O maidservant of God! Rely upon the Bounty of thy master, for, verily, thou art firm and steadfast, and His Favor is great and great toward thee. But make firm the hearts of the maidservants and believers in this Cause, which the greatest powers of the world cannot withstand, and which spreads in spite of all through the Power of the Kingdom of God.

Upon thee be greeting and praise.

APPENDIX IV,

PORTIONS OF TABLETS SENT BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ To Mrs. Helen S. Goodall {{p77}} Translated by Antun F. Haddad

In The Hidden Words “Leave the ego” means that man must leave his passions and lusts, his human sentiments, his personal interests and aims, and seek the Spiritual Fragrances and Heavenly Attractions, and become drowned in the sea of redemption, and drawn to the Beauty of Al-Abhá.[^]

[^] Shoghi Effendi translates this phrase as “Renounce thy self.” See Bahá’u’lláh, Hidden Words, p. 35, no. 38. — Ed.

In The Hidden Words “Remember the covenant you entered into with Me upon Mount Paran” means that in relation to the Truth (God) the past, the present, and the future are regarded as one time, but in relation to the created beings, the past has passed and expired, the present is about vanishing, and the future is the place of hopes.[^]

Of the fundamental principles of the Law of God, there is one which means that in every Prophetic Mission God taketh a covenant from all the souls which come up to the end of that mission, which is the Promised Day of the Appearance of a Promised Person.

Look back to Moses, the Interlocutor. Verily, He took the Covenant of Christ upon the Mount of Sinai {{p91}} from all the souls who came in the time of Christ. Those souls, though they came after Moses by ages and generations, yet, with reference to the Covenant which is sanctified from time, they were present. But the Jews were heedless and did not remember, so they fell into a manifest loss.

In the Arabic Hidden Words “No peace was ordained for thee save by cutting the ego from thyself”: It means that man, also, must not seek for himself in this perishable world anything, but must be separated from it — i.e., he must redeem his whole soul under all conditions, in the place of martyrdom, on the appearing of its Lord.[^]

THE INCIDENT OF THE DEPARTURE OF MÍRZÁ ASADU’LLÁH FROM HAIFA AT THE TIME OF THE DISTURBANCE IN 1905

Through Dr. Amin Farid, January, 1903.

As to thy question concerning the “Minor Resurrection” and the first creation, this is the appearance of the Báb, the Great, His Holiness the Supreme. But the “Major Resurrection” signifies the Manifestation of the Preexistent Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh), the GREATEST NAME. (May My Spirit be a sacrifice for His beloved!)

By the majesty of My Lord, your gathering in the meeting of Oneness, your commemoration of God with a pure heart, and your association with a spirit rejoiced by the Spirit of God in the Great Day profiteth you more than all favors and this Bounty surpasseth all wishes.

O maidservant of God, assemble the maidservants of the merciful with all spirituality and fragrance, love and attraction, and raise your voice in the praise and {{p92}} glory of your Majestic Lord for His abundant mercy and great favor of guidance.

Upon thee be greeting and praise. (Signed) ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS. ALLÁH-U-ABHÁ!

Alláh'u'Abhá! {.greet}

‘Akká, Syria, January 16, 1908. {.date .greet}

Beloved sister: {.greet}

Our glorious visit is nearly ended, but you must have at least a few lines from this Blessed Spot and the beautiful, special message our Lord sent to you.

Blessed are those who attain to the second visit, after a few years of even small service, for it is indeed a wonderful experience. Not only has my soul been bathed again in that perfect ocean of Divine Love and drank of that “peace that passeth all understanding, even more deeply and consciously than before, but each day has brought its lesson, - practical, matter of fact and homely, - of what it means to live the life.”

This has impressed me so strongly that truly I feel, and in all reverence I say it, that to the Attributes and Perfections that belong to God ought to be added Great Common Sense! You remember in what a state of mind we all came the first time (due mostly to our unfortunate early teaching), I know, for my part, I had the feeling that I must (if possible) do something extraordinary or dramatic in order to show my spirituality and my appreciation of my great privileges?

Our Beloved Master expects no such demonstration. He greeted us with a warm, strong hand-clasp, as might any other dear friend, adding the welcome of Him wonderful eyes and voice and smile, which, thank God, are unlike any other in all the world! He would not have permitted us to kneel if we had attempted it True, I did kiss His hand, but He deprecated even that One is always at His feet, nothing, else could be possible – but He does not care for the outward act, the personal homage, and discourages it upon every occasion: only another of the myriad proofs of His true Greatness.

But it smites one’s heart to see how the years increase His great Burden, and the strongest thought that comes and comes insistently is, O! if our believers could only realize that it is not by weeping at His feet they can best show their love for Him, but by promptly obeying His Command to unite in love and harmony, so that this Cause shall spread as it should, in America, before He has to leave the world. If they could only hear His voice as He asks so tenderly after their welfare; they could only see that Beloved race light up when we tell Him of the splendid service of some faithful one; if they could only hear Him say that nothing in the Prison makes Him sad, no matter how great the turmoil here, no matter how great even the fact of His own death - nothing has the power to sadden Him for an instant - except the inharmonony among the believers, and nothing can give them such happiness, He adds, with that wonderful, patient smile, "as to hear of their love and unity."

O! it does 'Akká to me that nothing in heaven or earth would prevent them from uniting as He wishes, to begin immediately to bend all their forces, physical, mental and spiritual, to that supreme end. For, verily, has He not promised that when this is done the blessings will begin to flow? It is the one thing He has been waiting for these nine years. It is the only thing that we have the power to do for Him. This seems to us the most tremendous message we can bring from here for the beloved in America. And yet, He has not uttered one word of complaint on the subject!

We have been here nearly two weeks and something joyous happens every day. One afternoon we held a regular reception. There were a number of pilgrims from Persia, among them three or four Jews from Hammedan, Who were most anxious to see the Americans. So they came to our room in groups and after them the resident believers also in two or three groups, for our little room would not hold them all at once. It was such a keen pleasure to look upon those, illumined faces, to see the steadfastness glowing in their clear eyes, to hear their enthusiastic welcome and their devout, "El hamd el Alláh!" that they had lived to see with their own eyes the prophecies of the Holy Books fulfilled in these days! The Jews interested us so much; they were new believers and such enthusiasm is good for the cool (?) Anglo-Saxon to see. We told them about Mr. Frankland and they thanked God for him.

Dear Mírzá Asadu'lláh was also here for a few days and made us several little visits. I gave him your particular greetings and he sent his love to you. He says the Master is very anxious that the Temple should be built, and he, himself, is just full of the subject. He said: "I know many of the believers think they are poor and because they cannot bring much they will not bring anything to the building of the Temple, but if they would each bring only one stone, the building would be finished. All must help, must, unite in the matter. The Temple is God's and while the people are poor, God is rich and if they will only make an effort and lay the first stone, God will help them, as the believers in Iskhabad were helped, and before they know it, the Temple will be done."

The dear old man says he loves the American believers very much. We told him that they loved him very much. He smiled and said: "Because they are all my children."

A number of the visitors are from 'Ishqábád – two of them women. We told there that we knew all out their Temple and were much interested, having seen photographs, etc., and they seemed very pleased. All ask after the American believers and show such sincere love for them, always speaking of the wonderful Power of the Word of God that has brought people together from opposite sides of the earth. Their depth of devotion seems to be no end and you could easily imagine any one of them becoming a martyr without a moment's warning.

One day our Lord held a Feast for these pilgrims, particularly the Jews, and Miss Jack, mother and I were, of course, the only women at the table. The Master pleaded us at the head with Mírzá Asadu'lláh on one side and on the other the old, old uncle of Mírzá Mohsin and cousin of the Báb, who has come to 'Akká to end his days, his active work being over.

The Master stood near the door, with the pitcher in His hand, and as the man filed in and held their hands over Vi howl, He poured the water, while He spoke cheerful words of greeting to each one, saying: "Bismillah! Bismillah!" with every breath. It was a long table (in the large entrance bail of the new home), yet it would not hold then all and about six or eight were left over. They sat down late, with the Master, to the second helping. He, of course, served with the assistance of two or three others. As it was not the regular nineteen day Feast I will not go into details here except to say that when the Master spoke, after they had nearly finished, it was on the subject of wren. He began by explaining that this Feast was for the visiting Jews - then said: "In this Day God has manifested ONE Light and to this Light are attracted all religions. Today three of them are gathered around this table, Muḥammadans, Christians, Jews. We must all thank God for the privilege of this sitting together, for this gathering is a symbol of the Unity of the Kingdom of God, when all nations, all creeds, all races, all religions, will gather in unity, under one tent, under the Shade of O Tree, and at one Table, to partake of Spiritual Food." Then He came and stood close behind us, saying: "In the olden times it was not possible for the woven to sit in equality at the same table with the men, but in this Day it is different, and the difference has been brought about very largely by the position given to women in free America, - so that it has been made possible for these American women to sit at table with these men in perfect equality, by the Power of Bahá'u'lláh, showing that in the Kingdom of ABHÁ there is no difference between the woman and the man. He said it made Him very happy to see us all gathered there and He hopes that the fragrance of this meeting will reach the nostrils of the believers all over the world and make them glad. (He said) "Such meetings have an effect on all the people."

You see it was a little lesson for these new Oriental believers. Such are our daily lessons in this house!

It is both impressive and touching to watch the family life of the Household. Yet, while everything and every member revolves around that shining Center, who is the very Source of Existence, not the least show is made of their care or their constant watchfulness. While all, even the youngest little maid who serves, are ever on the alert, and no strange footstep, no creaking door, escapes their sharpened ears, - not a trace of anxiety is apparent in face or manner; all their precautions are taken so quietly that their guests shall not be saddened by the hint of their prison conditions or made to realize that on the account Extra caution necessary! is this not true hospitality?

Of course, every pilgrim understands the situation and is only too glad to help the efforts of it Holy Family by keeping the way of curious unbelievers who come to call, and never forget the precautions position of the glorious Prisoner.

While the daily life cannot be entirely systematic, for unexpected circumstances may determine every domestic event, - meals waiting upon the convenience of any Turkish visitor, - the sweet serenity of these beautiful people is never broken, as you know. They may sigh a little that their Beloved Lord is kit so long and tired so much, but the sigh is accompanied by a smile, while they explain that although it is hard for Him and takes His precious, precious time, He is only obeying the Commands of the Blessed Perfection, to be kind and hospitable, to all comers, whether they be friends or enemies. Yet this same strain continues day after day, week after week year after year. Otherwise they pursue their daily tasks render their sweet service make their little sacrifices, teach their children and play with them too, - short, carry out, under these extraordinary conditions, a perfect ideal of human family life. They are so simple, so sane so perfectly poised that there is no need of any pose, - simply a calm acceptance of Gods s Will and Wisdom in every little thing,, and a sure understanding of the future blessing which will be the fruit of their present patience, - blessing for all the people of the world. These are son of the results of living with such an Educator. These are our daily object lessons. At the same time they show a most comforting, joyous, human side and it is a delight to see how they make merry over every little joke, getting out of it, every bit of laughter it contains encouraging each other to seize every opportunity of looking at the bright, light aspect of life, thus (detracting their minds fry the tragic side of their existence. Even the Master, Himself, hardly ever came to the table without beginning to chaff Miss Jack about being now on the roll of the prisoners (she is to stay a year and teach) and asking what she would do if they should surround her with Turkish soldiers; and one day Monever Khánun came in to lunch a little late and greeted us, for we had not seen her before on that day, and He immediately turned to her with a twinkle and asked how it was she was saying "Good morning" at that hour, and why she had not seen us earlier. We explained that Miss. Zack was to blame, having given her a long, strenuous English lesson. He laughingly said to Miss Jack: 'If you keep her away from our guests I Ethan ham, to punish you. At which lass Jack asked, And He promptly brought His hands smartly together with great glee as He said, in English: "Slap! Slap!" He was pleased when we responded to Him in the same spirit and told u over and over again, that He wished to see us always smiling and happy.

Thus, by this blessed relief of humor, you see He constantly preserves the balance.

This letter was not finished when it should have been, on account of a few days illness. Have you ever been sick at 'Akká? It would be worth a good deal of suffering to experience, in that Holy Place, the tender care, the cheerful service and devoted attention all lavished with such infinite love, as a simple matter-of-course. Our Lord came in to see me at least twice a day. On the third day, as I was not better, He sat by my bedside, holding my hand, and said, in that tactful, sweet way of His: "We are commanded by the Blessed Perfection to consult a physician when we are sick." Of course taws doctor came, and after one day of following his advice, I was well enough to get up and travel. But I was delighted at the way in which the doctor was suggested (I had not thought it necessary when Monever Khanun spoke of him). Our Lord did, not command me. He said. I should do just c.4.s I liked. Of course I "liked" to follow His suggestion, and was it not a nice lesson, too?

Well, we had to say good bye at last, but we told our Beloved that we could not, say it as the English do, but only the French, "Au revoir." He liked that and said it, too, in French, so promptly, that it softened: our parting by giving us hope that indeed we may be permitted to see His beautiful Face once again before that long parting comes, when His Glorious Presence will be withdrawn from our earthly vision and only the wondrous memory and its Spiritual Power will remain with us to light us on to the end of our path of service in His Name.

We were obliged to spend the night in Haifa (after the ineffable experience at the Holy Tomb, which you understand so well) and as we stood and watched the moon rise over the Lebanon mountains, in the most melting, exquisite blending of blues I have ever seen, sea, sky, mountains and the arm peaks beyond, - I could not help but think, as the rich golden flood lit up that Holy City, how much it looked like a precious White Casket that holds the Jewel of the world. For indeed, (as Miss Barney says) is lie not like a perfect diamond, - that "gem of purest ray serene," - without a fault or flaw, so surely cut, so completely polished, that through whatever facet of those many, many sides of a soul may look he will be able to see and understand and receive the, full, perfect, brilliant tight of the Whole Perfect Gem? (If I am indebted to anyone for this fancy, I gratefully acknowledge my obligation). So beautiful was this vision that it seemed like a benediction - the calm, unspoken voice of nature echoing the last sweet farewell. It sent us to bed happy, but not to sleep, - O! dear, no. such a spiritual "waking up" as we have had, - it seems as if we should never sleep again!

One more little note about the Temple. The name, "Mashriqu'l-Adhkár," means, literally, the Rising Place or Dawning Point of Mention, or the Place for the mentioning of God; and the Master said that the believers were to her there every morning to read the WORDS of Bahá'u'lláh - which you see will mean that it is to be open every day.

This is a horrid, scrawly letter, dear one, but we shall see you so soon that were it not for your message I should not send it at all. Our Lord sent His love and greetings to all the friends in America and said, with such yearning in His eyes and voice: "I wish the believers could know how much I love them. I would give My life for them."

Mother joins me in loving greetings to you and your dear husband and all the friends whom we hope soon to see.

We thought and talked of you both many times in His Presence, just as we prayed for you both at the Holy Tomb.

He said: "Give Mrs. Brittingham My best love and greetings and tell her that her services that she renders to this Cause are always before My eyes. They are written in the Book of the Kingdom, - in the Heavenly Book, - and will never be forgotten; and before long they will be written in the pages of the world in glorified writing which shall be read by all the people."

He said: "Give Mr. Brittingham My greetings and love. He should consider his wife as the crown upon his head. Through her he received the message and although he should strive all his days, and shower upon her all the wealth of the earth, he would still be in her debt, for she has given him the Life Eternal, the Everlasting Kingdom of God, - and there is no Gift equal to this."

Blessed are ye both for such remembrance! {.sig}

Faithfully your sister in the service, {.sig}

Ethel Rosenberg

January 1909

I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá {{p1}} what could be done to increase our numbers and make the work more effective.

He said the one essential, the only thing to do was that the members of the little groups should love each other very much and be devoted friends. The more they loved each other, the more the meetings would attract and draw others, and the more they loved, the more their influence would be felt.

He said we must consider all people — not only the believers — to be good. He hoped every one would be good. He added: “I say this for you in English. I do not often do that; but I say also in English, that you may understand how much I mean it, that LOVE is the foundation of everything, and that all must be good.

While looking from the window, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “We hear the murmur of the sea always continuing. It never ceases. Were it to cease, the world would be dead, stagnant, lifeless. But the waves of the mind of man are far greater than those of the sea.; they also are ceaseless. They never stop for one instant. This movement is good. If these waves of the mind are few, the man is dull and quiet. What pearls and jewels are contained in the depths of the sea! But the pearls and jewels hidden in the mind of man are knowledge, virtues, capabilities, etc. These pearls can grow and increase in lustre forever, but the pearls of the sea remain always the same. These waves from our minds go forth and create movement and thought in other minds. From one strong thought of love what great results may be produced!”

A question sent by a believer: “What is the meaning of Christ’s eating the fish and honey after His Resurrection?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered: “All these things — the fish, the honey comb, etc., are symbols, and were meant to be understood spiritually, just as the Resurrection itself was a spiritual resurrection. But because the people who received these teachings from the first teachers were ignorant, they understood them literally.”

January 9th — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “We know that the body or form has nothing to do with spirit or spiritual conditions. When the spirit is disconnected with or leaves the body, that is no reason for thinking it can be re-absorbed or joined with the whole of spirit, as the drops of water are absorbed or lost in the sea. The earth is one unit, yet how many beings and separate part it contains! The body of man is one unit, yet it has an infinite number of separate and individual parts that compose it — such as eyes, hands, fingers, etc. {{p2}} So, in like manner, is Spirit ONE, but consisting of many differentiated parts.”

---

During a former visit to ‘Akká, when conditions for the prisoners were more severe, Miss Rosenberg was deeply distressed and asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá why He, Who was so perfect, should have to endure such suffering.

He answered: “How could They (the Manifestations) teach and guide others in the Way if They Themselves did not undergo every species of suffering to which other human beings are subject?”

P.S. — We hope you will remember us and all the Believers whom you meet, especially Mr. Remey of Washington, and say thanks to him for the pains he supports in the service of the Kingdom of the Lord of Hosts, and also for his kindness in advertising to the Bahá’í Assemblies throughout America to have correspondence with Persian Bahá’í Assemblies.

With greetings of love, Reunion Morattebe

My dear beloved Bahá’í sister:

I, who am the translator of the Reunion Morattabe, have honor to send you my personal Bahá’í greetings of love and kindness. Since it is just a few weeks I have begun to translate Bahá’í letters from English to Persian, or on the contrary, I may have mistakes, for which I hope you will kindly excuse me.

Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, who is a Persian young man in Washington, and is a translator of the Holy Tablets, is my cousin. If you will have any correspondence with him, or you may meet him some time, I hope you will kindly remember me to him.

Your most sincere Bahá’í brother, Anayatullah

Account of our Visit In Haifa and 'Akká

Joseph Hannen

February 20th, 28th inclusive 1909

We arrived in Haifa about 10 A. M. after a most stormy voyage and were at anchor until nearly 5 o'clock before finally landing. Meanwhile it seems the crowning event in the history of 'Akká was being enacted in part in that our Lord had for practically the first time availed himself and the Believers of the newly given freedom by coming to Haifa with half of the Pilgrims now at 'Akká and publicly celebrating a Feast at Mt. Carmel. Tomorrow the other half is to go there and we are told that we may participate at the hotel, we were visited just before supper by Mírzá Jalál Effendi and Mírzá Munír Zain who conveyed to us the startling and glad news that our Lord was in Haifa and would receive us after supper. So at 7:30 we were escorted under a canopy of brilliant stars which fairly sang with the glory of the expected meeting. The home presented a brilliant and off on the mountain side half way to the summit or farther gleamed an eye as it were which was pointed out to us, as marking the site of the Tomb of the Báb. It was as if a great eye were beaming upon us – that even so long after His departure that Holy One was to be our Gate to Heaven.

Entering through stately gates we were ushered into a parlor where we awaited our summons, which was given in a moment. Thus with the slightest preparation we were to meet our Lord. Words cannot describe the scene which followed. If the soul could speak its language might by being a million times richer than that of the mind fully convey our emotions. Asking after our health and journey first bidding us welcome. The Master spoke of the joy imparted by the visit of Mrs. Hannen's sister dwelling particularly on the work of Miss Alma Knobloch in Stuttgart. He said that while others had conquered Germany in the past and had in turn been deposed this conquest would be immortal Napoleon ruled but a little while, this rule would be never ending. She would be greatly blessed in her work. She is the conqueror of Germany. Mention was made of the privilege we had in coming now so openly, white but recently many had been disappointed and the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Mills who but saw our Lord from a distance and went away happy, was cited. The Master said it was not the time which counted but the receptivity. One boy may go to a school for ten years and still be a dullard, another may receive but little schooling and be wise. One patient may be given many medicines and yet remain ill, while another receives but one and is cured. One merchant will work hard for years and gain little success; another completes but a single deal and is made rich. So it is not the length of one's sojourn but his receptivity, which determines his blessing.

Taking Mrs. Hannen in to see the ladies of the Holy Household, I chanted with Mírzá Asadu'lláh, Dr. Ammen Ullah Farced, who was our interpreter, and Mírzá Vaheed with Mírzá Munír Zayn. Even when nothing was said – the heart was too full for loquacity, the very silence was eloquent. The great eyes burned with love and the room was filled with heavenly emanations. Returning, our Lord, who had greeted me as His Joseph told me that we should be from tomorrow morning to be His guests at the home of His son-in-law Mírzá Zalah Effendi as he wanted us near Him. He said through His interpreter, "You are my own son" and added in English, "my son, my son." Returning we learned that most of the Pilgrims to be seen tomorrow were Jews. Mentioning the fact that the conversion of this race was regarded in America as one of the strong proofs of the Cause in America. We were told in interesting fact that in Hamadán, Persia, Christian Missionaries have been trying for 12 years to convert the Jews. They had a College for young men and recently the entire student body, all Jews became Bahá'í. Whereupon the missionaries offered to sell the College to the Bahá'ís and this was done. It was recalled that Mírzá Aḥmad Yazdí had told us while in Port Sa'íd that the French Government HAD RECENTLY ASKED THE Tíhrán Assembly, the request being made officially by the French Consul to send Bahá'í Missionaries to Algiers to bring about the union of religious condition in that province which the Christian Churches had not been able to effect.

Returning to our Hotel early at the command of our Lord, to rest. We were lighted by the stars which twinkle a response to the light of happiness in our eyes and helped to sleep by the Voice of the Sea with the Echo of that greater voice in our hearts.

Sunday, February 21, 1909

After breakfast at the Hotel, we were called for by Dr. Faríd and conveyed first to the book's Office and then to the home of Mírzá Jalál adjoining the residence built by Madame Jackson and in which our Lord is at present living, here we were put in possession, the family being in 'Akká just now. Soon the Master sent word that we were to accompany Him to the Holy Tomb on Mount Carmel with the half of the Pilgrims who were to continue the feast of yesterday. A three horse vehicle was occupied by our Lord, Mírzá Zayn as interpreter ourselves in front of Him, an aged and venerable Believer with the driver. On the way, 'Abdu'l-Bahá referred to the fact that we would see Jewish Believers, that the Christian Missionaries had striven for years to convert this people and had done countless things for them, to no avail: but behold! The power of the Word of Bahá'u'lláh – they were now Believers in Christ. This going up to the Mountain of the Lord – Carmel – and the Assemblage there was a fulfilment of the prophecies in Isaiah 2:3 and LVI:6, 7. We found a Karty of about 24 and more carne later. It was explained that some had travelled for weeks and months from distant places one specified 3 months enroute walking, and on horses, donkies and camel just to see our Lord. What greater proof than this could be asked! Following a visit to the Holy Tomb, where the Master chanted the Tablet of Visitation, we partook of a Feast – rice, bread, cheese and clabber – and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá welcomed each one and walked about eating nothing Himself until all had finished and were gone. We sat at the wall with the beautiful panamara – the street leading to the pier straight in front – in the distance ‘Akká – a City of Enchantment, beyond the placid Mediterranean. Various Believers joined us and conversed giving eloquent proof. When the Master appeared, all arose and faced Him. In a while – time passed here like magic – tea was served – Mrs. Hannen chanted the Commune in English and the Arabic Prayer. Then the Pilgrims from Hamadán bade us adieu, as they were going to Jerusalem, because being Jews their people would naturally expect them to go there. The Master would not have them antagonize this feeling. So they sacrifice the time and take the long trip overland because of this. A second visit to the Holy Tomb, where the master again chanted, marked the time to come down. It was my privilege to walk in the footsteps of the Master, and I found it as difficult as one might expect of such an undertaking, stumbling, where He trod firmly. Carmel abounds with beautiful flowers particularly the red anemones, which I had so longed to see and which are now spread around in profession.

While going to the Tomb ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to Mrs. Hannen, “You had a vision about two years ago of going up Mount Carmel and seeing many strange people. This vision will be fulfilled today and you will see the same people you dreamed of,” and so it was.

In conversation, a utterance developed - ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said to Mr. Haney, when he said he should not be able to digest the many spiritual food the ability to digest them goes with the gift.

Our Lord says that the Believers must applaud in the meetings when they desire to do so by saying in unison Ya Bahá’u’lláh, not otherwise such as by clapping etc.

There are four greetings given by the Báb

- Alláh-u-A’zam – God is the Greatest
- Alláh-u-Akbar – God the Most Magnificent
- Alláh-u-Ajmal – God is the Most Beautiful
- Alláh-u-Abhá – God is the Most Glorious

Bahá’u’lláh approved of all these but preferred the latter for greeting at meetings and for the 95 prayers. Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá! Should be used when supplicating in great need. Bahá is glory: Abhá is Most Glorious – viz. Comparative and superlative.

Dr. Faríd to us as Jesus Christ chose for His topics familiar subjects using the objective system of teaching and scorning oratorical effects, so ‘Abdu’l-Bahá taught by and from life. He cited an incident of today, when he met the Master walking in the city after His return from the Tomb. A party of nuns or sisters in a religious garb passed our Lord, indicating them, said to the Believers with Him, “See these women, they have severed themselves from the world and given all to serve God, and to know Him. Consider how blessed you are, to have what is nevertheless denied them.”

Early this morning, before breakfast and when we were just presentable for the day. Our Lord came to us. First asking about our health and if we had rested well. He asked after the health of the Believers in Washington. He said: “It is well to visit in the morning; better than in the evening for the sun is just rising and is typical of the Sun of Divine Revelation. I arise very early, about midnight.”

We asked if we might present the letters and gifts from America now, He was agreeable to this. While we were reaching for them, He said: “You are in yourselves a long and interesting letter from all the Believers, you are a present from the Friends in the Occident. When a merchant wishes to sell any again, he sends a handful of the grain as sample you are the samples of the American Believers.” When I replied that I hoped He would know the goods as being better than the samples, He said: “If the goods are equal to the samples, it is very well.”

Gazing with love upon photographs, accepting gifts and letters with individual interest. He passed to our questions on behalf of the Friends.

A proposed journey was discouraged because of condition in the country to be traversed.

Another was approved.

To a Believer who outlined a trip which has been commanded to be made, but for which he had been unable to obtain a companion, He said: “The Blessed Perfection has forbidden solitary travelling (i.e. for teaching) particularly long distances! Therefore those days of your leisure, namely your vacation, should be spent right in America, going from city to city and delivering the Glad Tidings, so that next year you may find your companion and make this trip. At present, the delivery of the Glad Tidings in the United States is of great importance, because the fame of the Cause has become widely known in America and many are the souls who long to hear more of the teachings. Therefore if you should devote your vacation to the spread of the Glad Tidings right in America it will be productive of greater results. If you are very disereous of making an Eastern Trip this year you may come to ‘Akká for a visit. If however, you should go from City to promulgate the Glad Tidings it is preferable, and a good result will be forthcoming.”

The next question concerned the marriage of a Believer to one not in the Faith, He said: “There is no harm in it; it is very good. In the Law of God that is to say in this dispensation it is both permissible to give in marriage and to give in marriage and to take in marriage. That is to say, to give to him who is not a Believer and vice-versa. All bigotries of the past have been removed from this Cause.”

Giving directions concerning a matter of great personal moment to us, the Master asked that other question be presented at a later time and left us. All eyes turned toward Him, as flowers to the sun, and when He was gone it seemed darker, though the sun was brilliantly shining outside.

In conversation with a pilgrim, Mírzá Ḥabíbu'lláh Ullah of Beirut a student at the American College there, an incident was related which has just transpired and shows the Masters ability to perform, seeming miracles. It seems that there has been some friction between the Muḥammada and the Christian students, which culminated in the former refusing to go to the chapel. The Bahá'í students (quite a number are Believers) took no sides acting upon their understanding of the general commands and continued to attend the Chapel. Unexpectedly a telegram came from 'Abdu'l-Bahá saying that they should side with the Muḥammadans. Wonderingly they obeyed. On the following day and notices were posted threatening these students with death had they not taken this action. Thus our Lord saved their lives entirely without anyone notifying Him of the conditions. Mírzá Zain explained that the reason the Bahá'ís in Persia were not being troubled now was because in past years they had not interfered with political affairs, though they often wondered at the commands given to that effect. Now the Cause is plain, and while Muḥammadans are destroying each other, our friends are safe.

In the evening about 8:30 the Master again visited us. “Goodnight” was His greeting in English and then “Good evening” He explained that the Arabs greet each other when meeting by saying “Goodnight,” whereas in English the term is “Good Evening,” also the equivalent in Turkish.

The Master said that He had been invited out and had felt it necessary to go, hence His failure to call upon us sooner. He said he had partaken of an Arabic meal with raw foods which He ate rather than disappoint His host and He wondered what we would have done with the foods. Saying He hoped we were happy – that we must be happy. He added that through the body might not be at rest here the soul is at rest. The question was asked as to the means of raising money for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár it being explained that some of the Believers were in favour of Bazaars or entertainments for that purpose. While others thought such means not fitting, He replied that if the entertainments were of an intellectual character such purpose. The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár will be erected and hundreds of such structures in due reason. It is not a favor to contribute but a blessing to be allowed to give to such a purpose. He had been especially touched by the gifts of some children who have saved carfare by walking and giving money to the Temple Fund. Such gifts through small, are very acceptable. It is as when a child goes into a garden and picks a flower for the father. The gift is pretty but the spirit makes it welcome. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has had large fortunes offered to Him, but has refused them while small things, such as a simple handkerchief, when sent with love, have been accepted.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in 'Ishqábád, has proven to be a great aid to the Cause and so it shall be in America. Wherever the heart of a Believer sincerely worships there is a Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, but with the growth of the Cause the outward Temple is also necessary. The Master visited us in the morning after we had breakfast and again inquired most solicitously about our healths and welfare. The following question was profounded. (Insert Talks ____ at 'Akká). St. Paul says: 2 Lo 11:15-15. He says Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; and in John 4:3 St. John speaks of Anti Christ as the spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. What is the application of these teachings to this day and hon – may the spirit of Anti-Christ be identified today? He replied: "This refers to the great disturbance which is to occur in that day – the later day. That those souls who occupy the highest stations shall be reverted to the lowest and the souls who occupy the lowest degrees shall be promoted to the highest. For when a new sovereignty is established, during its establishment, great and varied changes take place. Many of the Ministers and men in charge of affairs will be given the lowest posts and many souls who are as nothing will be elevated to a lofty post. To give you a concrete example, Take the Ottoman Government: The great men of affairs ministers plenipotentiary, who favoured, however despotism or monarchy, are now exiles or given very low posts, whereas those who were refugees, many of them banished, owing to their constitutional tendency, have been promoted to the high posts. When in a minor affair such absolute transformation holds as for instance, in the change of a government from despotism status to constitutionalism, how much greater indeed are the changes – when the great organization of the divine sovereignty occurs. These are the signs of the days of the Manifestation that those who are the highest become the lowest and vice versa. To illustrate" The great Rabbi Caiaphas becomes the abased one, whereas a humble fisherman such Peter is so greatly elevated, Mary the Magdalene even an adulteress will be promoted to such a lofty station. Furthermore the intention is to demonstrate that this Manifestation is empowered to do that which He willeth and to command that which He desireth. He who is of the greatest men is by His Word made the basest man, and the man or soul who outwardly is as nothing is taken by that mighty hold and made everything of that is what Jesus Christ means when He says that from the various parts of the earth, nations shall flock to the Kingdom, but the children of the Kingdom shall become outcasts, Math. 8:12 Therefore in the day of the Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh, Lubi Ezel became the lowest of men whereas remote souls became the nearest to the throne. Whatever He shall do is Truth for he is Truth. He designated Caiaphas as Satan whereas he was the Divinest of the Rabbis, He officiated. Mary the Magdalene the holiest of the holy souls an angel. Likewise the other disciples were mere called angels. Therefore He wished to say again the Manifestation of God is He who doeth whatsoever He willeth. Why and wherefore do not apply to His ways. It cannot be said or questioned why is this debased one elevated, why that lofty one abased. For in the world of existence every great affair which occurs has for its concomitant great changes; what cause can be imagined as greater than the founding of divine sovereignty? That that is why Jesus Christ says that an outcast stone becomes the corner stone. Likewise that corner stone becomes an outcast stone. The other takes the former's place. The simple fact that the outcast stone is to occupy the corner-stones place, indicates that the former has to be outcast. (end in 'Akká notes p. 6)

Hájí Muḥammad Karaim Khán was a man great influence in Persia and denied the Báb, and Bahá'u'lláh and worked against them writing many books, attempting at reputations and leaving no means of hate and animosity. His son also wrote treaties contradicting denying the appearance of the Báb and the validity of the Manifestation.

The spirit of Anti-Christ was identified at the day of the Manifestation in the person of Hájí Muḥammad Karaim Khán who did not confess that the Christ spirit had become manifestation in the flesh in this day."

Question no. 2:

Does the Oriental Teaching about Adepts, Initiates Masters, etc. harmonize with the spirit of the Manifestation of God?

Answer: In this day or dispensation asceticism is of the spiritual type: For spiritual asceticism is correct – is productive of result. On the one hand a man may attain virtues by inherent force of nature or existence: on the other hand these virtues may be due to the weakness of his nature. For instance, an infant is detached from the world; that severance or detachment is due to its potential weakness. But a wise man having passed the stage of maturity will likewise be detached from the world and care nothing for the world but that severance at that stage is indicative of inherent force or strength of character. A withered arm is incapable of storing or striking anybody. But that harmlessness is not due to virtue; it is due to imperfection. But if a person whose arm and hand is well and whole shall not strike them, it is a symptom of strength and virtue. A man who is a mute and dumb cannot lie, but that lack of lying is an indication of his weakness, not to his perfection. But he whose tongue speaketh and yet lieth not is verily mighty. He who is an anomaly of nature will not commit unseemly acts, but the noncommittal of this unseemly acts is not an indication of his strength, but of his weakness. But when he is whole in nature not an anomaly, then if he does not commit such unseemly acts it is truly proof of his righteousness. A dead man is harmless, no harm can come from him but this is not eulogy. But if he be alive and harmless that is eulogizing him. Now we come to the subject. By enduring ascetic hardships, the power of nature will undergo dissolution which will result in great weakness whereby one is made incapable of doing anything. He will not show any temper. He will not do any corruption. He will not cause a riot. He is quiet, He is wronged. He is like a lamb. But this is due to weakness. But he who has attained spiritual asceticism acquires these attributes by the strength of character. When a man is by nature that is to say, imperfection of nature, incapable of compelling uncommendable acts, that is not a eulogy to him but if he by sheer force of will and spiritual training attains to the character which prevents him from doing such things that is a great credit to Him. The insane is entirely detached attachments, but this is not eulogy. But the disciples of Christ who were in a normal state of mind and body, perfect minds yet they let go of everything in life, that is indeed commendable. Physical Asceticism will, in the court of time was an absolute atrophy of the parts resulting in the greatest weakness. There will be no love of transgressing

No attachment to this life no covetousness, no aggressiveness, but all this is due to great weakness of powers. But spiritual asceticism will help one to attain to such blossoming of powers as will enable him to make up his mind against the things that are not to be, and will encourage him in the things to be. In this Dispensation there is no physical or material asceticism. The spiritual are ascetics, and that is expressed by training souls and education humanity in morals the acquisition of the qualities of the kingdom. At dinner, the Master was present, and showed each of us to our places, offering the food but Himself partaking of none. He walked around us and gave us Teachings. At the outset, He said that this material food was very simple just enough for life, but that the spiritual food was varied and abundant. This material food would last for about five hours, and tomorrow we should again be hungry, but the spiritual food was eternal and would forever satisfy. As we came to the table because we were hungry so we should approach the spiritual table. Jesus Christ while on earth – He established the Lords Supper at which the material food was simple but the spiritual food abundant and immortal.

He said that, “we were gazing upon Mt. Carmel were many Kings and world conquerors had come but now one did not think of them but of the simple Prophets and of Jesus and His Disciples.” One of the dinner guests said, “But why think of the personality of Jesus why not of the spirit?” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered “Bravo! Very good! It is not the personality at which we should look. The nations of the world are looking to the personality and hence they are deprived of the reality of Spiritual Truth. It is as if one looked at the horizon instead of the sun, and because the sun was last seen at this horizon should expect it to appear again at the same place. So one horizon is that of Jesus, another that of Moses another of Muḥammad, etc. the Jews looked at the Horizon of Moses. They were so much under the influence of his personality that they did not recognize Jesus when He came. If we can know the sun we do not need the limitation of horizons again the personality is like the chimney and the Truth is as the Light. We can put the light of the lamp in another chimney and it is still the same light. We should not become attached to the chimney and put the light out of our thoughts Consider a lover and his sweetheart. Will he love her only because of a certain costume? Nay for him in that case his love will vanish if she were to appear in another garment or incognito. He must love her for herself. Even so, we must put aside the horizon, the chimney, and the costume and disperse with personality if we would know the Truth.”

At supper, the Master said, “That beauty is in the realm of mind as the eye cannot see more than about five miles. While the spirit has a boundless vision as for instance it can make discoveries in America.”

He was asked to give the meaning of Cain and Abel – the reply was that, “There are two meanings to this narration – the material and spiritual. As to the former the occurrence is correctly stated and really happened. In the spiritual significance, we find the Abel represents the Divine Law or Religion and Cain the human nature. The Divine Law is present in man, and attains a certain development when the human nature overcomes it. A man may take a forest and by skilful attention turn it into a garden. But if it be neglected for a time, it reverts into its former condition. So there is always present the tendency to multiply the action of the Divine Law or Religion. The Religion of Moses attained its highest development and before the time of Christ it had been acted upon by human forces. So Christianity reached its zenith and outside forces entered until the Divine Law became to an extent superseded. A man may with the utmost care, attend to a garden for a hundred years but if it be neglected for a single year it will become a wilderness.” Asked to explain the development of life from its lowest to its highest forms in accordance with a chart talk given to Mrs. Getsinger. The Master recalled this teaching and He explained that the development of existence may be represented by two arcs forming a circle. The one descending, the other ascending. Beginning with the mineral, the vegetable, and the animal, the human follows being at the end of the descending arc and therefore the vilest lowest point of life. If a man becomes stationary at that point he is the lowest of the low. As for instance if the animal does that which is not commendable it is not to be blamed as much as man can hate more terribly than an animal. Man can be more cruel than an animal and all the baser qualities or passions are intensified if present in the human family. It is by progressing into the spiritual life that the ascending arch is reached and man can grow and develop.

Asked if everything progressed and therefore all men must advance? He said, “There was either a standstill or a progression. There could not be a descent and upon the same principle that a man could not become a babe again. The animal is the lowest type, we cannot go back of that. Darkness is the absence of light, there could be no lower plane in the respect. So man does not go backward from the physical or human position. It is only when he has begun to ascend that he can descend. The point was often presented as to whether all men would eventually progress to the same stages of perfection. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that this is a matter of Divine Will. That although the Theosophists dwelt upon Karma and ultimate perfection, this was not to be expected as degrees of existence must always be presented. For instance if all men were kings there would really be no kings, as a kingdom requires ministers, soldiers, subjects, etc., etc. The goal to be reached is perfection, according to kind or station and this perfection is happiness. The eye is the most finely organized part of the body; the nail is of a coarser fibre. But the body could not be all an eye and the nail is equally necessary. In connection with the impossibility of decent in the planes of existence, the point of the effect of old age in the form of second childhood was raised. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that was not really a deterioration of an essential part of the man the mind or spirit, but weakening of the functional organs. For example, the wick in a lamp may burn out or become low, but the oil is still there and the light in that sense is not disintegrated; or the chimney may become blackened with smoke, but the light shines within as brightly, though it be not as plainly discernible.

As to the necessity for diversity in the development of the soul? He said – that diversity is really harmony. If our food were to be all of one kind it would become monotonous. So in reality the perfection of harmony and each may attain perfection in its sphere.

The question was then presented. Care in communication with the spirits of the departed?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that there is a communication between spirits but that the spiritual séances as given in Europe where spirits are supposed to move objects etc., etc. are plantasmogaria. That spirit can communicate with spirit is probably the known fact of teaching. It is a self evident fact that nothing tangible passes from the teacher to the pupil yet ideas are conveyed. In point of fact the human mind in its original state is now individualistic and the teacher individualized knowledge by classifying it and locating it with respect to the pupils mind. So soul can communicate with soul and in the realms of existence such intercommunication is possible.”

Wednesday, February 24; Our Lord went to the Tiberius on the shores of the sea of Galilee. This being His first trip on the Railroad. He was sent for an account of the passing out of a relative. Before going He planned that we should go to ‘Akká during His absence and this was according by arranged. The journey along the nine miles of saua beach forming an arc of which Haifa is one end and ‘Akká at the other was never to be forgotten. For the great part of the time we were in the ocean the team of the three horses finding a better roadbed in the Mediteran that along the sands, while the two rivers to be crossed are the river Kishon, the other the Naaman, are tremendously deep, along the narrow places on shore when they would seem to be fordable, but practicable a little way out. Passing several caravans of camels, many Arabs on donkeys or foot, the white city ahead became visible in greater detail until finally the Gate was reached. Here formidable looking iron doors, guarded by soldiers, bespoke the prison city. While rusty hinges told their story of the gates afar, a long time. There were more gates, a winding through narrow streets and still narrower passageways that made one glad that our faithful coachman Esfandiar, knew the way, as a pilot recognizes a channel. Finally at the very seawall, a turn brought us into the court which lead into the domain of the Master. Reaching the private yard, buildings on four sides loomed up, the first floors unoccupied, as is the custom fear of dampness leading to this course. A long flight of stone steps worn by the steps of thousands in perhaps hundreds of years, lead to the rooms. First we entered the Reception Room of our Lord – the long rather narrow chamber with its cushioned bench along one side, chairs and sittings opposite a table in the centre and His divan, at the head, with books, pictures, etc., strum about was recognizable from the description of many pilgrims. The atmosphere of love radiated, yet it was as if some rare birds had fled its cage, as we missed the great Presence. Through the dining room we reached our chamber, hallowed by the presence of many previous guests. The windows overlooked the great double walls and the moat which made ‘Akká an impregnable fortress to the world. Conquerors who found defeat here. One pondered naturally upon Richard the Lion Hearted Napoleon, Salahed din and those other heroes of history and in sharp contrast beheld the peaceful conquest now attained. Outside the sea beat tempestuously upon which had for thousands of years withstood their assault. Within was His peace.

We were visited after dinner by the pilgrims from every clime, Orientals, venerable men of God, many of whom had suffered for the Cause, pressed forward to greet us in love. Thus the remainder of the days was passed. On Thursday we visited the room where the photographs of the Báb and Bahá’u’lláh are kept and gazed upon the blessed relics, encased in filigree silver frames. Then we were told that that after dinner we were to visit the Holy Tomb, and the Ridván. The day was beautiful in sharp contrast to the proceeding day. The Tomb is located outside of the City, about half a mile. First one reached the Hospice or Tea House kept for the reception of pilgrims. Then the “Palace” or residence of the Blessed Perfection these with the garden formed the “Bahijah” or Palace. The Tomb is back of the residence, surrounded by a beautiful garden abloom with roses, violets and spring flowers. Inside the portals one is veritably in a heaven of rest. Tropical plants lend verdure and fragrance to the soft moist atmosphere. Costly rugs cover the marble floor of the outer room, with the garden in the hollow square, glass walls from about 15 feet above the floor to the roof, possibly 20 feet beyond, give sunshine at all times. When the orb of day is visible. From the window, sweet breezes wafted in, causing prisms in a chandelier to tinkle occasionally is bordered with deep colored oranges, so that all the senses are enraptured with the beauty enabling the spirit as it were to stand alone before its maker. The Tomb itself is visible from a door at one side, at the head of the room, and many candles are to be seen. Here one prays, as it were closer than ever before or after to their own God whom the Blessed Perfection manifested in the highest degree.

A drive of perhaps across the Valley of Achor, brought us to the Ridván, or “Garden of Paradise.” This is a piece of land shaped like a great ship surrounded on three sides by running water. Here Bahá’u’lláh sat oft neath the great mulberry trees forming a tent or canopy of green. Orange trees and many other varieties with a profusion of flowers stocks verbenas, carnations, violets, etc., form a delightful garden. Several pilgrims accidents encountered were about to serve tea in which we participated. We visited the Room of the Blessed Perfection, were given pomegranates by the Gardener, ‘Abdu’l Kázim, then left for Haifa. The shores peaceful today, were strewn with wreckage from an Italian Steamer which struck upon the rocks the preceeding Sunday. Arabs lined almost the entire distance taking the prizes of wood, oranges and numerous other things brought ashore in the heavy seas of the preceding day and night. We reached Haifa about 5 o'clock just in time for the Master's return.

Soon He greeted us in our room, and said that He had returned earlier because of our presence – He had been with us in Spirit though absent in body. Since leaving us He had walked where Christ walked along the shores of Galilee.

A question was presented.

Is it the duty of the Believers to attend the weekly meeting? ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “It is not a duty incumbent upon them; it is not obligatory, but if they have no special demand upon their time, the Believers must be present at the meetings. A man may have some special duty to attend to in the nature of an obligation; then he cannot attend, but if that duty is not important and he should be absent it is not commendable. If the love of God is truly in a man's heart, he earnestly desires to be present at all meetings. In fact, he would like to be there every night and every day.”

Question: In the regular meetings to which outsiders are invited. i.e. open meetings should the Holy Utterances only be read or explanations also be given?

Answer: In such meetings that is to say, the Meetings which are open to the public, a necessary part of the gram should be explanations or introductions to the subject that such a Manifestation has occurred and of course Tablets should be read. It should consist of both speech making though delivery of the Glad Tidings as well as the reading of the Holy Utterances. Dr. Faríd asked: “Do you have singing at the meetings in Washington? (Answer: At the School only.)”

The singing of hymns in the Meetings is not obligatory, i.e. not stated in the Book of Laws, but is allowable. But the parts which are incumbent upon the followers to observe are as follows: First the reading of prayer then tablets which contain instructions such as the Tajalleat the Ṭarázát the Ishrakat.

At supper ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The Arabs we met today were deprived of civilization and yet they think they are not in need of civilization or knowledge. They never prefer other to themselves, while in reality they are in absolute need of civilization and education. When the people of Europe look at the Arabs, they say – and they are right – that the Arabs are entirely deprived of every kind of knowledge but they themselves think they are independent. Likewise those who think themselves to be civilized may say they are independent of spiritual facts. When the people of reality realize this it causes them to grieve because they find that true they are deprived of every bounty and favour. Civilization is like unto the body. Spirituality is like the soul. A body with spirit is improbable though it should be of the utmost beauty while without spirit it is nothing. One should be alive inhaling the fragrances of the Holy Spirit. Therefore Christ said: “Set the dead, bury the dead: The one who is born of the flesh in flesh, but he who is born of the spirit is spirit. A picture though it should be of the utmost beauty, still because it is spiritless it is not alive. When it has no soul or spirit, it is of no use. But even the highest Senegambian endowed with the spirit or life is much better than that beautiful picture for he is alive. The disciples of Christ though they were lacking in culture were alive. But Herod was a learned man, nevertheless he was dead. Pilate was a highly educated man but he was as dead. To sum up one must be alive, and this cannot be obtained save by the Holy Fragrance.”

Question: What is the relative effect of vegetable and animal foods upon the mind of man or spirit of man? ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “It has no effect. It does not develop the mind to subsist upon a vegetable diet. A man can be without reason or understanding, though he does not eat meat or flesh and again one eats flesh but his mind is very sharp. The more man avoids hurting the animal the better. It is very strange that a man should kill an animal for his food, but since meat is in the market, one buys it. It is indeed very grievous to kill a lamb or other animal for ones food for the feelings of an animal are just as great as our own. As by the slightest injury for example, a thorn-prick, the man will cry out; how much more grievous is it to kill an animal.”

After supper, the Master retiring early, following a fatiguing journey. We were told that He desired the pilgrims from America, numbers of whom had received permission recently to come here, should inquire at Port Sa’id before proceeding further as to the number already hire. It being His wish that only four should be present at one time because of the attitude of the local Government. If any need what they should take any trips planned for Egypt before coming. He instructed us to convey this information to the Believers as we returned.

Friday, Feb. 26, 1909.

Walking with Mírzá Munír Zain, the Master’s Secretary, we met our Lord who had taken a trip to the German Pier and was returning, followed by nine of the Orientals Friend. The picture was indelibly impressed. The Christ type and the disciples were again presented vividly. Mírzá Munír told of the journey recalling the Master’s pleasure in the new experience of His desire to stand during the trip so as to see the panorama of desert and verdure. The trip on the railroad occupied about 3 hours – then they proceed on horseback to a nearby Arab village where dined. Thence followed by about 30 Arab Shieks, who recently followed the Master (though themselves Muḥammadans) the procession proceeded impressively to another village, about 2 hours journey, opposite and in sight of Tiberias in Galilee. Here prayers were said for the departed, using the Muḥammadan Ceremony, the Master lead and all followed Him and reverently kissed His hand.

In the late afternoon, our Lord visited us; asked for further instructions concerning the Bahá’I Sunday School of Washington D.C. He said:

“In that hour, you have to make the children familiar with the prophecies in the Gospel, and mentioning the name of God and about this Revelation that is to say instruct them how to become teachers so that the love of God may be established in their hearts while they are young children. They should develop spiritual feelings. You are to explain to them or read to them the Ishrakat, Ṭarázát, Tajalleyat, the words of Paradise and Tablet of the World. You have to make them learn by heart some of these verses. By these means they will become enlightenment and will be educated, for they are like unto a young tree, you can train them in whatever manner you like.”

Instructions were asked concerning the work among the colored people in Washington; He said, “there should be no differentiation between the blacks and the whites, all are the creatures of God, all are created by one God. Think the heart is the best whether white or black. I had a servant Esphandiar by name; he was better than a hundred whites. He was so good tempered, so faithful and trustworthy. One would be amazed at his intelligence. The question of the races is one which is extremely regrettable. For the blacks hate the whites, while the whites distrust the blacks. You must overcome this by showing them that you make no distinction. The end will be very unfortunate for both if the differences are not removed.”

(As now there is a great enmity between the white and the blacks in America. They hate each other. The white consider the blacks ill natured and the blacks are...) {ed}

October, 1909.

To describe ‘Abdu’l-Bahá so as to form any mental picture of Him that would in any way do Him justice, is as impossible as to try to paint a sunbeam. The artist may put the ray of yellow light in exactly the right place and with most beautiful effect; but, no matter how great his skill, he cannot catch that real essence of the sunbeam – that golden luminosity, which is like an elixir of life, is uncatchable, unpaintable. So it is with the likeness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. His expression is ever changing; each thought and emotion is mirrored forth and the face becomes so illumined that words are but as the dull, lifeless paint which cannot reproduce the sunbeam – yet some idea can be gathered from them.

When I first saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I was alone and I came face to face with Him all unexpectedly. He stood not over four feet from me. It *as in the upper courts with the blue sky over head and the sunlight shining down brightly upon Him, it being but a little while after “high noon”. It might have been anyone else of the family, as His sons-in-law were often passing to and fro, but every atom of my being, my heart and my soul cried out “It is He”. The face of my dream of Him stood before me with that same heavenly smile of welcome. The light of Infinite Love was radiating from His countenance. Majestic and yet sublimely tender, He was looking right into my eyes. I gave a start as if I had suddenly plunged into an ocean-then stood transfixed. It seemed as if I had come upon Him unawares and saw the “Glory of the Lord” shining forth around Him, and I know I must have felt as Mary Magdalene felt when Christ revealed Himself to her in her vision after the crucifixion – “The Risen Lord,” He motioned me to pass on. I could not. A sense of my great unworthiness made me bow my head-then He passed by me. He was dressed all in white. His hair fell in soft waves about His shoulders and His head was crowned with a white turban bound with a white cloth. His step was firm and kingly. When He reached His door He turned and motioned me again to pass on. I came toward Him and when I reached His door, I looked up into those marvelous eyes. I knew that every thought every act of mine was known to Him. Yet, knowing this I could look fearlessly, unwaveringly at Him, realizing all my sins and weaknesses, yet know He understood me as I could never understand myself, and that He was indeed “Infinite Love Incarnate.” I could not pass until He turned and entered His room – then, nearly overcome by the vibrations which thrilled me thru and thru, I Passed on. Later He came to greet us and I was fully confirmed – it was truly ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but a very different one, I now felt, from the one I had first seen. As He firmly grasped my hand with that welcoming pressure that comes deep from the heart, a hand-shake that warms you thru and thru, I saw the Divinely human man, the personification of my highest ideal of an earthly father. I never again, while in ‘Akká, saw Him as I had in that first meeting. It was then as if I had seen the Reality of His being, with the shades of flesh all raised that the Light of Spirit might stream forth.

In height, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is in reality but of medium height, but He holds Himself so superbly, with such a commanding dignity, and carries His head so high, with such a majestic air, that He ever gives the impression of greater height. His voice is full, and vibrant, each word uttered with marked distinctness and with that tone quality that leaves a faint echo, as it were, or wave vibrations such as come from a beautifully toned bell. All thru the day it rings out, first in one place, than another, for with astonishing rapidity ‘Abdu’l-Bahá seems to be everywhere – now in the garden, now in the room close beside the entrance, now in a guest’s room – or you may hear him calling someone in the “family section” of the “prison home” Always when I heard it, I felt its vibrations most deeply. Like His face, His voice expresses every emotion from tones that are stern and emphatic to those as tender and loving – as the cooing of a dove. His eyes defy description. I only know that to me they seemed gray, with a circle of white around the iris, which at times became luminous. Sometimes In the light I caught a shade of blue, and, again by lamp light they seemed almost brown - ever changing were they and wonderful. They, too, like His face and voice, expressed every emotion felt by Him.

I was deeply impressed by His perfect naturalness, His lack of conventionality and set form, and His refreshing simplicity. Divinely simple is He and simply Divine. His hair, which is gray and long, but rather thin, would at one time be flowing softly around His head, and at another time it would be tucked up beneath His turban in a careless, comfortable way. All of His physical senses seem intensified and when eating anything which He particularly likes, He shows the keenest enjoyment of it. Likewise, the perfume of a flower will seem to entrance Him. I thought of what one pilgrim to ‘Akká had said: “When ‘Abdu’l Baba inhales the odor of flowers, it is wonderful to see Him. It seems as though the perfume of .the hyacinth were telling Him something as He buried His face in the flowers. It is like the effort of the ear to hear a beautiful harmony-a concentrated attention. How He understands the mystery of all these things which we know nothing of! This, indeed is true.

While there was a deep undercurrent of exultancy In ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, yet, while I was there which was but a few days, to my consciousness there seemed a strain of sorrow and sadness, as if the weight of the world was upon His shoulders. Especially did I realize this upon my first night in ‘Akká. I occupied the room directly next to His. His bed rested against the same wall that mine did, and I could hear His slightest move. I could not sleep, and as I lay there wide awake I heard Him pacing up and down His room; then He would throw Himself upon the bed; then arise and walk back and forth again. Once, when He threw Himself down upon the bed, He moaned. Oh! that moan! It came from the depth of His soul and it pierced me thru and thru – the heart, I felt that was again the Christ Spirit was daily, hourly, being crucified by the lack of perfect love and unity among the believers that once again it was crying out:”O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent to thee, how often have I gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate.” How I longed to go to Him and declare my love and faith in Him. Then I realized that it was not our love and faith in Him, our love for one another, that is His crown of glory and the balm for His soul, for He said to a pilgrim: “If you love one another, it is just the same as if you love Me. The closer you draw to one another the closer to Me you draw. I will go away from this world but love will always stay. Therefore you should love one another very much.”

I felt that every inharmonious thought and action of the believers was painfully registered on that great heart, and with this thought came the overwhelming sense of the personal responsibility falling upon each one of us. Having seen and met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, I realized that “His Words are the Words of God, His Utterances are the Utterances of God; that He is indeed the Center of the Covenant of God.” And with this realization came the deepest joy. No need of arguments and worry over problems of life and death Which have confounded the greatest philosophers; no need to spend the precious time in delving into the unknown and unknowable – He has, or can explain it all and His explanations are true. Once having accepted ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s station it is as useless to vex our minds with all these “whys and wherfores” as it would be for a “Way worn” traveller, when a wagon comes along and the driver offers to “carry him to town and he gladly climbs in, et continues to carry his heavy burden on his back.” At ‘Akká not only climbed into the wagon of Truth, but I also left my heavy bundle of felf opinions and perplexity of ideas by the roadside, knowing this Divine Driver would carry me safely to the town. God has indeed given us an “Ark of Safety” in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Notes

Address delivered by Mrs. Louise R. Waite,
After her return from 'Akká before a meeting at the Bahá'I Assembly, held on Tuesday morning in Corinthian Hall, ____, Chicago Ill.

I feel that the words of the sweet son which Madam Linne has just sang so beautifully, find an ache in my innermost heart: "I'm but a pilgrim here, Heaven is my home" – only I would change it one way, "'Akká is my home." It seems as if I had fallen asleep when I left Chicago and have only awakened, but with this difference, that what I have seen and heard is the Reality of Life, while all slow mos seems but a dream.

When I left you I said I would carry each and every one of you closely in my heart.

When Dr. Moody, Mrs. Harrison, Mr. Sprague and I arrived at the prison home, we were met by a group of men believers, and when they took Mr. Sprague into their arms I realized that the Bahá'í love really was – the light in their faces – the truth and sincerity of it all! O! they love so truly in 'Akká. While there it seemed that only the language of the heart was spoken, and so which did I hear of the heart, as: "You must keep your heart as a clear crystal." "The true teacher is one who can teach the hearts." "Yet the Word of God be ____ forth from your hearts." "'Abdu'l-Bahá carries you closely in His heart." "Music is the hearts own language." These expressions and many others of the "heart" until it seems as if the whole world were one great heart-shaped globe, and I see each one of you not as human beings but just hearts filled with the fire of the love of God. Our stay in 'Akká was but four days and one day in Haifa, making only five days spent with 'Abdu'l-Bahá – but measured by the blessings received, it seems like five years. We were, however, recompensed for the shortness of our visit by being sent home, by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wish, with Mrs. Kinney. Their party had been in ‘Akká, previous to our arrival, fourteen days, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had requested that they share their notes with us, so on our return voyage this added blessing was ours, making our visit in reality nineteen days.

I realized deeply while in ‘Akká that my thought of you did not seem to cross to you but rather brought you there to me, and so it is that when one goes, all go. To Mr. Kinney ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Although our assembly at this table members only ten, in reality it is representative of all the beloved of God. Why? Because it pictures the Bahá’í community. The seed, no matter how small, is in the estimation of a perceptive mind a veritable tree. The mind imagines the tree and the tree is resulted from the seed. Likewise, when I see you, it is like seeing all the beloved of God. The teachings I give unto you are the teachings I would give to all.”

I found in ‘Akká that (to my mind) there were three great fundamental subjects upon which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá based His talks and they were:

1st – The power of the Word of God

2nd – Firmness

3rd – Love

And the greatest of those is love. When you come into ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Presence, He does not ask: “How much do they believe in America?” but – “How much do they love?” if it meets with our pleasure, I would like to give you what I have on these three subjects separately at other times.

I went to ‘Akká as an ambassador in the name of Music, carrying with me a letter from the House of Spirituality to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, asking whether there was to be an organ in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár or not, and of the nature of music used in our services. I gave Him this supplication with others upon the second morning of our arrival. At this time I also gave Him Madam Linne’s picture and her message to Him, and looking at the picture very lovingly, He said: “I will pray God to bless her and her work in music.” It was not until my last day in ‘Akká, when I saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá alone, that I received an answer to the question about the organ. I then asked: “Will there be an organ in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár?” He replied: “No. Nor organ in the Temple, but one in a building nearby.” I said: “An auditorium for that purpose?” And He replied: “You.” I said: “Will not music and singing be used in anthems of praise and hymns?” He replied: “Yes, but not in the Centre of Worship.” Later, in this same talk with Him, in speaking of music, I told him of the organs in our churches in America. It was almost a hope that one might be permitted in our Temple, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “There must be no organ in a building nearby. Here festivals and services will be held; here the and anthems sung, conventions hold and spiritual gatherings; but the chanting and singing of the Word will be unaccompanied by any organ in the Centre of Worship.” Again, when Mrs. Harrison and I were with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Haifa, I asked the same question that Mrs. Harrison might also hear the answer, saying to Monever Khánum: “In a Tablet which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote to me He said, 'that my hymns would be sung in the centre of worship forever more' – but if there is to be no organ in the Temple where will they be sang?" 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied: "There will be no organ in the Temple, but in a building nearby – there the hymns will be sung and at all other spiritual gatherings." I was very persistent in my questioning for I realized the great importance of it and I wanted it made very clear to my mind. At our last meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá I asked if the singing of the hymns, the Benediction and other music was still to be used in our meetings of worship, and He replied: "Yes, have the music as you now do, singing the hymns, etc., until the Temple is built – then have the music in the other building for that purpose."

In my precious moments alone with 'Abdu'l-Bahá I asked if He approved of our Choral Society and their past work. There was real joy in His face as He replied: "Yes. Music has a great place; it is one of the highest forms of expression of spiritual ideas; it is a great art and should be cultivated. All who have talent should study and develop it, and the work of the Choral Society was most acceptable – it was 'Very good,'" I said: "I wish you could have heard them sing at the convention on the 21st of March; they sang as if inspired" and He replied: "'Abdu'l-Bahá did hear them and saw them too and He will hear them." He told me that I was to continue to compose music for the Cause, as it was most acceptable to God, and when I asked Him if He approved of the songs I had composed of a sentimental order, He replied: "You must continue to compose such music also, for using one's talents as a means for wealth is most praiseworthy." I said: "I can best express my feelings in music and verse and can give the Message better in a hymn than the word of mouth." He replied: "Music is the heart's own language; its vibrations uplift the spirit; it is very beautiful." He then looked away off out of the window, His face became illumined and He repeated softly in English: "Music! Music!" – as if the word brought forth divine melodies to His ear; as if He were indeed listening to the "choir invisible." In speaking to Mr. Kinney of music and its divine importance, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Mr. Kinney asked me concerning music and I promised I would answer him. Music is of the important arts. It has a great effect upon the human spirit. Musical melodies are a certain something which prove to be an accidental upon otherwise vibrations, for voice is nothing but the expressions of vibrations which reach the tympanum and affect the nerves of hearing. Musical melodies are, therefore, those peculiar affects produced by or from vibrations. However, they have the keenest effect on spirits. In sooth, although music is a material affair, yet its tremendous effect is spiritual and its greatest attachment is to the realm of the spirit. If a person deliver a discourse, it will prove more effective after musical melodies. The ancient Grecian as well as Persian philosophers were in the habit of delivering their discourses in the following manner: First play a few musical melodies and when their audience attained a certain receptivity thereby, they would leave their instruments at once and begin their discourse. Among the most renowned musicians of ancient Persia there was one named Barbed who, whenever a great question had been pleaded for at the court of the king, and the ministry had failed to persuade the king, they would at once refer the matter to Barbed, whereupon he would go with his musical instruments to the court and play the most appropriate and touching music, the end being at once attained, because the king was immediately affected by the touching musical melodies; certain feelings of generosity would swell up in his heart and he would give way. You may try this: if you have a great desire and wish to attain your end, try to do so on a large audience after a great solo has been rendered – but must be upon an audience on which music is effective for there are some people who are like stones and music cannot affect stones. Now let us go back to the original subject: Music is an important means for the education and development of humanity, but the only true way is through the teachings of God. Music is like this glass which is perfectly pure and polished – it is precisely like this pure chalice before us – and the teachings and utterances of God are like the water. When the glass or chalice is absolutely pure and clean and the water is perfectly limpid and fresh, then it will center life. Wherefore, the teachings of God, whether they be in the form of homilies or communes or prayers, when they are melodiously chanted are most expressive. It was for this reason his holiness David sang the psalms in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem with sweet melodies. In this Cause the art of music is of paramount importance. The Blessed Perfection, when He first came to the barracks (‘Akká), repeated this statement: “If, among His immediate followers there were those who could play some musical instrument i.e. the flute or harp, or could sing, it would have charmed everyone.” In short, musical melodies form an important role in the associations or outward and inward characteristics or qualities of man, for they are the inspirer and active power of both the material and spiritual susceptibilities. What a motive power it is in all feelings of love! When man is attracted to the Love of God, music has a great effect upon him”

Surely we can need no greater incentive to work in the musical aspartment of the Kingdom than these ____ of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and His assurance that our efforts are “most acceptable to God.”

There is one thing which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to Mrs. Kinney which most beautiful expresses the attitude which all who sing or speak should take. (I give the especially for our Choral Society.) it was this: “Before you talk you must turn your heart to the Kingdom, ask the assistance of God – then assistance will be given you. You must look upon the audience like birds who are awaiting a beautiful melody, and then you must consider yourself as a beautiful organ played upon by invisible hands. Be sure and take this attitude and you will always be assisted by God.”

Herein lies the true art of singing – utter forgetfulness of self – and being a perfect instrument for the spirit of Song to play upon.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said much to us and to Mr. Kinney and his party of the affects of a visit to ‘Akká upon each individually. Let me read you His words on this subject:

“Some souls come here and return unaltered. It is precisely like one who comes to a fountain and not being thirsty, returns exactly as he came, or like a blind man who goes into a rose-garden; he perceives not, and being questioned as to what he has seen in the rose garden, replies: ‘Nothing.’ But some souls who come here are resuscitated. They come dead; they return alive. They come frail in body; they return healed. They come athirst; they return satisfied. They come sorrowing; they return joyous. They come deprived; they return having partaken of a share. These souls have in reality done justice to their visit. Praise be to God, you are of those souls and you must be exceedingly happy. If a cow should go to a beautiful town, a city full of bounties and blessings, and should be questioned as to what bounties and blessings he had found in this town, he would reply: ‘Nothing cucumber peels and melon rinds.’ But if a nightingale should fly to a rose-garden, when it returned the reply would be: ‘Verily, I have scented lovely fragrances, have seen most beautiful flowers and most delightful verdure, have drunk most refreshing waters and I have found new life.’ Now a beetle would reply: ‘All you have heard concerning the rose-garden is false. There is neither a delightful fragrance nor beauty of verdure, nor is it joyous. In fact, when I entered it was displeased. All you have heard is false. Had I not escaped I should have died.’”

The song that I bring back to you is that of the nightingale. I have been the rode-garden of ‘Akká, have scented lovely fragrances, have seen most beautiful flowers and most delightful verdure, have drunk most refreshing waters and have found new life.

We were told, while in ‘Akká, by dear, saintly Mírzá Asadu’lláh that we had come there at a most wonderful time, for it was the greatest month in the Muḥammadan year, and the position of the planets were such that they produced great power. Seldom had there been so many of the great teachers there at one time as then.

At our second dinner at ‘Akká, and dear Mr. Moody’s last, we could feel the great force which seemed to be emanated from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as He talked. He closed this beautiful talk by saying: “Therefore you must thank God greatly, for He has opened your eyes. You have heard the Divine Call – you have been ushered into the Kingdom. What a great meeting and what a great blessing this gathering is – right here and now, in such love, such sincerity. He paused impressively between these two last sentences and all remains silent for some moments, and it seemed as if every heart at the table was blended into one – and that one ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s. he arose and left us. We adjourned to Mr. Sprague’s room and here met a large number of old Eastern believers, among them being Ḥájí Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí, Mírzá Mahram and Mírzá Paeza. There were sixteen men and three American women, making nineteen in all. Of the wonderful words uttered by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá during our dinner, Mírzá Asadu’lláh said: “The words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá tonight were very wonderful and had an inner significance which will gradually dawn upon you. The more you ponder over them, the more their meaning will be revealed to you. Many people have made long pilgrimages just to see the Manifestation's face, or to hear one word. See how blessed you are, for you have received many words, and each word is a seed and will bear much fruit. The constitution of which 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke refers not only to that of the State, but also to each individual. Our faith is our constitution and 'Abdu'l-Bahá has planted the seed of faith in your hearts. You may not understand the meaning of His words now, nor consider their great worth. The ground does not realize it is being plowed and planted with seeds, but the needs grow just the same. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the wise gardener and the seeds He has planted in your hearts tonight later bear much fruit and affect the whole world. He has unfurled before you the carpet. He has taken you into the Kingdom. He has filled your caskets to overflowing with priceless jewels. Tonight you are rich indeed." And one of the jewels in the casket of my heart, which I bring back to you, is 'Abdu'l-Bahá's love."

We had our last dinner with Him in Haifa just a few hours before sailing. It was in Madam Jackson's house, and it being the Feast day of Ramaḍán, all of the family were gathered there. Just before dinner I had had the great privilege of being with the family in the holy mother's room. The Greatest Holy Leaf, the mother, the three daughters and the nine grandchildren were all there and I had the comforting joy of the holding each little one close to my heart. The dining room commands a magnificent view of the sea, and the table was decorated profusely with white jessamine blossoms – the air was laden with their fragrance. Only Monever Khánum, of the family, dined with us and interpreted for her father. He began His talk by saying: "Were you are sitting at this table, one from England, one from Syria, others from Persia and you two from America. This could only be accomplished through the love of God in your hearts. This love unites you all and soon will unite the whole world. You must go back to America as sign of Love and love the people very much – more and more each day. All the believers must reach that station where they will be willing to die for each other. Their meetings must be held in great love, just like the gathering together of doves which are so loving to each other. In the Past the love of the believers is very great, but America has not yet reached this station. It is much better, but they must grow in love for each other. Tell them that love is the one great thing. It is life – the only life of the spirit." And upon bidding us goodbye, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "I send my love to all in America. Tell them that 'Abdu'l-Bahá loves them very much"

To Mr. Kinney we are indebted for these beautiful words copied from his

And at another time 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "My love for you is like an ocean and your love is like a drop. The distress and calamities which I have endured for your sake for many years, you could not endure for one day, and now should any offer me the entire existent world in exchange for one for you, I would not accept it. This means that one of you is dearer to me than the whole world. If a thousand swords be used on my neck, or against me, I accept it, but would not be content that one hair of your head should be taken away. You must realize by this expression to what a degree I love the believers.”

To be loved by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá – what a blessing is this! And this divine love I bring to you in full measure. Today you are rich indeed.

Alláho ABHÁ!

Louise R. Waite.

“Our Lord and the beloved ones in ‘Akká bade us give to all the friends their greetings and love. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s stupendous burden had not been realized by us until this second visit. We can only lighten it, He said, by being in perfect Unity amongst ourselves.

The Holy Mother, upon one occasion, said to us that our responsibilities were very great, because we were living at the time of the beginning of the Cause of God, when our example would either advance or retard souls from the Truth. That naturally the soldiers in the front ranks must bear the brunt of battle and make it easier for those coming after. That it was a great privilege to serve when difficulties surrounded us.

We remained a month in the Holy Land principally between Haifa and ‘Akká, for we were exiled only four days which we spent in Nazareth, so that there would not be more than four American believers at one time in Haifa.

One of the greatest privileges we had during our visit was to be present when the Ashes of the Báb were moved to their final resting place on Mt. Carmel. It is beyond me to depict the beauty and solemnity of that scene. Our Lord was indescribably grand. We saw Him for the first time without His fez. (head-dress), His beautiful white hair falling in picturesque disorder upon His shoulders. He had thrown off His dark outer garment and was robed in a flowing garment of neutral blue. When the huge sarcophagus was finally placed in position our Lord with the men believers grouped about Him, made a picture never to be forgotten. One of the believers held aloft a lamp, the light of which fell like a radiance upon the beloved Master's form as He stood in the sarcophagus, and with tears streaming down His blessed Face, changed with His own Hands the Sacred Ashes from the casket which had held them many, many years, to the magnificent white marble sarcophagus which is a loving gift of the believers of India. When the marble cover was placed, our Lord threw Himself on the sarcophagus and wept aloud.

The believers who were with Him, as well as the ladies who were standing or kneeling about the entrance to the Tomb, wept with Him, and for Him too who made such a pathetic figure beside the Tomb of the One Who had proclaimed His Glorious Advent. Such a tumult of thoughts and emotions surged through our minds for it seemed as if all the miraculous happenings of the Cause from its earliest Dawn passed before our vision, flooding our souls with awe and wonder at the mighty works of God. When at last our dear Lord walked out of the Tomb He had an expression on His Face which is indescribable. The Power of the Spirit was so intense that we stood as if petrified until He had passed into another part of the building where a room was prepared for Him to rest in. In the meantime the believers who had been working with the Master came out and stood in groups speaking together in hushed tones while they waited to accompany 'Abdu'l — Bahá back to Haifa. Such a wonderful picture they made, especially the white haired, saintly looking believers in their Oriental costumes. One believer had given up business and came and camped with his family near the Tomb for some weeks, during which time he had worked with pick and shovel to dig a hole in the foundation of the Tomb through which the sarcophagus had been passed. They could not employ skilled laborers for fear of drawing the attention of the Náqíqín.

Before we left that afternoon, mother and I had the privilege of drinking a cup of tea with our Lord, but as He was still very fatigued we soon excused ourselves and descended the mountain side with full hearts."

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Story of Exile

August 21st, (1909?)

---

‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked after our health and (Mr Kinney) said we were very happy to be with Him. (After an absence of three or four weeks in the Lebanon.)

He said:

“Whosoever turns to the Kingdom must neither be affected by poverty or wealth for such an one possesses the treasures of the Kingdom, and whosoever possesses this is never poor. His Holiness Christ travelled through this deserted plane bare-footed and used for His food the herbs of the earth. The disciples were often without their supper.”

The translator continued, interpreting the words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

“While the Master was in Ṭihrán and the family was pillaged, for three days and nights they were left absolutely foodless, and with not a mat to lie on. In such a condition, in mid-winter, amid the cold and frost they were banished. They had to leave Ṭihrán. The Master was the age of ‘Mr. McNutt’ (little Howard). He did not have one but one pair of stockings, which He was wearing, and that had a big hole in it, so that His foot was bitten by frost; He feels it now. On the way from Baghdád to Ṭihrán there is a stage called Saasabad, where it is intense cold. It was thirty below zero, and as the foot was already bitten by the frost and they were all terribly tired and unable to go on any further, they decided to stop there, have a little supper and try to get warm. For supper they were to have bread and pudding; there was no tea. It was night and no light could be had. However they got some molasses, some butter and some flour to make the pudding. It, being so dark that they could see nothing, by mistake a handful of pepper was put in’ – imagine the pudding? But as there was nothing else, they had to eat it – and it burned to the inmost part! Notwithstanding this, they were in the condition of the utmost joy.” (While the Master was recounting these misfortunes, He laughed heartily.)

“The purpose in telling this is to show that whosoever enters the Kingdom must not be joyous because of wealth and home, nor sorrowing with indigent, destitute and homeless. Christ has said, “Blessed are the poor and (incomplete)

Sunday morning, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá drove from ‘Akká to Haifa with His family and a few of the old believers. Along the shore, halfway between the two cities, there is now a small house which the government has built for the watch of the road. Here, in the middle of the dessert, He stopped and had luncheon; then, after an hour and a half, we reached Haifa.

But few believers knew that nine years ago the remains of His Holiness, the Báb, had been quietly placed in the (piece of) Hasserrat-o-Ikeeda on Mount Carmel.

A week before the Feast of Naurcoz ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had sent to Haifa two of the believers that they should prepare everything for the coming ceremonies.

Nine years ago a believer from Rangoon (India) sent to Haifa a large casket made of marble, beautifully worked with the Greatest Name relief and gilded three times on each side. It was to later hold the remains of the Báb which had been kept sixty years (59 A.D. or solar year) in safety. Now they were to be definitely buried by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

A few weeks before some twenty men had pulled this heavy marble casket up the mountain.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave the last necessary instructions and it was slowly slid down into the under part of the Tomb. This must have been performed with the Holy of the Hosts of the Kingdom of El Abhá, for though the work presented great difficulty and was done by inexperienced men, everyone wondered at the ease with which it was all done.

The shrine under the ground was lighted with but one lamp. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá waited until all was well finished.

He threw off His turban and hat.

He removed His shoca.

but what fooled was no impressive that it is useless for me to attempt to picture it. I will simply relate what happened. Our beloved Lord with His hair waving around His beautiful head, His face shining with light, looking inspired, fragile and majestic, rushed down and threw Himself on His knees. He placed the remains of the Báb in the large coffin (placed in the marble casket) and leaning His blessed head on the border of the coffin, He wept, wept, wept and all wept with Him!

That night the Master did not sleep.

Pilgrimage Accounts

In 1909 Pauline and Joseph had the opportunity to follow in their sisters' footsteps and embark on a voyage to 'Akká for their pilgrimage to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá, The Master. This formal account, prepared by Joseph includes many of the talks that 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave during their visit. The following is Pilgrim's Notes and the sections attributed to 'Abdu'l-Bahá are not authoritative scripture. Following this account are Pauline and Joseph's letters home to their son and Fanny and Joseph's mother, which are of a lighter and even more personal nature.

'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

After an impressive silence, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke.

"To remove any source of differentiation, the Believers must know that the Blessed Báb was giving the glad tidings of the coming of the Blessed Perfection, and the Blessed Perfection was the Great Manifestation. Regarding myself, I am the Servant of Bahá'u'lláh and nothing more; 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the sum of all perfections, they must not attempt to surpass that word, Ab—dul Bahá.

"All must say to others, that He claims for Himself to be 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Believers must call Him by this name as He wishes. This is the only word He has appointed for Himself."

Mention was made of the privilege we had in coming so openly, while but recently many had been disappointed, and the visits of these friends being very short. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "...So it is not the length of one's sojourn but his receptivity which determines his blessing."

'Abdu'l-Bahá took us to the Holy Tomb of the Báb, and on the way He referred to the fact that we would see Jewish Believers; that the Christian Missionaries had striven years to convert these people, and had done countless things for them to no avail; but behold! The power of the word of Bahá'u'lláh,—they were now Believers in Christ. This going up to the Mountain of the Lord, Carmel, and the assem—blage there was a fulfillment of prophecies in Isaiah 2:3, also Isaiah 56:6-7.

We asked permission to present the letters and gifts from America. While reaching for them, He said, “You are in yourselves a long and interesting letter from all the Believers. You are a present from the Friends in the Occident. When a merchant wishes to sell any grain he sends a handful as samples. You are the samples of the American Believers.” Then Mr. Hannen replied that he hoped He knew the goods as being better than the samples. He smiled His wonderful smile, and said, “If the goods are equal to the samples it is very good.”

- [This next section of the account is a series of questions which Joseph or other pilgrims asked of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.] *

The next question concerned the marriage of a Believer to one not in the Faith. He said, “There is no harm in it; it is very good. In the Law of God, that is to say in this Dispensation, it is permissible to give in marriage and to take in marriage. That is to say, to give to him who is not a Believer and vice versa. All bigotries of the past have been removed from this Cause.”

Question: What is the necessity for diversity in the development of the soul? ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied that diversity is really harmony. If our food were to be all of one kind it would become monotonous. So in many ways the existence of different degrees is in reality the perfection of harmony and each may attain perfection in its sphere.

---

Question: Is it the duty of the Believers to attend the weekly meeting? ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “It is not a duty incumbent upon them; it is not obligatory, but if they have no special demand important and he should be absent it is not com—mendable. If the love of God is truly in a man’s heart, he earnestly desires to be present at all meetings. In fact he would like to be there every night and every day.”

CONCERNING THE COLORED RACE.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “There should be no differ—entiation between the blacks and the whites. All are the creatures of God. All are created by one God. There is no black and white in the King—dom of God. The purest heart is the best whether white or black. I had a servant, Esphandiar by name; he was better than a hundred whites. He was so good tempered, so faithful and trust-worthy. One would be amazed at his intelligence.

“The question of the races is one which is extremely regrettable. For the blacks hate the whites, while the whites distrust the blacks. You must overcome this by showing them that you make no distinction. The end will be very unfortunate for both if the differences are not removed.”

Question-Can we communicate with the spirits of the departed?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that there is a communication between spirits, but that the spiritual séances as given in Europe where spirits are supposed to move objects, etc., are phantasmagoria. That spirit can communicate with spirit is proven by the known fact of teaching. It is a self-evident fact that nothing tangible passes from the teacher to the pupil, yet ideas are conveyed. In point of fact, the human mind is in its original state non-individualistic, and the teacher individualizes knowledge by classifying it and locating it with respect to the pupil’s mind. So soul can communicate with soul and in the realms of existence such intercommunication is possible.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “In that hour you have to make the children familiar with the prophecies in the Gospels and mentioning the name of God may be established in their hearts while they are young children. They should develop spiritual feelings. You are to explain to them or read to them the Ishrakat, Tarázát, Tajalleyat, the Words of Paradise, and Tablet of the World. You have to make them learn by heart some of these verses. By these means they will become enlightened and well educated, for they are like unto a young tree, you can train them in whatever manner you like.”

---

After supper ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Hold fast to that which is the cause of unity and friendship. The result of everything should be the Love of God. This is the essential fact of everything, that we should love one another with Godly Love. The name of love is never applied to anything except the Love of God. Beside Godly love, other love is called passion; it pertains to animals and not to man. But Godly love, which means to love the Friends of God, is of the human characteristics. For they have no other intention save the good-will of God. How many souls have always been together in the utmost love, but at last it was changed into enmity, for the foundation has not been based upon Godly Love. It has been human love.”

At parting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “There is a parting which is in reality meeting. If you will carry out the precepts of the Blessed Perfection it will conduce to our Eternal Meeting. This is better than remaining here. If you stay with me for a thousand years, or if you do one thing, that is to say, put to practice one precept, that is greater than the meeting of a thousand years. If a tree should yield one fruit, that tree is far better than the tree which has been on the bank of a river a thousand years. There exist among the hearts of the Beloved certain susceptibilities which are of the purest bounties. There exist certain ideal bonds which are the greatest of the innate bonds. Praise be to God, these bonds are firm among us. Therefore you must not be sad on account of this separation. God willing, praiseworthy results will be forthcoming therefrom. Convey my greetings to each of the Beloved of God, and embrace each for me.”<sup>1</sup>

This account and Fanny and Alma’s account were published into small pamphlets and circulated among the Bahá’ís of that day. (Imagine my delight when on one of the many days that I spent in the National Archives while researching the voluminous correspondences for this book, I ran across another version of Joseph and Pauline’s pilgrimage. It was in the form of a letter Pauline wrote to her young sons, Carl, who was on his way to Germany at the time, and Paul, Joseph’s mother, and Fanny, who were back in the states waiting for their return. The character and content of this letter is quite different from the other published accounts because of the intended audience and purpose, but in many ways is much more telling of the nature and character of the writer. I was brought to tears many times as I read it, partly because of the memories it brought back to me of my own pilgrimage, but also because of the kinds of things which touched her heart. I can’t begin to express how pleased I was in finding it and I really feel that she wanted it found. So many points she made pulled at my heart strings and released wells of emotion that are somewhat inexplicable, but make me feel that she has been standing over my shoulder as I write this book. I will share these letters in their entirety, noting that I took the liberty to fix some of her typing and spelling errors as I would do with any of my student’s work as needed. I also found it interesting that she struggles with how to use commas as I have often puzzled over in my own writing. I admit that I did add some commas as necessary to make the sentences more readable.

This is Pauline’s personal account of meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Letter to Grandmother, Carl and Paul, Cairo, Egypt, March 4, 1909

My Precious Ones,

What shall I say, where to begin. We have lived ages in a few weeks, my last letter was written on board the Prince Ludwig. (Early in the morning we arrived at Port Sa’id) Such a noise, you can’t imagine, thirty or more row boats filled with strange looking men shouting, and calling for passengers for their particular boat to land us. This awful noise and confusion was and is the only unpleasant feature of the trip. After a while we were safely landed and with the help of a man engaged by Joseph, we were taken to the home of Aḥmad Yazdí. He is (just) a real Bahá’í, and we loved him at once. Also the clerks in his store are Bahá’í’s and this made it easy for us to speak freely. He sent his clerk with us to a neat little hotel, where we found an American believer, Miss Holtzbecker, who has taken a great fancy to us and was a great help to us also. She is now preparing to go to 'Akká next week. We walked all around Port Sa'íd and out the narrow streets and along the beautiful beach front where we gathered shells for our baby Paul "Thabet." And for our big son Carl "Nategh." (the first name sounds like sabet) It was such a beautiful place to pray and we did.

We had to wait until the next afternoon for the steamer. During the early afternoon, a sand storm began to gather and by three o'clock the whole city looked pink. The air was filled with sand, and we could not see half a block away. We secured a row boat, which landed us safely on the Russian steamer about five o'clock, which was to leave that evening, Thursday, but on account of the sand storm, and very rough sea, we had to lay in the harbor for 26 hours, leaving on Friday evening instead. The sea was so rough that all the passengers who were booked for Jaffa had to go on to Haifa. Such a lot of sea-sick people you never saw. But it was no wonder the boat rocked every which way, trunks, and satchels were flying back and forth like crazy things.

The steamer seemed like a rubber ball tossing on the waves. The front of the boat would shoot its nose into the air and then plunge into the sea as it seemed, then tip to one side then to the other on a slant like this[ illustration] in other words the edge of the upper deck touched the water. Once while Papa and I were sitting in the middle of the boat, on the upper deck on the floor, all of a sudden we had a toboggan slide in a great hurry to the railing of the boat and while straightening ourselves up a little and laughing at our hurry we were hurried back again and poor Papa had a good rap on his head, but it was so very funny that we could do nothing but look at each other and burst out laughing. In the midst of the fun, we were sliding again, as fast as the wind to the side of the boat again. This time we managed to scramble to our feet and by the time the boat tilted again we were holding fast to something. Strange to say we were not ill, not the least bit, and we rather enjoyed this novel experience.

When we reached Haifa, the sea was so very rough that no boats came out to reach us or to take us in from ten in the morning until five that night. We believed, as the Captain said, we must go on to Beirut, because if the men would venture out in their row boats the landing would be very dangerous. At five, we saw some row boats coming towards us. Oh joy! We hastened to our things and Papa looked at me so longingly and said, you must show your pluck now. I was not in the least afraid, but it was indeed a dangerous landing, but thank God after being pulled and thrown and pushed we finally found ourselves walking on firm ground once more. We were so glad to be walking on mother earth that we refused to take a carriage to the hotel, but we had some men carry our baggage.

