELATION has three aspects. God its Revealer, the Prophet, and then His successor appointed by Him.

Every religion has its mysteries — it must, because it is perfect from God and we are human, hence mysteries must exist for us because we cannot encompass religion, it not being man-made.

There are two Covenants; the Greater and the Lesser. The Greater Covenant of which God is the Author. The Manifestation the object, and the people of the world the ones covenanted with. The Lesser Covenant the Manifestation is the Author, His successor the object and the believers are the covenanted with group. Page 255, paragraph 527, of the Bahá'í Scriptures refers to the Greater Covenant.

Krishna was the Prophet of Hinduism; Buddha of Buddhism. The religion of the Sabians exists but we do not know the name of its Prophet.

Confucius and Lao-Tzu were reformers, not Prophets. The remnants of Sabianism are the idolaters of Africa, it appeared in Mesopotamia. The religion of Abraham was revealed among the Sabians just as Jesus appeared among the Jews. All prophets have had followers; Húd, for instance, but the followers have ceased to exist. {{p3}}

There was a time when they not only existed but flourished. All these Prophets are within historic times. The followers of Húd lived in Petra, Transjordan. The religion of Abraham was revealed among the Sabians, whose original Prophet is unknown.

Buddha and Krishna were the Prophets of Buddhism and Hinduism, but all their authentic teachings have been lost. In the case of Sabianism, we do not even have the name of the Prophet. Sabianism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity, Muḥammadanism, the Bábí religion, and now the Bahá'ís. These are the nine great religions, whose followers still exist. This does not mean that there were not many other religions. These 9 great religions are one of the significances of 9. Another is the name of Bahá', symbolic of the name of Bahá'u'lláh; the third meaning is that it symbolizes perfection. 9 is symbolic, as it symbolizes the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, which is the culmination of all religions, even as 9 is the culmination of all numbers.

The Prophets retain their identity and authority in the next world. The Letters of the Living retain their identity, their position, in the next world, but we cannot tell in what way or manner these function. (See page 141 of Íqán.) There are three worlds. God lives in a world of His Own, but who can picture, who can conceive of that world; then the world of the Prophets and the world of Creation. God is immeasurably exalted above the comprehension of all the Prophets and Messengers. Words he is translating on meditation of Bahá'u'lláh. We retain in the next world our identity and self-consciousness, but our self-consciousness is greatly increased. {{p4}}

THE PROPHET {{p5}}

Prophets, “endowed with constancy,” means that They are the bearers of a new law and that, having revealed the Law of God, they can endure every persecution. They are determined to uphold the Revelation of God against every opposition.

Christ’s Words; “Why has Thou forsaken Me?” Bahá'u'lláh says Jesus was overwhelmed and the human element in Him became impatient. Jesus has His moments of fear and agitation, and this sentence reveals it. The Prophets have their moments of fear and agitation; the human element is always there in the Prophet.

The body of the Manifestation and His Soul have a beginning — because this part of them is human. But the spark of God in them partakes of the pre-existence of God.

The human element in the Prophets is human, but the power working through their atoms is from God, is stronger than in other humans. The soul works through our bodies... the Spirit of God through Theirs. If the Prophets were apart from us entirely how could we know them? They have something in common with us, in other words, Their human bodies, which are subject to sickness, etc.

The soul will see the Prophets in the next world. They have always existed as themselves.

Any specified science, etc, is outside of the province of the Prophet in the sense that He does not wish to pronounce upon it. We must always disassociate the human part of the Manifestation from His Spirit. It is the rule that the powers of the Manifestation are stronger; His sense of beauty; his memory; His power of endurance and strength. It is the Spirit in Him that is more powerful. This does not mean that the body of the Manifestation is of a different stuff — no, keen is the word, everything in Him is keener. This is due to His unique Spirit, but does not mean His atoms are different. His body is not of a different order than that of human beings, they are all the same. Although the body is the same the soul is not the same.

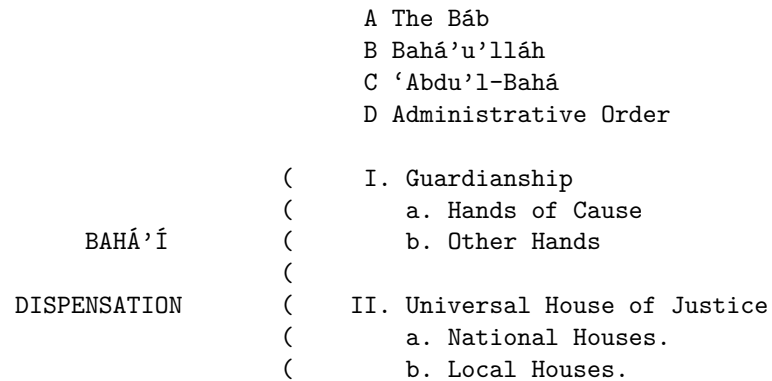

It is not a more intense reality, it is of a different order, quite different. If the body shows a keener perception it is due to this soul. The Master, the Guardian, the Saints, all else apart from the Prophets belong to the human order. {{p6}}

BAHÁ'Í DISPENSATION

— A —

(As drawn by Shoghi Effendi.)