On arriving at the Hotel, the Manager sent for Mírzá Jallal, the Son in law of our Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In about an hour he arrived with Mírzá Munír. After a very little talk about the various friends, we were startled speechless by the announcement, "Our Lord will receive you, after you have had supper and one of us will call for you." They saw we were unfit for further speech and left us. We hastened to our rooms, washed and dressed. I put on my silk dress, ate supper though we did not wish for it. While still at the table Mírzá Munír came. I saw him come in. We put on our hats and coats for it was cold, and started for that wonderful meeting. After ten minute, very quiet, and prayerful walk, we came to the gate of Madame Jackson's house and looking ahead of us on Mt. Carmel, a great eye as it seemed, but really a light on Mt. Carmel, was shinning down on us and this we were told was the Tomb of the Báb.

The Heavens seemed to be a mass of stars shedding their light upon us as though even the stars were happy for us. But how did I feel? Like a timid little bird, expecting I knew not what, but the end was very near. We were ushered into the parlor, where we removed our things. Then Mírzá Munír came back saying, "Come." I followed first, then Joseph. I stood upon the doorsill for one instance as though it might have been the edge of a precipice, looking upon our Lord who said something. Perhaps Welcome, but at the sound of His Voice, I flew at Him, my arms about His Blessed neck my head on his Shoulder. I was breathing very hard, really panting, and the uppermost thought was Father, Father, Father. I seemed like a weather beaten birdie having passed through storms and at last had reached the heaven of rest. Just as I began to feel that I was losing consciousness, this wonderful Father led me to a chair. Then I was quiet and more composed and saw Him embrace and kiss your Papa, your son and brother. He will tell you how he felt.

We sat to one side of the room with Armeen, his dear Father, Mírzá Munír Mírzá Jallal, I don't remember any more, oh yes another son in law and in one corner sat our Lord's little grandson, and our beloved Lord, Very well, face beaming the inexpressible love light in His Eyes. He spoke of your recent visit (Fanny) and how happy He was to have you, and that you were sincere servants, then spoke of Alma's work and among the other things, said she was the Conqueror of Germany. And her conquest would last through-out all eternity, while Napoleon conquered many lands and people during his day, but now these lands belonged to others, etc. He spoke with great joy of the Beloved in America and of the Cause, especially the Wash—ington friends. I can't remember all that was said that night, but after a little while, He arose, took me by the hand, and lead me across the large inner hall or court (you remember Fanny) to see the ladies, at the same time calling Monavvar. He seated Himself upon the divan and I next to Him with my hand encircled by his warm hand. In a few minutes, the Blessed Mother came in. He slipped out, while other ladies and I had to tell them about the Beloved in America, etc. Our Lord returned to Joseph, embraced him, and called him his Son, His own Joseph, and said he (we) should come the next morning and be His guests, and then said good night. Joseph talked to the men for awhile, then sent for me, and we started for the Hotel. Happy beyond expression, but very quiet, we said very little, and slept very little, thinking over the wonderful events of the day. Personally, Our Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a great and pleasant surprise; His wonderous forehead, clear skin, soft white beard and moustache, the hair is thin and white but not often seen, warm soft and small firmly grasping hands, and last but by no means least,

His wonderful, wonderful eyes. They express as no other eyes can, unspeakable love, sympathy, power and authority, submissiveness and oh the merry twinkle, I never saw anything like it. As to His Spiritual power, our know—ledge increased day by day and we wondered how the people could be so blind, and not know him, only to see him walking with six or more pilgrims, following at a short distance. His bearing, that of humility and power combined. He is. He is, yes He is

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ THE PERFECT.

The reason I say ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, instead of Lord or Master, is because He gave us a talk on this subject. To give it with out the setting and in brief it is this; lord is one title or attribute of God, Master is one attribute, ‘Abbás is another and, etc. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the combination, total of all perfections.

To go on, the next morning we packed our things, left some clothes to be washed, and by this time Dr Faríd came for us and took us for a walk, and then to the home of Rúḥá, but she was in ‘Akká at this time. We took all the gifts out and had them ready, but not till Monday morning did we pre—sent the gifts. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walked in saying good morning and asked how we slept, made us feel comfortable and at ease, then I began and placed each gift one at a time, mentioned the names of the givers and the messages where there were any to give. He thanked very sweetly for their expressions of love and asked for the many letters we had brought and then said you are a letter from the Friends in America, a long expressive letter. You are their gift, they have sent you, mean—ing both of us. When a merchant wished to sell grain he sends samples of his goods to be examined, and you are the samples, and it is very good. Then Joseph said we wish to say to our Lord that the goods is really much better than the sample. His eyes twinkled as he replied, if the goods are equal to the samples it is very good. You are dear to me. He mentioned Ruth Fuhrman and He looked so lovingly upon her picture and smiled at the fancy positions of the children’s pictures. It gave him real pleasure, for He examined each one separately. Tell Mrs. Fuhrman He gave me no answer but bowed his Head over the picture in prayer. Please tell Miss Ambrose I have secured an old handkerchief that is rough dried and been used many times by our lord. Should you see Mrs. Eardley, tell her ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to me, “because you supplicate for her, she may come to ‘Akká.” Tell .....of Baltimore, that she shall stay with her husband just as long as she possibly can stand it. When it goes beyond her endurance, divorce is permissible. Tell lady Cowles that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lay her steamer rug across his lap, folded His Blessed hands and prayed. The other Mrs. Coles (Claudia) you say He looked long at her daughter’s picture as though in prayer. O dear, when will I be able to finish this letter. Always someone coming in. At this very minute, a lady is talking as fast as she can, while I want to write. Ah dear, how glad we will be to settle down to work again, though my heart seemed nearly broken to leave our beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. To go on again with my story, or at least try to, it was not until Monday morning we gave the presents, but we arranged them Sunday morning, had just completed the operation when Mírzá Munír came in to us saying ‘Our Lord awaits you out front.’ Quickly our hats and coats were put on and when we came to the front door, who should be standing at the gate but Our Lord, with a little bunch of violets which He handed to me. He helped us into His carriage and He got in back of us with Mírzá Munír and in front was the driver, an old believer. As we were winding our way up the steep mountain road—way, every one silent of course, Our Lord spoke, saying to me, “About two years ago you had a vision in which you were going up this steep moun—tain and at the top you met many strange people at the feast. Today you will see this vision literally fulfilled, in a moment. He said think and then you will remember all. I did not recall this dream until I reached the top and greeted many pilgrims who had just arrived from different parts of Persia and India and Russia, believers who had traveled for three months on camels, donkeys or walking as best they could. Seeing these shining faces, the dream came back to me. After resting for a while and talking about America and having a friendly chat, one very old and beautiful believer read the greetings sent by the Washington friends to our Lord. Their faces expressed perfect joy and Jos—eph and I were very happy. I chanted the Commune and the Arabic chant, and they were delighted and this servant was most happy to be able to do something to please these wonderful people. In a few minutes ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared at the door and said come. We all followed him, Joseph and I were mixed with the others, but in a second Our Lord stopped and motioned for me to come and then to Joseph to come near Him, and quietly we followed Him into the Holy Tomb of the Báb on Mt. Carmel. It was very solemn and I felt utterly unworthy to be there. All stood while Our Lord chanted the Visiting Tablet in a clear ringing voice. Then He knelt on the floor and all of us did likewise. Then we retreated slowly out into the garden. We went into the same room where we had as—sembled in the first place, where the feast was prepared for us. With the exception of Joseph and I, all were seated about the feast spread on the floor in real oriental fashion, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walking back and forth to serve us and to see that we all were happy, pushing some cheese in front of Joseph or patting him on the back and saying “eat” and now and then letting me take His Hand in mine and look at me with such unspeakable love and tenderness. He spoke to us, but Joseph has it all written out. I will not attempt to give his teachings here, but never the less; it seems to me the greatest lesson was that of love. He embraced Joseph several times and kissed him too, once on the crown of his head as he was kneeling at His feet. Once he called us both to sit beside him on the divan. Being a woman I was denied the privilege of being kissed by Him, but His Hand grasp, I felt many times, and to hear His Voice, as He entered one end of the house, to come to us at the other end, “my daughter”, “my daughter.” “My daughter,” until He reached us and I was at his feet. He has shown us so much love that we can never do anything now but show love to the creatures of God.

When Joseph asked how he might serve more and differently he smiled sweetly, “Go on just as you have been doing. Your services are acceptable.” I begged that my tongue might be loosened to glorify the Cause. He said, "You have great love, the utmost love for the Cause. That same love is service to the Cause. You serve the Beloved of God and this also is a service. Because you remember God, this also is a service. You shall be confirmed to render great services. Be Confident." When we think of the great love He has showered upon us, our hearts must melt with love for everyone. Oh, I can hear Him, now saying "my son, my daughter" in English too. First He said "My son" two or three times in English and My daughter had to be translated. Then this humble servant wished with all her heart that He might call her something in English. A very few minutes afterwards, He stepped into the room and said "My daughter." I could have cried for joy, but I didn't.

When we were about to leave the Tomb for the carriage, we had been sitting about in groups on the grass, talking when all became silent and all stood reverently watching our Lord coming towards us from the gar-deners house, He stopped, picked a rose, and while doing this Mírzá Munír said "I prophecy. He is going to-pick it for you." (talking to me). Sure enough, walking slowly towards the road leading to the carriage not seeming to see anyone or anything until He came to where I stood, He handed me the rose, smiled and walked on until He came to the edge of the parapet or wall. Here all Haifa lay at his Feet, and at ours. In that moment, it seemed to me all the world was His to do with as He chose, yet like Christ, He chose the humblest, yet most mighty position of non-resistance. He stood like a statue for quite a while, as it seemed, the bearing of One who has conquered the world. Like the gentle Christ, when he was being crowned with thorns and persecuted, with only one to stand by him, John, yet he said, "I have over come the world." As Our Lord stood there, the embodiment of humility and power, that saying of Christ became clear to me. As He turned He motioned to us to precede him to the carriage, which was about a block away, higher up the mount. As we seated ourselves, we looked back to view another wonder-ful sight, Haifa, at the foot of Mt. Carmel, the Tomb bathed in sun-light. Our Lord, walking firmly up the steep mountain path towards the carriage, at a little distance came about 25 pilgrims, heads bowed, hands crossed over their breasts, Jews, Zoroastrians, Moslems, Greeks, etc. When He reached the carriage, He stopped and faced them, motioning them to come nearer and then He spoke. This we did not understand of course, nor was it interpreted for us. But it made a wonderful picture. Then He got in the carriage and we went home, not a word was spoken.

On several occasions we saw Him walking on the rough mountain roads with ten or twelve men following him, and now and then he would stop and speak to them. On one of these trips He said to them, "When I arrived at this place forty years ago, there were only a very few little huts about and now see the many houses, to this side, the German Colony over there awaiting the coming of the lord. After He passed through this land they came to settle." This was news to us because we had been taught that they came in 1868 — guess that was the Monastery.

Another time Dr. Faríd, Joseph and I went for a walk and on our return we saw Our Lord crossing the road a block away. We were coming this way [arrow pointing right] and we had crossed like this[ arrow pointing up]. I saw that He had a bunch of flowers in His hands as He waved His other hand. Joseph began to go at a lively trot to overtake Him, but foolish me, I said to Ameen, “No I won’t run for then He will give me the flowers and I would rather the other Pilgrims should have this pleasure.” What do you think, when we reached the gate, He stood near the house smiling, and Joseph was coming toward us with the most beautiful flower in the bunch, a perfect iris. Every one marveled at its beauty and wondered where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had gotten it and Joseph had a beautiful rose (for himself.) The point is this; ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had a flower for each pilgrim and one for Joseph and one for me.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá visited Tiberius during which time we were sent to ‘Akká, the Holy Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh, and the Garden of Riḍván [sic], the never to be forgotten trip.

Fanny, the ladies one and all send their love and wish me to tell you they often speak of your visit and what a joy it was to them. They are indeed wonderful people, especially the Greatest holy Leaf, who was especially affectionate to me, which gave me great joy. She was quite distressed that we had to leave so soon, and sent word by several of the Persians to Our Lord, asking him to send us back again before we left for home. But He told us it was not wise, because we would cause the people to wonder at our being there so soon again and be means of trouble. Don’t ask me how I felt when I had to leave the peace of the Holy Tomb. It seemed as though I could not leave, though I knew I kept the others waiting, I believe a long time. I did not hear them go out nor would it have made any difference, it was heavenly and I longed to stay. At first it seemed my whole being seemed like a surging sea, my head buzzing and I found myself wondering at this con-dition. All of a sudden I seemed to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on my right hand, and the eyes of the Greatest Holy Leaf on my left, and all was at peace, such peace that passeth all understanding. At last realizing it was time to go to the others outside, I backed to the door, but my heart failed me, I must step back for one more prayer, and I did so. Oh such joy cannot be imagined, it must be felt. After putting my shoes on and we were about to leave, a relative of Bahá’u’lláh or the gentleman who lives next to the holy Tomb and cares for the Tomb, came to us with two little bunches of violets that had been in the holy of Holies for two days, and presented them to us. These we have pressed and will bring with us. At the Riḍván we received two pomegranates that had been on the chair where Bahá’u’lláh had sat, in the room where He lived while at the Riḍván. How strange it seemed to be walking about the Garden where He, the Most Glorious, walked and taught His beloved. The mulberry trees with its twisted branches and the natural seat.

On arriving at this Garden, all were surprised to find that other pil—grims were there ahead of us, ten or twelve of those whom we had met at the holy Tomb of the Báb. They were just being served tea when we arrived on the scene. We also were served and then explored the gar—dens. After receiving a number of beautiful flowers, we went to the carriage. All the pilgrims gathered about us to bid us God speed, and we started for Haifa. Forgot to say that while in the Garden, we were permitted to go in the Blessed Room, in which His Blessed Perfection sat and rested or wrote. We were told to enter, but neither of us had the physical power to go further than the door sill. We prostrated ourselves in awe and prayer. I was dimly aware of a large, possibly an armchair, the seat of which was covered with fresh fragrant beautiful flowers. It was indeed a very strange experience to know of a Power—ful Presence and not able to see but an unmistakable feeling of His Presence. Similar to the experience in the holy Tomb only this time there was not that struggle for peace and understanding. We received that at the Holy Tomb, and when we gazed upon the Photographs in ‘Akká, of Bahá’u’lláh and the Báb, That experience defies expression, at least on my part.

Another experience, silly perhaps, but not for me. I was very serious when a piece of lemon was handed to me, from the lemon tree, growing in the Riḍván Garden. It was eaten with the solemn prayer on my part, that, like as in the Story, I might eat with equal joy the sour as well as the sweets offered by God.

Just remembered the story of the peacock at ‘Akká. One day while in the presence of Our Beloved, and feeling extremely unworthy: He said when you visit ‘Akká notice the feet of the peacock, they are ugly. The peacock proudly struts about with his beautiful tail feathers spread out. He is proud, but the moment he glances at his feet the tail feathers drop. So you must keep your faces and hearts turned to God always, never look upon your unworthiness.

The drive along the beach was delightful although somewhat sad because the shore was lined with wreckage from an Italian steamer that had been dashed against the rocks at the foot of Mt. Carmel. Many hundreds of oranges, wash-stands, beds, tables, railings, doors, floors, great bails of cotton, and hay there — - — - I must stop just this minute to mail this or I fear you will never get it. Continued in our next. So much has happened during the writing of this letter, I fear it is very bad, but perhaps in Algeria or Naples I may find time.

Your homesick little Mother .....

Thabet be a good brave boy and pray for us 2.....

March 12, 1909.

Dearly Beloved ones,

My last letter had to be mailed in such a hurry that I am unable to remember just where I left off. But believe I was telling about the wonderful drive along the sandy beach where we witnessed the sad sights of a wrecked steamer. We did not see the steamer itself at this point, but various parts of it. We saw the steamer before it went all to pieces at the foot of Mt. Carmel, and wonderful to relate, many of the pilgrims we met at the Tomb on Sunday had just left this same steamer. It was after leaving Haifa, it was dashed against these rocks. It was hoped that by relieving the ship of the freight, they might float it. With this end in view, many boats came to their assistance and worked day and night, but on Wednesday the sea was so very rough and the boat went all to pieces. The poor passengers after having been robbed of everything by the sailors and Arab boat men, so they say, were taken to the Hospice on Mt. Carmel, where we saw them, and here was the chance to invest little Mrs. Coles money. Perhaps she would be glad to know where it went. Our party of four helped them a little by leaving four dollars for them, only a drop in the bucket, but the best we could do. The beach was lined with natives who were gathering together the lumber and oranges, bales of hay and cotton and many strange looking pieces. Great wagon loads were being carted away and still the beach was littered. Our hearts were heavy when we saw such evident signs of grief and sorrow, and aside from this my heart was in a strange condition. We had just left 'Akká, and the wonderful Believers who were loath to part with us, then the wonderful Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh and the dear little Ridván Garden where we had tea, now this drive to our home in Haifa, where perhaps the dearly Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá would not be seen until the next morning. We went to our room to rest, Joseph did take a nap, but I (poor me) was nearly heart broken with unutterable longing to return to the Holy Tomb or to see the master's Face. In the depth of despair, I cried out, oh Lord, come to me now or I shall perish. Scarcely had the prayer been spoken in my innermost heart, when a voice from the back of the house rang out loud and clear, "My daughter, my daughter, my daughter," until our Lord stood in our room and I was at His Feet weeping telling him how I missed Him, etc. But in my heart I was ashamed to have disturbed him, He had just returned from His trip to Tiberius, and was, and looked very tired. He was very gentle and kind to me, said He had been with us to the Tomb in Spirit and had prayed for us, and because of us He had returned that evening. Be sure, though my body was absent, my spirit was with you. After this little speech I arose from my knees. He shook hands with Joseph, patted him on the back and said, "My son," and left us without further speech, save to say, "I am very tired, so will leave you, good night." This night Joseph and I both had a dream in which we were told we must prepare ourselves to leave on Sunday. On waking in the morning we both spoke of it, but Friday passed, and Saturday yet no word had been said, but we knew as though the word had been said. On Sunday morning, our Lord called on us and after the regular talk He arose and said you will be leaving this afternoon. Remember, I shall be with you always, I love you very much, in dream He had spoken to us.

One afternoon, while 'Abdu'l-Bahá was out for a walk with a group of Believers about Him, which is in itself a Christ picture, He turned to His followers and said when I came here forty years ago there were only a very few houses. Now see the size of it, the many beautiful homes and well kept grounds since Bahá'u'lláh and his followers passed this way. In surprise, I said to the one who repeated the incident to us (for of course we were not of the party) We have been taught that the German colony came here expecting the Lord in 1866. It is quite evident from what our Lord has said, that they did not establish themselves in Haifa until after the Lord had passed through in 1868. After this Bahá'u'lláh came again to Haifa and visited the Nuns asking them if they would know the Lord when He came and was told, "Oh yes, we will surely know Him." and Bahá'u'lláh passed on. The master has also visited the same convent and we saw the window where the nun watches for the coming of the Lord.

On another walk of this kind, our Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá pointed out some sisters, nuns, who were walking in a body just ahead of them and said these are pure souls who have sacrificed themselves, given up the world in order to know God, now consider how great is your blessing. If I write all that happened there will be nothing to tell though I feel like going on. One thing more of personal interest, I had been told in America and here also that some ladies had asked permission to dress like Lua, but were told not to, I may dress just like her if I wish, but I will not do so, because I asked, had He told me to do so, it would have been different. The Holy Mother and Dr. Farid's mother both gave me a white scarf to put on when I teach as they put it, and it was a beginning. I said I would wear them when I pray. They were all so good and kind to me and they remember you with so much love. One afternoon we had a drive, Miss Codwise, Marquise, Joseph and I to the Monastery on Mt. Carmel and to Elijah's cave. He later was of real interest because the prophets of old had really been in this cave and taught by Elijah. The master said this was the truth. The cave was very large, twice as large if not larger than the Hall. All around are natural stone benches, Arabic and Hebrew inscriptions cut into the stone walls. Opposite the entrance is a Muhammadan altar. On the left side of the cave as you come in, is a smaller cave and stone bench around it. Here it was easy for me to imagine the great Elijah in this smaller cave with about seven or more of his people around him, the other fifty or four hundred prophets seated in the big cave. How very strange to be in on the mountain where the holy men of ancient days, did walk and talk. While the trip was proposed and our Lord gave his permission for us to go, I had not the least desire to go but already I am thankful to have been to this Holy Spot. Joseph has a little sea-weed from this place, I picked up a few shells for Thabet.

That morning Miss Codwise and the Marquise had arrived and were in my room when our beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá came in to greet them and bid them welcome. Joseph had been called out of the room in order that a dear little Persian lady might visit us. And very shortly the Master entered. He addressed Himself to the new Believers of course, and began to speak and she would interrupt several times and differed some times. I of course was using the Greatest Name for her, but was at a loss to account for the merry twinkle in the Masters eyes, and sometimes He turned His side to her and looking out of the window his Face wreathed in a smile. When He left in a little while, and we went on talking in a general way, finally wandering out into the great central room or hall when they were in the midst of a laugh, the ladies and Joseph I mean. Mírzá Munír said, "Will you be quiet the Master is here." We had not seen Him come in but when Marquise saw Him she was taken completely by surprise and talked away in a lively whisper about the great surprise. I whispered, "That explains the twinkle I saw in His eyes." She said, "I caught that twinkle too, several times." We were called to dinner where the Master explained the meaning of Cain and Able. Afterwards we had a hearty laugh at the expense of the Marquise. Some of us should have introduced her, but we thought she knew by our manner that it was the Lord. I am devoutly thankful our Lord did not teach me as He found it wise to teach her.

One afternoon I was visiting the ladies when 'Abdu'l-Bahá came in and sat down beside me. This was in answer to an unspoken wish, but I did not say what I wished to say, but after His saying, "Speak to me," I thanked him for the magnificent flower He gave me and said in English, this flower is called a flag, but it was more beautiful than any I had ever seen, and that I hoped he would make me a flag bearer in this Most wonderful Cause. He smiled and said, "the opportunity may present itself, this was a very pretty thought of yours." I answered and said, "You can make the opportunity if you see wise." Again He smiled and said, "En shah'llah. Because of your great love for the Cause, I love you very much."

This same afternoon, I was leaving the ladies to go to my own room, when glancing through the front door which is of glass I saw, oh the most wonderful sight you could imagine to have happened in the days of the Spirit Christ. There was our Lord walking up and down the gravel walk from the house to the gate His turban pushed back, His head, erect, the great Eyes full of deep thought. On either side of the walk were pure and holy men, both old and young, with hands crossed upon their breasts, heads bowed in reverence, ears and hearts open to receive the words which fell from His lips. My eyes were looking for them, for I was fairly glued to the glass, but after a while I felt it was not lady like for me to peep as it were, though the ladies knew I was there, I quietly turned, went swiftly, but quietly out the back way to my room in the other house, not looking at this scene, until I reached the door. Just making sure they were still there, I walked into Joseph and told him to hurry to the side window, I was too deeply affected to go again, but He had gone before Joseph could see. This was made up to Joseph the same night or the next one, when 'Abdu'l-Bahá went out the back door to His house. We were told to come, that supper was ready. When we came to the door, we saw our Lord walking. Joseph and I stepped quickly by to get near Him, Joseph first went halfway between the two homes. Without turning His face, our Lord took Joseph by the hand and held it until we reached the table. Was Joseph happy, well I guess.

I am telling only the little events, because Joseph had taken the messages and talks in short-hand. These you will have when we return. I will tell one more thing then leave the scenes of that inexpressible life for some other day when we meet. After our Lord left us, I packed the things while Joseph went to buy the tickets. We had dinner, but our Lord was not present. After a long, long wait as it seemed, He came to our room to say goodbye. It seemed to pain him to send us, away. Seeing this, I used every effort not to cry and thanked God I did not. My eyes were dim with tears, but they did not flow. My goodbye was like the meeting. He permitted my head to rest on his shoulder for a minute, called me daughter, kissed Joseph and called him son, said I will be with you always, remember these days, then He left us. In a minute or two I was told to come and say goodbye to the ladies. I ran quickly thinking to have it over with before I broke down, but on reaching the door, saw our Lord walking very slowly with bowed head on the very path I must walk to reach the ladies, I stepped back a little, that I might not disturb the thoughts of this heavenly one battling with the inclination to run after him and falling at His Feet and just once more seeing those eyes, oh those Eyes of love. But I conquered this selfish thought, but when he went into the house and I finally went to see the ladies, my strength was gone. I wept and wept and have done so a number of times since. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has given us much work to do and now we go forth to live a new life.

Yes, one more thing, tell Aḥmad, that first I, then Joseph with me, went on our knees before our Lord and supplicated for permission for Him to come. Our Lord said He shall come but it is not yet time. There is much work for him in America, and be ye especially kind to Aḥmad. “He is very dear to me,” or “I love him very much.” It was one of these two, can’t remember which. Also tell Aḥmad that his spiritual father in ‘Akká, Sezid Asadu’lláh, the venerable old gentleman who taught him of this Truth said, “tell my son he does not behave well to leave his spiritual father so long without news from him, that I love him, and would like to hear from him now and then.

End of ‘Akká Accounts

We arrived at Fort Said too late to go right on to Cairo, so we called on Aḥmad Yazdí again. He is so kind, and again saw the dearly beloved Taqí Manshádí for the last time, since on arriving at Cairo we heard he had passed out suddenly, the day after the day after we left. It was a great shock to us all. Here in Port Sa‘íd I had the great pleasure of meeting Mrs. Maxwell. She in an angel on her way to heaven, known as ‘Akká.

We left for Cairo after making these visits and taking a walk along the beautiful beach, where we picked up some more shells for Thabet. If they do not get broken we will have quite a few for our little lamb. Oh how we miss our boys. Even Joseph’s eyes were moist with tears sometimes when he is thinking of them. If only we might hear something about them. It is now the 12 of March and we have heard nothing. Where is my big son “Nategħ”, if I only knew? Perhaps lonesome out on the deep sea, perhaps still at home? Soon we will know something. Next week we will be with Alma, and she will have some news for us I know.[Carl was actually on his way, crossing the ocean to stay with his aunt Alma in Bermany.] I am running away from my subject. We arrived in Cairo safe and sound, but oh so dirty. As Joseph said, he had to cut the dust around me before he could see my face. It was not quite so bad as this, but truly it was the worst I ever saw. We took a carriage to the Hotel where Miss Holtzbecker was stopping. After securing our rooms, we looked her up, and while with her, Mírzá Rhouy came in. Bless his heart. He kept us busily engaged during our six days stay in Cairo. This long stay was due, of course, to the fact that we had to wait for a steamer for Naples. We had a ride on a camel to the Pyramids and around the Sphinx and the temple of Isis. This was all very interesting, yes even the Sphinx was of interest to us. But when we reached home we were dead tired and there was Rhouy waiting to take us to our Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl. I simply had to rest a little, which of course shortened our visit with our beloved Mírzá. He was surely happy to see us and we, well you know. He mentioned many of the friends by name and wants us to give them all his love. Spoke of your visit and Alma, he asked many questions, and we were able to answer all but one, that was if Mrs. Boyles husband was now a believer.

This is not the most comfortable desk I have written on. It is a magazine on my lap and I am seated on a pipe that pushes and throbs with the movement of the machinery in the very bow of the steamer. Joseph is next to me reading. It is the only spot on the deck of the steamer where we can sit and not be blown away. This queer motion makes writing difficult, still this in my only chance for a week at least. Being well, we are going it pretty lively. Now to go on with Cairo.

We met about ten or twelve Believers at Mírzá's. Needless to say, we were very happy. On leaving, Mírzá Rhouy walked us to his house, through a beautiful part of the city. After a long walk, we reached the very, very large open space before it, where the soldiers practice and parade before the Ruler. The great barracks are to one side of this great court and to the other side a very large and elegant apartment house, which we admired extravagantly and with bows and graces were told that is where Rhouy and his family live, now on the lower floor, and gradually we will move higher and here it is I hope someday to bring the master, our Lord, if HE will so honor us. Our Lord has sent word that He will visit Cairo and Egypt. Isn't it too wonderful. The Believers are beside themselves with joy. Well we went into Rhouy's Apartment and met the ladies. Yes, Joseph did too, saw all the family. Also saw the typewriter Mr. Phelps sent him.

After some tea had been served and some cakes, and a Tablet had been read, we left for home, our Hotel I mean. Though it was quite late, about nine o'clock, we went into our lunch room and had supper. Then we retired by candle light, dead tired but happy. The evening before, Rhouy had taken us through the bazaars and on the Moski[?]. These were strange and wonderful sights, but no doubt you saw these narrow streets arched over by upper stories to the houses and indeed hard to explain this scene. It must be seen to be understood. Streets where we would never venture into without a native.

There were many beautiful things, but no money to buy. Donkeys walking through these narrow streets with the greatest care, so gentle in spite of the heavy burdens they carry. We then called on a Dr. and Mmd, De Bounes, spent a very pleasant hour with them, and returned home. The third day Rhoy sent a Believer, one of his English scholars to take us out sightseeing. He took us to the mosque of Sulṭán Ḥasan, a very old mosque. A very strange sight it was indeed, but some exquisite work in the dome of the Temple, from here we went for quite a long walk up hill until we reached the most beautiful Mosque in Cairo, built like the ones in Constantinople. It is a very handsome place, no chairs but elegant rugs, marble pillars and walls, exquisite paint-ings, a gallery for the Ruler and princes and the dignitaries to worship, hundreds it seemed like thousands of prisms suspended from the bulbs of electric lights, radiating the lights of the co-lors of the rain-bow because the sunbeams were playing among them. Really a place of prayer. In one corner was the — tomb of Muḥammad-‘Alí all in real gold. Before entering this you pass through a very large court capped by this real green roof, you sent on the postal to Aunt Mary. In the center of this court is an elegant marble affair around its base as it were, a ditch or gutter and all around this big pillar are taps. Here the worshippers come first to wash and then enter the Temple. It was a grand sight and though we were tired, we enjoyed this visit very much. After leaving the inner Mosque, we walked around the outside of it, and were ashamed of our own race, the tourists breaking bits of marble off and thus marring the looks of the building. On going farther around, we were unspeakably surpri-sed to see a part of Cairo at its base, and such a part, you could put Washington in the one corner of it. It is a very, very large city. Just to one side of this point of observation we see the English Fort with its guns and just below this the Turkish Fort with its guns. A strange sight this was, the Mosque on the top-of this very big hill, at its base one round lower down the English fort, one round more and the Turkish fort, at the foot of this a beautiful street very very wide with wonderful palms and trees and flowers in the parking on each side of the street and this is also used for pa-rades also practicing ground for the artillery. Such pictures thrill the soul with delight as well as sorrow. Again we were very tired, ate our dinner and tried to rest but I was trying to write....then went to tea with Miss Holtzbecher at the home of the DR. and his wife, where Rhoy joined us. We had a jolly time until quite late.

The next morning I begged to stay home and write. I was tired out. This was done until it was time to go to the wonderful and never-to-be-for-gotten meeting at the home of Lhorassani. I do not know how many believers were present but they circled the large room. It was a wonderful sight and we thank God for the privilege of attending such a meeting. No one can listen to the talk of such holy men and the power of the Word of Bahá’u’lláh, only the Word of God could have united such souls, men with great minds of their own, like little children when a word of greeting is sent to them from the Center of the Covenant, ready to sacrifice every will and desire of their own, even life itself, for the sake of the Word of One, according to the minds of most of the people, only a man, a false prophet. To imagine a false prophet purifying the lives of people to such an extent that they would die before committing a questionable deed.

Oh, what can the people be thinking of, what do they expect? Can any greater than this happen that singly and alone one man arises and causes thousands of men, women and children change, so that pure deeds and actions take the place of selfishness, render services for others, thereby learn to know God, Yes, these people are a living Testament of His Power and Might. No man could accomplish this; not ten, no not even a thousand men, putting their wise heads together, to perform such a miracle. Thank God the veil has been removed from our eyes and God grant that we may remain firm and steadfast youth to the end. To be brief, Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl instructed us, a youth chanted the words of the Manifestation, then Joseph read some of his notes and we felt spiritually uplifted.

The next day we visited the new English part of Cairo, built on an oasis that was. The homes are magnificent, never saw anything like it. We then spent the evening with Rhouy and took dinner with them and he read us his Tablets. It was twelve o'clock, I believe, or near it when we returned to the Hotel. I forgot to mention that in the afternoon Miss Holtzbecher had arranged to have us meet four Believers who came to visit us and served tea and crackers.

We had a very pleasant time, principally, Joseph reading his notes. The next day was Sunday, and Rhouy came to take us to the Barrage. He took us to the station where we got on a train, speeding along through the interesting villages. Some of the houses were simply mounds of mud with a hole for a door, other mud houses closely built together with thatched roofs. Strange contrivances for spreading water over the beautiful and fertile grounds, by this means supplying the water which the heavens seem to deny them, for it rains very seldom in these parts.

After an hour's ride or more, we reached our destination. Men were shouting to take the cars for the barrage. Paul, what kind of cars do you think they were? A platform on four wheels with two seats across the middle, two people on the front seat, two on the back with their backs against each other, then two Egyptian men with the most wonderful pair of legs you ever saw, would take a hold of the two rods that came out at each side and they pushed this car running like the wind all the way from for about the distance of a mile until they reached the beautiful gardens and the strange and wonderful Barrage. We did not ride because we wanted to see as we went. The barrage is a massive bridge over the Nile. At the base of this bridge you see between each arch, a door or solid iron gate[illustration] suppose this heavy line is the upper part of the bridge, the light line is where the water reached, the lower arch is the top of the gate and these gates are so arranged that they can be drawn up or let down when the Nile is very high and overflows. Instead of letting it flow into the sea, these gates are pulled up and the water must flow somewhere, so it floods these lands and makes it rich and fertile. There are two of these bridges, one over each branch of the Nile, and the fertile land between is called the Delta. This Delta, where we saw it, was the most wonderful flower garden I ever saw or ever hope to see, again, and the grand old trees and beautiful palms and scattered rustic seats even in the lotus trees where we sat down to rest. Yes, we really went up in the tree and sat on the bench put there for the purpose. Sitting among the boughs of this lotus tree, we drank in the beauty of the scene about us. The wonderful coloring made by the flowers, the beautiful birds, the velvety grass, the towering palms and the low graceful leafy plants, the strange vines, etc. The only thing missing, to complete the picture, was our Lord. But it made us supremely happy to think that in the near future He too will walk in this wonderful flower garden. This particular tree where we were sitting, and the grounds beneath it, are used by the Bahá'ís for special feasts. This attracts no special attention, since it is for the public. A little way off the grounds are arranged for picnickers whose hearts are rejoiced because of tables and chairs and, etc. But our people spread their feasts on an immense rug spread beneath the tree. Tablets are read (no chanted) and then they lie about on the grass and there is plenty of room.

Since writing the letter we have left the steamer, rushed through Naples for Rome and are now about to leave for Venice, both times travelling by night to save Hotel bills. Home is indeed a wonderful, also strange place, but I am thankful to be an American citizen. But really I must close this letter. We are very well and would be very homesick were it not for the fact that we may never come this way again; we would fly away to our beloved ones. In two or three days now we will be with Alma and we wonder if Carl will be there. Oh the agony of not knowing where our dear son is. I dream of him so often, in fact, all of you and Alma. God grant you may all be well and stay well until our return at least. When I have time in Stuttgart will go on with where I left off. Just to quiet your mind on one point which you would like to know, yes, Fanny I met the wonderful women in Alexandria and they all remember you, their faces beaming at the recollection. We met the Woodcocks, and S. Russel and others.

Fanny dear, I have done the best I could with letter writing and hope my letters to mother have been given to you, because they are for all.

Affectionately,

Pauline Hannen<sup>3</sup>

About Cairo

Stuttgart, Germany March 29, 1909

Dearly Beloved ones:

If possible I will go on now where I left off. The visit to the beautiful park in Cairo caused the utmost joy, because I could easily imagine the Beloved and the friends sitting about in groups under these magnificent Lotus Trees and most of all, the picture in my mind seeing 'Abdu'l-Bahá walking about these grounds and completing the living picture of the Garden of Eden. He will walk in these because He has promised them. On returning to Cairo, we had the pleasure of seeing a flower parade, rather some of it, carriages and horses bedecked with flowers and tulle and ladies dressed in dainty colors, a float made in the shape of an air ship. All of flowers, other floats loaded with masked people to represent different animals, others with clowns and, etc. A very lively picture for Sunday afternoon. We had callers and it was while these guests were here I had to close my letter so quickly that they might mail it for me, because we were to leave early in the morning for Alexandria. There are people of every nationality and creed and classes, congregated in this city and do just as they please. The noises are quite terrifying to us. This fact I mentioned in my note to dear Mother [Joseph's mother]. We started on our way and at the station, were met by some of the Friends, but most especially precious by our beloved Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl who sends his love to all the Believers and mentioned many of them by name.

This is the old letter I started and then lost. Will send it along.

The Master has given us so much to do that I am anxious to start and see the work progressing. For one thing, I can't imagine how we will instruct the children concerning the Ishrakat, but He told us to do so, and no doubt in the world, He will give us the Light. Also the work among the colored people, and to establish a Spiritual Meeting for Believers only, where the colored are to take part as well as the whites.

Well, good bye I am homesick just now, so I had better change drinks as the saying goes.

Pauline

The following is a letter that Joseph wrote to his mother, while making their way home from their stay in 'Akká with 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

Cairo, Egypt

March 5, 1909

My beloved Mother,

If you will forgive an assortment of rather mussy paper I shall be able to commence a somewhat delayed letter. As you will see, we are in Cairo, where we arrived Tuesday afternoon, March 2nd.

At this point I was interrupted, so you have an object lesson showing the difficulty of writing while "in tour". To resume: We arrived here Tuesday afternoon having completed a sojourn of 9 days in Haifa. As we wanted to see Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl and the believers here, and also Alexandria — and since there is no ship for Naples from Thursday until the following Wednesday, we decided to spend a week between the two places, and have purchased our tickets to leave Alexandria on Wednesday next. March 10th arriving Naples about Saturday, 13th inst. Thence we shall probably proceed to Stuttgart, stopping in Rome and Venice en route, reaching our destination somewhere around the 17th. As to our plans after that, there seems to be some doubt. I think we may remain about two weeks with Alma, then stop at Paris and London and sail for “home sweet home” about the second week of April.

We are both very well indeed. This morning we were discussing how fortunate we were as to health, for not one day’s illness or even discomfort has attended all our many changes.

Cairo is an intensely interesting place and the “Streets of Cairo” scenes in the various “World Fairs” are by no means exaggerated. One sees here people from every nation, literally in their native costumes. It is a city of 500,000 population. The streets are lined with cafes and day and night men and women sit and eat and drink and smoke as though the pursuit of pleasure were the chief thing in life, as in deed it is to them. Now and then processions pass, with weird music .....the merchants of every market is noisily sold. Guides and people with something to sell infest the land, and tourists galore are their prey. Handsome hotels and shabby “pensions” are many. We have a comfortable room, at a reasonable price, and eat at a very nice restaurant. Miss Holzbecher, whom we met at Port Sa’id, is here in the same Hotel and is lots of company for us. Then Mírzá Rúhí, whom Fanny will recall has been very attentive, so that we have been on the go continually. Yesterday we attended a meeting of the Cairo Assembly at the magnificent home of Mírzá Khurasání, where Fanny also went. It was most beautiful. About 30 men were there, and all greeted us so lovingly. Some of them are going to call on us this afternoon and others will see us off when we leave here Monday morning, while we will be met at Alexandria. So truly the Spirit of Unity has found us brothers and sisters here in Africa, so that we are made so welcome and homelike as though ‘twere Baltimore!

The weather here is like it will be in Washington in May or June. Flowers are a bloom, palms, eucalyptus & other tropical trees are everywhere, green and graceful. The sun is hot by day: but at nights one is comfortable with plenty of covers and sleep well. On Wednesday we saw Pyramids and the Sphinx. The visit to these historic landmarks is never forgotten. They were most interesting and beautiful. We rode camels and weren’t scared a bit. The trip was tiresome. Returning we went to Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl’s the same day. He is the same dear old Mírzá and next to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we feel that he is our objective on our spiritual journey so we are not sorry that chance has given us longer here than we expected.....I hope that letter reached you safely. There is much uncertainty as to mail in this part of the world. I have written letters, one from Gibraltar, one from Naples and one from Haifa, besides some cards.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in Haifa during our entire stay. He left for ‘Akká Monday of this week. We went there Wednesday of last week and spent one day and night visiting the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh and the Riḍván (Garden) on our way home. While we were away, The Master went to Tiberius on the shores of Galilee. His first railroad journey in many years — perhaps the very first. The days were spent in Haifa peacefully and happily, receiving instructions and enjoying the heavenly home life at the Holy Household. We were sorry to go, yet much (Of course) calls us home and we shall be overjoyed as the miles decrease toward the dear familiar scenes. I sent a cablegram to Fanny while in Haifa to send Carl to Stuttgart, 'Abdu'l-Bahá having approved Pauline's plan. Hope she got it in time to get him off so we can meet him there. (Stuttgart)

So much is happening these wonderful days that one scarcely stops to express surprise at anything, and I can only hope (and believe) that the new order of things as far as Carl is concerned will be for his greatest good and ultimate happiness, as well as that of us all. I wish you could be with me this morning, though the noise would distract you. Yet to see the camels, donkeys, tram-cars, and omnibuses, the Arabs in picturesque robes, the Egyptian women with their veils and peculiar headdresses, the Europeans of every kind one would suppose a big Noah's Ark had suddenly been emptied, or a thousand circuses turned loose. This is the height of the season here and unknown ... have timed our journey so as to give us the best weather of the year.

Pauline is opposite me at our table, scratching busily to Fanny and Paul. They will probably share the letter with you and I hope you will do likewise with this.

By the time you receive this we shall be much farther on our journey, and only a few weeks will divide us. Already about half the time has elapsed. It has all been wonderful! From every standpoint we are absorbing knowledge and shall return to our loved ones, our lives and our duties, prepared for greater service. We should try to share some of the joys with our dear ones at home as the days go by, so that you may rejoice with us.

Guess I've told you about all news, so far as a letter will convey it. Accept dear love and many kisses and believe me

Ever your devoted boy

Pauline adds;

Dearest Mother, I have by no means forgotten you as might well be imagined by not writing to you, but we agreed, Joseph and I that he would write to you and I to Fanny and since our letters are so different it would be best so for the first time during our trip we are both tired and nearly distracted by the noise, monkeys on dog's barks, men & boy acrobats, men, women and children playing violin, banjo, and singing for money, all kinds of band music, mules braying and men shouting, soldiers who had evidently been fighting, hard bloody faces and necks, men and boys chasing after us to sell us something. While it is highly interesting it is beginning to make our heads' ache, at least Joey's does, my eyes hurt and I want to get home now. Lovingly, Pauline<sup>6</sup>

The visits with the Head of the Bahá'í Faith, the Center of the Covenant, the Master, were a galvanizing experience in the lives of the participants. Meeting The Master in person gave them the confirmation and assurance they needed to dedicate the remainder of their lives to his service. Their complete obedience was never in doubt through the rest of their endeavors. The questions they asked show their still deep attachment to Jesus and their Christian roots, but the answers helped them to turn steadily toward their new Beloved, Bahá'u'lláh, who claimed to be the return of that same spirit that was in Christ. Other questions which were answered, gave them the tools and knowledge to fulfill their personal interests as to how they would serve when they returned to their homes. Alma went back after her pilgrimage, and continued to spread the Faith to many parts of Germany and beyond. Fanny and the Hannens went back to Washington and taught the Faith to friends of African descent, and particularly to Louis Gregory who carried the torch even farther than they could have imagined. Joseph took up the cause of helping the Persian friends and sewing seeds of friendship between Persians and Americans. He also put his secretarial skills to work and tirelessly served in many different areas. Pauline became very involved in teaching children's classes and following the instructions 'Abdu'l-Bahá had given her, even though she felt very unprepared and unworthy to do so. She also went on to teach many others to follow in her footsteps. All four of the returning pilgrims became sought after public speakers because of their clear and well deepened understanding of the Message of Bahá'u'lláh. Their lives were by now firmly rooted in this new garden called Bahá'í.

To close this chapter, I include the following Tablet which Joseph received after his return from his trip to Haifa. It must have added joy upon joy and further confirmations to what they had already experienced while in the master's presence:

Through Mírzá Munír Zein

To His Honor Mr. Jos. H. Hannen

H E I S G O D

O thou who art firm in the Covenant!

Thy letter dated July 12th, 1909 was received. Praise be to God that you have traversed the countries of Africa and Europe, visited the Friends of God, delivered to them the messages of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and upon your return to America you associated with all the Beloved and in all the meetings engaged in the commemoration of God. You must thank God for this Bounty and Favor to which you have attained. Any soul who in this day arises to serve the Cause of God, undoubtedly the Confirmations of the Holy Spirit will surround him.

Ye have written that the colored Bahá'ís have gathered in one meeting with the white Believers, destroying the foundations of racial differences and the barriers of color. When a gathering of these two races is brought about that assemblage will become the Magnet of the Supreme Concourse and the Confirmations of the Blessed Perfection will surround it.

I supplicated toward the Kingdom of God and asked forgiveness and pardon for the mother of Mrs. Hannen and Miss Knobloch. Upon thee be Bahá'ul' Abhá!

0 Thou Almighty! 0 Thou Forgiver! Cause Thou the entrance of Thy beloved maidservant, Mrs. Amalie Knobloch, from the world of matter to the World of Spirit. Forgive Thou shortcomings; overlook mistakes; do not look upon errors. Deal according to Thy Generosity and Bounty. Verily, Thou art the Forgiver and the Bestower of Favors.

0 thou Joseph, the speaker of the Word, the firm! Convey the wonderful Abhá Greetings on my behalf to Mary Alexander and exercise toward her the utmost kindness. The article which was published in one of the newspapers was received and read. I ask God to confirm and assist thee under all circumstances.

Upon thee be Bahá'ul'Abhá!

(signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás<sup>7</sup>

Before returning to the United States the Hannens stopped in Stuttgart to visit Alma and their son Carl. While there, they continued to help Alma with her teaching efforts. Pauline wrote in her memoirs that they spent a good deal of their time talking about their work with children. One of the listeners later wrote her for more information and in this way her expertise in teaching children's classes spread all the way to Germany.<sup>8</sup> This was especially meaningful because 'Abdu'l-Bahá had just sent her off with strong encouragement to continue with her work in teaching children.

Copy of the letter to Grandmother, Carl and Paul;

My Precious ones,

What shall I say, where begin. We have lived ages in a few weeks, my last letter was written on board the Prince Ludwig. (Early in the morning we arrived at Port Sa’id) Such a noise, you can’t imagine, thirty or more row boats filled with strange looking men shouting, and calling for passengers for their particular boat to land us. This awful noise and confusion was and in the only unpleasant feature of the trip. After awhile we were safely landed and with the help of a man engaged by Joseph we were taken to the home of Aḥmad Yazdí. He is (Just) a real Bahá’í and we loved him at once. Also the clerks in his store are Bahá’ís and this made it easy for to speak freely. He sent his clerk with us to a neat little hotel where we found an American Believer, Miss Holtzbecker, who has taken a great fancy to us and was a great help to us also, she is now preparing to go to Alka next week. We walked all around fort Said in and out the narrow streets and along the beautiful beach front where we gathered shells for our baby Paul “Thabet.” And for our big son Carl “Nategh,” (the first name sounds like sabet). It was such a beautiful place to pray and we did.

We had to wait until the next afternoon for the steamer, during the early afternoon, a, sand storm began to gather and by three o’clock the whole city looked pink, the air was filled with sand, and we could not see half a block away. We secured a row boat, which landed us safely on the Russian steamer about five o’clock, which was to leave that evening, Thursday but on account of the sand stork and very rough sea we had to lay in the harbor for 26 hours, leaving on Friday evening instead, the sea was so rough that all the passengers who were booked for Jaffa had to go on to Haifa. Such a lot of sea-sick people you never saw. But it was no wonder the boat rocked every which way, trunks, and satchals were flying back and forth like crazy things. The steamer seemed like a rubber ball stossing on the waves, the front of the boat would shoot its nose into the air and then plung into the sea as it seemed. Then tip to one side then to the other on a slant like this in other words the edge of the upper deck touched the water. Once while Papa and I were sitting in the middle of the boat, on the upper deck on the floor all of a sudden we had a tobargan slide in a great hurry to the railing of the boat and while straightening ourselves up a little and laughing at our hurry we were hurried back again and poor maps had a good rap on his head, but it was so very funny that we could do nothing but look at each other and burst out laughing in the midst of the fun we were sliding again, as fast as the wind to the side of the boat again. This time we managed to scramble to our feet and by the time the boat tilted again we were holding fast to something. Strange to say we were not ill, not the least bit, and we rather enjoyed this novel experience.

When we reached Haifa, the sea was so very rough that no boats came out to reach us or to take us in from ten in the morning until five that night. We believed as the Captain said we must go on to Beirut because if the men would venture out in their row boats the landing would be very dangerous. At five we saw some row boats coming towards us, oh joy, We hastened to pack our things and Papa looked at me so longingly and said, you must show your pluck now. I was not in the least afraid but it was indeed a dangerous landing but thank God after being pulled and thrown and pushed we finally found our selves walking on firm ground once more. We were so glad to be walking on mother earth that we refused to take a carriage to the hotel, but we had some men carry our baggage.

On arriving at the hotel, the Manager sent for Mírzá Jallal, the Son in law of our Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in about an hour he arrived with Mírzá Monever. After a very little talk about the various friends we were startled speechless by the announcement, Oar Lord will receive you, after you have had supper and one of us will call for you. They saw we were unfit for further speech and left us, we hastened to our rooms, washed and dressed. I put on my silk dress ate supper though we did not wish for it. While still at the table Mírzá Monever came. I saw him come in. We put on our hats and coats for it was cold, and started for that wonderful meeting. After a ten minute; very quiet, and prayerful walk we came to the gate of Madame Jacksons house and looking ahead of us on Mt. Carmel, a great eye as it seemed, but really a light on Mt. Carmel, was shinning down on us and this we were told was the Tomb of the Báb.

The Heavens seemed to be a mass of stars shedding their light upon us and though even the stars were happy for us. But how did I feel. Like a timid little bird, expecting I knew not what, but the end was very near. We were ushered into the parlor, where we removed our things, JOL then Mírzá Monever came back saying, "come" I followed first then Joseph. I stood upon the doorsill for one instance as though it might have been the edge of a precipice, looking upon our Lord who said something. Perhaps Welcome, but at the sound of his Voice, I flew at Him, my arms about His Blessed neck my head on his Shoulder I was breathing very hard, really panting and the uppermost thought was Father, Father, Father. I seemed like a weather beaten birdie having passed through storms and at last had reached the heaven of rest. Just as I began to feel that I was losing consciousness, this wonderful Father led me to a chair then I was quiet and more composed and saw him embrace and kiss your Papa, your son and brother, he will tell you how he felt.

We sat to one side of the room with Armeen, his dear Father, Mírzá Monever, Mírzá Jallal, I don't remember anymore oh yes another son-in-law and in one corner sat our Lords little grandsons beloved Lord. Very well, face beaming the inexpressible love light in His Eyes. He spoke of your recent visit (Fanny) and how happy he was to have you and that you were sincere servants, then spoke of Almas work and among the other things said she was the Conqueror of Germany. And her conquest would last throughout all eternity, while Napoleon, conquered many lands and people during his day but now these lands belonged to others etc. He spoke with great joy of the Beloved in America and of the Cause, especially the Washington friends. I can't remember all that was said that night, but after a little while He arose took me by the hand and lead me across the large inner hail or court (you remember Fanny) to see the ladies, at the same time calling Monever. He seated Himself upon the divan and I next to him with my hap encircled by his warm hand. In a few minutes, the Blessed Mother came in while He slipped out other ladies and I had to tell them about the Beloved in America etc. Our Lord returned to Joseph embraced him and called him his Son, rile own Joseph, and said he (we) should come the next morning and be his guests and then said good night. Joseph talked to the men for awhile then sent for me and we started for the Hotel. Happy beyond expression, but very quiet, we said very little. And slept very little, thinking over the wonderful events of the day. Personally Our Beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a great and pleasant surprise, His wonderous forehead clear skin, soft white beard and moustache the hair is thin and white but not often seen, warm soft and small firmly grasping hands and last but by no means least, His wonderful, wonderful eyes. They express as no other eyes can unspeakable love, sympathy, power and authority, submissiveness and oh the merry twinkle I never saw anything like it. As to his Spiritual power, our knowledge increased day by day and we wondered how the people could be so blind, not know Him only to see him walking with six or more pilgrims, following at a short distance. His bearing that of humility and power combined He is, He is, yes, He is

'ABDU'L-BAHÁ THE PERFECT.

The reason I say 'Abdu'l-Bahá instead of Lord or Master is because He gave us a talk on this subject to give it without the setting and in brief it is this) Lord is one title or attribute of God, Master is one attribute, 'Abbáss another and etc. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the cubmination and total of all perfections.

To go on the next morning, Sunday, we packed our things, left some cloth to be washed and by this time Dr. Faríd came for us took us for a walk and then to the home of Rúḥá but she was in ‘Akká at this time. We took all the gifts out and had them ready but not till Monday morning did we present the gifts. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walked in saying good morning and asked how we slept made us feel comfortable and at ease then I began and placed each gift one at a time mentioned the names of the givers and the messages where there were any to give and he thanked very sweetly for their expressions of love and asked for the many letters we had brought and then said you are a letter from the Friends in America a long expressive letter, you are their gift, they have sent you meaning both of us. When a merchant wished to sell grain he sends samples of his goods to be examined and you are the samples and it is very good. Then Joseph said we wish to say to our Lord that the goods are really much better than the sample. His eyes twinkled as He replied if the goods are equal to the samples it is very good, you are dear to me. We mentioned Ruth Fuhrman and He looks so lovingly upon her picture and smiled at the fancy positions of the children’s pictures, it gave him real pleasure, for He examined each one separately. Tell Mrs Fuhrman lie gave me no answer but bowed His head over the picture in prayer. Please tell Miss Ambrose I have secured an old handkerchief that is rough dried and been used many times by our Lord. Should you see Mrs. Eardley tell her ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to me “because you supplicate for her she may come to ‘Akká Tell Mrs. Thompson of Baltimore, that she shall stay with her husband just as long as she possibly can stand it, when it goes beyond her endurance, divorce is permissible. Tell lady Cowles that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lay her steamer rug across His lap folded his Blessed hands and prayed. The other Mrs Coles (Claudia) you say ne looked long at her daughter’s picture is the in prayer. O dear when will I be able to finish this letter always someone coming in at this very minute a lady is talking is fast as she can while I want to write. Ah dear, how glad we will be to settle down to work again, though my heart seemed nearly broken to leave our beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. To go on again with my story or at least try to It was not until Monday morning we gave the presents, but we arranged them Sunday morning, had just completed the operation when Mírzá Monever came in to us saying ‘Our Lord awaits you out front.’ quickly our hats and coats were put on and when we came to the front door, who should be standing at the gate but our Lord, with a little bunch of violets which he handed to me. He helped us into His carriage and He got in back of us with Mírzá Monever and in front was the drivel and old believer. As we were winding our way, up the steep Mountain roadway every one silent of course. Our Lord spoke, saying to me, “About two years ago you had a vision in which you were going up this steep mountain and at the top you met many strange people at the feast. Today you will see this vision literally fulfilled, in a moment he said think and there you will remember all. I did not recall this dream until I reached the top and greeted many pilgrims who had just arrived from different parts of Persia and India and Russia, believers who had traveled for three months on camels donkeys or walking as best they could, seeing these shining faces, the dream came back to me. After resting for a while and talking about America and having a friendly chat, one very old and beautiful believer read tee greetings sent by the Washington friends to our Lord, their faces expressed perfect joy and Joseph and I were very happy I chanted the Commune and the Arabic chant, and they were delighted and this servant was most happy to be able to do something to please these wonderful people. in a few minutes ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared at the door and said come, we all followed him, Joseph and I were mixed with the others but in a second our Lord stopped and motioned for me to come and then to Joseph to come near Him and quietly we followed Him into the holy Tomb of the Báb on Mt. Carmel. It was very solemn and I felt utterly unworthy to be there. All stood while Our Lord chanted the Visiting Tablet in a clear ringing voice. Then He knelt on the floor and all of us did likewise then we retreated slowly out into the garden we went into the same room where we had assembled in the first place, where the feast was prepared for us. with the exception of Joseph and I all were seated about the feast spread on the floor in real oriental fashion and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walking back and forth to serve us and to see that we were happy, pushing some cheese in front of Joseph or patting him on the back and saying “eat” and now and then let me take his hand in mine and look at me with such unspeakable love and tenderness, he spoke to us but Joseph has it all written out, I will not attempt to give his teachings here, but never the less it seems to me the greatest lesson was that of love. He embraced Joseph several times and kissed him too, once on the crown of his head as he was kneeling at his feet. Once he called us both to sit beside him on the divan. Being a woman I was denied the privilege of being kissed by Him, but His Hand grasp, I felt many times and to hear his Voice, as he entered one end of the house to come to us at the other end, “my daughter”, “my daughter. “ “My daughter” until He reached us and I was at his feet. He has shown us so much love that we can never do anything now but show love to the creatures of God.

When Joseph asked how he might serve more and differently he smiled sweetly, go on just as you have been doing your services are acceptable I begged that my tongue might be loosened to glorify the cause. He said, “You have great love, the utmost love for the Cause. That same love is service to the Cause. You serve the Beloved of God and this also is a service. Because you remember God this also is a service. You shall be confirmed to render great services. Be Confident. When we think of the great love God has showered upon us, our hearts must melt with love for everyone. Oh I can hear him now saying “my son, my daughter” in English too. First he said “My son” two or three times in English and my daughter had to be translated, then this humble servant wished with all her heart that he might call her something in English, a very few minutes afterwards he stepped into the room and said “My daughter” I could have cried for joy but I didn’t.

When we were about to leave the Tomb for to carriage, we had been sitting about in groups on the grass, talking when all became silent and all stood recently watching our Lord coming towards us from the gardeners house, he stopped, picked a rose and while doing this Mírzá Monever said” I prophecy. He is going to pick it for you.” (talking to me) Sure enough, walking slowly towards the road leading to the carriage not seeming to see anyone or anything until He came to where I stood, handed me the rose smiled and walked on until He came to the edge of the parapet or wall, here all Haifer lay at his Feet and at ours in that moment it seemed to me all the world was His to do with as He chose, yet like Christ He chose the humblest yet most mighty position non-resistance. He stood like a statue for quite a while as it seemed the bearing of one who has conquered the world. Like the gentle Christ, when He was being crowned with thorns and persecuted with only one to stand by him, John, yet he said, "I have overcome the world." As Our Lord stood there the unbodiment of humility and power, that saying of Christ became clear to me. As He turned He motioned to us to precede him to the carriage which was about a block away, higher up the Mt. As we seated ourselves we looked back to view another wonderful sight, Haifer at the foot of Mt. Carmel, the Tomb bathed in sun-light. Our Lord walking firmly up the steep mountain path towards the carriage at a little distance came about 25 pilgrims, heads bowed, hands across over their breasts, Jews Zoroastrians, Moh., Greeks etc. When he reached the carriage he stopped and faced them, motioning them to come nearer and then He spoke. This we did not understand of course nor was it interpreted for us. But it made a wonderful picture. Then he got in the carriage and we went home, not a word was spoken.

On several occasions we saw him walking on the rough Mt. roads with ten or twelve men following Him and now and then he would stop and speak to them. On one of these trips He said to them, when I arrived at this place forty years ago there were only a very few little huts about and now see the many houses, to this side, the German colony over there awaiting the coming of the Lord. After He passed through this land they came to settle. This was news to us because we had been taught that they came in 1868 – guess that was the Monastery.

Another time Dr. Farid, Joseph and I went for a walk and on our return we saw our Lord crossing the road a block away we were coming this way and He had crossed like this I saw that he had a bunch of flowers in his hands as he waved His other hand. Joseph began to go at a lively trot to overtake him but foolish me, I said to Ameen "No I won't run for then he will give me the flowers and I would rather the other Pilgrims should have this pleasure." That you think, when we reached the gate, he stood near the house smiling, and Joseph was coming toward us with the most beautiful flower in the bunch, a perfect iris. Every one marveled at its beauty and wondered where 'Abdu'l-Bahá had gotten it. Joseph had a beautiful rose (for himself.) The point

Hopes to come over on Sunday. Rest have gone to Cook's for mail. The agent told me I had two letters. We have the Message to a missionary yesterday. Haifa, Syria, Oct. 10, 1909

Dear Eva

Here we are at the foot of Mt. Carmel and so happy! We are in after dark Friday night and never can forget the landing by small boat-the uproar-the rearing and tearing of the lawless native-and we are glad to come out of it with our lives. I am mourning the loss of my black bag which I gave to Cook's man. It may turn up at Beirut. Mírzá Asadu'lláh says it will come back. He and 'Ináyatu'lláh.

called that night and the latter has been very good to us ever since. His shop is exactly opposite the door of Hotel Nassar, where we are staying. He closed it and took us to Dr. Faríd's house and dispensary – really a home and built on his own lot near the Brittingham place. Oh how Razeah Khánúm loved us over and over again; had me sit by her and every little while patted my knee. Farahangese is growing into a little beauty and she joined the party as we went to visit the Greatest Holy Leaf at Rúḥá Khánúm's (Madam Jackson's house). The beloved sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked us many questions about America and all the friends and her face lighted and glowed as she heard, of the love that was sent with us to them all. She was dressed in white, a light wool princess dress, with a delicate soft veil, bordered with tatting, neatly drawn back under her hair which is plainly combed back. The strong face is full of love, and so strongly marked by suffering that it is touching in the extreme. We were with her a long time and then went to 'Ináyatu'lláh's for a cup of tea. Khanoum Zeah, his wife, is very lovely. I like her so much. She had a turquoise blue trained princess gown and a large, long veil wound around her head and falling about both shoulders. It had the same fine tatting border. Little Hádí is growing. He was at first very shy. He has very heavy black hair and large eyes. I gave him one of Miss Albertson's balls; the kitties pleased him so much. Khánúm Zeah showed us charcoal sketches of herself and Hádí, by Juliet Thompson. She certainly has skill, as the heads were very characteristic and individual.

From there we climbed up Mt. Carmel to the Tomb of the Bá'b. Our land ladies on the left of the path and runs at least 300 or 400 feet, part of which, they tell me, belongs to doctor. Mrs. Harrison will bring the leaves. The land needs attention. More vines should be planted, and almond, olive and St. John's bread trees. I will ask Razeah Khánúm about it before we leave. Dear, we then crossed over to the Tomb of the Bá'b. A silence fell on us as we neared the building. An old man heating coffee or water over a little fire outdoors. The flowers in front were four o'clocks, roses, jessamine and still a few orange blossoms. After greeting the keeper we took off our shoes and entered the carpeted (rugs) vestibule. Mírzá Asadu'lláh advanced to the door, knelt and bowed his head to the threshold, touching with his lips three times. Each followed in turn while the holy solemnity intensified and soon Mírzá Asadu'lláh began a beautiful chant. The Tomb vibrated until every atom of our bodies responded. Dear Eva, no word can give you the rest of it. I thought of and longed for you and prayed for the dear ones. I can see in this our preparation for 'Akká. Without it I know not what would be left of me. Mírzá 'Ináyatu'lláh sent word to 'Akká and 'Abdu'l-Bahá commanded us to wait until Monday, as He is entertaining the Governor and officials every night.

Today we are to drive, then call on Riḍvánie (Arna's friend) and the wife a third Yazdí. She is not well. Then we have a Pillow dinner at 'Ináyatu'lláh's and tomorrow at 9 to 10 A.M. go over to the Holy City.

Love and to all,

Lovingly,

Letter of Dr. Susan I. Moody, en route to Persia to Mrs. Eva W. Russel of Chicago

Robert College, Constantinople,

Dearest Eva:

With only two days in the Holy City, you will know that I could not write letters, but I shall try to give you all the detail following my last which left us at 'Akká's gates.

The curtains are drawn to protect us and I think there could not have been a more peaceful entry into 'Akká. No one seemed to notice us except two boys who ran up behind and raised the back curtain to peak in. We entered the outer gate, then turned and drove through the inner wall, passed the prison house where Bahá'u'lláh and the seventy followers were first confined. How it recalled the days when we read Bakia Khánum's thrilling account of their suffering! The very walls spoke to us of it. Then we entered the court of "the Home" which we reached at last, October 11, 1909, 10:30 A. M.

Mírzá Munír, Mírzá Mahrah, the aged cousin of the Báb, and three visiting Zoroastrians were among the friends who welcomed us in the courtyard. Mírzá Munír said that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been with them, but had just gone up to His room. Mr. Sprague was given the room next to His, and Cecilia and Louise one on the other side of His, and I a little farther on, next to the woman's apartments.

Monever Khánum came to us very soon and visited for three quarters of an hour. She asked for many of the former pilgrims and said all were eager to hear of the progress of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár (Temple) in America. In appearance she is just what I had pictured. Her wonderful eyes, her smile are beautiful. So Rúhâ Khánum's eyes seem to look into your heart also. The Greatest Holy Leaf (Sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá) impresses one most powerfully. Her face shows the tragic life of suffering. Last night as we sat in a dimly lighted room, talking with her and the mother, she really resembled pictures of the agony of the cross.

It is the time of the fast of azan and most of the Household are keeping it, but dinner was served for us, a heap of fragrant jessamine blossoms lying beside plate. We had this meal by ourselves. As we left the dining room, Louise went first and on stepping into the open court, she saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá passing to His room. She drew back, but He motioned her to come on and stood facing us in the door of His room as we passed. She said she knew Him instantly. I thought, "This is the most wonderful man I ever saw – is it He?" When He recalled in our room later He was in pure white, and I thought perhaps I had been mistaken, but later I knew it certainly was He.

He came to us at 2:00 P.M. Monever Khánum had told us of His coming and all gathered in my room as it was the largest. Himself saying: "I am happy that you are here. Did you have a good journey? How are all believers? When one has so great an aim for a journey as this, the little losses and trials you have on the way should not upset you. When you have the ocean, you do not need the river. When you have the sun, you do not need a lamp. When you have heaven, you do not need the earth. All the prophets desired what is your today. You must be happy here. You must be very happy. When you possess a large house, it does not trouble you if it has a crack or a broken window, so long as you have the house – that is the main thing."

He then took us each by the hand, saying He would see Mr. Sprague, and left us sitting silent with Monever Khánum for some minutes. He seemed to float out of the room. His carriage is superb – the stately majesty of simplicity and naturalness. The light of the eyes and the love expressed in the face are so brilliant that it was only by favour of a flood of tears that I could continue to look into them.

Dear Monever Khánum sat with us for some time and when we found our voices, we spoke of the great privilege which had come to us. She said: "Yes, it means much, but if you treat it as a child does a toy, it is worth nothing. If it does not benefit our lives, if we do not live the teaching, all is lost. Thus some come and go away without any benefit." Then she continued: "Is it not strange that little 'Akká should be the place of this light? Think how many beautiful cities there are in the world, and yet little 'Akká is the place! Many have not even heard of 'Akká, and many right here do not know Him. They realize that He is a great and good man, but they are indifferent. They will not even stop to inquire why it is that He is different from other men."

Then we talked of the loving hearts which were following us every step of the journey here and were longing for the blessing of the spiritual meeting here with us. We asked if she would like to go to America and she said simple: "It is better to be where we can serve best" Then added with a bright smile: "would it not be a great thing for America if 'Abdu'l-Bahá should go there?"

Mrs. Harrison asked Monever Khánum if she thought it were possible for one to remain in a state of great spiritual upliftment and intoxication and still contact with the world. Monever Khánum replied: "It would not be best; one must strive to reach these great spiritual heights, then have a season of assimilation and giving forth of what they have received, or nothing is gained. It is the same as if a child went to school and receive lessons continually. He must have time for preparation."

Toward evening, on looking from the windows of my room which front on a court and garden, we could see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sitting in front of a small wooden summer house with tiled roof, which has replaced the tent used by Him as a resting-place and to entertain His guests for so many years. You remember the photo in Mr. Chase’s book.

Seyyid Mahdi, the Persian who came with us from Port Sa’id, is with Him and Mírzá Ḥabíb’u’lláh – very dark hair, very tall and straight, in the black uniform of the Persian Consulate (where he was formerly employed), – goes in to sit with them. We could hear the murmur of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s voice and twice caught the words “Írán – Irani” and saw the Seyyid bow in response. We slept well that night under His roof.

I shall not give any of the Table Talks or those of the noble old men who met with us after dinner. Louise will give them all out when she gets home.

About 5:45 the next morning I arose, too happy to sleep any longer. I had been up also at 3 A.M., looking out of the stars, when I heard ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s voice just outside my door calling one of the women who came and went with Him and soon returned to the corridor and called softly a name which sounded like “Fatullah.” After a short talk her light disappeared within the women’s apartment. I only speak of this by the way and because every little incident seems of moment within these walls – some service done, some protective thought for others evidence.

A mosquito had been bussing around my head and as the nets were down, I improvised one, putting my suit case on and at the head and making a mound of the cover. I threw my silk kimona over and slept to have a morning dream.

The Mediterranean had very suddenly risen far above its usual bounds, was lapping vigorously over the very door – stones and my first thought was, “This house will be swept away.” Then we went out among the people to warn them. We opened their doors and told them what was going on. The first room was crowded full of strange, wild looking people. A very dark man, with rough hair and beard, was holding a child. All in the room deemed to be angry because we came in. Then we went to many other homes, – some of my relatives. At one place the waves were so high that we could not get around the corner of the house to the door many of the people got their things together to go to a safe place. One wagon drove past as we were standing on our own doorsteps. The wagon sides were barred like a cage. A young woman pleaded with us to take from her a large pasteboard box. We told her that our house would probably be swept away also, but she insisted, so I reached up and took it from her. This seemed to settle everything, for my dream finished right there.

I got up, as I said, at 5:45 and before I had finished dressing, heard voices in the courtyard. Three figures of women in black and veiled were crossing the courtyard. They were Bahá’í women who had come to join in chanting Tablets with the women of the Household. A little chubby girl about twelve years of age came and rapped at the door and said: “Be ready in twenty minutes.” Then at 6:50 Monever Khánúm came and we went with her to the room where the women are met by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He was already in the room kneeling, or sitting in Oriental fashion in the corner of the divan which runs around three sides of the room. He motioned us to sit on either side of Him. Louise and Cecilia took the right hand and I sat at the left.

While one of the women chanted, He continued sorting and addressing Tablets. Soon He stopped the one who was chanting and told Monever Khánúm to take it up. Her voice is extremely sweet and the words seemed to ripple over her lips like a tiny booklet. After she had chanted several of the prayers, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told the little girl, who called us, to continue. As she pitched her voice low and was using the false vocal cords, He spoke and she raised the key, letting her voice out freely.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked after our health. Then, “Have you had a good night? Did you see Mrs. Bede? How is Mrs. Brittingham’s health? Is she on the way?” Saying He would see us later in the day, He went out. The sisters of Moneber Khánúm – Zeah Khánúm and Tooba Khánúm – came to us with loving greetings. We embraced and then the other women gathered around and we talked with them in the smile language. All of the daughters speak English. Zeah Khánúm asked especially about Mrs. Haney and the baby.

Letter of Dr. Susan I. Moody, en route to Persia to Mrs. Eva to Mrs. Eva W. Russel of Chicago

Robert College, Constantinople,

Dearest Eva:

I am continuing my story of our two days in ‘Akká, although sitting here, looking out over the Bosphorus. In rushing about every minute I have tried far ahead of the letters, but will try and catch up during our five days on the Black Sea. I wonder if you will care for all the details I have to write. It will take many pages to tell all.

After breakfast on October 12th I watched ‘Adbu’l-Bahá walking up and down a shady walk – his favourite one in the garden. A beggar had wandered into the court. ‘Adbu’l-Bahá went toward Him and put his arms across the trunk of a Soria tree. (Lena has is as a shrub with feathery foliage and pinky plumes.) Leaning His head in His arm, with face turned toward us, He talked, making a beautiful picture. He stood there for some minutes, then moved on into the court, calling aloud to someone. As I leaned forward I could see Mr. Sprague waiting for Him to pass and then about a dozen of the friends followed under the arch into a lower room. I heard the murmur of His voice for about ten minutes as He talked to them in a room below. The beggar had followed and leaned against one of the pillars of the arch till a man came to him and he went out.

Later ‘Adbu’l-Bahá went to the little house in the garden called first Mírzá Munír, then Mírzá Ḥabíb’u’lláh and later Mr. Sprague. I felt greatly privileged to thus quietly observe the love and reverence of the Eastern believers, shown in His presence. Mírzá Nouredin left Him, stepping backward to the gate in the most reverential way. All are ready at His call.

There are many sparrows in the garden; they are twittering. The blue, blue sea is covered with ripples. There is a low fringe of light clouds. Mt. Carmel’s point is in the distance. What a background for the scene in the garden!

A row of olive trees in this court are laden with fruit, with very few leaves on the side toward the house. In the court, on the other side of our corridor are two tall date palms, with three large bunches each, which have been sewed up in burlap to protect them from the weather until fully ripe. In this court the flowers are lovely. A climbing vine with many purple blossoms, three petaled, covers the side of the long flight of stone steps. It has long arms which reach out and wave gracefully with every stir of air – a very decorative plant, leaf like a castor bean, but woody trunk; and another shrub with a dozen of more large white lily-shaped blossoms, each at least six inches across.

While I write I hear His voice. Mr. Sprague has just been in to tell me of his interview. We two are to leave tomorrow, Wednesday evening, and take the boat for Constantinople on Thursday. ‘Adbu’l-Bahá said, “This is for your own good. If you delay, the weather will be cold and the journey will be much more difficult.”

Mr. Sprague asked if he might take Feriborz, the son of Kai Khusraw (the man in India who gave his life for Mr. Sprague) with us, and the reply was: “If all of his family are willing, it will be good.”

How blessed a privilege it is to stand here in the window and watch Him walking and talking! Mírzá Asadu’lláh and Dr. Faríd have just arrived and are now with Him.

Raziah Kahnum came with them and has called on us. Dr. Faríd came later and said that ‘Adbu’l-Bahá talked with him of my going to Persia and said: “Do you think she can stand the privations there?”

10:45 A. M.

Our beloved ‘Adbu’l-Bahá sent Monever Khánum to tell me to go to Him. He had me sit beside Him and said immediately: “You are to go to Persia. At first you will find things difficult, – the convenience are not the same. Many of the people are poor and sleep on the floor, as they have no beds. You must not look at their circumstances, but at their hearts. They will love you very much and I want you to be happy there. You must have much patience and try very hard to be faithful; lose sight of yourself entirely; work only for the love of God and you will succeed. You will find much love there – all will love you.”

I asked Him to pray that I might be separated from the self, so that I might fulfil His Command and He said: “I will often pray for you – you are never separated from Me.”

I then asked about having a home and He approved of it greatly and said: “Have your office in your home.” He approves of my having Feriborz in my home, saying: “He is delicate and needs a mother’s care.” I spoke of later also having one of the orphan Bahá’í boys and thus make a real home life. This, also, is sanctioned by Him.

Then I told Him of the thirty lost supplications, regretting the disappointment to each of the dear friends who had written. With a loving smile He said: “Tell them it is just the same as if they were all received. They are all accepted and you are favoured to have been their messenger.” Again I spoke of all the love that was sent and which I now laid at His dear feet. He said: “You are a worthy messenger,” and He arose and placed His hands on my shoulders and drew me to His side. I asked if I could come again in the future and He said: “Yes, and I only send you away go soon because the Black Sea gets cold and stormy soon and it is for your good that you are to go tomorrow, since the steamer leaves next day, but you will never be separated from Me.”

At 3 P. M. Miss Gamblin, the English teacher, had tea served in our room and visited with us. Just as we were finishing, ‘Adbu’l-Bahá came in and sat with us for a few minutes. He asked Miss Gamblin if she would try to interpret for us, but she blushed and said she would rather not, so He did not stay long. I had twisted my ankle in going to call Mr. Sprague for the tea, – caught my heel on the sill of the dining room door and fell flat before the door of ‘Adbu’l-Bahá. I had a handful of jessamine blossoms which were spilled. I gathered them up in spite of the pain. After tea was over I ‘fessed up and Miss Gamblin brought liniment and bandage, which I had to wear over a weak and save my ankle every step I took but, fortunately, managed to get through without having to make any explanations to the Household. Cecilia and Louise used to cover up my advance and retreat very successfully.

The rest of the afternoon was spent visiting with Razeah Khánum, Tooba Khánum and Monever Khánum. Zeah Khánum’s baby is very delicate and requires constant attention. I showed them my Bahá’í album and Louise took photos of little Marahanghes with me, and I took one of them. Then Cecilia and I had one together – all in my room. Dear Eva, I have asked Louise to give you a set for me. She will explain about it. I had meant to tell that ‘Adbu’l-Bahá asked us whether we had ever met Miss Gamblin before, and Mr. Sprague he had and that she had been a member of his choir in Christ Church at Neuilly. He said: “It is possible to greet one another as brother and sister here, even though we come from distant parts of the earth.”

As I told you, I leave the Table Talks and the after talks by Mírzá Asadu'lláh, Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí and Mírzá Mahram for Louise to give you from her notes.

Slept with my foot higher than my head. It ached, but I slept all the same. Arose at dawn, bathed, dressed and looked out at the wonderful sea until they called us to the chanting of prayers by the women. ‘Adbu’l-Bahá motioned us to the same seats beside Him, and Cecilia says that while I was placing myself on the divan, He looked me through and through very searchingly. I did not know it, but this accounts for the instant consciousness I had of being absolutely nothing, weak, asjamed of my former self, and as Zeah Khánúm, in her wonderful and sympathetic voice chanted the first prayers, I felt myself melt and melt until the tears rained down my face. I realized my unworthiness and His great love. When I tho’t that this was my last day, I had to exert myself to restrain my longing to kneel there and His feet.

Gradually my horizon cleared and through the chanting of Monever Khánúm and two other maid-servants, I became tranquil again. Dr. Faríd and His father and mother had stayed all night. After the women were through chanting, Razeah Khánúm told ‘Adbu’l-Bahá that I had chanted “Sobhani kya ho” for them and He turned and asked me to chant my prayer now. I felt happy when He turned and smiled and said: “Khali khoob” when I finished. Then He went out.

Louise was too hoarse to respond to the request to give one of her Bahá’í hymns, as she had done for the other gatherings.

All of the women greeted us again and said they had wanted to be with us the night before, but whenever they sent over we were still in Mr. Sprague’s room where to sets of the men came to call on us.

A visiting Zoroastrian woman seemed very glad when I asked how she was and said goodbye in Persian. Indeed, all are interested in my prospects of learning the language.

Three of the women, including Miss Gamblin, are going to Haifa to help Nurse Rúhá Khánúm, who is still very ill, and the others are tired out. Zeah Khánúm and Monever Khánúm again joined us and we had a delightful social visit, again going through the album in which they saw many of whom they had heard and some they had seen.

Love to all, and please send this around, as I can only write a postal occasionally to anyone else. In His Name,

During our first meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá after our arrival in His Presence on the morning of October 25rd, after our beautiful Welcome and while tea was served to us, He spoke as follows. Some started to come to that Blessed Spot and never reached their destination. We were all here in unity. The journey was long and full of trial, but we had at last met and this meeting would be the cause of our meeting in the Kingdom above. ‘He asked about the Cause in America and then asked for the believers in New York and what was the condition of unity in its Assembly. He said the Cause in America was now like the dawn; it was like the spring time, and like the first shoot of growth, but that later it would grow into a tree. He said all the believers in America were present when we were present.

Having another engagement, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not with us at the noon meal which later followed.

At the table talks of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá given during our Visit, Mírzá, Munír always interpreted.

Evening of October 23rd, our first meal with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”

At this table you will not find material comfort, but you will find spiritual comfort. The spiritual comfort must be of your heart and soul. For a lover in the house of his beloved is so intoxicated with love that he does not care. I invite you to this spiritual table. From the heaven and bounty of the Blessed Perfection I want you to partake of that table. The material table is found everywhere.

After a silence ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: I praise this fact that women have made progress. They are, in America, to surpass the men. In Persia the men surpass the women. In the Kingdom there is no difference. All are good. Praise be to GOD, the Love of GOD is in their hearts! When women progress, some other foot is shown.

In Persia, many men surpassed Kurret-al-Ayn in knowledge and eloquence, and were more illumined, but she, being a woman; manifested a greater work. The maidservants in America are good souls and are advancing. Among those supplications from America, there are ten from women to one from men.

The sun shines upon all and each receives from it and reflects according to capacity. Judgment is given according to capacity.

Come and assist to elevate woman to her true dignity and station. Such as you find in this lamp – the oil and the wick – the power to ignite it. But the power in the light is only for this room. . . But in man there is a power of flame to enlighten the world. This oil, when else touches it, will be ignited but that power in men, when touched by the Love of GOD, will be instrumental in enlightening the world.

not known. He said that Mary was engaged to Joseph, and Joseph, on the night of their wedding, found that she was with child, and asked her: “What is this?” and she answered; “This is from the Holy “Ghost.” “I told him: “May GOD curse you for what you have said. Christ was the Spirit of the spirits; the Light of the lights; the Mystery of the mysteries; the Sun of Truth!” He asked: “What is the peace of it?” He wanted an existing proof, for he said that all of these miracles which were applied to Kim are false. I told him, consider this present proof, that Christ was but one soul, and is called and brought together all the different nations and races under one tent. Is it possible to perform such an achievement thro human power? He arose alone and singly. What greater proof do you ask than this?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá often offered us bread and honey, and after a pause He said: I hope, when you go back to America, that you will be transformed like this honey, you will be so sweet. Some people are very bitter, while others are sweet. Those spiritual souls and divine persons are very sweet.

There is no greater pleasure in the world than when the different races, nations and creeds matter together and are united. Such a gathering as ours here has no equivalent in the world, with such, unity, harmony and love. We are not gathered here because we are of the same country. The oneness of language has not gathered us here. Oneness of politics has not gathered us here. Oneness of interest has not brought us together.

Nay, rather, it is the belief, and the assurance, and the Love of GOD, the power of the WORD of GOD, and the Unity of the world of humanity that has united us; and this is the Eternal Unity and Love.

In America, praise be to GOD, the cause has become famous and well known. In most of the cities believers are found. They recognize The Physician. Now they must not according to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. They must use the medicine appointed by the Real Physician. They have to compare their actions with the teachings so that all the people may witness and bear record that these people are real Bahá'ís. A sick person knows the physician and receives the medicine, but when he does not use it, what is the use of it? Therefore, the beloved of GOD must endeavor to make all their thoughts and intentions the practice of the teachings and commands.

If a man is named a "Bahá'í" but his deeds do not assert the fact, what is the use of that? The balance, or standard, is action. A Bahá'í is to be known by his actions, not only by his words and pretensions. Therefore Christ has said, You shall know the tree by its fruits. The sign of the iahai is,- to be sincere. He is trustful, detached from the world, attracted to the Holy Spirit, is contented, is kind to all the people, and in the service of the Cause is a devoted one. He is well assured, steadfast, and endures every calamity and difficulty. In the world of humanity such a man is in fact a Bahá'í. Otherwise he bears the name – nothing more.

If one should wholly abstain from meat and be contented with vegetables, it would be much better. And how difficult it is for a man to kill an animal and to prepare the food for himself. But as it is already killed and we find it in the market, we buy it. As it is new killed, it is better to take and eat it than to leave it to so

When in 1910 I went to Haifa on my first visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, there were rumors that He might come to America now that the way was open for him to travel. Many of the friends whom I met said they could not picture 'Abdu'l-Bahá in a western setting, but from the moment I heard the subject mentioned I thought He would come. One day when He was giving instruction I said; "When you come to America will you stay with us?" He smiled at my confident, "when" and answered: "Yes."

Two years later He came to our country, reaching New York the night of April 10th. I sent to Him a word of greeting with a reminder of the promise made at Haifa but a note from one of His translators said that. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had decided to stay at a hotel while in Washington. It can readily be imagined how perplexing was this news and how disappointing was this reply. My husband, to whom on my return from Haifa I had mentioned the promise, had been reading in the New York papers of addresses which 'Abdu'l-Bahá was making in churches and before peace societies and asked me when He was coming to visit us. I had to say He was going to a hotel. "Did He not say He would come to us?" was the next question, and to my answer in the affirmative time followed the further question: "How do you account for this?" I was obliged to say I could not explain it. Then there flashed into my mind a thought and I said: "This has just come to me: Although we regard 'Abdu'l-Bahá as belonging to the entire world, yet he is from the East and probably an Oriental would not accept an invitation to stay in the house of a married woman whose husband had not joined in asking him." He answered: "I am glad to ask 'Abdu'l-Bahá," and the response to a little note written immediately was the following wire received the next morning. "Letter received. Grateful. For your sake, myself a translator come your house." signed, "'Abbás."

On Saturday afternoon at a little after one o'clock His train reached Washington. He had been told that 'Abdu'l-Bahá desired to arrive quietly so the Bahá'í friends with the exception of a very few who brought Him to our house, restrained their longing to greet Him at the station. The day before His arrival the floor of the hall of the new house, in which we were not quite settled, was strewn with innumerable pictures preparatory to finding their places. This hall, large and square, led to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room and when He reached it He stopped, looked at the floor, then at the walls and turning to me said: "You have labored much,"

The meeting that evening took place at the Carnegie Library. Every seat and all standing room were filled and a path had to be made along the stairs and hall of entrance for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to pace through, so dense was the crowd standing with bared heads. Upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá's entrance into the large assembly hall, the audience rose at once and remained standing until He bade them be seated. He spoke mainly of peace and arbitration and the talk was followed with close attention.

When we reached home 'Abdu'l-Bahá's late dinner was served to in the morning room and we talked for some time. I asked about a friend of ours, a victim in the Titanic disaster. I said he had been much beloved and that his work had been appreciated in both Europe and America. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied: "hen one has been devoted to his work in life, art or whatever it may be, it is regarded as worship, and he is undoubtedly surrounded by the mercy of God." He also said: "If one does you a service and at some other time a wrong, overlook the one for the other and think only of the good."

During the early morning of the next day, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had many interviews. Between half after nine and ten He was with Jeffrey Boy looking at his toys, books and pictures, and then they went to the roof together. 'Abdu'l-Bahá never required an interpreter when with a child.

There was a meeting at Studio Hall at 11:15, an interview in the early afternoon and at four 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Universalist church. We found the minister, Dr. John Van Schaick, standing on the pavement waiting to receive Him. He conducted Him through a side door to the chancel. In his introduction Dr. Van Schaick said in part as follows: "In behalf of the officers and members of this church I have the honor of welcoming you to Washington. We feel that we are honored by the presence of one who has so faithfully served God and humanity. What you have done as a great leader and as a servant of God, for Universal Peace, Universal Knowledge, Universal Brotherhood calls forth our deepest gratitude and we gather here today because we believe that you are one of those who do not count their lives dear unto themselves, but, seek only to serve God." Dr. Van Schaick said that because of the many engagements of this Great Teacher of the East, the order of the service would be changed and that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would first address the audience and then leave.

The address was mainly upon the theme of Unity. So inspiring were the thoughts expressed in this address that the people begged to shake the hand of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which request was granted. So large was the audience that it was long before he was released.

On arriving home we found a group awaiting him. We all had tea together and after the guests had one ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was read to for a half hour. An interview with a member of the British Embassy and another person followed.

While at dinner my husband said: “Some evening, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, let us go to the Library of Congress to see it lighted.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “We will go now.” My husband urged that after a full day He must be too tired to do anything more, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was not dissuaded and late as It was we drove to the Library.

First we went to the gallery to look down on the reading room. Two of the bronze figures of heroic size were examined. Then Mr. Parsons turned to the entrance of the gallery. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was told that my husband would like to show Him another part of the Library, He said’ “When one undertakes to see a thing He should see it.” There are bronze figures placed at intervals around the gallery and all of these ‘Abdu’l-Bahá examined most carefully asking the name of each and finding, occasionally, anachronisms in the costumes.

We then went to the Division of Prints of which my husband had charge. It was growing late, so to avoid the inconvenience of having the lights turned out, it seemed best to go quickly through the immense corridors filled with the cases of interviewing prints. Again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá preferred to see thoroughly and went in and out among the cases showing interest in the rare and attractive pictures. My husband said to me: “The lights will go out.” I responded with a smile of utmost confidence and we proceeded slowly through the Division. Then Mr. Green, the custodian of the building, appeared, was introduced to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and when told by Mr. Parsons of his concern regarding the lights, he said: “The lights shall be kept on as long as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wishes to stay.” He set an order to this effect, adding that the doors were to continue unlocked for the present. Thus there was time to show ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the stacks for the books, the machinery for moving them and some interesting Turkish books. Upon our return home ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had his usual late dinner and soon went to His room. But who knows the hour this night when He ceased to pray for his children and allowed Himself the so much needed rest!

I have given as full an account as possible regarding one day of to Washington visit but I know there will not be pace in the Year Book for many further details. On the following day there many interviews. Early in the morning the housekeeper, the governess and servants were called together, exhorted to be fitful and given presents.

The first of the meetings which were held in the large room of the house from Monday to Friday inclusive, took place that afternoon and many interviews followed. At eight o'clock a Persian dinner was arranged for 'Abdu'l-Bahá's secretaries and a number of American men. 'Abdu'l-Bahá the Host and personally served the guests.

On Tuesday there was a large luncheon at the house of Mírzá 'Alí Kuli Khán, followed by a reception to which many people came to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Among the guests was the Turkish Ambassador. After that meeting the latter said: "I want to go to the house where He is to speak next so he came to our house. On Thursday, he gave a dinner for 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Friday, lunched with 'Abdu'l-Bahá at our house. Where among the guests was His nephew Mírzá Zia, a delightful.

A few years later at Green Acre, I again met the Ambassador's nephew to whom I said: "When did you become a Bahá'í?" He answered: "That night when 'Abdu'l-Bahá talked to us after dinner at my uncle's house."

On Tuesday also, 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed two large audiences of colored people, one in the morning at Howard University and the other at the evening at a church.

Among the many impressive meetings in Washington was the one on Wednesday afternoon at Studio Hall to which the children were brought to receive the blessing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. They were gathered in His arms or patted on head or shoulders. One little boy returning to his mother after receiving the blessing said: "It is like Jesus and the little children!"

On Saturday at the reception given in the name of the power possessed 'Abdu'l-Bahá to penetrate the reality of minds and hearts. I was told that when General Creely of Arctic fame was presented, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to him: "I have often sympathized with you in the experiences of hardships in your earlier years." Upon meeting Admiral Wainwright He said: "You are a good Admiral because you stand for peace." The Admiral answered: "My wife makes me do so!"

At this reception there was a young woman to whom I had been drawn from the time she was a small child. Late in the evening, I was able to leave my post near the stairway and enter the library where there had been gathered about 'Abdu'l-Bahá throughout the evening many groups of people. Coming to the center of the room I saw my young friend to who I said: "Of course you have been presented to 'Abdu'l-Bahá?" She answered: "No, there have been so many people surrounding Him that I have not been able to reach Him." Just then 'Abdu'l-Bahá having the intention of leaving the room, came near us and I said: "'Abdu'l-Bahá, I want to present to you Mrs. Miles." Looking from one of us to the other He said: "Mother: daughter." I replied: "She was a very mother of her own." Then He turned to her and said: "You are very fortunate to have two mothers."

Before 'Abdu'l-Bahá left for Chicago on Sunday we asked Him to stay with us on His return, but He felt it would be best for all His party to be together. After visiting Chicago, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went to Cleveland and Pittsburgh returning to Washington on May 8th. During the visit He had many interviews and group meetings, large and small. I shall write about His third visit to Washington after giving a brief account of His stay at Dublin.

On the evening of July 23rd, five of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s party arrived in Dublin from Boston and after dining at our house went with us to the house down to the hill which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had chosen as a place to live, rather than with us in the larger house. The following afternoon Mírzá Valliola Khán and I drove to the station to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, taking Him and His translator to His house. My husband was at the house to greet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to whom he showed the view from the second story veranda. During the next few days ‘Abdu’l-Bahá drove, walked, saw a few people and undoubtedly wrote much. I wanted Him to have a little quiet before seeing people generally, but on Saturday, July 26th, after several inquiries had been made as to when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá could be greeted, I telephoned Him for permission to ask the people to come on Monday, Wednesday and Friday of the coming week, which request was granted. Anticipating this permission many people arrived on Sunday afternoon and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke to them in the large room of our house. How difficult it is to refrain from mentioning the subjects upon which he spoke and describing at length the happiness which He radiated! People came from great distances to stay with him. There were visitors from Portland, Maine, Portland, Oregon, Washington, San Francisco, Boston and New York.

At one of the afternoon meetings, the Lector of the Unitarian church asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to speak on Sunday, August 11th, and a large number gathered to hear Him, he spoke for fifty minutes, which was unusual as His talks were generally short. The people sat motionless, so great was the power He manifested. Never have I known Him to look as He looked during the address. I asked the translator if he had ever seen ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as He appeared this day. He said: “Yes, once before in Chicago when He was speaking in a church.” I asked what it was and he replied: “Ecstasy!”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá has attracted many hearts at Dublin. Members of the summer colony asked Him to lunch and to motor, and they came time after time to hear Him speak.

When at Haifa, two years before, I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá what I should say to a certain distinguished artist on my return to Dublin, He said: “Give him the message. He will not accept now, but he will later.” This I did with the result which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had foretold. Very obviously he did not care for the message and with an unchanged point of view he came one day to a meeting at our house. His expression was a study of conflicting emotions. There was a battle between his objection to the Bahá’í message and the artist’s utter capitulation to the rare and beautiful picture before him, of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in black robe and white turban sitting in the bay window, silhouetted against a red curtain! How, after many years, the message is attracting him.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá accepted an invitation to spend an evening at the house of a well known scientist. After the host had told story ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was asked to do so. I should have known that He would make a better choice than I, but forgetful of this, I urged Him to tell the story of Iosk a pretty Persian tale with a moral. This He did and it was received with mild applause. Then, alert with eyes flashing, He turned to the host saying: “NOW I will tell you a story and it isn’t going to be a sermon!” Picture ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the long robe and white turban of the East surrounded by men and women of the East in full evening dress, the only link with His usual environment being the group of Persian sitting with bowed heads are folded arms on a sofa in the distance. He told with brilliance an Arabian story having climax after climax. It seemed each moment that nothing more humorous could develop, but it did and listeners were shouting and swaying from side to side with amusement. In the midst of the applause he rose, bade goodbye to the Assemblage, and left the room with the children of the family grasping His hands and coat as they followed Him to the car. While we were driving home, speechless with happiness, He said with the simplicity of a child: “Now are you pleased with me?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá arrived in Washington for his third visit on November 6th. Again He thought it best to live with the members of His party, but he resumed the meetings in our house. There were small group meetings in the library at 4:70 and at 5:30, large numbers of people were addressed in the lower room. The house which was taken for Him and party was constantly filled with visitors. One day when there was a group of believers there He said to us that we must not be concerned later when the Cause is violently condemned, that it is this way that knowledge of it will spread. He said we must regard all antagonistic expressions as, “the little songs of the sparrows.”

After lunching with us on Friday, November 8th, and speaking at 4:30 and 5:30, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá drove to the Jewish synagogue where after music and a talk by the Rabbi, He made a remarkable address on the oneness of the foundation of spiritual truth as taught by all the prophets and of the wonderful achievements of Abraham and of Moses. He gave an extraordinary survey of Jewish history leading up to the coming of another great prophet of God. He said: “During the time that the people of Israel were being tossed and afflicted by the conditions I have named, His Holiness Jesus Christ appeared among them. Jesus of Nazareth was Jew. He was single and unaided, alone and unique. He had no assistant. The Jews at once pronounced him to be an enemy of Moses. They declared that he was the destroyer of the Mosaic laws and ordinances. ***** This personage Jesus Christ declared His Holiness Moses to have been the prophet of God and pronounced all the prophets of Israel as sent from God, he proclaimed the torah the very Book of God, summoned all to conform to its precepts and follow its teachings. It is a historical fact that during a period of fifteen hundred years the kings of Israel were unable to promulgate broadcast the religion of Judaism. In fact during that period the name and history of Moses were confined to the boundaries of Palestine and the torah was a book well known only in that country. But through His Holiness Christ, through the blessing of the new testament of Jesus Christ, the testament, the torah was translated into six hundred different tongues and spread throughout the world.”

This produced a stir in the audience. An effort was made to stop the address but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá continued to speak, asking for just a few moments more of closest attention. He said: “And now it is time for the Jews to declare that Christ was the Word of God and then this enmity between two great religions will pass away. For two thousand years this enmity and religious prejudice have continued. Blood has been shed, or deals have been suffered. These few words will remedy the difficulty and unite two treat religions. What harm could follow this, - that just as the Christians glorify and praise the name of Moses likewise the Jews should commemorate the name of Christ, declare Him to be the Word of God and consider Him as one of the chosen messengers of God?”

As He vanished from the pulpit and as the translator rendered the last Persian sentence into English, the Rabbi came forward and said: “We are not accustomed here to the mention of other prophets than our own, *(note) but people of culture all over the world listen with politeness to others with ideas different from their own. They may be right any we may be wrong,”

During the evening many people left the synagogue and many of those who remained were restless and disturbed. The atmosphere was electrical. That ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was able to complete His message to this conservative congregation was the greatest demonstration of spiritual Power that I have ever witnessed.

*Note: It has been pointed out in this connection, that Jesus is frequently mentioned today in Jewish synagogues. The fact is, however, that while He may be mentioned as a prophet He is not spoken of in the terms used by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as Jesus Christ, the Word of God.

Knowing the administration of Dr. Herbert Putnam, Librarian of Congress for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, I recently asked him if he would tell me of the outstanding impression produced upon him at his meeting with this great Spiritual Teacher. So discriminating and appreciative is his response, that I am, with his permission, including it, just as it came to me, in this brief and inadequate account of the visit of the Greatest Visitor who had ever come to our country and with it I end the writing of my unfinished story.

Washington, D.C. December 24, 1931.

Dear Agnes:

In connection with some account of the visits - to Washington and to Dublin - of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, you have asked me to note the impression his personality made upon me. I wish I might do so adequately; but at the moment must content myself with a reference to the dominant impression that survives in my memory.

It is of an EXTRAORDINARY NOBILITY: physically, in the head so massive yet so finely poised, and the modeling of the features; but spiritually, in the serenity of expression, and the suggestion of grave and responsible meditation in the deeper lines of the face. But there was also in his complexion, carriage, and expression, an assurance of the complete health which is a requisite of a sane judgment. And when, as in a lighter mood, his features relaxed into the playful, the assistance was added of a sense of humor without which there is no true sense of proportion. I have never met anyone concerned with the philosophies of life whose judgement might seem so reliable in matters of practical conduct.

My regret is that my meetings with him were so few and that could not benefit by a lengthier contact with a personality combining a dignity so impressive with human traits so engaging.

I wish that he could be multiplied!

Ever sincerely,

FOREWORD

When, as a girl, I heard of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the son of the Founder of the Bahá’í Faith, and became a believer, I had an overwhelming longing to see Him and to attain His presence. But I was young, World War I was raging, communication with the Holy Land was cut off, and travel out of the question. I did write asking permission, but the letter was apparently lost, and there was no answer.

Later, when I entered the University of California at Berkeley in the fall of 1920, I again wrote to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and asked how I could serve the Faith, what studies to pursue, and for permission to make the pilgrimage. His loving reply was sent to me by Kathryn Frankland after her own visit to the Master in November of that year. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered all my questions in His Tablet and said, “I hope that you... may make the visit, but at present it is not possible.” [^] A year later ‘Abdu’l-Bahá passed away.

[^] See Marion C. Yazdí, “Youth in the Vanguard: Memoirs and Letters Collected “by the First Bahá’í Student at Berkeley and at Stanford University”, foreword by ‘Alí M. Yazdí (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1982) 34, 36, for the text of her letter to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s response.

A young Persian Bahá’í came to the University of California at Berkeley in the fall of 1921 to study civil engineering. He was remarkable in every respect, well-versed in the Bahá’í teachings, and devoted to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Who was called the Master. This exemplary and fascinating student was Shaykh-‘Alí Yazdí, or ‘Alí for short. As a boy and youth, he had often been with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and His grandson, Shoghi Effendi. It was three months after our meeting that we faced together the catastrophic loss of the beloved Master.

When I was with ‘Alí, I would beg him to tell me about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “What was He like?” His descriptions filled me with awe and joy; I was enchanted and uplifted. Throughout our friendship and later our marriage, I loved to listen to him talk about the Master; I came to feel that I, too, had actually seen Him and been in His presence.

I often hoped ‘Alí would write down his early experiences in the Faith for our children and grandchildren and for the Bahá’ís and other friends. But he was reluctant to speak or write about his intimate experiences with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his unique years with Shoghi Effendi. Then one day in 1975, though gravely ill and suffering, ‘Alí stood up from his desk and with a radiant smile gave me a number of pages entitled “Prophetic Days — Memories of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “ herein called “Blessings Beyond Measure”. The account that follows is essentially as my husband wrote it. I have included a few details from a talk he gave on 2 November 1975 at Haas Clubhouse on the Berkeley campus of the University of California.

‘Alí’s wish to write down his recollections of young Shoghi Effendi was not realized. However, he did speak on his memories of Shoghi Effendi at the above-mentioned occasion, and I have included the transcription of that recorded talk here. I have also added sections from a 1 July 1975 interview with ‘Alí that Beth McKenty made for the National Bahá’í Information Office, as well as excerpts from a talk he gave at the home of our daughter and son-in-law, Barbara and Jim Markert, on 23 October 1977. In addition, I have quoted passages from the diary and from the youthful letters of Shoghi Effendi to which ‘Alí alluded in his talk. The very personal letters of Shoghi Effendi to his young friend ‘Alí, written before and after matriculating at Oxford University, are published here for the first time.

A word of explanation regarding these intensely interesting memoirs is in order. The accounts of ‘Alí’s years with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his grandson Shoghi Effendi — filled as they are with experiences that affected ‘Alí profoundly all his life — should still be considered as pilgrim’s notes, one person’s impressions sincerely given. It should also be pointed out that the spoken words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Shoghi Effendi reported here may or may not be exact quotations. The translations of the tablets of the Master (with the exception of the one to Roy C. Wilhelm, the original of which has not been found) and the letters of Shoghi Effendi, however, are all authentic.

I acknowledge with thanks the publication in 1986 of an earlier and shorter version of my husband's recollections of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in "The Bahá'í World", volume 18. An earlier version of 'Alí's memoirs of Shoghi Effendi will appear in volume 19 of "The Bahá'í World". 'Alí's recollections of Shoghi Effendi as a youth were reviewed for accuracy by Shoghi Effendi's widow, the Hand of the Cause of God Amatu'l-Bahá Rúhíyyih Khánum.

I want to express warmest appreciation to Dr. Betty J. Fisher and Anne Atkinson for their proficient editing and no less for their insight and feeling for the subject matter.

It gives me pleasure to make available to others these blessed experiences with the Master and with Shoghi Effendi in the early life of 'Alí Yazdí.

PART ONE — Recollections of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

'Alí M. Yazdí

We live in an age in which God is openly denied and religion is ignored and discredited as archaic and even harmful.

Yet paradoxically, we live in an age that has witnessed the appearance of a new Manifestation with a Message for this Day — with solutions to the problems that are plaguing people everywhere. A Prophet of God has actually walked the earth in our time! Such is His claim, and such is the claim of those who have rallied to His call. His life, His teachings all testify to the validity of His station. His name is Bahá'u'lláh.

We are fortunate to live in an age when the Manifestation has walked the earth; it is an experience that is not given to many generations. For even though those who have seen Bahá'u'lláh are all but gone, there are some now living who have known people who have known and seen Bahá'u'lláh.[^] There are some who have known and seen His son, the Center of His Covenant and His appointed Successor, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. And there are more who have known His great-grandson, Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause of God.[^]

[^] When ‘Alí Yazdí wrote this account in 1975, there was probably no one still living who had met Bahá’u’lláh. No one who met Bahá’u’lláh is now alive. — Ed. [^] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was born in 1844 and died in 1921; Shoghi Effendi was born in 1897 and died in 1957. — Ed.

Now, obviously, knowledge of the Manifestation and the Center of the Covenant does not necessitate being in their physical presence. Yet being in their presence, feeling the spell of their power and love, is an experience of inimitable value and bounty. It is something that those of us who have experienced it feel over and above even the holy words. It is a blessing that imparts a tangible feeling of things spiritual. It enables us to reappraise and change our outlook and gain perspective, insight, vision. It adds zest and new hope to life.

It has been my privilege to have had a father who knew and served Bahá’u’lláh, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and Shoghi Effendi. His name was Ḥájí Muḥammad Yazdí.

It has been my inestimable privilege to have known ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and His chosen successor — Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian. While it is still possible, I would like to share the experience with others. I hope to give as best I can a little of the living Faith.

What can I add to what is already known? I dare-say very little. There have been many books on the subject. Shoghi Effendi’s history “God Passes By” has wonderful chapters on ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and there was no one in the world, after Bahá’u’lláh, who was closer to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá than Shoghi Effendi. He not only loved Him, but he understood Him. “The Chosen Highway” by Lady Blomfield is a remarkable book on the subject, and there are others. My contribution will be mainly personal, a firsthand account of the feelings and thoughts evoked in me when I was in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. I will include incidents I learned from my father, Ḥájí Muḥammad Yazdí.

But first, I would like to give some background — a few highlights about the Yazdí family and the early days of the Faith — beginning with the period just after the martyrdom of the Báb and before and after the declaration of Bahá’u’lláh.

[^] The Báb, Whose title means “the Gate, “ was the Prophet-Forerunner of the Bahá'í Faith. In 1850 He was executed by a firing squad in a public square in Tabriz, Persia (now Írán). In 1863 Bahá'u'lláh made His public announcement that He was the Promised One Whom the Báb had foretold. — Ed.

FAMILY BACKGROUND

Around 1856 the little city of Yazd, in the very heart of Persia, was carrying on its lackluster existence, its people mostly ignorant and poverty-stricken, unaware of what was going on in the rest of the world. But there was something special stirring. There was hushed talk of the Báb, the new Prophet Who had been martyred, and of the Message He had brought. There were people secretly spreading the news at the risk of their lives.

A youth, a mere adolescent only fourteen years old, contacted these people, heard the Message, and wholeheartedly accepted it. His name was Shaykh-‘Alí. He was the oldest son of the well-to-do and highly respected Ḥájí ‘Abdu’r-Raḥím Yazdí. The family was alarmed. The boy was in grave danger. His allegiance could bring ruin to the whole family. But Shaykh-‘Alí was ablaze.

[^] Shaykh-‘Alí, who was born in 1842, was the first member of the Yazdí family to accept the religion of the Báb in 1856. He was the uncle of ‘Alí Yazdí, for whom ‘Alí was named at his birth by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. — Ed. [^] Ḥájí ‘Abdu’r-Raḥm Yazdí (also spelled ‘Abdu’l-Raḥím Yazdí, as the name is pronounced) was the grandfather of ‘Alí Yazdí. — Ed.

To distract him from the Bábí Faith, his father sent him to Kirmán with enough goods to start a business. The shop was successful, but soon rumors floated back that he was meeting with the Bábís. ‘Abdu’r-Raḥím went to Kirmán and brought him home.

In Yazd Shaykh-‘Alí again attended the secret meetings. He took aid to the beleaguered Bábís who were imprisoned there. One night he was so late returning home that his mother, terribly worried, waited for him at the door. When he came in, without saying a word, she slapped him. Without a word, he took her hand and kissed it tenderly and looked at her with deep love.

Throughout this fearsome time, despite the calumnies and persecutions by the enemies of the Bábís, Shaykh-‘Alí displayed a kindness and fearlessness unbelievable in one so young. As time passed, his character, his behavior, the change in his life, his attitude, and his sacrifice, all the things he did, gradually won over the whole family who, one by one, joined the Faith.

[^] As a young man, Shaykh-‘Alí went to ‘Akká to serve Bahá'u'lláh. He performed many missions. In Khartoum, where he went to take messages from Bahá'u'lláh to Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí and other believers who had been imprisoned, he contracted a disease and died in the Sudan. — Ed.

They began having meetings in the Yazdí home, in secret of course. Teachers came from other cities, each with new tales. Some came from Baghdád, and they spoke of Bahá'u'lláh. Later others came from Adrianople, where Bahá'u'lláh was banished, and then from 'Akká, where He was exiled until the end of His life.

My father, Muḥammad Yazdí, who, like his brother Shaykh-'Alí, had joined the Faith when he was fourteen, left for the Holy Land with a friend, a donkey, lots of faith, and very little money. they set out to see Bahá'u'lláh and traveled over steep, rugged mountains and across hot, arid plains until they arrived in 'Akká around 1870. Other members of the family came later.

Ḥájí 'Abdu'r-Raḥím, my grandfather, left Yazd after he had been tortured, beaten, and bastinadoed. The story of this "precious soul, " as the Master called him, his arrival in the prison city of 'Akká, and his life there, is told with tender compassion by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in "Memorials of the Faithful".[^]

Each member of the Yazdí family arrived and was given an assignment by Bahá'u'lláh. He always gave each person who came to see Him a special mission, sending him out to serve the Faith in various places. Ḥájí Muḥammad (my father) and two other believers were sent to Egypt.

FIRST BAHÁ'Í SETTLERS IN EGYPT

My father and his friends worked hard in Egypt for many years and eventually built up a prosperous business. Through them, all young men, the Faith was first established in Alexandria, Cairo, and Port Sa'id. In each of these cities the believers formed a well knit society where they not only joined in Bahá'í activities but in social and business life as well. They married almost exclusively within their own community, so that many of them became related to one another. Thus they were a family in fact, as well as in practice.

They were not free to teach the Faith openly because of the suspicion and accusations of the authorities in Turkey and Palestine, which carried over into predominantly Muslim Egypt. They had a few Egyptian and Syrian believers, but the great majority were Persian. The Bahá'ís formed a Persian colony as well, maintaining Persian customs, language, and Bahá'í convictions. They were on good terms with the larger population around them and were generally liked and respected.

My family and I lived in Alexandria, or, more exactly, in a suburb of Alexandria called Ramleh, a beautiful and peaceful residential district stretched right along the sandy beaches of the blue Mediterranean. There were gardens on one side; on the south side, east of the Nile, were the Nubian plains. The best section, owned by Europeans and rich Egyptians, was next to the shore.

There was another section, a middle-class area, which had some villas, but mostly there were older, once luxurious houses. It was in two of the latter that we successively made our home. The house where I was born and grew to the age of four or five had a separate guest house and a large garden surrounded by a wall of rough-hewn stone covered with broken glass on top to secure both privacy and safety. Within the garden there were many rose bushes and many lime, sweet lemon, orange, and pomegranate trees. In the summer a tropical scent hung in the air.

Later we moved to another house. It, too, had a large garden with a huge wall and an annex where we cultivated eggplants, green peppers, dill, melons, corn, sugar cane, and the like. In the main garden we had mulberry trees, green lawns, and a bed of violets. Jasmine grew over the veranda, a large open porch adjoining the garden. Here our family often had breakfast, with Father presiding at the samovar and dispensing hot tea in hot glasses to the adults and hot water with a drop of tea floating on top to the children.

Before breakfast, however, we chanted our morning prayers and heard Father tell wonderful stories about his experiences with Bahá'u'lláh and the Master or read the latest communications from the Holy Land.

One of the stories was about Bahá'u'lláh and a money belt. Bahá'u'lláh had sent my father and his friends to Egypt as pioneer settlers. When they arrived in Egypt, they did not have much money. Money was not in abundance among the Bahá'ís. For one thing, it was taken away from them; they were persecuted. For example, my grandfather was a rich man when he became a Bábí, but all he had was seized. Not having money did not stop my father from pioneering. He and the others got notions — spools of thread, needles, thimbles, ribbons — and they went to the European homes up and down the Mediterranean coast from Alexandria to Ramleh, like peddlers. People invited them in and bought those things. My father became very popular. He looked quite different from the Egyptians; he was very fair complexioned, very white and pink. He was honest, as were all the Bahá'ís. People were not used to that. And so the pioneers became famous. People told their friends about them, and gradually they prospered. They would meet at the end of the day and pool their resources, put their money together, and work in a truly Bahá'í fashion.

Before too long they had enough capital to open a store. They called themselves the “Societe Rúháníyyih,” meaning “Spiritual Company”, and the store, the “Grand Bazar Persian.” It became bigger and bigger until it was the largest and best department store in all of Egypt. The Faith had prospered also, in spite of the restrictions, and was well established in Alexandria, Cairo, and Port Sa'íd.

My father and his friends wanted to show their gratitude to Bahá'u'lláh and also help the Faith. So they took a wide belt, a money belt, stuffed it with gold, large gold coins, and sent it to Bahá'u'lláh. A tablet was received from Bahá'u'lláh expressing His appreciation.

In the 1880s there was a rebellion. An Egyptian general by the name of Aḥmad Arabi Páshá arose, and he wanted to destroy all the Europeans in Alexandria. There were riots. Of course, the wealth was in the hands of the Europeans, and they were robbed. All the populace wanted was an excuse to pillage, steal, and destroy.

The French and British sent their fleets to Alexandria and threatened a bombardment if the pillage did not stop. All the European people left in ships. My father and the friends took the last ship out of the harbor before the actual bombardment.

When the rebellion was over, about seven months later, they came back and went to the site of their business. There was nothing there but rubble and ashes — absolutely nothing. They were desperate. People asked when they would open a new store, and they had no answer. Their credit had been good, but now they needed some down payment, and they did not have it.

One day they were meeting together, consulting and praying, when unexpectedly the postman came with a card — a notice of a package at the post office. They went to the post office, got the package, took it home, and opened it. There was the belt they had sent to Bahá'u'lláh, untouched and full of gold. They reestablished credit and started their business again. It flourished more than ever.

MEMORIES OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ IN RAMLEH

Stories like the one my father told about Bahá'u'lláh and the money belt left an indelible impression on me. It was in such a setting, when I was a child, that I heard the news of the coming of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Ramleh. I heard that suddenly, without warning, He had left Haifa on a steamer bound for Europe, that He had stopped in Port Sa’íd because of ill health and fatigue, and that He was coming to Alexandria. Then the news came that “He was coming to “Ramleh!” To Ramleh where we lived! What a miracle! There was intense joy within my family, within the Bahá’í community, within me. Of all the places in the world, He happened to choose Ramleh as His headquarters for His trips to Europe and America during the period between 1910 and 1913.

I was a schoolboy, eleven years old. Excitement swirled through my mind, and along with it curiosity and anticipation. All I knew about Him was what I had heard my father tell us. No one in the family that I knew except Father and Grandfather had seen Him. There were no pictures then, except an early one taken when He was a young man in Adrianople. He was a prisoner beyond our reach — a legendary and heroic Figure.

[^] This grandfather was Ḥájí ‘Alí Manshadi, ‘Alí’s maternal grandfather, who lived in a guest house on the family’s property in Ramleh and who was very close to ‘Alí. — Ed.

Now He was free. And He was coming to Ramleh. What would He be like? How would it feel to be in the presence of the Center of the Covenant, the son and successor of a Manifestation of God? I knew that He was not only a holy man, but a divine man, that although He was not a Manifestation, still He had a divine station. Much went on in my mind as I prepared for His arrival. But I kept it all to myself.

The Bahá'í Faith was an integral part of me, not something superimposed. In Ramleh I was surrounded by it. I lived it. I believed it. I cherished its spiritual concepts as well as its goals and its principles. I realized its fundamental importance, its necessity for the world today. Yet my studies at the French school I attended had opened other areas to my mind. The logical and systematic approach and the discoveries and applications of science fascinated me. I believed they provided us with effective tools for the implementation of the teachings of the Faith. I prayed that I might be guided to play some role in this endeavor. The feeling came over me that my contact with 'Abdu'l-Bahá would provide the inspiration and the impetus to a move in this direction.

Hence, I waited eagerly for the day, which came in October 1910.

A crowd gathered in front of the Hotel Victoria for His arrival. Suddenly there was a hush, a stillness, and I knew that He had come. I looked. There He was! Then He walked through the crowd — slowly, majestically, smiling radiantly as He greeted the bowed heads on each side. I could only get a vague impression of Him, as I could not get near Him. The sound of the wind and the surf from the nearby shore drowned out His voice so that I could hardly hear Him. Nevertheless, I went away happy.

A few days later a villa was rented for Him and His family not far from the Hotel Victoria. It was in the best residential section, next to the beautiful Mediterranean and the beaches. Like all the villas in that area, it has a garden with flowers and flowering shrubs. It was there that 'Abdu'l-Bahá chose to receive a great variety of notables, public figures, clerics, aristocrats, and writers — as well as poor despairing people.

I went there often, sometimes on the way home from school, sometimes on weekends. I spent most of my time outside of school in His garden. I would wait to get a glimpse of Him as He came out for His customary walk or conversed with pilgrims from faraway places. To hear His vibrant and melodious voice ringing in the open air and to see Him exhilarated me and gave me hope. Quite often He came to me and smiled and talked. There was a radiance about Him, an almost unlimited kindness and love that shone from Him. Seeing Him infused me with a feeling of goodness. I felt humble and at the same time exceedingly happy.

I also had many opportunities to see the Master (Sarkár-i-Áqá as we called Him) at meetings and festive occasions. I especially remember the first time He came to our house to address a large gathering of believers. The friends were all gathered, talking happily, waiting. All of a sudden there was quiet. I could hear from the outside the voice of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá — very resonant, very beautiful — before He entered the room. Then He swept in, His robe flowing.

He was straight as an arrow. His head was thrown back. His silver-gray hair fell in waves to His shoulders. His beard was white. His eyes were keen; His forehead, broad. He wore a white turban around an ivory felt cap. He looked at everyone, smiled, and welcomed all with “Khushámádíd. Khushámádíd” (“Welcome. Welcome”).

I had been taught that in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I should sit or stand with my hands crossed in front of me and look down. I was so anxious to see Him that I found myself looking up furtively now and then.

He spoke often and on many subjects. For nine months it seemed like paradise. Then He left us and, after three months in Cairo, sailed for Europe. How dismal everything became. But there was school, and there were duties. Exciting news reached us from Europe, and there were memories.

[^] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá moved to Cairo early May 1911 and left for Europe on 11 August 1911. — Ed.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá came back four months later. Paradise returned. He spoke to me on several occasions. He always called me “Shaykh-‘Alí”, the name He Himself had given me, after my uncle Shaykh-‘Alí, who was the first member of the family to join the Faith. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke to me, I would look into His eyes — blue, smiling, and full of love.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ’S DEPARTURE FOR AMERICA

Again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left us, this time for America. I will never forget the scene of His departure, as He came out of the house and turned to wave His last farewell to His disconsolate family looking down from the veranda above. They were greatly concerned about His safety and well-being. He was sixty-eight years old. He had suffered many hardships and gone through severe trials. He had been in prison for forty years of His life. And now He was undertaking a journey to a far-off country utterly different from any to which He was accustomed.

But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had made up His mind. And when He made up His mind, nothing could change Him. He strode out of the garden gate without looking back. He walked for several blocks near the shore to take the electric train to Alexandria, where He would board the ship that was to take Him to New York. He was followed by about thirty believers who walked silently behind Him. I was one of them.

What ‘Abdu’l-Bahá accomplished during His nine-month stay in America is now history. From there He went on to Europe and then back to Ramleh on 17 July 1913 to stay until the following December. After that visit He left for Haifa, never to return.

Yazdí (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1982), chapters. 2 and 8.

That was the first chapter of my experience with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, when I was a child between the ages of eleven and fourteen.

MEMORIES OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ IN HAIFA

Destiny had it, however, that in 1914 my family would move to Beirut, not far to the north of Haifa. This opened the second chapter in which I was privileged to be in the presence of the Master — but only on special occasions.

[^] When ‘Alí was fifteen years old, he had qualified for the French baccalaureate, the equivalent of a degree for two years of an American university. But when the war broke out between France and Turkey, the French Brothers’ schools were closed. He hoped the war would end soon, but it went on relentlessly. Then when Germany invaded France, he knew the French schools would not reopen soon. In the fall of 1915 his parents moved to Damascus with his younger brothers and sister, but he applied at the Syrian Protestant College (soon to be known as the American University of Beirut). Since he had never studied English, he decided to enter as a sophomore instead of a junior, although it meant losing another year. — Ed.

My first occasion to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Haifa was in the summer of 1917. World War I had been raging for about three years. The Allied blockade had completely cut off Syria and the Holy Land from the outside world — no mail, no trade, no telegrams, no travelers. The Turks were ruling the area with an iron hand. The military commander, Jamál Páshá, was ruthless, cruel, unreasonable, and inefficient. He destroyed all in his way. Everybody was under suspicion. Many of the aristocratic families of Syria found their sons hanged in the public square. There was a shortage of everything. Nothing could be obtained from abroad. There were no means to produce anything. Even food such as wheat was scarce. Whatever little grain was raised was largely sequestered by the Turkish army without payment to the farmers, and what was left of the crops was decimated by swarms of locusts. Famine was rampant. Poverty was everywhere.

Such was the situation when I came to spend my summer vacation with my uncle, Mírzá Ḥusayn Yazdí, in his home on Mt. Carmel. It was a memorable summer nevertheless. For over two months I lived on God's holy mountain.

Every evening before sunset I had the bounty of being with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I would join other believers gathered in front of the Master's house. The entrance had an iron gate, and inside the gate there was a garden. We would sit on the wall or parapet on each side of the wide gravel walk that led from the garden gate to the steps and wait for Him. He would come out with a cheerful and warm greeting, welcome all, and take His seat on the platform at the head of the wide stairs. The sun would be going down, and I remember it being very quiet in Haifa.

Sometimes he sat relaxed and did not speak at all. But usually He spoke in His commanding voice, looking straight ahead as if speaking to posterity. He talked on Bahá'u'lláh, on Bahá'u'lláh's teachings, and on significant events in the history of the Faith. He told stories sprinkled with humor. And often He spoke of the believers around the world and of their progress in spreading the Faith. Then He became wistful. For three years He had heard little or nothing from anywhere. The isolation and constraint weighed heavily on Him.

Now and then He addressed individuals in the audience, asking them about their families, their work, their problems. Then He offered advice and help. Toward the end He asked one of the believers to chant verses from the Mathnaví of Bahá'u'lláh. When the chanting ended, the meeting was over. 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose and entered the house. Dusk descended over Haifa.

There were frequent trips to the Holy Shrine of the Báb. 'Abdu'l-Bahá rode an old horse-drawn, bus-like vehicle up the mountain. The rest of us walked the rocky road, past the Persian (or Eastern) Pilgrim House to the terrace overlooking the city of Haifa and the blue bay beyond. In the distance lay the hazy outline of 'Akká. We gathered on the terrace until 'Abdu'l-Bahá appeared and entered the Shrine. He generally chanted the Tablet of Visitation, but sometimes He asked Shoghi Effendi to chant it. When it was over and the believers started to come out, He stood at the door with a vial of rose water and put a little in each one's hand.

[^] The Pilgrim House referred to is located on Mt. Carmel near the Shrine of the Báb. — Ed.

I remember following Him as he walked among the pines, past the Holy Shrine on Mt. Carmel, deeply absorbed in thought, while the setting sun came down into the Mediterranean Sea.

There were also trips, though less frequent, to 'Akká and Bahjí to visit the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh.

There were times that summer when 'Abdu'l-Bahá went in the horse-drawn carriage to Tiberias and the biblical Sea of Galilee. His purpose on these trips was to oversee the grain crops which, under His supervision, had been planted by the believers in the Jordan Valley. It was hot, and He was tired, but nevertheless He did not hesitate to go. I could “see” how hard it was for Him. I could also see His foresight in planting these large crops, long before the need arose for them. He was looking ahead, as He always did. When famine overtook the area, there was rescue for the hungry and the poor. The Master had plenty of grain stored in the ancient pits that the Romans had prepared a long time before. He distributed it to everyone who needed it, Bahá’í, and non-Bahá’í alike.

When the British arrived later, they also did not have enough provision; an officer came and talked to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá about the situation. When asked for His advice, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied, “I have grain.”

“But, Master, for the British Army?”

“I have grain — for the British Army,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá responded. He was later made a Knight of the British Empire for His services in relief of distress and famine.[^] [^] See Balyuzi “‘Abdu’l-Bahá”, 443-44 for an account of the knighting of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on 17 April 1920.

Another concern of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s that summer was Jamál Páshá, who, as I mentioned before, was ruthless. He was supposed to cross the Sinai Desert and the Suez Canal, then drive the British out of Egypt. He never got there. But what he did was destroy the whole country over which he passed.

Jamál Páshá had heard charges from the Covenant-breakers that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was against the Turkish state. He was suspicious and made plans to execute Him. The Master met with him on at least two occasions. Commissions were sent to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to investigate His activities.[^] [^] See Shoghi Effendi, “God Passes By”, 304, and Balyuzi, “‘Abdu’l-Bahá”, 412-14, for an account of Jamál Páshá.

I would sometimes go into ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s garden and talk with Ismá’il Áqá. He was the gardener, an old man whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá loved. I would sit with him in his room there and talk. I happened to go to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s garden one day. Everyone was quiet, and I asked why.

They said, “There is a commission of inquiry up in the Master’s room.” I listened, and I could hear His clear, commanding voice through the open window right above, talking to the Turkish commission with dignity, as if He were the investigator and they the culprit. Although the Master was humble in many ways, He never really bowed to anyone; He was proud in His nobility. Through sensing His confidence, I acquired confidence and faith that He would be spared.

During these difficult and dangerous days He took time to write the momentous Tablets of the Divine Plan, sometimes in Haifa, mostly in ‘Akká, thus conferring upon the American Bahá’í community its world mission.[^]

[^] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote the Tablets of the Divine Plan, which included fourteen letters addressed to the Bahá’ís of the United States and Canada, in 1916 and 1917. These letters, or tablets, constitute ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s charter, or master plan, for the promulgation of the Faith throughout the world. See ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “Tablets of the Divine “Plan: Revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the North American Bahá’ís”, rev. ed. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1977).

I was impressed that summer by the German colony, descendants of the Germans who had come to Haifa in 1844 expecting the return of Christ. As I looked down from the Shrine of the Báb on Mt. Carmel, I could see the straight, steep path, a succession of flights of stone-and-masonry steps, that were in line with the main street of the German colony. Their main avenue looked straight up at the Shrine of the Báb on Mt. Carmel. On their houses were inscriptions from the Bible.[^]

[^] The German colony, known as the Society of the Temple, or Templers, had cordial relations with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Who utilized their doctors and called upon others to assist in business transactions pertaining to acquiring land on Mt. Carmel. About twenty-five of the homes of the Templers had religious inscriptions carved into the stone over their doorways. One house, adjacent to a spot where Bahá’u’lláh once pitched His tent, has the inscription “Der Herr ist nahe 1871” (“God is nigh 1871”). — Ed.

There were also memorable little details such as eating at the table with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He ate very simply, but He insisted on others having the proper amount of food. Quite often He would come behind the guests and talk to them. He came behind me and said, “Why aren’t you eating?” I was shy; I was hungry, but I did not dare eat. “Why aren’t you eating, Shaykh-‘Alí?” He would repeat. He would then put a large helping of rice on my plate. I had to eat it!

One day I was walking back from the business section of town. All the streets were winding there, and the roads were dirt roads, not macadam. I was going around a curved street up the hill toward the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. As I turned the corner, there He was. I saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with two of the believers behind Him, walking down the hill. As was the custom, I stepped to one side and bowed. He stopped and walked over to me, right in front of me, and He looked me straight in the eyes. That is something I will never forget — looking at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá face to face. (photograph)

How to describe Him? I cannot do so adequately; I can only give a few brush-strokes, hoping that together they may form a rough sketch of the Master.

Imagine a strongly built man with a bearing at once majestic and genial. Snowy white hair and flowing aba. Broad forehead, a strong intellect, unswerving will, wondrous blue eyes that could look into your soul or melt into infinite tenderness and reassurance. A face, now calm and meditative, mirroring the very essence of peace, now radiant and full of life. A man of contrasts, He was dominant, and yet He was humble. He was strong, and yet He was tender. He was very loving and affectionate, and yet He could be very stern. He was intensely human, keenly alive to the joys and sorrows of this life. There was no one who felt more acutely that He did the sufferings of humanity.

He had a great sense of humor. I will share with you a few stories from here and there, which I heard from others. One time, when He was in Paris, I believe, some British journalists came to interview Him, and He answered their questions in English. They were surprised and said, “Your English pronunciation is very good.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá smiled and paced back and forth. (Quite often He walked back and forth as He talked—even in His public speeches.) “Oh yes, “ He said, and then He recited a few words such as “hippopotamus” and “rhinoceros”. “Yes, I speak “difficult” English for you!”

Another time He was in Palo Alto. This story was told to Marion, my wife, by her favorite professor of English at Stanford, Samuel Swayze Seward. Dr. Seward said he asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at dinner, after he had spoken at Stanford University, “Who are the people most responsive to your teachings?” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied, “The Persians.” “Who are the least responsive?” “The Turks.” “What about the Americans?”

“Well — the Americans never want to stay on the same streetcar very long. They always want to transfer. But when they come to the Bahá’í Cause, they are firm and strong.”[^]

[^] See Marion Carpenter [Yazdí’s] personal interview with Seward, 14 February 1924, in Yazdí, “Youth in the Vanguard”, 118-19, 167.

Once Harlan Ober, one of the early believers, was asked by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to go to India. Harlan had traveled all over the world for the Faith, but he didn’t feel too keen about going to India at that time. Of course, he said nothing, and he was perfectly willing to obey. A few days later ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “Harlan, you are going to America; you are going to the United States.”

Harlan said, “But Master, I thought I was going to India.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered, “So did Columbus!”

To return to my story: Summer vacation was almost over, and I went to see my family in Damascus before going back to Beirut to graduate from the Syrian Protestant College in May of 1918. After graduation I returned to Damascus. The Allies ruled the seas. A ship stood in the Beirut harbor; I could see it as I left. Bombardment was expected at any time.

THE END OF WORLD WAR I

The war dragged on and on. There was nothing to do in Damascus. My father had a small store, and I would help him with it. There was very little business. I got a book and learned German just by reading and talking with the soldiers who came to our store. I used to meet with the German soldiers. I was trying to do something with my time, and I thought I could learn the language and eventually study at the Technische Hochschule in Berlin.

We lived on a terraced hillside above the city in an area called “muhájirín”, meaning “immigrants.” It was so named because there was a group of Turkish citizens who had emigrated there from European Turkey when the Greeks had occupied their land. They preserved their own habits, costumes, and language. It was a nice section, and I could look down over all of Damascus, all the plain, then up at the mountains in the background.

Every day we walked downtown because the streetcars were not running; they did not have any coal or fuel to produce power. (The trains were running on wood. I had the experience myself of climbing the Lebanese mountains in a train powered by wood, and it was not exactly rewarding.) We had to walk “up the hill at night. However, it was very pleasant, because Damascus, as my father told us, was a little like Persia. It was still like the old, old country. The walls were made of pressed mud and straw, and the wood was not finished wood but just peeled trees put up instead of lumber. There were beautiful orchards, and when I walked, I could see all those trees laden with fruits. The weather was nice. I actually enjoyed my stay there. So we went up and down, counting the days, not knowing when the war would end.

One evening after sunset we had finished dinner and were up on the little veranda when we heard a loud noise like an explosion — cannon shots. We looked out ahead and saw a big fire. Then there were more explosions and more noise. We realized that the British were bombarding the military section of Damascus. At last the British had come. We had been hoping for deliverance from the Turkish yoke.

That was the beginning of the British occupation. Instead of the Turkish army’s crossing the Suez Canal, the British had come and conquered Jerusalem. Before this time we had had no news. All we heard was fabricated by the Turkish authorities. This came as a complete surprise. What would happen to us, we did not know, but somehow we were not afraid. After awhile, the bombardment stopped; we went to bed and went to sleep.

Before dawn we awoke to strange noises. First we heard the Turkish and German soldiers filing away, right in front of our door, on a little tortuous path, and escaping up the hill to the north. Then we heard a funny, squeaky noise, which we found out later was from the “Tin Lizzies,” the little Model-T Fords, going up the hill. We had never heard sounds like that before. That morning I was bold enough to go out and walk downtown to see what was going on. There were Australian cavalymen with their big hats, riding up the street eating tomatoes. I had never seen anybody eating tomatoes as fruit before. I waved at them, and they look at me suspiciously. Then I spoke English, and they brightened up, responded, and were very friendly.

Our great concern was Haifa. What had happened there? For a time we had no word. We were very anxious. But soon the news came: General Allenby and the British had occupied Haifa. There is a long story behind that. In short, the British Intelligence Service, headed by Major Tudor-Pole, one who was very friendly to the Bahá'ís, if not a Bahá'í himself, had uncovered a message telling that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in danger, that Jamál Páshá had vowed to crucify Him, and destroy the Holy Tombs and all the sacred buildings of the Bahá'í Faith before the British came. Immediately, the wires were busy between London and Cairo as the British arrived in Palestine. Forces were set in motion to take the town by surprise. General Allenby was to come around the promontory, around Mt. Carmel and into Haifa, and flank the Bahá'í properties. The British at once put a cordon of soldiers around the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and took steps to protect Him. All the generals and officers came to pay their respects to Him. And thus He was saved. We learned this fact later; we did not know at the time how close we came to losing 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

The doors to the outside world were opened up. Now we could see ahead. We, too, were free and could make plans for the rest of our lives. There was much thinking and counting of pennies. I had been working for the Public Works Department of the new Arab government. I had studied civil engineering and was hired as a draftsman. I was able to work for several months and save a little money to help me get started, but it was not enough. News got to 'Abdu'l-Bahá through my uncle, Mírzá Ḥusayn, and the Master offered me one hundred pounds, which in those days was worth about five hundred dollars.[^] That made it possible for me to go. I did not waste any time. In the fall of 1919 I went to Haifa to say farewell to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I was on my way to Europe (Switzerland, then Germany) for my graduate studies. I was twenty years old.

[^] This gift from 'Abdu'l-Bahá was gratefully returned to Shoghi Effendi, the new Guardian, soon after 'Alí was employed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company on completion of his graduate studies at the University of California at Berkeley. — Ed.

This was to be my last experience with 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

FAREWELL TO THE MASTER

I was in Haifa for two or three days. Just before I left, 'Abdu'l-Bahá called me to His room. I was there alone with Him; the only other person was Shoghi Effendi, who was in and out. The Master asked me to sit down, and He directed Shoghi Effendi to bring me some tea. As He spoke to me, He gave me instructions on how to live. He told me He had hopes for me. He said, “You are a good boy, Shaykh-‘Alí.”

Then Shoghi Effendi brought the tea. They serve tea in glasses there, boiling hot. I took the tea, and I tried to drink it, but I could not. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, “Drink. Drink your tea.” So I had to drink it. It didn't matter!

At the very end He gave me His blessing. Then He stood up and beckoned me to Him. I went to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and He put His arms around me and kissed me on both cheeks.

I never saw Him again. but the tablets, or letters, that the beloved Master revealed on my behalf followed me to Europe and America. One of the tablets, in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s own handwriting, introduced me to the German Bahá’ís: “O ye friends of God! His honor Shaykh-‘Alí is one of the firm friends; exercise toward him love and kindness.” To the Bahá’ís in the United States ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent two introductions. In the fall of 1920 He wrote to Roy C. Wilhelm: His honor, Shaykh-‘Alí, is going to America. He is a youth of good manners and temperament and is of an accepted family at the Threshold of God. Therefore, you will do your best to help him in managing his affairs.

On 8 October 1920 ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote, in His own hand, to William H. Randall: Jináb-i-Shaykh-‘Alí, the distinguished son of Ḥájí Áqá Muḥammad, is a sensible and cultured young man of good behavior. He will be going to America to complete the courses of sciences and arts which he has been studying in Berlin. Probably he will remain about two years in America. Thou shouldst treat him with the utmost consideration and kindness.

On 9 December ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote again, this time to Mrs. Ruth W. Randall, regarding the selection of a suitable university for me to attend. Finally, in late 1920 or early 1921, I was greatly strengthened and inspired as I began my life in the United States to receive a tablet from the Master inscribed to “The spiritual son, Shaykh-‘Alí, upon him be the Glory of God, the All-Glorious:” O Shaykh-‘Alí who are dear to the spiritually minded. Render thanks unto God that in this blessed age thou hast stepped forth into the world of existence, been nursed from the breast of the love of God and hast been reared in the bosom of divine guidance, and that now with the permission of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and by His leave thou art proceeding to America to study the sciences. Thy father is here with us at the Holy Threshold, and we both pray on thy behalf and beseech for thee the assistance and favor of the Blessed Perfection. And upon thee be His glory.[^]

Wilhelm, undated, translated by ‘Azíz’u’lláh S. Bahádúr, 6 September 1920 (since the original Persian has not been found, the Universal House of Justice has not been able to verify the translation); ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to William Randall, 9 December 1920, translation approved by the Universal House of Justice; and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Shaykh ‘Alí Yazdí, undated, translation approved by the Universal House of Justice, in Marion Carpenter Yazdí Papers. A year after receiving this tablet, when I was enrolled at the University of California at Berkeley, the news of His ascension reached me.

REFLECTION

Looking back, as I have so many, many times in my life, I can see that the passing of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá marked the end of an era. He was a man passionately devoted to a single goal: to spread the teachings of His Father, Bahá’u’lláh; to bring people together; to establish the brotherhood of man on earth in “fact as well as in principle. He had spent His whole life in the midst of severe and uninterrupted persecution and imprisonment, yet He had not flinched. With His brilliant mind, His indomitable courage, and His unbounded devotion He had directed the spread of the Faith to the peoples of Europe and America, while at the same time protecting this Faith in the country of its origin from concentrated and merciless attack. Nothing stopped Him — not His enemies, the military, disaster, dangers, the Turkish authorities, the difficulties that met His efforts — nothing ever deflected Him from His purpose. And yet it was not easy, for despite His high station, He was also intensely human, and He suffered a great deal.

He was often very happy and always asked the Bahá’ís to be happy: “Be happy! Be happy!” That was His counsel to the believers, and he set the example. But there were times when I would see Him with the burdens of the whole world upon His shoulders.

There is something we should never forget, something I learned from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: His life was not really His life alone; it was the life of every one of us, an example to every one of us. If we always keep His life in mind, I think it will help us find our way.

We have a new generation of Bahá’ís coming in from the outside and a new generation growing up from the inside. They know what they have read in the books. But do they know that this is a living Faith? Do they truly realize that the Manifestation of God has actually appeared and initiated a new era? Do they know that people have lived and worked and died for the Cause? Are they fully aware that the Bahá’í Faith is not just something extraneous, something beautiful, logical, just, and fair? Do they know that it is part and parcel of our blood, our very life?

I cannot help wondering what the world would be like if people flocked to the teachings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and followed His example, if men and women all over the world arose in ever-increasing numbers and made His way of life their own — ten thousand, ten million, a hundred million people — each pursuing His goal with zest and confidence. What would the world be like? And what would the individual’s life be like, transformed by the example of our Master?

PART TWO — Recollections of Shoghi Effendi

‘Alí M. Yazdí

It has been a blessing for me beyond measure to have personally known Shoghi

Effendi, the extraordinary grandson of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, during the years of our youth, before he became the Guardian of the Bahá’í Faith, as well as after.

Shoghi Effendi was very close to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The Master always treated him a little differently from other people, even when he was a child. He was devoted to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. From his earliest childhood, from the very beginning of his life, he was dedicated to the Faith.

MEMORIES OF SHOGHI EFFENDI IN RAMLEH

I first met Shoghi Effendi in 1910 when he came to Ramleh, shortly after the Master came. He was thirteen, and I was eleven. I had heard about him but had never seen him before. Now, in Ramleh, he went to the same school I did: the French Brothers’ School. We slowly started to get acquainted; you know how children are. Then we got to know each other better. I would see him at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, and gradually we became friends. Even as a child he was always dignified, but he was also friendly. He was always full of zest — always energetic and eager, always full of life.

The first thing of importance that happened during his stay in Ramleh proved to be a shattering experience. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá planned to go to the United States, He wanted to take Shoghi Effendi with Him, along with a few other believers. Shoghi Effendi was in seventh heaven. He had heard so much about America, and he longed to be with the Master as He traveled throughout North America and gave the Message. He looked forward with great anticipation to the experience.

The day before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left, Shoghi Effendi came to see me and asked, “Shaykh-‘Alí, “ — he almost always called me Shaykh-‘Alí — “do you want to go to the ship with me and see my cabin?”

I said, “Surely!” So, with some other believers, we took the electric train to Alexandria and then to the harbor. Before us was the Cedric, a White Star Liner.

It was a beautiful ship, one of two that plied regularly between Alexandria and New York, and stopped only at Naples. Shoghi Effendi and I went on the boat, and he took me upstairs and showed me his stateroom, the dining room, and everything on the ship. He was extremely happy, and so was I very happy for him. I made him promise to write to me when he got to America, and he said he would.

The next day, 25 March 1912, was the day of departure. Earlier I explained how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá walked silently to the train and how he went to Alexandria and took the ship.[^] Shoghi Effendi went with Him. In Naples there were physical examinations; eyes were tested, for no one could enter the United States with trachoma. The Italian doctors said that Shoghi Effendi had this infection. He had never had trouble with his eyes. There were no signs of trachoma, yet they insisted he must leave the ship. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was very sad. He said, “They think we are Turks.” Italy was still at war with Turkey. Through this, and perhaps other machinations, Shoghi Effendi was sent back. When he returned to Ramleh, the doctors said firmly that he did not have any problem whatever. Shoghi Effendi was heartbroken. He wanted to be with his beloved Master, and he wanted to be in America and see the teachings of the Faith he loved spread all over the country. That dream was denied him. I saw how he lost weight and actually became sick because he was depressed. It took quite a while before he regained his health.[^]

[^] See pp. 20, 22. — Ed. [^] Shoghi Effendi’s wife, Rúḥíyyih Rabbání, explains in “The Priceless Pearl” ([London: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1969], 19) that Dr. Amin Faríd, one of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s secretaries, was party to the machinations that prevented Shoghi Effendi from accompanying the Master to North America. — Ed.

After ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s travels in the United States and Europe, He returned to Ramleh for five months. Shoghi Effendi, who had been in Haifa part of that time, came to be with Him. On 2 December 1913 ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left Alexandria to return to the Holy Land. I did not see Shoghi Effendi again for almost three years.

MEMORIES OF SHOGHI EFFENDI IN BEIRUT

At the Syrian Protestant College, Shoghi Effendi and I were both students. There was a group of Bahá’í students who met to discuss the teachings. That was our extracurricular activity and our time for comradeship. Shoghi Effendi was one of the group, and so was I. These students were mostly Persians who were marooned there. They could not get home because of World War I and the blockade of the coast; during the summers they went to Haifa and spent their vacations on Mt. Carmel. There was an anteroom to the Shrine of the Báb that was assigned to them, and they spent very happy summers there. When I was in Haifa, I greatly enjoyed being with Shoghi Effendi and with them.

At the college Shoghi Effendi was always jolly, optimistic, and hopeful. He had a wonderful personality. All of a sudden he would burst forth with loud laughter. Or sometimes a smile would break on his face. He had a very small mouth; beautiful, expressive eyes; and very regular, handsome features. He was bouncy. He just bounced.

At college we were in the same dormitory. Shoghi Effendi’s room was right across the hall from mine. I have stated that there was a shortage of everything, including food, which led to famine. I remember being downtown and seeing women dying on the streets. No one paid any attention to them. I did not go back again; I preferred staying on campus, for it was terrible to see those people dying when no one was able to do anything for them. Luckily, because of President Bliss of the college, even though America was in the war, rations were allowed to come to the college. The main reason for this was that the Syrian Protestant College trained doctors, engineers, and so on — professionals who were useful to the Turkish authorities. We were not actually deprived of anything, but we had not luxuries either.

From time to time Shoghi Effendi would have things sent from Haifa. He would receive good, brown, home-baked bread; honey; dried fruits; and nuts. the fruits from Haifa and Lebanon were absolutely delicious. Shoghi Effendi would invite me to his room, and the two of us would sit together, feasting, talking, and enjoying ourselves. He was always very generous.

We would converse on many subjects. Actually, our relationship was now of two young men, two personal friends, as we were beginning our life on our own, and we had much to share. We often talked to each other about the future. His vision was always of the Faith spreading all over the world and of everybody serving the Cause; these were his only ambitions. We shared a common goal of personal service to the Faith. He himself did not know he was going to be the Guardian. Even at Oxford, where I later visited him, he never gave any indication that he knew he was to be the Guardian.[^]

[^] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appointed Shoghi Effendi the Guardian of the Bahá’í Faith in His Will and Testament, but Shoghi Effendi did not learn about the appointment until his grandfather passed away in 1921. — Ed.

Though Shoghi Effendi was of holy lineage, and I was a member of an old pioneer family in the Faith, we forgot about that and were just two young men being very happy together.[^] We both had logical minds, and we both liked to discuss things analytically. We also enjoyed sharing our creativity and vision. These were aspects of our relationship then and later.

[^] A pioneer in the Bahá’í context is one who leaves his or her home to serve the Bahá’í Faith in another country. — Ed.

MEMORIES OF SHOGHI EFFENDI IN HAIFA

In 1917 I spent the summer vacation in the home of my uncle, Mírzá Ḥusayn Yazdí, on Mt. Carmel. The trip from Beirut to Haifa was something I will never forget. I had never been on a horse before, and yet I had to go from Beirut down the coast by horseback. There were other Persian students riding too, but they all knew how to ride.

Despite my inexperience, I managed fine. The horse was not exactly an Arabian steed, but we trotted along until just before Tyre. I remembered something about the land of Tyre in the Bible. At that point we had to go over steep mountains. There was only hard rock, and we were high up looking down, way down, onto the waves of the Mediterranean beating against the rocks — I not knowing what I was doing. But I trusted the horse, and I prayed all along the way.

There were compensations. We traveled by day and by night. It was strange to pass through the fields right along the seashore as people had done in Biblical days, and to see women working through the night, gathering vegetables. The fresh summer night air made it a delightful experience. Best of all, we made it safely to ‘Akká.

There were compensations. We traveled by day and by night. It was ‘Akká is an old city paved with stones. By the sea-shore there was an old fortress made of stone, brick, and masonry blocks. It was built out over the ocean with holes in the walls through which guns could be fired. The waves would beat against the walls. There I looked down and could see the house where I was to stay that night. Later I heard about all the things that had happened in that same house in the history of the Faith.[^]

[^] It is not known to which house ‘Alí is referring. — Ed. It was exciting. I was always quite a romantic child and youth; I liked to let my imagination run away. That night I slept on the floor, exhausted.

The next day we went to Haifa and were in the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. During the summer I was frequently in the company of Shoghi Effendi. He was part of the group — not just with me; we were all together, enjoying one another’s company.

COMMUNICATIONS AFTER WORLD WAR I

Shoghi Effendi graduated from the Syrian Protestant College the same year I did.[^] He went back to Haifa; I went to Damascus. Later on, when the way was opened for communication and travel, Shoghi Effendi was exceedingly happy. His diary and his letters at that time are a truly remarkable record of what the Bahá’ís were doing, as well as of his own feelings. They show how excited he was, after the long spell of silence and isolation, to see the mail flooding in from all over the world — from the United States, from Germany, from France, India, Burma. Letters came with news of the Faith; telegrams expressed the joy of the believers that they could again communicate with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Shoghi Effendi was thrilled by all of these greetings as his letter of 26 December 1918 shows:

[^] Shoghi Effendi and ‘Alí Yazdí graduated on 15 May 1918. — Ed. Every day carries with it its fresh tidings and happy news. From the Far-Eastern land, the center of news has shifted today to Persia, in the Middle East, and thence to the extreme West in the U.S. of America. Many telegrams have arrived, and each contributed its share of consolation and solace. From the dear land of Persia, the doors of which are still practically closed, in a material sense to the face of the Beloved, this bit of good news is wired: “Good news made all extremely happy; friends well safe and united; desiring only Thy will.” From France a similar cable is at hand expressing joy at the receipt of the Beloved’s cable and conveying love to all. From Boston and Chicago alike the news arrive[s] that the friends rejoice at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s deliverance, supplicate Tablets, and even beg the Master to come to their shores. We shall wait to see the response of the Beloved. Early this morning I was ushered to His Holy presence, and there facing the Beloved on the sofa, enwrapped in His mantle with masses of supplications scattered around Him, I sat, pen in my hand, putting down the words that flowed from His lips. A Tablet was revealed to Miss Juliet Thompson of New York....[^]

Now the friends were again free to teach the Faith. My father received permission to come to Haifa. Shoghi Effendi described the visit in letter of 13 February 1919: The call of the Beloved bidding the friends of God to arise...has resounded throughout all regions....The city of Damascus...has awakened to the spirit of the new age. The prominent figure among its friends [Ḥájí Muḥammad Yazdí, the father of ‘Alí Yazdí] has attained to the court of the Beloved’s presence and has brought with him...good news...This morning he was ushered to the Beloved’s presence and the first thing he did after seizing the hem of the Beloved’s garment and repeatedly kissing it, was to offer a supplication from an erudite Arab, a native of Medina, an influential and responsible personage in Damascus, an authority in the Muslim creed who had been attracted and moved to write to the Beloved....In short the news of our beloved and dear visitor, Áqá Ḥájí Muḥammad Yazdí was refreshing, numerous, and significant. With a smile and a nod of appreciation the Beloved greeted every bit of news and was glad to know that a reaction to the passiveness and inactivity of the past had set in. “Deliver the Divine message with prudence and wisdom” was the Beloved’s recommendation to the teachers who are serving in these regions. Having said this, He arose, again welcomed our guest...leaving us with our friend whose source of news and glad tidings seemed inexhaustible.[^]

Two days later Shoghi Effendi wrote enthusiastically that the pilgrims were arriving as before the war: Tonight, around the Master’s table for supper sat Messrs. Aḥmad Yazdí, Ḥájí Muḥammad Yazdí, Mírzá Ḥusayn Yazdí [‘Alí Yazdí’s uncle, father, and a second uncle, respectively], Áqá Muḥammad Taqí, three of the Parsee friends of ‘Adasíyyih who have recently arrived, Badí’ Effendi, and my father. The Master was tired and did not converse long. That night the recollection of those prewar banquets wherein believers from every part would gather came to my mind, for new faces I saw, and delicious dishes were placed.... Major Tudor-Pole due to a slight indisposition has had to postpone his departure from Cairo.... When he arrives, our joy will reach its utmost....[^]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá worked all hours. One morning Shoghi Effendi was sleeping when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called him to get to work. This tender description was written later that day: Early this morning I was awakened by a gentle knock at my door, followed by the sweet voice of the Beloved calling me to rise from my sleep, to shake off my drowsiness, and to attend to my work.[^]

[^] Diary-letter, Shoghi Effendi to Aḥmad Sohrab, 21 February 1919, copy in Yazdí Papers. We have used house style for capitalization, spelling, and the transliteration of Persian and Arabic words.

‘You could see the Faith was Shoghi Effendi’s life; his joy was service to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He kept repeating all the time, “I am in the service of my Beloved.” He was happy in those days and intent on the future of the Faith.

But Shoghi Effendi was also aware that all the Persian students of our group were leaving, some for Persia, some for Europe, some for America. He wrote of the separations in his diary on 24 August and noted that I was coming to Haifa to say good-bye to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: This week has been, viewed from one aspect, a sad and depressing one. It has witnessed the scattering of friends who during the war and prior to it have been for years held closely and affectionately together by bonds of fellowship and common interest. The student Bahá’í group at the American University — that company of young, brilliant, active, and upright men, which has all throughout the war retained, notwithstanding its vicissitudes and blows, its cohesion, is now splitting up, its numbers mostly graduates of that university departing from that common center....Mr. ‘Alí Yazdí is just starting from Damascus to Haifa where, after meeting the Beloved, he will proceed to Berlin to engage in higher studies. Sad has been the farewell..., but the idea that these young men, enlightened and active as they are, may one day each in his own sphere of action render a service to the Cause, affords sufficient consolation for the hearts that remain behind.[^]

STUDIES IN GERMANY

I left Haifa by train to go to Port Sa'íd where I would take the ship to Switzerland and Germany. Shoghi Effendi came to the station in Haifa to see me off. He sat in the compartment until the train was ready to leave; then he said good-bye, and he asked me to write to him. It was the end of August 1919 — the last time I was to be in Haifa until 1928, after my marriage to Marion Carpenter when we both made the pilgrimage and were in Shoghi Effendi's presence.

There were five other young Bahá'ís, one of whom was older than the rest of us, who had been students at Beirut and were now being sent by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Stuttgart to contact the believers after the war. We all had passage on a small, old Italian boat of the Lloyd Triestino Company. The route was from Port Sa'íd to Alexandria to Venice. In Alexandria I went to the offices and arranged a transfer to a new ship, which was just ready to sail. The others followed suit. We had the most beautiful trip along the Adriatic by the Dalmatian coast, with its sunny little hamlets and islands, to Trieste. In Venice we were marooned for a couple of weeks with passport difficulties; things were not easy right after the war. I stopped for a short time in Switzerland. But the university had already begun, and I went on to Germany.

I studied for a year at the Technische Hochschule in Berlin and spent a summer in Stuttgart. It was a wonderful Bahá'í summer. There I came to know Consul and Mrs. Albert Schwarz. He died in 1931, but she served the Faith actively for many years and died much later. They were both remarkable people. They took me to their house many times. The Bahá'ís there were most kind. The southern Germans were very friendly, mild, and loving.

There was also another family with whom I became close. The head of that family, the father, was Herr Hauff. He had a factory outside the city that made photographic equipment. He was quite well-to-do. He had built a large house that was a replica of an old castle. He invited me to stay there. His family were all Bahá'ís; he was the only one who was not a believer. He offered me some of the choicest wine from his cellar and was rather shocked when I turned it down. He could not understand such a thing.

Herr Hauff and his wife had two daughters and a son. The older daughter, Johanna Hauff, was a very sweet, lovely girl, and we became good friends. When I was in Berlin, she and her father came to see me, and we went to some of the interesting places together. Later I read in "Star of the West", in 1922, that she was in Haifa at the time of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's passing.[^]

[^] See "Letters telling of the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "Star of the West 12 (2 March 1922): 296-99, for two letters dated 28 November 1921 and 3 December 1921 from Johanna Hauff, at Haifa, Palestine, to her parents in Stuttgart, Germany.

Germany was a marvelous experience for me, but all of Shoghi Effendi's friends had gone, and he was left behind — until 1920. But he was happy in his work.

He was busy translating all the incoming mail in French and English into Persian and translating the tablets revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in reply to these people. He was very much occupied and extremely happy. I corresponded with him now and then.

After I arrived in Germany, I received this letter from Shoghi Effendi written 9 December 1919: My dearest ‘Alí

For a long time have I awaited your letters as I was in the dark as to your whereabouts. But now that your father has come for a few days from Damascus, I secured your address and am sending you herewith some news of the Holy Land. The Beloved is in the best of health and so are the friends and pilgrims. Your dear and devoted father is as ever warmhearted, loving, rosy-cheeked, and in full bloom. Your brother is studying at the S.P.C.[^] and all runs smoothly. I was told last night that he is growing wonderfully in height and his studies above par.

[^] ‘Alí Yazdí’s brother, ‘Abdu’l-Raḥím Yazdí (named by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for their grandfather ‘Abdu’r-Raḥím), was studying at the Syrian Protestant College, now called the American University of Beirut. Later he served for many years as the chairman of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of North East Africa. — Ed. As to myself, the same work and the same room. So please write me and forget me not as I do not and cannot forget the dear Shaykh! Yours affectionately Shoghi

Eight days later he wrote that fifty pilgrims had arrived from many parts of the world. He enclosed a tablet revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá commending me to the believers in Germany: Dearest ‘Alí! Your letter from Stuttgart dated Nov. 27 is at hand. I exposed its contents to the Master, and I secured this Tablet for you in His own handwriting addressed to the German friends. I herewith enclose it.[^]

[^] See pages 42-43 for the text and facsimile of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s 17 December 1919 tablet concerning ‘Alí Yazdí addressed to the German Bahá’ís. — Ed. Your dear father is here, and we exchange the news of your letters to me and to him. He is well and happy. I trust you have received my letter to you dated Dec. 8, which I sent to the Technische Hochschule and in which I enclosed some diary letters of mine which I thought might interest you. We are exceedingly busy here. Some fifty pilgrims, Arabs, Kurds, Persians, Americans, Europeans, and Japanese. How we miss you and the dear Trio, Bakers & Co.; I have written them letters, and I wonder whether they have been received. Áqá Mírzá Muḥammad-Báqir Khán is on his way to Haifa and is now in India.[^]

[^] With “Bakers & Co.” Shoghi Effendi is making a play on words using the name of Áqá Mírzá Muḥammad-Báqir Khán. — Ed. Give please my love to all the brothers and sisters in Stuttgart, I am ever your brother Shoghi Most admirable Tablets have been revealed for Consul and Mrs. Schwarz, Mr. and Mrs. Herrigel, Miss Knobloch and Pastor Hydron. Inform the recipients of the bounty bestowed upon them.[^]

SHOGHI EFFENDI IN PARIS

The time came when Shoghi Effendi, too, would leave Haifa. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wanted him to continue his studies. However, the hard work had broken his health. The Master sent him to a sanatorium just outside of Paris to rest, undergo treatment, and recuperate.[^] He was not to open a book while he was there. His postcard, written 8 May 1920, gives some idea of what he was going through at this time:

[^] Maison d’Hydrotherapie et de Convalescence du Parc de Neuilly, 6, Boulevard du Chateau. — Ed. Dearest ‘Alí! I have not forgotten you, but do you know and realize what crisis I have passed and into what state of health I have fallen! For a month I have stayed and am still staying in this “maison de convalescence” away from Paris and its clamor in bed until noon, receiving...treatment and following the Master’s instructions not to open a book during my stay in this place. Be sure, dear friend, that your place in my heart is ever reserved and warm! I wish, when recovered, I could come to see you. But I am afraid this is not possible. Your dear father had gone to Port Sa’íd for a time when I left Haifa. The Master is in splendid health. Fourteen American pilgrims have arrived. The Holy Land is astir! Shoghi [^]

[^] Postcard, Shoghi Rabbání to ‘Alí [Yazdí], 8 May 1920, Yazdí Papers.

On 28 June 1920 Shoghi Effendi wrote that he had almost recovered and was waiting for instructions from the Master: My dear unforgettable ‘Alí! Your letter and the good news of you imparted by Ghulám-‘Alí made me wish or yearn to come to you and see you for a few days now that I am better and almost fully recovered Shoghi [^] I shall wait and see the turn of events before I decide to pass a sojourn with you in Berlin. Now that I have recovered after three-months regime, hydrotherapy, and electric treatment, I am impatient to plunge again in a valuable, profitable work, to build the structure for my future and whether I shall resume my work in Haifa or go to England for two years study — it all depends upon the Master’s will, which shall be communicated to me within a fortnight.

[^] Ghulám-‘Alí was a Persian Bahá’í druggist who came to Germany to supplies. — Ed. I have deplored the hard financial situation you are in, and I really feel with you. I have just written home and exposed your situation to the Holy Mother, and I trust something will be done to remedy the situation.[^] Dr. Mírzá has lately arrived here from Baghdád....Who knows? Perhaps we may both come and see you for some days in Berlin! It is a long time I have received no news from home, and I am growing impatient.... President Bliss has died in America.[^] A great blow indeed to the college! I do not like Paris. People are so superficial, empty, pleasure-seeking, and frivolous. Life bores me here, and I hope I will have soon a change for the better.

[^] After World War I Germany was in ruins, reparations and pensions had to be paid, money was short, inflation was out of control, jobs — especially for students — were scarce, and the cost of living was expensive. ‘Alí had left Haifa with faith, his earnings as a draftsman, and one hundred English pounds that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had given him. High university fees and saving money for going to the United States to study irrigation engineering, as the Master had directed, left ‘Alí virtually with no funds. — Ed. [^] President Bliss was the president of the Syrian Protestant College when Shoghi Effendi and ‘Alí Yazdí attended it. — Ed. Your loving brother Shoghi [^]

[^] Shoghi [Effendi] to ‘Alí [Yazdí], 28 June 1920, Yazdí Papers.

Later in his life Shoghi Effendi went to Switzerland during the summers to climb mountains and walk a lot. He loved the outdoors and the mountains, and he needed time with nature, because all his work was desk work. But in 1920 his stay in Paris was only a stop on his way to England and Oxford University.

SHOGHI EFFENDI IN ENGLAND

Shoghi Effendi was happy with the Bahá’ís in England. He saw Dr. John Esslemont, whom he had known the previous winter in Haifa, and they struck up a great friendship.[^] Dr. Esslemont had tuberculosis. Shoghi Effendi used to go to his private sanatorium in Bournemouth; they had meals together, and they enjoyed talking.

[^] Dr. John E. Esslemont (1874-1925) heard of the Faith in England in 1914 and was instantly struck by the beauty and significance of it. He rendered many services to the Faith, distinguishing himself through his literary contributions, most notably his well-known introductory text “Bahá’u’lláh and the New Era” (5th rev. ed.[Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1980]) and through his collaboration with Shoghi Effendi. After Esslemont’s death, Shoghi Effendi appointed him a Hand of the Cause of God. — Ed.

Then he went to Oxford, and there, of course, things were different because he had to study very hard. He was working for a special certificate, not for a Master of Arts or a higher degree. He was studying special subjects — English, economics, history of religion, and so on, as described in the letter below. He was not taking required courses for an advanced degree. the best way to understand his feelings at that time is through the letters he wrote: Balliol College 5.10.20 ? Dear ‘Alí: Your letter reached me at a time I was immersed heart and soul in my manifold preparations for entrance at Balliol College, Oxford.

I am fearfully anxious and occupied, but your letter absorbed my interest and diverted it from this phase for a time. I am glad and extremely sad in receiving your letter — glad at the knowledge that at last my efforts have proved partially successful and some pecuniary help has been extended to you. I wished, dear ‘Alí, to have had enough money at my disposal to share it with you! I immediately wrote to Mrs. George and exposed the case fully. I hope you will soon and easily sail. I am so grieved at the sudden turn of events and the complications and cost of travel have only marred the brightness caused by the knowledge that some financial help has been finally extended. I really wondered and got even angry at the delay and silence following my letter which I sent home concerning you. I wonder whether you have experienced brighter developments since you wrote me your last letter. I assure you, dear friend, that if some are free from pecuniary anxieties, they are nevertheless subject to another set of various physical, intellectual, and social drawbacks and preoccupations. Do you believe me when I say that I, the grandson of the Master, have been victim of painful experiences, sometimes of bitter disappointments, and always of constant anxieties — all justified — for my immediate work and future? If you have spent of late painful and trying times, my share of these troubled hours is by no means much less and my burden much lighter. My field of study is so vast, I have to acquire, master, and digest so many facts, courses, and books — all essential, all indispensable to my future career in the Cause. The very extent of this immense field is enough to discourage, excite, and overwhelm such a young and inexperienced beginner as myself. Think of the vast field of Economics; of social conditions and problems; of the various religions of the past, their histories and their principles and their force; the acquisition of a sound and literary ability in English to be served for translation purposes; the mastery of public speaking so essential to me, all these and a dozen more — all to be sought, acquired, and digested! [^]

[^ ] In a question-and-answer session following a talk on 2 November 1975, when ‘Alí Yazdí was asked whether Shoghi Effendi was a public speaker, Yazdí explained that Shoghi Effendi was intensely interested in the great speakers at Oxford. However, Shoghi Effendi himself did not speak publicly on any occasion as far as he knew. Shoghi Effendi felt, perhaps, that that was not his greatest contribution. — Ed.

Prayer, faith, perseverance and effort will alone do it. Praying for your success from all my heart! Shoghi Rabbání [^]

[^ ] Shoghi Rabbání to ‘Alí [Yazdí], 5 October 1920, Yazdí Papers. Shoghi Effendi signed this letter “Shawqi Rabbání, “ a spelling he sometimes used before settling on “Shoghi Effendi.” See Rúhíyyih Rabbání, “The Priceless Pearl” (London: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1969), 20.

MEMORIES OF SHOGHI EFFENDI AT OXFORD

In the fall of 1920 I left Germany and went to London, where I wired Shoghi Effendi to tell him I was going to the United States. He immediately telegraphed, “You don’t mean to tell me you are going to America without coming to see me.” I wrote a note, and he answered by postcard on 3 November 1920: Oxford 45 Broad St.

My dear ‘Alí. When I received your telegram, I wondered to what address I should forward my answer. Now that I have been informed I hasten to tell you how glad I would be to meet you, shake hands with you, and perform the ceremony of “muṣáfiḥih”.[^] I am bound with my lectures and courses and feel sometimes depressed. I shall be your host when you come to see me. I don’t know how you have managed for your traveling expenses.

With this invitation I went to Oxford and stayed in Shoghi Effendi’s rooms and spent a couple of nights there. He took me all over the university, showing me the sights and unburdening his soul. There, again, we were two young men, one of holy lineage and the other from a family that had long been in the service of the Faith. We talked about the future of the Faith and our part in it and of the opportunities that lay ahead. He told me, as he had written me, that he wanted to go to Haifa to serve the Faith. He never discussed his career in more detail — only that he hoped to be of service to the Cause in whatever way the Master would say. It was always, “What the Master would say.” Of course, translation alone would not have been enough for him. He never gave any indication that he expected to become the Guardian.

He was intensely interested in the outstanding speakers at Oxford and especially those in Oxford Union, where their great statesmen had received their training. He wanted me to attend the debates with him and to hear the address by Bryce. He hoped we could discuss the talks together. After my visit I received a card from him dated 6 November 1920, which bore the crest of the Oxford Union Society: Dear ‘Alí: I have received your card, and I knew well that it would be difficult for you to come here again. I did miss you profoundly last night and the night before, particularly as I firmly anticipated that we would both enjoy and comment upon the procedures of the debate and lecture. I trust, however, that you will not be detained a long time and that you will have not any difficulties to surmount. I have written to Grandmother about you reminding her of your difficult and strained situation yet your patience and will. I hope that some help might issue by the time you prepare yourself for entrance into college. My best and tenderest wishes be with you always. May we meet again under better circumstances.[^]

A few days later, shortly before I sailed, I received this further evidence of Shoghi Effendi’s tender heart, loving kindness, and generosity, at a time when his own problems were almost overwhelming: Oxford 10.11.20

Dear ‘Alí: I really never realized how minute, intense, and urgent were your financial needs. I hasten, therefore, to send you all that I can for the present — namely, five English pounds banknote, which I enclose with this letter. I hope you are staying at Miss Herrick’s. She has some rooms to offer to friends who come to London. If you are not there, do apply. She is so kind. My studies and preoccupations are exerting an effect upon me almost as distressing as your own difficulties. Believe me it is so. I don’t know what I shall do at the end. Yours lovingly Shoghi For Heaven’s sake think not of sending me back anything. I flatly refuse and decline. Let your mind be at rest.[^]

SHOGHI EFFENDI

THE GUARDIAN OF THE CAUSE OF GOD

It was two years later, when I was in Berkeley, California, that I heard the news of the ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It is strange, but we never thought that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would die. Though He Himself alluded to His passing, our minds had not, could not, accept the possibility. Before the will of the Master was opened, I wrote to my father expressing my grief, my affection, and my concern for Shoghi Effendi. It was the beloved young Guardian himself who answered my letter.

You have read in the history books how the unexpected news of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s passing almost broke Shoghi Effendi’s spirit. Coming suddenly, without any warning, it was too much for him. He actually had to leave Haifa and put the affairs of the Faith in the hands of the Greatest Holy Leaf.[^] He had to recover from the shock and regain his strength.

[^] The Greatest Holy Leaf was Bahíyyih Khánum, the daughter of Bahá’u’lláh and the sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. She was in charge of the Bahá’í Faith until Shoghi Effendi recovered from the shock of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s passing and his own appointment as Guardian of the Cause of God. — Ed.

His answer to my letter to my father, which he wrote on 23 January 1922, gives you some idea of how he felt at the time: My dearest brother: The touching letter you had written to your dear father has been such a relief and comfort to me and to those who have perused it. In the midst of our sorrows, one ray of hope gives us the solace and peace that the world cannot give — namely, His sure and repeated promise that He will send souls that shall gloriously promote His Cause after Him. My dear brother! The pure faith, the ardor and the services of your father, I am sure, as well as your own noble wish, will make of you an efficient and energetic servant in His Cause, and I assure you of my prayers at His hallowed Shrine, that whatever you do, whatever you acquire may in the near future be wholly and directly put to the service of His Cause. I am too overwhelmed to write more fully, but I assure you of my prayers for you, my attachment to you, and my fervent hope that we shall both cooperate to the very last, in our servitude at His Holy Threshold. The bereaved Holy Leaves remember you with tenderness and hope and wish you a bright future wherever you may be.[^]

[^] The Holy Leaves were the female members of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family. — Ed. Yours in His Love and Service Shoghi

An envelope was enclosed on which he had written: “Rose petals that have been laid upon His Sacred Threshold.”[^]

I did not see Shoghi Effendi again until 1928, when my wife and I went to visit him. He had been the Guardian for seven years. Our friendship continued throughout the years of the Guardianship. Shoghi Effendi encouraged me to write him. But I was reluctant to do this, for he always responded warmly, and I felt I must spare him. I did write under special circumstances, or with good news, and have his exceptional letters of those later times. But that is part of another story.

As to his Guardianship, you all know about Shoghi Effendi’s splendid achievements. How did his contributions affect the Bahá’ís at the time? Out of the whole world this one man undertook tremendous tasks in every phase of the Faith. There were translations of important books that he did almost single-handedly. Before his translations we had very few good ones. His first translation was “The Hidden Words”. Mrs. Corinne True in 1922 brought back from Haifa a copy of the manuscript. A college girl, a guest of Mrs. True’s, spent thrilling hours copying by hand the new translation to take home to California. This young woman was later to become my wife.[^]

[^] Marion Carpenter [Yazdí], on summer vacation from the University of California, Berkeley, with her brother, Howard, was an overnight guest office Mrs. True. That night she copied the entire manuscript of “The Hidden Words” by hand. “The Hidden Words of Bahá’u’lláh” (London: Bahá’í Assembly) was first published in 1923. — Ed.

I can recall the day in Berkeley when we heard that Nabíl’s “The “Dawn-Breakers” had been translated by Shoghi Effendi.[^] We could hardly wait to receive a copy of this enormous book. We immediately established a class to study it. The beautiful English translation gives the flavor of the Persian original. Through reading “The Dawn-Breakers”, the believers in America could, for the first time, get the feeling of what the early Bábís had gone through and the experiences they had had.

[^] See Nabíl-i-A’zam [Muḥammad-i-Zarandí], “The Dawn-Breakers: “Nabíl’s Narrative of the Early Days of the Bahá’í Revelation”, trans. and ed. Shoghi Effendi (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1932).

There was also “Bahá’í Administration”, the Guardian’s letters to the American National Spiritual Assembly and to the American Bahá’í community, from January 1922 to October 1932. Through such messages the Guardian built an administrative institution block by block. Then there appeared “The World Order of Bahá’u’lláh” in 1938, in which he established the Bahá’í Administrative Order as “the nucleus and pattern of the world civilization” emerging under Bahá’u’lláh. His own comprehensive history of the Faith, “God Passes By”, appeared in 1944. Before it was published, an eager Berkeley believer got the galley sheets from Wilmette and read all night.[^]

[^] See Shoghi Effendi, “Bahá’í Administration: Selected Messages 1922-1932 7th rev. ed. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1974); Shoghi Effendi, “The World Order of Bahá’u’lláh: Selected Letters”, 2d ed. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1974); and Shoghi Effendi, “God Passes By”, new ed. (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá’í Publishing Trust, 1974). Marion Holley [Hofman] was the “eager believer” who received the galleys of “God Passes By” from the Bahá’í Publishing Committee’s office in Wilmette.

Among his other achievements the Guardian completed the outer shell of the Shrine of the Báb. He extended and beautified the gardens on Mt. Carmel and at Bahjí. He carried on a vast correspondence with believers all over the world — in Persian, in English, and in French. He had no staff for carrying out major projects. Nobody went to Haifa to work with him when he needed help so greatly — perhaps because they thought that he was indestructible. Actually, they did not really realize how much he needed assistance. In the early days of the Faith in America and elsewhere, everything was happy-go-lucky and informal. Each one did what he liked. When the Guardian came, he established the administrative order. It was not easy. Some people did not like the idea; they were not used to it. Until the friends could function properly, he could not use them. When that time came, he appointed the Hands of the Cause of God. It was through that institution and through the International

Bahá'í Council (the precursor of the Universal House of Justice) that he was able to get the help he so desperately needed.[^]

[^] The Hands of the Cause of God were stewards of the Faith appointed by Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and Shoghi Effendi to assist in the Faith's unity and development. At the time of Shoghi Effendi's passing there were twenty-seven Hands of the Cause alive. These individuals guided and directed the affairs of the Cause until the Universal House of Justice was elected in 1963. The International Bahá'í Council was established in 1951 under the direction of Shoghi Effendi. The International Council was, in the words of Shoghi Effendi, "the most significant milestone in evolution of Administrative Order of the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh in course of last thirty years" ("Messages to the Bahá'í World: 1950-1957", rev. ed. [Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1971],7).