---

— B —

The Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the administrative order are the correct way of mentioning the Cause. The administration was conceived by Bahá'u'lláh, but matured in the womb of the Master's mind. Bahá'u'lláh is its Father, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, its Mother. The Guardian is the interpreter, the House of Justice the legislator. Formerly all other Faiths had one person as these two things; the Caliphate, the Primate and the Pope. Revelation has three aspects: God the Revealer, the Prophet, and His successor appointed by Him. The Guardian may be the heart, but the heart is part of the body, the Administrative Order is the body. {{p8}}

THE BAHÁ'Í FAITH.

Also References To Bahá'u'lláh,

The Báb, The Master
And Their Lives.

The World Order {{p9}} was anticipated as announced by the Báb, conceived by Bahá'u'lláh and formulated by the Master, and is now being built by the Bahá'ís.

Bahá'u'lláh abrogates, modifies and augments the Báb's laws. The laws of the Báb went into effect for about 19 years. Bahá'u'lláh revealed His laws only after His arrival in 'Akká. The interval must be short between a fore-runner and a Manifestation. It happened the fore-runner was a Prophet — a law-giver. Years are not of much importance. God can cause the fruit to ripen very fast. The first intimation was in the dungeon in Tíhrán. 19 years after the Báb's declaration He declared Himself in Baghdád. The most stirring, the most fiery of Bahá'u'lláh's Tablets were revealed in Adrianople (not yet translated.)

Christianity advocated union, Bahá'u'lláh unity. The world is ready for unity today.

In 1844 the Báb released the forces which were destined to enable mankind to attain maturity. (See "Gleanings" page 77, where Bahá'u'lláh refers to year 60.)

The Báb prophesied that His religion would spread to the whole world. One of the chief causes why this will be possible is because schism has been made impossible in the Cause due to the appointment of a successor in the "Book of the Covenant" and "Will and Testament" therefore there will be no opposition to its spread, such as Protestantism and Catholicism, Shí'ah and Sunní.

Previous religions have been more for the individual than society, whereas this religion is primarily for society.

The "Golden Age" is the maturity of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and it will start with the unification of the world; that marks its beginning. We have passed the period of infancy and are now in the formative period. As far as this planet is concerned, there is nothing beyond this Golden Age (i.e. unification of entire world.) Thence its endurance for five hundred thousand years, just as the individual States in the U.S.A. united to form one federal government, so the nations of the world will unite to form one federal international government, which is the highest thing for this planet. Every five hundred thousand years a Revelation equal to that of Bahá'u'lláh will appear. The Prophet who next comes has the right to abrogate the whole of the Aqdas if He wishes to, but all Prophets will be under the shadow of Bahá'u'lláh. It is the spiritual influence of Bahá'u'lláh that will over-shadow for five hundred thousand years. {{p10}}

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation "A. / See / B." — ed].

He is not sure all the American Bahá'ís recognize that Bahá'u'lláh is the coming of the Father, they identify Him with the coming of Jesus and think the Father is God and cannot appear. When we say Bahá'u'lláh is a final Revelation of God to mankind, when the Father appears, it means the fullest Revelation has appeared. The followers in every Revelation believe it is the final one. The Bahá'ís must not believe this, there is no finality: "From the beginning that has had no beginning to the end that has no end." In the Gospel is only a reference to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. The Qur'án refers to both the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh.

He strongly feels we must safeguard the integrity of the Cause, its purity, in presenting it to the public. Not to make compromises, not to dilute the teachings to please the public. When you compromise you undermine the integrity of the Cause. Everything is being compromised in these days. In teaching we must start with the spiritual principles of the Cause, as the Master did. The laws are not mild, they are hard bread, we must wait until they have teeth for it.

In the Aqdas the House of Bahá'u'lláh, and the House of the Báb in Shíráz are established as the pilgrimage — the friends can choose one or the other. This is a law, obligatory for men, optional for women; this is a rule in favour of women. The institution of pilgrimage is to these two Houses. We visit Haifa and the Shrines. The House of Bahá'u'lláh takes precedence over that of the Báb. The Qiblih and the pilgrimage are the same in Islám, but in the Cause they are separate.

This is a stage in the evolution of the Cause, being persecuted by the politicians. They are afraid of the Administration. The reason why the German Government does not oppose the Cause is because their numbers are negligible. He does not think the Cause in the West will reach the stage of sufficient numbers and importance to be opposed by the Government before the next war. The fall of Western Civilization is really the destruction of the whole fabric of civilization, East and West. There will be a mass reaction in favour of the Cause — entering the Cause in troops. The Cause is now being consolidated, but not yet proclaimed. It will be proclaimed after the next war. This teaching work and construction of the Administration is only the first step to enable the Spirit to function in the body; it is more than a new religion, it is a new type of civilization. He prefers Bahá'í Faith to Bahá'ísm. It is all so simply expressed by Bahá'u'lláh and the Master, that the friends have failed to realize its greatness.

Bahá'u'lláh has come primarily to organize humanity and this cannot be done without Justice.

The Cause is impelled forward through crises. The spread of the Cause precipitates crises, and the crises gives the spread of the Cause a chance to overcome it, and the solution of the crisis through the operation of the Cause facilitates the spread of the Cause. {{p11}}

Growth, crisis, and the manifestation of the spirit of the Cause; and then it starts again, further growth, crisis, triumph, etc.