Of course, his marriage to Rúhíyyih Khánum was a great blessing; that was really the greatest thing that happened to him during his Guardianship.[^] She meant so much to him and helped him tremendously.

[^] Nee Mary Maxwell, from Montreal, Canada. Shoghi Effendi appointed her a Hand of the Cause of God in 1952. — Ed.

But despite the lack of help until later in his life, Shoghi Effendi completed vast teaching plans and innumerable projects. It was incredible how much work he could turn out through his determination to serve the Cause. He actually broke his health, and that is one reason for his untimely death.

Shoghi Effendi left us a majestic legacy. When I think of that brilliant, devoted, and purposeful Guardian and his unbelievable accomplishments, I am awed by the bounties bestowed upon us.

Nevertheless, my mind keeps going back to the lively, handsome, happy, young man I knew in my youth, who looked ahead eagerly to the future. He could not have known, in those days, how unique, how momentous would be his destined role in the triumph of our beloved Cause.

Table of Contents Dear Doris,

...Your gift for capturing the essence of personalities in a few sentences, and of evoking those very wonderful days of the 1920s and the activities of the friends is unequalled; I have never read a more exciting, poetic or detailed chronicle. Its value to the Faith will grow with every passing year. Of special interest, I found, was your uncanny capacity to depict – dare one call them “mystical” experiences; the epiphanic and transcendental moments in the lives of the Bahá’ís... The facts are almost always retrievable, and anyone with a Sherlock Holmes inclination can usually dig them out; but what you are preserving is that much rarer thing – the feeling, atmosphere, texture, and spiritual shape of the events you describe...
Roger White

Doris McKay was born Doris Henrietta Hill in Lindley, New York on September 29, 1894. When she was ten, her family moved to Rochester. Doris attended the New York Normal School and, after graduation, taught for six years. Her last school was in Geneva, New York, where she met Willard McKay. They were married June 30, 1923 and took up residence on a successful fruit farm in the area.

The greatest adventure of Doris and Willard’s lives began two years later, when they embraced the Bahá’í Faith through the teaching efforts of Howand Mabel Ives. This book tells the story of that adventure – of Doris and Willard’s work and warm friendships with people such as the Ives, Grace and Harlan Ober, Louis Gregory, May Maxwell, Martha Root, Dorothy Baker, and other early American Bahá’ís. It tells the story of the McKays’ work in the racial amity field and their eventual pioneering move to eastern Canada in the 1940s.

Doris, still at her pioneering post in Prince Edward Island, tells her story’ with clear-sightedness, zest – and love. This book is sure to delight and instruct anyone interested in the development of the Bahá’í Faith in America over the past seventy years, and it provides an intimate glimpse into the spiritual life of a dedicated Bahá'í teacher. {{ppxiv}}

Fires in Many Hearts

Part One ### The Burning Log

It seems to me that my chief distinction in the Bahá'í Faith is that I have lived so long. At this writing (1983[^]), I have lived fifty-eight years in the Paradise of Abhá which is, for me, the knowledge that the Chosen One of God has, in the ascended Glory of the Sun, revisited the earth.

[^] [This book was six years in the writing, and Doris celebrated her ninety-fifth birthday just a few weeks before it was completed. (September 29, 1990)]

Throughout the years this certainty has been the cause of rapturous joy, my charm against disaster, my password to the hearts of others. This is the reason for the little smile that I wear on my lips at the thought of my treasure, my talisman, “my phoenix egg” that I carry in the warmth of a symbolic hand.

Was it an accident that someone had given my father a book of Persian poems when I was fifteen, and that when he saw I was in love with it, he had given it to me? The book went with me through high school, teachers college, and art school and after that out into my teaching world. I grew up, then out, with my perceptions widened and coloured by the songs of Omar Khayyám, Ḥáfiz, and Jal'u'din Rumi. I drew illustrations in the margins. I wore the cover off the book.

I asked a young friend of mine, a great pioneer in the far reaches of the world, “What would have happened if you had not heard the Name, Bahá'u'lláh, on the boat that day?” {{p2}}

She replied, “I would have been lost. That is literally true.”

Yes, people do get lost in the Valley of Search. I too, walked in that Valley with a pack of “isms” on my back when I was young. Like my friend, I travelled alone seeking I know not what, until, by a miracle, I grasped the meaning of that Word. I, too, was lost.

Lost, yet I thought I was found when I met Willard McKay and we fell in love and were married in June 1923. After the years of teaching and living in different places, I started a new life on that beautiful fruit farm in the Finger Lakes country of western New York state. There dwelt love and compatibility, and, for a setting, there was the old house with its antiques, and the lavish plantings of roses and flowering shrubs on the grounds. The nook by the brook was planted with violets, bloodroot, hepaticas, bluebells; sweeping arbour-vitae hedges sheltered the orchards. Family and friends were nearby and there was an inner atmosphere of conversation, music, and books. Every deep wish seemed granted.

The remembrance of my early marriage has remained, floating in memory like an iridescent soap bubble. It seemed that we were at the peak of fulfilment and security. I wrote a poem in those days which conveys my deep sense of satisfaction then: "THIS IS ENOUGH!"

With a mild sense of nostalgia I have taken out the diary of our first year. It began in January 1924. Here are the pages of a life we would later leave behind – a life bent on pleasure exclusively, an almost pagan excitement with Nature. Thronging through the pages are many casual friends with whom we played cards, picnicked, skied and crouched around fireplaces and discussed our "isms". Each day in the diary tells of the weather and what we had to eat. {{p3}}

Did I really say, "This is enough!" I ask myself today, "This?" The romantic bubble is burst. Any Bahá'í who has lived more than half a century in the altitude of spirit would have suffocated with boredom with that life of 1924!

In the late fall of that year there was a slight erosion in the pattern. We felt flattered to be invited to join two older couples on Sunday nights to read a newly published book called {Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era} by Dr. J. E. Esslemont, a book left by someone named Howard Ives.

The two or three evenings were social; stimulating because they gave us an opportunity to talk about our religion or lack of it. And the talk was so interesting with the Doctor and his wife (both orthodox Christians), the Collisons (atheists) and Willard and I, discussing "New Thought". Actually, we did not open our minds to the book, although we were curious about the title. .

But there came the day when three words that we read stayed with me. I did not welcome them, but they persisted to crowd my consciousness. They were: "Service is prayer!"

On an Indian summer day Willard and I climbed the hill at the back of the farm and looked down over the cherry orchards to Seneca Lake. The trees were drab now, the cherries picked, and the sixty or seventy Italian pickers paid off. I spoke timidly on a subject we had avoided. "Everything seems so heavenly the way it is, but in our lives we have no service and we have no prayer... So, if service is prayer, as the book said, perhaps we should invite your mother and sisters to move out here with us."

How gladly Willard assented, as if he had been waiting for me to say this! Thus it happened that, before Christmas, the farm truck came out from town, riding high above the frozen {{p4}} ruts in the lane with Willard's dignified and erudite mother in her wheel chair. Our family, including Marguerite and Christine, would now be increased to five.

The old house looked very welcoming. Fireplaces in two rooms were crackling with blazing apple wood. Candles were burning in their sconces and the lamps with golden and rose . china shades were alight. Our old furniture, given to us by my mother, had been accepted as an addition to the beautiful antiques of the McKays. A baby grand piano had found its wall in the bookroom. The wide planked floor was painted orange with dark blue borders. Every surface was polished bright. Kim, the old sheepdog cum collie, went rushing out to greet the truck.

Thaya, a Bahá'í teacher, writes today, "How to convey to those unbelieving souls out there, the wonder of being a Bahá'í!"

My story begins with that wonder – a wonder that was given to us on an evening in January 1925. The seven of us who were invited to meet Howard and Mabel Ives that night were like a handful of travellers, strangers to one another who had met on a bus. Actually, we were taking off for a whole new world together, although, had we known it, we would have resisted that very thought and perhaps have left the bus. We had in common that all of us were adults who had found a certain pattern in our lives. We were people with strong opinions and curious minds.

I suppose the others were feeling as Willard and I were feeling, excited for some deep reason, but resolved to be critical and wary. Sales resistance we could call it today. All five of us would appear to have been among those who were least likely to become Bahá'ís.

We Meet Mr. and Mrs. Howard Ives

The call had come soon after New Year's day. "Would you like to come to &' baked bean supper at the Collisons' tomorrow night and meet the Ives'?" Tomorrow was Sunday, and late that afternoon Willard and I stepped into our Model A Ford and charged down the lane to the main road. In fifteen minutes we were stepping into the fire-lit room.

Over the handshakes we caught the message of Howard Ives' eyes. Most eyes are veiled at first contact, the first meeting. Perhaps some are veiled always. But these eyes spoke. They said, "My dears, this is a meeting of souls. We cannot hide from one another." The moment passed and we saw his eyes to be deep set and brown under bushy brows. They were set in a lined face with strong features. He had a mobile, speaker's mouth. The man was spare, a little bent. Close to him stood his wife, Mabel, his physical opposite, not very tall, exceedingly pleasing and pretty with blue eyes and dark curly hair. She looked both merry and wise.

We began to enjoy ourselves. The aura of the two guests enhanced the atmosphere of the room, imparting an expansion of mind to a level above the merely rational. It was an unfamiliar elation, a response to a sense of intimacy – a sense of somehow being known and cherished. There was laughter, and stories were exchanged. We made a semi-circle around the fireplace, with plates of Mary's baked beans on our knees. It could have been the food of kings!

The Bahá'í Message

We sat away from the fire and became quiet and expectant as the Ives' were introduced to speak. We were to see the skilled operation of an experienced team of husband and wife. Mabel spoke first on the world aspects of the Bahá'í Faith, stressing its call to universality. She listed and explained the Bahá'í principles derived from the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh – revealed over a century ago. Among these were a list of concepts. In those early days they were challenging, even explosive – far reaching in their call, not to a locality, but to the whole world. For example, mankind is one, the religions are one, all racial, national and religious and class prejudice must be abandoned. There must come universal education, a universal language, a world court, a world administrative body. By eliminating the roots of dissention, she said, universal peace would ultimately follow.

“How can we achieve such a state of mind?” somebody asked.

There was a thoughtful silence. We had all been seekers, each in our own way. We had remained cool to the insistent dogmas of the church, the weird statistics of psychical research, the egoistic goals of the modern cults into which we had probed. Had we perhaps been perishing for a firm belief in something reasonable, something scientific, and at the same time something warm?

Mabel's strong confident voice laid every treasure before us in dazzling array, and somehow, truth could never again be piecemeal. In our minds a new thought exploded: the concept of oneness – a concept to be loved as a reality, for itself! {{p7}} In that flash of illumination we accepted the integration of our ideas and of our world.

Speaking quietly, Howard told us of an Entity, veiled in light, whom he called “the Manifestation of God”. This being had borne the name of Zoroaster, Krishna, Buddha, Moses, Christ, Muḥammad/ and, in recent times, the names of the Bah and Bahá'u'lláh. Their words were the Messages of the Holy Spirit made vocal, each in its own day.

In their dual station, the Manifestations or chosen Intermediaries between God and Man were men – and yet, more than men. Their messages were from one Source: God – the Unknowable Essence. All taught the singleness of God, Whose laws they brought. All taught the love of God and love of “thy neighbour”. They brought the laws and ordinances of God that differed with the changing times. Now, at the summit of the long cycle of human history and evolution and in a time of great danger to the human race through world strife, not one, but two exalted Beings had appeared. The Message for this day was Justice, and through World Order, peace.

Here, indeed, was a new idea, a Christ returned! “Like a thief in the night,” said Howard. When he invited questions, our instinctive need was to relate to our previous beliefs the supreme fact that he had revealed. But how could his answer be reconciled to such a group as were gathered before him? The agnostic and atheistic scientists, the churchman, the searchers in the humanistic cults.

Sometimes it seemed as if Howard had left us when, with open palms and head thrown back, he sat in silent prayer. Then he would rise up, his deep eyes flashing, his white mane vibrant on his head, and the answers would come through an electrified atmosphere. {{p8}}

He told us, "Instead of giving up Christ you will find Him. Yes, God spoke through His prophets. Did He not say to Moses, 'I am the Lord, thy God.' Yes, this is in fulfilment of prophecy. The prophecy If all the prophets foretold this Day."

"Science?" asked Rex Collison.

"Science and religion will enhance and prove each other. How can one truth contradict another truth?"

"Reincarnation?" That was my question.

"It is true that we are born again after leaving this world, but not in the sense of reincarnation. In the next world we will continue to advance into higher stations, if we so desire. Births will be necessary to attain to these, just as tonight a new world and a new birth lie before you. Your first birth was from the womb. Even in this world, a "second birth" is available to the awakened soul."

"Proofs of the prophet?" Here is the challenge to investigate truth. Howard told us. "The life of the Prophet and His Teachings are the unassailable proofs."

"How do we know that They were sent by God?"

"Whence came that dynamic power to uplift humanity of the world religions that bear their names?"

His voice stopped as did our questions. We sat silent, amazed by another and personal proof. We had beheld a man communing with an Unseen Power. We had watched him bring inspired, reasonable, and acceptable answers back from another realm.

Such was the power in the room, our eyes, too, were suddenly opened to it. A place of spirit had, somehow, signalled us. The man, Howard Ives, had become a part of his message, had become something more than the flow of words, the voice, the movement of hands in prayer. More than his eyes looking into ours with a compassionate comradeship. {{p9}} Our defenses dispersed. The Message flowed into our separate worlds like a sudden flood. I believed. We all believed.

It had been a happening. There are different ways of saying it. For example, a boat on a sluggish, weed-hampered stream enters a main current that effortlessly speeds it along. A painting, obscured by dust, is restored to the artist's original colours. A fish, floundering on the beach, is returned to the sea by a kind of ninth wave; a half-dead person is revived by oxygen. Many times when the early Bahá'ís were with us, our spirits were to feel this release. Tonight, this night with Howard and Mabel, had been our first.

I had one last question for Howard as he held my hands in a goodbye: "How does one pray?" Howard and Mabel exchanged the look of conspiring parents.

He said, "Dare I?"

She nodded, and he slipped into my hands his own worn prayerbook to take home.

I tried to sleep that night, but I had to give it up because I found myself spiritually awake for the first time in my life. Of course I had had lovely thoughts before, induced by some book or other that I was reading, but these had been passing thoughts that had made me feel comfortable, like a church service does for some people.

I asked myself, "What had I learned from contact with the passionate sincerity of Howard's words?" That there was a world of spirit and that there was an Essence there – a knowing and responsive ENTITY. That Howard had addressed this Being and had been inspired in the answering of our questions. That it followed that we, too, could pray, establishing a kinship with this Power, with Bahá'u'lláh as an intermediary. {{p10}}

Yet, marvelling at this new dimension of my understanding, I was miserable. The intonations of Howard's voice seemed still to ring out, "Mankind is one! All prejudices must be abandoned." How could I, with my own two or three choice prejudices, qualify as a Bahá'í? In the searchlight of these teachings, how ugly my faults were! Were the doors closing? For a few hours I had thought that I belonged to "the new creation" mentioned by my teachers. Now I was a little less secure.

I arose and lit a candle, turned the pages of Howard's prayerbook and prayed, almost with fear, that these hindrances might be removed.

My prayer was answered overnight. In the morning I awoke with a free, unsullied soul. This I knew through an experience of faith – a positive knowledge of things divine.

Mary Collison telephoned to ask, "Are you still up in the air?"

"Yes, I am," I replied, "and I never want to come down!" Neither Mary nor I ever did come down.

We Meet Other Bahá'ís

In the days that followed, the ground had vanished and yet we had no wings. There was now a bewildering sense of unreality about the human plane. Sometimes we did not seem real to each other. When I look back today, only the days since our acceptance of Bahá'u'lláh seem real. As our new life began to grow, the old receded.

Howard and Mabel guided us with parental concern, returning as often as they could to instruct and to inspire us. We were soon to meet their closest friends, Grace and Harlan Ober, for we were invited to attend a “Feast” at the Obers’ home in Buffalo and to spend the night. {{p11}}

We took flight like seven young birds following their parent birds to a clime where always the sun shine and roses bloom. Those who rode in the Ives’ car had the added advantage of a tour, with Howard as guide, through {The Seven Valleys}. On we flew through the spiritual landscape of the Valleys that symbolize the seven stages of the progress of the soul: the Valleys of Search, of Love, of Knowledge, of Unity, of Contentment, of Wonderment.

“Now,” proclaimed Howard, “we come to the seventh Valley, the Valley of Annihilation.” Just then a heavy truck tore past with a screech of doomsday – missing us, it seemed, by only half an inch. “Praise be to God,” said Howard, watching the road a little more carefully the rest of the way.

“Bahá'u'lláh describes it this way: This station is the dying from self and the living in God; being poor before God and rich in the Desired One. It is a stage corresponding to the unitive life of the Christian mystics.”

We arrived at the Obers’ house on a pleasant Buffalo street. Close together in defensive formation, our country group filed into the hall and on into the oval of people which occupied two connecting rooms. I was conscious of my new hat, a large blue scoop lined with lavender-shirred silk, a hat I had bought to fortify my ego for this occasion. For a moment all eyes turned toward us. Then the reading continued and several people spoke.

Only one speaker do I remember. She was a slim young woman with smiling grey eyes, her pallor and luminosity set off by a wine-coloured velvet dress. When asked to speak, she told a simple story to remind us that we were “all children of one God.” The impact of her personality was stunning. I was {{p12}} so stirred by her, that when I was invited to say a few words, I stood up and said merely, “I am speechless!” and sat down.

When the closing prayers were said, this vision of a person moved down the room, stood before me and took both my hands.’ She looked deeply into my eyes, nodded, and said, “You are the one!” I knew by my excited heartbeat that this was no casual meeting.

Her name was Dorothy Beecher (later, Dorothy Baker). Her job was to tell stories to children in the Buffalo schools. Her grandmother had been named “Mother Beecher” by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá but at the time her parents were not Bahá’ís.

Dorothy Beecher had seen right through my hat and veil of acute self-consciousness. Such was not true, however, of my hostess. We laughed, at our next meeting, when Grace Ober confessed that she had classified me as a person “just going along for the ride.” This was far from the truth because I had been talking deeply with Howard, and I had been reading. And I had been intrigued by the unsolved mystery of prayer. No, Grace had not seen through me. At breakfast the next morning the conversation deepened and Grace looked with concern at my impassive face. Later, when I asked, “Where do our prayers go when we pray? Do they go to the Supreme Concourse?”, Grace said that she had the surprise of her life.

Willard Gets “Up in the Air”

Although called away by many duties, the Ives did not leave us alone. And the Obers began coming over on weekends. They were another team of husband and wife as inspired and as strong as the Ives. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had married them in 1912, with Howard, then a Universalist minister, officiating. {{p13}}

Sometimes Grace would stay over for a week, visiting among us, answering our questions and, with magnificent designs appearing in outline, weaving for us a new life.

One night Grace and I sat praying by the fireplace in the dining room. Willard, still intellectual in his approach, had asked Grace, “Is it all right for me to be a Bahá’í if I give it only my academic approval?”

With a twinkle in her eye, Grace responded, “Yes, certainly Willard, that will be fine.”

That night Willard went to a dinner meeting of his University Club to sit with the learned professors of our two local colleges. The subject for the evening was, for them, an unusual one: “Concept of Deity”. Being younger, Willard had never spoken before at the Club discussions. That night, however, after listening to the dryness and limitations of their academic minds; Willard rose to his feet and told them about the Manifestations of God and that from them alone, could one learn of the Unknowable Essence. He rushed home to tell us, as “up in the air” as any of us had been. He loved to tell the joke on himself – about his “academic approval”. From that night on, he was a most ardent Bahá’í.

From Grace we learned more of the early teachers and the reason they were not like other ‘good’ people we had known. “Walk thou above the world by the power of the Greatest Name,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had told them, and this, following His footsteps, they had learned to do. In His presence and through His teachings they had found a new range of spirit an altitude of station beyond the human kingdom. It’s a higher plane of existence that I call “the plus level” that is open to them. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called that level “the Spirit of Faith”. Thus uplifted, the early teachers had surged forward in a small band, the apostles of a new Day. They were to {{p14}} learn in their human moments, that “the steed of the Valley of Love is pain.” The rising and falling between the higher and lower levels of Nearness is part of the process by which maturity is won. It was their firmness of intention that never wavered. Even while swept by emotional tests, they remained firm as a rock.

More About Howard and Mabel

From their friends we learned more about Howard and Mabel. After meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Howard had given up his ministry and his security. His marriage broke up and his little daughter, Muriel, remained with her mother. Howard travelled and taught and tried to make a living.

In 1920 he married Mabel Rice-Wray, an equally devoted early Bahá’í teacher who, also, had met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in 1912. After an unsuccessful business venture, they faced the fact that there was no easy way to find the freedom to teach to others the principles of their religion. They sold their things and accepted a joint selling job in Pittsburgh, peddling a course of literature for people who had not gone to college. Together they sold the books and Howard gave a course of lectures on them.

The selling of books would be followed by a six week course of lectures requiring two or three months. At the end of the lecture series, the Ives advertised free public talks on the Bahá’í Faith. Usually study classes would follow and from them, Bahá’í groups would form .

By living very frugally, the Ives managed. One wondered how they could have done it. Recklessly they burned themselves out and only through stressed concentration, were they able to balance their Bahá’í activities with keeping alive. They were truly heroes, but they did not pretend to be saints. They {{p15}} kept their enthusiasm all through a life made up of crises. There would be good food and good times. Always the Ives were human. Always the Ives were fun. Certainly this is a high station: to appreciate the good things that God has given us and, yet, to give them up gladly – to be detached.

Mabel, in her remodelled handed-down clothes was dainty and feminine; Howard in his shiny grey suit was distinguished. Together, they were an aristocracy of spirit.

Lessons in Prayer

Looking back on our early efforts to deepen in the Faith, I realize that one cannot learn how to pray. One can learn about prayer, but actual prayer, as “conversation with God”, comes as a “grace” or a gift, unexpected and undeserved. A feeling fills one’s heart. Should this take place and, with it, a glimmer of love for that unknowable Being called God, one is ready and eager for another step – the discipline of prayer.

“I know the Manifestation is the Intermediary, but He, too, seems so far away. How can I know God?”

“There is no knowledge of God except through an experience of the Holy Spirit emanating through His Manifestation,” one of our teachers replied.

“What is the Holy Spirit?”

After a moment’s thought, “It is a step-down transformer of God’s love.”

The Nineteen-Day Fast was approaching and Grace Ober agreed to visit Geneva during the first week to “teach us to pray”. On the first day of the Fast, Willard and I ate before dawn and drove to the Collisons’. Grace had planned for us an order of prayers: The Greatest Name ninety-five times; {{p16}} the long and beautiful Dawn Prayer with its refrain, “Thou seest me, O my God, holding to Thy Name, the Holy, the Shining, the Precious, the Greatest, The Highest, The Abhá...” (This was the translation in use at that time); then a prayer for spiritual qualities; nineteen prayers to the “Remover of Difficulties”; and healing prayers.

There is no ritual of prayer in the Bahá’í Faith. This we knew. But Willard and I, remembering our first Fast, adhered long afterwards to this program of prayers as planned for us by Grace.

The Night The Ice Went Out

The Tioga River was nearby. As the later days of winter lingered we longed to see the river flowing openly again. With consternation and hope we longed for that annual event when the pistol-like cracking would signal the break up of the ice which would be cast up in five to six-foot-deep chunks on the roads and lawns and would damage some of the houses. It was the irresistible response of the river to the pressure of warming weather – to the coming of spring rains. When the ice went out, the landscape changed. That night was an event to be talked about and noted in diaries. Our first Naw-Rúz was like that.

We carried a social self-consciousness into our Bahá’í lives; a self-consciousness distant from an awareness of the “real” people inside others. We had each our private store of thoughts and a fear of “what the others would think”. There was a desire to protect ourselves through self-concealment. This was our build up of ice – an accumulation of low temperature responses.

With the Fast and its dawn prayers over, we were a little more aware of the spiritual forces playing about us, but we {{p17}} were still the searchers, the scientific investigators. Our knowledge was deepened, we had accepted the Message, and our emotions remained shallow.

Grace, with Harlan, drove back from Buffalo to make us a Persian pilau which she had learned from Maḥmúd, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s cook. She brought with her a large tray of burnished brass that had held so many feasts in the past. When Willard and I arrived at the home of Dr. and Lucy Heist, the food was already cooked and waiting to be arranged on the tray.

We saw built before us an amazing structure of baked, buttered rice, a crown of carrots cut lengthwise, the space between filled with chopped nuts and olives, peas, and whole onions. This was the first layer. There was another layer of rice, with a decorative design of dates, sliced peppers and tomatoes and french-cut green beans. The brass tray was hidden by a mounded edifice of blended foods. Today we would call it “gourmet”.

The Feast, earthly symbol of spiritual bounty, was eaten in the big kitchen of the Heist home, where floated the odours of the cooked food. We ate, much aware of the significance of this, our first, Naw-Rúz Feast. Then, regaled, we sat at the table and listened to Grace talk. While she spoke, her radiance made us aware that the presence and remembered face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was with her. She quoted his words, saying that “food prepared with love is healing for the body, the mind, and the soul”, and that this food tonight had been special because it was offered with His hospitality.

As she talked, Grace lived again in those days of 1912 when the Master had visited North America. While speaking of the food, she recalled that Maḥmúd had prepared dishes like this. He had come as a cook and she had noticed him as he came off the boat from steerage, wearing a turban on his head and {{p18}} a ground-length black robe. On his back he carried a feather bed, or mat. Little had Grace realized just how intimate would become her relations with this elderly man who spoke only Persian.

On this occasion all eyes were drawn to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with his silvery white hair, fez, and oriental robe; fragile looking but taking long steps; not tall, but looking tall. He was making welcoming gestures with his hands. Walking behind Him would have been His small entourage of interpreters and aides.

When news arrived that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was coming to America, Grace had offered her services. She had thought of herself, she admitted, as a hostess, arranging flowers and extending gracious welcomes to guests. When the arrangements were made, Grace was assigned to a much different station—that of helping Maḥmúd in the kitchen. This was, she told us, an example of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s humour. “He sends us tests to burnish our souls.”

Grace confided that her weakness had been pride of family, talent, and attainment. Now, with the Master actually under the same roof, her task was to clean the pans stuck up with rice cake! She described the slow baking of the rice in the oven and the golden crusts that adhered to the pans. Poor Grace! The pots and pans became monsters. And, worst of all, the Master had not singled her out for praise and attention.

Then one day, all the happy, shining-eyed people were leaving with the Master for the West Englewood Picnic. The pots were standing in the sink and Grace could not leave her kitchen. This was the climax. She hid herself behind the door and began to cry. Suddenly, swinging open the concealing door, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in the kitchen. With love and laughter He paraphrased her name, Instead of Grace, He called her {{p19}} Grease, rolling the G so that the word was “G-g-grease”. The weight rolled off her heart and she laughed. She was soon to learn that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had arranged for her to go with the others to the picnic.

We ate the Master’s food from the big brass tray that night. Then listening to the many loving stories, we were all laughing and crying like little children. Somehow, Grace had brought into that kitchen the irresistible charm of the Master, His penetration of the mind, His bubbling spirits, His fatherly concern and His eyes that made souls transparent. Such love was transmitted to us. It melted the ice of pride or resentment and the congealment of constraint and fear. These negative feelings, often called “human”, did leave us that night and we were happy and unburdened as never before. We were unified with each other.

We had come to our first Naw-Rúz Feast as people not very intimate with one another. We had accepted but intellectually, the Bahá’í Teachings and we were not in the habit of knowing anyone well. The atmosphere of this Naw-Rúz had the effect of sun on ice. We saw one other for the first time, as real people. We ceased to hide from one another and began to care truly. Grace Ober had, through her association with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, shown us how He cared about everybody.

Never again did the ice re-form as it had. Not only had we laughed, we had wept. We would never forget “the Night The Ice Went Out”.

Our First Assembly

We formed the Spiritual Assembly of Geneva, New York in May 1925. Included in our “community” were the couples of the original group that had been introduced to the Faith at the Collisons’ bean supper. There were, also, Willard’s mother, Edith; his sisters Marguerite and Christine; and two youth members, Elizabeth and Lucille Heist.

The manner in which Edith McKay became a Bahá’í was a triumph of human lucidity. A typical lady belonging to a church for many years could, at that time, be expected to recoil in alarm from statements that not only challenged her ideas of organized religion but, also, offered a dizzy perspective of world affairs. But Edith McKay was not a typical lady. She was actually a pioneer in higher education for women. She was among one of the first classes of women to graduate from Cornell University.

We told her one morning about the Cause as Marguerite, Willard and I hovered anxiously beside her bed. We waited. Why didn’t she say something? When she spoke it was to tell us, “You haven’t told me a thing that doesn’t make commonsense.” On hearing the message, she had become a Bahá’í.

The formation of the Geneva Assembly took place around the fireplace in the bookroom at the farm—the room adjoining Edith’s. She listened from her bed to the proceedings and sometimes her voice joined in. That night, she listened with us to the reading of letters from Bahá’ís across the country, letters which welcomed us with such love into the Faith. Our hearts were thrilled with the knowledge that there were people reaching out to us. This special welcoming into the family of Bahá had been arranged by our spiritual parents, the Ives, who had written to several friends.

I am sure that we were all stirred deeply by the importance of our commitment. I know that I was. The next morning I sat in a deck chair by a flowering syringa bush, an open Bahá'í book in my lap. (It was the old PBahá'í Scriptures.) The acres of cherry trees were in white bloom, the apple and pear trees were budded and all their fragrances blended. I envisioned {{p21}} before me, two paths: one, relatively smooth was tracing to the present familiar ways of my life; the other had turns around which I could not see, a rough, steeply ascending path. That I have remembered for more than fifty years this setting, this occasion, marks that morning as a Moment of Truth. I rejoiced in my decision to take the upward winding path.

Conflict of the Old and the New

The early summer brought a conflict of old and new personal relationships. A week-end was planned, with the Ives and Obers coming, and the Bahá'í friends were invited to a large meeting. I received from Isabel a telegram telling me that she was coming from Washington to spend several days at that time too. I had known Isabel in Art School and we always looked forward to our get-togethers.

Isabel arrived. All went delightfully well until it was time to prepare her for the coming of the Bahá'ís. As we relaxed on the lawn, I took a long breath and began.

"Isabel, do you believe that Christ will come again?"

Her response came from _a Georgia Baptist background, "Oh, yes, indeed!"

"Well, what would you say if I told you He has already come?"

"I wouldn't want to hear another word about it!" She left me, stalking proudly into the house.

"Just let her meet Harlan Ober," I prayed. Especially Harlan. I had absolute faith in his powers of persuasion. He had, along with the arguments of his fine Harvard-trained mind, all the endearing social virtues. "He will talk to Isabel," I told myself happily. "He will make her understand." {{p22}}

That night twenty-five Bahá'ís came to the meeting. All were intoxicated with the wine of the spirit, loving and embracing one another. All except Isabel, who was in bed with a raging headache.

"I'll run up and say some prayers for her," decided Grace, who made for the stairs. I followed. Grace perched herself on the bed and put her hand on Isabel's head. Isabel moaned and turned her head aside, muttering, "Please go away."

The next morning my indisposed guest was leaving by train. Twelve or more people were serving themselves breakfast and eating close together at the kitchen table or in the breakfast nook. Isabel would not speak to me. Standing, she looked around helplessly. I brought Harlan downstairs and begged him: "Harlan, you must help her! You will know what to say. This is serious!"

Harlan found Isabel a corner in which to sit down, consulted with her about her choice of breakfast, served her and then sat down with her and engaged in intense conversation. Presently they came to me, and Harlan announced, "I'm driving Isabel to the train, will you come with us?" Isabel, smiling now, affectionately took my hand.

We saw her off and I could see by her smiles that she had "gone with a gladsome heart". What had Harlan said to cause this transformation? He explained it. "The Master told us we must serve every soul—but we must find the plane on which the person can be served, whether material, intellectual, or spiritual. I found that plane with Isabel and I served her. I served her breakfast."

"But I saw you talking. What did you tell her?"

"I asked her about her interesting work in Washington. If we are to serve with love, we must serve with understanding."

Those were impressionable days. More and more were we conditioned to accept the infinite variety manifest in the {{p23}} Bahá'ís and to feel respect for the family bond that united all of us as Children of the Kingdom. We were told, "You will find that there are human faults in the most devoted Bahá'ís. We are enjoined to humility, and what can make a person feel more humble than to acknowledge before God his own failures and faults?" As in a garden, while hoeing the weeds, we are cultivating the plants.

It is part of the balance of our natures—the silhouette of light against dark—man in his lower aspect wrestling with the angel of his higher self.

In the teachings of the Faith, we are not to mention the faults of others, and we are to speak of our own faults only to God. But we must not be egotistical in our self-abasement. Only with self-forgetfulness are we free to concentrate on God. Why have we not learned this? "Make your will a door through which the confirmations of the spirit come," 'Abdu'l-Bahá had said.

We were helped to see that "use of the will" meant not to experience an expanded consciousness, the quest of so many seekers. Rather, we were to learn and to relearn that the practice of will is a love-response experience, a self-forgetfulness because of an absorption in God. Even when we fail to achieve the absorption, our trying is itself a means of maturity and growth.

Grace's Station of Servitude

Our greatest lesson had been to see and to hear Grace pray on our behalf. When she prayed; the strong, capable, assertive Grace became a beggar. We would steal glances under lowered eyelids at her pale oval face, ordinarily so animated, cast now in a line of passionate entreaty. Her outstretched hands were urgent in their appeal. {{p24}}

I can see her now, a harmony of rounded lines. She had large green-flecked hazel eyes, heavy lids and a wide curved mouth; sloping shoulders. She could make herself irresistibly comical, turn herself into a clown. In her younger days Grace may have been a strawberry blonde. Now there were tints of burnt sienna in her greying hair. Her artist's training was reflected in her choice of clothes: tans, yellowy-greens, reddish browns, and oranges predominated. Her wardrobe brought forth the appearance of a strong and compelling personality. The effect was one of both inner and outer unity.

Sometimes my rather vague and poetic temperament found Grace a bit hard to take. I remember one magical spring morning when I took her to a treasured retreat near our house—a little grove where a brook lazed over mossy stones. The path leading there was edged with white and purple violets. “You must come and see the violets,” I urged. Grace came and, continuing to talk about the Teachings, her sensible flat-heeled shoes stepped blindly on the flowers!

Grace and Mabel were, at this time, twin engines in the advancement and organization of the Cause. They were, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would have called them, true “maid-servants of the Merciful”. But it was for Howard and Harlan that I had felt romantic affections. Such is the waywardness of the heart.

A Talk with Mabel Ives

While Howard was carrying on business that spring, we invited Mabel to stay with us for a rest. She delighted in the respite from exhausting efforts to make a living and from her strenuous teaching activities. Her habit had been to “keep going” until she was ill. She would take a rest, and then throw herself back into the grind. Those days of her visit in 1925 were welcomed for this restoration of “strength to serve the {{p25}} Kingdom”. This time, Mabel was not ill and Nature's energies fed the flame of her soul.

Mabel could never get enough of the sun or of being outdoors. She partook wholeheartedly of nature to a degree that only Willard and I could appreciate. One morning, a farm helper passing nearby saw our dignified leader of meetings suspended upside down from a tree and chanting loudly the Greatest Name. “God is the Most Glorious.” She came down laughing.

Especially helpful for me were our talks. It was a hopeful time. The world was then sandwiched between two wars and we and our friends actually believed that, by his League of Nations Treaty with its Thirteen Points, Woodrow Wilson had “made the world safe for democracy”. Had not Mabel, herself, said that Wilson's daughter was a Bahá'í and that the President kept on his desk, a card with the Bahá'í Principles?

It was one of those beautiful days and Mabel and I sat drying our hair in the little formal garden that Willard and I had built. I observed, “The Bahá’í World is sweetness and light and soon the whole world will be transformed.”

“I wish that could be true,” replied Mabel, “but further trouble will beset the world.” Threatening dark clouds drifted over the garden bleaching some of the radiance from the flowers. I shivered.

She continued, “How else can the established institutions of the world be ultimately destroyed so that new ones can be built in their place? How can we build the New World Order on a foundation so obviously defective? She quoted Bahá’u’lláh, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Shoghi Effendi.

The dark clouds drifted away and sunshine returned to the garden. Mabel assured me that, after a darkened period, the world itself would come back into the full light, like our {{p26}} garden. “Are not the affairs of the world,” she observed, “in the hands of Divine Providence?”

The “Practice in Speaking” Class

While Mabel was with us, she started a “Practice in Speaking” Class. The purpose was to train the Collisons and the McKays to chair meetings and to make short talks on a variety of subjects based on a study of the Writings: the “Two Natures of Man,” “Can Human Nature Change?,” “What is Truth?” among others. We were businesslike. We made outlines on filing cards and we explored the few Bahá’í books that were available in those early days. Most of those books are available no longer today, books like {Divine Philosophy}, {The Wisdom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá}, and the {Bahá’í Scriptures}. Mabel would drill us. One of us would act as chairman and the others would take turns in giving ten minute talks. We would stand and address an imaginary audience. After each talk, the chairman would ask for questions. Despite the fact that all of us had been schoolteachers and should have been at ease on our feet and comfortable before a group, the fun of the Practice in Speaking Class was that, with our bright-eyed teacher observing us so closely, we were very nervous. After Mabel left, we continued the practice by ourselves.

Teaching

We were learning so much during that first year and, even more important, we were learning to teach! All through the spring, Lucy Heist taught her Sunday School class. (“I don’t see why I can’t,” she said. “I believe in Christ even more now that I know that He has returned.”) There were actually two classes, each for adult women. One Sunday nobody came to {{p27}} Lucy’s class. She sat for an hour in an empty classroom, her Bible opened to the verses’ she had intended to read. In silence she sat and prayed. When the hour was over Lucy stood by the Church door and greeted warmly her students, who had gone to the other class. Only one woman came back to speak to her. “Mrs. Heist. We all like you, but we can’t stand your teaching.”

“What is wrong with my teaching?” queried Lucy.

“We believe in the Devil and you don’t.” Thus ended a church relationship of many years.

Jimmy Tollis

There is the story of Jimmy Tollis. He was Italian and the manager of a local fruit farm. One night Rex Collison brought him to our group. He listened very attentively but said almost nothing. On a later visit, becoming more communicative, he told us his story.

When Jimmy was a little boy in Italy, he was sent out one morning to pick dried beans. A stranger came walking down the road with a pack on his back. He approached Jimmy and said, “If you will give me a handful of those beans, I will give you one of these books.” He drew a book out of his bag. Jimmy accepted it and the stranger went off munching the beans. The next Sunday Jimmy took the book to the priest. (Apparently it was a tract of {The Gospel According to St. John}) The priest ripped out the pages and gave back to Jimmy the now-empty covers. “These are for you,” he said, and proceeded to tear the pages themselves into pieces which he threw out the church window. Jimmy vowed that, someday, he would read the other Bible—the Protestant one.

At twenty-one Jimmy emigrated to the United States. As he walked up an Ellis Island street one Sunday morning he saw {{p28}} people entering a Protestant church. He followed them in and never returned to the Roman Catholic Church. In time Jimmy learned to speak English and joined a Protestant church, but never did he find the answers he was seeking. This is not strange, for he did not know what questions to ask. Like many of us, he was starving for a truth he could not find! When he read in the newspaper the word “Bahá’í”, he went to Rex Collison’s desk at the New York State Experimental Farm. Rex told him about our class. It was uplifting to our spirits to feel that our classes were really teaching. Jimmy never missed a meeting. He would smile and nod as he listened, but what was he thinking? We asked him about his wife, Mary; would she like to come? “She will come—sometime,” he would say.

One night his smile was wider. He had talked to Mary. He had begun by telling her, “Mary, these people say that Christ has come again.”

“What is His Name?” she asked.

“Bahá’u’lláh”.

“I knew it,” she exclaimed. “A few weeks ago I saw that Name written in letters of gold across the sky. I had forgotten it, but I know it began with a ‘B’.”

Mary accepted the Faith at once and came with Jimmy to the next meeting.

A Nervous First Meeting with Louis Gregory

Louis Gregory was going to visit our new community and it was arranged that he would stay at our house. With the exception of the Ives and Obers, he was our first Bahá'í guest. Louis was in vigorous middle age and he seemed to my inexperienced eye, like an elongated being from another planet: long legs, long arms, long neck. His head was so very far above mine. The physical qualities pointed, as it were, to {{p29}} a lofty altitude of integrity, courage, and resolution. His brown skin veiled from me his face. It was like being introduced to someone in a dark room while being conscious of a magnetic spiritual attraction and power. I thought to myself, "This man is integrated from his roots; from the sub-subsoil of his ancestry. He shot up like a straight young tree towards the sun, the source of his growth." His face appeared affable, yet so self-contained and quite unreadable. At that moment of meeting, I was not prepared for anyone like this.

Louis took a brief rest in his room and I heard him coming down the backstairs. I was still feeling very rattled and worried about saying the wrong thing. He asked me about our group activities, of which we were proud, and about the different members. I complained about the backwardness of one of them. Louis, sprang to his feet, snapped his fingers like a firecracker and, saying not a word, retired to his room.! I had been backbiting, of course; praising myself and feeling superior, committing a whole category of insidious Bahá'í crimes. I was left to think of Grace Ober's oft-repeated words from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "All voices are from the King."

Later that afternoon, when the sunlight in the long low room was beginning to wane, I saved myself from walking into Louis. He was prostrated on our Khasak rug, flat m prayer. With agility and grace he arose, smiled and said, "There's a little of the oriental in me, I think." There was no reference to our first little talk.

I was to meet Louis Gregory again and again over the years. He was ever an example, always serving the Faith with wholehearted devotion. He comes in and out of the story of my years, but I shall never forget the lesson that he taught me on his first day in my life. {{p30}}

Green Acre, the Convention of 1925

"July is the time to go to Green Acre," declared Mabel. "The National Convention of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada will be held there. This will be your opportunity to meet the administrators and the teachers—to see what the Cause is really like. May Maxwell will be there. Wait till you see HER!"

When I talk about that first Convention, some dear friends have protested, "But there had been other conventions before 1925." This is true. But while I can say that this was my own first Convention, It was also the first Convention under the Guardian, of the National Spiritual Assembly of 'the United States and Canada. With Shoghi Effendi guiding the development of an unfolding world administrative order this Convention was unique. It was not an isolated national event it was part of a new international initiative.

We drove with the Collisons. The Heists would be coming too and Jim Harlan and his wife, Anne. We wound our way through the White Mountains and now, late in the afternoon, as we neared the old seafaring town of Portsmouth New Hampshire, we caught the tangy scent of the marshes. We were but four miles from Eliot, Maine and Green Acre. The car was silent now .. Each of us was excited in our own special way. My own feelings were of anticipation, bordering on a • fear of coming Into contact with the spiritual voltage of the great Bahá'ís whose names were familiar to us. A mole-like part of me feared the light and a moth-like counterpart wanted to rush blindly towards it. Both the mole and the moth rolled on swiftly.

We first saw hallowed Green Acre in the slanting rays of the late-afternoon sun. We could not mistake the corner where we were to turn, marked by a gift shop and tea-room {{p31}} and, by the road, a large flower. Now we saw the white three-storey inn on a rise of ground overlooking the Piscataqua River. A breeze stirred the silky pink and gold grass on the slopes.

The veranda fronting the inn was empty but animated voices emanated from the dining-room. The crowd from Geneva gathered around the desk before slipping into the dining-room to order a New England dinner of baked beans, hot biscuits and blueberry pie. Our shy arrival was disrupted as soon as Howard and Mabel discovered us. They greeted us warmly, with loud welcoming cries and engineered the moving of tables so that we could sit together. Later they whisked us down the long veranda to a room called “the Hall”. In it was a raised platform trimmed with garden flowers and lights. Piloted by Howard and Mabel, we stepped into a constellation of brightly shining people—people who would become, with time, intimate and dear to us—Doris and Horace Holley, Jessie and Ethel Revell, Hebe Struven, Harriet and Curtis Kelsey. Then, there was May.

May Maxwell seemed to be a person set apart by an almost visible aura; outwardly, she was a being of such beauty and poise and of such a power of attraction that we had to restrain ourselves from staring at her. Years later in attempting to describe her, I wrote that the memory of her was a “perfume that could not be contained in a bottle”. It was years later that she was to conquer my shy withdrawal from her.

The next morning I awoke early and slipped out by myself to look around Green Acre and to inhale its atmosphere. As I walked, I meditated: What had Howard meant when he had talked about ‘The Meeting’? What had I seen in Dorothy, that strange beautiful girl in Buffalo, and now, in May Maxwell? {{p32}} What were the stations of the human soul and how was it that some people seemed to be mysteriously nearer to God?

After a long look at the garden, a stroll along the lane past the tea-room, I came to Fellowship House. I found myself in a handsome living-room that opened onto a veranda overlooking the river. A tall, red-haired lady appeared. She embraced me lovingly. While still in the arms of this radiant being, I said, "But I don't know you." "That makes no difference," she declared. "You soon will." She was Miriam Haney, mother of Paul Haney who would become later a Hand of the Cause of God. How true was her statement! Through correspondence and occasional meetings, we became close friends. It was through her encouragement that I was able to write numerous articles for {Star of the West}, and, later the {Bahá'í Magazine} which she co-edited with Stanwood Cobb.

Back at the Hall the chairs were arranged for the Convention. A quartet of Black singers had been hired. Their rousing spirituals brought the hundred or so delegates and friends to their seats. Montfort Mills, who had been recently with the Guardian, opened the meeting. The roll of delegates was called and their alternates acknowledged. In those days of long train journeys from opposite sides of the country, alternates were accepted.

Today, there are more than one hundred National Assemblies in the World. In 1925 the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States and Canada was the eighth. The structure which now is called Bahá'í Administration was set up in accordance with the Guardian's plans for world growth of the Faith. We were there to see it happen.

Did our Geneva Bahá'ís grasp how historic was this occasion? Only dimly. I wrote down the words of the Guardian as spoken by Mr. Mills. {{p33}}

The message said:

"It is difficult to break with some of the customs and traditions of the past and familiarize the vast number of Bahá'ís, so diverse in their outlook and conceptions, with the necessary changes and requirements of this new phase of the history of the Cause."

The stir among the assembled Bahá'ís was in the womb of a promised New World Order. Across the world the beloved Guardian was saying, in effect, 'it is incumbent to live the life and spread the Teachings, but in this day, more is required; to step into the Formative Period of the Faith and become imbued with its spirit.'

In my state of immaturity I could imbibe only milk. I was quite incapable of digesting such solid food as our new Administrative Order. It was in my more sensory impressions of the spirit of that meeting that I found the nourishment to encourage my growth.

Mr. Howard MacNutt

The road that ran along the Green Acre property passed a dense grove called "The Pines". Among the tallest trees was one called "'Abdu'l-Bahá's Pine". Beneath it, in 1912, the Master had addressed a circle of early believers and had chanted prayers. To the Bahá'ís that spot was sacred, and ever since, the friends would slip away to this place to pray there.

It had been arranged. The group from Geneva was to meet with a very great Bahá'í, Howard MacNutt, who would talk about the deeper Teachings of the Faith. Mr. MacNutt had learned Persian and had translated some of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's {{p34}} American talks. He had assisted also in the early translation of Bahá'u'lláh's majestic {Kitáb-i-Íqán}. Mr. and Mrs. MacNutt had been believers since 1898. Well aware of our great privilege we sought the MacNutts in the pine grove.

For several afternoons we would meet at two o'clock and trail along the path through the pines to the giant tree. There we would find waiting for us, the white-haired MacNutts and their little dog. We would sit at their feet on a carpet of pine needles and open our hearts to Mr. MacNutt's words as he set forth the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: unity, love, God, the Holy Spirit. The sun would slant down through the branches, releasing the scent of the pines. Mr. MacNutt's face was radiant.

On our last afternoon, Howard MacNutt took out a manuscripted roll of prayers that he had translated while in 'Akká and in the presence of the Master. The passion and power in the prayers, seemingly beyond the power of those in our prayer books, was more like those in the Tablets 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed to the Persian Bahá'ís—more mystical and more poetic. With 'Abdu'l-Bahá's permission, Howard MacNutt could keep and use the prayers but could not publish them. It was our appreciated bounty to have him share them with us.

Our Geneva group was not entirely on the receiving line. News of our Practice in Speaking Class had been spread by the Ives. So, one morning, after one of the sessions, we found ourselves before a large gathering assembled on the veranda of Fellowship House. The four of us sat frozen in the front row while a very bland Louis Gregory, describing himself as a "deacon in the Baptist Church", introduced himself as chairman. He called upon us to present the arguments of the Faith as we would address them to orthodox Christians, {{p35}} scientists, agnostics, and anyone of the modern cults such as Christian Science or theosophy. After our talks we were to answer questions. Our knees were shaking. I remember how the rigid line of Rex Collison's jaw revealed his stress, and I can hear my own creaking voice. But our beautiful audience of star Bahá'ís were praying for us as we plunged into our talks. The question ' period was uproarious. Thunderous applause rewarded our efforts and our audience crowded around to embrace us. It had been an emotional experience for the practice speakers: first to be abjectly helpless, then to be raised up by unstinted praise. Not so hard to be a martyr after all!

Dr. Susan Moody

At one of the evening meetings Dr. Susan Moody spoke. She was seventy-five years old, a small, intensely vibrant personality who had returned after fifteen years of service in Tīhrán. Her pioneer work was in education and health for women and children and it lasted until the government closed the schools. Accompanying her was Lillian Kappes, her companion and co-worker since the early 1900's. I seem to remember Dr. Moody in a black-and-white checked dress.

One of her stories was so exciting that the passage of time has not erased it. She told us about a night in Tīhrán, the last night of the Moslem month of Ramaḍán, when an aroused mob, ignited with the wind-up of their fast, raged through the city attacking "foreigners". They came with flares and firearms, roaring down the road to the Bahá'í school. Dr. Moody and Lillian were just the kind of prey for which they were looking; two Bahá'ís, and American women at that. They decided to leave the building and to hide behind the bushes. With hearts beating fast they prayed the {Tablet of Aḥmad} for {{p36}} "one who is in affliction or grief". The mob approached the gate and the two ladies crouching in the dark reciting, "solve our difficulties... O God, remove our afflictions." The gang stopped at the gate and fell into violent argument. Distracted from their original intent, they turned away. The Bahá'ís and the school were saved by "the Merciful, the Compassionate".

On the last morning of Convention, after the last prayer, the hired Black singers stood up. They had been listening to Bahá'í talk all those mornings. Now the last word was theirs. With wide grins they sang most lustily, "The Old Time Religion Is Good Enough For Me". The Convention cheered and people trooped up to shake their hands and to thank them for their songs.

The Pilgrim House

The return of Grace Ober ended any desire to relax after the Green Acre experience. When Grace was around, there were few inactive Bahá'ís. As an instrument of Bahá'u'lláh, she aroused people to activity. She said, "What about the little house? If you have no other use for it, perhaps we could turn it into a Pilgrim House."

We unlocked the door and explored. The largest room was the big square kitchen, which had floor-to-ceiling cupboards. There was a sink with a pump and square-paned windows looked both east and west. Downstairs were an old fashioned sitting room and a small bedroom. Upstairs there were two more bedrooms with sloping gable walls.

Grace's enthusiasm was contagious and the Pilgrim House became the summer project of the Geneva Assembly. Our two technicians, Rex and Jim, following specifications from a Cornell bulletin, built a fireplace of native stone. After days {{p37}} of ardent labour, with everybody working and contributing, the sad little tenant house came into bloom: scrubbed, plastered, the walls tinted yellow, the woodwork creamy white. The bedroom walls were papered with bright rambling designs. The broad planks of the floors were painted blue and there were blue checked curtains at the windows. The house was nicely furnished too, with pieces of cast-off furniture. The deep pantry shelves were stacked with white and yellow dishes and shined-up pots and pans. From our house came forks and an old oil cook-stove named “Florence”. To the little garden on the east side Willard added dwarf fruit trees.

The Bahá’ís brought food for an opening supper party. By this time it was early fall, a little cool on that day, and a light rain was falling. We had a perfect opportunity to try the fireplace. The apple wood flared into a splendid draft and the fire warmed and lit the room.

We were told, in the midst of our preparations, that Dr. Heist was bringing Mr. Siegfried Schopflocher. He entered delightedly into our party and it was an amiable experience to meet him. Since part of the meal was on the cook-stove in our own kitchen and had to be brought to the Pilgrim House at the strategic moment, I found myself running back and forth in the rain. Our guest accompanied me and I was still calling him “Mr. Schloplacher”. He was calling to me, rather out of breath, “Call me Fled!”

“What did you say?”

“Call me Fled! Fled!”

That was the end of the “misters”, although we never did call him “Fred”. “Fred-die,” I think.

Several weeks later another guest arrived. Mother Beecher was to spend the winter with the Collisons. We found her to be a very endearing lady, eighty-five then, very neat and trim, `{{p38}}` alert and full of humour, authoritative and precise, very perceptive. She spoke clearly, enunciating her words with a precision that she had acquired by listening to and practising oratorical addresses on wax Victor records. We were not allowed to mumble, because she was hard of hearing and did not want to miss a single word. She exhorted us often. “Speak for the edification of all,” she would say. It is quite embedded in my consciousness. Mother Beecher—she was also the grandmother of Dorothy, the girl who had claimed me in Buffalo. Mother Beecher had grown up at Clifton Springs, about fifteen miles from Geneva.

Dedication of the Pilgrim House

November 26th, the Day of the Covenant. Twenty-four people made a double semicircle before the fire in our little meeting place and hostel, our renovated Pilgrim House. We had company from Newark, New York, Buffalo, and Rochester. All were making extemporaneous talks under Willard’s persuasive chairmanship. The meeting began and ended with prayers of dedication for the House that had been achieved by the unity of our efforts. Before we separated I brought out a new Guest Book bound in green leather and asked Mother Beecher to be the first to inscribe it. She wrote:

Thanksgiving Day, 1925

The opening and dedication of this Unity Home today will never be forgotten by those who participated in its festivities, both spiritual and material.

Being the Day of the Appointment of the Center of the Covenant, suitable exercises were observed for commemorating that very important event. {{p39}} Conferences and soul-stirring talks showed the results of deep research and understanding of the inner meanings of the Revelation.

This blessed gathering will no doubt prove to be an inspiration to this group and 'a preparation for their future work.

May this home, opened by the General Assembly, be an eternal blessing to all who enter its door. With deepest Bahá'í love Mother Beecher, aged 85 years.

1926

Another Bahá'í year. Naw-Rúz 1926. We went back to Buffalo to attend the Feast. Two carloads of us arrived at the banquet hall where long tables ran the width of the room. There were present a large gathering of Bahá'ís and invited "key people". I sat across the table from Dorothy. She and I had been chosen to give brief talks. I was representing the Geneva Assembly. I was going to be nervous. My hands were icy cold. How could I face this big-city knowledgeable crowd? A pot of tulips sat on the table and Dorothy's radiant face swam on the other. I called to her, "Dorothy, there are so many people here, how can I get up and speak? Help!"

She laughed as if it were at a delicious joke. "It is really so simple," she said. "Pretend that you are speaking to just one person • and you will never be nervous."

So I did. I spoke to one person—Dorothy. Her eyes were twinkling and she was smiling at me, sharing our foolish little joke—the joke that I could be scared! I did make a happy talk and the people applauded with loud cheers. I still remember Dorothy's advice when I need to. {{p40}}

Leonora Holsapple

The Macintosh apple orchard was beginning to show its pink and white bloom so I know it was in the month of May that Leonora Holsapple came. The enormous seringa bush on the lawn was fragrant and buzzing with bees. Leonora was spending a day with us and we were camping on a Mexican serape spread out on the grass. Leonora had been a classmate of Willard's sister, Marguerite, at Cornell University. She was home now, on a visit from her pioneer post in Bahia, Brazil.

She laughed, "Do you remember, Marguerite, how tongue-tied I used to be? I couldn't raise my voice to speak in class, not even to read aloud!"

“Yes, I do remember,” recalled Marguerite. “It was a real affliction, wasn’t it?” They talked over old times. Both had had scholarships, both had been bookish and shy, and this had helped to make them friends. Now, through separate channels, they were Bahá’ís. What a difference it made in the basis of their friendship!

We begged this new Leonora to tell us about her decision to pioneer in South America.

”I was at the Convention in New York City when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s {Tablets of the Divine Plan} summoning ‘the armies of God,’ were revealed. Here are some of His words that stirred us to such a pitch of excitement. I know them by heart:

“Each one is holding in his hand a trumpet, blowing a breath of life into all regions... Any soul from among the believers of God who attains to this station, will become known as the Apostle of Bahá’u’lláh.”[^]

Leonora paused, searched our faces, then continued. ”I felt the call to go, but there was every reason why I should not have. It happened to me in this way:

“I had a dream of a comet flashing across the sky with a tail that swept over the whole world. The tail was made of sparks. And now I was a spark rushing with the wind in the wake of the comet. I •knew then that I would offer to go to Bahia at the southern tip of Brazil. The language was Portuguese but I would apply myself and learn it. I chose Brazil, remembering ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s words that the christening of the city ‘Bahia’ was through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.”

“What happened after you arrived?” we asked.

“I gave English lessons but this was not enough so I took my savings and bought a house. I take in roomers and give meals. Finally, since I could find no one to listen to the Bahá’í message I adopted nine orphan girls. When I take in washing and ironing, the girls help me with the work and we make a living. We have a happy household. The girls are taking care of things while I am gone. There are enough of them to make a Spiritual Assembly when they become a little older. They are only teenagers now.”

Leonora was our age, still in her early thirties; a woman no longer retiring, but competent and strong.

Convention in Montreal, 1927

The third Convention of the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States and Canada was held in Montreal during the winter of 1927. Willard went as a delegate. He must have come back on a night train because I remember hearing the rattle of the ‘tin Lizzy’ and the dog’s joyous barking as Marguerite and I were having breakfast. Soon he was standing in the kitchen doorway, tall, slim and ruddy wearing his old {{p42}} overcoat and without a hat. His excitement was as full of oxygen as the air outside. We settled him with coffee and pancakes and then we asked him, “How about the Convention?”

Willard reported that Montford Mills had been a wonderful chairman—“An iron hand in a velvet glove”, courteous in his handling of the sometimes bewildered delegates who had wakened to find the Cause in a transition state, different from the old days of “the Bahá’í Temple Unity”. They were now to share in building the foundations of a new administrative world order on which would be built later, the institution of the Universal House of Justice. The clear vision of this overwhelmingly solemn trust was brought to this early Convention by Montford Mills, who had been in consultation with Shoghi Effendi.

That Convention elation—how well I was to know it in the years that followed! It was a world outside time, a world that Willard was trying to share with us. He spoke of a friendship he had made with Mrs. Hebe Struven, sister of the early teacher Lua Gettsinger. Hebe herself had visited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the prison city of ‘Akká—had been smuggled in under a load of vegetables!

Hebe had accepted the mission of inspiring Willard, the young Bahá’í, and how well she succeeded! They talked at great lengths about living the Bahá’í life and, as they talked, they drove in a hired carriage up Mount Royal. It was a deepening experience, and one that changed the accent of Willard’s life, and of mine, for always.

The theme of it all was universal love. “We are not required to love everybody personally,” Hebe had explained, “but we must love everybody universally, for the sake of God.” {{p43}}

She said that it was asked during ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s stay in New York, why everyone came out from His presence with a shining face. He explained that it was because He had seen in each one the Face of His Father.

“He saw the beauty of the soul in every person. The people responded and became. uplifted. The Bahá’ís need that transforming love,” said Hebe, “and we must give it to one another. It is the Holy Spirit, as in the days of Christ Bahá’u’lláh has placed His attributes in every soul. We will seek Him in these souls, if we are seeking God.”

“Willard,” cried Hebe, “while you are here at Convention, look for someone who needs it. Then try it.”

Willard knew who that would be. It was George. George was a man of classic beauty with a high patrician nose. His large grey eyes looked out contemptuously, so it seemed, from half-opened lids. His face was impassive. He looked bored and lonesome, especially with the group of delegates. When he joined them, the talking fell away. Said Hebe, “What most of the friends do not realize is that being made to go to war had immobilized his face. He had been shell-shocked.”

So, while asking inwardly for help, Willard joined George at lunch. The eyes opened for a moment and looked searchingly into Willard's. As the two talked, a lively mind and a devoted Bahá'í heart revealed themselves.

If Willard had held back, through indifference, from his experiment in "Universal Love", the rewarding personal relationship we both had with George Spendlove, honoured and beloved teacher of the early Toronto Bahá'ís, would never have developed. {{p44}}

Green Acre Revisited

That summer Marguerite and I drove to Green Acre. We were to stay with Ella Robarts in her cottage near the Inn. One day while we were relaxing on a rug on the grass, our peace was shattered by the arrival of a shaky elderly lady . from Boston. She disappeared into the house, scolding Ella in a loud complaining voice. "You did not tell me that you had invited others to stay here. You know I am too nervous to stay with people. You knew I would be upset."

Marguerite and I exchanged knowing glances. This lady needed "universal love"! So, when we met her to be introduced, we proceeded to "love her for the sake of God". Like magic, this poor lady became lovable, her nerves relaxed and, before long, her spirits were exhilarated. By bedtime, we were all out in the kitchen eating Ella's food and our dear little old lady was showing us how high she could kick!

For this I thank Hebe for first pointing out the potency of "The Elixir of Love."

At that time two or three morning classes were held at Green Acre. One in Fellowship House, another on the inn's veranda and, perhaps, another under "The Pines". In the evenings there would be talks or reports from teachers or returned pilgrims.

We gathered one evening to hear Mrs. Elizabeth Greenleaf, a much-loved teacher, tell us about her trip to Haifa and especially her meeting with Shoghi Effendi. Not many had visited the Holy Land then, and we were eager to know more of the Guardian.

Elizabeth, tall and stately, a person of presence and beautifully poised, began her talk in this way:

"I felt like an ELEPHANT when I met the Guardian!" {{p45}}

After we had stopped laughing, she explained that it was his perfect equilibrium, the balance of his qualities—rational, spiritual, and practical, that had produced in him such grace and harmony of being. Were we, the lopsided Bahá'ís with too much or too little of the needed qualities, his co-workers?

Jináb-i-Faḍil

We were told that he had been persecuted in Persia by being forced to ride backward on a donkey followed by a jeering mob. This was but a detail of what had happened to this dignified man and renowned scholar, Jináb-i-Faḍil. I can see him now as he sat on a platform waiting to address us. His head was bowed and he was slipping through his fingers prayer beads made of rose petals. He seemed to be in a state of abstraction. Then he rose and began to speak in fiery Persian. His wife, who sat beside him, was asked to chant a prayer. Looking like a shadow, emaciated and pale and covered with a black garment, suddenly she enveloped us in a stream of passionate prayer that left the room vibrating.

We were stunned by the forces emanating from these people from whom the self had been burned away. Examples of abject self-effacement until arising to speak, they resigned themselves to a power that shook them. The Persian husband and wife were remnants of an earlier and darker Persian era of the Faith.

The magical influence of Green Acre was around us that week—a deepening in the Faith, friendships, a picnic on Mt. Salvat. Sometimes we would slip away to the beaches, take walks along the shore of the Piscataqua River, or visit The Pines. We would never again see Mr. and Mrs. MacNutt {{p46}} under ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s pine. While engaged in interracial teaching in Miami, both had been run down and killed.

Several of the friends owned cottages along the road. Names that I remember are Roushan Wilkinson, the Thompson sisters, Julia Culver and Marion Jack.

Marion Jack

In those days, “Jackie” was just another pleasant person. I never heard her talk about herself, except on the day when we were invited to her cottage for tea. She told us about her stay in Haifa and showed us some of the paintings that she had brought back. Actually there were too many to show in her small house, so some were propped up around the walk outside. They were in oils, faithful to the buildings and the landscape. We looked eagerly at all the colours, knowing that they were like the colours there. Over tea Jackie’s words embellished the beloved scenes to which her paintings had transported us.

At that time it would have been irrelevant to ask about Marion Jack’s story. If we had asked the Thompson sisters, Julia Culver, May Maxwell, or Mason Remey, we would have been told that she was born in the Canadian Maritimes—Saint John, New Brunswick, and that this laughing vigorous person we were meeting was, in fact, seventy-two years old! Her story would place her in ‘Akká, teaching ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s grandchildren in 1908, and later, travelling and teaching in foreign lands until she returned to North America in 1914. In 1919, in response to the Divine Plan, she went to the Yukon.

After another summer Jackie would say a final farewell to her Green Acre cottage for she would be spending the rest of her life in Bulgaria behind the Iron Curtain, as, much later, it was to be called. When she died in her nineties, Shoghi Effendi was to call her “an immortal heroine” and “a shining example to pioneers of present and future generations”.

But, on this day our emblem of steadfastness seemed so ordinary. There seemed to be so little to remark about her appearance.

We returned to Geneva where Howard and Mabel joined us for a few weeks that summer, accepting the hospitality of our Pilgrim House. In the fall their business took them to Ithaca and we kept in close contact with them. They would return for weekends sometimes bringing with them Genevieve Coy and Amy Dwelly, then graduate students at Cornell. Genevieve and Amy would later become Bahá'ís of brilliant service. Through another Bahá'í, Forsythe Ward, the Ives were introduced to the Cornell Cosmopolitan Club of which Willard was a former member and, together they invited us to a banquet at the Club. Willard and I were delighted to accept.

I was intrigued by the variety and brilliance of the members who represented the cream of their Indian, African, Oriental and South American cultures. Their faces were a garden of hues. Beaming paternally, Howard brought us to Chun Chuan Cheng whom he introduced as someone we would meet again. I mentioned an Indian poetess, Madame Naidu, to my partner at dinner and asked him to recite one of her poems.

“Certainly;” he agreed courteously and began to chant in a resounding voice a poem that seemed never to end. The conversation at the long table fell silent. A little flushed when he finished, I murmured “Thank You!” I was the insular and ignorant one. No one else in that glorious gathering of foreign and American students saw anything remarkable in the interruption. {{p48}}

Later, Forsythe Ward took us on a tour of the Club's quarters, even up to the dorms at the top of the building. He turned on the light. To our surprise a large bare foot stuck out of the rumpbled sheets on one of the beds and a startled head looked up from the pillow.

“I forgot,” whispered Forsythe, “that he was sleeping here.” He turned off the light and we retreated, laughing. The owner of the foot was not the only one startled. We all were!

That winter the members of the Practice In Speaking Class arranged, with the permission of the local Spiritual Assembly, to hold six advertised meetings in a hall which we rented for two dollars a night. We were fortunate in our publicity because the {Geneva Times} gave us a column each week to review our talks. It was too bad that fear kept most enquirers away.

But not so Leslie and Ruth, a young couple who had recently arrived in town and were very lonesome and bored. They came to one of our meetings, listened attentively and, when we adjourned, came with us to a fireside at the farm. We found that we had interests in common. Leslie Hawthorne was a friend of Forsythe Ward and when I related the story of my Cosmopolitan Club banquet and tour and the disturbed foot, Leslie exclaimed, "That was my foot!"

Leslie and Ruth soon became treasured friends. They attended all our meetings and gatherings throughout the fall and winter, and in the spring of 1928, they stood up and announced to an assembled roomful that they wished to become Bahá'ís. The year 1928 proved to be significant for Leslie. He graduated from university, married Ruth, became an American citizen (he was from Great Britain), and joined the Bahá'í Faith. The Hawthornes' lives continued to be eventful and full of distinguished service. They moved in a few {p49} years to Texas where they attracted a group of Mexican and American believers. Then followed some years in Utah, for Bahá'í work with the Mormons. Leslie became a specialist in his own field of agriculture, and Ruth found her degree in Home Economics valuable in her approach to the wives. In 1962 the Hawthornes pioneered to Uganda.

"I shot an arrow into the air, it fell to earth, I know not where..." , wrote Longfellow. From Geneva, New York, to Uganda! We were to learn by repeated experience over the years that Divine Guidance directs the flight of those arrows.

The Tests and Visions of Agnes Parsons

Our Dr. Albert Heist had been gaining fame since he became a Bahá'í. He seemed to have an uncanny ability to diagnose and heal. He was an osteopath, although other degrees hung on his office walls. A number of Bahá'ís from away came to stay for a while in Geneva and to take treatment from him. In January 1928 Mrs. Agnes Parsons came from Washington, D.C., to benefit from his recently acquired equipment for recuperative exercises. This would be, also, our opportunity to know a particularly rare and special servant of Bahá'u'lláh. Mrs. Parsons was the wife of a United States Senator when she first heard of the Bahá'í Faith in 1908. One afternoon, over a cup of tea, we begged her to tell us the story of "How did you become a Bahá'í?"

She opened her book at the beginning, telling us the story of her meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá and how it had changed her life. Her pilgrimage in 1910 had been prompted by a blend of curiosity and hope. Her meetings with Lua Gettsinger had aroused in her a longing for the ideal. She had not yet met 'Abdu'l-Bahá and could not accept the fact that anyone of His description could be "real". She determined that she must see {p50} Him with her own eyes and that she would judge the Faith by what she found in Him. Agnes Parsons had a perception that the Faith would set upside down her engrained values. She fortified herself for the meeting. She would challenge the claims of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and then decide.

She went to 'Akká and was annoyed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá kept her waiting for what seemed like an age. When finally summoned, she entered His presence in that mood. He looked at her. The first thing she knew He was courteously raising her to her feet. She had fallen flat on the floor. Why had she been overcome? Because a blinding ray of light had passed from His eyes into hers.

This meeting, notwithstanding, Mrs. Parsons was still doubtful. The next morning she visited the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh and asked for a sign. She said that not a breeze was blowing but, when she asked for her sign, the flowers at the entrance of the tomb blew vigorously back and forth as if in a gale, and a little bird flew into the bosom of her dress and nestled there for a moment. She accepted this as Bahá'u'lláh's answer.

Neither she nor we understood the meaning of the third supernatural sign. We knew that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was called by Bahá'u'lláh "the Mystery of God", and that He was a moonlike reflection of the identity of Bahá'u'lláh who was the return of the Spirit which Himself, had spoken before through Jesus. The early believers, some of them, thought that 'Abdu'l-Bahá, too, was a Manifestation, until Shoghi Effendi's writings dispelled this fallacy. However, when Mrs. Parsons said "Are you Christ?", the form of 'Abdu'l-Bahá disappeared into a cylinder of light that looked and cracked like the trunk of a tree on fire. The vision passed. There was no verbal answer. {{p51}} p>

She reported that her acceptance of the Cause was now whole-hearted and complete. She returned to Washington, D.C., and became an active member of the Bahá'í community there, teaching the Faith and opening up her home to the believers. She was to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá again, two years later when He visited North America. In anticipation of His coming, she built a new house. For eight days, April 20 to April 28, the Master and his interpreter accepted her hospitality, although His usual policy was to maintain separate quarters in a hotel or rented house. Her beautiful new home, besides affording a base for His activities, provided the setting for meetings with many of Washington's elite. Adding drama to the situation was the fact that, in Washington, as in the deep South, there existed two worlds—one White and the other Black. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's theme throughout His stay with the Parsons was, with an emphasis on the elimination of prejudice, the Oneness of Humanity. Unity of Race was His challenge to that city.

Notwithstanding the encouragement to make use of first names, we younger Bahá'ís called Agnes Parsons "Mrs. Parsons". We would never address her by her first name for she was a lady of inherited dignity, "to the manner born". With us Mrs. Parsons was never familiar, certainly not demonstrative, yet we knew that this reserved and gracious lady sought for and maintained a humble relationship.

On another winter's night we sat around the dinner table at the farmhouse: Willard's mother in her wheelchair, Marguerite, Mrs. Parsons, and Louis Gregory. The atmosphere was genial, almost intimate. Willard and I were again on our subject of personal and universal love. We asked Mrs. Parsons and Louis which they preferred. To our surprise Mrs. Parsons said rather quickly, "personal," but Louis replied, "universal, it's safer!" Their choices revealed to us the searching heart of {{p52}} Mrs. Parsons, whom we had thought to be unapproachable and, for all his geniality, the disciplined detachment of Louis.

In that rare moment of closeness was Louis recalling the first time he had dined with Mrs. Parsons? During ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s stay in Washington a formal luncheon was arranged to which a select group of “important” people were invited to meet Him. The Master and Louis were conversing in another room when His host, the Senator, came to summon Him to the dining room and the waiting guests. The table was laid beautifully with its silver and china, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá pushed some of the dishes aside and requested that beside His own, a place be set for Louis.

Our supper that night at the farm ended in a burst of laughter. Willard suddenly called out, “DOWN GREGORY!”

“I beg your pardon,” responded the surprised Louis.

“Oh, excuse me,” exclaimed Willard. “The cat was clawing my pant leg.” From under the table ambled a big, jet black cat with the markings of a formal white tie under his chin. “He is named Gregory,” disclosed Willard, “after you.”

On another afternoon, Mrs. Parsons related, “For nearly three weeks the Master stayed at the Inn in Dublin, New Hampshire. I invited a large dinner party, wondering what my friends would think of a person so different from themselves.” It was then that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá produced for his concerned hostess, the second of His dinner-table tests. The cultivated representatives of the political, artistic, scientific, and philanthropic circles waited courteously for the guest of honour to begin His meal, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá commenced to eat with His fingers!”

“But oh, with such delicacy and grace,” she noted. The people were fascinated. Then the Master told a funny story. Everyone was relieved because they had expected a formal lecture. They told funny stories in turn and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told them, “Good to laugh!”

“He told them about His life in prison,” she added. “A captive most of His life, sometimes with a sword suspended above His head. Still, He and His fellow prisoners had been able to laugh. Joy, He said, was not the result of material comfort or wealth.”

Elizabeth Greenleafs Ham and Eggs

Elizabeth Greenleafs stay at Geneva must have overlapped Mrs. Parsons’, for her entry in my guestbook is dated February 6th.

“His loving care and kindness surge even as the eternal billows of the sea, and His blessings are continually showered from His eternal kingdom.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

At the time of her visit, those blessings had showered down on Elizabeth for over thirty years. She had been a channel to the hearts of many. It seemed as if particles of light irradiated her physical atoms. She was sparkingly radiant.

It was on this visit that she told us the story of the white ram. In a dream a powerful white ram was destructively butting and dispersing people. He seemed to have the face of Dr. Ibrahim Khayru'lláh, a declared follower of Bahá'u'lláh. Dr. Khayru'lláh had been teaching the Faith for many years and had gone with the first party of pilgrims to the Holy Land to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Charles Greenleaf urged his wife to forget the dream, but the impression lingered. When Dr. Khayru'lláh returned from his pilgrimage it became evident that he had brought with him strange teachings. Disappointed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had rejected his vain-glorious plan to {{p54}} become the guide and administrator of the Cause in the West, Khayru'lláh became a covenant-breaker and allied himself with the enemies of the Faith. The ram had separated the sheep from the goats. The core of confirmed early American believers, such as Thornton Chase and the Greenleafs and many others before my time, became even more united and dedicated. The Cause grew and the violators were ineffective.

One day Elizabeth said, "Some of the friends were so in awe of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in those early days after His arrival in New York that they hid from Him."

"I can understand that," I admitted. "I, too, might have done that."

"Well, that is what I did," said Elizabeth. "After longing for more than fifteen years to meet Him, I could not bear to make myself known to Him. Until one day Grace Ober, tired of arguing with me, opened the door of His audience room, pushed me inside, and shut the door."

There was to be no escape. The Master motioned her to take a seat and continued conversing with His guests. She sat there, red-faced and head bowed, really quaking. Then, at the apex of her embarrassment, 'Abdu'l-Bahá did a strange thing. He came over to her seat and, in English, whispered in her ear, "ham and eggs".

"This was a secret joke between me and Charles. If either of us got upset, the other would say 'ham and eggs' and the trouble would end in a laugh. Nobody else in the world knew this, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá did! So I laughed with Him and my fear vanished forever." {{p55}}

Keith Ransom-Kehler

On March 4th, 1928 Keith Ransom-Kehler came for an unexpected flash of a visit—just an overnighter. We were electrified instantly by her personality. She was the privileged kind of person who becomes the centre of any group, merely by being there. She was tall and straight, intense, with wideopen brown eyes and white hair wrapped like a turban around her head. I remember her in a dress printed with large white daisies on a brown background. This may be a trick of my imagination because Keith, herself, was such a "daisy". Add to that, she was a "looker" and a firebrand, too!

We were ready at sundown to break our third day of the Fast. Rúhí Afán was there and, I think, Louis and some young people. Keith, to amuse us, began talking about horoscopes and we sat around for an hour after we had eaten telling our birthdates and laughing at Keith's remarks about us. One completely uninhibited person spreads the pleasant infection; we were so relaxed in Keith's company. She asked for another glass of water to take some medicine, whispering to me as if confiding a private joke, "The doctor says I have Bright's Disease, you know."

She left the next morning but not before I had brought her my guestbook. "Write your favourite quotation, Keith," I asked. This is what she wrote:

"O our God! Lead us to the ocean of Thy graciousness and immerse us in Thy Name, that our thought may not grieve us and whatever happens to us in Thy Cause may not afflict us."

The words were tragically appropriate. They were a portent of what was to come to Keith in the Path of God. Within only four years, Keith, beautiful in face and form, poetic in her {{p56}} written word and eloquent of speech, died in Persia after a long exhausting mission. Like Ṭáhirih, she was proclaimed a martyr, the first from the Western world.

This was our fourth spring in the Cause. My opportunity had been providential in that my daytime care of the invalid in the house kept me at home except when Marguerite or Christine spelled me. This meant that there were many hours of quiet daytime calm in which to study the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. There was not then the wealth of reading material that we have today. I read, reread, and meditated on the creative Word found in the few books available. I was beginning to use the Bahá'í Writings as the criteria with which to measure the truths claimed by popular science and other sources. I reviewed my study of Christian mysticism, really searched the Bible, and, for the first time in my life, dipped into the Qur'án. Our neighbours, too, the Collisons, were absorbed in the Writings. All of us were. It was a fertile period of assimilation and growth of great value when appreciated in our later Bahá'í lives, when activities claimed more of our time.

A week after Keith's brief visit mother Edith McKay's illness reached a climax and within days, she ascended to the Abhá Kingdom. The last weeks of her life gave us further insight into the mysterious forces of prayer.

Aside from the stress of advanced arthritis, six weeks ago she had seemed well. Then one day she had with Grace Ober, a talk about a concentrated prayer effort to bring relief from an immobility which she found unbearable. She agreed to accept God's answer to the prayers—should it be either "yes" or "no". For the first time in her illness she gave up her will to God. Every morning at eight-thirty, Willard, Marguerite, {{p57}} and I met beside her bed to say the Greatest Name and the prayers for her healing. From the day we began, Edith McKay began her departure from this world. Her decline was obvious and swift. Her high colour faded and her bodily functions weakened. At her own insistence, we continued the daily prayers beside her bed.

The end came while Rúhí Afán was with us. In our house he served us selflessly. He was, at that time, the Guardian's representative to the North American believers and his future defection would have been then, unbelievable. The week wore on until, as if from a dream of the unreality of this life, Edith McKay's soul took flight from its outworn body. A benediction, marvelled at by neighbours and friends, descended upon the house. A Unitarian minister and friend of the family had come from Ohio, and he and Howard Ives shared the service. Afterwards it was as if we held a reception, very joyous. We passed around cakes and sandwiches, and her old-time friends lingered by the fire. It was early March and the family was still keeping the Fast.

I was free now to travel. April saw me taking a night train for Chicago on the way to Wilmette as a delegate to the 1928 National Convention. I spent the first day in Chicago riding around on the tops of buses in the bright spring air. I wanted to see the city too, to prepare myself for the event ahead. I had not changed much. I felt as I had on my visit to the 1925 Convention, dreading somewhat the spiritual impact of the intense emotional atmosphere I would find there and yet, impatient in my desire to be present. In the evening I checked into the Evanston Hotel and met my roommate, Katherine Cole, from Cleveland. The next morning, with a group of friends, I rode to Wilmette. {{p58}}

There it stood, a vast circular construction less than one storey above the ground, its walls covered with a dark grey paint or plaster. A path led to a single recessed door. A line of joyous spring-clad people were strolling up the path and entering.

Inside was a wide main corridor with small adjoining rooms and welcoming double doors entering upon a large nine-sided audience chamber known as Foundation Hall. Like the progress of the soul, we had come in by the straight and narrow path and entered into glory. The impression was of many lights, walls hung with fabulous Persian carpets, tables laden with flowers and ferns, and a semicircle of folding armchairs placed around the focal point of the Convention business to come. The delegates and friends revolved around the centre of the hall like electrons around a nucleus, sometimes adhering to one another as if drawn together by magnetic forces of mutual attraction. I stayed close to my new friend, Katherine Cole, whom I would treasure over the years ahead.

Lovely singing called us to attention and we took our seats. There were prayers and opening remarks and then the Convention was underway. Horace Holley read from the correspondence of the Guardian which called us to take an urgent and unified step forward into new and ordered growth. As in the three previous Conventions, there flowed two streams representing two ages of this World Faith: the old "Heroic" age and the new "Formative" age. The Guardian was calling upon us to become one wide river. There were still two currents because some of the staunchest believers did not understand, as yet, the requirements of this new phase in the growth of the Cause. It seemed as if only a few were poignantly aware of the drama taking place at the World Centre in Haifa where the young Guardian was given the {{p59}} guidance to formulate with a master hand, the plans for the future growth of the Cause. Shoghi Effendi was in the extremity of an ordeal and it was out of his grief, pain, and exhaustion that the flawless structure of the new World Faith was being outlined and its foundations laid.

Only a few seemed, as I recall, to be fully involved. The delegates were engrossed with their local assemblies and intent on making reports. They moved around in a rosy haze enjoying the reunion with their friends. Like myself, they listened to Horace Holley, Montfort Mills, or May Maxwell, all of whom were in close touch with the Guardian. Everyone took down a few obedient notes for the people back home.

Katherine and I were invited to dinner parties every night. They were given by older and more affluent Bahá'ís, I think, to foster a spirit of love and unity. After dinner, usually at the Evanston Hotel, we would go back to the Hall for an evening program. When we retired again to the Hotel, we visited one another in our rooms or said prayers. The main purpose of the delegation had been accomplished on Saturday afternoon. We had elected, by secret ballot, a new National Spiritual Assembly.

I was tired when I left Geneva and now I was in a physical condition that I recognized as “light” tired, a floaty feeling with a weak heartbeat. On the train home I went to sleep in my berth. I was awakened by someone twitching at my pillow. It was a very big and Black porter.

“Thought you might like to wake up, Missus, and look at Niagara Falls. We will be here fifteen minutes while taking on water at the Suspension Bridge.”

I groaned, “If you had asked me, I would have told you that for two years, I taught school in Niagara Falls. We even used to come out to this very place for picnics.” {{p60}}

My too-kind porter thought this was a most delicious joke. He told everybody in the coach. “I woke her up and she used to live here!” Laughter rippled in his wake. I did get up, however, went out on the platform and saluted the dear old Falls at sunrise.

At home, Willard and Dr. Heist were determined that I needed a rest. I made my Convention report to the community and then arranged to visit Hornby for a few days. I wrote:

”I am on the Lehigh Valley train headed for Beaver Dam, New York. The little train runs along the east side of Seneca Lake.

”As I peer out of the window I see the mist rising over the river which is lavender with a shine like silk.

”What memories I have of this little railway! I came this way to Rochester at the age of 10 to be a city child; I rode this train to Geneva to teach, then to meet Willard. One morning my mother and I took my father back to Lindley to be buried. We had taken this train and at this time of year only five years ago.

“Before we were married, Willard and I spent a day hunting trailing arbutus in Beaver Dam... Now I am going ‘into retreat’ with my mother’s old friends five miles from the station... Straight up, behind a horse and in an open wagon.”

Will and Clare Underwood welcomed me back to the small unpainted house that their pioneer ancestors had built a century ago. After a pancake breakfast, I went out, as in my girlhood days, to range the woods and fields. It was still April and the wind was chilly, but the earliest wild flowers were budded. {{p61}}

The Convention uplift rose again. I had with me the small black prayer book and, as I was memorizing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s {Tablet of Visitation}, I rambled. I was in a special sacred spot with oak trees grouped on a sheltered southern slope. Dead leaves were heaped in a natural depression in the ground. In that nest of leaves, I prayed, “‘Abdu’l-Bahá, it is my desire to serve Thy Cause.”

In the prayer book, now out of print, there was another prayer. It began “He is the Listener and the Answerer!” I was aware that He listened at that moment.

I had been restored by my stay at Hornby and returned home. I engaged my cleaning lady, Mrs. Moses, to clean the house and the Pilgrim House. I helped to plan the garden and I waited to see what form the answer to my prayer would take.

I was not surprised when a letter from the National Spiritual Assembly arrived and, with it, a package of blue paper that pleased me very much. It was National Teaching Committee stationery with a letterhead that filled two or three inches. At the top of the letterhead was the symbol of the Greatest Name, and on the left, the names of the nine members of the Teaching Committee. On the right were the names of a newly established Outline Bureau: Reginald Collison, chairman; Doris McKay, secretary; and Marion Little. Marion was from New York City and her duties were consultative.

The letter from Horace Holley suggested that we prepare outlines on the subjects of Christianity, Science, and Bahá’í social teachings with compiled references from all the available Bahá’í books. We were encouraged to get help from other believers and Willard, Marguerite and Mary Collison became “associate members”. A date was set for us to {{p62}} present and to discuss our plans with a quorum of the National Teaching Committee. We would leave to meet with them soon after the weekend of our Blossom Picnic in May.

The apple and cherry trees were raining perfumed snow when the guests from Rochester and Ithaca arrived for the Blossom Picnic. I had arranged a Saturday-night dinner for . eighteen. On that day I had undertaken to make six pies, now sitting on a shelf. I sat down with fatigue and cried a little. A few hours later I was back in the kitchen cutting up vegetables. Howard Ives was with me then, leaning his elbows on the table and talking sonorously about the mysteries of the Cause. My knife slipped and I cut my finger. With a rather absent-mind, I bandaged it. Observed Howard, “I have been watching you. My daughter, you have grown. Love in action is how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has described the Bahá’í life,” Howard reminded me once more.

‘Alí Kuli Khán

Dr. Khán once came to visit us. He gave a marvellous talk to two rooms packed with an eager audience. No one in Geneva had ever seen anyone as glamorous as Dr. Khán, who looked like the hero of one of Scheherazade’s tales. After breakfast the next morning I took our guest for a walk around the farm lanes. With Dr. Khán wearing spotless grey spats, we were mindful of our steps. He showed interest in everything, especially Old Joe, the gander who was approaching us, his funnel-shaped head low to the ground, his great wings flapping. Old Joe had no well-wishing intentions. “Excuse me, just a minute, Dr. Khán,” I implored. Before he could answer I took off through a bordering field. Joe, screaming and hissing, continued to follow me. I knew the proper technique {{p63}} and was not alarmed. I took a sharp turn to the right and Joe, borne by his own momentum, flew past me and into the next field.

Gregory, the black cat, had a brother—a striped tiger which answered to the name of “Little ‘Alí”. When Dr. Khán and I returned from our walk, Little ‘Alí was waiting at the house, his topaz eyes fixed on a tall evergreen tree. Soon ‘Alí was off, climbing to the very top. When I called, “Come down Little ‘Alí. Come down,” I explained to Dr. Khán that the cat had been named for him. “Khán” was positively delighted. When the cat ran up the tree again, our gentleman in grey spats boasted with appropriate gestures, “See what my namesake can do! VERY GOOD!”

Committee Work: New York, June 1928

Rex and I met with the Teaching Committee at one of the New York hotels. May Maxwell, Harlan Ober, Marion Little, and Rúhí Afnán were there. We listened to a review of the journeys taken by Bahá’í teachers throughout the country, and Rex reported on our plans for the Outline Bureau, which were accepted. The leading spirit was May Maxwell. She was, as I had seen her at the Convention—very keen, quick-thinking, informed, and exacting. Consecrated to the service of Shoghi Effendi, her efforts were intent and single-minded. Outside of a business meeting, May was a different person. But Rex and I had not met that person—not yet!

On the morning our business was completed, we went to see Rúhí Afnán off on the little merchant ship he was taking to Haifa. He wore a stiff dark suit and his face was grim. His return to the Holy Land was overdue; in fact, he had received a cable urging his return while he was at our house for a second visit. His mood at that time was rebellious and his {{p64}} retort was “No!” Now, he was returning obediently. In the bright sunshine at the wharf he passed out of sight like a cloud.

A little group of New York believers were there to wave farewell, among them Doris and Horace Holley. Horace was looking exhausted, actually ill.

We were not surprised to hear, a few days later, that Horace was coming to Geneva to be treated by Dr. Heist. That is how he and Doris came to stay at the McKay Farm from June 6th to June 25th.

The Holleys

Willard expanded in the companionship of the Holleys. In Horace he found a choice support for his “academic” mind which, most of the time, had to be kept in storage. Both men were knowledgeable, quick of wit and comeback. Horace was truly a genius with extraordinary gifts that could be released in a variety of meaningful and productive channels. He had written, when young, a beautiful book of poetry. He had been a newspaper man. He had compiled {The Bahá’í Scriptures}. Now his faculties were turned towards the Administration of the Faith and the enlightenment of the friends. He was indispensable in North America, in this evolutionary period, as a worker for the Guardian. Horace was unique, too. The amount of energy he ordinarily expended was fantastic. The work he did was superhuman. When asked about it, he referred to a “zone of energy” in which he sometimes operated—a more than normal strength that was available, sometimes, to him. At the time of his visit, however, he was run down. He was relaxed, but not idle, and he would soon wind up again. {{p65}}

It was the Word that bound us in love to both the Holleys. Horace told us how it was the Word that first convinced him. He had graduated from university and was bound for Europe, perhaps for a walking tour of the Black Forest of Germany, when someone gave him a copy of a book that contained the word of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He read the book while crossing the ocean, and knew that he was a Bahá’í.

Both Doris and Horace had a passion for the Word. One could tell by the way Doris read the Writings aloud, every syllable infused with meaning. To read it was her way of teaching. She loved to read aloud, and I loved to listen to her. After a day of working outdoors, Horace would sink into the nearest chair, reach for {The Bahá’í Scriptures} and disappear into the world of the Word.

One morning we sat long over the breakfast table on the veranda. It was sour cherry time at the farm and the orchards were vocal with Italian pickers. Willard’s job was to move truckloads of cherries to the cannery. The pickers moved in early, but it was not yet time to go to the truck so he was free to enjoy the relaxed and expansive conversation of our guests. That morning Horace told us of his meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the experience of “cosmic consciousness” that followed.

He noted that it had happened exactly sixteen years ago on this same day in June. The scene was a resort on the French Swiss border to which Horace had travelled to meet Him. A fragment of Horace’s own writing expresses his experience. He had seen a stately old man, robed in a cream-coloured gown. His white hair was shining in the sun.

“Without ever having visualized the Master I knew that this was He. My whole body underwent a shock. My heart leaped, my knees weakened, a thrill of acute, receptive feeling flowed {{p66}} from head to foot. I seemed to have turned into some sensitive sense-organ, as if eyes and ears were not enough for this sublime impression ... In every part of me I stood aware of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s presence... While my personality was flowing away, a new being, not my own, assumed its place. A glory, as it were, from the summits of human nature poured into me... In ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, I felt the awful presence of Bahá’u’lláh, and, as my thoughts returned to activity I realized that I had just drawn as near as any man may to pure spirit and perfect being. I entered into the Master’s presence and became a servant of a higher will for its own purposes.”[^]

The two weeks of Dr. Heist’s treatment and counsel, the outdoor life, rest and the frequent games that we played were a successful cure. The Holleys left us and Horace tapped again into his zone of energy.

Green Acre, 1928

Love, unity, prayer, sacrifice. These are strong words so imbued with meaning that they wield an inherent redemptive power. As I rode towards Green Acre with Rex and Mary Collison, my thoughts dwelt on the fact that somehow we were different people—different from the ones we had been when we drove over that road four years before. Our attitude in regard to these words had changed.

Our work on the reference outlines had brought us into hours of contact with the Writings. All of us had consulted on how best to fit the references together into a program of study. The magnificence of these studies had shown us a wisdom that gave us keys by which we could escape “the prison of self”. We were now much more receptive to what we might find in the atmosphere of Green Acre. Perhaps we {{p67}} might glimpse life from the perspective of the Supreme Horizon mentioned by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The Inn was full. The Collisons engaged a cottage and I was directed to a room in an accommodation on the road to the right of the one where Marion Jack’s cottage stood. Between the two roads stood the Pines, edged by fields.

Mornings, I would • take a detour through the Pines on the way to the Inn. It was a dream experience to walk through that hallowed spot while the dew was still on the spider webs. The birds, squirrels, and rabbits carried on their sylvan commotions.

One evening Dr. Glenn Shook, who lectured on Science and Religion, played the colour organ. I cannot explain its mechanism. All I know is what I heard and saw. The instrument looked like a small, modern, parlour organ but while Dr. Shook played it, colours danced across a large white screen. The music was classical: Bach, Handel, and Mozart. The colours on the screen were like northern lights, very brilliant and animated. They grouped and regrouped, frolicked and chased one another across the screen in obedience to the vibration of the music. The summer crowd was enchanted by it.

To conclude the evening, the moving pictures of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were shown. Seeing Him, I adored Him as I had never loved anyone before. The film was old and the camera so primitive that the movement was bouncy and overly-quick. And the people looked so improbable, the men with cutthroat collars, the women with flounces and birdcage hats! But nothing was absurd or incongruous. Because of the Master’s lilting presence, nothing but grace and beauty were there. I felt as if the screen were drawing me physically closer to Him. {{p68}}

I went back to my room alone, and I did a daring thing. I walked through the Pines in the dark of night. I became overawed, frightened and I began to run. My panic subsided as I came out onto the road which was white with moonlight. I slipped up to my room and wrote:

The Pines have seen Him, Have felt the reverberations of His stride; The ground has felt it through the carpet of pine needles And reached up, as to rain ...

I, who had not beheld Him Feared to see His picture flung across the screen, O faint of faith, to fear! Tumultuous I stood—at sight of Him— Too far! too far! that by the door I stood, I longed to press my cheek against that screen!

In the summer of 1928, Marguerite and I were told that Lorna Tasker, a poetess, was working in the tea-room. After tea, one day, we went into the kitchen and asked for her. Our poetess, who was a history teacher in Beverly, Massachusetts, was making teabags of loose tea and gauze. We had never before seen teabags. Lorna was a little younger than we. Her small, pale, face was illumined by eyes that truly were “windows of the soul”. Her accent was “down East,” bespeaking the honesty and integrity of the early-day pioneers who were, no doubt, her ancestors. At our request, Lorna read a few of her poems—beautifully. {{p69}}

I would look for her again, and when I found her, she was washing her white socks. I sat on the edge of the bathtub, watching the operation. As a surprise to us both, I began talking to her about the station of being an “Apostle of Bahá’u’lláh.” I remembered Leonora Holsapple’s visit and the words of Howard Ives. Howard had said, “To be an apostle is a state of mind.” “At least, we could try,” I said.

Lorna told me that she had picked up a book in George Spendlove’s gift shop. It was The Book of Certitude, the {Kitáb-i-Íqán}. She had learned of the Faith through George who was in charge of the shop that occupied the other half of the tearoom. Her eager reading of the Book gave her the “certitude” for which she had waited.

She said that the waitresses had teased George because of his British reverence for tea. From him they had learned to “take the pot to the kettle”, so that not one bubble of the essence would be lost. She could appreciate and enjoy such nuances of taste for she had been blessed with poetic sensibilities. My books would have called it “low threshold”. She was always only a step away from a plus-nearness spiritual realm of rapture induced by light, or the music of wind in the trees, incoming waves, or the whispered messages conveyed by touch.

Moved by the spirit of our meeting, I invited her to visit Emerald Hill, our name for the Geneva farm. She accepted and we set a date for the week of her school vacation in February.

We stopped to visit Hebe Struven in Worcester, Massachusetts and then continued on to Geneva, where we resumed the patterns of our lives. In the warm weather we took our outlines up to the top of Emerald Hill, where a row of Black Tartian cherry trees still retained some stray fruit. Soon we would use the stone oven that we had built there to {{p70}} roast the first ears of corn. The crops of string beans and corn checkered the fields; the acres of apples and pears, fenced in by arbour vitae or spruce hedges, were acquiring size and colour. The slope of the hill ran three miles to Seneca Lake.

For the promised corn-roast, the Hawthornes brought Ruth's brother, Chester and his wife, Sally. Sally stayed with us for a few days. She was a business-woman, manager of a belt factory; very modern, restless and high-g geared. We did not talk about the Faith but, for most of the night, we consulted concerning her problems. The next day she picked up {The Hidden Words} and asked, "What's this?"

I judged her and replied, "You wouldn't be interested, Sally." God forgive me.

Perhaps, after all, psychologically it was the perfect answer. When we returned from an errand in town we heard loud, very lively music on the Victrola. There sat Sally, listening to the music, furiously chewing gum, and reading {The Hidden Words}. She asked questions and that same day she accepted the Faith. Her home in Rochester, New York became a centre of Bahá'í activity. When I got to know her better, I learned that she lived by intuition; she knew, without being told, of events before they happened. Who had said, "We do not select the Bahá'ís, we find them"?

September brought Katherine Cole and her family from Cleveland, Chun Chaun Cheng and, later, J. Krishna Lall from the Cornell Cosmopolitan Club. One was a follower of Laotzu, the other of Krishna. Alas, that each was entombed in the Faith of his ancestors. Entombed and tied to the religions of remote pasts. The Founders of those ancient religions, had They appeared in our own age, would have revealed the Words of a universal religion and taught the oneness of mankind. {{p71}}

"There is no flavour to American food," complained Lall. So we challenged him to cook an Indian dinner. He picked a variety of vegetables, combined them with a paste of farina, and then emptied into the mixture all my curry and most of my other spices. We invited twenty-five people to meet Lall and to share his dinner. Certainly his food was not tasteless. There were full pitchers of water to cool our guests' tongues and Lall was happy. He sent me later a package of Indian curry to prove that mine was inferior.

Lall's prophet, Krishna, was alleged to have said in the {Bhagavad Gita}:

"...Whenever the world declineth in virtue, and vice and injustice mount the throne ...then, come I, the Lord, and mingle as a man with men. And by my influence and teachings do I destroy the evil and injustice and re-establish virtue and righteousness. Many times have I thus appeared, many times hereafter shall I come again."

The Gita was a gift from our next visitor, Mrs. Ruth Moffett. It was now October 1928, a year after Ruth's pilgrimage. Unlike most "pilgrim's notes," the Guardian had approved these taken during conversations with him. How eagerly we listened for the first time to a description of the three conditions of prayer: concentration, purity of intention, and, lastly, detachment from the outcome.[^]

[^] [Five years later Ruth Moffett published her detailed study of the dynamics of prayer, {Do'a on Wings of Prayer}. On pages 15-17 of the 1974 edition (Des Moines, Iowa: Wallace Homestead Co.) she describes the five steps of prayer dictated to her by the Guardian: 1. Pray and meditate about the question or problem, 2. Arrive at a decision and hold to it, 3. Have determination to carry the decision through, 4. Have faith and confidence that the "right thing will come to meet your need", and 5. Act as though it had all been answered.]

One of our earliest lessons had been, "prayer is conversation with God". Now, with the Guardian's notes for a new era of the Faith, we asked ourselves and Ruth, "Conversation about what?" The ultimate purpose of prayer was for the advancement of the Cause; it became a discipline, an obligation, a thrusting step in the direction of the Holy Spirit. Were {{p72}} we disciplined enough, pure enough, courageous enough, to pray for such an outcome?

Enter and Exit the Whites

Mrs. Ruth White and her husband, Leonard, appeared unexpectedly on the afternoon of Willard's birthday November 1st. I had made a cake and had prepared a celebration dinner when, suddenly, the Whites, whom we had never seen nor heard of, knocked on the door. Ruth White, later described by Shoghi Effendi as a poor deluded woman, seemed at that moment, the very opposite of "poor". They were Bahá'ís. They had been recently in Haifa. Could they come in?

Mrs. White was prepossessing. A kind of stalwart personality that wore black and white with a small chic hat. They were world travellers, full of information and convictions of being right. Leonard was more modest and attractive in his manner, more of a listener. We all listened while Ruth told us of a new term, "Administration," that soon all of us would be using. She described the Guardian, the World Centre and said that she had seen the original Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

With the meal over, Willard stood ready to cut his cake. The door banged open and our two large dogs burst into the room. They had had an encounter with a skunk and carried with them an odour both vile and overpowering. The dogs, frenzied and somewhat blind, charged through the house and, again, out the doors. We could think of only one remedy besides that of leaving open the outside doors. We had a box of incense in little pyramid capsules, but the smoke from these increased, rather than ameliorated, the problem of “airs”. The Whites’ conversation was never resumed. It was somewhat befitting to connect the foul smell that occurred {{p73}} with Ruth White’s determined efforts, soon afterwards, to discredit the Master’s Will. Her reason for doing this? A dream she had! A frightening example of the harm done by “vain imaginations”.

Toward the end of the month arrived another Bahá’í who would become, many years later, the victim of vain imaginations. On the 28th Mason Remey telephoned and later appeared at our door by station taxi. He was a magnificent looking man, proud and born by tradition to rule. He had written books, travelled, been a prominent architect. The Guardian had often called upon him for consultations. The need to be first would deceive this man one day and he would become the cause of grief to the Bahá’í world.

We had a peaceful evening in the bookroom, the candles burning low in their sconces above the hearth. We read prayers and listened to Mason’s stories of the Master. In the guest book, to commemorate the date of the Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, he wrote, “The seventh anniversary of the Great Sorrow”.

“I am a captive, rid me of my bondage.” The cry rises from a human spirit that has glimpsed the freedom of the spiritual world. The entrance into a new year in the Cause was a time when, again, all the Teachings seemed new and a golden thread linked the jewels of people and events, each, an unexpected gift that a more-than-human spirit had added to my life. With the new year, I counted and assessed those jewels: the night that Howard Ives had invoked the Unseen Power and gave us our first experience of a new spirit and a new Faith; the moment I first met Dorothy; that spring {{p74}} morning when I saw the two roads and made my choice; the night I saw the movie of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; my moment of rededication in the Hornby woods. And, yes, the intensity of my conversation with Lorna Tasker had the same dimension as those other moments—not essentially emotional, not rational, but indicative of a higher faculty that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called “the Spirit of Faith”.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that the first faith comes in drops and increases to a shower. I saw the stages of my faith as upsurges of understanding and commitment, drops borne by sudden winds, or, as steps in a succession of stairs. These moments had not been a reward, but a grace from the bounty of Abhá.

The Burning Log

It was during the week that Lorna spent with us that I had my first experience of making a “covenant” as a promise to God shared with another. The saying “out of this world” was true of this strangely anticipated time together. We had a week of Bahá’í meetings where both of us spoke. We enjoyed fine music and poetry and, on skis, climbed up the hill to shout the prayers of the Báb to the winter landscape below. Our talks revolved around the love of God, the Universal Love that Hebe had introduced to Willard, and the miraculous powers released by the unity of the believers. We prayed for ourselves and for others to experience “the unity in the love of God,” but still, the purpose of our week was, as yet, unfulfilled.

Silent and rather sad, we sat late one night by the embers of a dying fire. There was no electricity in the farmhouse, but we had the light of two blue candles set in my tall, brass, wedding candlesticks. We sat on the floor with a pile of books beside us. I turned to “The Unveiling of the Divine Plan” in {{p75}} the old Scriptures and read again the second condition in the {Tablet to the Apostles of Bahá’u’lláh}.

“O ye friends! Fellowship, fellowship! Love, love! Unity, unity! So that the power of the Bahá’í Cause may appear and become manifest in the world of existence.”[^]

With the reading of these words the purpose of this visit dawned on us. What our covenant would be. Both of us promised that we would look for people of capacity and invite them to the unity of the love of God. We would love people and pray that they would taste of that unity. Knowing ourselves, we knew this to be presumptuous, but we made a covenant with each other. Each uttered a simple pledge:

“I will try, Doris.”

While our two young souls sat scared by the solemnity of our vow, the embers of a burned-out log began to crackle. It began popping and showering sparks out into the room, sending up rings of grey smoke. This, it seemed, was a response. The unseen Presence was in the room then as was an overwhelming nearness to Love itself. “The Listener and the Answerer” had left us with a sign, our symbol of the burning log.

Lorna had been back at her desk at the Beverly High School only a day or two when Mabel Ives returned to Geneva. She announced, “An Interracial Amity Conference is to be held in Rochester on March 7th and I have been given the responsibility for finding a suitable meeting place, a White minister to share the platform with Louis Gregory, and of interviewing a list of prominent members of both races. {{p76}} All of these arrangements,” she sighed, “will take several days. And several days I do not have.”

Then came the shock. “Willard and Doris, you will be just the ones to do this for me, with Elizabeth Brooks to help.”

Thus Mabel pushed us out of the nest where we had been as fledglings who had never known flight. We protested, but . would never dream of refusing. We were beginning to see that with each covenant we make, with each rededication of our spirits, comes a new challenge. Sometimes the challenge is an opportunity and at other times, a test. It turned out that with this challenge to organize the Amity Conference, there were confirmations with us all the way.

Over the Colour Line

“Remember,” the Master’s voice within me seemed to say, “the first time you prayed, you wished to. cross this line. You are ready now, to cross the line with love.”

How clearly I recalled the miracle that had removed my prejudice in a single night when, armed with Howard Ives’ ‘prayer book, I had undertaken my first experiment with the power of prayer. I remembered also my girlhood days in Rochester and saw a continuity. When my family first moved to Rochester, from Lindley, New York, we lived on a city street that had an invisible line running through it—a colour line. People living on the east side of Caledonia Avenue were of one race, and those on the west, of another. Black, White. We averted our eyes from each other. An exchange of looks would have been considered an affront. The prejudices on each side of the line were leaden, like the walls of a casket. It was over the very line called “Caledonia” that the Bahá’ís were to move with their call to Interracial Amity. {{p77}}

Unlike myself, Willard was a born crusader against that social barrier. He was “lead resistant,” a neutrino of the spirit. His life pattern before becoming a Bahá’í had been affected by his stand for oneness. He lost his job at the University of Texas because of his outspoken friendship with people of all races. “One of the students in our dormitory at Cornell,” he had boasted, “was Black. He was my roommate.” The remark reached the Dean’s ears. Willard did not withdraw his stand. The family fruit farm had needed his help, so Willard became involved in its problems and gave up his university career.

“Too bad,” some would say. “Willard was a born teacher!” But Willard saw now that it was providence. He would say, “If I had not come back, I might not have become a Bahá’í and I would not have met you!”

On Thursday morning, February 28th, we took the interurban trolley to Rochester to help Mrs. Constance Rodman and Elizabeth Brooks draw up the plans for our campaign. We could not have done it without Elizabeth’s lists of leading people and contacts with the newspapers.

Elizabeth had accepted the Bahá'í Faith from the Ives a year before we did and was a confirmed and dedicated handmaid of Bahá'u'lláh. Her face is before me as if on a photographic slide in my brain. Round face and cheek bones like a yeoman of the guard, as indeed, she was. Straight, clipped iron grey hair, level brows over steady grey eyes, a wide mouth, ingenuous, wreathed always in smiles. She was extremely tall.

Elizabeth later devoted her life to the friends over the line. She rented a house in a poor section of town and supported herself by taking in roomers. We had found an "apostle" of Bahá'u'lláh. {{p78}}

If we had carried banners, they would have read: "Forgive Our Whiteness—Mankind id One—Join Us!" We visited churches, offices and homes. The people were guardedly polite, judging us with keen intuitive senses that necessity had developed. Praise God, they did not reject us. Perhaps they read the invisible banners we were carrying.

By March 2nd, our preparatory work was accomplished. We had travelled the city by day and spent the evenings praying in Mrs. Constance Rodman's little rented parlour. At night we slept thee behind a pale blue curtain.

We returned to Geneva and began the nineteen day Fast. I had come home with one nagging worry: I was to be chairman at this important meeting where I would introduce Louis Gregory and the young White clergyman, Mr. Sanford, assistant in the largest Presbyterian church in the city. The planning of my part seemed taken from me. To Lorna I wrote: "I am nearly sick with a cold. It was wet and slushy in Rochester and I had a sore throat..." I had to admit, however, that what I really had was "cold feet."

A supper party was planned for the night of the conference. Louis, Willard, and I had invited five of our Black friends to a popular downtown restaurant. Our friends did not relax at first. In 1929 this was a controversial, rather than customary, atmosphere. What a joyful experience to feel the difference melt into a true unity feast! A line from Walt Whitman comes to mind: "They came together to talk about the millennium, but their meeting together was the millennium." To the goggle-eyed astonishment of the supper crowds, we walked through streets and up an exclusive East Avenue to the place of our meeting, the Women's City Club.

From my place on the platform I watched the Hall fill to the doors. A triple line of chairs in an alcove facing the hall {{p79}} held the choir of the African Zion church, their director Mrs. Lee and their minister James Claire Taylor. Glorious voices opened the program with a Negro spiritual and I, as chairman, arose to address the hundred or so gathered.

Louis, eloquent and dignified, had spoken to organized Interracial meetings all over the country. The Rev. Mr. Sanford, young and idealistic, carried friendship to estranged and wounded hearts. The choir wound up the evening with the Negro National Anthem and the audience, two thirds of whom were Black, took up the song and sang the ringing triumphant words. When it was over, the tide rolled up to the platform and we were one race.

To Lorna I wrote:

“What a fool I have been these last two weeks to worry over the part I had to play. You must have been praying for me in my hour of need, for I felt a sublime happiness, love, assurance, and power. I cannot describe the ecstasy I felt all through.”

Willard and I spent the night with the Sanfords, met Louis and returned with him to Geneva. He would spend a few days with us before going to another conference in Buffalo.

The following night we left the farm. Louis and my mother washed supper dishes together, while the three McKays drove to a public meeting at the Hotel Syracuse where the Ives were to speak. My mother, her roots very much in the old world order, was a little afraid to be left in the house with Louis. “Is he safe?” she had asked. We assured her that he was very safe.

About sixty people gathered at the hotel and many questions were asked. One man became angry with Howard and, making violent remarks, stormed out of the room. Marguerite {{p80}} and I tended the literature table and Willard played the piano. It was two o'clock before we reached home again.

Louis and I spent the next afternoon cooking an enormous pilau. The meat in it was Joe, the gander. That ill-tempered bird had charged one car too many and, on this day, had been killed—head on. To cook the elderly goose, we borrowed a large pressure cooker from the New York State Experimental Station. It took some extra cooking to soften up Joe's resistance. In those days, more than now, pilau, with variations, was a favourite food and always a festive dish. Louis was an experienced pilau cook and, together, we accomplished what went down in history as the “Joe-pilau”. The visit was also an opportunity to invite our Sunday-morning discussion group to meet' and talk with Louis. We had, later, a splendid social evening. Everett, our fine musician, played the piano and we sat on the rug by the fire and talked till late. And Joe was compensated. His atoms had entered the human kingdom.

Mary Hanford Ford

Marguerite and I were polishing the house for the company we expected later when Mrs. Ford arrived. It was Saturday, April 14th, 10:00 a.m. and she had not been expected until the afternoon. Looking like a small avenging angel, she entered berating our branch railroad whose agent had misinformed her about schedules and had let her start out late one evening. Soon afterward, in the middle of the night, she had been ousted from her sleeper for a two-hour wait at a country station. Not a pleasant stop for a fragile looking lady in her seventies. She asked for a cup of tea and we put her to bed. {{p81}}

Anxiously we peered in at her door. We saw a woman who looked collapsed rather than asleep, and I was surprised when she appeared at lunch-time completely restored. She told us of her faith in tea as a restorative, and, also of her trained ability to revive herself through relaxation and prayer. We were beginning to find this new person exciting, adorable, and sprung up with vitality and love. We had beheld a miracle.

She stayed until Tuesday, her brilliant conversation going on for hours, day after day, on every sort of topic: history, art, philosophy, metaphysics, world events. Her fascination with the world of thought was a love beaming through the fireworks of a remarkable mind. She was ninety pounds of wit, wisdom and depth.

She told us that when she was a young person, she was left a widow with children to support. She became a professional lecturer on Art, travelling from city to city. In her Bahá'í talks she drew upon Art to teach religion—as she did one evening in Geneva.

On her first morning she entered with a heavy bag, which she requested be placed by her bed. It was full of books. She explained that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had told her to read five non-Bahá'í books for every Bahá'í book and during her rest periods she would be reading them.

“How does she do it?” we asked ourselves. Perhaps the people of the New World Order, generations from now, will have evolved the powers of intuition by which she functioned. At this time it seemed a secret knowledge; she had developed faculties that we did not possess. In Haifa, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had given her access to teachings not universally given and to Tablets not to be copied. She spoke of developing our intuition and hinted that there are additional senses possible to cultivate in this life, and for which the so-called “sixth sense” is but a preliminary. {{p82}}

On Sunday morning we asked her for stories of Bahá'u'lláh. Here is one of them:

Bahá'u'lláh poured tea at sunset in the garden of Ridván, for a small gathering of His trusted followers, then poured forth utterances that enraptured their ears. Carried away by His exaltation at the Words pouring through Him, He danced with an ecstasy inexpressible by words. A pastel picture was made by an artist who was present. It was hanging in Haifa at the time of Mrs. Ford's pilgrimage.

One who watched in the Garden was 'Abdu'l-Kareem, a merchant who, in order that he might visit the Blessed Perfection, had sold his goods and paid his debts. On the night he arrived, he was not met at the boat because the servant of Bahá'u'lláh had been told that a “great prince” was coming, and he saw only an old man in a three-cornered shawl. When the servant reported that the distinguished guest had not arrived Bahá'u'lláh said, “I shall have to send someone with better eyes.” and He sent 'Abbás Effendi ('Abdu'l-Bahá).

When 'Abbás Effendi reached the dock He saw an old man hunched on a bench in the cold night; he had lost his shawl in the sea. No one had met him and he was cold, lonesome, and disillusioned.

Then ‘Abbás Effendi appeared, wearing a long cape against the cold. Claiming ‘Abdu’l-Kareem as His father’s guest, He enveloped him in the cape with Himself and the two sat on the bench and prayed till dawn, that he might be prepared for the soul-challenging experience of entering the presence of Bahá’u’lláh.

Mrs. Ford said that ‘Abdu’l-Kareem, himself, had told her these stories. {{p83}}

As I live again those days with Mrs. Ford, I recall her spiritual and mental capacities. They were enriched, rather than diminished, by age. The day she left, Marguerite said, “There goes the youngest Bahá’í visitor who has ever come to us!”

We Visit Dorothy Baker

The Collisons, McKays, and Ruth Hawthorne starting out early for the 1929 National Convention, stopped for Bahá’í visits in Buffalo and Cleveland. Now we were on our way to Lima, Ohio to visit our own Mother Beecher and the Bakers.

My heart skipped a beat of excitement at the thought of seeing Dorothy again, and of seeing her in her own home. My “particles” had been windswept and swirled at my earlier meetings with her I think both of us were aware of a hidden design by a God “Who doeth whatsoever He willeth”. At last spring’s Blossom Picnic, Dorothy, her soul in a white fog, had asked me to drive with her for a half hour. During that time we had been unable to exchange a word.

Later, that afternoon, we witnessed a transformation of spirit, the turning on of a light, a dazzling illumination emanating from a pale lamp shade. The circle of people who clustered on the lawn had never heard such words of eloquence, words released with such a radiance. The quiet girl of Dorothy had assumed a newer vitality and had captivated all hearts.

Mother Beecher, during her winters in Geneva, had spoken often of her adored grand-daughter. She told us of taking the . young girl to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá when He was in New York in 1912. She told us, also, of an early teacher who, after seeing Dorothy, had a vision so astonishing that he sought out Jinab-i-Faḍil for an interpretation. Jinab-i-Faḍil replied, {{p84}} “Someday she will become one of the great teachers of the Cause.” Mother Beecher began to pray and to contrive that this promise would be fulfilled.

In 1921 Dorothy had married Frank Baker. Frank was older than she and had two motherless children. A few years later they moved to Lima, Ohio and Frank established a successful baking business. He was indeed Frank the baker! They started a family of their own, a girl and a boy. Frank was practical, honest, and big-hearted. Dorothy had a structure of common sense and hominess as well as prettiness and poise. Inevitably, the social life of the friendly mid-western town engulfed them.

Dorothy's dilemma was that the voices of the "world" did not deafen her ears to the call of the Mystic Nightingale. She was alone. There were no Bahá'ís in Lima. Her husband and parents were not Bahá'ís, although, later, they became glorious ones. No one understood except her gallant grandmother, when she was there. The situation was unknown to Dorothy's friends who, although they loved her, did not know her.

When we arrived we were welcomed into a prosperous household where the business of living was successfully carried on. The whole family ran out to meet us—Mother Beecher, then a spry ninety; Frank, hearty and kind; Dorothy, smiling; her mother, Leulla; and the children. They swept the travellers into the house for a bountiful meal and afterwards, we gathered in the living room for an evening of good fellowship and some hilarious games.

When Frank took Rex and Mary to visit the bakery, the next morning, Dorothy took the rest of us for a drive around town. "Connie goes to school there and I am President of the Parent Teachers Association," she laughed. We visited the school, the golf course, then saw the homes of some of their {{p85}} friends, and returned by way of the bakery. We had seen all of Dorothy's outer world, with Dorothy a delicate flower growing in a vegetable garden!

She had not shown us her whole world. For all her merry words she had been unable to hide her depression. She said she had been ill. How ill, we would not know until later. Our own relationship in the inner world was a mystery known to God alone. As we were leaving, Mother Beecher drew me aside and whispered, "When she was so ill, Dorothy said to me, 'Grandma, if anything ever happens to me, I want to leave my children to Doris McKay.'"

She was coming to the Convention on Saturday. Perhaps, there we would be able to talk.

First Days at the Convention of '29

I do not remember any of the business, except that Shoghi Effendi had called for the next step in the building of the Temple—the raising of the steel structure above the concrete foundation. We were still functioning in our "cheese box" of Foundation Hall. We were delighted with the Temple's interior but its outer appearance was a trial to the people of Wilmette.

Our continued sacrifice was always a discipline before us. Considering the smallness of our number, it seemed that the beloved Guardian had asked us to do the impossible, especially since we could not accept contributions from non-Bahá'ís, nor were we allowed to incur debts. Some of us would go home and sell stamp and coin collections, rare oriental prints; some would take extra jobs. Orcella Rexford gave each of us a little orange bag for the dimes and nickels we saved by small sacrifices. Jewelry was given up for sale; cheques were written and pledges made. The Bahá'ís would manage; they {{p86}} always did. Work would begin and the steel structure of the dome would be completed. Our mood was happy and independent of our material wants.

Dinner with Louis Bourgeois

Willard and I accompanied a number of others who were invited to a luncheon at the home of Louis Bourgeois, architect of the Wilmette Temple. His house seemed to be in accordance with his spirit of Temple building and although small in area, there were three levels; an effect of airiness and space was created by a living room two storeys high with a mezzanine balcony around the sides, stairs leading to the second floor.

I sat next to Mr. Bourgeois at the long table where our meal was served. He told me that he used to be a vegetarian until, at a meal with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Master took a small roast chicken and put it on his plate, saying, “Eat. But in the future the foods will be fruits and grains.” Mr. Bourgeois then asked us, “Would you like to see some of the designs for the ornamentation of the Temple?”

Soon our host was taking us downstairs to his studio. He shuffled dozens of long, tubular, blueprint cases. He selected several and began displaying, on a vast drawing table, the prints that they contained. He threw them onto the table with a twist of the wrist that would start them unrolling. We saw before us, a fairyland of intricate stone designs.

Mr. Bourgeois said that the inspiration for the Temple was from another realm and that he had been conscious, from the beginning, that Bahá’u’lláh was the creator of the building. With such luminous words, the architect displayed roll after roll of designs for a building that was yet to be built. He {{p87}} showed us where he had arranged for jewels to be placed in the ornamentation.

We were dazzled. Assured that, already the “Temple of Light” rose above us in the world of conception, Willard and I returned to the lowly Foundation Hall for the afternoon session.

On the last morning Willard and I went over to say “goodbye” to our luncheon host. “I love you, Mr. Bourgeois,” said Willard, and the warm-hearted little Frenchman seized Willard and saluted him on both cheeks. We floated to our waiting car. Mr. Bourgeois died that year, before the structure rose.

Dorothy Takes Her First Steps

Saturday morning my thoughts had strayed from the Convention business. “What does God want from all Bahá’ís?” I pondered. “What can I offer to Dorothy? Only what Lorna and I had promised in our covenant – to listen, to love, and to pray. Yes, I could do that.”

I looked over my shoulder to the door. Dorothy stood there silhouetted faintly in her light summer dress and small white hat. Face and lips were pale, eyes grey. At that moment the strong soul of the Convention and the ardent concentration of the people rose up around her and she swayed. I arose and went to her. She asked if I would walk with her and we slipped out. I was four years older than Dorothy, and at this moment, I was the counselling friend whom she had chosen. Neither of us knew why. She had that star quality that never, perhaps, would find its equal in a friend.

We climbed down the stairs behind the architect's house to the shore of Lake Michigan and walked close to the water. Then we returned and walked around the streets of Wilmette. {{p88}} I knew already the causes of conflict between her life and the forces of her destiny. These spoke to her through her grandmother's pressures, the prayers of her friends, and her own feelings. When she was with Bahá'ís and speaking for the Faith, she knew that the Power used her. She could see the faces of the people made astonishingly beautiful by the words that came to her and her manner of offering. As we walked, an irresistible overflow of pent-up waters washed away the protective barriers of excuses and self-justification upon which she had relied. Had she put it off too long? Had she thrown away her destiny? She was drowned now in her own grief, beating herself with guilt.

We circled back to the Hall and Ruth Hawthorne joined us, her face alight with her prayers. We drew Dorothy into the little shrine in a cubby-hole off the corridor over the cornerstone of the Temple. Here was a little oasis in the structural wilderness of columns and beams.

We found there a small circular table spread with a gold and black cloth and a vase of pink roses. Near the table was a bench covered with a Persian rug. We sat, and Dorothy wrapped herself in the spirit of worship. She listened to the prayers uttered by a young Black couple who shared our nook, and she remained as still as a statue.

It was over. The inner light shone through. Never again was I to see Dorothy's face without that light. In that little alcove shrine, something had happened and the troubled spirit had found peace. At dinner that evening, we sketched out her new life. She said, "I thought I was lost forever."

Back home I received from Dorothy these words:

"And now may I tell you something? At the Convention and during your visit to Lima you have given me unbounded strength! What you did, I do not exactly know. The few {{p89}} minutes at the shrine will never be forgotten. How my throat ached! and when I looked up I saw you looking at me so serenely and oh, so sweetly. Ruth was looking at me too, and it startled me for I had never really seen Ruth before. But what those moments at the shrine taught me cannot be put into words. I think my heart was laid at the Master's feet there.

Don't forget that I have joined your 'Unity in the Love of God' and am anxious to pray for you and to work with you."

Through the grace of God, Ruth and I had been permitted to ease the agony of birth for the most gifted of our Bahá'í teachers and a future Hand of the Cause of God in the Faith.

We were beginning to notice that any Bahá'í decision made with prayers opens a sequence of events. Some of these events are like ripples made by agitation in a stream ripples which reach the ocean and are caught up by the waves. Decisions are fateful. I see now that my whole life is composed of ripples of events begun by decisions, one leading to another.

This is true, especially if, after making a covenant to serve the Cause, one makes a move with that intention. Another example goes back to February 1929, that fateful month of "the Burning Log". The decision was this: to answer an article in {The Atlantic Monthly} entitled "The ,Passing of the Prophet". The author, a Unitarian minister, had stated that the day of belief in the prophet had passed. There would be no more prophets.

This was the one and only time in my life that I have answered a magazine article. I wrote to inform the author that, indeed, there had been two Prophets within the last hundred years Who claimed to be the Word of God as it had been spoken by Muḥammad, Jesus, and the other Founders {{p90}} of world religions. I told him that, in 1844 the first Prophet had announced the coming of a universal Manifestation of God Whose teaching would unite mankind. I wrote of their persecution; how one was martyred and the other exiled and imprisoned. Thousands of their followers were killed and their Cause had become world-wide. That was the substance of my letter, as I recall. I did not mention names or places and, of course, I hoped for an answer.

The answer came from the editor! Did he have my permission to publish the letter? Gladly!

I heard again from him. He was swamped with questions from his readers and sent me forty letters to answer and asked for a second letter telling more about the history of these Faiths. The May issue of the Atlantic came out before I left for Wilmette.

It was because of the sudden publicity that I was asked to make a report on the Convention floor. The writing of the letter led directly to two friendships as well as to a widening of McKay horizons. May Maxwell and Louie Mathews, both dynamic people, were brimming over with natural enthusiasms. Together the two ladies began to make plans for us which, at the moment, seemed like day-dreams. Willard and I returned home encouraged and sustained. I attempted to describe my feelings:

"It is like comparing an ordinary electric light bulb to a forest fire. This is the problem I face as I try to describe the difference this Convention has made in me. Bahá'u'lláh spoke of His 'particles'; mine have been transfused and have lost their identity – as in the interior of the sun, dense matter becomes a molten mass. Ripples of energy seem to find their way to the surface carrying heat and light – and my heartbeat has been to the rhythm of spheric music." {{p91}} and pear trees and bright-pink peach blossoms. the brown cases on the apple buds were already swelling. Our second Blossom Picnic was set for the weekend of May 11th and 12th.

We had been home a day or two when May Maxwell called to invite me to New York for a brief meeting with the National Teaching Committee. I left the picnic plans to other Bahá'ís and took a night train to the city and arrived for breakfast. I was early for the meeting and had a day to myself – a day to spend in a city that I had come to love when, for two years, I taught on Long Island. I seemed also to be guided to telephone Willard's friend, a secretary of the YMCA, who suggested a tour. "There are young 'Y' students taking a series of bus tours to ethnic neighbourhoods. This week they are visiting Harlem. It's called the Reconciliation Fellowship Tour and you can catch it if you hurry." He named the street corner and with hasty thanks and beneficent powers, I managed, just in time, to board the yellow bus.

We, the bus travellers, were to learn about Harlem as it was on that day in 1929. We visited a church and talked to an earnest young organist; a modern library, where we chatted with a librarian about a new housing project. We saw, too, endless grimy streets and neglected shop window displays. The people were wearing shapeless and drab clothes that were shoddy and cheap.

But • there was an idealism and a hope here which we described in our next visits to the Urban League offices and the headquarters of the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People). The secretaries enlightened us with stories of poverty and legal injustice that left the White students mute. During the question periods I dared to raise my voice and speak of Race Unity as a program. {{p92}} "What," I asked, "is being done to further friendship and unity between the races?"

With Harlem streets as a witness, the question seemed banal. I expected scorn from the informed workers, but I added the word "Bahá'í" and referred to my recent experience in Rochester. I was encouraged when, detained at the doors, I was asked for further information about the interracial work of the Bahá'ís. Mr. James Hubert, Secretary of the Urban League, invited me to have lunch with him the next day. Of course I went.

Mr. Hubert was waiting for me at the subway entrance, wondering, I suppose, if I would have the interest to return. He was a fine looking gentleman – a light brown suit flattered a complexion of pastel mahogany. His face was both sharply keen and meditative. We walked to a restaurant which was situated in a corridor of an old brick building. There were small • separate tables with lights in orchid shades and small vases of artificial flowers. The food was delicious, and as we ate, we talked.

Mr. Hubert listened politely as I held forth on amity, oneness, association through mutual experience, then friendship.

He said, "I wish it were true, but it can't be done."

“But it has been done,” I insisted. “You can see it with your own eyes!”

“I won’t believe it ‘til I see it done,” said my host.

I replied, “Then come to our Blossom Picnic this weekend in Geneva, New York.”

The Second Blossom Picnic

Quite a challenge to a key man like Mr. Hubert to rush off to a picnic a hundred miles away in upstate New York! But {{p93}} he came, that Saturday, by the afternoon train. He stepped down at the weather-beaten, country-looking station. Perhaps he was feeling a reaction, a return of mood to the bitterness and frustration that pushed him on with his work, the work on which he had closed his office doors eight hours ago. His face inscrutable, he accepted a seat in our open Model “A” Ford car.

After a drive of two miles, Willard and his quiet guest turned at the entrance and crossed over “The Bridge of Sighs.” (Howard Ives thought it ought to have been called “The Bridge of Larger Size”.) A crowd of boys were playing ball in a field. They were of both races, Black and White. Here was something that Mr. Hubert had never seen before.

Guests had been arriving since noon. Late afternoon found me in an orgy of rice cooking, twenty-five pounds of it, Persian fashion. I had washed the rice through several waters and, to preserve some crispness, cooked it rather sparingly. I spread it with butter and baked it on cookie sheets in a slow oven. Meanwhile carloads of our Black friends from Rochester arrived and were taken for walks in the orchards. More of the Geneva friends arrived with their consignments of prepared food – boned chicken, rolled dates, cooked whole onions, carrots, chopped nuts and olives, green peppers and tomatoes. Mr. Hubert mingled with the crowd and I saw him deep in talk with Tom Bolling, Secretary of the Rochester coloured ‘Y’.

The big kitchen was now full of helpers. We started to pile the large platters, constructing pilaus similar to the one we shared “the night the ice went out”. The old-dining room table with all its wide leaves was opened and trimmed with flowers and lighted candles. Great platters were placed at each end, and lines formed. We served eighty that night. After {{p94}} the plates were passed back to the kitchen, we called a meeting.

Willard had trucked a load of chairs from the funeral parlour. Some people sat on the stairs and the children sprawled on the floor. The evening was mostly musical. Mrs. Lee and the members of the Zion Church choir furnished some of it. Our beloved Bahá’í teachers were there to bring the presence of the Master. Howard and Mabel Ives attended, as well as the Obers, Louis Gregory, and May Maxwell. It was a beautiful, enchanted, moment engraved on the tablets of eternity. The scent of lilacs and apple blossoms wafted in through open doors and windows.

The guests, reluctant to break the spell, lingered late and the younger children slept on the floor. Eventually, those who lived near by drove home, while others were entertained in Bahá'í homes. We had thirteen overnight guests at Emerald Hill-some of whom slept in the Pilgrim House. Willard and I slept rather precariously on a red plush sofa in the dining room. In the early hours of the next morning we were startled by a resounding CRASH. The four Black teenaged youth brought by Bishop Shaw were sleeping upstairs in our bedroom, and their weight became too much for the antique bed. The wooden slats broke and deposited the boys on the floor. We rushed to the scene, spread out the mattress and put the sleepy and bewildered boys back to bed.

Blossom Picnic – Day Two

Sunday morning. A self-serve breakfast for seventeen: popovers, scrambled eggs, fruit, and mugs of coffee laid out on the sideboards. Other guests began to flow back and a carload of the varicoloured Cosmopolitan Club students arrived from Ithaca. All the young people gathered in the {{p95}} Pilgrim House for a meeting conducted by Mary Maxwell, who had been wading in the brook the day before, with a goose under each arm. Mary was beautiful, tall and graceful, lovely in a rose-coloured dress.

It was a relaxed day. One on which to enjoy the country and wander around the acres of fabulous beauty. Today the friends provided a great picnic lunch that we ate on the lawn. That evening we held another meeting with music again, and talks by the guests and noted Bahá'í speakers. The seventy who attended tasted the Paradise of Abhá. One lady, a Mrs. Edgecomb from Binghamton remarked, "I have the feeling of a vibration in the top of my head." I told her that I had known it too.

The tide of the Blossom Picnic receded and left a drift of pearls along the shore. The friendships begun with the Black community of Rochester were sustained through the following week by meetings with three Black ministers, Elizabeth Brooks, Louis Gregory and a local interracial group. Bert Jackson of Geneva became a devoted Bahá'í. He was a janitor and the least pretentious. Of those who had been called, Bert was the one chosen.

Elizabeth Brooks was a vital link in our follow-up efforts in Rochester. She arranged meetings in several homes where Willard and I gave firesides on Sunday nights. Often we spent the night in homes of our Negro friends. Old church and social ties held fast, although we were grateful for the privilege of sowing the seeds of love on both sides of the colour line, and more grateful still, to be accepted as trusted friends by so many. I remember one woman who exclaimed, "If the Bahá'í movement makes you love us like this, it must be the return of the Christ spirit!" {{p96}}

I thanked Bahá'u'lláh that the "Caledonia Avenue" of my young girlhood had become, through His bounty, a phantom barrier. Soon two families, the Lindsays and the Greens, joined us to become a firm foundation for the Faith in Rochester.

I thanked Bahá'u'lláh for our Blossom Picnic. During those two days, besides the oriental students from Cornell, fifty members of the Black community had been with us. Mr. Hubert said, on leaving, "I had to see it to believe it!"

Returning home from the picnic were three carloads of people from Binghamton, New York. The Ives had conducted their lecture series and had formed a Bahá'í study class. Those who had come to the picnic had set out in the same spirit of adventure as had Willard and I when we travelled four years earlier to Buffalo. Perhaps one of those carloads had had the privilege of having Howard recount The Seven Valleys too. But it was the meeting with other Bahá'ís that was a confirming step. For Willard and me, as well as the Binghamton group, the steps were planned by the Ives.

How did it feel to be a Bahá'í in those early days? I wrote in my diary in June 1929:

"Diditte, my cat, is what Ruth Moffett would call a 'planetary mother.' She worries fiercely about her young. She is always bringing them back or taking them away. When they are away they are usually to be found in a hay loft in the barn – a place of ancient timbers with the sunlight falling on the yellow of last year's hay. To go there to adore the kittens is to step into the world of yesterday.

"The other day as I stood there watching the gaiety of the kittens dancing in the hay I felt nostalgia for the time when I {{p97}} would have unblushingly taken a love story and a sandwich and sat half a day with the kittens.

"I can remember when it used to fill me with well-being to sit down by a pink-shaded lamp and play bridge with some friends, the tinkle of teacups and the rest. Some of them are still there, playing. To me, after being four years a Bahá'í, they are like the kittens in the hay dancing in the sweet, warm, carefree, earth vibration. For us, no more. Instead we have these other delights and a certain immunity from the pangs and fears of mortals."

In June, Ruth Moffett and her husband Robert spent their wedding anniversary with the Geneva friends. The occasion expanded into a triple Bahá'í wedding. The Heists, the McKays and the Moffetts all had anniversaries in June. The rooms at the Heist home were decorated and a sumptuous feast prepared. The "brides" were quite radiant in their white dresses and enormous bouquets of mock-orange blossoms. Our husbands may have been a little more self-conscious.

What had seemed like a play, at first, had taken on significance for ourselves and our invited guests. Had not all the grooms asserted in the presence of the others, their pledges to God; "Verily, we are content with the will of God." And we, the brides had given the rejoinder, "Verily, we are satisfied with the desire of God." [^] This, I knew, was my first real marriage, my Bahá'í one. Throughout the next day I felt lifted above the ground to the height of my own knees. I was disappointed that my more down-to-earth husband did not share in this sensation.

[^ ] [{Bahá'í Scriptures}, Ibid., #840, p.457. The pledge of marriage, as found in today's prayer books, is translated as: "We will all , verily, abide by the Will of God."]

Ruth had had a letter from Shoghi Effendi and she shared the priceless statement that God, although the Unknowable Essence, is not an abstraction – but cognizant, loving, responsive, although forever beyond our ken. {{p98}}

Chun Chuan Cheng comes to Emerald Hill

We had been introduced to Chun Chuan Cheng of Canton, China, at a dinner of the Cosmopolitan Club. He had come with the other students to the Blossom Picnic and later, had written to us asking permission to spend the summer on the farm: "I am going to you to have experience, home life, and manifold learnings on your farm."

Cheng made arrangements with the Agricultural Department of Cornell University to receive laboratory credit for his summer's work. He would learn the care of fruit, how to drive a car or tractor, to milk a cow. He would work for no salary.

On the first morning I asked him of his plans.

"First, I meditate fifteen minutes. Then I do my washing [his bath], then I practise my violin, eat breakfast, go work 'til four, then I wash again." The rest of the day was for his "manifold learnings".

The advent of a Chinese student into our rural environment invited, fifty years ago, more comment than it would today. It did not take long, however, for all to acknowledge Cheng's superiority. He had won a university scholarship in Tientsin, in a competitive examination and had scored first among hundreds of others. His test with us was to adapt to a different style of life, and, in so doing, to win the people over from their prejudice.

I found my grandmother removing one day a treasured quilt from his bed. It was one that she had given me as a wedding present. 'When I persuaded her that Cheng was very clean, she agreed to leave the heirloom where it was. The morning he went out to work with the Italian women in the cherry orchard, the three male workers were in near panic. They called Willard aside and whispered, with appropriate gestures, "He bad. He eat people!" {{p99}}

But when my grandmother became ill, it was Cheng whom she asked to bring her lunch tray. Often he would sit by her bed and tell her stories. Once, on the way home for holidays, he told her, river pirates had kidnapped some young students of the rich. Cheng was among them, but his parents were poor and they could not pay the ransom. He was left on the riverboat, in a sort of cage. He said, "It was then that I taught myself to meditate. I became changed."

His captors put him ashore, eventually, and he found his way home. He said that the experience was good for him because, with his increased power of concentration, his studies were made simple and he was able to win his scholarship. He had been referred to the Chinese Consulate in Washington, D.C., and was their ward. Cheng came to think of us as his parents and on his school vacations, came “home” to us.

The summer of ‘29 passed sweetly. For more than a month, the Sicilian cherry-pickers came and worked at the harvest. The orchards were gay with their cries. Even the little children were put to work picking up the fruit that had fallen on the ground. This was fruit country and hundreds of pickers from the cities flocked in. The fruit and vegetable harvests would continue in the area until late in September when the apples and pears were put in. The pickers would camp in barracks provided by the growers in the neighbourhood. The sounds of outside activity was an overtone for the life going on in the house. That summer I cooked for a household of seven; to which numerous visitors were added.

I would write to Lorna:

“We will have twenty-two over-night including Dale and Katherine Cole from Cleveland... There were fifty-five for dinner at the Heists, many from Binghamton. I must go now {{p100}} and make a million beds... We have had a big picnic for each of four days. Barefoot dancing on the lawn, Oscar Wilde stories by firelight, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Tablets at sunset on the hill with a young moon rising.”

On July 19th I had another telephone message from May Maxwell calling me to a National Teaching Committee meeting in New York City. She would engage a room for me in her hotel. I would be with her in the evening and meet her for breakfast, then we would spend the day at Committee work with Mason Remey, who was chairman. Harlan Ober and Marion Little would also be there. In the absence of Rex, I represented the Outline Bureau. I recorded the notes and made a report for Horace to put in the newsletter.

Visit to the Kinney Apartment

I went to New York, and in the evening, May took me to the Kinney apartment, her spiritual home. At our tap the door was flung open by Mr. Edward Kinney whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had named ‘Saffa’. My first impressions were that he was not tall, but expansive both in girth and in his gestures of welcome. He had generous features; impulsive movements. I recall his rich baritone voice as he invited us in.

In the living room a full-length painting of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá faced, with the assurance of His presence, whoever entered. There were a number of people in the long room. Carrie ‘Vaffa’ Kinney greeted me. There was the intimate circle of friends who seemed, like May, to be members of a spiritual family linked by bonds of remembrance of the Master. Some of those memories would date before His visit to New York. To step into this company gave an uplift to the soul. Among {{p101}} us moved our host. Of him, I wrote, “He is full of spiritual fire. His heart is afire and he sets others aflame.”

We spent the evening, until midnight reading Tablets and listening to anthems that Vaffa had composed. The Greatest Name “Yá Bahá’u’l-Abhá” was the refrain. I took refuge in a black oak chair with a tall carved back and listened with closed eyes to the mention of the Name of God. To conclude the evening May recited a prayer which she said was the Guardian’s favourite.[^]

[^] [7. The prayer, revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, begins “O Lord, my God and my Haven in my distress! My Shield and my Shelter in my woes...”]

Saffa Kinney arose and impressively addressed the room. “All prayer is a covenant with God,” he said. “By that prayer we have all made a covenant. We promise to do our part to carry out what we have prayed for.”

“Everything stopped,” I wrote later. “The people in the room just looked at one another. We looked and looked until all our personalities seemed to fall away and there was only the shining of an inner light, beautiful and clear.”

Toward the end of August, two or three carloads of Bahá’ís from Geneva were on their way to Binghamton, a large manufacturing town about one hundred miles south of Geneva. Wheels had been rolling between our two towns since the spring picnic, but this promised to be an event of special importance. Through the summer months the Ives had been staying nearby in a cottage at beautiful Quaker Lake. All of us were invited, now to an overnight houseparty and to stay with them or with some of the Binghamton people. Mabel and Howard were excited and joyous. We knew their mood. It had always something to do with the advancement of the Cause. Lorna Tasker was with us. She acknowledged later that she was “in a state of strange excitement”, which she felt others were sharing. The Obers arrived from Buffalo and {{p102}} lastly, the Binghamton people. Baskets of food were taken down to the pine trees by the lake and, after reading a selection of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s words on the subject of love, we feasted. Following the meal, a number of people spoke and Lorna remembers that Mary Collison told the story of Bird Gadoon. Lorna recounts it this way:

The Story of Bird Gadoon

“The bird, Gadoon, was of unusual plumage. She could fly higher and farther than other birds and her eyes were turquoise blue, whereas the eyes of the other birds were brown. The other birds were jealous and, whenever she tried to build a nest, they drove her away and destroyed it. So she was forced to use some other method of raising her brood. unknown to the others, she laid her eggs in their nests, one in each nest. When the little birds were hatched, in each nest there would be one unlike the others – one which felt within him a strange restlessness, a yearning for something he knew not what.

“And then, one day, the mother bird flew over the forest and called her young. Aloft she soared in the great freedom of the sky and from the forest the young birds rose and followed her.

“So, all who are born in the nests of the world bearing in their hearts the yearning for a deeper brotherhood – children of a dream yet unfulfilled, will rise, hearing the call of divine love and mount on wings to join the others.” {{p103}}

“As we listened dusk came, and night. The party broke up, but no one went home. We went around by the light of bonfires greeting one another, laughing, talking, being glad together. I forgot my usual reserve, my uneasiness on meeting new people. We were age-old friends, comrades in the love of God.”

The next morning about forty people sat down to breakfast. The picnic tables were moved together, white cloths laid, and the food spread out. Everyone was in the highest spirits and, beyond the hilarity, was the feeling that this was a special moment. Howard Ives stood up and read a prayer with the power that was in his voice. Next he called for talks, starting with Harlan and Grace Ober. The magic of that team of Bahá’í teachers who had known the Master, became the air we inhaled. They spoke of the reality of servitude. The Geneva guests, too, spoke from their hearts.

We cleared off the tables and returned to find that Howard had placed on them a long sheet of paper and a pen. He said: “All those from Binghamton who wish to become Bahá’ís, write your names on this paper.” Nineteen signed.

We had been exchanging letters with Loulie Mathews ever since our meeting at Convention. Now a date was set for another meeting with her. She was inviting us to spend a week in New York City, beginning on December 5th. We were to speak at public meetings, be passed around among the Bahá’ís, and to stay at the Woodworth Hotel, where we would be near the Kinneys.

More letters came from May. Those two dear people who had conspired at Wilmette, Loulie and May, had added now {{p104}} a teaching trip which they had planned for us – a trip to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Boston, Portsmouth and, finally, Montreal where we were invited to spend Christmas week with the Maxwells.

Well, the fruit money was in and we could think about clothes. I bought a blue velvet suit and tam in Rochester, and Mayme Rapelje, our Geneva dressmaker, made me a pretty, flaring, blue silk dress. This was the nucleus of my wardrobe. When Willard dressed up, he was aristocratic in appearance and I was vain about his looks and aplomb. Cheng’s opinion of Willard’s appearance was quite different. He once said, “Willard, he is poet and peasant.” Marguerite and Christine were left in charge of the house and the two dogs and five or six cats. The tenant farmers looked after the farm animals, including our three mules.

We had now a little time after our busy summer to rest, to prepare some talks, to say some prayers. Then we were off again for our first scheduled stop, New York City.

We were the most unlikely people in the world to be making a tour of big cities, but the doors flung open and through them we went! For the next month we were to lead. an enchanted life. Loulie Mathews was our fairy godmother and May, our guardian angel. Our talks were not brilliant. No Dorothy Baker eloquence came to our aid. But then, Martha Root was not brilliant either. A strong magnetic power sustained her. That same power showed through our public talks. We could tell by the concentrated attention of the faces we looked into. We were upheld by the certainty that our friends were praying strong prayers for us. Our recognition that “of ourselves we can do nothing,” was answered by the companion statement, “God doeth whatsoever He willeth.” This helped. {{p105}}

New York City and Richard Harrison’s Fish Fry

Loulie, our hostess, did not intend that the visit of “the children”, as she called us, should be an ordeal. She planned delightful diversions and came with us whenever her busy life permitted. One matinee afternoon she indulged Willard’s fondness for Wagner by taking us to a performance of “Die Valkyrie” and, another time, to the current hit, {De Green Pastures} with Richard Harrison in the role of “de Lawd.” At the opening curtain, “de Lawd” is seated on a cloud, hurling thunderbolts upon the people of the earth. He is prevailed upon by the all-Black cast to give the world another chance. All ends with a triumphant fish fry in heaven tended to by “de Lawd” and His angels.

After the final curtain, Loulie said, “Would you like to go backstage and meet Mr. Harrison?” She piloted us through aisles, passages, and doors and soon “de Lawd” was shaking our hands and calling for the Black angels to come and be introduced, wings, stars and all.

That night when Willard and I were relating our experience at the Kinneys’ dinner table, May said, “Why can’t we invite Mr. Harrison here with some of your Harlem friends, for a pilau dinner tomorrow night, Doris?”

We telephoned Loulie. She was enraptured with the plan and she agreed to pick up Mr. Harrison and bring him to the Kinneys’ and, later, to take him back for the evening show.

“This is great,” said Vaffa, “but remember, I have to be away all day.”

“I will go shopping and buy all the makings,” May volunteered, adding, “Doris and I will make the pilau.”

The next afternoon there was a commotion in the hall. May arrived with a boy who was carrying large bags of provisions. We put on aprons, wielded knives and other utensils, and {{p106}} performed the ritual of preparing the food of the Master. May, with her usual go, turned out to be an excellent cook. Meanwhile, we kept on telephoning to invite friends from the Black and White communities to our Feast. These included the Huberts and the Allens from the Urban League, Mr. Harry T. Burleigh, and Marion Little. There were five of us from the Kinneys’ and some visiting Bahá’ís.

Reinforcements came. The table in the long narrow dining room was lengthened and places set for eighteen. In the kitchen, the gently baked rice was taken from the oven and the pilau made. When Loulie arrived at six-thirty with Mr. Harrison, we stood waiting behind our chairs, the place at the head of the table being reserved for him. Looking back in memory at that table and the beaming welcoming faces, I seem to see it through Mr. Harrison's eyes. He stood still for a long moment, then said:

"Some FISH FRY!"

I recall another dinner of that time, one with Mary Hanford Ford. Her apartment was like herself, small, compact and stocked with the treasures of a lifetime. She had made herself comfortably at home at the farm. Now, we were to see her in her own world. In the afternoon she whisked us away to have tea with a baroness. The Baroness, imposingly large, bejewelled and well-draped was deferential to Mrs. Ford. The minds here were sophisticated, world-travelled, interested in metaphysics. With them, our Mrs. Ford took her rightful place in the centre. I think it was compassion that brought her there.

But it was in the company of Bahá'ís that Mrs. Ford became a tiny queen. How they adored her! That night at the Feast of Masa'il, our hostess, Marion Little, just picked her up like a small child and swung her around. In her green velvet {{p107}} dress, she was all of ninety pounds. The merriest of all was our wise, clever, famous Mary Hanford Ford.

Then there was a luncheon hosted by Loulie. Loulie had written once, a book, My Friendly Enemy Life. She had had her ups and downs of fortunes and had arrived now, with her husband, at a cycle of affluence. I paused in wonder at her living-room door. Over the fireplace hung an original Corot! I was so mesmerized by it that I did not see the other paintings. But I do remember being impressed by the bright peasant tiles of the imported Italian cook-stove.

Loulie's friends were an experience for Willard and me. Perhaps they were from a world related to the Baroness's domain. One gentleman, brother of a famous dancer and fresh from the Parisian art colony of the Left Bank, had a fringed white toga, a silver fillet in his long white hair and wore sandals. It was all very casual. Loulie's little white dog persisted in licking the gentleman's bare toes. The atmosphere was artistic and bookish and Willard and I, although feeling rather "upstate", got on quite well. One lady was especially interested in prayers at dawn, when, according to Muslim lore, the inverted sun over the horizon showers bounties on the earth.

Saffa's Story

There was a knock at the Kinneys' door. "Excuse me," Saffa begged, "I have a music pupil. Don't leave unless you want to." He introduced his pupil as the star of a current musical show. I had not known that Saffa was a trained musician and composer, an organist and choirmaster, and in demand as a voice teacher. Within half an hour he was back again and we resumed our talk. {{p108}}

When I asked him to speak of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, his eyes twinkled. “Do you, too, want me to tell you of the time He carried me up the steps – and me, nearly 300 pounds?”

One day during ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit of 1912, they had returned from a trip in the city and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lay back in the car, His eyes closed. He roused Himself, descended from the car and stood with Saffa looking up a flight of steps they would have to climb. Saffa made a worried remark, his eyes on the Master’s frail form. Suddenly, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá hoisted the weighty Saffa in His arms and ran lightly up the steps with him.

“It was as if I had no weight,” Saffa explained.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, who has been called by Bahá’u’lláh, ‘the Mystery of God’, had summoned the Power of the Great Ether. This power, shared by the Manifestations, is supernatural. In our lack of understanding we call it a miracle – and so it has always been, for us, a miracle.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá had meant this as a joke on Saffa, for having worried. The Master’s laugh had been hearty.

Philadelphia and Mrs. Revell’s Kitchen Sink

The week in New York was over, and Willard and I were alighting from the train in Philadelphia. We had been told that we would be within walking distance of the Revells’ home. We stepped out, inhaling the air of a new city. We saw that the houses were built in compact blocks with nothing to distinguish the separate homes except their trimmings details such as doors, railings, steps, and window curtains. I do not remember any grass or trees. We clutched our slip of paper with the street and number.

We arrived safely and were drawn into a long connecting hall by an angel disguised as a tiny little lady of seventy. She {{p109}} had snow-white wispy hair, brown eyes, a strong nose and the sweetest and most sensitive mouth we had ever seen. She was Mrs. Revell, the mother of Ethel and Jessie. Here was another who had known the Master and had received His blessings during his visit to North America. She was shy with us. We sat down at the table with her and she poured tea. Then she wondered why, although we ate her cookies, we drank no tea. She sampled hers. All we had in our cups was hot water!

“Oh my goodness, I forgot to put in the tea. I get so excited!” She grabbed her teapot, and hurried to the kitchen and soon returned with the tea. By this time, through laughing about the tea, we were well acquainted with Mrs. Revell. She told us her story of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Mrs. Revell had been at a meeting in a Philadelphia hotel when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to her, “I will be at your house tomorrow at nine o’clock.”

“I came home walking on air,” she said. “The Master in my house!”

She began to clean and polish and worked to make the whole house befitting for the Master. “But there was one thing I could do nothing about – the kitchen sink. It is porcelain, stained and cracked. I thought, if the Master should ever see that, I would be disgraced.”

“The next morning,” she went on, “I, made refreshments. I looked again at the house. Everything was spotless. We had a screen in one room and I moved that out in front of the sink.”

“Sharply at nine, the Master came and with Him ever so many people. Even the stairs and hall were full of people standing. But why was the Master passing through the people to the dining-room and kitchen? He strode straight over to that screen, pushed it to one side, and looked at my sink. {{p110}} Then he laughed as if it were His joke on me. I laughed too, as I am doing now, and kept on smiling all through the wonderful talk He gave. This house was the only home in Philadelphia that He honoured by His presence.”

“But you are not drinking your tea!” exclaimed our hostess. Dear Mrs. Revell had given herself the fresh tea and had forgotten to pour ours. The three of us were laughing hopelessly at this second incident.

“It was the Master who made me forget. And, you know, that day He was here, I forgot to pass the refreshments.”

We had our charming hostess to ourselves that afternoon, until Ethel and Jessie came home from work. Their brother was there and, in the evening, he took us sight-seeing around Philadelphia and we saw the famous Liberty Bell.

Washington, D.C.

Looking very elegant, Mason Remey met us at the Washington station and took us to breakfast. For over fifty years, I have remembered that we had chocolate walnut waffles.

Our sight-seeing trip began with a visit to Arlington National Cemetery and the grave of the Unknown Soldier. Eclipsing this in importance, it seemed, was an imposing monument that marked the grave of Mason’s father, who had been an admiral in the United States Navy. It was impossible not to see in our guide an overwhelming pride of family. Yet he was genial and kind, taking us to see the Capitol and the White House. This was the man whom, one day, the Guardian would appoint as a Hand of the Cause of God and who, later would fail in his allegiance to the Covenant because he thought he had the right to rule. {{p111}}

We were charmed by our tour and were delivered to the home of Allen MacDaniel, Chairman of the National Spiritual Assembly. Our hosts were gracious although a little formal, as was their home. We did not see much of the MacDaniels, what with meetings being held every evening and the friends claiming our daytime hours.

When she had hugged me at Green Acre, I had protested, "But I don't know you." She had replied, "We will know each other sometime." Since that time, four and a half years earlier, Miriam Haney had maintained a friendly relationship through correspondence. She was one of the first who had encouraged my Bahá'í writing. One morning during our stay in Washington she called for us and took us [or a drive around the city. She said, "I remember taking 'Abdu'l-Bahá on this drive in 1912. Paul was a little fellow and he cried the entire time. I could do nothing with him."

Mrs. Haney asked me if there was anywhere I would especially like to go. "The Corcoran Art Gallery," I replied. We stopped there and saw the paintings, all of which I have since forgotten. I do remember a line from a poem of Rumi. "I am bound for heaven. Who has an eye for sightseeing?" It was so then.

After luncheon at the Haney home we went to see George Spendlove, who had an antique shop on P Street. George and Willard met like brothers, after their friendship at the Montreal Convention. At George's shop we saw some beautiful European furniture. We had dinner with him and went with him to the rooms where we were to speak.

The mingled group of believers, representing the Black and White races of the city, were the variegated fruits of the tree of Oneness that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had planted with such concentrated intention during His visit. Mrs. Lua Gettsinger had nourished the ground from which that tree grew and a {{p112}} distinguished band of early Bahá'ís, headed by Mrs. Agnes Parsons, had tended It with courage and dedication. It was our precious experience that night to be in the radiance of that circle.

Faces Along the Path

As I sat in the kitchen of a boarding-house in Baltimore a busy Bahá'í hostess served me a bowl of delicious stew. One of her boarders was a tall strong man in working clothes who introduced himself as John Reddin. He told us that he was from Halifax, Nova Scotia. How far away that seemed. He was a Bahá'í too, and had lost his arm in the Halifax Explosion. In years to come I would learn more of that disaster. But now, we enjoyed a hurried visit before speaking at a downtown .hall. The rain poured and few people came. The next morning we were on our way to Boston.

Lorna met us at the Bahá'í Centre and, after a meeting, we went to Beverly, Massachusetts to spend the night. When we returned to Boston the following morning, we called on Mr. Matthew Bullock of the Urban League. I offered him a letter of introduction from Mr. Hubert. Mr. Bullock's manner was polite, but reserved. We had, at least, made a gesture for racial unity.

We were surprised to hear, much later, that he had become a Bahá'í and, still later, gratified when he became a member of the .National Spiritual Assembly. I believe that our visit with him and whatever effect it had was an example of Bahá'u'lláh's guidance. It illustrates our need for alertness in taking the initiative with the knowledge that our actions may be the keys to an unknown, yet unfolding destiny. {{p113}}

The Gregorys and a Marriage Prayer

Yes, there stood Louis Gregory waiting for our bus with a look of boyish eagerness. We walked briskly with him to a small house on a side street.

“Yes, we certainly are •in residence,” he said triumphantly. Louis and his wife Louise had been married for eighteen years; yet, only occasionally had they lived together in a place they could call home. Their marriage was “made in Heaven”. They had met while on pilgrimage and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had suggested that they marry. In spiritual attune, they did, through devotion to Him. Soon they were to discover the bounties of intellectual compatibility and the growth of human affection. They were truly married on every plane. But, by agreement, they had, for months of each year, gone their separate ways: Louise to teach in Europe and Louis to promote racial unity in the United States. Here, in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, they were together for a time.

When we stepped into the kitchen, Louise, small and dark and with a red scarf wound around her head, was bending over the stove and stirring the contents of an iron pot. “I hope you like okra,” she said anxiously as we shook hands.

The hospitality was southern. The stew, featuring the okra, was a blend of meat and vegetables. Time passed dreamily, while we floated on Louise’s solicitude and Louis’s gaiety. We shared with them the details of our trip and for Louis, who knew all of the people we had met, it was family news.

The neighbours, both White and Black, came and we sat in the neat little parlour which must have come furnished with the house. The intimacy we had known at dinner was extended now to the guests. We sat there, somewhere beyond our usual selves, secure in love. Willard and I had been {{p114}} making many talks which were planned in advance. Here, we could carry on a conversation with the inner reality of the people who had gathered. So we relaxed into a paradise of the blend of races, as in those remembered meetings in Rochester. We talked about prayer and the answer to prayer.

I told them, “‘God will answer every sincere prayer’, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said.” Another person contributed, “When we pray for spiritual attributes, we will be answered, at least by tests!”

“And our material needs?”

“Yes, those prayers are answered too, although in the wisdom of God, the answer is sometimes ‘No.’”

“Relating to attributes,” said Louis, “let me tell you that, in my youth, my greatest sin was pride.”

We were amused to hear this admission, for Louis was a most humble and self-effacing man. So humble was he that we all laughed heartily at the “monster of self” that we imagined him to have slain. Louis laughed too, and mocked the situation by getting down on his knees and begging for help. He continued, in a more serious vein. “We have to look at ourselves first and bring ourselves to account so that we will know when we are ‘standin’ in need of prayer.”

We slept that night in the Gregorys’ house, deeply aware of the privilege that was ours. In a prayer revealed for their wedding ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said, “Verily, they are married in obedience to Thy command. Cause them to become the signs of unity and harmony until the end of time...”[^]

Montreal

We arrived in Montreal on Christmas Day. The climate in Washington, D.C. had been mild and I was wearing over my velvet suit, only a cloth coat. Frost crystals sparkled in the {{p115}} light from high leaded-glass windows of the Maxwell house as we waited at the door of 1548 Pine Avenue. It was opened soon and we walked into May’s embracing arms. Sutherland and Mary, with welcoming smiles, were standing nearby.

The place was already a shrine. The Master was still there. His holy presence breathed to us, emanating from May’s greeting like a strain of music or the scent of attar. The beauty of the house, created by Sutherland for the service of the Cause, soon enveloped us. We passed the door of a formal parlour or library, and the chair where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had sat was pointed out to us. We entered the living room where we relaxed and answered eager questions about our trip, and listened to some of the plans for our week in Montreal. I absorbed the atmosphere, but I retain no memory of the room except for its elegance, taste, and comfort. Only one object do I remember well: a small oil painting of a beautiful Scottish girl of another generation. Her name was engraved on a brass plate mounted on the frame: “Mary, Duchess of Sutherland.”[^]

As the ringing of church bells proclaimed Christmas Eve, we were shown upstairs to our room. A collection of Japanese prints were displayed along the stairway and hall. We slipped off to sleep in an unreal and dreamlike world.

Lying awake the next morning, I had a flash of understanding. I had mistakenly called our impressions “dreamlike”, but we were the ones who were disoriented from reality. “The real life is the life of the Spirit and not the life of the body.” Loulie Mathews had been right. We were the “children” born rather recently to the Bahá’í Faith. We were also, however, the ones who, for the past three weeks, were welcomed into the intimacy of mature Bahá'ís who had known the Master.

“This is too much for me,” my lesser self complained. I was to suffer in the days ahead, just as I had seen Dorothy Baker {{p116}} suffer from the conflict of the two natures within. The test turned me inward for days and I was saved from embarrassment only by Willard’s pleasure and excitement of being there. I could not talk and I found it difficult to raise my head. Any display of composure had to be achieved through will power.

The events of the day were casual enough. While we sat at the breakfast table, we heard music from the street. French speaking carollers were outside and we ran to the window. Sutherland went outside to give them some money and they sang again. I think there was, too, a violin or fiddle. The carollers were bundled in rough coats and thick scarves and worn caps. As they strode along, the snow creaked under their thick boots.

Relatives were coming for Christmas dinner and May, Mary and the maid were very busy in the kitchen and dining-room. Mary wore a blue silk morning gown bound by a metal belt around her slim waist. I recall the quick rhythm of their movements as she set the silver around the long table.

The traditional family dinner had ended in a blaze of glory, a great ball of flaming plum pudding. In the afternoon the McKays excused themselves and went upstairs for a rest before setting out for “tea” at the home of Ernest Harrison. We did not know yet that tea is a time of day in British Canada. This tea turned out to be another complete turkey dinner. Such was the munificence showered upon us that Christmas that we ate two turkey dinners.

We spent the evening with Ernest and his family. His handsome children, having returned from skiing on Mt. Royal, were flushed and excited. Mrs. Harrison was polite but reserved, and conversation was difficult to maintain. Soon, refusing help, she retired to the kitchen to cope with the dishes. It was obvious that Ernest, in his intense inward {{p117}} devotion to the Cause was in, but not of, the life of the house. I thought, “He stands erect on a hill, a weather-beaten monument to God.” Years later, his wife gone, Ernest came alone as a pioneer to Prince Edward Island.

We spoke seven times in the six remaining days of our visit. As in our other meetings in New York and the other cities, our efforts were confirmed by a power other than our own merit. There was no doubt in our minds that, during our week in Montreal, May’s prayers clothed and protected us even as the furs in which she wrapped me warmed me in the below-zero temperatures. We followed the schedule made for us until, on Sunday, we spoke in the pulpit of one of the two churches where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had spoken. From my seat in the carved pulpit chair I looked down into May’s eyes – eyes that shone with an electric light. We were in the full focus of “her prayers. Their strength parted the veils between earth and the heavenly forces. To rise and speak, well, what else could we have done? After the meeting in the church, the little group of the very first Bahá'ís in Montreal went to the Maxwell house and laid out a community supper.

The life of the household flowed pleasantly around us. Mary's young friends, called "The Youth Group", came and went. Most were students at McGill University, where Mary was enrolled in special classes. Several were of mixed racial background. One student, for instance, was of Irish and Japanese parentage. Mary's tutor in Arabic was Turkish. There was a Black in the group too; Eddie Eliot, an electrician. Emeric Sala and Roland Estall were youth then, and Rosemary Gillis, a rare, dark, Scottish girl, very striking with high cheekbones, full features and jet black hair. A lifelong friendship with Rosemary began the afternoon that May sent the three of us for a sleigh-ride on Mt. Royal. {{p118}}

As we rode we saw spread below us, the St. Lawrence River with its bridges and the vista of the city of Montreal. Our views were split by the looming back of the driver. With his bushy fur coat and great cap, he resembled a bear. It was a crystalline world we rode through, and we talked about ourselves. Rosemary said, "My greatest test is Mary. She is so far above me that I feel quite dumb. She is so lovely, such a teacher, so gifted. I never can think of anything to say when I am with her."

I smiled at the description of my own ego plight. "Rosemary, how well you have described my own feelings since coming here, and, more than that, my experience of "nothingness". I feel that May is calling where ordinary mortals cannot follow." Willard listened, indulgently, but made no remark.

In the evening we were invited to meet with members of the Youth Group. Because it was Christmas week, a feeling of gaiety was in the air and I wished I had something to wear besides my veteran blue silk dress. As I started downstairs, Mary called from her room, "Would you like to wear this? I think it looks like you." It was her glamorous Spanish shawl; blue roses embroidered on a square of white silk, with a fringe of shaded blue at least eighteen inches wide. Mary draped this over my "Alice blue" shoulders and joined me in a rapturous gaze in the mirror. Instantly, I had become a somebody! Enchanted, I wore my blue finery with the flair of a Spanish lady.

When I returned from the meeting I stopped at Mary's room to return the shawl. "Why, Doris," said Mary, "the shawl is my gift to you. It is perfect for you."

The joy of the Maxwell house had been showered upon me, yet I was still captive of a gloomy withdrawal of spirit. With May, my wings were of lead. I had remained dumb during those hours she had talked with us about the Cause, the {{p119}} presence of the Master illuminating her words and physical being. I thought, ruefully, of the early story of Elizabeth Greenleaf running away from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, yet lingering in a contradiction of love and fear. My Montreal visit was drawing to a close. On the last day May came into my room to find me cast down on the bed, crying. She had to know why. I told her how the week had been agonizing for me, "as if a part of myself has been burning away".

She suggested that now I could begin to understand Shoghi Effendi's anguish when called to the station of Guardian. She had known of his pain. She explained, "To the extent that we elect to carry that cross ourselves, will he be relieved of his burden."

"Is this," I asked "what is meant by the station of martyrdom?"

"Yes," she responded.

At last I had spoken and May had answered. She stayed with me awhile, comforting me by pouring heavenly love on me. She had become my spiritual mother, and that is how I still think of her. A tenderness, not of this world, was communicated to me and my self-thing with her was banished forever.

We would return again to our administrative duties on the Teaching Committee, but now there would be a difference. Willard knew this when he came back from his walk. He knew that he was stepping into a new heaven. May had taken us into her heart and now was spiritually related to us. The glow of warmth has never cooled in the forty years since she left this world.

That night May moved into our room, and Willard and I slept in the bed of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She had made the bed with green sheets and over us spread the gown of the Greatest Holy Leaf. It was called the "Robe of Bounty". I lay awake {p120} many hours that night, aware of the unusual lightness and unsubstantiality of my physical body; sometimes, I seemed to be floating above it.

We stayed close together on our last day and May spoke of many things. It was then that we learned about the Robe of Bounty. The Greatest Holy Leaf had given it to Lua Gettsinger and Lua had given it to May. Shoghi Effendi had said its presence in Montreal was most portentous. Its counterpart existed as a spiritual reality, a mystery and a bounty like the {Tablet of Ahmad}.

May told us an intimate story that helped to explain her constant reference to the Guardian. She had been prostrated with grief at the death of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and, for months, had remained ill in bed. When she was called to visit the Guardian she arose and went, in a wheelchair. In Haifa she experienced the shock of the Master's absence and suffered the realization that she would never see Him again. The thought of losing Him forever overwhelmed her, and she lost the strength to leave her bed again.

In her most despairing moment, the youthful Guardian, then twenty-six, came and stood by her bed. As their eyes met, it was 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Himself, who stood there, as if He had never been away. As the vision faded into the form of Shoghi Effendi, her startled recognition of his conferred identity with the Centre of the Covenant restored her spirit. She had once more contacted the spirit of the Master and had been given evidence of His presence and His nearness to her.

The next day Shoghi Effendi wheeled her chair to the tomb of the Báb, which is also the burial place of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He helped her to stand and asked her to walk with him around the shrine. Supported by his arm, she took the first faltering steps and then walked slowly around the tomb. {{p121}}

May’s healing had begun and ultimately she was restored both in body and in mind. She had glimpsed the reality of the Guardianship, the Valíyy-i-Amru’lláh (Defender of the Faith), and her devotion was complete.

After a New Year’s party in the ballroom, with Mary’s Youth Group, Sutherland drove us to the train. In parting he clasped around my neck a silver chain with a blue butterfly pendant.

1930

We left the noise of the cities and returned to the stunning silence of the Geneva countryside. The orchards were asleep now, tucked under a blanket of snow. Falling snow blurred a soft stillness.

On the first starry night we put on skis and went up Emerald Hill. Willard seemed to know all the stars by name, as had my father. I could never remember them so I would ask him about the constellations. We skied down the Hill and back to the house where the old dog, Kim was waiting. We piled more applewood on the fire and talked about our teaching trip. May’s spiritual intonations echoed through memory with the clarity of a silver trumpet.

Jimmy Tollis was looking well and unusually happy when he breezed in one day. He had been depressed for weeks and I had included his name in the healing prayers that we said at the Revells’ house. Jimmy had been suffering from stomach ulcers.

We asked him about his health and he was pleased to tell us, “Why, I got well all of a sudden. One day I was working in the fields, and then, one moment, all the pain in my stomach was gone. I knew the moment because I actually felt {{p122}} the pain stop.” Jimmy laughed. “I ran home shouting to Mary, ‘I’m well! Mary, I tell you I’M WELL!’ And I’ve been well ever since.”

Willard asked, “Do you remember the date?” “Yes. It was so strange, I marked it on the calendar. December 17th.”

Willard took out his little black book and showed us where he had recorded the healing prayers for Jimmy. The date and the hour corresponded.

Night School

In the days of a deepening Depression, the Bahá’ís had fallen into step to achieve the latest objective in the construction of the Temple – the raising of the steel structure above the foundation. The challenge was to find extra ways of making money. Mine was to teach a night-school class in the high school. I had given a course the previous year, but attendance was so close to the minimum that, should anyone drop out, I was always in danger of losing it.

On registration night I sat in the auditorium, quaking and praying. To a hall half-full of applicants, the Principal described my class as one in Elementary Design. It stood apart from the many other utilitarian courses offered. I repeated silently the prayer for the Remover of Difficulties and did not pause. When all the courses had been described, the applicants were told to report to the rooms to which the courses of their choice were assigned.

“Oh, God, let there be at least eight,” I prayed.

I hurried upstairs to the Art room. Fifteen easels were there. Providence looked down on me with a smile, I think. Had I been too urgent in my petitions? Thirty-five crowded {{p123}} the room and less than half had anywhere to sit. I noticed that the students were quite young and very talkative.

The class was moved to the Chemistry Laboratory and I began, three nights a week. When my grandmother became ill and was dying in Rochester, I went to her and, until her death on January 27th, commuted to class.

I suffered from that loss and felt a built-up exhaustion fall upon me. I returned to Geneva very ill with a cold. My Monday-night class was disastrous. On Wednesday night I was even more ill. The infection was in my sinuses, throat, chest and kidneys. Then a beautiful thing happened. Like Jimmy Tollis, I had an instant cure. On that night I went to my class, my symptoms disappeared quickly and all of us worked in an absorbing harmony. There were wings over that class that night.

Outside, in the chilly weather, Willard was waiting to take me home. “Something miraculous has happened,” I told him. “I am actually well and my class and I have been in heaven.” I was sitting beside my miracle. Willard had not gone to the library as was his habit; instead, he sat out in the car in front of the school praying that I would be healed.

We were happy to have another confirmation of one of the promises in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s writings. This is my favourite:

“When you call on the mercy of God waiting to reinforce you, your strength will be tenfold.”[^]

To believe such words was to have our powers expanded.

“The truth is that God has given men supernatural powers ... in man there is a power that is bestowal of God.”[^]

[^] [-Bahá, {Foundations of World Unity} (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1971) p.62.]

Our friends and teachers who had known the Master had lived, through the inspiration of His presence, in the realm of the spirit. The classnight of my cure was, for us, yet another glimpse into the vibrant world of a level of super-consciousness that is available to us, do we but wish it!

Mr. Ivanoski Paints a Portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

"I have decided to commission Mr. Ivanoski to paint a picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá," announced Mrs. Frances Esty. She, Willard, and I were looking at the portraits of family members in the Esty home in Buffalo. The paintings were in the style of the Impressionists, vibrating with flecks of light-diffused colour.

"Mr. Ivanoski spent some time with us before he painted the portraits," she explained. "No one sits for a portrait. He tries to catch the essence of his subjects by studying them in different light and in different moods, noting their changing expressions. When he is ready, he excuses himself from the world around him and becomes absorbed in his painting."

"Painting is a form of meditation," I offered.

"Painting is prayer," she added.

From the vibrating colour on the walls we followed our hostess into her Bahá'í garden. "I built this garden when my husband died. I commune with him as I work here and I know that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is with us."

She took us to a tea-room in the afternoon. A woman psychic was there moving about and reading teacups. She stopped at our table, turned my cup around, looked grave, and said, "I see you leaving your home."

I exclaimed, "Oh, no. No! I plan to spend the rest of my life there. I never want to live anywhere else!" But the woman replied, "Time will tell if I am correct."