The Báb's Revelation released the forces required to bring about the maturity of the human race. When we enter the Golden Age of this Cause, then this maturity becomes a fact. The Golden Age is when it yields its fruit. The culmination of a process, the consummation of a cycle, is what is meant by "Knowledge was contained in 27 Letters, two of which have been revealed before the coming of the Báb." When the world is unified it marks the beginning of a development, which is world civilization. The coming of age of humanity marks the beginning of the unfoldment of world civilization. How could the whole world be unified by the coming of Jesus? — America was not yet discovered. It was too early — premature. In the prayers of Bahá'u'lláh there is reference to: “His Sovereignty” and “His Government.” This passage refers to the last stage in the Bahá'í evolution, when all nations are unified as a Bahá'í Commonwealth. Evil will almost disappear. There is nothing in the Teachings to make us believe there will be a decline. In previous Revelations there was the rise and fall, previous Revelations were preliminary. The character of this Revelation being fundamentally different, its results must be different — there was corruption in other Revelations, there cannot be any in this one, owing to the Administrative Order. Evil will cease to be the force it is at present, it will become negligible.

This is the Law of God. The Prophet appears amongst the most backward of people, they become the greatest. A Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh states that the Government of His land will become the most honored. He feels Persians are quite wrong when they claim, some of them, if not all of them, that it was their capacity that made them worthy of having Bahá'u'lláh appear in their midst; quite the opposite. They should be proud because Bahá'u'lláh has brought about such a change. He has no sympathy with the attitude, in fact very much resents it, that they admire the Cause, love the Cause, because of what it will mean to Persia; in other words a nationalistic viewpoint. The Orthodox standpoint is the Cause first, be ready to sacrifice the interests of Persia to those of the Cause. Not Bahá'u'lláh for Persia, but Persia for Bahá'u'lláh. The national interests must be subordinated to the interests of the Cause.

There is a Bahá'í standard to which everyone must make sacrifices. It is not an American thing. It is God's Will that America should happen to be the first to build up this new civilization (Bahá'í), it is not that America happens to be superior. The prejudice and corruption prevailing in America is responsible for the initiation of the Bahá'í Civilization in that country first, as the Faith first dawned in the darkness of Persia. Although the Cause was born in the East its proclamation was in the West. There is a Tablet of the Master where He says the mysteries of the Cause will be made manifest in America, etc. What they are establishing is not American, {{p12}} it is Bahá'í, and the Americans themselves must make concessions to it. Is it American that nine people should conduct things and not be responsible to anyone? This is anything but American.

The friends of Persia do not realize it was Persia who lead in the Heroic Age, and now it is America's turn to make its contribution in the formative period. In the Golden Age they will all be merged into a mysterious entity.

The Báb had His first intimation of His Revelation when He had the dream of drinking the drops of blood that fell from the severed head of the Imám Ḥusayn. The Báb was a descendant of Fáṭimih through Imám Ḥusayn.

The Báb and Bahá'u'lláh were constantly in communication by letter. The first chapters of the Qayyúmu'l-Asmá' were those papers which the Báb sent to Bahá'u'lláh by Mullá Ḥusayn.

In the Name of Bahá'u'lláh the name of Ḥusayn has precedence over the name of 'Alí. This precedence establishes the greatness of Ḥusayn. Ḥusayn was the 3rd Imám; ‘Alí the first.

It is the worse form of heresy to identify Bahá'u'lláh with God, and when we say He is God, we must be careful to explain the relationship.

Bahá'u'lláh has come primarily to organize humanity and this cannot be done without Justice.

Sinlessness is like the rays of the Sun, inherent. It can be compared to the light of the Sun. Sinlessness means free from error, which is infallibility. There are two kinds of infallibility, one derived, the other inherent. In the case of the Sun, the Manifestation, it is inherent; the other, derived, is like the Moon and its Satellites. The Satellites revolve around the Moon. (Moon is like the Master; the Satellites, the Guardian and International House of Justice) but they receive their light from the Sun. The Master's statement in His Will makes it clear that they are under the direct guidance of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb. In this connection we must not think of the Báb as part of the Bahá'í dispensation, but the Báb's Dispensation. As They are both Manifestations the infallibility is derived from two independent Sources. Because infallibility is of two kinds it does not necessarily imply being a Manifestation. The Master is all-knowing, but not the Satellites, the Guardian and the International House of Justice, they are neither all-knowing nor perfect as the Master was. Perfection and omniscience are the attributes of the Master and these are not inherent but derived.

The Master is essentially human, the Prophet essentially divine. The Prophet must assume human form, the human shape in order to reach us. Divinity is not incarnation. Divinity means manifestation, revelation, the mirror. The Master is essentially human but had the attributes of the Prophet. This is the thing that makes Him a mystery. {{p13}}

How can you believe a human being is perfect and all-knowing, this is the paradox — when one starts by saying the Master is human not divine and has the attributes of the Prophet. This is a mystery. The Guardian and the International House of Justice are also human, no divinity should be associated with them. Although they are human, as the Master is, they cannot claim to have the attributes of divinity as He had. They are fundamentally different from the Master as He was from the Manifestation.