The first visit to Mrs. Esty's came at the turning of summer into autumn and while the late summer roses were vying with her budding chrysanthemums. She was pleased when my article, "The Garden of the Heart", appeared in World Order. In March, she invited me to go with her and her daughter to the Annual Flower Show in New York and to see Mr. Ivanoski's portrait.

On the drive to the artist's home in New Jersey I learned that, for weeks, Mr. Ivanoski had 'lived' with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, studied photographs of Him, read stories of His life, absorbed His words.

"I have planned this," said Mrs. Esty, happily, "hoping that Mr. Ivanoski will see the light and become a Bahá'í."

A servant opened the door into an unfamiliar world, an old world of polished luxuriance. In the centre of this environment was the superlative personality of the artist himself. His courtesy put me at ease after my shock of being served a formal luncheon by an attending footman.

“Yes, I returned to Poland after the First World War,” our host was saying. “I was to be with Mr. Paderewski when the League of Nations appointed him Premier of the Polish state. I came here last year with him.”

I ventured that Willard and I had heard Paderewski play at a concert in Aeolian Hall after his triumphant return and that he wore, over his shoulder, a wide scarf with the colours of Poland, red, green, and white. He opened by playing Chopin’s {Polonaise}. {{p126}}

“I too, was there. A great occasion,” said Ivanoski. After our return from Poland, Mr. Paderewski turned to his music and I to my studio. Shall we go there now to view the painting?”

The walls were high and there was a skylight. A large area of the wall facing the door was curtained in a soft neutral-hued material like velour or velvet. We took chairs, well back and to the right of the curtain. Mr. Ivanoski pulled a cord and the curtain opened wide. There was a brief breathlessness. In silence, we beheld a large illuminated canvas.

It was superb. Mr. Ivanoski was, indeed, a master painter. A prophetic figure sat on a bench in a garden, the details subordinated to the figure and, especially, to the face. The effects were gentle and beneficent. We knew that the artist shared our reverence.

I had second thoughts, however, thoughts that I kept to myself. The picture, prized as it was, had been painted by someone who had felt the warmth of the Master but not the heat which I see in some of His photographs. In them I detect a bit of the “Mystery of God”. His eyes are a reflection of two realities: the right eye speaks a compassion for humanity and of an intimate understanding; the left eye is unfathomable and as untameable as a falcon in heaven. These are some of the things that I see.

Tea with Marjory Morton

Mr. and Mrs. Max Greenvan and Montfort Mills were there in New York. The Greenvans had been away for eight years to Haifa, Japan, India, and some of the European countries. Marjory had been to Haifa six times. While we sat eating pate sandwiches and sipping a smoky Sooshong tea from Chinese cups, we talked about the Words of Bahá’u’lláh and later of {{p127}} World Administration. Marjory began to tell us about her first pilgrimage;

On her first voyage to Haifa, she had been very sick. The sea was rough and she had to be carried to the small boat that took the passengers ashore. Later, at the Master’s table, she had to refuse food. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá placed a plate in front of her and said, “Eat.” She accepted, although she was so miserable she that thought it would kill her. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá brought her a second helping, she thought, “It is certain now that I will die. But if it is the Master’s will, I will die for Him.” She ate the second plate of food.

She was healed, of course – not only of her present ills, but also of a chronic stomach ailment.

How impatient I was in those days in New York! There were so many things I wanted to do. Certainly not to spend so much time shopping with my companion or making the daily visits to the Flower Show. I prayed, “O God, make me free and without desire.” I became resigned and at last I recognized the test and accepted it. Of itself, that recognition was important. During the last two days, other plans developed for Mrs. Esty and her daughter and I was free of my social obligations. Like an arrow, I shot to May and Mary’s hotel and was accompanied by them on another visit to the Kinneys. I met Millie Collins then and shared a room with her for the night.

When I think of Millie, I am flooded with descriptive phrases. A small love-activated hurricane will do, for a start. She had grey eyes and wispy hair and wore dark businesslike clothes. She was unpretentious, efficient. Her jewelry sparkled, as did her fun. “I want you to help me write for the Convention, a report of the National Spiritual Assembly meeting,” she asked. The next morning we wrote the report while she packed her bags for the trek west.

After Millie left, I returned to May’s hotel for farewell prayers. While I settled in her room, she crossed and took something out of her suitcase. It was the Robe of Bounty. She spoke again of Lua and wrapped the robe around me so that I was covered with its faded apricot pinkness. We said the prayers and talked about teaching. Then I left for an appointment, at the Kinneys’, with Mr. Hubert. I was delighted to hear his promise to study the Faith and to speak of it to his associates. He drove me back to join the Estys in taking a night train to Buffalo.

National Convention – 1930

Katherine Cole and I had taken the long road from her home in Cleveland to Wilmette. ‘We went via Flint, Michigan, where we picked up Helen Whitney. On the next day of our journey we held a meeting in Detroit and spent the night with Bahá’í friends. Lou Eggleston was at the meeting. I had been introduced to him by the Obers, the year before, in Buffalo. Lou was pensively reserved-tonight. His mind and heart were at odds, he later told us, battling the decision to become a Bahá’í. He put his struggles into questions during the meeting and we were able to give him convincing proofs. His inner conflict was resolved and he accepted the Faith academically, as Willard had done, and followed us to Convention the next day.

The Bahá’ís were dressed in last year’s clothes, •the brightness of their faces making up for the absence of new spring finery.

On one wall of Foundation Hall hung the fabulous rug from the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. It was sent by the Guardian with the {{p129}} suggestion that it be sold for the benefit of the Temple Fund. It had not been necessary to make this sacrifice. To our own efforts had been added those of the friends in other countries and actually we had on hand the $400,000 required for the erection of the steel framework. We did not have to sell the carpet. We had responded to the Guardian's call and, during the first gaunt years of the Depression, we had achieved "the impossible". WE HAD WON! The work would begin in August. Mr. Bourgeois' plaster model of the finished Temple was displayed on a rotating black velvet mat on the speaker's table. It was in the Temple that our dreams had taken shape.

We watched for Lou. He had come and then disappeared. We were to learn later, that for the best part of two days, he walked the shores of Lake Michigan making up his mind before taking the final plunge – not into the Lake, but into the 'Bahá'í Faith. He had found rather shattering his initial entrance into the Convention. He was overwhelmed by the variety of personalities, the mixture of nationalities and races, and our uninhibited cries of greeting. Most disturbing of all, he said, was the experience of being an alien in a new dimension. The rest of us, it appeared, had somehow arrived in another world.

When he made his appearance, his friends were waiting for him. The Obers, the Geneva group, and Helen Whitney, who bore him away under her wing. I am telling this story because it is history. Lou and Helen met again at Green Acre and in due time they were married. The Bahá'í summer school at Louhelen Ranch is one of their fruits.

The spirit of the Convention was joyous, triumphant, high. During the reports of activities, I was called upon to tell of the interracial work in Rochester. I smiled at Mabel Ives, who was as excited as a little mother hen, entranced by the {{p130}} peeping of her chick. Rochester had been Mabel's plan in the first place. Mabel was always more than a teacher, she was an organizer.

The newly elected National Spiritual Assembly appointed Rex Collison, Chairman and Doris McKay, Secretary of the National Teaching Committee. May Maxwell, Dr. Heist, and Louis Gregory were the other members.

I drove back to Cleveland with Katherine Cole, and Louis Gregory joined us. 'Kay' invited her friends to come and hear about the Faith and to share in Louis' vegetable pilau – a pilau festooned this time by a wreath of fresh spinach. I continued to Rochester where Elizabeth Brooks was in heaven over the formation of a Bahá'í study class. Sally Reynolds was an ignited teacher there. I wrote, at the end of the trip, "The fire of the Love of God has been at white heat and many veils have been consumed along the way."

Convention of the Urban League

James Hubert kept his promise. I was invited to Buffalo to attend as an observer, the convention of the Urban League. It was an all-Black convention with delegates from forty-three states.

I was so with them, in body and soul, that I forgot my whiteness. When I stepped out to do an errand, I experienced the shock of reentering a world of white majority.

I was given ten minutes, at the end of the last session in which to introduce the Faith. I spoke on the abolition of prejudice, emphasizing our meetings in which racial unity was practised in our homes. There was a warm applause from the {{p131}} audience. One member, a minister, told me that my talk had been a benediction.

My Harlem friends, Mr. Hubert and Mr. Allen, drove me home. We stopped for dinner at a wayside restaurant. This act, in itself, was a bold step over a social frontier. A well-dressed birthday party occupied the tables by the windows. I smile as I recall the double row of startled faces; the ones with their backs to the entrance turned around to stare openmouthed. They beheld a rather wispy-looking me, escorted by two aggressive-looking members of the darker race. At our side table, after ordering the choicest food on the menu, we were treated with a dazed deference. We made a noteworthy exit, too. My friends stopped to buy cigars. There, next to the desk was an advertisement for another dining place. Three, two-foot-high capital letters, “KKK” stood to represent the Klu Klux Klan which was active in these parts.

Exhilarated and talkative after our successful foray, we drove on to Geneva. Mr. Hubert and Mr. Allen stayed the night, and the next day, the Collisons came and we all went to Seneca Lake for a picnic.

Cheng Returns

Cheng was being admitted to Leland Stanford University for doctoral studies in the fall. Before he went there, he returned to spend the summer with us on the farm. He planned, when he completed his studies, to return to China. It was a duty to his people, he explained, although he would prefer to have stayed in America. “I have now come to stay, except next week, when I will be driving to Pennsylvania to visit a friend.”

Cheng now considered us to be his adopted parents. Our “son” had come home to us on all of his school vacations and {{p132}} we attended his Cornell graduation. To his professors, he had introduced us as “my family”.

Cheng was a follower of Lao Tzu and always had with him a precious little leather-bound book, {The One Thousand Sayings of Lao Tzu}. It was, of course, in Chinese. He and I translated a few pages into English, and I found that it contained the familiar triad of God, Manifestation, and Man.

Cheng’s bright face was always at our Bahá’í meetings. He indulged our emotional response to the glad tidings of Bahá’u’lláh’s appearance in our own day as if he felt himself to be an “older soul” with a heart of mandarin antiquity.

On Sunday night, ‘Alí Kuli Khán carne to speak. Our spirits were so elevated. Cheng rose to speak, complimenting us respectfully, but stating with an unusual emphasis, “But for me, I am a practical man, a philosopher.” On the next morning, he left us for his Pennsylvanian holiday.

On Tuesday morning the telephone rang and a voice asked, “Are ‘you the friend of the Chinese student, Chun Chuan Cheng?”

“Yes, but why?”

“I am a Dean of Cornell University and I regret to inform you that Cheng was killed. in an automobile accident in Pennsylvania. “

Thus the dramatic exit of our “practical man”. How soon was he to learn the ultimate practicality of preparing for the life to come. Dear Cheng, the love of so many people followed him to the next world. We prayed that he would be “one of the fruits that ripen best when plucked from the tree”.

We had been functioning that summer as a Bahá’í community. Young people had converged on the farm from different directions, asking to stay and work for their board. {{p133}} Goldie and Frank Haffner from Pittsburgh, eighteen-year-old Otto from Germany, and Sabri Jamál from Baghdád, sent to us by Horace Holley. Everett Bosch came with his gift of music, and Lorna was a guest.

The summer of 1930 was the nearest that I ever carne to an ordered routine. I arose with Willard at five-thirty or six and vanished into a secluded porch behind a curtain of vines. My typewriter was there beside files of correspondence for the Outline Bureau and the National Teaching Committee. After writing three or four hours, I would go in search of breakfast. In the kitchen, the serving trays would have been prepared and waiting for the boys hours before. Fruit, jam, and bread would be put out on the table, and the house custom was to help oneself and eat wherever one liked.

Later, with Goldie’s help, I would prepare a simple lunch. The workers would come in, bathe, and help themselves to sandwiches, salads, and cookies. We would carry our lunch out to the porches, or to ‘the picnic nooks, or sit inside and listen to Everett play the piano.

For the evening meal we became civilized. We would dress up a little for a seven-o’clock dinner at a table set with candles and flowers. Willard served with high style. After dinner the boys carried out and washed the dishes, and we would have conversation and readings, sometimes games and dances. It was a party every night.

Unity is a Light-Giving Essence

I had experienced a succession of “covenants” and, over time, I was to see their effect on the motives that pushed me forward. There WAS a power in the promises made to God, especially when those promises were made in the presence of other Bahá'ís who were activated by the same resolves. {{p134}} Foremost among those covenants, were the promises that Lorna and I had made on the night of the burning log promises to practise universal love. The vows of Bahá'í marriage represented another covenant. I had experienced another, with May Maxwell, when she asked us to join in a prayer triangle, each begging divine guidance for the mission the Guardian had given her – "to the extent that we elect to carry the burden, will the Guardian be relieved of his." She helped me to realize that, indeed, we do elect to become believers, elect to assume spiritual responsibilities and elect to become living martyrs. Lastly, there were the prayers of dedication called for by Saffa Kinney. The motive for all of these covenants was UNITY.. At one of the conventions, Elizabeth Greenleaf had called unity "a light-giving essence". She had said that unity must change the believers before the believers could change the world.

On June 25th, 1930 Howard Ives wrote me a letter. Howard would usually begin a letter by describing recent events and his health or lack of it. He would preface his remarks by saying that the letter would be short. More often than not, by the time he finished describing his health, he would be struck by a train of inspiration streaming gold. This is what he wrote on that day:

"Unity is the great key to spiritual progress. The unity of believers must be of such a character that never ,NEVER , must one single thought of anything but love and sympathy and kindness and reverence enter into such a heart. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that when we see even the slightest traces of love for Bahá'u'lláh in any soul, we must reverence that soul. How great then must be the reverence we have for those souls who are fully confirmed in the Cause of God and have arisen for service... {{p135}}

"But our great task, as individual believers, is to see that, in the group in which God has called us to serve, never does the slightest breath of anything but love arise. And that constantly, at every moment of our spiritual journey, every selfish desire, every human attachment must be banished and we must find our greatest joy in becoming 'as dust beneath the feet of the friends.' ... This is the station of unity in this Day to which the believers of God are called...

"Upon thee be glory and peace! Upon thee be all the confirmations of holiness and sanctity! In His Name and love, Daddy Howard"

Such was, in part, the letter from my spiritual father.

We continued to assist the Cause in Binghamton and Rochester, but Geneva too, needed attention. As individuals, we were all growing spiritually. We were close, like the children of one family. There were ties that bound us together and, yet, we did have conflicting qualities. We needed administrative growth, too, and the mysterious quality of unity was eluding us. The "perfect unity" as the standard set by 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the hope of Shoghi Effendi did not exist. At least, not in Geneva. Willard, Lorna, and I prayed for our unity and Lorna, Ruth Hawthorne, and I were encouraged further by May's promise to share with us a prayer covenant. Regardless of the physical distances that separated us, every morning each of us prayed the dream of unity that we shared.

One late afternoon I was in my room, praying for a sign from Bahá'u'lláh, and the inconceivable happened. I was suddenly in His presence. The attempt to describe my {{p136}} entrance into that emanation calls for a host of inadequate similes. Still, I must try. It was as if I were struck by a scattering wind, an explosion within my soul. I tasted the Cup of Bliss and had a frightened premonition of loss. Grief overwhelmed me. The Presence would not stay, but, like a rainbow, faded from me. Perhaps, even in the next world, I would not be worthy of this unearned Grace from God, this Gift of the Meeting!

I fled downstairs to Lorna and Goldie, who put their arms tightly around me as if to save me from flying to pieces, but I could not stop crying and shaking. I could not tell them what had happened. Then Lorna had an inspiration. She found our black cat “Dido” and put him in my arms, and I paced the lawn in my bare feet. Eventually, I came back to the comfort of this earth.

That night I wrote on a scrap of paper that I have kept through all our moves:

“His darts, thrown from afar struck deep within my heart. Yet I wept not from pain of the jagged wounds that cut my Self away but that the Hand which held the darts would not be mine to hold, perhaps, till time was old.

Yearning, desire, despair! His Beauty, shining like a Sun! It was as if my Dearest Love – but never known – had passed me by, bound for eternity. {{p137}}

His Beauty had not been a scourge. His Heat an endless drought; Had thirst and pain not been His call to me? His way of telling me where shade lay deep and balm grew near the spring.

He passed; But left His handmaids with me.”

I went that evening to the Assembly meeting, a meeting I had been dreading. The gentle impact of the Presence was with me still and I sat quietly. For once I was not over-zealous and outspoken. I was not forcing my thoughts upon this group. And in that way I saw at last, my aggressive spirit subdued. I was no longer a test to any of this group. And the prayers of the maidservants, in the covenant that we shared for unity, were answered. I record this because of the great lesson He taught me.

An Early Teaching Conference

What was Bahá'í teaching like fifty years ago? When we became Bahá'ís, most teachers were like the apostles of Christ. They had arisen to travel and to teach while the Master was still living. As long as these teachers were alive, they were here to train and inspire us.

Now, the Guardian had issued a call. There were three goals: teaching, completion of the Temple, and the growth of the Administrative Order. On August 16th, Lorna and arrived at Green Acre for one of the earliest teaching conferences. Teachers came. Some were members of the National Spiritual Assembly or the National Teaching {{p138}} Committee. Others were members from the eastern Bahá'í communities.

Rex Collison, as chairman, opened the meeting by reading beautifully from the Writings. Someone rose to suggest that all of us might, at least, learn to read the words effectively, as Rex had done. Our program was aggressive, yet practical:

How to Confirm New Groups How to Attract Youth The Personal Study of the Teachings Inter-Assembly Cooperation

There was consultation on the importance of the Guardian's statement that the Bahá'ís should visit one another. In the evening, the Ives spoke on "How to Do Bahá'í Work in a Large City" and "How to Follow-up a Big Meeting."

Mary Collison reported on the success of the Outline Bureau's project. Questions and assignments were added to the study outlines which we had prepared and referenced. Together they formed a new correspondence course for which close to 300 had applied. Mary commented on the question, "How to deepen in the Cause?" by quoting the Guardian, "To deepen in the Cause means to read the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh and the Master so thoroughly as to be able to give it to others in its pure form."

On Sunday morning Lorna was asked to speak on "Inspiration" and to read a number of her poems.

The conference was an enjoyable three days full of enthusiasm and resolve, and there was time to be with our friends: time for a supper in Portsmouth with Jessie Revell, a {{p139}} trip to Ogunquit with George Spendlove and Rosemary Sala, a picnic on Mt. Salvat. I remember an evening with George and Lorna. We had spread a carpet on a bank above the river and, by the light of the headlamps of Lorna's car, read from {Bahá'í Scriptures}.

The Green Acre Teaching Conference spawned others in several communities. Teaching was on the move. So was racial amity. The Geneva conference was held in October, on the 19th. Louis Gregory and Juliet Thompson were there, along with forty others.

I went with Juliet to show her where to put her coat and hat. A bed overflowed with the outer garments of our guests. At this first meeting she seemed to be without the accents of personality which most of us rely upon. Yet, I am sure that if she had slipped quietly into a crowd, no one would have failed to recognize her distinction. Only a few of us knew that she had been singled out by the Master for a tender and special love. It was Juliet who had been the distinguished artist that had painted His portrait. Unlike Mr. Ivanoski, Juliet had experience the warmth and the transforming heat of the Master's love.

Juliet Thompson

Louis and I had gone to Rochester a few days earlier, to meet Juliet at Sally Reynolds'. Sally was out of town and was leaving the house to the three of us. We visited in the afternoon, cooked our dinner, and planned a meeting for the evening. A "fireside" is what we would call it now. Elizabeth Brooks was with us to help. In that radiant and carefree atmosphere of the spirit, I thought, "Actually, in ordinary life we are only half alive. A person becomes a keyboard with two {{p140}} extra octaves: one, childlike and free, balanced by the deeper notes of a self we never plumb."

Seventeen came to hear Juliet speak that evening. To be with Juliet was to find the beloved Master. His qualities radiated from her as naturally as her breath. A small divan was set at an angle in Sally's living room and Juliet sat there, relaxed and loving, waiting to begin. She rested her notebook on her lap and read excerpts from it. It was her diary of the days that she spent with 'Abdu'l-BaM, first meeting Him in the Holy Land, then with Him during His visit to New York. She told of the moment when He appeared at the blue door of her room, and as she recalled the event, words deserted her. Silence spoke instead. She was overwhelmed by her own unworthiness, just as she had been then. She implored us to understand. We watched her eyes, reading in them the message she had come to bring us of a divine love and a supernatural awe of the. "Mystery of God". "About my shortcomings," she smiled, "I was taking them too seriously. I was afraid to meet the Master, forgetting that He would understand and forgive me."

The next morning Juliet was bubbling with high spirits. She and I blew around in gales – of laughter, getting breakfast for Louis. "Oh, come on, Louis, break your rule and have a cup of coffee with us," she teased. "Very well," said Louis, "since it is you who asked. One teaspoon of your coffee in a cup of hot water, please." I wish I could remember the conversation of these two young/old apostles of Bahá'u'lláh. He had said, "Drink thou with a healthy relish, O people of Bahá." [^] This we did, with joy and exultation.

When Louis left, Juliet and I tackled a sinkful of dishes. "This • is a good time, Juliet," I said, waving my dishtowel, "to tell me about your life as a young Bahá'í in Paris. How did it begin?" {{p141}}

"It was the artist, Mrs. Alice Barney, who opened the door for me to go to Paris and study at the Sorbonne. Through her, I met her daughter Laura who took me to May Bolles' apartment. There, on the wall, was a picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I had found the Person whom I had seen in my dream as a young girl. That was the beginning. May answered my questions and I became a Bahá'í."

Her story sounded like the opera {Manon} or the romantic story of {Trilby}. The life of the artist on the Left Bank. Through her story she wove the names of Sutherland Maxwell, Hippolite Dreyfus Barney, Thomas Breakwell, Mason Remey. They were all young then and studying in Paris. May Bolles' apartment was where they met.

"At the Beaux Arts Ball", Juliet laughed reminiscently, "Laura, Jackie and I vowed to give the Message to all our dancing partners. What a magical evening – fancy dress, lights, music, youth and dreams, and our glorious Message given to listening ears."

Urban League Speakers in Geneva

The building had the facade of a Greek temple with imposing pillars. The hall was large and, on this day, packed to the doors with a mixed smalltown audience who had come with equally mixed emotions balancing between racial prejudice and curiosity.

It was Mary Collison's idea. She had persuaded the Women's Club to open their fall program with talks from the Urban League secretaries, Mr. Hubert and Mr. Allen. As a special attraction, Harry T. Burleigh would sing.

As a famous composer and singer, Mr. Burleigh strode onto the stage and, with the magic of his voice, dominated the gathering. His charm was irresistible. He gave us all the humour and pathos possible of the Negro spirituals. He opened with a personalized rendition of "Deep River" and wound up with one of his own compositions, "The Gospel Train". He even simulated the whistle with his voice. The audience, enchanted, called him to sing it again. The first lesson of the evening was that music is a universal language. Our little band of Bahá'ís exchanged proud glances. In turn, Mr. Hubert and Mr. Allen spoke about the dramatic upward struggle of their race and how the League was organized for social and economic advance. Their talks were informative and appealing.

The Geneva audience looked somehow changed, as if relieved from their cramping thoughts. They had been raised to think of Blacks as their "enemy". They found now, that the "enemy" had stirred their love and their respect. For many it was a bewildering experience. Some of them might have been members of the Ku Klux Klan, which had threatened to burn a cross on our farm.

Sam and Lois Allen stayed with us, as did Louis Gregory. We ate breakfast outside when we could and I remember one morning when I was shocked to watch Sam stack a large tray with coffee, cream and sugar, pop-overs, jam, butter, the dishes and silverware. He picked it up, balanced it above his head, and ran through the house. "No worry," he said. "I got my training as a pullman porter."

Sam and I were old friends since the Urban League convention in Buffalo. But Lois was not so easy to get to know. For all the fun and intimate talks we shared, Lois had to make a conscious decision to trust us.

The invitation to the Urban League was reciprocated. The Collisons and the McKays were invited to Harlem on November 8th and 9th. We were asked to bring as many as thirty friends, who would be entertained in Harlem homes. Actually, {{p143}} only fifteen Bahá'ís stayed in Harlem. The Ives came from Hartford, Connecticut, the Obers from Pittsburgh, and there was a carload each from Geneva and Binghamton. Louis Gregory joined us. Generous hospitality was bestowed upon us and our hosts showed us the town, introducing us to notables and to other people's homes. I like to think that the minglings were under Divine auspices – a foretaste of the “fruits of one tree”.

Willard drove back with the Geneva friends but I stayed over another day with the Aliens. Lois confided in me her deep-seated racial prejudice. She was well-educated. Her father had been a graduate of Princeton. It was not an ignorant prejudice. She said, “I can't help it. If there is a knock on the door and a White man stands there, my heart sinks. Whoever it is, if he is White, I feel the same.”

When I asked her if she would take me to the Museum of Modern Art, she was self-conscious about going out on the street with me, but she was game and we fared forth together. In the Museum, everyone was White. Then Lois called me over to where she was sitting on a bench against the wall. She whispered, “A Black man just came in!” I laughed, and said, “So did a White one!” She got the point.

The Aliens had said, “Come any time,” and in a few weeks I was back. Their third-floor apartment over the League office was, for the three of us, an island in the sky, a place of safety and understanding love.

Perhaps it was the foreboding innate in us at the approach of winter, but accounts of the Great Depression, now in its second year, would seem to explain the gloom of Willard's older brother Cecil. He would draw Willard aside for consultation about the affairs of the farm and would leave, his face closed and grim; Willard, after one of these talks, would {{p144}} be suspiciously cheerful. The Macintosh apples, each wrapped in a square of purple paper, polished and flawless for the New York market, still waited in the old iron barn, hundreds of barrels of them. The earlier fruit had gone at a disastrously low price.

By the fire, with the small iron kettle hung on its ancient crane, we faced the moment of truth. We would have to dismiss the tenant farmers, store or sell our heritage of antique furniture, and leave for wherever we could make a living. Cecil, maintained by a job in town, would assume the affairs on the family farm.

“Gregory, our cat?”

“Lorna's mother would take him,” I said, and arranged it through correspondence. Our beloved black cat with his big six-toed feet, and his triangular head with unusually large ears, was to take the trip by train in an apple crate. Cooked liver was nailed to the walls.

“The cat is lucky,” I thought. “He has a place to go to.” Disrupting thoughts intruded into the bubble-like dome of my security. Suddenly, at one with the refugees of history, were we not, ourselves, the dispossessed? My separation from this beloved spot, the scene of early married life, my Bahá'í childhood, and the present base of a very active Bahá'í life would not come easy. But Willard, mature as always, assured me that my depression would soon pass.

The Providence of May Maxwell

“My calamity is My providence...”[^] Bahá'u'lláh had said. My own quick release from such a passionate attachment was yet another sign of His loving care. As my world began to fall apart, May Maxwell returned and took a room at the Seneca Hotel. She was then in delicate health and would rest in her {{p145}} room for days on end. Those of us on the Teaching Committee would go to her for our consultations. We would be transformed by what Rex Collison called “May’s chemistry.” I was soon able to write,

“A great peace has come over me and I have stepped into the larger perspective of the Faith. I lapse out of it occasionally but, for the most part, I am cheerful and not regretful of the over-shadowing change.”

The creativity of the Committee meetings contributed to my revival, but May would do more to transform our spirits. Willard and I would go up to her room in the evening. She and I would prop ourselves up on pillows and Willard would hover nearby. We did not talk about our problems, which now seemed unreal. Rather, we read prayers and listened to May talk about the love of the Master. Our “providence” was that she poured out on us the healing power of that influence, telling us how much she loved us and inviting us to be “in amity” with her. This meant that she was asking us to make a “prayer triangle” with her – a prayer covenant in each of us would pray to aid her in the accomplishment of a mission that the Guardian had given to her. She said there was a special power in the prayers of three people who were in unity – a hidden mystery to be guarded and worn next to the heart like the keys of a treasure-house. She added, “We should strengthen the ties of unity for the sake of unity itself.”

There was unity in our triangle on those nights in the old hotel. We were led by May into a new dimension. Sometimes there will be souls who are like hollow reeds through which pure music can be piped, reeds cleansed of self. Such souls, the writings tell us, may be the mediators of God’s help to us in this life as well as in the next. “Ye are the angels,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá {{p146}} says, “if your feet be firm, your spirits rejoiced, your secret thoughts pure, your eyes consoled, your ears opened, your breasts dilated with joy...”[^] Because of the ministrations of such a soul, Willard and I, in that soft-lighted room, tasted a life-giving essence. Nor was May alone in helping us. On more than one occasion she spoke of her teacher, Lua Gettsinger.

“Sometimes I feel that Lua is with us,” she would say. “Lua was great because she never deserted a soul to whom she had given life.”

Our committee work was done and May left. I sent to Horace Holley, nine pages of reports for publication in the newsletter. He responded, “Your teaching reports came yesterday. I think this whole activity is the greatest we have done and will lead to the public success of the Cause.”

December passed and the landscape, like the minds of bewildered people, was subdued with greyness and fog. A visit to Elizabeth Brooks in Rochester found her aghast with the state of business in that city. Mabel Ives wrote, “I am ill and can trace my illness to a spiritual condition. I must try to find the key. All Bahá’ís must seek and find spiritual illumination through the vitality of their inner being at this truly dreadful period of confusion.” Louis echoed, “The Bahá’ís are suffering. I have to keep busy every second or I will fall into depression.”

On January 31st, 1931 Willard and I went to Rochester to ask my former High School Principal, now President of the Board of Education, if there were any jobs for us. His reluctant answer was “No”.

We began looking for school or agricultural jobs, first near home, later in the west or the south. If God had a plan for us, {{p147}} we did not have a clue, but we seemed strangely preserved from the expected anxiety.

“We are waiting in the dark,” I wrote, “yet with trust. No one ever had poorer prospects. We ought to be congealed with apprehension, but somehow we are being set free by this breaking loose from security.”

May and I Test Each Other

May returned about this time and committee work resumed. From my notes, January 29th:

“We have just returned from an evening with May. She has been talking about the elimination of self in teaching, about being humble, letting others do the talking. She says that this she can never learn! When the ego shows up, the other person loses interest.

We have had dramatic experiences of prayer with May. She is very powerful and brings down to us a little of heaven’s fire. Yet, some of the time she has been out of sorts. She would like us to understand that the call to the early Bahá’ís was to be heroes. It did not follow that they were always saints.

Last night, a test surprised me. After returning home from one of those exalting evenings, Willard went to bed; I stayed up, praying in the room downstairs. Perhaps May was praying too, for it seemed that suddenly I was invaded by her presence. Body, soul and mind were rocked by the entrance of her being into mine. I did not have the capacity to contain such grace. So this is what May meant by her oft-repeated phrase, ‘interpenetration of spirit’. I was afraid and, then, surprisingly angry. It was a defensive response to my troublesome lower nature. {{p148}}

After dawn prayers, wisdom expressed itself in this way: 'To contain May's love, you have to be a receptacle without sides. The celestial unity must flow through, and not be contained by you, otherwise it will shatter you.'

Today she told me that she had been unhappy all day and could not tell why, except that 'half of herself was gone.' It was because I had separated my spirit from May's. I had sat by her bed and complained of her 'wasted relationships' with a number of believers in Geneva, people who were in awe of her, and shy. They were awkward with her and did not know what to say. I spoke of the Master, Who, she had said, instructed her to be 'the centre of the love of God in the western world!' What of those faithful but unnoticed souls? I left May and went to sit in a chair by the window to cool off.

The incident that precipitated my complaint was this. I was painfully aware of a wall between May and the Geneva people. That wall was built on a sense of personal inferiority experienced by the friends. There were, in particular, two sisters. They were physically unattractive and had little to offer in the social graces. They made their living making fishhooks. When these sisters came into contact with the charm and magnetism of May, they sensed a pathetic inferiority and wilted. I took May to task for this. I said to her, "Are you thinking about these people in Geneva as being as full of potential as ordinary Bahá'ís? Why is it they are not elated by your presence as we are? For those of us who know you, we can share friendship, inspiration, love, and talk. But to them, you are a great lady and they are not at home with you. They are not at their best. They feel awkward. Why are these sisters depressed? They should be sparkling too." I had such a nerve to do this. I was wrong in every sense of the word. My notes continue: {{p149}}

How could I have forgotten that our darling May had expended all her strength to make those difficult winter journeys to Geneva? I had forgotten that Willard and I were absolute nobodies in comparison to her, and that unity with her loved ones was the oxygen she breathed. In a few moments she called me, her voice weak and very tired, asking me to say healing prayers for her. Holding her hands, I said the Greatest Name and the healing prayers. She told me that life began to pour into her then.

May had made us feel so at home that we could reproach her. She responded to my observations by planning a big party in the hotel. It was to be like a feast with lots of things to eat. She gave a personal invitation to the sisters, who felt as though they were being summoned by royalty. We went, all of us dressed up and inclined to be a little nervous. May greeted everyone with hugs and kisses and we tasted of the unity in the love of God. People forgot their fear of her and became expansively happy. The next day she was gone, on her way back to New York.

In a few weeks' time she wrote:

“You must know, Doris, without a word of mine, the strength and spiritual depths I have drawn from my association with you since I left. This second meeting has only served to intensify the spiritual interpenetration of each other’s being in the mysterious alchemy of divine love. Almost every night when we are together in communion we seem enveloped and embraced and lifted up into the tangible part of the Supreme Concourse.” {{p150}}

Around the 25th of February, Alfred Lunt invited the Teaching Committee to meet with the National Assembly in New York. I went a day early in order to visit Mabel and Howard Ives in Newark, New Jersey. It was beautiful how they carried a sense of “home” with them throughout their continual changes of location! It was a homecoming to be again with them, especially with our sleeping arrangements that night. They slept in one twin bed and I in the other! The next morning I went back to New York and took a room in the Pennsylvania Hotel, where May was staying.

That night the telephone rang in my room. May told me that she was very ill and asked me to come down to her room and say healing prayers. I sat on her bed with my hand on her heart and said the Greatest Name, seeking to synchronize its rhythm with the irregular beat of her heart. When she was better I stayed there, lying by her side. We talked and it seemed to me as if my atoms were dissolving into an intense healing ray. When I rose to leave, her heart protested, so I waited a little longer until she slept.

Alfred Lunt came from the National Spiritual Assembly meeting greatly concerned about May. She was weary now, but over her attacks. After a day’s rest in bed, she was strong enough for our meeting, which we held in her room, with a quorum of the National Assembly.

The last evening of my stay in New York I spent with Millie Collins. She was returning to California in the morning. I was delighted when she rerouted the first part of her journey so that we could ride together as far as Geneva. We rode, hand in hand, all day, telling each other about ourselves and our lives in the Cause. Millie, I remember, was wearing her beautiful rings, one a large moonstone, the other an emerald, each with a gold inlay of the Greatest Name. These were the {{p151}} gift of her husband, who, she said, had made a fortune in copper. Millie had been a miner’s wife. Her husband was not a Bahá’í, but in his unselfish love for her, he left her free to spend weeks away every year travelling back and forth across the country by train. When the train arrived in Geneva, at eleven o’clock, the friends were waiting on the platform. Millie left the train and rushed out to embrace them.

Our last two weeks at Emerald Hill. We witnessed the disintegration of our material home. We were selling our books, the piano, my grandmother’s dinner set. Our old dog, Kim, was put to sleep. We discarded our country clothes and took on city ones. Our feelings, mercifully, were still detached and’ unreal. I wrote, “Sweetness and softness are being taken out of our lives. And the joy we have known here. Our sense impressions are sharpened to poetry, our awareness lifted to the cosmic.”

I was alone in the dismantled house on the last afternoon, saying the “Remover of Difficulties”, when I passed into an unconscious condition; not asleep, just blank. It was dark when I emerged. I knew at once what wonderful help had come from the Compassionate Spirit. With Bahá’u’lláh’s celestial aid I had been granted a final severance. My attachment was wiped clean. Unlike Lot’s wife, I forgot to look back when we drove away at dawn.

We were going to join the Obers in Pittsburgh, with the expectation of a place to live, a job for Willard, and an abundance of Bahá’í work. The Obers’ pleas made it a mission. The date of our exodus was March 10th, 1931.

We were driving an open Studebaker car, 1923 model, which we had bought from Howard Ives for $25.00. Its buttoned side curtains offered some protection from the March wind and on the floor was our own invention, a lighted {{p152}} farm lantern under a blanket, cosy for the feet. Packed in the back were our overflowing earthly goods. There were chains on the tires to prevent skidding on the icy roads. By the time we arrived in New York City, the public seemed to view us with astonishment as we wound our clickety-clanking way around Riverside Drive.

A visit was planned for us in New York, similar to the one of the year before. We were the invited guests of Loulie, although she was still very ill with pneumonia. She had arranged somehow, for us to attend a matinee at the opera, a play, and a dinner out. We were permitted to see her only once and we found her vital, the life of her body rallying for even greater services to the Faith, although the door of death was still slightly ajar. There were meetings planned for us and visits with the friends – Mrs. Ford, the Holleys, Curtis and Harriet Kelsey, and Mrs. Marie Hopper.

We found these friends kindly as ever, but subdued. There was something else affecting this community, something more than Loulie’s illness and the necessity of moving her to Colorado, something more than the advancing might of the Depression. New York City, called by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá “The City of the Covenant” was being infected by the virus of disunity.

Now we knew what May’s unexplained mission had been. It related to the problems created by Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, who persisted in his disobedience to the Local Spiritual Assembly of New York City, of which he was a member. That disobedience extended to his violation of the authority of the Guardian. The devoted early friends had known Aḥmad when he travelled with the Master as interpreter in 1912. Later, he had been chosen to present ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Divine Plan in 1919. The Guardian, deeply saddened, had asked May to keep contact with Aḥmad and “to make efforts to save him from {{p153}} his own acts.” Awaiting the Guardian’s final instructions, May had complied.

While we were in New York, a cable was received from Haifa. It was over. Aḥmad was declared a covenant-breaker and May was instructed to carry the message to the friends. She asked us to go with her. There was unrest in the hall and some of the people left to follow Aḥmad. Thus, at times, are the believers sifted. There was a hushed silence when May, dignified and pale, stood before the assemblage and read the cable. A Bahá'í friend sitting near me whispered, "Did you see a white light around May as she stood there calling us to steadfastness?"

We were welcomed again to Harlem. James Hubert called an interracial meeting in the rooms of the Urban League with Mary Hanford Ford and me as speakers. Willard was called upon to speak from the floor by the chairman, Sam Allen. It was a distinguished meeting of known Black leaders and devoted Bahá'ís. It was standing room only.

That evening we went with the Holleys and the Allens for dinner at the Huberts' home and, later, spoke about the Faith. The next Sunday, the New York Assembly returned the courtesy of the League, inviting some of the Black leaders to speak. There was an interracial luncheon at the Women's City Club.

We were preparing to leave again, and we went to May's room to say prayers and our final 'goodbye'. We were putting behind us, a life we had known, and we were enveloped by May's tenderness. We shared in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's mystical presence and were inspired by May's words. Then, suddenly, she announced. "I am going with you as far as New Jersey." {{p154}} She bundled up in her fur coat and joined us in the front seat of the car, sharing the warmth of the lantern under the old laprobe. This was the May of delicate health who could not face the Montreal winters. Over the long bridge into New Jersey we rode. We said a last 'Alláh'u'Abhá', put May into a taxi, and drove away to the next phase of our Bahá'í life.

In the Susquehanna Valley we sensed the change of climate and put our farm lantern out for the last time. We stopped for the night in a Pennsylvania Dutch village and ate sauerkraut and pig's knuckles at a church supper. On a bright morning we passed from the immaculate cleanliness of that village to the coal mining valleys of the Alleghenies which, eventually, led us to our destination. The miners were plodding home from their shifts, tunnel lights still burning in their caps. Home they went. Home to rows of small square houses planted down in the shadow of steep hills. We could see at times a browning grey cloud light up with an orange glow. It was from the blast furnaces in the environs of Pittsburgh. "Abandon hope, all ye who enter here," I murmured, recalling {Dante's Inferno}.

Soon our attention was focused on the posters advertising St. Philomena's Raffle. The date was for that night. The side curtains of the Studebaker were open now and flapping. We steered through the impatient traffic until we saw the old church with its soot-blackened bricks. It was bedecked with coloured lights, and loudspeakers were announcing the coming event. We had entered the section of Pittsburgh called Squirrel Hill and had no difficulty finding the Obers' apartment. It was but a short step away from Philomena's. In the din of the loudspeakers, the door flew open and we were in the Obers' welcoming arms. {{p155}}

A New Life

The nationalities of the Ober household spelled the name of Grace: German, David; Russian, Mary; American, Harlan; Canadian, Grace; English, 'Azíz (Ronnie). The way of life seemed comfortable, even luxurious to us. Harlan's business of distributing fire extinguishers seemed prosperous. Grace went to the office each day with Harlan. Louise, the Black maid, came in daily to do the housework.

We ate dinner that first night, then yielded to the insistence of the loudspeakers and joined the crowds at the raffle. We looked in at the little booths and were jostled by the avidity of the mob. The noise and excitement were overwhelming and we soon returned to the apartment, found music on the radio, and had a tall glass of "Grace juice" – hot tea with a slice of orange. A round of prayers for our combined service placed us together as co-workers in the plans of God.

With our coming, the house was overflowing and we were to sleep on cots in the sunporch. That part was fun, like camping. In the morning Willard was gone with Grace and Harlan. Louise came and, with that exception, I had the day to myself and for settling down to my letters and reports.

The Bahá'ís of Pittsburgh were coming to meet us that evening. I drew the shades over the arched inner windows of the sunporch' and took out of our baggage my prettiest dress, one handed down to me •by Mrs. Esty. It had a white silk blouse embroidered with a wreath of flowers of tiny beads. The skirt and jacket were black velvet. Willard dressed too. He looked rosy and trim in his one suit of blue serge.

The Bahá'ís swept in and took us into their hearts. This beautiful community was an example of unity in diversity. It appeared, even at this first meeting, that the McKays would be a moderator of its extremes. Without representing an {{p156}} extreme, we stood somehow, at the central point of a group which ranged from the brilliant minds of the academic world to near illiteracy, from those with economic security to poverty, from Black to White. We had our vow to practise universal love, and here was ample opportunity. At this meeting I felt, for the first time, the impact of our dramatically changed environment. A sudden let-down after hovering on the 'heights' is, I suppose, to be expected. How often we tread the "Valleys", the stages or cycles of growth. In my thoughts I rebelled against the travail of passing from the "Valley of Love" to the "Valley of Knowledge" of which Bahá'u'lláh said, "He in this station is content with the decree of God."[^]

[^] [Bahá'u'lláh, {The Seven Valleys and the Four Valleys}, Trans. by Marzieh Gail (Wilmette, Ill.: Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1978) p.12.]

Had I said during those sublime days of uplift with May that I was free from attachment? On the morning ride with her to New Jersey I had asked her, “How does one attain maturity in The Cause?” She assured, “Someday, you will know.”

Now it was time to remember things said in our farewell talk with her. She had told us that “The Cause of God is not child’s play.” She told us that one day when ascending Mt. Carmel, an American believer had tried to call Shoghi Effendi’s attention to the marvellous warbling of a bird. The Guardian had replied, “I have no time for birds.”

In our changed circumstance, I saw a need to change my attitude. “It means,” I wrote, “reports, not poems; it means responsibility, not rapturous dreaming; it means Pittsburgh, not Geneva.” In crossing over this grim mountain, I was loaded down with a hard cold, hundreds of words to write, no place to retire to, and the Easter vacation with two young boys for a rainy week!

On Easter morning Bahá’u’lláh granted my spirit a resurrection. After a time of tears I awoke joyous and whole. The battle over, Howard Ives appeared unexpectedly, “like a knight in shining armour”.

At breakfast Harlan said to Howard, “They are happy and joyous in spite of the fact that we have had to ‘hang them on a peg.’ They have adapted themselves to the children, in spite of the fact that they are not used to children.” Only God and Willard knew about those storms out of a falsely smiling sky.

With the return of the sunshine, Ruth Randall Brown called to take me to see the city. In the spirit of adventure and elated by the opportunity to get acquainted with that vivid and exciting personality, I clothed myself in a dress given to me by May and altered by my dressmaker in Geneva. It was carefree in colour with brown flowers set in a gold background. A surprise box containing a spring coat with a cape in a soft green, had come from New York. May’s note read, – – I found this in the basement at Klein’s. I go there sometimes to look for things for Mary. It was very cheap.

Don’t worry, May.

So I was ready for spring. I went with Ruth and we drove several miles to Schenley Park in the heart of the city. I saw the Carnegie Library, the two centres of learning, Carnegie Tech and the University of Pittsburgh, where Bishop Brown taught Business. Then we went to the great stores in the triangle made by the three rivers. To cap the day we visited the Heinz Pickle Factory to join a tour of their enormous plant and to sample some of Heinz “57 Varieties”.

National Convention – 1931

Ruth Brown and I met Katherine Cole in Cleveland and drove with her to Wilmette. We swept along with happy laughter and talk, exhilarated by “the Convention feeling” a sense of keen anticipation. We would see the newly erected framework of the Temple and we would meet Martha Root, back from recent travels.

The House of Worship had, indeed, risen from the ground. It was still bare of its ornamentation, but the structure was very encouraging. At its dedication I stood with Dorothy Baker. Prayers and readings were enunciated from an upper balcony. A strange echo took up the voice and the intonation of Bahá'u'lláh's Tablet of Wisdom reverberated throughout. A beautiful Persian voice began to chant. Dorothy and I, arm in arm, stood under the glass dome rising more than a hundred feet. The sunlight seemed to be amplified by the great bowl above our heads. Around us circled the variegated throng of people whom Bahá'u'lláh had called mysteriously, to advance His Cause in this Day. In the echoing music, we felt our bodies sway. Others later mentioned how they, too, were moved. With the recitation of Bahá'u'lláh's Tablet of Visitation, the solemn dedication was over. We filed quietly down to Foundation Hall with its oriental carpets, bouquets of roses, and the folding armchairs arranged in semicircular rows around the speaker's table. That morning a new goal was set before us – the ornamentation of the framework of the Temple. Defying the world depression, we dreamed of our next advance. It was May 1st, 1931, 19 years from the day that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had set the cornerstone. {{p159}}

First Meeting with Martha Root

After the day's closing I was invited to meet Martha Root in a local hotel suite. I opened the door into a roomful of people. In the midst of a rather dense circle of friends was the silvery grey head. The radiance of the people shone like a ring of gold around a single pearl. Each face, each form, was bent toward her.

My name was called. She rose and came towards me with outstretched hands and with what seemed to be her usual greeting of 'Alláh'u'Abhá'. Our eyes explored each other and she smiled. A chair was found for me and I joined Leroy Ioas on the outer circle near the door. I recovered from my first stunned impact of Martha's spiritual magnetism to observe that all the joyous people were eating ice cream from little cardboard trays. ,Leroy whispered, "The Master said that the Bahá'ís should all eat with one mouth." A spoon was given to me and Leroy and I ate from his dish.

At one time during the Convention, Martha was speaking in Chicago. Although she was not visible, we, in Wilmette, were not deprived of hearing her. A loudspeaker was set up and we were able to hear her over radio. It was a perfect delivery, every word clear and powerful, a stirring experience to hear the name of Bahá'u'lláh mentioned in that way, resounding throughout the Hall in Martha's steady voice.

I recall that many of us found the 1931 Convention puzzling. Why could not the Bahá'ís be more realistic about the emphasis on the Administration? The growth of the administrative functioning of the National Assembly was now under the Guardian, something that some of the delegates had difficulty in accepting. Some of the most loyal believers were too rigid. {{p160}}

Montfort Mills, who had been with the Guardian, told us that the time will come when the word “administration” will be so accepted and so familiar that it will be seldom mentioned. It will just BE, like the laws of a country, a way of life.

This was the morning on which, from the Convention platform, Elizabeth Greenleaf confronted our flushed faces by saying, “Unity is a light-giving essence. And without the light of Unity, how can we say we see?”

I was kept very busy between sessions with committee meetings in which we planned the journeys of our travelling teachers, Louis Gregory and Albert Vail. I was later on the floor with my report of the work of the National Teaching Committee and of the interracial advances made by Louis. I reviewed the year’s work on the Study Outlines and the regional teaching conferences. Miriam Haney lifted my spirits by telling me that I had a “trained mind and a trained heart”. Why, indeed, should that not be true with all the training bestowed on our Geneva group, since our spiritual birth six years ago, by the more mature and dedicated followers of the Master?

The Princely Cloak

It was the last night of the Convention and the third Feast of Rídván when George Latimer, the chairman, was putting together an informal program. Dorothy’s seat was next to mine and had been empty for a long half-hour. When she returned, her white shoes were grass stained and her hair wind-blown.

“Walking again, Dorothy?” She nodded to my whisperings. “You look as if you had seen a ghost.” {{p161}}

“Yes, Doris, the ghost of my former self,” she smiled, her eyes gently apologetic.

George Latimer was looking our way. “We all remember Mother Beecher. Her granddaughter is here and she will say a few words to us.” Dorothy rose obediently and walked to the platform. I think it was her first time before so large an audience. I wondered if she were feeling as I did the first time that I stood to report before a sea of faces – the gust of their regard flowing from their eyes, bright like sunlight shining on the waves. She stood there a moment, perhaps overwhelmed by the impact of that sea.

She told me later that a word had swept through her mind: “Guidance”. She had been asking for guidance to solve the problems of her life – her three children, her ailing grandmother, and Frank, her kind and sociable husband. These were her loved ones, whom she yearned to serve. But there had been the dreadful weariness. The doctor had told her that she was “very” ill. She stood there now, gave herself up, and plunged in. She spoke in that sweet carrying voice of hers. “Blessed are those who follow guidance.” She began to speak from a station unknown to herself. There was a hint of the miraculous in her manner and choice of words.

Could it be, I wondered, that the oft-promised Holy Spirit was inspiring the pure soul of Mother Beecher's granddaughter? Perhaps, too, to inspire the hearts of the believers and to bring them back to unity? The atmosphere was so beautiful. It begged a doubt. Dorothy felt it. "I felt as if a princely • cloak were being placed on my shoulders," she confided later.

What might have been the thoughts of the people to whom she spoke? There was the Guardian, the much-loved link to the Master. But there was also the National Spiritual Assembly which, because of the disunity of some of the members, {{p162}} they did not trust. There was also the world depression and thoughts of doom. Above their heads stood the framework of the Temple dome, unfinished and undecorated. It was a time of change and confusion.

"There was a time," said Dorothy, "when confusion fell upon the disciples of Christ. Then came the hour to go forth and teach. The Holy Spirit was there. It was the time of the Pentecost and the disciples were filled with a humble, but vitalizing power, guided by the Spirit to go forth and spread the Word."

"What the Cause needs now," she was saying, "is the Pentecostal spirit to bring the believers together and enable them to appreciate the Administration as a warehouse of the Spirit, not as a machine to be operated, as some have said, but an instrument of guidance." She repeated her refrain, "Blessed are those who follow guidance."

The audience had been spellbound. As if on air, Dorothy walked to her seat. She sat down, a little light-headed, amused at herself for "feeling like a priestess" and still wearing the "cloak".

I could not wait to ask her. "Something has changed, Dorothy. What happened when you were out walking in the dew?"

"I was crying," she whispered back, "when I met Albert Vail. He told me what I had guessed – that I might not be here next year. He asked about my family and, then, 'Have you no fear for yourself?' I said, 'No, but I would like to leave some service as a monument to the Cause.' He advised, 'Then work as if your illness never existed.'"

When George Latimer rose to close the meeting, Dorothy asked me to slip away with her to the Temple Dome. Our seats were on the left side of the hall and the stairs were just outside. A single light swinging from a cord cast eerie shadows {{p163}} on the walls of the big nine-sided room. Our steps on the unfinished stairway seemed to be leading us up to the climate of nearness. We sank down on a bench, with the structure of the skylight arched above our heads. From this spot of ultimate refuge, Dorothy's voice rose in supplication for the Faith and for her dear Bahá'í friends.

"May they open their eyes," I quoted the prayer revealed to the Northeastern states, "... by beholding the light and be freed from the darkness of ignorance. May they walk around the lamp of guidance..."[^]

[^] [The translation with us today is, "May their eyes be opened to behold the light, and may they be freed from the darkness of ignorance. May they gather around the lamp of Thy guidance..."]

"I am the Listener and the Answerer," the Voice in the small black prayerbook told us. Up here it was a loving presence on Dorothy's Night of Wonder. Taking turns, we said many prayers before rejoining our friends below. {{p164}}

Part Two

Tilbury Tenement

During the two weeks that I spent in Cleveland and Wilmette, Willard and Grace moved the Obers and the McKays out of the prosperous facade of Beechwood Boulevard and down the side of the hill to Tilbury Street.

Bishop Brown had come over to Cleveland to pick up Ruth and me. Now, having arrived back in Pittsburgh, we stopped at a three-storey double house of weathered brick. Our neighbours were sitting outside on their square of lawn, where it was cooler in the shadow cast by the house. Their eyes rested on Bishop's immaculate small car and the distinguished appearance of the Browns as they escorted me up the steps to the pillared brick portico. The door opened and Grace ran out, as usual, her arms flung wide to embrace us. We said goodbye to the Browns, and Grace drew me into "Tilbury Tenement" and up two flights of stairs.

"Oh, Grace, I love it!" I warbled as I looked in at the large tree-top attic she had prepared lovingly for us. It seemed as if the room had everything: space (the whole width of one side of the building), two windows making a cross draught, and odds and ends of convenient furniture – a table to write on, plain kitchen chairs, shelves for books, a wide old-fashioned iron bedstead, and a small electric fan. Grace had hung yellow curtains at the windows. There were watercolour paintings on the walls and Bahá'í quotations, lettered and framed. Grace said, "This is your room, Doris, yours and Willard's. Welcome to the 'Palais Royale'!" {{p165}}

When Willard came home we unpacked our few boxes, hung up our clothes, and put our books on a shelf.

"I am not working for Harlan," Willard announced. "All business is at a standstill. Did you know that five Pittsburgh banks failed while you were away?"

"What shall we do?"

"I have a job," Willard said brightly, "soliciting funds for a bread line. An old Roman Catholic church in 'the Strip' is handing out bread and soup to a hundred or more homeless men who live in shacks made out of packing boxes and cardboard. ‘The Strip,’ he explained, “is that pitiful little village of those shacks. It’s on unwanted land between a cliff and the Ohio River, with a city streetcar track running through it. Set at one side there is this soot-stained old church. The City allows the men to squat there and the church feeds them twice each day, the church paying a small percentage for solicited donations.” This was Willard’s job.

Next door in the attic that corresponded to ours, an old Jewish mother made moaning accompaniment as she chanted a mournful song from her homeland.

That night we sat with the Obers in the large, meeting-sized, living room. “How did you manage such a look of freshness?”, I asked, “with all this soot lurking about?”

“Cleaners,” said Grace, “You rub the wallpaper with a pink dough that looks like the kneaded eraser we used in Art School. The rugs I cleaned with a scrub brush and the foam from a pail of hot suds. The Master enjoined us to purity,” she added.

We talked and planned our lives with the move to Tilbury Street – our seismic slide to changed conditions. We agreed that Grace and Harlan would continue to devote their time to {{p166}} office sales and collections. Grace would be the office girl and I, the housekeeper. Willard would find ways to make a little money.

The four of us, feeling very exalted, prayed that night, the first of hundreds of community prayers, voicing our appeal for assistance, renewing our covenant to work for the Cause in Pittsburgh. We prayed too, for the completion of the Temple dome. “We must turn to the Guardian, offer ourselves to him.”

“It will not be easy,” warned Grace. Then she made one of her unforgettable statements, reminiscent of the Master, “We must not think of difficulties as tests, but as opportunities for the power of the Holy Spirit.”

I awoke to the sound of a lost voice, my own, saying, “Who am I?” I would like to have heard Willard’s answer but he was already up.

In an hour I would be serving breakfast to the six of us, including ‘Azíz and David, the boys adopted by the Obers. As I made coffee I heard a knock at the door. The man peering through the glass looked harmless and I opened it a few inches. He thrust in an arm, holding out to me a pair of brown shoe laces. “Here, take these for a cup of coffee,” he urged. Harlan’s voice responded, “Would you like to come in and sit down?” I put the food, whatever we had, on a tray. The man wolfed it down and disappeared through the door.

Harlan and Grace were dressed to leave, but there was time after breakfast for them to explain to me the complexities of the washing. “I don’t know anything about electricity,” I confessed. “There was none at the farmhouse. We sent the washing out.” Grace and Harlan went down with us to the basement. I carried an armful of shirts. They watched while I soaped the collars of the shirts with a bar of yellow soap called “Sunshine” and left them to soak in the {{p167}} tub. I learned the levers on the washing machine and was rewarded by the vibration of the motor. Back upstairs again, we watched the Obers leave.

Our friends, smiling and waving, looked invincible as they drove out to their daily ordeal. After seeing the two boys off to school, I washed the dishes and found places for them in the cupboard.

With Willard’s help I started the vacuum and cleaned the rugs and the furniture fabric, and then did the dusting with an oiled cloth. Later, in the basement again, I scrubbed the collars with a stiff brush and started the washer. Soon Willard’s voice was heard using the telephone upstairs and the monotonous words given him to say: “...you will admit the necessity of coming to the aid of these hungry men with a generous contribution, or even a small one...” If people agreed, he wrote down their names, addresses and the amounts promised. At the end of the week, he would collect his small commission.

About three in the afternoon I climbed up to our treetop ‘palais.’ I needed it. “Fresh soot will fall every day. It is a constant,” I murmured, adding, “and constant, too, is the upright perfection of Grace and Harlan. They really live up to the laws of Bahá’u’lláh, especially cleanliness!” The easygoing McKays would have to accept a new standard for that attribute, and discipline would call for supreme effort. Fate had brought us here, and there was no retreat.

That night Grace taught me how to fold and iron shirts, collars smartly pressed, sleeves crossed in the back. That second morning I ironed the shirts as if my salvation depended upon doing a perfect job. As I worked I intoned lines from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s {Tablet of Visitation}: “Give me Thy grace to serve Thy loved ones,” I whispered. “Strengthen me in my servitude to Thee...” {{p168}}

When the ironing was done, I stacked sixteen shirts and the piles of sheets and towels neatly on the ironing board. When Grace and Harlan came home that evening, with bags of vegetables for me to prepare for supper, I called them to come down and see first the display of my work. Harlan inspected a shirt that the new laundress had ironed for him. He told Grace that I had done better than my predecessor, Louise, the maid. He said, “Doris is an artist in life, as well as in other things.”

So I had learned the art of ironing a shirt! I wanted to cry. I wanted to fly!

The Crimson Ark

From my present perspective, our year with the Obers (later to be joined by Howard and Mabel Ives) is an “Epic” in the Faith. I have only the scraps and pieces of journal entries, and letters to my friend, Lorna Tasker, to aid my memory. I shall try to work them together to describe all that ‘was 1931.

When I think of that time, I think of the Crimson Ark, “the ark which Bahá'u'lláh hath prepared for the people of Bahá". The movement of the ship is erratic: it seems to flounder, and then to dart ahead on a planned course. – There is no fear of capsizing, for the believers aboard are praying. Their chants still the pounding of the waves. Harlan was steering our ship. He had challenged us to come. There was Bahá'í work to be done, a Local Spiritual Assembly to be united and inspired. There would be a way to make a living because Harlan would employ Willard. Through unity and prayer we would make a powerhouse. {{p169}}

May 1931

From my

"I am alone in the house and talking to myself about the upset in our lives. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said there are two natures in man. In me, these natures hold converse. I know now who I am. I am nobody. Already, I am run-down, shabby, inclined to be on the defensive. We have no money and my service in the house is below par. I do not tell the Obers that my back and feet are killing me.

"'But remember last night,' says my inner voice, 'you were awake in a thunderstorm and began to worry about money and, finally you slipped out of bed and began to wander around the room. The flashes of lightning were lighting up two photographs of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and one of the Most Exalted Leaf, so that their eyes looked into yours – you thought, knowingly. And, you said, 'You are my Family, my People and your presence is sweet.'"

I thought of Harlan, resenting his rule of the house. "But the material of which a Bahá'í is made is rugged," I had written, "because strength is needed in the Formative Period of the Faith." There was something unbreakable about the early Bahá'ís. Only occasionally were they as gentle as Louis Gregory is gentle. (That quality, says Louis, has to be acquired.)

I remember the uplifted faces under the dome at the dedication of the Temple. They were strong faces, modeled by the thumb of God, the Fashioner. On that day their faces were alight. "If, sometime that light should dim in an airless and unspiritual atmosphere," I noted, "the breaths of the Holy Spirit will revive it on some other great occasion." {{p170}}

"In the tavern of this mortal world the bile of the man of God is not removed." [^] My life as a bride on a farm has shed light on these words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I had found the little sac of bile in the chicken and had it not been removed, the meat would have been bitter.

[^] [{Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá}.]

Harlan too, that man of God, was tasting the bitterness of failure. I was so absorbed in our own material downfall that, at the time, I did not relate myself to Harlan's crushing financial plight. As well as supporting three adopted children and ourselves, he had taken upon himself responsibility for his destitute salesmen. From his New England ancestry, Harlan must have absorbed some of the idealistic dreams of Emerson and Thoreau, for deeply implanted in him was the concept of an exalted communal relationship for the unity of mankind. Clearly this had been his thought when he urged us to come. This fantasy was now threatened.

‘we could offer no material help, except our work in the house. Our bank account was down to one dollar and all of Willard’s life insurance was withdrawn. We were selling the heirlooms we had left in Geneva. Even my diamond ring was in and out of pawn.

The Steed of Pain

There came days at Tilbury when, on “steed of pain”, we rode, four abreast through the Valley of Love. The true cause of our depression, I brooded, was that our Bahá’í community was being pulled and stretched between earth and heaven. It was like the agony of the rack in the medieval Europe. Tension was the sharp pain, depression the dull throb.

The prayers that we gathered to say at night were spoken with such power (especially those uttered by Grace) the Gates of Heaven were assailed by them. Why did not intercession come from on High to relieve us? Why too, the question {{p171}} persisted, had not the all-powerful Spirit come always to Bahá’u’lláh’s aid? Sometimes, when the winds of God were blowing in our Tilbury community, it was as if we stood on the edge of a pit. We were very quiet, because if we stirred, we might fall in and take the others with us. Our one security was that we were united in holding on to the Cord of the Covenant.

The symbol of “the cord” reminds me of the day that I met Harlan in the hall upstairs. He had been ill and was wearing his old bathrobe tied around with a long cord. Smiling shakily he said, “This cord I am wearing belonged once to Bahá’u’lláh.”[^]

The inconsistencies of our moods was a test which made us doubt one another. Who was the real person? This one with the darkened face? Or the irradiating teaching soul? Our avoidance of one another would seem like disapproval, even rejection. This was true especially for the McKays because our financial contribution was nil. I could not bear this. I was to learn later, from Howard Ives, that it was my pride.

Yet, our prayers for assistance were answered and blessings of great munificence came. Although there was no material help, we would find ourselves, when teaching, uplifted to that different world of being, which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called the Spirit of Faith. At such times we were ‘awake’ again, the nightmare over. We spoke without notes and attracted people through love. It was still May when I wrote:

“As I adjust myself to the requirements of the work in the house, the members of my body protest. There used to be a myth about my not being strong, and so I learned nothing about hard physical work. My muscles aren’t ready for it and my few pampered ailments feel themselves challenged. {{p172}}

“Yesterday I was upset all day. I wept and raged and, when my work was done, I wept and walked. In my green coat, its cape flying, I went out into cool damp weather and followed Beechwood Boulevard round till I came to a place where country began. I looked down into a valley where the town of Homestead lies and watched the mist of smoke and the tracing of a muddy river under black iron bridges. Sometimes, like Dante’s idea of Hell, there would be a flashing of lurid light from the blast furnaces.”

And yet, in my notes of June, there were signs of growth.

“I do not want to put my tests on record. It is absurd for me to complain of my lessons, for I recognize in them the guiding Hand of Bahá’u’lláh.

“My faults are all on trial. They are being torn out of me like unsafe tumbledown houses along a street... If I were only a bigger and braver person, this training would be glorious.”

Later,

“To choose humility and-meekness had been once like the choice of a grey rag of a garment instead of a flaming robe. I’ve come to love the luminosity of humbleness, the grey wing of a moth that has sacrificed itself to a flame.

“God has thrown in my way storms to test my strength: restlessness, resentment, discouragement, fatigue. I have shared my feelings with Willard, who is so detached and wise. But one night he comforted me so tenderly that I became hysterical with self-pity and shed a flood of tears. In the morning Grace said, ‘Doris, you have been crying. You must tell me why.’ {{p173}}

“‘It is the feeling of being trapped,’ I said. ‘Of no future, no solution. It’s being smothered with soot and sticky heat, and not knowing what will happen, and being so terribly tired. And it’s hiding ourselves from one another.’

“How could I say this to Grace, whose fortitude encased her feelings like a polished shell? But Grace said, ‘I know, Doris, because I feel exactly the same way myself,’ and she opened her arms for a hug.”

Louis Gregory Gives Me Five Dollars

Louis was in town and was invited to the house for dinner. Other guests were there and the evening took on the genial mellowness of Louis’s presence. I was surprised when he called me aside, looked understandingly at my wan face and said, “Experience has shown that it is not always easy for Bahá’ís to live together.” And he gave me a five dollar bill. FIVE DOLLARS!

How many days would beloved Louis go without his dinner because of that gift? He slipped it into my hand and, before I realized what he was doing, he was gone to the other side of the room. By what power of intuition had he read my problems so sympathetically?

Oh, the brilliant pictures against the troubled background! On most nights when we did not have guests at home, the Obers' car, named "Go-Cart" (G and O standing for Grace Ober), would drive out for meetings. There were weekly meetings at Alice Parker's, business and Feast meetings, meetings with our Black contacts, made through the YMCA, church and other service groups; and there were the meetings of a new national Bahá'í committee, called "Bahá'í Study" consisting of Ruth Brown, Harlan, and myself. {{p174}}

Mr. Joseph Douglass

One night the "Go-Cart" 'turned towards one of the better residential streets in the Black section. Friends of Grace and Harlan had invited us to meet Mr. Joseph Douglass, a concert violinist from Washington, D.C. Friendly hosts greeted our delegation as did a thin dark man of cultivated and gentle voice, his eyes alert in a quiet face.

Magically, all of us were soon in the special Heaven of the Unity of Race, that same heaven that we had entered with Lois and Sam Allen in our visit to Harlem in the spring of 1930. The felicity of meeting on a plateau between two ethnic worlds, with souls discerned to be kindred, is to experience rapture stored in the world-to-come, really beyond description. It is an experience and a discovery, a finding of completion. The Bahá'í principle of the Oneness of Humanity, no longer merely an exalted concept, becomes an emotion near to the heart.

I remarked, "There is a statue of Frederick Douglass in Rochester, New York, where I come from, in the Square by the Central Station. The inscription says that he was an orator for Abolition at the time of the Civil War. Are you related to him?"

"I am the grandson of Frederick Douglass," he replied.

Do you ask a violinist on tour to play for you? Willard did, most humbly. Mr. Douglass took out a precious old violin and played simple melodies with magic, as Kreisler would have done. Willard, transported, asked for the "Goin' Home" melody from Dvorak's Ninth Symphony. This was the high note of the evening. Soon we said "Goodbye" and we too, were "goin' home".

The four of us drove through the drab streets, feeling as if we had been celestials welcomed in a stately mansion – such had been the elevation of our experience of true rapport. {{p175}}

At Tilbury Tenement I ran upstairs to write one of my first poems. I had things I had to say to Mr. Joseph Douglass. Urged by Grace, I sent it to him with a note of appreciation. He responded with hopes of another meeting.

ENHANCEMENT

I watched the face of the coloured violinist As he drew forth melodies, filched from Dvorak, From the time-honoured wood.

And I saw that for which I had been searching, The sign of the lovely sequestered people, Of the people sealed away;

Of an island inundated by a roaring white population Where full-throated songs are sadly muted, Whispered to dark ears only;

Of a world which my fancy longs to enter, Exchange glance for glance with heavy-lidded eyes, Dally with purple-shadowed hair;

Of a continent waiting for discovery, A place of heartbreak, prayer and laughter, Invisible, but near.

When shall a few of us go to seek our kindred, Riding intrepidly over the white-crested waves With our garlands of greeting? {{p176}}

Our Fellow Believers

June 5, 1931

At the Feast of Núr (Light), Willard and I saw again our fellow believers. In those days, there was one community of Bahá'ís over a sprawling area. If you had taken a picture of a human heart and cut it into pieces for a jigsaw puzzle, the separate pieces would have been the boroughs of Pittsburgh. The Bahá'í community, too, seemed made up of pieces because it was a cross section of the social life of those boroughs. It was unique, and in my memory, prized.

Somehow our delightful group – the Browns, the Obers, and the McKays; Leila Payne, the statuesque wife of a Black undertaker, her white hair braided around her handsome head; Henry Seker, the paper hanger and his wife Bessie, who had been a nurse; Braydon Black, a real estate man and a bachelor, and Eve Kerin – all of us would that night find places to sit. It was a gracious room, embellished with Miss Alice Parker's old furniture, books, and pictures. There were bowls of fresh flowers. Alice, a distinguished educator (so the column in the newspaper said) was sixty-four now and had every admirable quality: mind, initiative, and a warm loving heart. She had been one of the four hundred people who had heard 'Abdu'l-Bahá speak in 1912 at a meeting arranged by Martha Root. Now, in her apartment, in this meeting nineteen years later, lived the miracle of Unity, even Oneness. Everyone knew of its value. Alice drew a grateful breath, leaned back, and relaxed. {{p177}}

We Find Hidden Treasures

I had known that night of the Feast that Eve Kerin was a cryptogram waiting for a key. I had been attracted by this silent white-faced woman with blunt features in a high-boned face. She had intent dark eyes under heavy black eyebrows, an effect accentuated by a white blouse and plain black suit. Her immobility was relieved only by the nervous movements of her hands. A communication sprang up between her eyes and mine, but what was she saying so silently?

She invited us to spend the coming Sunday at her home in suburban Emsworth, fifteen miles of trolley ride away. Their street was inclined on one of the Pennsylvania hills with coal deep-down underneath. We climbed up steps to reach their small house. We were introduced to Eve's frail husband, Charlie, and to their children, Joe and Sue. At first their shyness seeped into us and we all sat down, enigmatic and stiff. Then there was a little cry 'from the kitchen and the family took us out to see a nest of kittens under the stove.

All at once we belonged to the Kerins and they to us. We knew that we had found an essential comradeship. They had not been to school, and we had. They had had hard knocks since childhood, while our way had been relatively easy. They had no artful words with which to converse, and we had too many. But soon they were eagerly telling us their dreams and how they felt about nature. They brought out their favourite poems to read to us – poems that we enjoyed too. We not only had dinner, but stayed for the evening meal and on until after eleven o'clock, before leaving for the long ride home. They had asked us to stay the night.

That day we had been uplifted to the grace of God. I think even Charlie and the children realized that something was different. Later I wrote, "Something happened up there at the {{p178}} Kerins'. Something happened yesterday to all of us alike. We did not talk about the Cause. We WERE the Cause."

The Kerins, locked up in their own worries, had found again their true selves. And so had we, especially when we all went out to climb a hill. My light-hearted spirits were effervescing as in former days. Sue told her mother, "I never saw a grand lady so like a little girl!"

The Key

The next week brought an understanding of Eve's cryptic behaviour on the night of the Feast. Grace met Eve in town and brought her home to dinner; to meet again was a reunion. The Obers stared when the erstwhile stony Eve advanced on both Willard and myself and kissed us soundly. After a happy meal I asked Eve up to see our tree-top room and we had a visit and prayers.

"We need your prayers," Eve began abruptly. "Charlie is out of work and scaring us with his depression. And he is drinking, you know. I haven't had an easy time, myself, breaking the drug habit. It was the opium they gave me at the hospital while I was having my operations."

"Sometimes, still," said Eve, "my mind takes strange flights, psychic maybe." (I think of a later time when an experience she had would be called extrasensory.) "For example," she explained, "the first time I saw you, I saw some part of you that was not your outward self. It is almost a child, otherworldly and rather delicate. It occurred again that night at the Feast. Didn't you see me looking at you?"

So many sides to us all. I had recognized this elusive quality in myself and even had a secret name for it, which now I shared with Eve. She said of that part of me, "That person has something to say to me." Later when we were talking {{p179}} about giving up of our wills to God, Eve brightened and said, "I think that is what she wanted to tell me."

NAACP Convention

July 6th, the convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) opened in a large auditorium. Grace and I were there. She pointed out to me Dr. W. E. Burghardt DuBois, chairman of the five day event. He was a noted author and Editor of The Crisis magazine. It was said that this intellectual Black person disliked the White race. I felt nervous when I watched Grace, with her arresting look of spiritual dominance, go up the aisle to speak to him. He rose politely and accepted from her (Horrors!) the folds of blue paper on which my poem, "Enhancement", was typed. He bowed and Grace came triumphantly back to her seat whispering to me, "He's going to print the poem in {The Crisis}."

Throughout the week the convention sessions would find Bahá'ís beaming, nodding, shaking hands. We knew already some of the delegates and now we met many more. At the close of the last morning's session and after an exchange of words with Dr. Dubois, Grace was granted a few minutes on the platform. She extended to the delegates an invitation to stop at the Tilbury address for a cup of tea before leaving [or home that afternoon.

Grace hurried home with her news. For racially prejudiced Pittsburgh, it was a one-woman Declaration of Human Rights. First she made telephone calls to the other Bahá'ís; then she went out ringing neighbours' doorbells, telling the people to look out of their windows at four o'clock if they wanted to see some very distinguished people. She promised them that they would be surprised. Later she made other telephone calls for sandwich rolls and ham, cupcakes and cold drinks, and asked {{p180}} Eve Kerin to come and help make sandwiches for thirty. Then she returned to the afternoon session to talk people into coming home with her.

At four, the street began to fill with parked cars and the NAACP delegates, dressed now for a social occasion. They who moved on in the direction of our door, were some of the most impressive people in the nation. We had expected thirty. Sixty came.

Eve and I scurried to the kitchen, where our sandwich rolls were arranged on trays and we cut them all neatly in two. The neighbours stared out of their windows – eyes on the overflow of our guests on the steps and the lawn, paper plates and cups in their hands. Our visitors were in an expansive mood. Evidently they considered this a “peak experience” after a week of discussing the wrongs and ills suffered by their race. They were relaxed and jovial. Grace, at her best, moved among them – a messenger of light, magnificent.

Visit to New Castle

Two days later we spent the night at a farm near New Castle, Pennsylvania, where the Ives were spending the summer. We arrived late in the afternoon, and had supper and an evening of talk before being tucked away in country bedrooms. In the morning I beheld an orchard from our window.

To be on a farm again in summer set me back a year in time. My spirits rose and I felt my cork blow with an excess of joy. At the first opportunity after breakfast, I slipped out alone into the orchard, touched the old trees and talked to them. I had been reading a life of Emily Bronte and I mused, “what could Emily’s life have been like without her heather-covered moors?” {{p181}}

No one had seen me go, but soon they would be calling me. I felt as furtive as a wild creature in the woods, sniffing the air for human scent. Like the snapping of a twig warning it to bound away, their first call would alert that sensitive part of me to flee.

“Doris, where are you? We want a consultation with Howard and Mabel.”

Dear cognizant Eve would have understood. I did not join the others immediately, but slid around to the back porch and communed with the cat. The voices called again. When I appeared at the front porch they said, “Where were you?” I sat down with the others and began scribbling on a piece of note paper. Howard wondered, “What are you writing?”, but I shook my head and would not let him draw away my arm. It began, “The twigs are snapping in the forest that I call MINE.” I am sure Grace and Harlan were aware of something opaque in me. I did not tell them – could not. But I could give my self to Bahá’u’lláh – because HE knew my heart.

To the picnic in the afternoon, Howard and Mabel had invited the country people and some of the connections that they had made in town. From New Castle came Edith Burchard and Ethel Kelly, two high school teachers who later opened the way for us to hold meetings in that city. They had heard of the Cause from Martha Root. (Edith’s people had been settlers with the Roots, at Cambridge Springs two generations back.) Chairs and rugs had been placed outside in a shady field where we held a meeting after the picnic lunch.

We talked about prayer, and the guests were invited to take part. For many, “Conversation with God” consisted of special requests, but I still remember what one sweet little lady said. She had found that God would answer her prayers for spiritual growth. THAT she could depend upon – although not {{p182}} often had she been confirmed in her prayers for material needs. “God,” she said, “sometimes answers ‘no’, but how His spiritual gifts have changed my life!”

When we opened the door to Tilbury Tenement there was a strange fragrance in the house and a trickle of liquid on the stairs. ‘Azíz had been making ginger ale and, before he left, had stored the bottles in a case under his bed. In the heat, the bottles had ‘blown their corks’ (as I had) and the house was awash with quarts of the bubbling beverage, although bubbling no longer. (Nor was I.)

It had been possible, in that quiet field in New Castle, for the Depression to seem unreal. Now we were on our way to the Kerins’ for a picnic on the Fourth of July. Leila Payne also had been invited and Mr. Payne, massive, dark and non-committal, drove us out to Emsworth in his undertaking limousine. (Later we would come home on the trolley.) A picnic basket had been packed and Eve, the children, Leila and Willard and I set out to walk to a favourite spot. Willard, laden with the basket, walked with the older ones, but I ran ahead with Sue and Joey, out-of-myself in the sun-dappled woods.

Charlie had remained behind to read his book, although he joined us in the evening to watch the fireworks.

At a meeting two weeks later Eve told me, “You came to see me last week. Do you remember?”

“Certainly not last week,” I said.

“Oh, yes you did. At three o’clock in the morning. You came and stood beside my bed and looked at me and smiled. I put out my hand to touch you and you vanished.”

“You were asleep and dreaming, Eve.”

“How could I be asleep when I was sitting bolt upright in bed and screaming prayers at the ceiling?” {{p183}}

She said that one day she had gone out to purchase cyanide tablets to disinfect a sore on her arm. Afterwards, she put the tablets high up on a shelf in the bathroom. On the night she called, she had found Charlie in the bathroom with one of the deadly tablets in his hand. She took it from him, caught him when he collapsed, and helped him back to bed.

In her own bed Eve tried to pray. But because of the ceiling, she thought, the prayer would not rise through to God. It was in her panic that, remembering my promise to pray, she cried, “Doris, Help me!” Somehow my spirit came to her while I slept. Does not our spirit often linger invisibly near those for whom we pray? This, perhaps, was a rare instance in which it was visible. I have heard of other situations where the spirit showed itself in order to reassure another.

Eve slept. She awoke on a high spiritual level that she maintained for days. She was able to rescue Charlie from his despondency and brought him to the next meeting. There was a new look in Charlie’s eyes that night. As he was leaving, I said, “Charlie, have you ever thought of becoming a Bahá’í?”

“I might do just that,” he responded. That night, with us all there, he enrolled.

When we arrived back at the Kerins’ for Sunday dinner, we found a transformed Charlie. A wonderful bounty had descended upon our friend. With his finger in a prayer book, he met us at the door, wrung our hands and returned to his chair to continue reading. He had vanished into that land which he had found. Eve’s face was alive, eyes smiling, lips in a curve.

When we sat down to Eve’s chicken dinner Charlie said, “Wait, we are not ready yet.” He pulled out his book and read prayers while the dinner cooled. Not that anyone minded. Even the children breathed the atmosphere and {{p184}} waited patiently. The food was delicious. That day was a real love feast and the Host was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Emily Craighead

The Bahá’ís were in an atmosphere of unity at Alice Parker’s praying for souls to arise whom we might teach. On the second floor of her hotel apartment, the sounds of the street seemed far away. We began saying, in turn, the Remover of Difficulties – to the number of nineteen. Our voices, in different keys and inflections, made strange music: the cultivated voice of Alice, raised in earnest petition; the baritone of Harlan and the tenor of Willard; my own voice, high and chirpy. Leila Payne invoked God like a priestess; Henry and Bessie said the words slowly and with difficulty. Ruth and Bishop’s accents were from New England.

The door was ajar that warm night. We heard an indrawn breath and then a timid knock. Alice rose and opened the door to admit the one who would be the answer to our prayers. We were introduced to Emily Craighead, another retired teacher and an acquaintance of Alice. She was nervous and quailed visibly at the roomful of assorted people – all of us with our eyes so bright and looking as if we would like to swallow her.

“Have I interfered with your meeting?” she faltered. “Should I have come? Oh, please excuse me. I felt I had to.”

She had waited in the hall for us to finish our prayers. The intoned words were like a spell calling to her. Through the partly opened door she had seen that we had not bowed our heads, but had raised them as if awaiting for an answer. By the time Emily sat down with us to hear about the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh, she had responded already to the call of the Holy Spirit that she had heard in the hall. This was the power of the Word itself; its syllables when sincerely uttered, it was {{p185}} promised, would “cause the heart of every righteous man to throb”.[^]

I cannot remember how she looked, except for her brown eyes and the white hair that once had been auburn. She was very tall and fragile looking – an elusive wisp of a person with a gentle and eager spirit. Her old-church, old-Pittsburgh family would cause her anguish when she joined the Bahá'ís.

Such is the power of the spoken Word that, in the time of Muḥammad, Omar, who had come to slay the believers in the house of his sister, lingered outside to hear the Qur'án read. He had come to kill, but when won by the music of the Word, he sought out Muḥammad, fell at his feet, and offered up his soul to the new Cause.

Meeting at Mrs. Payne's

The Payne Funeral Home looked very inviting. A stage was illuminated on each side by incandescent white globes on tall standards, and an arrangement of scented, artificial flowers was placed in front of a purple backdrop. Leila Payne, Willard, and I sat in armchairs at the front of the stage.

At the right stood a beautiful little cabinet organ. Onto the stage and toward the organ ran a tiny ancient lady, her face the colour and corrugation of withered walnut meat. She sat down and began to play. It was a song that my grandmother used to sing when I was small – one that I loved. “Come Birdie come and live with me,” sang the woman, “you shall be happy, bright and free. Come Birdie come! Come Birdie COME!”

The people did come when they heard the music, most of them habitual funeral goers with long faces. They looked unbelievably at the gala decorations and at our beaming smiles. “You shall be happy, bright, and free,” sang the lady. {{p186}} Mrs. Payne rose and graciously introduced us as her dear friends who had come with a ‘message’ for them. The audience began to fill most of the chairs. When we told them that “Mankind is One and that we are all children of one loving Father, God,” they stared dumbly. Only one face, in the front row, seemed alert. When we asked if there were any questions, that person said, “Yes, I has. What makes White folks treat cullard folks the way they do?”

Happy no longer, I answered. “I am ashamed of all those white folks. They don't know what they're doing. Will you try to forgive us?” She smiled – yes, she would try. All the people smiled and we came down off the stage and shook their hands.

In the latter part of August the Ober family drove to Eliot, Maine, to visit Green Acre and to see a little farm that belonged to them. If the Pittsburgh venture failed, they might have to take up residence there; perhaps even take our community with them. It was a port in a storm – one that already had been considered seriously.

Willard's soliciting for the bread line was not doing well. People were not paying their pledges. With the failure of fifteen banks, they were not inclined to make promises. But he had some pay coming that he would collect on Saturday night. We looked forward to that day. For the while, our food was reduced to potatoes and boxed breakfast food.

During this time came the invitation to hold, on Friday night, a meeting in New Castle. It was from Edith and Ethel, the schoolteachers we had met at the Ives' picnic. The meeting would be advertised and held in a public place and we would spend the night at the home of friends.

Willard had housed somewhere in a shed, the old Studebaker that had brought us to Pittsburgh. It was entitled to permanent retirement because of its advanced age and the {{p187}} life it had lived. But Willard picked me up in style Saturday afternoon, and with high spirits we started the sixty-five mile drive to New Castle. After buying gas for the round trip, we had thirty-five cents left.

"We will have to pray for the right rear tire," said Willard. "It has a very doubtful patch."

"The spare?" I questioned.

"That, too, is patched."

The meeting was held in a tearoom rented for the evening. The tables were pushed back and the chairs arranged in rows. Our audience, friends of Edith and Ethel, was intellectual, academic. It was a splendid meeting. Today we would have called it a proclamation. I introduced the Bahá'í Faith and Willard gave his talk on 'Science and Religion.' No one knew how hungry we were.

We went home with a kind lady who said, "You must want something to eat after your efforts this evening." She brought out a large bowl of crackers and a pitcher of lemonade. Light-headed now with hunger, perhaps we showed too much enthusiasm for the crackers. "These are delicious crackers," said Willard, taking a second handful. "What are they called?" I asked, helping myself. "Oysterettes" she replied. We finished the bowl and drank the lemonade. For breakfast our hostess provided hot muffins and jam, bacon and eggs. We parted with hearty good will.

The Studebaker took us to the edge of the city. Then it happened: 'psh-s-s-s-sh', followed by a jolt. Glory be to God, there was a service station across the street! Willard ran over and said to the attendant, "See, here. The patch has blown off my tire. Can you help me? I can pay you thirty-five cents." They came back to the car, smiling broadly at our "joke." The attendant put the patch on and accepted our coins. Penniless, we pressed towards Pittsburgh and Willard's earnings at 'the Strip' – not for a moment forgetting to pray. {{p188}}

I watched from the car as Willard went into the office to draw his pay. To open a road, a mountain of rock had been chiseled in two. A steep grey wall rose there, its shadow, black. The crazily laid streets and cross streets of the shantytown were on the flats above the river and there, the old church, with its square steeple, stood in coal-sooted dignity. It was noon. A queue of men stretched from the box-built shelters to the door of the church kitchen. Each was handed a bowl of soup and a chunk of bread. All the men were stamped with desolation – the same hunched shoulders, the same dull eyes staring at nothing, the same avid acceptance of the soup. Willard was returning now with his quick step and square shoulders. He did not look at the line-up. He had learned that they wanted to be left alone.

“Yet they cling to life,” I said. “Why, when it is so easy to die in these days?”

Willard said, “They are afraid to die. Their childhood religion spoke too little of a Compassionate God.”

We opened the pay envelope: fourteen dollars and a few coins. We gently urged the Studebaker through six miles of congested population to the Borough of Squirrel Hill and Tilbury Street. It was Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, and most of the stores were closed. We found one with an open door and spent two dollars of our money on the first real meal that we had had that week: two T-bone steaks (25 cents each), tomatoes, milk, butter, and pumpernickel.

How happy and secure we felt now; elated by being so . wildly extravagant and grateful for being brought safely home, by the Help in Peril, after carrying the Message to new people. After supper we prepared for the Obers’ return by cleaning the house.