The Guardianship and the International House of Justice are the two pillars that support the edifice of the Administrative Order. It is not supported by the members (or their calibre) of the International House of Justice; it has nothing to do with their being representative of the believers, of the National Assemblies, etc., it is the fact that they have been given this derived infallibility. Each of these two pillars has its Satellites; the International House of Justice has its local and national Houses of Justice. The Hands of the Cause are a corporate body, an organized body, these are the Satellites of the Guardian.

All the Prophets following Bahá'u'lláh for 500,000 years are Prophets of constancy, but under the shadow of Bahá'u'lláh and derive their authority from Him, and this authority is so great that they can abrogate the laws of the Aqdas in part or in whole. Their authority is not inherent but derived. See “Dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh, Page 19, par., “Under the Shadow of the Ancient Beauty.”

[In the margin of the next paragraph is the typed notation “B / See / A” — ed]

Bahá'u'lláh is the greatest figure in this planet's past and future life because He is the supreme figure associated with the coming of age of the human race. They (future Prophets) are supreme over their generation and Bahá'u'lláh is supreme over them all.

The unique greatness of the Cause: that the Founder should have a forerunner who was a Prophet.

If the followers of Muḥammad all repent, it will be the effect of the prayer in the Master's Will: the prayer was the means of forgiveness, the denouncing of the enemies to point them out for our protection. Purity of heart, of motive, is not sufficient. We must have faith, faith in God, be spiritually-minded, religiously-minded. One can have faith in God and not believe in the Administration and vice versa.

The influence of the believers is as mysterious as the mysterious way the Manifestations Themselves work. The nearer the believer is to the teachings, to the Manifestations, the more mysteriously he will work. The events taking place in the world react on the individual and help mature the seed of the Cause.

The leading Bahá'í countries are, first Palestine, the Qiblih, (point of prayer) of the Faith, the place of Ascension; second 'Iráq (Baghdád) Center of Pilgrimage, the place of sojourn; third Persia, the {{p14}} birthplace of the Faith. The Báb said the Manifestation, “He whom God will make manifest” should be the Qiblih, not the place He revealed Himself, not as in Islám, where Mecca is the Qiblih and not the resting place of Muḥammad in Medina. These three countries are contiguous, geographically they touch each other.

The Cause of God has always been born in the East. The Administrative center has shifted to the West and then been reflected back into the East. The civilization begotten by the Faith was born in the West. Hence the Sun of Civilization appearing in the West: “O Beauty of God, unveil Thy Face that the Sun may arise from the West,” says Bahá'u'lláh in one of His Odes. The unveiling took place in the East, but the Sun of the Civilization of the Faith arose in the West. There is a Muḥammadan tradition that when the Promised One appears, the Sun will arise in the West.

Five hundred thousand years is an indication of the greatness of this Revelation.

Abraham Lincoln's vision for the United States is comparable to Bahá'u'lláh's vision for the whole world. Now it is possible for a man to conceive of a greater destiny for the United States, a destiny incorporating her in the Federation of World States, encompassing the whole world. This is comparable to that Prophet who may appear after 500,000 years, and who would do the same thing for the planets. Inter-planetary, which corresponds to the incorporation of the United States with other nations. A scientist says there can be beings, not human beings, outside this planet. The cosmos includes many universes, as these are infinite and space is infinite, so divine revelation is infinite. The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh is the biggest thing for this planet, because it has united it and there is nothing beyond unity. Is there anything beyond world unity for this planet? That is the answer. That is why it marks the coming of age of humanity — world unity. If there were at least one more planet, if science had discovered it, gotten in close touch with it, then a greater Revelation than Bahá'u'lláh would be needed to create the unity of these two planets.

[^ ] (See Page 163 of “Gleanings” reference to: “Fixed Star hath its Planets, and every planet its own creatures.”)

Revelation has had no beginning and will have no end. But divine revelation has had a beginning and will have an end on this earth. Isaiah prophesied 3,000 years ago the prophecy of the coming of age of humanity; the lamb and the lion will lie down together, the Kingdom of God on earth is nothing but the stage of maturity — the coming of age of humanity. It has also a political connotation and this will be fulfilled at the Coming of the Golden Age. This is for the German believers to realize (Isaiah being a Jewish Prophet.) Christ's prophecy of “Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will be Done, etc.,” is a vague, hazy statement, compared to the prophecy of Isaiah. This does not mean Jesus did not make more definite prophecies, just that we did not have them. Justice is the hall-mark of the Kingdom. “Justice filleth the earth as {{p15}} the waters cover the sea,” can be a reference to the International House of Justice. World unity cannot be established unless it is founded on Justice. The lamb and the lion lying down together would require Justice. A strong nation might be a lion, and a weak one a lamb.

A man may be devoted to the Cause and not have a good character. A man may sacrifice his whole life to the Cause and yet have a despicable character. Character is different from faith, from devotion. Laxity in morals is as bad as thieving or lying or back-biting. A young Bahá'í may be devoted, sacrificing, but have moral laxity which is just as bad as stealing or lying. Not all the heroes of the heroic age led saintly lives. We must not confuse a hero with a saint. Hero primarily denotes the attitude of a person towards the Cause. We must not confuse loyalty to the Cause with character. A believer who is loyal, who will sacrifice for the Cause, is a tremendous asset and we must recognize it — but it is not enough. We must have character; a Saint who is a man of action becomes a hero too.