We were relaxing in the living room, listening to the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. The air was redolent with a blend of cleanser fumes. The floors had been scrubbed with {{p189}} kerosene, the rugs sponged, and the windows washed to sparkling. The car doors slammed and, followed by Grace and Harlan, ‘Azíz and David roared into the room. Grace halted, sniffed deeply, and cried, “This house smells CLEAN.” We sat down and exchanged our news, laughed about our New Castle excursion, and absorbed the messages that our Green Acre friends had sent to us. The spectre of food was banished at the evening meal. Our milk, bread, and tomatoes were added to the blueberries and home-cured ham the Obers had brought from Eliot. A homecoming – our community bond was a true reality.

The thought of Fall and the turning of August into September brought change to the seeming endlessness of summer. Harlan invited me to go with him to New Castle to visit Howard. With his characteristic enthusiasm, Howard had fallen in love with some beautiful (lucrative, he said) white rabbits. We went with him to the farm where they were for sale. Certainly the rabbits were beguiling with their rich white fur and shining pink eyes. They were, Howard pointed out, an investment. Their fur was valuable, their offspring saleable and, Howard hesitated, their meat would be there should there be an emergency. He had decided to buy all that he could afford – sixty.

“Where will Howard keep his rabbits?” I asked on our thoughtful journey home.

“In an old barn near Tilbury Street,” said Harlan. “The Ives have decided to move in with us this fall and Mary will be coming home to enter High School. Our embryonic Bahá’í community is growing.”

We were entering a time of even greater testing of our courage and resolve – more so than in the four months that had passed. The Depression was deepening in the city. {{p190}} Guards were being posted at night in the foodstores. There was even some talk of closing the schools. Willard and I were almost penniless; Harlan's funds were diminishing. The miasma of desperation, constantly combatted by prayer, seemed to drift into our minds like polluted air infiltrating a house through chinks, crevices, and keyholes. On September 28th, 1931 I wrote:

"It seemed as if the tension of these four walls had tightened to the point of torture: the tension of stronger wills and personalities, tension of noise, of ideas, the tensions of the city, the tension of waiting for winter to end and of getting enough money to live on.

"I walked four blocks to Murray Avenue to buy a stamp. The air was unusually clear of smoke, the sun was shining and a 'cool wind was blowing. I came back and began to run the vacuum cleaner. I was crying and 'holding on to the Cord' of the Greatest Name. The sweeper had sounds like the whine of a hurricane, a hissing of wind, and a shrill cry. I found it glorious. I was caught up in the energy of a self-answering prayer. I did not have any feelings when I finished, except those of physical fatigue.

"Tomorrow the Ives are moving in with us and Mary returns after a six-week absence."

The Rabbits

Country and an unpaved road were only a short walk from the populated area of Tilbury Street. On this road Mary and I found the barn where Howard kept his rabbits. We stood in the doorway, saw Howard there, and went inside. He proudly displayed his neat rabbit crates, stacked in twos and threes.

"Aren't your rabbits rather small," said Mary pertly, her high-boned Slavic face animated. {{p191}}

"I bought the small rabbits because they were cheaper, more of an investment I thought," replied Howard.

At breakfast a week later Howard announced, "I am ready to mate the two largest rabbits, to set them up in a home of their own in a nice, new crate, I have named them 'Grace and Harlan'," he told us. After that they were a great source of fun – until the morning when Howard joined us with a disturbed face.

"I found Grace and Harlan's cage full of white fur this morning," he said. "They have attacked each other. I am very much afraid that both Grace and Harlan are male rabbits."

The rabbit tragedy then unfolded. Every morning Howard went to the barn. The bags of food grew smaller in proportion to the increased appetite of the rabbits. Could he afford to buy more feed? He tried to sell the rabbits, putting a sign on the barn and an ad in the newspaper. The day arrived when Howard came home in mid-afternoon a broken man. He had slain his rabbits, skinned and dressed them, and put the meat into cold storage. A murderer would have had no deeper lines on his brow. Howard's spirit dwindled into gloom.

The forecast of meat for the winter was fulfilled. My lot was to cook all the rabbits, two at a time, on the weekends. I searched for recipes and for variety. We had rabbit stew, baked rabbit with stuffing, minced rabbit with spices, rabbit "a la king" with white sauce and pepper rings and cold rabbit salad. I would enhance their attraction by calling them hazenpfeffer or jugged hare. "When it is skinned," observed an interested onlooker, "a rabbit looks like a baby." Said Mabel, "Those rabbits should be grateful. They have entered the human kingdom." Rabbits taste rather like chicken and were a prized addition to our diet.

The rabbits even made a contribution to the Temple dome. When a plea came for sacrifice to the Fund, we invited all the Bahá'ís for a baked potato and rabbit gravy dinner. The {{p192}} friends were to contribute the cost of a normal dinner at home. We collected fourteen dollars for the Treasurer to send. Henry and Bessy Seker asked us all to their place, the next week, for another economy dinner.

Glad Tidings for Charlie Kerin

It was the first Sunday in October and the McKays were free to spend the day with the Kerins. We made our lighthearted approach up the steps to their house on the hill. Eve waited for us in the open doorway. "Charlie is not well today. He is upstairs asleep now," she announced.

"Wait till we have dinner," she said. "Then we will go up and see Charlie. The doctor says to just let him sleep."

I remember sitting in the kitchen with Eve while she cooked lamb chops. It was a subdued meal. Eve and the children were all silent until Eve said, "I may as well tell you what happened. Charlie has been fighting a battle, you know. Last night he lost. He came home late and he'd been drinking heavily."

Eve had helped him to bed and he had slept. In the morning he awoke and stumbled down the stairs. Trying to light the kitchen stove, he fell, hit his head on it and fainted. Joey and Eve carried him back to bed. The doctor came and said to let him sleep, leaving some pills for him to take when he awoke.

We went up to the bedroom to say healing prayers. Willard sat beside him on the bed, touching him with his kind, firm hands. Eve and I sat together on the other bed, our eyes on the frail form and pale face, our love pouring out to him. For many minutes we sat there, peaceful and strangely happy, praying for Charlie: "Thy mercy is my healing and my succour, both in this world and in the world to come....".[^]

In those moments, Bahá'u'lláh, the Wise, the Compassionate, released this soul from its dilemma in this world. Charlie, who had imagined himself lost, slipped into “the world to come”.

From my Journal: October 10, 1931

“Yesterday we had services at Charlie Kerin’s grave. I was appointed to speak for a few minutes and read from a selection from the Bahá’í Writings. We drove into the bleak-looking Roman Catholic cemetery, which is on a hill surrounded by other desolate hills. I was so depressed that I felt I could not proceed. The people I was riding with were not in a good mood, either.

“Then I saw the river gleaming in a ray of sunlight and moving swiftly as if in answer to a Call. As the image brightened, there arose within me a sense of joyous nothingness which is also wholeness. When my turn came I began:

“‘The Pittsburgh Assembly has extended its boundaries into the World of the Kingdom. We have a representative before the door of the Cleaver of Dawns.’ I let the words pour out and the people began to weep.

“Later Bishop Brown said, ‘If you would promise to do that for me, Doris, I would willingly lie down and die tomorrow!’ That rhythm flows again through all this house, beginning with numbness and inadequacy, moving on to a call for help then the answer, an inflowing grace, the promised strength of ten.”

{{p194}}

Later I would note in my diary:

“Today I sat down and faced Eve for the first time since Charlie died. We looked at each other and Eve said, ‘You are like the girl in the poem who was quite plain sometimes, and again, she was beautiful. This is one of those times when you are beautiful. In fact, I have never seen you like this before!’ Eve had come to tell me that Charlie had not gone.

“‘When I was crossing the street by the Fort Penn Hotel,’ she said, ‘I found myself standing still in the midst of two-way traffic. (No red and green lights in those early days.) I thought I would be killed, when I felt his hand under my elbow, mysteriously guiding me safely to the sidewalk.’”

There were brighter moments in my notes for the Fall of 1931:

“The Browns have given the household a truckload of furniture which they had stored in a basement. It looks as if the ‘good fairies’ had visited our room! We have a bookcase, a mahogany table and a little sofa by the window.

“Ruth is taking an advanced English-composition course at the University of Pittsburgh and she stops at the house to go over her notes with me. It is as if I am learning how to paint pictures with words. (They are studying description.) Art, they say, is to look at something so long that it looks to you so different from the way everyone else sees it. To express in simple words what you have seen is great Art.

I thought secretly, ‘I have beheld you, dear Ruth, with that long, long, look. You are like my Lady Doll that someone gave me when I was a child; like Lady Doll, created by artisans in the middle of the century, Ruth belonged to a greater past. An artist had molded the clay to cast her white china head {{p195}} with elaborate coiffure, straight patrician nose and staring, candid, blue eyes. Lady Doll’s hands and feet, long and slender were made of the finest white kid.”

No, I did not tell her what I saw. Lady Doll’s delicacy did not invite personalities. Yet, we had intimate talks on those visits.

In 1912 when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in America, Ruth Randall had been Mr. Harry Randall’s young wife, ill in bed with the disease better known then as consumption. She was expected to die. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá visited her in her room and blessed and healed her. He told her that she would recover and bear another child. (A daughter, Margaret, had been her first.)

Twelve years later, while in Haifa on pilgrimage, Ruth pledged the financial support for the building of the Western Pilgrim House. When she returned home she found that Harry’s fortune had been wiped out. Over the years, his activities for the Cause had increased while his interests in the family firm of shipbuilders had dwindled. The fact that his name was often in the papers linked with the Faith and the teaching trips of Martha Root had disturbed his conservative Boston relatives and friends – advertising which hurt his law practice.

The Randalls moved to smaller Boston quarters and Ruth went to work as a clerk at the Jordan-Marsh department store. In 1929 Harry died.

“How did you keep your promise to the Western Pilgrim House,” I asked her later.

“I sold my jewels.”

“And Bishop, where did you meet him?”

“We met at Jordan-Marsh. We devoted ourselves to Harry in his last years of illness... Harry, too, loved him. Before he died he joined our hands together. It was his wish.”

Bishop Brown was offered a chair in Business Research at the University “two years ago”, and they moved here. {{p196}}

The Hidden Meanings

My writing exercises with Ruth opened my shutters to an increased intimacy with all that I observed inwardly. Words tumbled out of subconscious depths to surprise and delight me. My charmed discoveries seemed in accord with a book, by Mary Austin entitled {Everyman’s Genius}. I found it and another book, similarly entitled {Discovering the Genius Within You}, by Stanwood Cobb, in Alice Parker's wonderful case of books on psychology and religion. I hadn't read them then, although their titles were as evocative as a voice calling to me from a hidden room. I was intrigued now with the gathering of closer attentions and the discovery of essences of the familiar realities within my present life, such as the changing view seen from my attic window.

And this practice of observation I applied to other environments, persons. I recognized it as a form of meditation. "It is my spirit talking to my mind! " I heard myself exclaim.

I remember a short conversation with Dr. Cobb. At Green Acre I stopped him and asked him for an explanation of "the Universal Divine Mind". Learned as he was, this beginner's question did not elicit a satisfactory answer. But now I read again the answer from 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"But the universal divine mind which is beyond nature ... embraces existing realities and receives the light of the mysteries of God ... A ray of this light falls upon the mirrors of the hearts of the righteous, and a portion and a share of this power comes to them from the Holy Manifestations." [^]

[^] ['Abdu'l-Bahá, {Some Answered Questions}, Trans. by Laura Clifford Barney (New Delhi, India, Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1973) p. 253.]

My scribbling was one of my only diversions during the crowded days of fall and winter. There were other diversions, but not many so meaningful. {{p197}}

There were walks – the late midnight walks that Willard and I took together after coming home from meetings. We walked blindly into grandeur. Following a narrow footpath, we discovered once the great Frick Park. We had not known of its existence within the city limits. In the darkness we felt the woods by the freshness and cleanliness of their night airs, heard rippling waters and the sleepy monologues of unsettled birds. A cool, damp, and breathless night.

On another night we found ourselves on the grounds of a country club. I was so weary when we started our walk, I thought that! would have to be carried, but there was bounce in my step on the way back. Such were the discoveries. In spite of the poverty of those days, it was quite safe out-of-doors at night. No one ever accosted us.

The Racial Amity Conference – October 1931

Louis Gregory had left Willard in charge of the arrangements for Pittsburgh's Racial Amity Conference. When Louis returned on the fourth, Willard had secured a free hall at the Frick Normal School, had enlisted the cooperation of the Urban League, and had found an excellent speaker: a young and popular Jewish Rabbi who would appear on the platform with Louis. The next ten days were spent in calling upon the great and near-great to arouse interest in the meeting. The conference would take place on the 14th.

Louis asked me to be chairman. It had been four years since Willard and I worked together with Louis. That was the Amity Conference held in Rochester, New York, my first experience in speaking from a platform to a large meeting. About 175 people attended. Sitting near, Louis beamed encouragement to me. Later, when an elated crowd of us, {{p198}} Black and White, had supper at the coloured “Y”, Louis said, “Doris, I wish you would be chairman at all my meetings.”

During the week of the Racial Amity Conference, Tilbury Street was in its usual turmoil and stress. Of the situation I had written, “It is ever on, and on, and ON with the alternative of NOWHERE!” A week later, Oct. 11th:

“We are, all six of us, making 11 mighty upward heave together. Tonight we went up to the McKays’ room to call to Bahá’u’lláh, the Helper, the Help in Peril, using the ultimate invocation, ‘Ya Alláh el Mustagath!’ The sloping walls of our attic tossed back the vibrations of our voices. The old Jewish mother, moaning and mourning in the attic room adjacent to ours, ceased her chanting.”

The Guardian was sustaining us with his letters. There had been two. The one to the Local Assembly said, “...these difficult times would bring out the qualities of the sincere believers in the form of sacrifice and sustained effort.” To us he wrote that we were a group of responsible teachers adding, “Now we will see what you can do!”

Willard Hatch Visits

The Ives and the Obers were thrilled that their old-time Bahá’í friend, Willard Hatch, would be stopping over in Pittsburgh on his way home from Haifa. He would be the bearer of news from the Guardian. There were so few visits to Haifa then. Only the Browns and the Obers had seen Shoghi Effendi.

While taking a leisurely teaching trip home from the Holy Land in 1920, Grace and Harlan were staying in Paris. They remember: {{p199}}

“We were in Paris on the way to England when Shoghi Effendi came through on his way to England to enter Oxford. It is a most precious memory ... that he phoned us and came to breakfast. We asked him why he had chosen England, not France, to finish his education. He explained that it was the Master’s choice that he become fluent in English.”

On several occasions Grace had told the story of the glorified breakfast party with Shoghi Effendi who was then twenty-three years old. She always added that she and Harlan were aware, even then, of Shoghi Effendi’s nobility. They sensed that his destiny in the Cause would be very great.

Two years later the Obers were again in Europe, this time in Switzerland. One day while Grace was sitting in a tea-room overlooking a village street, a man in a black suit passed the window. “Who is that young man?” asked a fellow traveller. “He has the saddest face I have ever seen.” Answered Grace, “Since the passing of his grandfather, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, he is the Guardian of the Bahá’í Faith.”

The solitary figure walked swiftly toward the mountains.

Willard Hatch was a tall figure with firm features and a raised voice. He was a seasoned and experienced Bahá’í of many years now on fire with one idea, that of the Guardianship. On his pilgrimage he had been turned around to face new directions by an uplifting spiritual power. He wanted us to understand and to make efforts to tune our souls to this heartbeat at the core of the Cause, to reach toward the Guardian if,} our prayers, to say his name and to dream of losing ourselves in order to follow him.

Challenged by the ardent discipleship of Willard Hatch, I recalled gropingly, May Maxwell’s mention of his name on all occasions – always the Guardian, the Guardian, the Guardian. {{p200}} I had been content to wait for understanding. I knew that he was human, but with a function more than human. And I knew that in his station he was “protected from error”. ‘Alí Kuli Khán had told me that he had prostrated himself before the Guardian and had been told to rise. Young Bahá’ís responded to the Guardian’s loving messages. His letters terminated usually with “your brother, Shoghi.” They marvelled at the decisiveness of his plans.

During these days, believers would read the {Will of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá} and would know the words, “for he is, after ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Guardian of the Cause of God ... he who hath disobeyed him hath disobeyed God; he who hath turned away from him hath denied the True One....” This they would read before declaring.

Mr. Hatch said, “He is the embodiment of an institution, the Guardianship.” At last I said to Willard Hatch, “He still is not real to me and some of my friends, although we love and accept him. But, what is he like?”

But our visitor would not speak of Shoghi Effendi’s personality, his charm, his humour, his struggle. He said only, “He is the Guardian, the orb of the Guardianship that is arising in this dark world.”

I have always thought of myself as young, but I am two years older than the Guardian. May Maxwell had promised that, sometime, I would learn the meaning of maturity. It is a slow growth.

November

Surely the secrets of the hearts of the Bahá’ís are events in the history of the Faith. I am moved to turn myself inside out to share with you the true record of those days in which we were revealed unto ourselves. {{p201}}

November. Willard Hatch was there no longer to lift up our spirits. Loose dirt blew in the streets or cold rains drizzled, allying with the people out there who had lost hope. There had been no material answer to our combined prayers offered two weeks ago. We were not relieved of the fear that we might become destitute.

I remember a line in the little black prayer-book that we used then. Bahá'u'lláh said, "It is incumbent upon you that joy and exultation shall be manifest upon your faces, that everyone may see in you the signs of forbearance and resignation." Our community at Tilbury did put up a radiant front to the outside world. At the time I noted:

"The collective power of this house is a dynamo – or a mad robot. When we sit down to one of our frequent consultations, telephone calls come from all over. We seem to attract the calls of weak people tuning in for power. We are all making great contacts with people in the city. Our Bahá'í teaching is being confirmed. Such is the mystery of God."

Grace used to say that our house needed rubber walls to stretch to hold us all. Harlan's abstraction and gloom were understandable with the pressures and tensions of the community he supported. Tilbury had become, through gradual stages, a ruled world, its standard of perfection fixed. Even for the children it had the rigidity of defense. And now the addition of Mary and the Ives to our number had pushed our household to a crisis of nerves.

Mary (Marusha) was a rebellious teenager, a fiery Slav, talented and beautiful, and admired by the two boys. She was recovering from polio. Mary, Willard, and I adhered to one another as a minority. And when Mary had another tantrum she was welcome to sob it out in my arms. {{p202}}

Howard and Mabel had joined us. Howard had told me on one of his first visits to Geneva that the doctor had said his nerves were "stripped." Mabel too, had chronic illnesses induced by stress. I wrote:

"Those wonderful Ives. There is no one like them! It is their temperament to be either in heaven or in hell nearness to God or separation from Him. The process seems necessary for the release of their special powers. Whatever their emotions in reacting to conditions, there is no variability in their passion to teach, never a cooling of their love for Bahá'u'lláh. It is only that they are sometimes in contact and sometimes disconnected from the Object of their love. They are always in a state of spiritual excitement and the people they reach are awakened and stirred, as we ourselves were touched and awakened the night we met them."

Spiritual Parenthood

My love for Howard is a transcendent emotion. We have always been close, ever since that fabulous spring of 1925 when he brought me and Willard into the Cause. Now I am privileged to see his reality shining through that tired, feeble body of his, and it is brilliant.

He wrote me a letter that first summer. He said I was the daughter of his spirit and asked me, as a bond of our relationship, to call him “father.” I have never done this. It is too awesome. Besides, it is too sacred for others’ ears.

“Last night I sat next to Howard at a supper Feast. Under the cover of the general conversation, he said, ‘I have been wanting to tell you that your sweet spirit adds to the community consciousness.’ I almost cried because I knew the wickedness of my heart. I had quarrelled with Harlan over his interference with my working program in the house. I had {{p203}} slammed the kitchen door and refused to come back and talk things over. I had kept out of his way for days while I licked my wounds.” One evening I wrote:

“It is 9:00 p.m. and I have just come upstairs. I have been in the basement scrubbing clothes and later, in the kitchen, cooking cornmeal to be put overnight in the fireless cooker. After a day of struggle with my duties I am walking crooked, like a half-opened jackknife. I am lying on my back and trying to think of how I can squeeze in an hour or two each day to carry on National Study Committee work. I am the Secretary and I am being buried by the correspondence that is stacking up.”

Sunday evening. We were having a gay little supper party of creamed rabbit and mushrooms. Suddenly a wave of fatigue and depression swept over me. I ached in every bone. “If you will excuse me, I think I will go upstairs and lie down.” Grace came over to me and put her hands on me and I felt the healing begin. I said to her, “You could not do this if there were not unity between us.” Again she said something very profound. “Unity is renunciation.” I did not go upstairs to lie down. I was completely revived.

Willard Goes to Washington

On the 10th of November, I wrote:

“Willard has been asked to speak in Washington, then to meet Louis (Gregory) in Atlanta for a two week tour of the South. We had a letter from Loulie Mathews with her check for $60, and another one will follow from Roy Wilhelm.” {{p204}}

The first of December, the time had come for Willard to go. I went with Harlan to see him off on a morning bus. I had been practically sleepless for two nights, missing him in advance. Sleep would not be induced, it seemed. On the looming last night before his departure, Willard even tried telling me stories about a character called ‘Tinybird.’ When that failed, Willard was inspired to suggest, “How about my practising the talk I’m to give in Washington tomorrow night?” I was asleep in two minutes – a joke that later we would enjoy.

Now I was sending him off with an artificially cheerful face and scolding him a little because he insisted on taking a cheaper and ‘less comfortable bus. When the winds blew at Tilbury, I would not have him to hold onto.

That evening as I was doing the last kitchen chores, Harlan and I had a wonderful talk. It was wonderful because the Harlan that I knew was back – not the stressed and critical Harlan with whom I had had the argument. He said that I had arisen to a challenge in taking over the house. “It was a big O.K.,” he said, “although we have a lot of adjusting to do, sometimes even to clash swords about how to run the house.”

Grace came down and I owned up to my black wickedness. I told her that I was an Assembly problem because I had stayed away from two meetings because I could bear no longer to hear about “the life” without seeing it lived. Grace and Harlan had a good laugh and Harlan mauled me playfully, the way he does when the boys are naughty. This was what we needed – laughter and FUN.

But the night was not over. We talked about Howard’s problem with nerves and of the need to keep the whole family hushed because of his condition. He was eating his meals alone in his room. Even I was keeping out of his way. At this moment he was sitting in the living-room waiting for us to go to bed so that he could be completely alone. Even Mabel had been sent away. Grace thought Harlan ought to go to him a mistake!

Harlan went in and I heard him praying, then talking. Howard began to shout, repeating over and over, “I want to be alone. I want to be ALONE!” Mabel came running down the stairs crying, “Oh, Howie,” in an agonized voice. Then she took him away and held him in her arms the rest of the night. He told me later that he would have died had he not in his memory that night, the words of Bahá’u’lláh.

With Willard away I went to bed alone, my teeth chattering from nervousness and the cold in our unheated room. I prayed and eventually went to sleep.

I awoke, wondering if Howard had had a complete collapse and what the day would bring forth. I tiptoed down to the kitchen and was getting breakfast when Howard came in, dressed to go out. He took me right into his arms, called me his ‘dear daughter,’ and love leapt between us. I slipped away upstairs thinking my continued presence might be too much for him. In a few minutes he called me, made coffee for me, and wanted to share breakfast with me. Mabel came along and, by the grace of God, all three of us stepped into the realm of spirit together and celebrated a great victory.

Later in the afternoon Howard returned, exhausted. His face was leaden and had terrible lines in it. He sent Mabel to ask if I would put my hands on him and perhaps put him to sleep. Oh, would I! I sat beside him with my hands on his head and neck, and I prayed. My whole personality was dissolved in prayer. The prayer had the effect of moisture on a hard crust – it dissolved the shell that encased him. After a time he caught my hand, kissed it, and held it to his cheek.

I sat with him a long time and sometimes he would speak to God, or to me. I did not tell him what a test he had been to me as well as to the others. Yet I blamed myself for having been withdrawn from him, my spiritual father, in those dark days. How shallow we were – how selfish and blind.

Soliloquy

To my friends of the Depression I wrote:

“This man has been a lighter of fires in many hearts; his spiritual sons and daughters are spread over the eastern United States and they have been impregnated with the love of God. In generations to come his spiritual progeny will have multiplied and become an army. Three weeks ago, at a meeting, he prayed for a supreme martyrdom and because of this he has been in torment. He is making supreme efforts away from the earth, higher than ever before, and falling back on his face in water and clay. He is ill, perhaps because the community has been intolerant of him. We have all been tested. Only Willard, in his radiance, has been secure from tests.”

From my Journal:

“Here is one of the things I have learned this year – no person is easy to live with. We all have our curious slants, annoying habits, inconsistencies. Why cannot we take, as we ourselves give, the bitter with the sweet, the drab with the vivid colour? What we know and love in each other, unchangeably, is the spirit.”

Willard and I seem ordained to love deeply some of the kindred souls we have found in Pittsburgh: Eve and Charlie, Alice Parker, Ruth Brown. I have known about “kindred spirits” since Dorothy Baker, unaccountably, selected me to be her friend. But do we have a right to all this splendour? {{p207}} One day I talked to Harlan about personal love. He said there is an individual love, sometimes developing out of universal love. It is part of the divine scheme. It does not make demands, does not fluctuate; it is not exclusive. The spiritual power generated by such unity is not for personal gratification but for the attraction of hearts to the Faith, a sacred energy devoted to the passing of God’s love to others – a link with the Holy Spirit. It is a relationship belonging to married lovers and to dedicated friendships among the believers. As our perception of other souls increases through universal love, the number of those with whom we are united widens. This is the knowledge that came to Lorna and me on the “Night of the Burning Log”. This, too, was the subject of our talks with May Maxwell – unity in the love of God.

At Tilbury Tenement there was peace after the storm. Howard was weary but acquiescent. And now Willard’s missive from Atlanta transported us out of the murkiness of the Pittsburgh scene. His talk in Washington had gone well. The people there had not gone to sleep, he teased. Arriving in Atlanta he had called at the white YMCA to ask if Mr. Gregory had been there.

“Gregory was here,” said the young clerk. “Black isn’t he?”

“He is called Mr. Gregory where I come from.” Willard said. “He is’ much respected as a speaker, a great traveller, and a lawyer.”

“You don’t say. I sure would be embarrassed to call any Black man ‘Mr.’” The clerk looked thoughtful and not a little shocked. He would have been incredulous if he had witnessed the handclasp of Willard and Louis at the Black YMCA a half-hour later. {{p208}}

Willard wrote, “Louis thinks this is the first time a White man and a Coloured man have travelled together on terms of equality, riding on public conveyance through the southern states.”

With Grace and Mabel

Grace and Mabel were home more often now. With a square-cut brush they were practising the drawing of curves and straight lines in the hope of making a little money at showcard writing. As we worked we talked about our several ways of rejuvenating ourselves when exhausted. “Grace says she flops down and thinks of herself as a tree sending its roots down, down, down, into the mineral world until some circuit of descent is satisfied. Then up, up, up into the air and out through all her limbs. Suddenly she feels free and leaps up with fresh energy.”

“Mabel says she mentally detaches herself from’ her body, takes refuge in her spirit, touches its life, then returns with fire and assurance to her physical self.”

I said, “When I get tired, sometimes I am in contact with a throbbing flow that sets up a motion in my atoms and refreshes me. When I turn towards the source, it is there. I feel this in my hands when I say the healing prayers.”

One day Grace was sewing, I was reading aloud to her when she said suddenly, “I wonder if you know how much I love you?” I said, “Yes, I think I do,” and she sat down for a talk on human relationships that would never have been found in the psychology books I had been reading. She said, “Our different personalities are only incidental, you know. Your attraction for me is elemental. We have been together before the Throne at another time, comparable to this.” {{p209}}

“It sounds like reincarnation,” I objected. “Not at all,” she said, “The transparent glass that holds the wines of our separate individualities is preserved elsewhere. The bestowal of divine potentialities which we claim now may appear in another age, just as it happened in the days of the Manifestation. It is the return of the qualities.”

“Does it mean,” I asked, “that various kinds of personalities with certain attributes appear in different ages as species do in the lower kingdom? A certain kind of person accepts the Manifestation in a former age, another rejects Him? And that the apostles were a type of person appearing again in this day – that you and I are like those who followed Christ or Muḥammad?”

Grace assented. “But remember,” she added, “that the Master said it is not the personality or the rational mind that returns. Just as the Manifestations differed in personality but were one in their attributes, the same is true of their followers in different ages.” She smiled. “When the Master was with us, we ‘maidservants’ spoke much of this, wanting to know what roles we played in former days, even arguing about it.”

Visit of an Apostle

Martha Root was coming. At an excited meeting at Alice Parker’s we talked about the days when Martha lived and worked in Pittsburgh. Alice was an administrator and teacher in the Frick Normal School before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit in May 1912. Martha had been a successful newspaper writer and executive, whose articles and lectures were well known. Certainly these two career women knew each other. “Yes, I knew her,” said Alice, “but only in a professional way – at times when the Normal school was news. After the Pittsburgh {Post Gazette} published her article on the history and teachings of the Cause, we knew of her interest in the Faith. But I had {{p210}} admired her for years for her advanced ideas. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s appearance in New York had made a stir in the newspaper world and when He came here, about four hundred people showed up at the Schenley Hotel to hear Him speak. The meeting, of course, was arranged by Martha Root. The response of the audience was part of the magic of that evening. The contact with the spirit brought by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was truly a moving experience. And we saw a changed Martha Root, different from the practical, busy person known to the newspaper world. She was transformed by joy in the presence of the wonderful being who had come to Pittsburgh at her invitation.”

“You know how I have always felt about the oneness of religion,” Alice beamed. “Naturally I was one of those who pushed up to speak with Him after the meeting. There were Bahá’í books too, which I purchased and took home to read... Then Martha was away again, finally around the world, meeting important people and writing articles for the press.”

December 11th – 15th

Eve and I were appointed to meet Martha on the evening of the 11th. Ink was raining from the sooty clouds that night and the glass dome over the station platform was leaking. The passenger train pulled in with a piercing squeak of wheels and reek of coal gas. Bold lights revealed the holes in the dome and the wet rises and cracks in the concrete.

Martha, a traveller seasoned on such trains, was alighting briskly from a coach two or three cars down. We could see the flurry of a small hurrying figure encumbered by bags and bundles. She was running to meet us and we were running to meet her when she tripped, on a crack in the concrete hidden by a pool of water, and went down. Before we reached her, she stood up, soaked and laughing. “What a lark!” she {{p211}} exclaimed. Carrying wet bundles and giggling, the three of us splashed over to the Fort Pitt Hotel, went up to a room, and waited while Martha called room service to come for her coat. We had a prayer, embraced joyfully, and said goodnight.

Martha's gleeful reaction to these circumstances was amazing to Eve. While we waited to catch our busses, we talked.

"Well, I never expected to see a sunbeam in a shower of rain," said Eve fervently.

"Eve, you have seen an Apostle of Bahá'u'lláh."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because in His {Tablet to the Apostles of Bahá'u'lláh},[^] 'Abdu'l-Bahá defined their high station as the fulfilment of three conditions." I waited for her to ask me what those conditions were. "Firmness in the Covenant, fellowship and love among the believers, and travel to all parts of the world while proclaiming the Faith. Surely, Eve, Martha is a true apostle. There were a few in the time of Christ and many more are needed today. Bahá'u'lláh calls these souls the 'armies of God.'"

At two the next afternoon the Bahá'ís sat quietly at Alice Parker's, waiting for Martha. She came with the Browns, people she knew from the days when her great friend and co-worker, Harry Randall, was alive. She greeted affectionately each of us and went with Alice to remove her freshly cleaned coat. When everyone was settled, Alice welcomed Martha home to Pittsburgh, mentioning some of the far-off cities 'fabled in song and story – Cairo, Baghdád, Tíhrán, where Martha had sojourned on the return swing of her journey back to the starting place of her world tours Pittsburgh. A cloak of romance rested lightly on Martha's dark blue shoulders. {{p212}}

"This morning," said Martha, "I was busy praying. Whenever I enter a city, I can't call Pittsburgh a new city, I pray nine times, the {Tablet of Aḥmad}, praying that doors will open to teach the Faith." She told us stories of near miracles that had followed that beginning formula. "'Abdu'l-Bahá was with me, opening the doors. We must never forget that, with God, all things are possible."

We sketched out the program we had arranged for her: tea at the University Club with some of her old associates, an evening talk at the Ebenezer Baptist Church, a tea and talk with an International Peace Society, a formal public speech in a lecture room at Carnegie Hall, and some free time for Martha to renew her contact with the city she knew so well.

I went to all her meetings. I did not listen, but looked at her with my mind relaxed and still, as in a refreshed sleep. In the bland atmosphere of her presence the moisture of the Holy Spirit was seeping down to my roots. It is impossible to explain in a logical way the effect that Martha had on people like me. She wove a spell: Her charm did not lie in what she said. She avoided brilliance which can be a veil, however shining. Her person and her dress were without embellishment. “Nothing is needed,” said Bahá’u’lláh in {The Seven Valleys}, “until thou canst become acceptable in the path of love.” A divine economy was effective in Martha in moments of teaching. There was no obstruction of the Holy Spirit.

At the Ebenezer Baptist Church

The electric cross fixed to the steeple of the church lit up the street. Late, I climbed the stairs and entered. The people in the back row moved over and made a place for me. The faces of the White Bahá’ís in the audience looked ashen in the big Black congregation. {{p213}}

Martha was a small figure as she stood in the pulpit, speaking quietly of peace and unity and the One who had brought bright assurance to the world. The people sat, acquiescent, knit in a strange predicament, caught as they were that night, with closed minds and open hearts. They stared at Martha, sometimes nodding and saying, “Amen.” I thought to myself, “They are wondering why they are feeling this way, when there is no rousement.” “Rousement” was their word for the fiery excited eloquence of their minister. It was the love swelling up in their hearts and one was satisfied that the Spirit had come, that the Spirit was there.

When she was finished the minister said a prayer and called for a second collection. Then the people stood and shook hands with one another over the backs of the seats. A brown hand clasped mine. Martha and the minister walked down the aisle to the door, where I joined them. The people surged around us, sometimes touching Martha, mumbling, “praise de Lawd.”

Martha had offered her soul to the congregation of the Ebenezer Baptist Church. At the tea given by the members of the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom she withdrew it. She could have entertained them as she had charmed her associates at the University Club, with a display of names and interviews with peace leaders in Europe. But Martha now chose to use the occasion to speak of the Bahá’í Principles containing the structure of a lasting universal peace. She chose to plant seeds rather than to regale the fashionable and vociferous crowd in this elaborate room with the raised speakers’ platform. Her intuition had shown her the futility of trying to please them, for their cups were overflowing with a blend of foreboding, resolve, frustration, and research into the conditions of old-world ties. Their minds were stimulated by an egg-beater whirl of world crises. Our hostess, Mrs. Norman {{p214}} W. Storer, took me aside to tell me of her disappointment. “Too philosophical, too detached,” she said.

A woman’s voice filtered out to us as we stood in the hall. “As soon as I heard that sugar was to be rationed, I bought two hundred pounds. I have it stored in the attic.” A few lines from the Tablet of Manifestation (in the {Bahá’í Scriptures}) came to mind, “But thou beholdest the creatures and hearest that which proceeds from their mouths; therefore the bounty is restrained....”

December 14, 1931

My eyes had looked at Martha so many hours that week, what more had my “inner eye” beheld? It seemed to me that her personality was an arrangement of levels or planes, catching the eye like a piece of semi-abstract sculpture, each perspective demanding a change of focus: the Ebenezer congregation, the luncheon with the friends from the Press Club, the Peace advocates at tea, meetings with the Bahá’ís. Each event had brought out aspects of Martha like facets of light in a masterpiece – aspects of a soul who, in the act of teaching, was turned obediently to God for inspiration. Her ‘ personality was a work of art. Because of its simplicity, it was the essence of perfection.

On the night of her meeting at Carnegie Hall, her audience was banked in tiers of inclined seats: students, professors, professional friends of Alice Parker, the Bahá’ís and the guests that they brought with them. When Martha entered with Harlan, the people stood. She wore a lovely pale dress and a gauze scarf on her shoulders. Her hair, that night, was freshly coiffed and worn around her head like a silver helmet. Her face was a frame for brilliant grey-green eyes. She carried American Beauty roses. Martha stood forward on the platform and, with dignity and fullness of voice, proclaimed the Faith of Bahá’u’lláh. She spoke of World Order and Peace. When she was finished the audience stood again and applauded. Their expressions were respectful, a little wistful, as if they had heard an ambassador from a king or from another planet. They came up to meet her and lovingly, she gave away her roses. Martha was more than a personality; she was a presence. The reporters were: baffled. They did not know how to describe her. On the 15th Martha moved serenely on to another city, Washington.

The quietness of unspoken thoughts settled now on Tilbury Tenement. It had been a month of emotional excitement and of widened horizons. First with the visit of Willard Hatch and then with Martha’s. I, for one, was sunk in the emptiness of Willard’s absence and was awash with the uneasy feelings. It was as though the walls of the house ticked away like clocks, ticked away to mark the approach of some unknown doom. Or perhaps it was the drip ... drip ... drip of the steady leaking away of our funds. All of our foreboding was heightened. Winter was at Sand. We had worked ourselves up to an orchestra of feelings, pitched from low to high.

At school the children had caught a wistfulness for Christmas. David was found to have taken money to buy a present for his teacher.

Willard’s Triumphant Return

Quick steps and a lifting latch and Willard was home. The three children were first to reach him and I had to scatter them to get my hugs and kisses. Cries of joy echoed through our household, now redeemed from gloom. In his shabby red-striped bathrobe, Howard joined us, his face carved in a smile. “Is it my imagination, Willard, or do I detect in your {{p216}} presence the scent of magnolias and the warmth of the southern sun?”

“Unfortunately, a vain illusion,” said Willard. “I had forgotten about weather in the south at this time of year. It rained almost every day.”

“Did you have any encounters with the Whites?” Grace sounded hopeful. “It must have been a shock to some of them to see a White man and a Black man going everywhere together.”

“I saw very few Whites after I left the desk clerk at the Atlanta Y. My trip with Louis was to demonstrate Black and White brotherhood as a Bahá’í principle. The Black students and their teachers were familiar with the Bahá’í social teachings brought to them on Louis’s earlier visits. Understandably, they had listened to him then with a grain of salt. They had heard talk of brotherhood before. The mission of our journey was to demonstrate it. When we stayed a few days sharing their dormitory and eating with them at their table, they were amazed. One chap said, ‘My father sure will be astonished when I write him about this; don’t think he’ll believe it at first.’”

“Why was eating together so important,” one of the boys wanted to know.

“Because it meant that I was equal with them. Eating together was a taboo. It was a revolution against the idea that the Black people were to be shut out from the Whites. That’s one meaning. When Bahá’u’lláh said Oneness, He meant the end of all taboos. People are equal.”

“Was there any bad feelings on the part of the students? You must have experienced some resentment against the White race.”

“Absolutely none. There was a desire to be understood and loved by me that sometimes brought tears to my eyes... {{p217}} They couldn’t help seeing that I loved them, so they loved me too. It went beyond race.”

Willard swallowed the lump in his throat in the pause that followed. He went on to say:

“Louis introduced me to the chief administrators and their wives. We talked directly to them about the Message of Bahá’u’lláh. Will I ever be able to tell you enough about these souls, their learning, their wit, their penetrating thought! They opened their classes to us and their assembly halls. Louis and I addressed thousands of students, sharing the program between us. We had the confirmations of Bahá’u’lláh. And how we had asked for them, beginning with a prayer that Louis said every morning.”

Willard looked across at me and our glances locked. “Would you like to say Louis’s prayer now?” I asked.

We shut our eyes and moved into the alpha rhythm of the Word, Willard holding his hands upward as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had done:

“O Lord, confirm me with Thy penetrating potency so that I may speak out Thy promises and glorifications among Thy creatures and my heart become overflowed with the wine of Thy love and knowledge.

“Verily, Thou art powerful to do what Thou willest and Thou art mighty over all things. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá”

“The trip was Martha’s idea, you know,” he said. “She would have liked to have come with us. She sent me this, through Louis.” Willard took out an envelope and opened a paper folder and said. “Here are two hairs of the head of Bahá’u’lláh, ‘the one hair of Whose head is, before God, better than all there is in heaven and earth.’” {{p218}}

We touched the paper that held the gift of greatest value, united in our thrill of awe. Grace said, “When I was in Haifa, the Greatest Holy Leaf told us that she saved the combings from the comb of Bahá’u’lláh. That Martha gave you this great treasure was an expression of gratitude for the work you and Louis were accomplishing in the south.”

When Willard and Louis left the Emery Institute in Atlanta, they went on to Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. Willard’s report goes on to say:

“When I bought my ticket at the bus station I asked the driver if there were any state laws which would prevent me from sitting with a Coloured friend with whom I was travelling. ‘No, not if you want to sit on the back seat with the rest of them,’ he replied. So we sat together on the back seat, although there certainly is more motion in the rear seats. After a while the driver came down to invite Louis and me to move up front – if we thought it would be more comfortable. This last lap of our journey lasted about four hours. We had time to talk over what seemed to us wonderful guidance to openings and remarkable confirmations of our efforts. Our faces must have been beaming. No wonder the driver wanted us to come closer!”

Mabel interrupted him by asking, “Certainly you met Dr. George Carver at Tuskegee?”

“We called on him after breakfast on our last morning. We found him in his long room full of growing plants. That’s also part laboratory but he says his real laboratory is in the cultivated grounds around the buildings. Boys, you can thank Dr. Carver for the quality of your beloved peanut butter. He has experimented with over forty varieties of peanut right {{p219}} there at the Institute. Actually he is one of the world’s leading chemists. He has an international reputation.”

“Does he know about the Bahá’í Cause?”

“Yes, Mabel. Dr. Carver has been a friend of Roy Wilhelm for seventeen years and would like him to go there, to the institute. Roy isn’t well, you know, and Dr. Carver thinks he can heal him with some vegetable oils he has discovered.”

“And what did I think of him? He is elderly, unpretentious and quite poor. And he belongs to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s ‘superior race’ who are the ‘lovers of mankind.’ He remains at Tuskegee from choice. He’s turned down remunerative positions offered by the commercial companies because he’s needed at the Institute to create revenue through his agricultural researches.”

At the meeting with the Bahá’í friends that evening Willard reported that the presentation of the Faith and the spirit of universal love between the races reached more than a thousand students and teachers in the chief universities and technical schools in the southern states. His account was enlivened with human stories and repeated conversations. One of our newer members, Walter Buchanan had once been with Booker T. Washington on the staff of A & M College in Montgomery, Alabama. Walter was incredulous.

“I would not believe anybody but you, Willard, that you and Mr. Gregory had been asked to speak at the classes in Tuskegee and that chapel time was turned over to you. The chapel hour is the only time in the week in which the principal, Dr. Moton, has the opportunity to speak to the student body.”

“So he said,” Willard agreed.

“How did you accomplish this miracle?” Walter wanted to know. {{p220}}

“Louis was our spokesman, of course. He talked to Dr. Moton about the Bahá’í principles and about Bahá’u’lláh. He said that we were ‘ambassadors for the oneness of mankind.’ Dr. Moton said he usually had fifteen minutes in the Chapel program, but that he would give us twenty.”

Walter was still shaking his head, “But how do you and Mr. Gregory explain such a miracle?”

We waited for Willard’s answer. “I think I have shown you that my experience was a profoundly emotional one, a mystical one. I was overwhelmed with love, for what I sensed was the spiritual potency of the Black soul – in its moments of release, pure, close to the Source. The inmost reality of the White soul is its complement – it complete-ment. When our two races united in this mission to spread the Word of Bahá’u’lláh there was a blending of qualities, a spiritual chemistry that overcame obstacles. Louis and I prayed sincerely every day. We love humanity. By the grace of God, we prevailed.”

We came out to our waiting “go-cart”. It had seemed, for a moment, that the Breezes of the Merciful were flowing from the South. But this was Pittsburgh and our second year of tests was about to begin. A man suddenly rose up in our midst asking us for money for food. He was an open-faced, naive sort of chap, light brown. He said, “I’m hungry. I tell you I’m HUNGRY.” He showed us a rent in his trouser leg, almost to the knee. “Look at this, too!” We gave him a few coins and he vanished.

January 11, 1932

“Troubles are being intensified for all of us. Our great retreat is to His Fortress. Our spirits can be free. We are told to walk above the world by the power of the Greatest Name. We are the fortunate ones. Think of mankind in general!”
{{p221}}

It was not Harlan who called us this time for a family consultation. It was Howard. “I have come to a turning point in my life and I intend to waste no more time” he said “Perhaps I will go away from you all and not come back.” Mabel sat with her head back, eyes closed. My heart was thumping. “I had a letter from Washington,” he said. “They want me on a two-week teaching stay. Perhaps I will buy only a one-way ticket, trust the Lord, and go about my business.”

Considering his health, his age, and his finances, his plan seemed shockingly irrational. When we tried to reason with him, he became violently disillusioned with all of us and broke away to his room, shouting over his shoulder that he wished he had not confided in us.

He said we did not understand. But I did. That same week I had written in my private

“I am bound with threads and ropes and ribbons, with everything that hurts and irritates and holds... I don’t know whether I am accepted or rejected. My God! How I long for a change! Am I trying to run away from myself?”

It was the tension in Tilbury Tenement that Howard wanted to get away from – our rack. We had witnessed his efforts and defeats since his earlier collapse. Repeatedly, he had disappeared behind a wall of silence and been in hell again. With his nerves. His state was understandable and forgivable but we could not let him go.

That night we called to the Guardian to take our prayers to Bahá’u’lláh, the “Remover of Difficulties” and the Healing prayers. The next day Howard asked Grace if he could have a talk with her. I noted: {{p222}}

“She [Grace] decided to tell him the truth; how everything in the house had had to build itself around his self-absorption; how the boys kept out of his way; how Mary at age seventeen was angry with him because he treated her like a tiresome child; how we deprived ourselves of food to give his special luxuries. Yes, it was Shock – and her treatment was inspired. She reached him and, as it says in {The Hidden Words}, he ‘burst his cage asunder.’”

Howard’s cure began at once; the change, a healing from on high. He came back to his loving friends. He won back the boys. He apologized to Mary. He let us play the radio at dinner... A week of recuperation and it was time for him to start for Washington where he would stay with Allen MacDaniel (then Chairman of the National Assembly). Howard would save souls there and everyone would come nearer to Bahá’u’lláh.

Later I would write, “He left in a blaze of glory after hugging me four times and calling me his ‘precious daughter’. Never had there been such a victory. He said that never before had he met himself face-to-face in just this way. Dear Grace, our invincible heroine, said ‘Praise be to God!’ ”

The joy-bells rang again in January of ‘32.

“Emily Craighead has formally joined the Cause. Such love as I felt for her that night could not have been only my love. The Love of God beamed in all our faces. She sensed the divine Reality and became radiantly happy. It is wonderful to see a soul drawn out of its sheath through the power of Love. Emily, aged fifty-eight, entered the great adventure with the zest of a girl, although her family was persecuting her cruelly.” {{p223}}

Weekly Public Meetings

In the heart of the old Duquesne Building there was a free room called Utility Hall, which was ours for a series of Sunday night public meetings. On this, our first night (February 4th), the Bahá’ís came early and scattered themselves among the rows of seats. Although we were yearning to turn around and face the door, our eyes surveyed the stage, its two armchairs, and a small oak table that held a potted palm. Behind us entered our friends from the Wednesday night Study Class and eleven new people that came in response to our newspaper ads.

Willard and Harlan ascended the platform and sat down in the two armchairs. I knew that they were making eye contact with the audience and praying inwardly. Willard introduced Harlan, who spoke on “What is the Bahá’í Movement?”. It was a good talk, scholarly, and with emphasis on the basic Bahá’í principles. Later there were interested questions from floor. People lingered and felt at home. It was a good introductory start by a pattern I knew well.

The second thrill of the evening for the McKays was the visit to the newspapers. First, “we took our notes over to Thompson’s Lunch and ordered a mug of coffee, our first in weeks. Suddenly my mind began to click. I seized my pencil, spread my writing pad on the shiny white table, and the publicity wrote itself.” Afterward we made our way to the newspaper offices through a tangle of alleys, stealing around garbage cans and prostrate figures asleep in doorways. Scary, until I got used to it. “What about thugs?” I asked nervously.

“You don’t find thugs in an alley. No money here to grab.” Willard assured me.

“If the big streets are the city’s arteries,” I ventured, “these alleys must be its veins.” I looked at the lights around the tops of the tall buildings. Illuminated front facades shone down {{p224}} into the ancient passageways which, it is said, once were trails for riders on horseback. By coming this way, we had saved walking half a dozen blocks.

Upstairs in the night room of the {Post Gazette}, I thought of Martha Root. That smoky, littered, masculine atmosphere must be tucked away in Martha’s brain cells because she had blossomed there during her years of feature articles and news assignments with the {Gazette} and the {Pittsburgh Press}. We found the atmosphere exhilarating: deafening machinery, glaring lights, much shouting and running around – a glorious high-speed energy. We called for a typewriter and I dashed off my notes, remembering the proper heading, “For Immediate Release”, a space for the Editor to fill in a title, the arresting first sentence and the closing climax. We took the sheet to the night editor. He read it, initialled it, and added it to the pile on his desk. Back to the network of alleys and on to the {Pittsburgh Press}.

Our publicity appeared, complete, in both the morning and evening papers.

Thirty-seven people came to our second Utility Hall meeting a week later. Twenty-five were visitors. A number of fine-thinking people joined in the discussion, including Dr. Bryson, head of the popular “Pelley Group”. Several other ‘New Thought’ members attended.

After the talk, the McKays found their way to “the Brass Rail”. Before prohibition it had served beer, but now it was a snack bar. We ordered coffee and, like accustomed “hands”, talked over our newspaper copy. Then, through the alleys to the press offices. This became our Sunday night routine in the months that followed, and our public meetings moved to a larger hall. {{p225}}

Finishing the Thirty-Six Lessons

Later that week I noted:

“Today all the lessons for the Study Outline Committee were finished and sent off to St. Paul for mimeographing. Harlan, Ruth Brown, and I have been working since spring with the National Teaching Committee; the result being this offering of Thirty-Six Lessons taken from all available Bahá’í material and arranged with prayers and quotations for meetings. I have sent a descriptive report through the Newsletter to the Local Spiritual Assemblies offering the lessons for sale. They will be sent out from Pittsburgh – if Bahá’u’lláh allows us to stay here. “Affairs depend on means.”

The Guardian’s Letter to Emily

Emily had written Shoghi Effendi on the day of her entrance into the Faith. His answer came promptly. She had started to read it to us but had broken down and handed it over to me to read. The letter called her to the station of a Bahá’í teacher. The rest of the message was for every Bahá’í in the world. The Guardian said:

“If the complete destruction of our civilization is to be averted, if the world is to become a place of peace and good will where our own personality can become enhanced and developed spiritually, souls will have to arise who will first get imbued with the spirit of God revealed in this age through Bahá’u’lláh and then diffuse it in the consciousness of man.

“Unless this happens, the darksome clouds that threaten a terrific storm to an already ravished society will not be dissipated and the era ‘When the lion and the lamb shall lie down together’ will never dawn.” {{p226}}

“He asked me,” marvelled Emily, “a new believer and not a speaker. What can I do right now?”

“Just be ready to serve,” I responded. “To spread the knowledge of Bahá’u’lláh by word and deed. It is the fact that we TRY that counts. It is said that souls in the next world are gathered around to help those who have faith and who put forth an effort.”

“I still don’t understand why God needs our help,” she said.

“Because the All Bountiful not only does things for us, but does things with us; that is our part of the Covenant – to give ourselves for the operation of the Holy Spirit in the world. The Guardian implies that, in spite of the smallness of our number, we Bahá’ís can save the world. There is an atmosphere around such exalted service. It is evoked by sacrifice, by unity, and by love. These qualities are supernatural and miraculously potent. The Guardian’s instruction to the Bahá’ís to rededicate ourselves and call on the help available to us is a desperate appeal. Those of us who listened to his message quaked at the power of his words.

“Unity. How can we achieve that unity? We are so very different.”

“He is our unity,” said Grace. “The Guardian, because he is the centre of the Covenant now. In him we are all united. That is our hope and the hope of the world.”

We were confronted by the letter to Emily and it became startlingly clear that the Guardian’s message was addressed essentially to all who were only partially awake. I thought of the letters I had been receiving from Dorothy. How awake she had become, how steadfast in her search for someone to teach, and how regular her study of the Word with Mother Beecher. Merely to think of Dorothy brought a lump to my throat. I had had two letters from her lately and I had not answered them. Had she won the struggle with self-doubt that had sent her out to roam the streets of Wilmette? Did she {{p227}} feel still the light touch of the “princely cloak” on her shoulders?

At that great moment, the appointed Centre of the Covenant was challenging us to arise and show forth our power as Bahá’ís. My introspective musings tell me that our only strength is in the decision to give up our lesser selves and offer to be used.

“Forget yourself,” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said, “God’s help will surely come. When you call on the Mercy of God, waiting to reinforce you, your strength will be tenfold... One must never consider one’s own limitations, it is the strength of the Holy Spirit that gives the power to teach.”[^]

There is no such thing as self-sufficing. Of ourselves, we can do nothing. Will we ever learn that lesson? An impulse within me leaps, falls back, and leaps again!

There was an earlier letter from the Guardian to those of us in that house, which called us “a group of responsible teachers”. He had added, “Now see what you can do.” Thank God we had some advantages: we were not young, but young enough; not very strong, but strong enough; not exceedingly well educated, but what we had sufficed. We had all the advantages that Martha had. The Holy Spirit could free us, too, if only the human spirit had the courage, the determination, the steadfastness to accept our role as she had done – whatever that role may be.

Sunday, March 20

“This morning was the beginning of a long day. Mary and I, accompanied by her little dog, Buddy, were taking one of our walks and were in a contemplative mood. I reminded her that, a year ago on this very day, Willard and I had driven around that curve of Beechwood Boulevard for the first time. There was the apartment building where we had lived for the {{p228}} first six weeks. “For Rent” signs were posted on it again. It rained and snowed on that day a year ago. I remember driving down over the steep cliff of a mountain and into that pit of dense atmosphere, feeling a dark cloud settle on my spirits. Except for the occasional “scourings”, it too had remained as grey as Pittsburgh woodwork.

“And now it is so different, Mary. We love this place and pray to remain here. We have a car with no tires or licence plates and, with luck, one room to live in. The ‘security of our numbers’ is gone, and yet, Mary, do you understand how Willard and I can be so light-hearted – and so scared we won’t be able to stay?

“Young-old Mary had acquired some wisdom in her life of feeling misfit. “Some-time,” she said, “I too will be free to be myself.”

Had it been the experience of other experimental communities that the sacrifice of individual persons had. NOT been found in a storehouse of. spiritual gains? Why had we felt so often, a poverty of spirit? I remembered that Louis Gregory had warned me of this happening. Or is there a hidden inner treasury where all the copper that is lost is transmuted into piles of newly minted gold coins?

Naw-Rúz Feast

The lecture meeting and the visits to the newspapers were. over. When we reached home we found • Grace and Harlan getting ready for the Naw-Rúz Feast and we joined them. It was midnight. We retired a few hours later, thankful that no longer would we have to get up at six o’clock for early breakfast and prayers. The Fast was at an end and this is how I remember that Feast. {{p229}}

Grace and I were filled with holiday spirit and we enjoyed the work of preparing the enormous pilau. It was a privilege to be with Grace while her thoughts were drifting happily on the Master's hospitality. In the afternoon, other "maid-servants of the Merciful" arrived, bringing contributions. Said Bessie, in her blustering way, "I might have known I would be asked to bring the onions. I cried my eyes out!"

Everyone worked with the intention of dressing dull Tilbury in festive garb. There were always plants in the Ober house: our yellow lilies, ferns, and ivy. Now even the goldfish and canary were commandeered to add charm to the rooms. Mabel had brought pink hyacinths in pale green frills. There was an Easter lily. Tables were extended through the archway between the living room and the dining room. They were spread with white cloths, trimmed with paper ribbons and set with lovely silver and china that Emily and Ruth had brought. Mr. Payne's funeral chairs were drawn up in a phalanx on one side, later to be placed around the tables. It was now seven o'clock. The candles were lit and the guests began to arrive.

"This place is heaven!" sighed little Mr. Glinka, our Hungarian follower of John Huss.

"So enter in then, all ye angels," boomed Harlan. "Find your placecards."

A bell tinkled and the canary trilled as Grace and Willard entered from the kitchen, each bearing a serving tray piled high with the ornamental pilau. The repast was trimmed with vegetable and fruit designs that – were Grace's specialty, designs which testified to courses that Grace took in Art School. Each presentation was a masterpiece soon to be demolished and eaten. The pilaus were placed one at each end of the long table. Willard and Harlan stood ready to serve the guests as, plates in hand, they filed past. {{p230}}

Harlan asked a young Bahá'í, "Can you tell me, in one sentence, what is the Bahá'í Faith?"

The young Bahá'í answered well, "Can you hold the ocean in a cup?"

Harlan grinned at me. Encouraged by her success, she continued, "We are interreligious, international, interracial; in fact, we are intereverything."

"These pilaus," said our host, "are symbols of the Unity of Mankind. They are composed of the blending of many gifts from God's kingdoms (mineral, animal, vegetable). They are, indeed 'inter-Everything'! The result, I think you will agree, is a unique and delectable flavour. It is not the taste of any one ingredient – it is the blend."

After the food on the trays and side dishes had greatly diminished, Grace rose with her familiar gesture of opening wide her arms and said, "The lower worlds of the animal and vegetable have now been promoted to the human kingdom. The cycle is complete." We laughed. "But spiritually," she went on, "it seems to me that this special Naw-Rúz Feast is delectable because of the blending here of our racial and national inheritance. Let's move our chairs back and be confidential about our own contribution to the flavour of this gathering – starting with Willard.”

Willard complied, “My four grandparents were McKays, Judds, Willards, and VanDuesens – Scottish, English, Welsh and Dutch.”

“And mine,” volunteered Walter Buchannan, “were African-Scottish.”

Forty-one people had come to our Feast. About twenty-five were recent acquaintances made during the last three months of our organized meetings; first the Wednesday-evening study class at Alice Parker’s and then the advertised public meetings at Utility Hall. From these meetings a few firesides followed in people’s homes where Howard, Grace or I had been {{p231}} invited to speak. Now, some of the ladies had brought their husbands. The collection of “ingredients” for our blend was interesting: Hungarian, Jewish, African, Russian, Canadian. As the disclosures of ancestry went around the circle, they looked at each other in astonishment.

It was a social miracle that we had an hilarious time and experienced universal love. The Bahá’í friends lingered to clean up the place and to exult together over the Feast’s success. It was their Feast, too, for most of the food had been contributed, the people who still had incomes providing the more expensive items.

“It is an anniversary too,” I reminded them. “It was a year ago today that we first met.”

“We yall, you mean,” corrected Walter.

On the weekend after Naw-Rúz, Willard was invited to speak in Washington. His expenses would be paid. On the 26th, he left on an Easter excursion which gave him two nights and a day in the capitol. I went with him to the trolley at a little before ten, trying to put off my melancholy to give him a cheerful send-off. I stood on the curb waving to him as he rode away. Willard’s requirements for happiness were quite simple, he claimed. He was happy if I was happy.

But for me, things were not that simple. I wrote:

“The winds of God are buffeting us. All we know is that they are the winds of God. The Ives have found an opening for their work in a new town and are leaving April 1st. The Obers’ hold on Pittsburgh is being loosened by Fate also. The McKays have had an offer to return to New York State to work on a fruit farm, with old friends as hosts. Why is this offer so passionately unacceptable?” {{p232}}

On the walk home after our ‘good-byes’ and parting, it seemed that I was keyed emotionally to a state of apperception described better by artists and mystics. I felt an unexpected rapture in everything I beheld: the row of Kosher restaurants closed on this Saturday Sabbath, the wide-open Italian shops offering “fresh pastini” and, then, there were the enticing Easter flower-stands. I was absorbed with delightful sights. Others called it the “innocent eye” of pure feeling or pure aesthetic.

“When the Bahá’ís talk of Oneness,” I meditated, “it is much more than an intellectual concept. The Rose of Oneness is, for us, a transcendent emotion that can transform our lives in this outer plane. Jewish, European, American shops here before me, three in a row. Beautiful!”

When I reached home, the boys were waiting for me.

“Auntie Doris, are you going to help us with our Easter eggs?” David wanted to know.

“Do you need help?”

“Sure,” said ‘Azíz.

So we went out into the kitchen and made a terrible mess. The boys scrapped as usual, while I painted Harlan’s and Willard’s pictures on a couple of duck eggs.

Grace and Harlan were at the dinner table. Willard was still away. I was halfway between the table and the kitchen sink when Harlan said that, if business did not pick up they would have to leave for Eliot in a few weeks. We could go with them or return to New York State. I ran back to the kitchen to cry over the dishes and to wipe my tears on the dish towel. I bounced back and said, “I think the Guardian wants Willard and me to stay in Pittsburgh.”

The firm planks of the Crimson Ark withstood the battering of the winds of change. {{p233}}

I prayed until two in the morning, using the Guardian’s name in supplication, and I awoke with those words sounding in my head. I felt my fixed desires relax, and, then could whisper, “I am not sure that I know what is best for us. How should I know?” The firm planks that steadied me? – the daily cleaning of the house, washing and ironing Mabel’s things before she packed them, having a scant but attractively served dinner ready when they came home at night. These, I felt, were the firm invariables.

In the afternoon I went out to give a talk to the Abundant Life Group. I had heard that some had said that Bahá’ís put Bahá’u’lláh ahead of Christ. I spoke about Christ and Christian mysticism, about eternity and time, and about the need to be free in order to make others free. I prayed that these groping souls would catch a glimpse of the reality of the “abundant life” they were seeking so earnestly. Their faces were shining. Surely a sign.

A Patch of Sacred Ground

One felt affection for this room. It had its charm – the lovely oriental rug of tan and green with soft designs in rose and grey, a Victorian stained-glass window over the stairway with its polished newel. I felt affection for this room and mild regret at the thought of leaving it. The Tilbury community was at the point of dissolution.

When Grace and Harlan acknowledged that they would not . need us after April 1, a wild elation took hold of me. And Willard began to beam like the sun. All tension broke and complexes untangled. Harlan was but our friend again and Tilbury was no longer a prison but a patch of sacred ground.

No one had, by his own volition, called out, “Enough!” We would have remained together had not circumstances prevented. Now the Obers were leaving for the same reasons that {{p234}} we had left our first home – the doors were closing to their remaining. They had tarried dangerously close to the margin of destitution.

The four graduates of the school that we called Tilbury Tenement looked back over their year in that house. The vows that had gone up from Tilbury, our combined emotions, the opening doors and the ones that closed, the attacks of illness, our moments of madness and of exalted sanity. If there are atmospheric colours created by the intense vibrations of the mind, as some will suggest, what a kaleidoscope hovered over that hallowed Bahá’í address! In my imagination I can see it like a rainbow sparkling with flashes of sunlight and the sky behind it rolling with black clouds. Tilbury. Place of our solemn Covenant with a company of His chosen ones. It had been made an arena for the testing of our unwavering resolve, a testing that had reached intensity. Someone, powerful and omniscient, knew the balance of negative and positive temperaments and knew, also, of our will to carry on.

As Harlan was pleased, we were too. He said, “Including the Ives’, our being here together has resulted in the welfare of the Cause. We have got the Assembly organized for the first time, have a flourishing study class, downtown meetings, publicity – most of the work being done by the people in this house. A study group has been started in New Castle. Pittsburgh is now a fertile field for racial amity...”

We said our last prayers together, continuing our supplications for protection and guidance – the Remover of Difficulties elevating from Tilbury Tenement. {{p235}}

Part Three

Joy Gives Us Wings

In the morning paper there were pages of advertisements offering “Rooms for Rent, Light Housekeeping”. Emily Craighead was coming to take me to look at some of them. The rates were listed conveniently and we would not need to waste gas on the expensive ones.

I remember the attic studio that I rented once when I went to teach art at Niagara Falls. That memory convinced me that one could make any place attractive with a few sticks of second-hand furniture and a paintbrush. “Why, this city must be full of such places,” I thought exultantly as Emily and I started out that bright April morning. Instead we were given a tour through the slums of what once had been called the richest city in the world.

One place did rather attract me, although Emily made no comment. In it there were two rooms which had been parlours in a well-designed house now backed-up and moldering against the rear of an old Greek Orthodox church that blocked the light. A cooker on a table occupied one corner. In another, a couch that converted into a bed for two and in lieu of clothes closets, a section of wall was hung with hooks and drapes. “It has the charm of the Left Bank of Paris,” my former self urged. “Emily, it’s not far from Alice Parker’s,” I argued. “It’s close to meetings, Schenley Park, and the library. What an opportunity!”

But my newly cleansed eye rested on the greyness of the woodwork and the walls. I told the faded lady in charge that I might return later with my husband.

“Would you like me to drive you out to the address in East Liberty?” Emily suggested. “I know that street. There is not so much soot there and some of the houses are not so {{p236}} ancient.” She took me to a place on North Negley Street, high up in the rear of a three-storey rooming house. The landlady was named Mrs. Bowser.

I had never heard of a bed-dining room, but this was one. The bed, an odd-sized roll-away dominated most of the walls pace on one side, making a raised level like a mezzanine or balcony. The bedspread was white, spotless. The dining table and white kitchen chairs were across the room by the window. I saw a wardrobe and a chest of drawers with a mirror and there was a kitchen. It had been a clothes closet, but now it had a gas plate and oven and a little square worktable on rollers. On the wall there were shelves with a coffee pot, saucepan and a few dishes. The running water was in the bathroom and we were told that we could wash dishes there at quiet times of the day. Grace came out with me early the next day and gave it her approval, then Willard went to pay a week’s rent.

Our Last Day at Tilbury: April 7, 1932

The Ober family was moving too; not to Eliot, Maine, but, until the end of the school year, to temporary lodgings. I wanted to capture and store away an image of that moment in my mind. I wrote:

“It is a bright spring day with a touch of elixir in the air. I am visiting, for the last time, my ‘palais royale’ and relaxing on the little sofa by the window. My yellow curtains are blowing out and the sunshine falls warm on my hands. Our room is torn up, the bed sitting rakishly in the alcove. The cleaning lady has washed the rug with Austin’s Cleaner and it smells wet.” {{p237}}

We had been washing, ironing, and packing all day when Bahíyyih, Ruth Brown and the baby, Beth, came to call at four. We sat in the bare room and talked with Bahíyyih, who, with Edvard, was moving to Pittsburgh to stay with the Browns. I was telling them about the tiny apartment that we were moving into that very night. “The best thing about it,” I said to them, “is that it is on the third floor and we can look out through the east window and see, first the sunrise, then the treetops, and then the outline of the hills.”

We Arrive at North Negley

Ten-thirty on a Saturday night and the food stores were still doing business when the street car let us off at Negley Avenue. There were bargains to be had and we were pleased with the bag of food we purchased for five dollars. There was another package, which I bought without comment. We climbed the stairs, took out our new key, let ourselves in and turned on the droplight. We unpacked, found places for the groceries, and lit the gas plate. Exclaimed Willard, “This place is Heaven on Earth!”

I opened the other “package” for which I had paid the price of seven loaves of stale bread – thirty-five cents. It was a marigold blooming in a pot. “This is our flower garden,” I announced to Willard. He took the plant in his hand.

“Much more than you thought,” he observed. “It comes with a weed and a ladybug. It is a whole estate!”

“And if we don’t hurt the ladybug,” I replied, remembering the nursery story, “she will bring us good luck.”

With a castle of our own, we began to practise hospitality. Guests invited to our Sunday morning breakfasts were illustrious. Bahíyyih (Margaret) and Edvard Lindstrum[^] were our first.

[^] [25. During my first visit to Green Acre, we called at the Randalls’ summer residence. I met Mr. Harry Randall, who had distinguished himself as Martha Root’s co-worker. He was ill at the time. Ruth and Bahíyyih were not at home, but I remember seeing a good-looking blond, young man sitting on the lawn. This was Edvard, the man engaged to Bahíyyih.] {{p238}}

“We shall be living in Pittsburgh,” explained Bahíyyih, “with my mother, Ruth and Bishop (Brown) until Edvard gets settled financially. I have been going through the Egypt of the spirit,” she confided. Edvard was boyish and genial, a little too high-keyed. Bahíyyih resembled Harry Randall in appearance. She had been taken to ‘Akká on a pilgrimage, when she was a little girl, and had been the beloved child of the party on whom the Master had showered His bounties. She was now a devoted Bahá’í, mature, and a worker for the Cause. At this time, Bahíyyih and Edvard’s own child, Beth, was about a year old. We knew that we would love this couple. Our hours together during this Sunday breakfast were delightful. They had to leave at twelve, but Edvard came back in the afternoon to take us to the Feast.

Alice Parker

“Your heaven is high up,” said Alice, panting a little after her long climb. “I suppose I should call it an ascent, rather than a climb. How do you manage to run up and down all those stairs?” she sighed.

“This is the time when ‘joy gives us wings’,[^] to use the Master’s own words,” I replied.

Alice responded with one of her habitual expressions. “You sweet thing.”

The marigold sat on the window sill. Here was a picture with the sky for background. A breeze came from outside and set the little plant to quivering. One of us commented, “Isn’t this like our hearts when animated by the breezes of God?” After lunch and a tour of all the features of our Castle we rested on the bed while waiting for Bishop to call for Alice. I confessed to her:

“The Lord has been paying so much attention to our training this year that I have come to look on all material {{p239}} happiness as fleeting. The kind of effervescence Willard and I are having right now is ‘bubble stuff’. We are swimming around like minnows in a lake of joy, with a vague uneasiness that another wave may come and sweep us back on the pebbles again.”

Alice looked amused. “If ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had asked His favourite question, ‘Are you happy?’ and you responded, ‘very happy’ what would He say?”

“He would say, ‘Khayli Khub’. That means ‘very good’.”

“Joy gives us wings,” she said, “and wings have been provided to us – to fly above the gloomy atmosphere of Pittsburgh. Dear Doris, think only of that and be exhilarated... Here’s Bishop!”

Howard Drops By

Howard Ives was in town and he and Grace came to breakfast. It was evident that the man before us was another person to whom the Lord had given wings. I noted:

“Howard was full of spiritual dynamic ... very wonderful. What he said inspired me. He is bubbling over with zeal. His personality is flooded with power from on high. After the events of last winter, he is a miracle confirmed.”

But life in the sky-parlour of Negley Avenue, no matter how exalted, was not designed to be a perpetual breakfast party. Like the sudden clap of hands, the tensions of the first Pittsburgh year were over. I admit that my wing-giving joy rose first as a release from the numbing burden of housework. Somehow, Bahá’u’lláh and Harlan, my mentors, had accepted my contribution and, weak though I knew it to be, had made me feel good about it. Now we knew that the days before us {{p240}} would be filled to overflowing with a variety of interesting activities.

There would be more writing. I had been appointed Associate Editor of the Bahá'í magazine. The Thirty-Six Lesson Course on the Bahá'í Teachings was in circulation and Willard and I were appointed by the National Teaching Committee to handle the sales and correspondence. The Local Assembly had adopted the Course and put me in charge as teacher of the weekly study meetings. Then I was elected Chairman of the Assembly, an honour that overwhelmed me.

The crown for Negley Avenue hospitality arrived when Lorna Tasker came for a week during a school holiday.

April 15th

I could tell when Lorna got up in the morning, for she put her pillow to air in the window of her rented room across the street. I would watch her as she walked over, limping a little from an ankle broken last year. In a way, Lorna reminded me of Martha Root: she was not so much a personality as she was a presence: Not that I had not seen her as a strong personality while she was teaching, but sometimes, when we met after an absence, there seemed to be a “third person” shared by both of us – our united Self, devoid of personality. St. Teresa in her {Interior Castle} might have accorded us a moment's sojourn in that “little chamber where great stillness reigns”. This inestimable bounty, this Nothingness that Lorna and I called The Place. It was a condition, a realm described by the prayer, “that shall rise above words and letters and transcend the murmur of syllables and sounds – that all things may be merged into nothingness before the revelation of Thy splendor.”[^] We felt this to be a confirmation of the covenant we had made four years ago on her first visit – the {{p241}} covenant to reach out to people with universal love, to pray for them and to seek unity with them.

Lorna wrote ninety pages in her journal to describe that week in which we worked together. Emily Craighead took us to the Browns', Eve Kerin's, the Sekers' and to Mrs. Payne's. On the evening of the Study Class, there seemed to be a special atmosphere of aid from on high. Two ladies at that meeting were from the social class – at one time rich, but now in need and dimly aware of their poverty of spirit. One of them, the elegant and gracious Mrs. D, had been very friendly to me. On this night she extended an invitation to a dinner party to meet her friends. Lorna was quite attracted to her and was delighted that she had asked both of us to speak. A letter from Lorna describes what took place:

“At the luncheon all the eyes around the table were [socially] veiled. Afterward I read some of my poems. Then you spoke and told them about our dedication to a new way of life on the night of The Blazing Log, and how our own lives had grown richer and happier.

“It seemed to me that as you spoke, the whole meeting opened out full like one of the roses in the bowl on the table. The Spirit descended into our midst and we were all one. It was a new dedication. This time it had come, not as a dream and a promise, but as a fulfilment and actuality. We had worked together.”

We Search for Wider Fields

Lorna’s visit and the rebirth of our aims opened fields of activity that had been entered before but not sufficiently explored. How to help the people who were trying to help the world? Some were agitating for a Bahá’í principle without awareness or acknowledgment of its Source. These were people who campaigned for Universal Peace or Social Justice. Others were interested in the search for man’s hidden powers. Black organizations rose up for the advancement of their race. The apostolic energy of the churches was stirred up.

They are unconsciously answering the Call of Bahá’u’lláh “ I exclaimed. “We must get closer to the people, Willard. These partially awake people need more than ‘a mere set of principles’; they need contact with Universal love. But how to reach them?”

“Well, if ‘joy gives us wings’,” quipped Willard, “we will have to fly to them.”

His teasing remark reminded me that it had been two months since we had found happiness in the tiny space that was all ours: What bliss it had been! Willard was thinking of our uncertain future when he said, with determined optimism .No matter what happens to us, we can look back on this time of heaven on earth.”

There had been only one casualty. A sudden windstorm had blown our symbolic marigold out of the window down onto the pavement below. The flower pot was broken, of course. Willard begged a jelly glass from Mrs. Bowser and brought the plant back to me. It did not seem possible, but the lady bug was still clinging to it. When we left, we gave both to Mrs. Bowser.

In the weeks that followed, I joined the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom (WIL) and Willard and I gave a joint talk on “The Bahá’í Plan for Universal Peace”. This was my Bahá’í bow to the more than three hundred women in the organization. Over half were educated, aggressive, and Jewish. Many had relatives or friends in Hitler-persecuted Germany. Mrs. Norman W. Storer. at whose home. Martha had spoken in December, was President. The American members were ardent sympathizers. Our talks were informative and, to judge by the interested questions asked, seemed to be well received. The meeting was in a room in the Chamber of Commerce building and the League was going to have lunch there. Willard left and I remained.

There were reports of new atrocities in Germany and it was hard for Mrs. Storer to keep the meeting in order. I sat in the midst of a bubbling cauldron of explosives and quaked. I was uncomfortable and I knew why – my elbows were digging nervously into my ribs. I wanted to be anywhere but there. I asked myself, should I leave?

“No,” said the voice within. “You are a Bahá’í teacher, sent here to represent Bahá’u’lláh. When you call on the mercy of God, waiting to reinforce you, your strength will be tenfold.”[^] How often to some other aspiring soul, had I quoted that line from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

That helped. I found myself relaxing the way a cat does when it feels at home. I loved the people universally. I even stayed to have lunch with Mrs. Storer at the big round table and heard myself talking Peace.

From My Journal:

“Now that the Obers and the Ives are gone, the community says that they are depending on us, the McKays. I must stop feeling little and unimportant and accept the responsibility of study of the Writings and prayer. And I must strive for faith, initiative and responsibility. I am such a sloppy person, so vacillating, so limited. It is hopeless! My efforts are those of a bird who carries a grain of sand to some glorious foundation that is being erected.”

“‘Yes, that is true,’ I told my lesser Self. ‘Of ourselves, we can do nothing.’ But what of Bahá’u’lláh’s statement, ‘God doeth whatsoever He willeth.’ Even in our noonday prayer we testify each day to ‘our poverty and His riches, to our powerlessness {{p244}} and to His strength.’ As Willard would have said: ‘Our human negative reactions are an expression of self not worthy of mention, if we truly desire to serve Bahá’u’lláh.’ ”

On the eve of the Feast of Núr (Light) we had Readings and Prayers, and later discussed the departure of the Obers and the coming of the Lindstrums. There was talk, too, about ‘survival’. The member, we affectionately called ‘Blackie’ was silent. We did not question him. Instead, we invited him to dinner with each household, rotating different nights of the week. He accepted, with his humorous twinkle.

Then someone said to us, “Are you all right?”

Willard told the community, “Simply great – so far. Except that the work I have now won’t last much longer. But we are sure something will show up. It always does.”

At this point Bessie Seker created a sensation, first by raising her hand and then by standing up to emphasize what she had to say.

“Perhaps something has shown up, although I am not prepared to say what. I took it upon myself to write the Guardian about the work you were doing and about your affairs. The answer has come back. He said about you, Doris and

Willard, 'They are well versed in the Teachings and have the Bahá'í spirit and that is all the capital a Bahá'í needs.'

"And in some mysterious way, our Guardian knows," added Ruth Brown. "Sometimes when we were sitting at the dinner table in Haifa, a faraway look would come into his eyes. There might be minutes of withdrawal when we were sure that he was responding to urgent prayers poured out to him from different parts of the world, in accordance with the promise 'God will answer every servant, if that prayer is urgent.'" Ruth went on, "We are too tepid in our prayers. {{p245}} Beyond a mild reaction, what do they accomplish? Concentration, purity of intention, and detachment from the outcome – these are the attributes of prayer."

From My Journal: June 6th

"Tonight we are going to bring our affairs before the Local Spiritual Assembly. Willard's work has about come to an end. The city still has a faint pulse and a reflex of breathing, but in reality, she is quite dead.

"The Sekers have offered us a free apartment, so if we can find twenty-five dollars a month for electricity and gas, food and car fare, we can still subsist.

"The Bahá'í work is booming as never before. When Grace left for Green Acre she turned her contacts over to me. We have temporarily given up the downtown meetings because of the heat, but the Study Class is flourishing. Willard is chairman of a Teaching Committee of nine."

Another example of our efforts while still living in Negley to reach the heart of this strange, perilous, fascinating city of Pittsburgh I described:

"Somehow I have associated myself with the Lucy Stone League for Colored Women. I have just come back from a tea given for the League. The Crafts of the YMCA are leaving the city for work in the new "Y" in Harlem. Mrs. Lampkin informed me that I was to speak. Mrs. Craft, a delightful woman in a pink silk dress and a white fur piece introduced me as "someone a little different from most people – a Bahá'í." I spoke for ten minutes on our interracial contacts in Harlem saying that the Bahá'ís believe in one religion and one God and one race – the human race. {{p246}}

"After the meeting, Mrs. Lampkin said I might have said more about the Bahá'í Cause. She spoke as a field secretary of the NAACP about the cooperation of the Bahá'ís and that she is very pleased and that Mrs. Craft is very near to acceptance of the Faith. This was news to me as the Crafts were our first contacts for the interracial work in Pittsburgh. Although we had come well-introduced, they had seemed quite determined not to be coaxed into friendship.

"And now, the beautiful coffee-coloured Mrs. Craft gave me a farewell kiss, while everyone looked on in astonishment. 'I love you,' she declared, 'in spite of all appearances – and you are not to say I don't.'

“She was going and probably we would not be seeing each other again. In Harlem she will meet my friend, Lois Allen, who I hear, has become a Bahá’í.”

A few days later, I noted in my journal:

“Willard has been taken on as a salesman for a firm that does business with little parking coupons. The Sekers have moved to an apartment on the top floor. Their building, recently covered with imitation brick, looks like a shoebox stood on end in this environment of single and two storey structures. It is topped by a flat roof enclosed by a two-foot high brick wall. Bessie has been up there to pray under the stars-and at dawn. She is so near to Bahá’u’lláh up there that she speaks to Him with more familiarity than I would dare. “Bahá’u’lláh, what are you going to do about Henry’s gambling?” she says. And the prayer is answered. When Henry heard that Bahá’u’lláh had been called in, he never gambled again... “A real penthouse for evening meetings,” I told Bessie.” {{p247}}

June 10th

“We have come here to live in the madding crowd. This congested three or four streets of provision stores is a famous market section. The street and sidewalks are so narrow it is almost impossible to slide through the crowd.

“We parked at the curb with the Sekers, while Bessie entertained with histories of some of the people who were our neighbours. Homewood is an intimate neighbourhood, like a small town. The setting is a vast network of narrow streets and alleys littered and smeared with rained-on soot. We float in a sea of slums, yet with our own civic pride we have a branch Post Office, a bank, a branch library, and a small park.”

At eleven o’clock, Henry started the motor and Willard and I followed Bessie’s lead and disembarked. We walked around to the entrance of the former wallpaper store, an entrance which was now the front door to our home. The windows were pasted over with newspaper but there was a light switch on the inside woodwork. We turned it on and it lit up an aisle which ran the length of the store – half a block long by Homewood Avenue standards. There were still odd remnants of wallpaper, some partially unrolled, hanging over the shelf edges like neglected drapery. Up a step, then to the door of the apartment. The square living room was bare of furniture. There we set down our bags, which contained the food, books, and kitchen things we had bought at Negy. Bessie announced cordially, ‘The kitchen and the bathroom are ready for you and your bed is made up. We’ll go at it again in the morning. In the meantime, welcome to your new home.’

“Thank you Bessie. It’s going to be great!” Willard hugged Bessie and I kissed her. She went out through the kitchen {{p248}} door and we heard her trudging up the two flights of wooden steps to their own apartment.

The bathroom had expensive fixtures. The water was hot, always hot as Bessie had promised. Because of the limited space the tub was only four feet long.

“A tub of our own,” I enthused.

It was four o'clock in the morning when the clamour broke out. (I remember seeing the little ivory and red wall clock.) Our bed was plumb against a lath-and-wallpaper partition which quivered and shook. We felt the movement of heavy objects being thrown against it from the other side. A babble of voices shouting in foreign tongues could be heard through the wall, sometimes wild with laughter, sometimes bawling in anger. At last the body, or whatever it was, was rolled out on heavy wheels, loaded onto a truck, and borne away.

Later in the morning we found Bessie. “Did you hear the riot last night?” we asked. Called Bessie, “Listen to this, Henry.” Henry, showed us, for the first time, how hard he could laugh. When he regained control of his voice he told us:

“It’s them Eyetalian fellows next door. The press sends out a load of morning papers and they sort them. The news chaps come and take out a bunch to deliver and sometimes there aren’t enough and the chaps fight for them. If there are some left over, they’re sent back on the truck. I promise you,” Henry waxed emphatic, “you’ll get used to them, same as we did.”

Our first day in Homewood had begun with an effrontery to our ears when, the early morning newsboys piled in. Following this, our spirits were dampened by a week of steamy and rainy weather. Most of our daylight came from the alley between Homewood Avenue and Zenith Way, where, for three storeys, the apartment balconies were built side-by-side and on top of one another. We were embedded in a section of space, called “the Court”, which wrapped us in a smothering blanket of dimness, dampness and dirt.

My depression grew by progressive stages. The Court, the air we breathed, the smell of the community trash box, Willard’s slow start with work and the swearing of Mrs. Wells. She had a flat on the second floor and, from time to time, would suspend her cursing to sing gospel hymns.

Once again I had struck bottom but, for Bessie and Henry’s kindness, I wore a bright smile facade. Although I do not mind sharing its contents now, the notes I wrote then were private, secret. There had begun a series of dashings out to the library or to the Park, or even out of town. My running away had the pretext of winning back the nearness to reality, the lack of which is also a peculiar feature of nightmare. This is subtle torture for a Bahá’í, the remoteness is really from God.

Only a week away from the peace of Negley Avenue and what of the ‘wings of joy’ now? I asked myself in the coolness of the library, “The wings supporting our spirits, have they become already, only an image of faded delight? Yes, they were real, but evidently only lent to us here. Have we lost them?”

I asked Willard that question on the night we went out to find the hills. He said firmly, almost automatically, “Take refuge in God!... Seek the ‘inner • invariability’! I don’t need to tell you that.”

“But how I need to hear you say it. However, I will answer my own question next. How to do it? Your answer is ‘Walk thou above the world by the power of The Most Great Name...’[^]”

And that was what he was doing then, breathing “Alláh'u'Abhá” as we walked a few blocks and began to climb a series of hills ascending upward from level to level, finally by {{p250}} wooden stairs, until we balanced on a street called Apple Avenue. From there we could look out over seven miles of Pittsburgh and its boroughs. In the late sunset we could see the two synagogues on Squirrel Hill, the University buildings grouped around the Temple of Learning where Bishop taught, the seven blast furnaces from which came the soot, and the lights outlining the fifty-seven bridges over the Ohio, Monongahela, and Allegheny Rivers that shaped the Golden Triangle. We could look down at our own street, Homewood Avenue, a bright lavalier of rhinestones as blue, red and yellow store signs and the moving flashes and glares of automobile lights crowded the beginning darkness. It was Saturday night and, within a mile of our lookout, thousands of people were milling around those three or four blocks in search of food bargains.

We climbed higher on the tiers of streets. Each stairway would connect with a rutty unpaved road with a scattering of poor houses where Black people stared out with observant eyes. When we reached the top and turned again toward level ground, I said conversationally, “‘Joy gives us wings’, but pain gives us feet to walk on. Sometimes earth feet are needed, especially when walking with others. If I have never experienced how it feels to be depressed, how can I know what most of the people in Pittsburgh are feeling? “

Window in the Sky

On Sunday mornings there would be no noise in the newsroom next door. But today I awoke at four o'clock anyway and lay there with my eyes open. First there was nothing to see in our little dark dungeon. At this time of night in summer, I imagined the stirring wonder of the outside world. I felt helpless and deprived. All that I could see of the outside was offered by a small tipsy square of a window {{p251}} notched into the wall beneath the zigzag of a stairway. And all that I could see now was pre-dawn sky. Suddenly I noticed that the moon was in my private plot of sky. It was an old moon shining with a mellow incandescence against the soft azure of the sky, its face turned away. Then there appeared a star, too, in the crook made by the moon. As a climax to my startled wonder, there appeared in my square the Seker's cat, looking beautiful and weird with the moon irradiating her fur.