Bahá'u'lláh observed the Ramaḍán all His life and ‘Abdu'l-Bahá for 25 years. The Master until the end of His life went to the Mosque and when He died the Muslims came and said the Muḥammadan prayer for the dead for Him. But after His death they were forced to change their policy, because of the declaration of the Muḥammadan religious court made in Egypt, that the Bahá'í Faith is independent; A Muslim is not a Bahá'í, a Bahá'í is not a Muslim. There was a difference of opinion among the Muslims as to the position of the Bahá'ís in relation to Islám, some contending we are a sect of Islám. In Egypt they proved we have laws that abrogate the laws of the Qur'án as their justification for our expulsion from Islám, they went too far. They consulted the Aqdas and then in their verdict quoted the laws of the Aqdas; pilgrimaged, Qiblih, fasting, etc. The Jews in their relation to us are neutral. We have sprung from Islám, it is the parent that opposes.

Bahá'u'lláh's Revelation synchronizes with international unity.

Twenty-five people claimed to be the Promised One in Baghdád. This is the Master's statement. During the most troubled period when Bahá'u'lláh had left for Sulaymáníyyih, the Báb had appointed no successor. It was the most disturbed period in the history of the Cause. The Master was ten years old at that time. Nabíl says he met the Master at this age, and the Master said; "I am a boy, but I feel old." Bahá'u'lláh sent Muḥammad-'Alí to India about 5 years before his passing, He knew what was going to happen. The Master was all alone with the Greatest Holy Leaf after the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. All the brothers sided with Muḥammad-'Alí. They expelled the Master and His family from the Mansion. There were almost a hundred people in the Mansion. The Master had no son, his daughters were young. It was only when the first American pilgrims came that it was changed. {{p16}}

After the turmoil of the Covenant breakers came the triumph in America of the Cause, its spiritual consequence was the rise of the Cause in the West. Every crisis in the Cause has its spiritual benefit, spiritual consequence. A crisis suffered by the Master or by the Cause has its direct spiritual effect in the Cause. It was a very severe test to the believers when the whole family sided with Muḥammad-'Alí. The Master had no Sons, no man in His family to send messages by to the believers. His sense of mourning for Bahá'u'lláh was deepened by His family turning against Him. This was dispersed by the arrival of the first pilgrims from the West. The rise of the Armenians in Egypt against the Spiritual Assembly which they tried to undermine by establishing a "Scientific Society" and which they fought against is an example of this law. They sought to fight against the Spiritual Assembly and after this, as a direct spiritual consequence of it, came the first Bahá'í Convention in Egypt, the establishment of the N.S.A., and the pronouncement of the Muslim authorities, of the independence of the Faith. He believes all this was the direct consequence of the affair of the Armenians. Like Herrigal and Mrs. White in Germany; now Germany has been resurrected. But for this bitter experience, this agony, the Administration would not have been established. Khayru'lláh led to the beginning of the establishment of the Administration in America. The turmoil is the cause, and the rise and consolidation of the movement, the effect. Crises, trials and tests are like spiritual food — they feed the body of the Cause — they do not subvert it, because there is a foundation, the tempest does not uproot the Cause it reinforces its roots. The Cause works in a mysterious way. It has its ups and downs, its ups and downs. The Cause is growing and as it grows it must show signs of disorder. If there is no disturbance in the Cause it is a sign of stagnation. The greater the growth of the Cause the greater will be the disturbances which the Cause itself originates. This does not mean that every one of the disturbances is God-sent; the lesser disturbances are due less to the attacks of its enemies than to the unwisdom of its friends. We must not lose heart, get discouraged. The completion of the Temple (in America) will arouse agitation in the Cause. The achievement of such a triumph of the Cause will itself arouse turmoil; it will arouse its watchful enemies. The Muḥammadans are destined to oppose the Cause very fiercely in India, the Hindus in the distant future. The wailing and lamenting of China and India, which the Master referred to — (These allusions are in a Tablet of the Master addressed to the Great Afnán, the cousin of the Báb,) is this opposition of the Hindus and Buddhists to the Cause. Opposition is not yet even born in America. It will spread from America to England. The declaration of Bahá'u'lláh in Baghdád, His banishment from Persia which preserved His life, were all the direct consequence of the martyrdom of the Báb. His Tablets to the kings and rulers were the result of His banishment to Constantinople and Adrianople just after He had declared Himself and things were better. The fulfillment of all biblical prophecies was again the result of His being exiled to 'Akká, where no one thought He would ever survive. {{p17}}

The violation of the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh had as its first direct consequence, the establishment of the Cause in the West. As the Master was waiting for the ship to come and take Him away, He wrote the Tablet to the Great Afnán. He does not think the friends realize that the crisis begets the triumph, just as the coming war is the begetter of the Most Great Peace. Every crisis in God's plan is but the prelude to a triumph. {{p18}}

THE SUCCESSION IN THE BAHÁ'Í, CHRISTIAN, AND MUḤAMMADAN RELIGIONS.

ALSO ISLÁM. {{p19}}

Luther could have never opposed the pope, nor Paul, Peter, if the terms of the Bible had been at all like this Dispensation. Peter was so simple he divided his food into seven portions and when he arrived at the last one he knew it was the day of rest. Forty days after the death of Muḥammad the schism started in Islám. Sunní means democratic in Arabic: "Majority of the people," Shí'ah means "Upholding the family of the Prophet." 'Umar appealed to the democratic element, "He said the people have to elect the successor." We must become Shí'ah Muslims before becoming Bahá'ís. No Bahá'í in the West can be called a Bahá'í unless he is first Muslim (believer in Muḥammad's revelation and teachings and the Imáms) and a Sunní Muḥammadan can never become a Bahá'í unless he becomes first a Shí'ah Muslim. The Sunnís were following a false line, they must recognize their error and accept the Shí'ah truth and then this Revelation. The fact that the Báb is a lineal descendant of Muḥammad is sufficient proof for us that the line of the Imám Ḥusayn (son of 'Alí, son-in-law of the Prophet) was the authentic one. Could the Báb have descended from a line of usurpers? In the light of Bahá'u'lláh's tribute to the Imám Ḥusayn could we doubt it? So must the Jews first become Christians, then Shí'ah Muḥammadans, then Bahá'ís. Paul usurped the right of Peter as the Caliphs usurped the right of 'Alí. The Bahá'ís must sympathize with Peter as they do with 'Alí, because both had their rights usurped.

In Christianity there are two weak points; There was no right of interpretation given definitely, and it was vague as far as the succession was concerned. Also no administrative Principles in the Gospels, no administrative order has been given. No statement that Peter is the sole successor and interpreter, thus giving a chance for Paul to say He is the co-successor; nor does the succession invest any successors after Him with the same authority. One of the reasons why we consider Islám an improvement on Christianity is because we have the laws, Pilgrimage, Fasting, Marriage, Inheritance; these were all in the Qur'án from the Founder and could not be corrupted by either Sunnís or Shí'ah. This was an improvement of Muḥammadanism over Christianity, because of these administrative institutions and laws. There is not one reference in the Qur'án to succession, but traditions were enough to give the succession to 'Alí, but as no quotations could be found in the Qur'án to substantiate these, the Sunnís rebelled. Now comes the Bahá'í Revelation.

In the Bahá'í Revelation we have the institutions and laws and succession. The Báb referred to it, but it was vague again. In the Gospel there is a reference to succession, but no administrative principles, institutions or order. In the Qur'án there is reference to administrative principles, laws, etc., but no reference to the succession. The Bábí Revelation referred to both, but vaguely. The Bahá'í Revelation has administrative institutions established by Bahá'u'lláh and made clear in the Master's Will and Testament. The Master's Will appointed both the successor and interpreter. {{p20}}

No other Revelation has this. Forty days after the death of Muḥammad the schism occurred, the Caliph rejected 'Alí. The split in Christianity was not Luther, but Paul versus Peter. Decline is an inevitable result of schism. There can be no schism in this Cause, hence no decline. Differences are inevitable, but schism is impossible in the Cause. One is inevitable, the other impossible. The Cause is like the body of a man, growing continuously, and crises occur which are a sign of growth. There will always be crises even in the Golden age. The Golden Age will witness no decline. It is a new phase — the Golden Age. The Báb says: "All the world will accept My Revelation."

After all Peter was the most stupid among the Apostles, and yet he was the successor to Jesus — that is what it amounts to. 'Umar had more experience, was more powerful, and yet Muḥammad chose 'Alí. The Bahá'ís must believe in the primacy of Peter as in the primacy of ‘Alí. Many of the traditions quoted by Bahá’u’lláh which He considers as binding in authority as that of Muḥammad (though the station of the Imáms is not the same) are from the Imáms. Peter’s position in relation to Christianity and ‘Alí’s in relation to Islám is represented by two institutions in the Cause: the Guardianship and the International House of Justice.

He considers the mission of the Bahá’ís in the West, more particularly the Americans, is to establish Islám in the West. Even if this Movement had not sprung from Islám, we should establish it, vindicate it, establish its divine origin because it is the later Revelation than Christianity, a step further in Divine Revelation. For its own sake we should do this. Not convert people to its institutions, but to the truth of the Muḥammadan Faith, the Imáms, etc. Now it happens that this fuller Revelation is the parent of the Bahá’í Revelation. A believer can never be considered a believer unless he recognizes the truth of Islám and accepts it as a fuller one than Christianity.

A Bahá’í must first become a Muslim before he becomes a Bahá’í, and how can he do this unless he studies and knows Islám? Not only become a Muḥammadan but a Shí’ah Muḥammadan. We must be wholly detached from our feelings and beliefs, discard them, throw them away. People can appreciate the Cause much better if they are familiar with Islám. Islám is a fuller revelation. It is blasphemy to believe that Islám was not meant to be a universal religion. There is a point of similarity between our Faith and Islám that does not exist with Christianity because every word is a word of God, divinely revealed, this is not true of the Gospels. The Gospel is so fragmentary, so unreliable, we can scarcely trust everything in it. We cannot be sure these are the exact words of Jesus. The Trinity, for example, each a God and all three Gods are One — they call it a mystery, it is nothing but supposition. The “Beloved” is a new word used by Bahá’u’lláh, it is confined to the Bahá’í teachings.

Secularization will increase in ‘Iráq to such an extent that maybe the Holy Tombs of the Imáms may be desecrated. {{p21}}

Islám will greatly suffer. The Jews were punished for two thousand years. The Muslims — Sunnís and Shí’ahs — will suffer for a long time (because of persecuting the Báb and Bahá’u’lláh, opposing the Cause, etc.) It is their turn now to suffer, they will suffer in proportion to their crime. Then it will be the role of the Bahá’ís to vindicate the glory of the Imáms, establish their spiritual position and significance. The important thing to remember about the 12th Imám is that he died — not disappeared — died.

We must teach Islám with courage and not mind criticism.

Mustapha Kemal, an avowed Muslim, overthrew the Caliphate. That is very significant. The Temple of Solomon was destroyed by a Roman, but a Muslim, calling himself one, has dealt such a blow to Islám! The Caliphate and the Sultánate were both overthrown by him. How humiliating this is to the Faith of Islám. Mustapha Kemal did it; he overthrew the Caliphate and Sultánate, the arch-enemy of this Faith. To re-establish Islám from a spiritual point of view, will be one of the tasks of the Bahá'ís in the Golden Age. To vindicate the spiritual position of the Imáms, not to re-establish the machinery of Islám. It is these crises in the world than unfold to us the importance of these events.

Explanation of Sacred Writing

Bahá'í, Christian, Muḥammadan

Meanings of, “He is God, “the identity of God with God, of the Prophet with God, of Bahá'u'lláh with God, of the Báb with Bahá'u'lláh.

The Báb in Chapter III of the Persian Bayán, uses the word “Order”: “Happy if the man who fixeth his gaze upon the Order of Bahá'u'lláh and renders thanks unto His Lord.”

The Qayyúmu'l-Asmá' was regarded as the Qur'án of the Bábís.

The Shaking in the Qur'án: “The earth shall tell her news.” refers to the Most Great Peace. The Daybreak, in the Qur'án; “When the earth is made to crumble to pieces.” refers to the next war and may be taken literally, bombs, etc.

Súrah of Joseph was the only work of the Báb in the possession of those who were martyred in Zanzan, Nayris and Tabersi. Táhiriht was the one who translated it into Persian.

Íqán was written by Bahá'u'lláh while he was a follower of the Báb, before His own Revelation. The title page of Nabíl is Bahá'u'lláh's reference to the Báb from the Íqán.

Page 16 of Gleanings — ‘Ere long He will sail His Ark upon thee.’ etc., Ark symbolizes the legislative body — the International House of Justice who will sit in Haifa.

Page 16 of Gleanings — ‘Call out to Zion.’ Zion is a hill near Jerusalem and here it means Jerusalem the Holy City.

Page 9 of Gleanings — ‘Except them whom God was pleaded to guide.’ Predestination and free will will always be a mystery, we can never draw a clear line between them. Like the origin of evil, we cannot get at the bottom of it. We have a certain amount of free will, if we don’t use it we are deprived of the flow of these forces. (i.e. promises made in the teachings regarding progress, etc.)

“The lamb and the lion will lie down together;” One explanation is big and little nations; they have all equal rights and representation in a world government, like States in the U.S.A.

Pages 16-16 of Gleanings. “the terms “His Throne.” “City of God.” And “Celestial Kaaba,” all refer to the Holy Shrine either of the Báb or perhaps in the future of Bahá’u’lláh.

Bahá’u’lláh refers to two wholesome things in Gleanings. (Pages 216, 342-3) civilization ends liberty which, if carried to excess, will exercise a pernicious influence on man, and also civilization which if allowed to overleap its bounds will bring evil upon men. So even devotion to the Cause if carried to excess leads to fanaticism. Refereces to Civilization. “when its flame will devour the Cities is a prophecy referring to the bombing of the cities in the next war. Western civilization will commit suicide in he next war becuse by the very weapons it has created it will destroy itself.

Saratu’l-Haykal is the fulfillment of the prophecy in the Bible. “The branch shall build the Temple of the Lord.” Bahá’u’lláh stated this after He had revealed it.

The “Evil One” is the self, the corrupt nature in man. (See ‘Bahá’í Administration.’)

The divorce law is made very easy by Bahá’u’lláh and marriage very difficult; but the Master, because of the ease of the divorce law, discourages divorce extremely. There is in Bahá’í divorce aabsolute equality. According to the Bahá’í law the husband must pay the wife’s expenses for the year they are separated, then they come together and if they still wish to divorce it becomes immediately effective. They can remarry. Regarding marriage, the parents must be quite detached and uninfluenced by the wishes, the standards and the ideas of the marrying ones. But in divorce they need consult no one. “We have wisdom in requiring the consent of the parents. Our purpose is to promote unity and not disunity.” Sais Bahá’u’lláh. Marriage is not something that concerns two people, it is asocial institution.

In Bahá’í Marriage they must go to the Spiritual Assembly, not to an individual — this is priesthood?

“The Cord that none can sever, “referred to in the Gleanings:” Cord in general means His love.

The Visitation Tablet for the Tombs of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh is three parts: first part was revealed by Bahá'u'lláh to a believer who could not make the pilgrimage. A few days after the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh the Master asked Nabíl to arrange selections to be chanted in the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. Of the Tablet of Visitation the first part is not addressed to God but to Bahá'u'lláh Himself. The second part is a prayer revealed by Bahá'u'lláh and the remaining paragraphs refer again to Bahá'u'lláh and not to God direct. It has been used ever since as the Visitation Tablet.

The laws of the Aqdas can never be touched or changed by any International House of Justice. (See “Confusion of Tongus.” — interesting in this connection.)

The Valley of the Indus in India is the cradle o the Aryan race, say Bahá'u'lláh.

Referring to the promises made in the Son of the Wolf: in the pages “he who says Alláh-u-Abhá and counts forty names on the shore of ‘Akká, etc., etc.,) these promises are true forever, not only for Bahá'u'lláh's lifetime.

The confusion of tongues referred to in the Gleanings is true historically. Once there was one race, one tongue, in Northern India which migrated and became parent race to Persia, parts of Europe, etc., but not of the whole world at once.

The Prophet is not a scientist or a sociologist, He is forever authoritative in whatever He states, but does not elaborate. (See Chart attached).

Page 12. Epistle to the Son of the Wolf: Book of Fatimith referred to was a book which the daughter of the Prophet, Fatimith, saw revealed to her in a dream by Gabriel. She was overcome by grief after the death of her husband, ‘Alí, the martyrdom of the 3rd Imám Ḥusayn, and the death of the second Imám Ḥasan, both of whom were her sons, as well as the death of her father the Prophet. The angel Gabriel revealed words of consolation to her which, however, were never known; and also promised her that from her issue the promised One would appear. Shí‘ah tradition believed that the Promised One would bring these words again. When Bahá’u’lláh revealed the Hidden Words, He called them the “Book of Fáṭimih.” They were revealed before His declaration. Later they became known as the Hidden Words because they were hidden all the centuries between Fatimith’s vision of them and the appearance of the Promised One.

The prayer for the dead is the only congregational prayer in the Cause — (not yet translated).

What the friends consider to be the Star Tablet is not the Star Tablet to which the Master refers. The Báb revealed many Tablets in the star shape, but the original Tablet with the 300 odd derivations of Bahá’ is lost.

Quddús’s station is higher than any other Letter of the Living.

The Báb’s taking Quddús to Mecca with Him apparently invested him with that peculiar authority he later manifested.

The Epistle to the Son of the Wolf: Page 37; “He will stand by you and your Empire shall extend over all the land’s lighted by the Sun.” This is to be taken literally. If Napoleon the III had accepted the Cause his material empire would have extended over the whole earth. He (i.e. Manifestation) gives men the means to use what God has given them. Men are not born equal; that is the fundamental principal of the Cause.

The power of the Greatest Name can either mean power in the name of Bahá’u’lláh and His Attributes, or the repetition of the Greatest Name, Ya-Bahá’u’l-Abhá.

“Hidden Words:” “Myriads of hidden mysteries are made vocal in a single speech, etc., “refers to the manifold meanings of Bahá’u’lláh’s utterance.

In the Christian dispensation that ray that proceeds from God is called the Holy Ghost. In the Qur’án, the Muslim dispensation, it was the Angel Gabriel. The Trinity in Christianity was the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost was in the form of a dove. In the Muḥammadan dispensation it was Alláh, the Apostle and the Angel Gabriel who were the trinity. In the Bahá’í Dispensation the Most Great Spirit is the Holy Ghost or ray. On page 17 of Dispensation of Bahá’u’lláh it says: “The Holy Spirit itself has been generated through the agency of a single letter revealed by this Most Great Spirit. (D. See E.) — “if be of them that comprehend.” This only means the superiority of the Bahá’í Revelation and is not symbolized as in the dove, in the Christian, and the from of the Angel Gabriel in the Muḥammadan Dispensation. The term “Most Great” means the consummation of a cycle but not finality. Finality different from consummation and culmination of a cycle, Most Great in the sense of consummation and not finality.

We believe the trinity: in God, the Prophet and the Holy Spirit, but not as the Christians do. To us it is human heresy because we believe that the sun, the ray and the mirror always remain each themselves. The mirror never becomes the sun, or the ray the mirror, or the sun the ray. So God, the Holy Spirit and the Prophet are each distinct and their relation that of the Sun, they ray and the mirror.

In the Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, there is reference to a hidden language and a hidden script. Shoghi Effendi himself asked the Master regarding this, and He said that no one ever asked Bahá’u’lláh regarding this, so it remained hidden in the stores of His knowledge.

“The Shrill of the Supreme Pen.” is Bahá’u’lláh’s reference to the reed pen with which He wrote.

When the Aqdas is translated the Bahá’ís will realized to what extension Bahá’u’lláh has abrogated the laws of previous dispensations.

The spiritual significance of the resurrection we believe in absolutely on the authority of Bahá’u’lláh. It often happens that Bahá’u’lláh’s quotations differ from that of the text of the Gospel. We must of course accept His words as the gospel themselves do not agree and were written down many years later. The Gospel must not be taken literally. The text is not authoritative in the sense that the Qur’án is. The proof is that Bahá’u’lláh, when quoting Christ, quotes Him in a way that is different from the Gospels.

In the Will and Testament where it says, “Under the shelter and guidance of His Holiness, the Exalted One.” refers to the Báb. The Exalted One is always the Báb.

The friends of the West are familiar with the principles. There are two pillars of the Faith; principles and laws, they are the warp and the woof of the fabric.