Now the sun was rising and its rays struck the red chest. There had been some old furniture in the garage, which we were privileged to use, including this chest with two deep drawers. I decided to paint the chest a Chinese red. I found red paint and added a small can of orange. As I worked putting on two coats of colour in two days, some of that glorious tint got into my soul. Colour is cosmic, I had read somewhere; the capacity of the mind to perceive it is a faculty and a sign of God.

As I painted the chest, I became more interested in my little place. The rooms would be scoured bright and clean, the walls and carpets cleaned. We would put plants outside, in the little junky court, to make of it a Greenwich Village sort of place. Willard was pleased that I was nest building.

But now my thoughts were soaring to a higher nest – the Sekers' flat roof. "It would be like the roofs in Persia, away from the world and nearer to God. We could have our meetings there on hot summer evenings," I urged Bessie.

Bessie and Henry owned a house in the country about twenty miles from Pittsburgh. They had bought some furniture that came with it, furniture that was meant to be Victorian. One weekend Willard and I went with them to visit the house.

Mine is an uneasy memory – the remembrance of a room that had an air, quite common in country homes, of wakes and funerals. There was an unusable fireplace, for example, trimmed with an old hymn book and a vase of artificial flowers. But the haunting impression of the room was caused actually by the massive, black, walnut furniture upholstered in lack-lustre black satin.

"The Elks," Henry had remarked. (The Elks Club was a mens' social organization to which Henry belonged.) They had refurnished their meeting room. Could they have sold this old stuff to Henry? Perhaps this is backbiting. I stopped thinking.

There was a rather pretty wicker set. I expressed a liking for it and Bessie promised it to me for our still unfurnished parlour at the flat. My mind started dreamily fitting it into our nest. She said that a truck would bring it in. There were plants outside too, which we transplanted and carried into town in pots.

We packed the car with an old matting rug, some low chairs and stools, and a wide-spreading sun umbrella in gorgeous colours.

At home we set the plants around our penthouse pavilion, put down the old rug, two card tables and our seating arrangements. The effect was both spacious and gracious. There would be a cloth and tea things on one table, we said, and Bahá'í books on the other. In the chairs, our beloved Bahá'í friends.

Tuesday afternoon came and at supper time Henry would be coming in the truck with the furniture. Willard and I slipped in for a look at our living room. We had used Dic-a-Doo, a wallpaper cleaner made in Geneva, which brought back the paper's true colour, a pale green with a tracery of flowers and a satin finish. Bessie had provided the paint for the woodwork and floor. There were no windows in the room, but we had the overhead light turned on and, in the next room, the blaze of the late sunset fell upon and fired the red chest. {{p253}}

Henry called Willard to help carry in the furniture. IT WAS THE MASSIVE, BLACK, PADDED SOFA AND GARGANTUAN LOUNGE CHAIRS FROM THE ELK'S CLUB. Henry was glowing, "This is the good stuff, not that riff-raff wicker you picked out. Thought you would like this best." I told them, "Move it back into the corners against the walls. I shan't be able to shift it." Still beaming, Henry went to find Bessie.

Woe! Woe! I climbed up on the biggest of the monsters, the sofa and began to cry. The other great monsters seemed to stare.

A half-hour later we suddenly began to laugh. This was one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's little jokes, with a lesson tied up with the gift. "If George Spendlove were here," Willard contributed, "he would remind us once again of the three Most Holy Words given by Bahá'u'lláh in the Persian Hidden Words; 'Prefer not your will to Mine, never desire that which I have not desired for you, and approach Me not with lifeless hearts, defiled with worldly desires and cravings.' "[^]

[^] [30. {The Hidden Words of Bahá'u'lláh} Persian #19, p. 28.]

So, feeling rather weak with so much emotion and so much laughter, I began nest-building again. "We can send back to Geneva for the floor-length blue and gold curtains that used to hang in the book room at the Farm. We can drape them over those spectres. No need for curtains when a room has no windows. So we will hang the furniture instead!"

We laughed again, perhaps a little hysterically, and accepted 'Abdu'l-Bahá's gift ... and Henry's too.

The second Sunday in June. There was a Bahá'í 'picnic in Youngstown, Ohio. Bahá'ís from Pittsburgh, Cleveland, New Castle and Youngstown convened in the rain, in a fairyland of a park. A pavilion accommodated our considerable numbers. We spread our food out on tables and held our meeting in a rustic auditorium. {{p254}}

When the meeting was over I said goodbye to Willard, the Sekers, and the three guests we had brought with us, and left to catch a ride to Rocky River. A friend, Lois had rented a cabin there for a month. She had a job not far away in Cleveland and commuted back and forth daily by bus.

I was thus left alone for two incredible days, completely vacuous and at rest, as blissfully I tossed pebbles at a rock in the brook. On the third day I, too, caught the early bus to Cleveland.

Before store-opening, I waited on a park bench by May's Department Store. The beauty of Rocky River was still with me as I viewed the landscaped flowerbeds and bushes planted around a fountain that was scattering diamonds in the early morning sunlight.

A flock of pigeons arrived for breakfast and several cars drew up. Boys and girls leapt out with bags of bread crusts and table scraps to feed the birds. Perhaps this bird-feeding is a project of the private school where Kay Cole teaches, I thought to myself. These children are well dressed and have come in big cars and they are most lavish with their crusts. They tossed their scraps into a low-fenced enclosure where the birds were.

Watching this pleasant scene from his bed in the grass was a rumpled victim of Want. His eyes roved between the falling crusts and the manoeuvres of the birds. The children were laughing at the greediness of the pigeons.

“Don’t you ever know when you’ve had enough?” one boy yelled at them.

Soon the boys and girls climbed back into the cars and were whisked away to school. The man stepped into the enclosure, picked up his dreadful breakfast of trampled and grass-stained bread and, crouching there, wolfed it down. When he saw others looking at him, he scooped up a handful and shuffled away.

Like the desperate man, the people passing in the park seemed, in their own way, to reflect the abnormality of the Depression. The shop girls hurried to work in single-minded concentration. Heads and shoulders thrust forward, they walked, not with a free stride, but with legs bent sharp at the knee. They were like the stick figures we children used to make at school. Action was shown by straight lines bent at elbows and knees. Round knobs were attached for heads and hips. Live little figures, but no grace.

As the flocks of girls hurried past, my thoughts went back to the picnic at Youngstown. Bishop Brown had read from a large book bound in green, the colour of the Báb’s turban. It was the first time that any of us had seen the newly published {Dawn-breakers}, a translation by Shoghi Effendi of {Nabíl’s Narrative}. One of the readings was of the story of how Quddús, the last Letter of the Living, had found the Báb and had recognized Him instantly by His gait.

Bishop had asked us to close our eyes for a moment and to meditate on the gait of the Báb. It would, we imagined, have been an unhurried stride and there would have been a unity of rhythm in the movement of His body, His head, perhaps a little inclined. There would be signs of loftiness in His gait, loftiness tempered by humility.

But what of our own gait as Bahá’ís? Did it, I questioned, reveal truly our inner state of certainty?

May’s big store was open now and I observed the mixture of human qualities manifested in the early shoppers. I joined them and spent an hour looking around the store before taking the bus to East Cleveland and lunch with Alice Doolittle.

Few of the western Bahá’ís had visited Haifa during these hard times. Most of us submitted to our deprivation, sustaining ourselves with the crumbs of plenty brought back to us by our more fortunate friends. These Travellers in the Path {{p256}} of God had taken on a special lustre because of their experience in the Holy Land. Alice Doolittle had made the pilgrimage and recently had returned.

I got off the bus and walked to the small house with its screened veranda. A neat sign advertised “HAIRDRESSING”. I had gone twice, while visiting the Coles, to have my hair done by Alice. The first time was in winter and she told me jubilantly that, over the years, she had saved $400 to go to Haifa. But in May she said she was not going. “The Temple Dome,” she explained. “I decided it was my duty to give my money to the Dome. All my customers wanted to know why I was not going and, of course, I had to explain. They could tell that, deep down, I was disappointed.”

“But you did go, Alice. What happened?”

“It was this. My one wealthy customer gave me $400 but she said that I must use it on this trip only. When I talked to the others and asked ‘What shall I do?’, they said, ‘You must accept the gift, partly because of this generous soul. She will be hurt if you refuse. Also, you were meant to take this journey for the sake of God. Because of it, your services to the Cause will be increased.’ So I went.”

We had eaten lunch and were on our way to the Coles’ house, four blocks away. As Alice was shorter and somewhat thick-set I adjusted my long steps to fit her smaller stride. The wind was blowing noisily and I bent over her to hear her talk as we walked along. She was a bit out of breath.

“You think I am excited? Blame the wind,” she began. “Or perhaps it’s that I am going to give my first • talk to the Bahá’ís and I am nervous.” Impulsively she asked, “Do you think I have changed?”

“Yes, Alice, but I can’t comprehend why.”

“Our short time together is drawing to a close and I did promise myself to tell you this...”

“So why don’t you start,” I suggested, squeezing her arm. {{p257}} p>

“You see, my big fault when I started out on this trip was my inferiority complex. I was all wrapped up in myself. No one saw what was inside me. I thought of myself as an overlooked person. My fault, of course.”

“I know that feeling,” I put in.

“You do know how I am, Doris. No style, no looks, poor English. I’m nervous with people like the Coles with university degrees. ‘Haifa’ I told myself, ‘nobody will take notice of me there either.’ But the Guardian must have known from the start. He singled me out and treated me like a queen. On the first night when I sat next to him, he asked me questions and showed great respect for me. I was in dreams!”

We checked our pace and Alice began to catch her breath.

“But still,” she gasped, “I wasn’t satisfied. You can see why I can’t tell this to the others. In my folly I wanted Bahá’u’lláh Himself, to take notice of me. Well, on the last day of my pilgrimage I went alone into the Holy of Holies [Bahá’u’lláh’s resting place at Bahjí] and setting aside some flowers, I crossed over the Threshold to the inner ‘room. How could I dare! I asked him for a sign.”

She stopped and looked into my eyes as though to confirm her decision to tell me and continued. “I can remember the shaking; the walls, the floor – and most of all, the atoms of my body. I felt thrown off my feet. Was it like wind, or waves, or an earthquake, or was it like all three? I was on my knees, with my forehead pressed to the beautiful Persian rug, crying my heart out in gratitude to Bahá’u’lláh. I stood up suddenly, quaking with the fear of God, It’s Awe, they say. It is not that you are AFRAID of God, but something different. And I knew that I was a new person, born again. Inside I could hear myself shouting, ‘Bahá’u’lláh HAS TAKEN NOTICE OF ME!’ ”

Gazing off, she paused to savour an inner moment.

“Before I left,” she continued, “ I asked the Guardian what I could do to serve the Cause. He said, ‘Teach. Speak.’ ‘But {{p258}} I am not a speaker,’ I said. He told me to use my notes and to use the pictures I was taking and to speak to the other Bahá’ís about my pilgrimage. And that’s what I’m trying to do.”

In the Coles’ house a roomful of Bahá’ís were waiting to take notice of the returned pilgrim. A sheet was hung on the wall, and a table with a stereopticon lantern was set up at the opposite side of the room. Alice projected her pictures onto the sheet and when she began to speak, she was at ease, in her element at last. The atmosphere expanded under the influence of her joy. The enlarged pictures bloomed on the sheet and we were in Haifa with her. Later that evening Kay and I drove Alice to another meeting in a Cleveland home.

I came back from Cleveland a day early to a smouldering and unpalatable Homewood and, also, from being “up in the clouds”. Key in the door of the shop with the papered windows, quick steps down the aisle with the flyspecked rolls of wallpaper, another step up to the dark room with the shrouded furniture and there, before me, was pure felicity Willard eating fried green peppers-at the kitchen table.

As if addressing an apparition, he sprang up and asked, “How did you get here?”

“On wings, my dear, wings of joy. A miracle happened in the days I was away. Homewood is suddenly HOME!”

My delight swept Willard, too. Our restored wings lifted us into a state of elation that we had known on so many occasions on our enchanted Emerald Hill farm. That state of elation was the joyous blending of souls; it was like a honeymoon.

“But where did you get all those green peppers?” I wanted to know. “About midnight,” Willard explained, “the grocer at the corner sold me a hamper full of them for twenty-five cents.” {{p259}}

“We’ll use them for barter,” I gloated, “with Bessie and Mrs. Mills.”

“...the matter of setting ablaze the cold and veiled souls...” I had heard words like that before and now they were saying themselves to me as I walked over to Mrs. Norman W. Storer’s on Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom business. But when her big grey house loomed in front of me, my heart was in my mouth. This lady, with sharp steel-grey eyes and iron-grey hair cut short and strait, was my griffin. I prayed, “God, let the Holy Spirit work here. Let me stand out of the way!”

I pressed the button and heard the chime of bells inside. “Mrs. Storer opened the door, “Oh, it’s you. I’ll run upstairs and get that list.” When she came downstairs it could be put off no longer. I kissed her, firmly and convincingly and by that kiss told her things that words would have bungled. It was a kiss that promised Universal Love. In her astonishment, my frozen lady thawed. She asked me in for lunch, then to say Bahá’í prayers. The next day she telephoned inviting me to come and get flowers for our Feast that night. I had told her that we were hosting it on a roof.

Garden of the Heart

It was a garden of the heart on which Mrs. Storer had lavished her loving care. While she had the assistance of a landscape gardener, only the commingling of her expertise and devotion could have coaxed a city garden plot into an effective illusion of leisured space. It was a rock garden whose foundation was a few boulders from Pennsylvania’s Allegheny mountains. A spiral flagstone path led towards the top of a dramatic little man-made hill. Spaces were landscaped there for flats of growing plants, vines, flowering bushes, and {{p260}} massed groupings of flowers. After soot-stained Homewood, I thought I must have died and gone to heaven.

She opened the screen doors to her plant rooms in the cool basement of the house. The rooms were furnished like a summer cottage but with the addition of tubs and sinks, filing cabinets, and storage racks for the garden tools. Working in what I thought to be a chilly silence, she trimmed the armful of flowers she had picked and made them into a great bouquet for our meeting. Delphinium and day lilies, late Darwin tulips, and sprays of bridal wreath. She put the flowers in water and said, “There!”

Muttering, I told her that the flowers were lovely. Suddenly she spoke, her words exploding away a barrier.

“No one has guessed how I long to have friends – to be with people. People stand away from me and I can’t go to them except through the work we do. I don’t know what it is like to be close to anyone, not even my husband and son.

There must be something left out of me or I'm inhibited. I'm really isolated and never happy except when I am with the flowers."

"Will it help you to know that there is one person who understands and would like to know you better? Besides, there are others: Alice Parker and Emily Craighead, and Mrs. Bishop Brown."

"Why, I know all of them. Are they Bahá'ís? Why are they different?"

"Because it is a religion of love, as was Christ's. You have heard the Bahá'í Principles. They offer Universal Love as the remedy for the ills of humanity. In one of our prayers we pray God to unite our hearts."

I think the thought struck us both that, someday, Ruth Storer would become a Bahá'í. {{p261}}

From My Notes:

"Mrs. Storer has invited me to come and live in her garden. She said we could come every day if we liked – Willard to play the grand piano; and I to read or write or to tend the flowers. I think Mrs. Storer is aware that the kiss was an offering to her of the Love of God. Between us there is a promise of an agreeable association. We could be a help to each other. Because I had prayed, I had been permitted to offer her a taste from the cup that is life indeed. The rational mind cannot explain the answers to our prayers. That we pray at all is a sign of His bounty."

The Feast of Rahmat – Mercy: June 24th

As a whole, our community never before had entered the environs of Homewood. Tonight was hot, in the nineties, and we were asking the members to climb yet another flight of stairs to the roof. There were no comments, only sighs as they laboured skyward. The Buchannans had come, a new Black couple (the Smiths), Bahíyyih Lindstrum and the Browns; Eve Kerin and Blackie (Braydon Black). After following Henry through the Seker's kitchen, they climbed a staircase at the right of our door.

Bessie and I were clad in our best and were standing to greet the Servants and Maidservants of the Merciful as, winded, they arrived on the roof. The taller men had to duck under the low doorway opening onto our makeshift terrace. There was a chorus of delighted exclamations as their eyes took in our collection of benches and chairs plumped up with sofa cushions, the green potted plants, the Bahá'í books (marked for reading) spread out on card tables under a strong overhead light, and, in the centre of all, the umbrella stand {{p262}} holding Mrs. Storer's flowers. "We call it Paradise Penthouse," I told them.

"This has got to be magic," declared Walter.

"Or the entrance to the Kingdom of the Spirit." It was Bahíyyih's voice.

"How easy it is to get away from it all," said Eve. "Just climb up higher."

Now, with Feastly decorum, Bessie was calling us to order. “Welcome to the Feast of Mercy,” she said. “Henry will read the opening prayer.”

When the readings were finished, I begged Henry, “Oh, please put the light out so that we can see how AWAY from it all we really are.”

He touched the light button and, quiet under the stars, we sat there, the street sounds muted and the air cool and pure. We said a round of Healing prayers and the prayer for the Remover of Difficulties. Willard said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s {Tablet of Visitation}.

The lights were on and now, knowing ourselves released, we clumped joyfully downstairs for cookies and a cold drink at the Sekers’.

An Assembly Problem

A loose-flung community of three million people like Pittsburgh and its environs had a point of oneness – an insistent commonality. And that was the unrelenting predicament of the Depression. All of us were awake to instability and discomfort. It was not a local affliction but, rather, a creeping fungus that quickly had spread over the world. The Guardian had warned of the disappearance of the “islands of safety”. It was apparent that minds which had once seemed balanced and secure, were reeling. Thank God that Willard and I had come out from our year of Tilbury Tenement tests {{p263}} stronger and more seasoned. (I do not mean that the “maturity” I had once prayed for had been attained. Rather I was less hysterical than I had been last year!) We continued to be tested.

“Blackie” had come to the Local Assembly to say that he had no money except what he borrowed sometimes from other Bahá’ís. “Is there any Bahá’í agency to help me?” he asked. We wrote to the National Spiritual Assembly and were told ,that there was no fund as yet and that regrettably, needy Bahá’ís should apply for public funds. Two of our members later went with Blackie for an interview with the Welfare.

The harassed worker, wanting to put our problem in its proper perspective, pointed out that others were trying to cope with starvation.

“Where do they live?”

“On a farm near Grove City, but I haven’t seen them for years.”

“Well, we will contact them,” said the social worker.

“But isn’t there some other way? My family has always considered me a career man.”

“Embarrassing,” agreed the weary-looking worker, “but there is no other way. Please don’t think of your case as unique. It happens every day.”

His niece answered the letter and expressed delight and anticipation about having Uncle Braydon come to live with them. Just say the word, she wrote, and they would drive in for him and his things and bring him home.

The Assembly moved that Mr. Black accept the invitation and decided, also, to write to the relatives, thanking them. The National Assembly would also be informed. {{p264}}

At home I said to Bessie, “Doesn’t it seem as if an individual were being parcelled out?”

A few days later, after a Wednesday-night Study Class, we gathered around Blackie. “When things get better we’ll see you back again. You have earned this rest with your young relatives.” We shook hands with him and Eve Kerin put her arm around his thin shoulders. He was dressed in his respectable grey suit.

Ascension of the Greatest Holy Leaf

On July 15th, 1932, the cables from the Guardian had encircled the world like a despairing cry:

“Greatest Holy Leafs immortal spirit winged its flight Great Beyond. Countless lovers her saintly life in East and West seized with pangs of anguish, plunged in unutterable sorrow. Humanity shall ere long recognize its irreparable loss... I, for my part bewail sudden removal of my sole earthly sustainer, the joy and solace of my life...”[^]

Shoghi Effendi sent to the National Spiritual Assembly, his tribute to the Greatest Holy Leaf and, two days later, the Sekers and the McKays, together with their fellow Bahá’ís were climbing again the stairs to the meeting place on the roof.

As Ruth Brown read aloud the Guardian’s words of passionate grief some of us found his sorrow more overwhelming than the departure of Bahíyyih Khánúm from this world. How to understand and feel deeply enough! {{p265}}

His message said in part:

“The Community of the Most Great Name, in its entirety and to its very core, feels the sting of this cruel loss. Inevitable though this calamitous event appears to us all, however acute our apprehensions of its steady approach, the consciousness of its final consummation at this terrible hour leave us, we whose souls have been impregnated by the energizing influence of her love, prostrated and disconsolate...”[^]

Hundreds of words testified to the exalted station conferred on her by Bahá’u’lláh. In the conclusion of his message, Shoghi Effendi called to her,

“Dearly beloved Greatest Holy Leaf! Through the mist of tears that fill my eyes I can clearly see, as I pen these lines, thy noble figure before me, and can recognize the serenity of thy kindly face. I can still gaze, though the shadows of the grave separate us, into thy blue, love-deep eyes and can feel in its calm intensity, the immense love thou didst bear for the Cause of thy Almighty Father... The memory of the ineffable beauty of thy smile shall ever continue to cheer and hearten me in the thorny path I am destined to pursue... The sweet magic of thy voice shall remind me, when the hour of adversity is at its darkest, to hold fast to the rope thou didst seize so firmly all the days of thy life.”[^]

How the Guardian’s bereavement, which he had started to share with us, put its test on the depth and sincerity of our own hearts! We had been so detached, so cool, so Western! We defended our poverty of spirit by saying, “But, we had not known her.”

We appealed to Ruth and Bahíyyih Lindstrom, “You knew her. What did she mean to you?” {{p266}}

Ruth spoke thoughtfully, “I think she was most loved because of her understanding and sympathy for everyone; she had the true ‘sin covering eye’. Dear Khánúm. She read in us the person we might have been and still could be.”

“First, in my private thoughts,” Bahíyyih continued, “she was Bahá’u’lláh’s daughter, born to an exalted station. He was the ‘Tree of Life’, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, its ‘Branch’, and Bahíyyih Khánúm, its ‘Most Exalted Leaf.’ In them the bounties of the All-Glorious overflowed. Now all are gone from this mortal world. That book is closed.”

Eve Kerin, her eyes smouldering in her white face, stirring restlessly as if disturbing thoughts were racing through her mind. She now exploded in a rough and too-loud voice,

“Do you think things can now be worse than they were?”

Bishop answered, “They may be. We don’t know. The Guardian seems to imply that with the ascension of the Greatest Holy Leaf we have stepped into a new stage in the evolving history of our Faith. It is like the cycle of the seasons. The spiritual springtime has passed. Next comes the season we call the Formative Period, a season of our maturing relationship with the Cause. The Guardian has called Bahíyyih Khánum ‘the well-loved and treasured Remnant of Bahá’u’lláh.’ Of His family she alone, over the years, had remained with us on our earthly plane. As His adored daughter, she had known Bahá’u’lláh’s love. She had suffered with her family, had endured, had worked at every task and had remained selfless and tranquil. She had loved and served. She was the centre of God’s bounty here among us. His Presence was here with Bahíyyih Khánum – one of the Mysteries.”

“So, she is lost to us.” said Eve, despairingly.

“No, indeed, Eve. Now we must turn our thoughts to her, and implore her intercession for our prayers.”

I unfolded a brown silk handkerchief, a gift from the Greatest Holy Leaf to May Maxwell. In 1930 May had given {{p267}} it to us that we might, in our hoped-for time of growth in the Cause, have contact with the sacred atoms in its folds. The handkerchief had a Persian design in black on tones of brown and there was a brown silk fringe. As Bessie took it and passed it around each one said the Greatest Name and recited a short prayer. It was a spontaneous response.

Ruth told us, “There were few servants in ‘Akká or Bahjí. Khánum often cooked for the household and did the washing. Some American Bahá’ís, after their pilgrimage, gave her a washing machine. I have heard that she gave it away.”

Photographs of her had been brought by the friends and were placed on a little table with Henry’s spotlight shining on them against the darkness of the late evening sky. A favourite picture of her in which she had posed against a photographer’s tasteful background, had been taken about 1895 when she was still youthful in appearance. The pose is regal, her features classically beautiful. The gaze of her eyes is far away. Her dress, worn with an embroidered jacket, was of flowered material with a draped skirt and worn with a little train. Her hands hung relaxed at her sides and, to my eyes, seemed to have a lyrical beauty like the angel hands modeled by Michelangelo.

Willard spoke, his voice husky with feeling, “We had a book for a time, an English publication called {Unity Triumphant}. There was a story in it about Bahá’u’lláh’s buying flowered material to make pretty gowns for His daughter and His granddaughters as well as for Munírih Khánum (wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá). He might have selected the material for the pink-flowered Robe of Bounty. It had panels of pink-flowered design like the one the Greatest Holy Leaf is wearing in the picture.”

“Not all of you have heard about the Robe of Bounty,” he went on. “It is now May Maxwell’s, but once it was worn by the Greatest Holy Leaf. We have told you before that, on the {{p268}} last night of our visit in Montreal, May arranged for us to sleep in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s bed. She came in for a final prayer and spread the Robe of Bounty over the bed and left it with us all night.”

“At a teaching committee meeting in New York,” I concluded, “prayers for guidance were said on the Robe. May sent it to us in Geneva, where we had the privilege of keeping it for a few weeks.”

We said the {Tablet of Visitation} and other prayers. Tonight we had felt the presence of the Greatest Holy Leaf and had drawn closer. In hushed silence we reflected. Then Henry spoke for us all,

“When we went up there tonight, I knowed we’d find Her!”

After we descended Eve noted, “It disturbs me that Mr. Black was not with us tonight. I, for one, miss him.” “He will be so much better in Grove City with his family, away from all his worries.”

But I was troubled too. Justice is the responsibility of the Assembly, I remembered. But the requirement of the individual believer is to show love to the people. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is our example. Had we done enough?

The story is, as I heard it later, that Marion Little saw in a dream, the entrance of the Greatest Holy Leaf into the Abhá Kingdom. Those whom Bahá’u’lláh calls the inhabitants of the cities of immortality were arrayed on each side of a shining aisle up which the ephemeral white-clad figure of Bahíyyih Khánúm made its ascent in the direction of the Glory of God. The next day Marion was informed of the passing of the Greatest Holy Leaf at the very hour of the dream. {{p269}}

I Meet the Dawn-Breakers

We were having dinner at the Browns’ on the eve of July 26th when Bishop, contributing to the table conversation, mentioned that he had received a surprise request to conduct a class on {The Dawn-Breakers} at the Flint (Louhelen) Summer School.

“The committee,” he said, “feels that the Guardian will be pleased if the study of the book can be started so soon after its publication. I agree. It is a wonderful idea, especially since the Bahá’ís are eager to get their hands on it. But why has this happened to me? The class starts in less than two weeks.”

“Have you any plans?”

“Yes, Bahíyyih has agreed to make a set of question-and answer quizzes on the principal figures. The information will be in the selected readings and in my talks.”

Willard asked, “How many pages are in the book?”

“Six hundred of {Nabíl’s Narrative} besides the introductions, notes and epilog.”

It seemed to me that the atmosphere around our pleasant supper table became suddenly electric. It was so still, and yet, so DYNAMIC. Could Bishop, Ruth, and Bahíyyih all be holding their breaths? Why were they all looking at me?

Bishop broke the silence. “Doris, we are asking you to write a synopsis of {The Dawn-Breakers} for me to introduce at Louhelen. You will have until August 5th.”

“I too will be working hard on my outline lessons,” defended Bahíyyih. “And Bishop will be organizing his course. We will all three meet and plan together quite often.”

I did not pretend that I needed to be urged. I was ready to fall into their arms because of my hunger for the book. When we went home that night, tucked under my arm was Bishop’s number two copy of {The Dawn-Breakers}, a copy that is still with me today. {{p270}}

Dark Entrance into a Different World

Morning. I awoke with my spirit bound by the fetters of sleep. I was alone. The subconscious again, call it what you will, had concocted temporarily, a potent brew of incoherence that left me frightened and depressed. I had forgotten about last night. My notes recall:

“I looked up at the tiny skylight to find out about the day to come. I thought, ‘the rain is not only streaming; it is STEAMING. That man we found yesterday slouched in a chair at our wallpaper store apartment looked like a rate-collector in the London slums back in the time of Charles Dickens. He was stamped by his job, bulbous and unkempt. He asked us our names: ‘Mr. and Mrs. Willard McKay.’ How I hated the sound of our names then! He handed us an envelope.

Read this,” he commanded. It was a paper stating that the part of our property called the Baker Farm, noted for its fruit growing acreage, had been seized by the bank.

“Sign here.” he said. We knew that the next time he came, Emerald Hill would be gone in the same way:

Still, we could joke a little because this must be happening to someone else. At the McKay farm the pickers would be stripping the last of the Montmorency crop of pie cherries from acres and acres of trees. I would soon write:

“It seems weeks since Willard has taken in any real cash. My ring is pawned again. We are adapting ourselves to two meals a day. We are becoming better and better hikers; it is the car fare that kills. But my shoes...

“Willard is out early up at the stores. He is trying to rent parking lots to people who have lost their cars!” {{p271}}

I shook off the fetters of sleep and could now see the green and gold cover of {The Dawn-Breakers} waiting on the red chest. The bookcovers were the gates to the world that lay inside. For ten days that world would be my world, my reality, too, my human thoughts discarded like the faded wallpaper in the abandoned shop.

I ignored the “Big Chairs”, and soon moved into their den with my little Corona and a card-table, and put on the bright overhead light. I set up page one on Bishop’s writing paper and divided the page in half with a line running from top to bottom. On the left side I listed names, dates, places and, on the right, the outline of the main events of the story.

Like other readers first approaching {The Dawn-Breakers}, I had to find my way through what seemed to be a forest of unpronounceable names. ‘This difficulty was eased when I found that each name included the person’s title and geographical origin. On the first page I met Shaykh (teacher) Aḥmad of Asa’i (from Asa, an island on the south side of the Persian Gulf). In Chapter 2, I met Siyyid (descendant of the Prophet) Kasim i-Rashtí (from the city of Rasht). Now that I knew and understood their titles, names and birthplaces as well as their surnames, they took shape as persons with real identities. I could even try to pronounce the names using the table on page 673. I could use their names and call upon them for inspiration.

My prayers for assistance were answered, and I found myself reading and taking notes with an unusual fixed concentration. At 4:30 p.m. the telephone rang. I jumped with a startle. It was Bishop asking how I was getting on with my work. I told him, “I am getting into it.” “Getting into it” meant that suddenly I thought I knew what this book was about. For my own pleasure I scribbled from time to time in the margin of my notes. In one scribbling, I noted: {{p272}}

“This is God’s book. It records the stages by which He manifests through the Holy Spirit. From the beginning His Plan has never changed. This is the NOW stage of His Plan.

“It was time for the Rose to unfurl its petals again. And this time there were two Buds, not one. Two manifestations, the Báb and Bahá’u’lláh.”

I read on, through the week, about ten hours a day. Sometimes at night Bishop and Bahíyyih joined me and we checked over our notes. There seemed to be a spell on all three of us. We were spared from wasting time on needless errors. Our Study Class continued to meet on Wednesday nights at Alice Parker’s and we went there together, prepared to answer questions. In the minds of our friends there was a scent of the mysterious.

Walter – Buchanan felt it and brought it out, “I seem to sense something out of this world.”

Bishop responded, “It’s probably this Dawn-Breaker work of ours. Doris, Bahíyyih, and I have been living in another world with it and it is a mysterious other world.”

“Who indeed, could interpret the book as anything other than the mysterious? Even from page one of his Narrative, Nabíl records a book-long series of events best described as supernatural. Why? Because they all gave evidence of the operation of a Divine Will within the realm of men’s minds. Not in miracles for all to see, but in the consciousness of His forerunners and His Chosen Ones –

those who were to people the stage on which this greatest of dramas was to be performed. How shall I say this? There seemed to be a continuity of awareness that swept through their thoughts, namely that this is the day of the coming of the Promised One.”

“These were incendiary thoughts,” Bishop’s quiet voice continued. “To have divulged this knowledge prematurely {{p273}} would have had the destructive effect of touching a lighted match to a piece of paper or, in this case, a sacred scroll. The pre-dawn period of the ‘two wisemen’, Shaykh Aḥmad and later Siyyid Kázim, would last 40 years.”

“It seemed like a time,” commented Willard, “for the protection and nurturing of the young Faith. When did events begin to happen that led to the disclosure of this knowledge to the outer world?”

“The synopsis we are working on deals with dates and events of an outer, physical, world termed ‘historic’. But the Divine Will operates first in the consciousness of men. It’s a different category – a history of a God-infused inner world.”

“Yes, that’s it, you see,” I added. “When Shaykh Aḥmad began to fulfil his ordained role, Bahá’u’lláh was not yet in this world. He wasn’t even physically conceived at that time. But something, someone, was directing the operation of the Divine Will within the consciousness of his Forerunners. So who can say when it really began to unfold? Perhaps this is another mystery enshrined in the meaning of an eternal story.

For days {The Dawn-Breakers} became my world and, the people in it, the realities with whom I conversed. I sat, clad lightly in the humid little room with the light on overhead which seemed to disdain the perpetual sunlight outside. Sometimes in the middle of the afternoon I would leave my work and stagger to the bedroom, fall on the bed, and sleep for half an hour.

A week later I found myself back at the Wednesday-night Study Class. I felt that I had become “older” in the Faith (I was going to say “centuries older”), not in age but in insight. Working for 10 hours a day with attention fixed on the Chosen Ones of the Heroic Age was to be in their company. Forgetful of self, for a time I breathed the freedom of unhampered mind. It was a release like entering an empty room – empty except for a plentitude of sunlight and fresh {{p274}} air – after having been confined to one which is dark and crowded with the soiled relics of the past. In that freedom you breath the qualities of the Chosen Ones who speak not, save by His permission.

The following Wednesday we were again at Alice Parker’s for the Study Class. “In {Dawn-Breakers},” I told the class, “Divine intervention becomes the proof to the doubters of the existence of God.” Some of the faces stared blankly at me. I detected in others a yearning or even a hope. A few of the seekers that we met at the Utility Hall meetings were there. The faces of Eve and Emily were smiling, encouraging me to go on. I asked if I might read them a few of my notes. (I did have, at least, the foresight to bring the notes with me!) At

“Last week Bishop spoke of {The Dawn-Breakers} as a book of mystery. Bahá'u'lláh tells us ‘There is a power in this Cause – a mysterious power – far, far, far away from the ken of men and angels...’”[^] I began to read from my

“Because of the presence of that power in the unfolding of every event, in the decisions of every person, this marvellous story, like that told in the New Testament, describes how a supernatural knowledge of the presence of One Powerful and Great was infused into the minds of the forerunners Shaykh Aḥmad and, later, into the soul of his youthful disciple Siyyid Kazím. A few chapters later we learn how a similar miracle illumined the minds of the Letters of the Living – eighteen minds which independently of one another, became infused with that knowledge. Within God’s creation of man are hidden capacities including the capacity to know. There is another source of knowledge besides education. There is Divine guidance. {p275}

“Little by little I feel it more. There is a Being out there, an Essence elusive because of the limits of our rational minds , an Essence Who sent word to us that He created us to know Him and to adore Him. He is a Spirit, a Guide with angelic helpers. He is the eternal Manifestation of God, the Ancient of Days, the I AM that existed before Abraham, the Father to whom Jesus spoke, the Nightingale of Paradise in Bahá'u'lláh’s {Tablet of Aḥmad}. He is the Author of {The Hidden Words}. He spoke with the Voice of all the prophets but only the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh wrote down the Words.

“And from their Writings we glimpse another mystery, the relationship between the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh. Never before were there two Divine youth growing up at the same time and in the same country. Both came from families of respect and wealth. Both had innate knowledge. Both were adored by the people. Both were idyllically happy in marriage. And to both came visions and intimations of Their Supreme Station. Although they never met on this earthly plane, we learn from {The Dawn-Breakers} of Their love for each other and we are told of the letters they exchanged.[^] Both spoke the Word of God. Their voices are ONE voice, the voice of God itself. The day of {The Dawn-Breakers} was the appointed time for God’s call to be universally sounded. It was the time for the revelation, the inauguration of His Plan. And as Christ knew that He would be crucified, the Báb knew that he would give up His life for Bahá'u'lláh, ‘The One Whom God shall make Manifest.’”

[^] [The metaphor is given that, if the oceans were turned into ink and the branches of the trees into pens, love could not be sufficiently expressed. To me the early Writings of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb, in choice of word, in style of rhythmic prose and, especially, in the power to quicken the heart, demonstrate the product of a single mind – that single Voice.]

I selected one more scribbling to read,

“Like perfume, a knowledge drifts to us of a Divine Presence and a warmth touches our hearts.” {{p276}}

On the morning of the tenth day, the telephone rang. It was Ruth Brown. I was able to say, “It’s all over, Ruth. I am checking the last details.”

She responded, “Something else is over, Doris. I’m calling to tell you that Blackie’s body was taken out of the river early this morning. They found our address in his pocket and a letter from his niece in Grove City. She had written, ‘Where are you, Uncle Braydon? We are waiting to hear from you. When do you want us to drive over to get you and your things? We are happily looking forward to your arrival.’ That was all – our address, the letter, a quarter, a dime, and a five-cent piece.”

Eve Kerin, who had not wept for Charlie, was inconsolable.

“He would sit for hours in the Fort Pitt Hotel,” she told us. “He would read his newspaper and watch the people. I would sit with him for awhile. We had a strange relationship; understood each other. I guess we were meant to be a couple of outsiders. After Charlie died I didn’t feel sociable. I would just wave and pass on by.”

“Come back. Come back and let us be kind,” I quoted. “We all feel we have failed, as Bahá’ís, I mean.”

“No. It was a kindness to leave him to his private life. He chose that when he left his boyhood home in Grove City. To have people know that he was broke crushed him. We’re not all alike, you know.”

“In one way we are all alike,” I murmured. “We are all too proud.”

With Blackie To Grove City

We were in the Sekers’ car, driving behind Mr. Payne’s hearse. Leila, with her husband, was sitting in front of the hearse. The slow-paced ride, after two turbulent days, was a balm to our spirits. Our untired gaze took in the wide valleys {{p277}} and encircling foothills. Streams sparkled down the sides of the hills and cut rivulets through fields of market vegetables; corn, beets, yellow beans and acres of harsh, bright-green, turnip leaves.

When we arrived in Grove City, the minister and a family of three (the two nephews and the niece) were waiting for us in the churchyard. The nephews helped Mr. Payne with the coffin, and the minister beamed benevolently to the young relatives, “Your uncle has come home at last.” We thanked Mr. Payne and said “goodbye” to him, while Leila joined us to go to the farmhouse where we were invited to dinner. The eldest nephew gave him some bills in an envelope.

The Blacks’ dinner table was usually a round one. Now the leaves had extended it and soon there was a feast spread out for us. Chicken with .gravy and dumplings, an array of vegetables, pickles, jellies, and a mountain of homemade ice cream. “Perfectly delicious,” said Willard after a few moments of joyful assimilation, “and I think it was all raised on your farm.”

Soon we were all sharing one of those rare incredible moments of release from tension when spirits rise up over tragedy. At the table, the whole group reached an oasis in a desert of despair. That group even seemed now, to include Braydon. His Pittsburgh Bahá’í friends had never really known him before.

“Would you like to see some early pictures of Uncle?”

“Yes, we would.” And we saw him—from childhood into his youth. We saw his stern father and his comforting looking mother.

“We all looked up to Uncle,” one of the nephews said. “We looked to him as somebody who had made a success in the city – carved a life out for himself.”

“Yes, he called himself a career man when he was talking to the Welfare worker.”
{{p278}}

When it was time to return to the cemetery, we went. We went as the family of Braydon Black. The townspeople were already there. The minister and I gave a short talk on “The World To Come”. Leila Payne’s high-voiced invocation opened eyes and turned faces. There were men of seventy who had gone to school with Braydon. One said, “It’s religion, whatever they are calling it.”

The trip home was the morning’s landscape in reverse. The sunlight, rather than raining down from overhead, slanted from the West and gave a richness to every colour. It was as though we were moving through a book of paintings by Constable. Bessie and Henry were quiet, a little drowsy. We held on to our dream mood while praying, thinking of Blackie. “O Lord, perpetuate his existence in Thine exalted rose garden, that he may plunge into the sea of light in the world of mysteries...”

Overlapping Worlds

Back in Homewood again, Willard and I mused on the psychological mileage between the different worlds of Pittsburgh and Grove City.

“A world is more than an environment,” we agreed. “It can be also a state of heart, a condition of mind.” True to our covenant of the Burning Log made with Lorna, we had been paying deeper attention to other people and less to ourselves. We had been praying to convey to others even the faintest scent of Universal Love, offering our own hearts as channels for the Ocean of God’s grace.

“The variety of souls we have thus beheld,” I exclaimed, “is a fabric of overlapping worlds.” Think of them: the world of the man stealing bread crusts from the pigeons; the world that Alice Doolittle found in Haifa; the cold grey castle of Mrs. Storer, warmed only by her garden; the desperate mental {{p279}} realms of the Jewish Peace ladies worried about relatives in Germany as news of Hitler's: atrocities spread; and, lastly, Blackie's world. His last act on the cool damp wharf near one of the bridges on the Allegheny River, the River a blaze of light; not quite enough money in his pocket to buy a bus ride home. These were the worlds that flowed back through the channels of God's grace. To see more, even if not to know more, draws us closer to people.

Little Girl Dead

One night, about ten o'clock, someone pounded on the shop door. It was George Washington, the Black welfare worker with whom Willard had volunteered work for four mornings a week and to whom he had talked about the Cause.

"I am asking you and your wife to come to our house and pray," he said.

"Anything wrong?" Willard asked.

"Linnie, my little girl – playing on the street after dark has got hit and killed. We need you to come and pray at our house. You told me you could pray. I have my car here."

Willard raced back to the room for the prayer book and we ran out and jumped into George's car. We sped through the streets to his house. A small crowd loitered at his apartment door and we pushed through. Upstairs a chubby eight-year-old dressed in white lay in a white coffin on an ironing board by the window. She had white flowers in her hair and her complexion was blue-tinged.

George was shaky. His wife's face was stony with pain. The neighbours lamented noisily. This world was broken. "I told her," the mother said, "not to go out but she just laughed and ran out, just ran out." The room was buzzing with flies. {{p280}}

George introduced us, "Meet Mr. McKay and his wife. They have come to pray for Linnie and to say a few words. Their hearts are with us."

We stood by the coffin and said Bahá'í prayers to guide the little newcomer to the "garden of happiness". We told the Washingtons that she would grow up in that world and become a beautiful maiden. And that, someday, they would find her and she would be their daughter forever. We then asked for a silent prayer so that our thoughts could rise and reach her and, for a moment, go with her There. Then there was no sound except the click of the mother's fan above the child's face.

At home Willard said, "George is like the students I met on the trip with Louis Gregory – graduate in Social Sciences from a Black university – Fiske, no doubt."

"Employed by the city at too low a wage to buy screens," I protested.

"Like the rest of us," Willard concluded sadly, "the city of Pittsburgh is bankrupt."

There was a world of high-pitched gaiety here too, especially among our Italian neighbours on Zenith Way. Their back wall spanned the left side of our “court”. A mother and her five children ate their meals outside on an open porch. It was sunless there, but they would turn on a lamp with a red shade. They had also put out a red tablecloth. Their radio was always playing catchy music from the local stations. Our gospel-warbling neighbour at the second-floor front criticized the family for having the radio. We could hear the children laughing or squabbling in Sicilian, the language of our cherry pickers at the Geneva farm. The smell of garlic from their stews wafted into the court. We loved all this. {{p281}}

Remover of Difficulties

I withdrew from the contemplation of our empty kitchen shelves to admit our young friend, Lois. Our connection with her had begun in Geneva when, in 1928, the Obers had brought her to our Blossom Picnic. Lois Halderman was not a Bahá'í, although she would listen to us talk. Others had found her very reserved and hard to know, but, with us, Lois wasn't shy. Actually, I think her talking to us may have saved her sanity. She was one of three sisters in a once-comfortable family. Emma was the eldest and, until recently, a student at the University. Lois and Ellie were teenaged, but it was Emma and Ellie who had suffered mental breakdowns from the strain of having lost faith in the future. At first they had been angry, then confused. Now, they were mentally sick.

“The doctor has diagnosed Ellie's case as schizophrenia,” Lois explained. “But she has something to love, which saves her, and that's her canary.” Lois looked uneasy. p>

“I can't go back to that dinner table tonight. I really can't. Oh, please let me come here!”

I sat down with her and asked her to explain, “What has happened, Lois?”

As though speaking through wooden lips she tonelessly explained, “Ellie reached into the cage today and killed her bird. She said she could not bear its singing.

“Well, as for coming here, Lois dear, what shall we eat?”

“I can give you twenty-five cents a meal if you will take me to board.”

“Twenty-five cents is an absolute fortune,” I exulted. “We can all three live sumptuously on that. Praise be to God!”

How was this to be done? Ground beef, which must be bought carefully, was 10 cents a pound. Root vegetables were sold cheaply or even given away on the Saturday-night clearing of the stores. Day-old bread, current buns or cake {{p282}} were available four blocks away on the corner of Penn Avenue and often, there was often a glut of fruit in the stores. Our food could be prepared in different ways: cooked, served raw, made into soups. I praised the year at Tilbury Tenement when I learned these ways with food.

Although Lois was not shy with us we began to understand how some people had found her difficult to know. There was a depth lacking. During one of our dinners she told us.

“There is so much warmth here between you that you must think I am frozen, and I am. It’s like water in a flowerpot that freezes when its left out all winter. The frost can break the pot. In this case it’s my heart.”

We sat nearer to her, looking expectant but saying little.

“Six years ago, when I was twenty-five, I met and became engaged to my ideal man. As the wedding date approached he fell in love with someone else and married her instead. My problem is that I can’t stop loving him. When I accidentally meet him on the street, I want to die. I’m not interested in other men. What is the matter with me?”

“Sounds as if you have a fixation,” Willard offered. “You need a healing.” We concluded the conversation by challenging Lois to say the Báb’s prayer for the Remover of Difficulties nineteen times for nineteen days, starting that night. Using the powerful bounty-imbued Words, we would pray for the healing of her ills and that she would “find someone else”. Although not sharing our assurance, Lois agreed reluctantly to say the prayers with us.

Two weeks later Lois began the dinner conversation, “I don’t think I ever told you about Marty. No? Three years ago, before the Depression, I took a trip to Buffalo and Niagara Falls by myself. I met Marty on the bus. We talked, had dinner together, and went to look at the Falls. When we separated we exchanged addresses but never used them; that `{{p283}}` is, until today. He wants to come to Pittsburgh and to visit me! Says he has some business here.”

“What will you tell him?” I asked.

“Well, I shall be honest about the girls and that I never have company.”

Marty wrote back to tell Lois that he was coming anyway. He showed up on the Haldermans’ doorstep and was popular with the family. Early in his visit they came to see us. Marty’s grandfather had emigrated from Norway and his family resided now in western Canada. Marty was honourable, secure and kind. He asked Lois to go to Canada to visit him and to meet his mother. Lois went and did not return. During that visit she married him.

Willard and I believe that the answering of those prayers was a miracle. But Bahá’u’lláh has not chosen to teach by miracles. Lois did not, to our knowledge, ever become a Bahá’í.

What do we do when our teaching efforts have not been rewarded? We pray for them and leave them to God.

Prisons of Self

One August night we sat sipping iced tea with Alice, the Browns, and Emily Craighead. Most of our “seekers after truth” had left at the conclusion of yet another Study Class.

Said Alice, “At this time of night you can see the ruffles on my curtains begin to move. It is a sign that a breeze is coming down from the atmosphere above the hills that hover about us on a hot night. Is it fanciful for me to say that the Holy Spirit blew upon this meeting, lifting, just a little, the stuffiness in the ‘prisons of self where some of those friends are languishing?’” {{p284}}

“Prisons of self!” cried Emily. “I felt like reading this to them.” She opened to a marked passage in her {Wisdom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá}.

[^] [36. {Wisdom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá}, p. 185.]

“Why,” wailed Emily, “do these beautiful people invite us to take part in their meetings and why do they come regularly to ours while, in a single breath, they talk about mind over matter, reincarnation, New Thought, the supernatural, and, yet, they will not even challenge the Message of Bahá’u’lláh? If they will not listen, why do they come?”

I suggested, “Is it because they sense that, despite the world’s confusion, we have found peace within? Our small and sometimes down-at-the-heel group of assorted people appears young at heart and one in spirit. For them, that is unusual. Our friends hide the fact that they are assailed by a thousand fears; their secret spectre is that the mind-over-matter schools of thought will not grant them immunity in this time of crisis.”

“And we,” observed Willard, “are the bearers of glad tidings, ‘did they but know.’ Take heart,” he told us. “Occasionally someone listens!”

And then there was Dr. Bryson. We had come to rely upon his continued presence as a seal of “respectability” to our meetings. He was a distinguished figure, elderly and dignified, clad with conservative elegance and an aura of being in charge. He was a retired doctor (nose & throat) and a prestigious leader of a popular New Thought group. Someone commented on Dr. Bryson’s appearance of peace within. “It seems that he has confidence in an unseen power.” {{p285}}

“Yes, but what power? Where is the center to which he turns?” questioned Emily.

“Couldn’t his composure be the result of a disciplined will power; disciplined, that is, in accordance with the precepts of New Thought.”

“Very Good!” replied Bishop, “But those precepts are not endorsed by the Word of the Founders of the world’s religions which yield the human will to the Will of God. That’s a different form of discipline. What we have is a discipline of detachment and renunciation. What we have is a Faith, not a cult of the mind.”

It was to be expected that Dr. Bryson and the people who came with him to our meetings should show signs of unrest when we referred to the Manifestation. Our study outline as prepared by the Teaching Committee dealt mostly with the history and the principles of the Faith but, throughout, the station of Bahá'u'lláh proclaimed itself.

One evening as Dr. Bryson rose to leave, Dr. Mary Coffin, one of Pittsburgh's Scottish-Presbyterians and soon to become a Bahá'í, had to ask him.

"Who was Christ?"

"Jesus," replied our doctor friend, "was a man to be respected and his example followed. But given more knowledge and a strong enough incentive, we could all be Christs. The soul of man is divine."

A few days later Ruth Brown telephoned to inform me that Dr. Bryson was very ill and in hospital. He had fallen in his apartment, evidently striking his head on the cast-iron radiator, and all night, had lain unconscious on the floor.

I went to see him. The nurse at the desk said to me, "You may see him but he many not be conscious. He keeps drifting in and out." {{p286}}

I went in and stood by his bed. He was conscious, recognized me, and spoke: "Last night I thought I was going to step out, but I am still here."

His eyelids were beginning to droop.

"Dr. Bryson, I did not come to talk, but just to sit with you a little and to say some prayers."

"Thank you," he whispered. He was gone again into that opaque enveloping fog we call coma. And yet, I am told there is an extraordinary awareness of the soul at such moments.

I sat in a chair by the window and said the Greatest Name and the Healing Prayer, not so much for the man's body as for his soul. Then I rose quietly to slip away.

But no. He was beckoning to me, his eyes raised above the level of the pillow. He motioned for me to bring my ear closer to his lips and he whispered, "You have met the Manifestation."

Could this be a declaration of belief? I had to be sure and asked him to repeat. Again he said, "You have met the Manifestation."

"Do you mean Bahá'u'lláh?"

"Yes."

I took his hand, spectral and old, in my warm one. There was a weak pressure of his fingers and he was gone again into the calm of the spirit.

When I walked out again into the street I was walking "above the world by the power of the Most Great Name". There is no rapture to compare with even a momentary contact with the Abhá Kingdom. In a state of euphoria I called all the Bahá'ís to tell them that a miracle had happened to the doctor's soul.

In a few days I heard that he was better and that his daughter had come to take him home with her to California. He had forgotten his Moment of Eternity at the hospital. He {{p287}} had denied his acceptance of the station of Bahá'u'lláh. We never saw or heard again from Dr. Bryson.

"Be happy," said Willard. "In his heart he was accepted. Later, when he goes, he will leave his veils behind."

A Lesson for Bessie

I sat in the Sekers' kitchen that special morning, watching Bessie slice beef to make sandwiches for our community picnic. We were discussing the other Bahá'ís. I watched her affectionately. How vital she was! How deft with her hands. And how aggressive was her whole person – but likeable, even if sometimes so pugnacious and loud. Bessie's heart, I thought, is another magnetized particle drawn by the power of love into the Unity of a Bahá'í group. We were diversified and yet we were one. If we were not tested so much by one another's egos, we could belong to the New Creation promised by Bahá'u'lláh.

But unfortunately, Bessie was letting off steam at the moment by scolding Bishop, whom actually she admired and adored.

"He's too NICE, I can't bear him," she raged. "I know he laughs at me. He's amused because I shout when I talk and I bounce when I walk. I always have. Sometimes, though, he makes me feel like DIRT. He makes me so mad that sometimes I'd like to..." Bessie emphasized her remarks by waving threateningly, her long murderous-looking meat knife. It caught her left wrist and released an arc of bright arterial blood.

"Don't stand there with your mouth open," she yelled. "Get the first aid kit out of the bathroom. Help me bandage this wrist. Call emergency. Get Henry."

On the way to the hospital Bessie held up and looked at her poorly bandaged and reddening wrist. Then she began to {{p288}} laugh. "This will teach me not to backbite Bishop. So help me, Bahá'u'lláh, I won't do that again!"

The dressing at the hospital cost eight dollars. Bessie broke out laughing again on the way home. Henry and I were still too shaken to manage more than a weak smile.

Bessie thought of Bahá'u'lláh and His guidance. "He sure is prompt!" she noted.

Race Relatives

At supper time Willard and I were in agreement about dropping in at the Buchannans'. Since becoming a Bahá'í, Walter's lighthearted questions and comments had enlightened our meetings. I picture, in my memory, a small, slim, laughing man, his eyes brown, a well-chiselled aristocratic nose, features delicate and Nordic, all enclosed in a coffee-coloured skin. We loved Walter and savoured with true relish his charm.

Ida was twice his size and of a warmer, coffee, colour. Laughing, loving, and singing were in the depths of her personality. But Ida could be fierce and free, too; quick and fervent in her movements. Ida had a degree in music from Oberlin College, Ohio. Walter was a Princeton graduate. He was at Tuskegee Institute with Booker T. Washington and was later President of A & M College in Alabama. Now he had a little truck and was selling coal. "At least we keep warm, ." he laughed. And laughing delightedly, they opened their home to us.

Ida dramatized despair. "You know I have nothing but toast for our tea." She cut thick slices of homemade bread and we toasted them on forks over the coal embers in the fireplace. Spread with butter and honey, they were delicious. Ida served the tea in Limoge china cups with hand-wrought silver spoons. Tea at the Buchannans' was a ceremony from a culture born in the deep South.

We luxuriated in the knowledge of being "at home" with these friends. Rain streaked the windows but I was warm before the fire, a warmth that reminded me of the earthly well-being and peace of the Geneva farm when applewood crackled on its hearths. The coal fire at the Buchannans' was a basket of red embers, the black chunks of cannel coal making explosive noises as they expanded in the heat, kerosene igniting and flaring up in the cracks.

I, the homeless one, watched Ida. I thought, "This is Ida's house. It is her habitat. Here, graciousness and warmth exude from her personality." Her soul relaxed in this atmosphere and, for this reason, we were given a view of the emotional fire beneath the ash as she told us the story of her foray the night before.

"There was a Greta Garbo picture offered at the Homewood Theatre. I had to see it, but the man at the window said, 'Sorry, no seats.'

'But people are going in,' I said. 'Why not me?'

'No Coloured,' is what he said.

I threw my money on his counter and stalked in carrying myself like an African Queen. And I had a very good view of the picture. I had the whole row to myself."

She had to make us understand how smothered her spirit had been. Dressed in a silk tunic of a print resembling tiger skin, she sank to the floor at my feet and pounded on the arms of my chair where I had been sitting so Whitely and privileged. And as quickly as she had made this gesture, she was up on her feet in a wide, dancing, sweep of the room.

"I heard this the other day," she announced. "When de Lawd gave out hair, the Black folks hung back and de White ones got the best hair. Jes' a li'l wool left for us. So when de {{p290}} Lawd gave out feet, the Black folks was fust and we got the biggest.”

Walter commented, “She makes fun of us, but she wouldn’t let you do that. What would your brother say, Ida?”

“He would laugh too,” she said firmly. “My brother is a professor at the University of Cairo. Do you know, when he came to see us last summer, he stood on the doorstep and boomed, “Yá Bahá’u’Abhá.” Neither of us knew the other was a Bahá’í. I replied, “Alláh’u’Abhá.” What a meeting we had, how we hugged each other.

Willard asked for music and Ida went to the piano and began to play the spirituals we loved. We joined into the magic spell of her voice.

Later when we were sitting more quietly, I startled myself by asking her, “Do you resent Willard and me because we happen to be White?” It sounded so funny that we were all laughing, then standing together in a gigantic hug. Walter exclaimed, “We used to talk about race relations but we are race relatives.”

September 1932

I look back on the Homewood days as glorious. At the time, the amount of work allotted to me was so bewilderingly overwhelming that I was obliged to turn it over to the Holy Spirit. I was beginning my chairmanship of the Local Assembly. I had responsibility for managing the advertised meetings at Harmony Hall and for teaching the weekly study class at Alice Parker’s. I based the sessions on the 36 lessons which we had prepared for the National Teaching Committee. But this was not all. I have mentioned earlier the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom and Mrs. Norman Storer. To her I offered myself as a “worker” and {{p291}} was more and more drawn into the lives of the League’s members – American Jewish women, about 400 of them.

All at once I seemed to have been put at the forefront of activity, going about to church and school groups to talk about peace. I have never been sorry, for I learned more about my own capacities and realized what skills I could impart to them. I offered to do their publicity. I had newspaper experience from the work of the Faith and I knew the formalities. I could dispense with the preliminary stages of learning how to open the doors. With the League I met many important visitors from other countries who came to speak about peace. I attended many meetings and became even more at home in newspaper offices, offices in which Martha Root once had worked.

Back to Geneva

A brief recess came in the fall of ‘32 when Emily Craighead offered to drive me back to Geneva for the Labor Day weekend. Beloved Geneva. In my memory a peaceful college town, the fruit farm with its view of Seneca Lake framed by tall poplars and pines. That was the memory. We arrived late at night at the home of Rex and Mary Collison. The Collisons were born into the Faith with us, when Howard and Mabel Ives gave us the message seven years before in 1925.

I slipped out early the next morning to walk through the field which bordered our old Preemption Road, a border to our old life. Here were the mailbox and the little bridge over the stream where watercress was growing. There, the lane to the sweeping lawn of the house. The cherry crop still hung on the trees, a crop that had been sprayed against rot in anticipation of a June picking. The branches were loaded for a “bumper crop”. The cherries were now as large as plums, tasteless. No need for the harvest. The markets were closed. {{p292}}

Geneva, beloved Geneva. I found the farm in relative ruin. The ancient smoke house, which had been built in the 1700s had been torn down. The 25 foot dining room had been converted into a kitchen with a stove at one end. The back of the house had been torn off. Dido, my black cat was there, indifferent to my affections. Geneva. Emotion drained out of the dream. There was nothing left to hook on to... And it did not matter.

Winter came. In its “orchestra”, the violin strings of economic pressure were tightened to a higher note, to the pitch of a shriek.

There was a street near us called Nadir Alley. That would have been a good name for the whole city, the whole country, perhaps the whole world – a world at its nadir, its lowest point. Willard and I were so in the habit of determined optimism that we refused to face the reality of our financial situation. One afternoon I came home to find a familiar slouching figure in our apartment. He had come once before to take part of the farm. He returned now, with foreclosure papers, to take the rest. The bank had taken over the Baker Farm for unpaid taxes and mortgages. The dream of ever going back was over. This was the emotional finality.

We had still a few antiques stored in the old Guest House and now we were forced to sell some of them. Willard’s brother, Cecil, helped with their disposal. A little money came in from their sale. Willard’s grand piano earned $50. From time to time help came from Lorna, who was teaching high school in Beverly, Massachusetts. She originated the concept of “Bahá’u’lláh’s Money” which, in critical moments came down like manna in the form of $5.00 and $10.00 cheques. With this bounty and Willard’s sales of small gadgets, we were able to pay our utility bills and to buy groceries. Willard’s only outer reaction to the pinch was that he was unusually hilarious. I tried to match his mood. {{p293}}

One night we reached the bottom of the purse. It contained a latch key and a dime. We said many prayers that night for God to sustain us. But, God forgive me, I could not sleep.

It was an hysterical response to personify poverty as a beast stalking the streets. But sometimes one shivered. Mercifully our affairs did not challenge our faith. We felt safe. I said, “Just remember what the Guardian wrote in his letter to Bessie about our coming here. ‘They are well versed in the Faith and have the Bahá'í spirit, and that is all the capital a Bahá'í needs.’”

“Yes,” Willard agreed, “we have had many proofs of this and will, no doubt, have many more.”

I went on, “‘Help over which we have no control’ will sustain us... ‘Here it is in the prayer book, in the words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. ‘Prepare for us the means of livelihood; give us bread through channels over which we have no control – Thy heavenly treasures.’”[^]

[^] [From the old black prayer book: O God! O God! Cause us to drink from the cup of Thy bestowal. Illumine our faces with the light of guidance; make us firm in Thine ancient Covenant. Suffer us to become thy sincere servants. Open before our eyes the doors of prosperity, prepare for us the means of livelihood, give us bread through channels over which we have no control – Thy heavenly treasures! Grant us power to turn our faces towards Thy merciful countenance and to be faithful in Thy Cause. O Thou Clement and Compassionate One! Verily Thou art gracious to those who are firm and steadfast in Thy strong and impregnable Covenant. Praise be to God, the Lord of the worlds. – ‘Abdu’l-Bahá]

No, I could not sleep. As I lay there praying, almost supernaturally alert, I thought of Emily Craighead. Something was wrong. I nudged Willard, “Wake up and help me pray for Emily. She is in trouble,” I pleaded. After many more prayers, the need seemed to be over and we both slept.

The next morning the telephone rang. It was Dr. Mary Coffin, one of our near-Bahá'í contacts. She said, “I have been with Emily Craighead. She had a heart attack last night at three o'clock. She is safe now, I think, especially if she has rest in bed for two or three weeks. Emily wants you to come and stay with her while her sister is away during the mornings. She will give you your dinner, your car fare, and a dollar each day. Can you do this, Doris? Emily has faith that she will be healed.”

Of course I stayed with her. I remembered placing my hands on May Maxwell's heart, feeling it race and when I said the healing prayers and repeated the Greatest Name I felt it {{p294}} regain a more natural rhythm. I applied the same treatment to Emily and, in two weeks time, she was on her feet.

Spring of 1933

The bottom was dropping out of Pittsburgh and out of the substance of society itself where, in the United States, it was estimated that thirty million people were out of work. The money I had made was spent and, again, we were face to face with real want. Yet the Guardian had promised us that we would not be forsaken by our angels. We were well versed in the Faith and had the Bahá'í spirit. That was all the capital we needed. On March 12th I received a letter from my cousin Harry in Brooklyn. I had not had contact with him in years.

He said the thought had come into his mind that I might need help and he had enclosed a cheque for $5.00. Riches!

This was the day that Franklin Delano Roosevelt had announced the closure of the banks throughout the country. Eleven o'clock that morning was to be the deadline. Willard joined the crowd before the wicket of our Homewood bank. As I peeped corner wise through the outside window I saw him jostled to the counter. He was given his $5.00 and the window closed. This had been the first inspired move of FDR, the newly inaugurated President bringing with him the New Deal. He was soon to offer the WPA – public work projects and jobs for unemployed men. Willard landed one that involved taking statistics and measures of outside chimneys. Hundreds of men had applied for the job. Willard was paid $17.00 a week. Sometimes the work would stop and a new project commence. Once, when work reopened, he was made squad leader of seven men.

Roosevelt's strategy was to stimulate spending in the United States. The banks opened again and people dared to redeposit {{p295}} the savings they had left – if any. There was a little life now and there was a new hope, a feeble one. The people on the Homewood streets were still in shock, however. They had no hope. God was lost out of their hearts.

It is unusual for me to remember dreams. One night, however, I had one in which I was standing on top of a pushcart at the intersection of Homewood Avenue and Nadir Alley screaming passionately to moving crowds of unhearing people. "I preach Christ crucified. I say, I PREACH CHRIST CRUCIFIED!"

As Bahá'u'lláh said, in the {Tablet of Aḥmad} "for the people are wandering in the paths of delusion, bereft of discernment to see God with their own eyes or hear His melody with their own ears." Except for a few. A few for whom Christ had been crucified, and for whom Bahá'u'lláh had been made a prisoner. This day will pass and another generation will be able to listen to His message.

Through Willard's employment and a Saturday job at Sears-Roebuck, we had enough to pay for an apartment by ourselves. It was in an old brick mansion near the store and I won it on the approval of a cat. When I interviewed its aristocratic and elderly owner, she said "No. I want a single man there." She was quite firm until a big fluffy cat came in and suddenly jumped on my lap. Said Mrs. Edmonds, "That cat never goes to strangers. I'll have to let you come after all."

We lived in faded splendour for over a year and, when Mrs. Edmunds died, I helped the nurse layout her body. We stayed on with the approval of her daughter, who lived there too, an artist who had a studio in the tower of the house. {{p296}}

The Coles in Cleveland gave me money to go to the 1933 Convention. Convention was in June that year to enable the friends to attend the Chicago World's Fair. My bus ride from Cleveland to Chicago was interrupted frequently by Declaration Day parades in towns along the way. When the bus arrived, very late, Dale and Katherine Cole were waiting to take me home. Certainly, there was no place in the world that seemed as much like home as did their delightful suburban house, set on a big lawn in Cleveland Heights. On the next morning, Kay (Katherine) and I, with some other Cleveland people, drove to Wilmette.

Thoughts, like tendrils pushed out ahead to Convention a hazy dream of expectations. I was excited with the prospect of reunion with the bewildering assemblage of people who would be there, the amazing people who had been with 'Abdu'l-Bahá and had gone out as teachers with His light on their faces and in beckoning smiles and gestures. Our dear friends, so accessible, later to become fabulous myths. May Maxwell, Louis Gregory, Roy Wilhelm, The Trues (mother and daughter), Loulie Mathews, Mabel and Howard Ives, Grace and Harlan Ober, and 'Keith'.

But I had other expectations as well. My life had turned a corner when we moved into the new apartment. I told Lorna,

“Homewood was, in reality, a loathsome, nasty, little hole. The fact that it was a warm little hole, a cosy little hole, a convenient little hole, was ungratefully forgotten. I hope that I can seal up that book as I sealed up the book of Tilbury.”

I tried to put that life behind me and began to branch out. In April I had taken on three classes at the University psychology, writing, and figure drawing. The tuition fees then were especially low. Through those courses I fell in love again with learning and studying. I had never had a university education and I found that, gathering As and Bs, I was doing very well. I began to recover a lost confidence. I was studying a lot and beginning to write, doing extensive supplementary reading. I was busy, too, with publicity work for the Women's League. I felt better about myself but sometimes I wondered if I were frittering away my time. I began to see how scattered my activities were and to see the dissipation of energies by distractions, inadequacies, worries, monotonies and financial failures.

Lorna and I had talked often about “The Place”. It is a state of spirit that can be maintained only through effort. “The Place” is a zone of nearness to God, a zone of “seeing naught save God”. With my new-found excitement for learning, and through the intensity of concentration on my classes, I went a little off the spiritual track. I came to experience the truth uttered by 'Abdu'l-Bahá when He said, “Knowledge is the greatest veil.” It had removed me from the zone I had come to occupy and feel at home in. By the time of Convention I knew of my need to get unified and to refocus myself on the Cause as the centre of activity. The Cause is our one claim to distinction, our one source of power. I needed a better connection to that power.

So many dear friends were there. During the first session of Convention I sat as a delegate, in one of the front rows with my head screwed on backwards watching those that entered. All my dear friends. I felt my separation from them. "These are not my people any longer, I thought." I felt the loss of "The Place" and I began to mourn.

I knew how Convention would open. The song of two sweet singers from Chicago, the scent of the masses of roses, the Persian rugs on the wall. Ernest Harrison from Montreal was called to say the Prayer for Canada. Then the voice of Horace Holley giving his report of the Bahá'í year. {{p298}}

One of my last glimpses of the late comers caught sight of Dorothy. This radiant personality with sparkling eyes and a fun-seeking quirk on her lips. She saw me and waved an index finger of her raised hand. I felt a magnetic surge toward her which, after the session, brought us together for lunch. It was two years since we had met. Today she had come with a flock of new Bahá'ís from Lima, Ohio. She was teaching. She was healed of her physical ills. The Dorothy of two years ago was lost to me because I saw in her the beginning of the death of SELF. I saw it in the outline of her aura of spirit, the garment of the person of the "fifth kingdom", that infusion of the human world with the atmosphere of the "world to come" while still on earth. I, the friend, four years older than Dorothy, on whom Dorothy had leaned two years ago, now felt humility and immaturity with this "being" who had bloomed in the interval.

After the afternoon session, I left Dorothy to search for May Maxwell. May would be in her room, resting, as she must after long train journeys. Mary would be somewhere near. May reclined on pillows on her bed. She too, I had not seen for two "Pittsburgh years"! I ran to her. Her motherly arms embraced me. She could be loving. But she said "Doris, if you have to go to the washroom, don't be scared. There's a young alligator in the bathtub. Mary insisted on bringing it with her." I looked in the washroom and saw the alligator grinning at me with its long satirical jaws.

All of us were staying at a hotel in Evanston. Later that evening Kay Cole found me crying on my bed. My glorious friends; I felt separated from all of them. I felt as though I had lost my Cause. The Holy Spirit was gone. Kay understood. She brought me something special to eat and comforted me. After a few evenings spent in this way I was given back what I had lost. It was a gradual and rather unspectacular recovery. I can only credit it to my rededication and {{p299}} the refocusing of my efforts to the business of the Convention. It was the work of the Convention that took me out of my "prison of self" and slipped me back into "The Place".

After Convention, I began a new routine of sustained meditation and prayer. I remember the first morning. I was most restless, like a cat that wanted to get away, but I held myself down until the struggle ceased. It took fifty minutes.

That's discipline – and it brought such a sense of achievement, a clearness, a groove to hold my wheels.

I went back to Rochester and Geneva in September. Some of our other friends had also returned to Geneva from distant parts of the United States. It was a reunion of sorts. But this time, I felt a different kind of separation from my friends. Marguerite, Christine, the Collisons all seemed pretty impersonal and hard to get at. I realized that it was an habitual numbness of response. Everyone in the group was grand but something was missing. One night at Dr. Heist's home, I was called upon to speak. I took as my topic, "What does it mean to be a Bahá'í in 1933?" I spoke of the Depression and its effects on all of us, individually and collectively. I said, now that we were back together after three years, we ought to take stock together. "What is our condition?" I asked. Suddenly I flared up and demanded, "What about the wall between us and other people? Is it still higher and more impenetrable than three years ago? For a Bahá'í who is a representative of God's love, THE WALL MUST GO!"

Everyone began to talk at once, from out of their ghastly isolation, and began to bear witness to the wall and its devastating effect on their lives and the growth of the Cause. "What can we do?" they asked. I talked about the power of prayer and the need for courage to come out from our intellectual ramparts and begin loving. As we talked, we came together once more, truly united in the love of God. This talk {p300} and the one I gave in Rochester taught me something about letting go, of releasing the spirit.

As I mentioned earlier, during our early Bahá'í days in Geneva I had responded to an article that appeared in the {Atlantic Monthly} magazine. I wrote to the editors offering my thoughts and the Bahá'í teachings which inspired them. They published my letter. This was one thing that drew attention and put me on the floor at the National Convention and on my first National Committee, the Study Outline Committee that later prepared the 36 Lessons.

In November of 1933 I wrote to Stanwood Cobb suggesting that the Study Outlines be used as a correspondence course. I turned them into writing exercises. Students would write articles based on the material in the Outlines and would send them to us. We would critique them and mail our comments back to them. I thought the articles might also prove useful to the Bahá'í Magazine. Between 40 and 50 people took the course. I remember receiving a letter forwarded from Europe asking for the course materials. It was from George Townsend, who was then investigating the Faith. Mr. Townsend became later a Bahá'í and a Hand of the Cause of God.

From My Notes: December 21, 1933

"Where is it that Bahá'u'lláh tells us to appreciate the values of these fleeting days?" I was struck, all of a sudden, while going through the kitchen door, by a bombardment of thoughts about the importance of day-to-day living and experience and of how we should welcome opportunities to develop spiritual qualities through the exercise of living. How we ought to have perspective enough to know that certain things are dumbbell drills and sit-up exercises of squeezing out of each day every drop of growth, experience, colour, and appreciation that it contains – storing it all up. It is the raw {{p301}} material of the fabric of the next life. I feel that we are wasteful of material, that we discriminate too much, and really accept too little. Then that high rapture that comes over us at times – this is a fore-vision of the meaning of life eternal. It is for this potential rapture that the game is worth playing. That God has created us glorifies the verb “to be” out of its humdrum inescapableness. I want to proclaim against all nullification and deadness and half measures and compromise.”

About this time I began to see more clearly how I had been changed by the Pittsburgh experience. I was feeling a little victorious inside. I had become much more a social being and I was praying for more love, more dynamics, to be exactly as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had encouraged – to show forth affection to every creature. Pittsburgh was the proving ground for my first attempts in practising universal love. Now I prayed to expand the practice. I wrote at the time, “If radiance is to be found in these streets, is it not better than acquiring it by the easy means of an orchard or a sunset? I cannot have my soul at ransom to the accident of environment.” Another lesson had been learned.

One morning, during the Fast, the inflation of our lives seemed to collapse. I related to Willard an exciting discovery. “I believe I’m ready to leave Pittsburgh at last. How about you?” Willard replied, “If a door opens, I’m ready too.” Dawn was rising over our three-storey aviary and we finished another round of the Remover of Difficulties, feeling strangely free and at a little loss. {{p302}}

Part Four

Go Thou Straight On

Three and a half years and suddenly our work in Pittsburgh seemed redundant. My activities for the Women’s League had grown out of proportion and had born little fruit for Bahá’u’lláh. A fruit would ripen later, however, when Mrs. Norman Storer became a Bahá’í. But the Bahá’í group was assured. Alice Parker, a great teacher, was keeping up the Wednesday night study classes.

In three short weeks from the Fast and our ‘prayers, we were on our way to Jamestown in the Sekers’ commodious car, together with Henry and Bessie, their dog ‘Noodles’, the cat and canary – plus ourselves and all our earthly goods. The goods consisted of our books, clothes, and a few dishes. For the first time since we left Geneva, we were to have a home that was not a furnished apartment.

We and the Sekers stayed the first night in a tourist house on Prendergast Avenue. I had a nightmare, screamed, and threw myself out of bed. I thought the “prohibited” cat which was in our quarters was escaping into the house. Willard rescued me from under the bed. The next morning the landlady passed me on the stairs. I was covered with bruises and I was limping. She said,

“Did you hear the explosion last night? It shook the house.”

“Why, no,” I replied. “I didn’t hear one,” and hastily passed by her. The cat, sleeping illicitly in the Sekers’ room was not discovered. Willard and I went out, found a clothing store, charged a new suit for him, then went up the street and rented the home where, six years later, the Jamestown Assembly was born. {{p303}}

Lucy Wilson

There was one Bahá’í in town temporarily: Lucy Wilson, Martha Root’s lifelong friend. Alice Parker had been my great friend in Pittsburgh and now Lucy, years older, was to become my new friend in this environment. When I think of Alice or Lucy, I feel a glow of warmth in my heart. They were twenty years older than we, perhaps then in their 60s. The personification of subtle wit, understanding, bravery, perceptiveness, and loyalty – everything we loved in people was given to us in Alice and Lucy. To be with them was heaven.

Lucy Wilson, we found, was not won easily from her own excessive shyness, a quality augmented by her physical appearance: small-boned, thin, very delicate. Her manner apologetic, she had an aura of humility and submission and of having suffered.

A trained musician, she had a very sensitive touch on the piano and had lived only by teaching music. She had no students now, no money and very few places to go.

Lucy was a flower that quivered in an atmosphere of love. Willard and I set out to win her and we asked her to speak of Martha. Lucy opened up like a choice orchid whose inner petals were blue violet with a centre of gold. We persevered because it was evident that love was a part of the Bahá’í life she had been missing and now she was learning to breathe in it, relax in it, swim in it.

The three of us had very little money. Material-minded people would say that we had no luck. But we knew, because of our love of Bahá’u’lláh, that we were rich. As part of our wealth we counted Martha’s letters to Lucy. The letters came regularly and when Lucy came up our walk, her eyes shining like stars and a smile on her lips, we knew another letter had been stuck in her bag. Precious Lucy. To write of her is to long to see her again. {{p304}}

Finding a New Home

To speak of Lucy first has been a digression. This is how we found our new home: We walked up the street looking for “FOR RENT” signs. There was one on a small duplex, a neat looking house with brown shingles and white woodwork.

No one was at home so we followed a cobblestone path neatly bordered with flowers to the back of the house and waited on an old-fashioned school bench under a grape arbour. The back yard was enormous and seemed to be a whole street long. The neighbours, too, had great lawns and gardens, and since there were no fences it was as though they were all one. The rear edging, a sharp incline, was bordered with tall trees. On our yard was a square of twelve fruit trees – cherry, pear, and apple. The grape arbour was the size of a small house.

We waited, enjoying the sunshine, until a little grey man appeared. It was Mr. Fretz, the owner of the house. He opened the door and we stepped into the house and looked around. On the first floor was a large living room – always an asset to Bahá'ís. There were also a small guest chamber, dining room, bathroom and kitchen. Upstairs we found a large room with a bed and another room with a locked door, behind which was the private world of Mr. Fretz himself. We could have the house for $25 a month, if we would take Mr. Fretz too.

Eve Nicklin

At a time before the Guardian's instructions discouraged Bahá'í membership in churches, Eve Nicklin was a deaconess and a superintendent of a church-sponsored orphan asylum in Sheffield, Pennsylvania. Before learning of the Bahá'í Faith, Eve felt "ordained" as a Christian in the children's service. After reading the Word and talking to God, she became a Bahá'í and continued to work at the orphanage.

I had first seen her at the Sekers' while we were living in Pittsburgh. With an unconventional ease, Eve stretched out on the floor to listen to a reading of a newly received letter from Shoghi Effendi, "The Goal of a New World Order." She had the air of a gypsy and we were wondering if she would become a Bahá'í. Howard Ives met her later and taught her more about the Cause.

[^] [Shoghi Effendi, {The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh} (Wilmette, Ill., Bahá'í Publishing Trust, 1974) pp. 29-50.]

A short time after we moved to Jamestown, she dropped in with her assistant, Wreatha Cranston, and a few others.

[^] [I visited Eve at the Asylum one day in February of '35 and Wreatha joined the Cause that night. She was 23.]

"We brought our own refreshments," she announced. "All we would like is a cup of tea." Willard and I were embarrassed because all of our cups had cracks in them. We prepared the tea and I set the table, while telling our visitors that our cups had had a very hard life.

"If one of you should be so unlucky, you might get the cup that is cracked." They came to the table and we sat on packing boxes.

Our guests all shouted at once, "I've got the cup with the crack!"

Eve's uniform had such a stylish look. She refused, except on ceremonious occasions, to wear the bonnet with the white ties. She wore, instead, a daring black beret. On this visit, she wore dangling, bright red earrings and a bold plaid suit. The effect produced was picturesque, a bit theatrical. I called her "Garbo."

Eve had considered herself, for two years, a member of the Pittsburgh Bahá'í community, although an often absent one. I had met her on other occasions but I had never before had the opportunity to get to know her. Not until October, that is, when she came to Jamestown to speak at the Methodist Church to a conference of church workers. I went with her on the first afternoon of the conference. She spoke to half a {{p306}} churchful of women, about her orphans, and swayed them with real magic. She was telling them, in effect, "Abandon what perisheth for an everlasting dominion."

We sat, that evening, around the little "Cricket Herald" stove and talked until the late hours. Praising Eve, Willard said, "Here is someone at last, who comes near to being a real Bahá'í, and it is also a thrill for her to be staying in a Bahá'í home for the first time." With Eve there was not the customary expression of Bahá'í affection between us but, rather, a detachment so strong in concentration that when our paths crossed it was as though a messenger had been sent with a mystic scroll to be read. Eve Nicklin would return.

The Story Story

Mrs. Margaret Story seemed to me to be so much more perfect than me. By her mere presence, she embarrassed me. She was of another class – good shoes, good clothes, good education and, in comparison, I was an example of apparent crudity. And yet, I think I fascinated her.

She was the wife of Mr. Chester Story Sr., Principal of Schenley School. She was President of the local chapter of the American Pen Women and a noted author, having written a book on style, as opposed to fashion. She had written another book and asked me to do the illustrations. I did them and they were approved by the Editor. Unfortunately the book was never published. Had it been, our financial problems would have been solved.

Our friendship began while Willard and I were still living in Pittsburgh. She had invited me to a tea back in early '34. I had gone, feeling particularly uncomfortable. I was wanting to leave, but I told myself, "You're representing Bahá'u'lláh, not yourself," and with this sophisticated crowd I did not give up {{p307}} being myself. I remember watching Mrs. Story and thinking to myself, "This person needs love." Like Mrs. Norman Storer of similar social background, I had singled her out for the practice of universal love. I had prayed that I might be able to love her. When the party broke up and the guests were departing, I summoned my reserve and kissed her. That kiss was the beginning of our friendship and the first of many answers to the prayers. Mrs. Story opened up to me, later confiding in me and asking for advice in resolving personal problems.

She told me that her friends did not stay with her and I told her that I was her “Rock of Gibraltar”. With me it really was her heart that had blossomed and responded.

We were at another meeting in April which I described to Lorna: .

“Mrs. Story was looking rather hard and unapproachable, and I knew that she really was not. You see, I could look into her. I sat beside her after most of the others had gone, and she told me that I was beautiful because of the spiritual light in my face... I’ve become a mysterious person to her. I know something she does not. I’ll tell her sometime – have been on the point of it twice, but something interrupted. I woke up last night, prayed for her, and went back to sleep, and when I woke up, there she was inside. In a little while she called me; said she was thinking of me and had to call. Just think, my greatest Pittsburgh bugbear, this person who had the power to bruise and break my wings, being in this relationship through the working of ‘love and will’! The splendour can be endless as long as there are people in the world to be loved and won.” {{p308}}

Now that I was in Jamestown, Mrs. Story wrote to me often:

“...Just a short time ago I came in from lunching with Alice Parker – so very happy to have her physically near again – How I long to see you with the physical eye as I so very often do in remembrance –

“Here in my hands is what I found on my return – a marked copy of “World Order”. (What a splendid title there is so much written on “World Chaos”!) “Through the Invisible” by Doris McKay is a classic – a poem. It is so beautiful it hurts – You were, as you always have been, priceless in your loving friendship to have me share this, your individually love-inebriated, intuitively self-impregnated expression of a Divine vision. From the purple vault of Sacredly inspired emotion – or more than that, spiritually discerned Beauties, you fling the treasures of your Soul. Yes, darling, I am grateful.

Such a hunger for a visit with you – When are you coming? Love and love, Margaret”

About a year later, her husband, Chester, sent for me. It was urgent. She was very sick and had asked for me. I remember hearing in those days, a tune on the radio called “Dream a Little Dream of Me”. I took the bus to Pittsburgh and, when I arrived at their apartment, I was ushered into the dining room, where all the relatives, both close and distant, had gathered. All waited to be called to her bedside. Quite a formidable group. I sat with them very much out of place and much looked at. This was not my crowd. {{p309}}

After a time, Mr. Story came running out, quite excited and calling out my name. “Peggy is calling for Doris’. She promised to come and hasn’t arrived yet.” Through the opened bedroom door I could hear Mrs. Story raving, screaming my name. Chester found me and escorted me to her bedside. She looked to be frightened and very far gone. I sat on her bed and began saying prayers from memory. I did not know then as many as I do now. I said all that I could and, after awhile, she seemed satisfied and weary. While Mr. Story and I waited the minister came. He was from one of the fashionable churches with a socially sophisticated congregation. He came to pray for her soul, but Chester stopped him. "We've already had the service – Bahá'í prayers. Peggy requested Bahá'í prayers."

A few days later, Peggy died. Willard and I received this letter from Mr. Story:

"Dear Doris and Willard,

"I wish I could write you all I feel about the wonderful help you have both been to me, and to us, for our family circle is not broken, though its best part now reaches into a serener and lovelier somewhere. I am sorry, Doris, that you had to leave before I had my spiritual revelation of Peggy's soul. I must tell you of my experience. It came in the night as I was lying awake thinking. Somehow I became conscious of Peggy's soul above me. I realized that in all my life with her I had known only a tiny section of her spirit in all its beauty and strength and inspiring power. I could almost see her soul, like a great dome above me, sheltering not only me but big enough to cover a multitude. And the message came to me from that soul that it would be always near me to bless and inspire, that it was at peace, and happier than ever on earth. Everything solved, and I could even state it perfectly in words {{p310}} that satisfied me with their logic and sense of calm beauty. Then I fell asleep. In the morning the words were gone. I have tried often, but cannot state the solution as it came to me then – only grope vaguely towards the idea. But the calm feeling persists. All my bitterness and resentment of the summer have gone, all the fear and horror of death. To me now there is a gentleness, a wisdom about that opening of the door to a new and happier world that I can feel, but not express. You understand, I believe, for your understanding is so far greater than my own. But I know you will be happy to know that you helped me to find the way to see the truth. And perhaps my experience will strengthen your own knowledge and beliefs... Chester."

Mr. Story later told me that when Peggy had called for me asking for Bahá'í prayers, she had said of me, "She is the only one who knows that I have a soul." For me, that is sufficient confirmation of the power of universal love. Now and then that tune enters my head and I say a prayer for Peggy.

Mr. Story would remarry in time, and we never heard from him again.

In September of '34 I had written to Lorna my last impressions of Pittsburgh – of watching the stars from the balcony at 1:00 a.m. – seeing the Pleiades. My first month in Jamestown I was homesick and noted that Alice, Ruth, Eve, Bessie and Mrs. Storer, anyone of them, would have looked now like an angel, a star of another heaven. "Here there is nobody," I had written. "Each day is a complete and endless blank. It seems as if bedtime will never come."

Aspects of that first month lingered. Jamestown was a very grey world during the first year. Evelyn Underhill had written in her book, {The Grey World}, “Want of faith in the improbable {{p311}} is really responsible for all that is deliberately dreary in our lives.” The improbable that I fought with was the finding of new friends and of teachings “Somewhere in this population of 45,000,” I wrote, “there must be friendships and the conscious need of God. It is hard to break through if one is not very aggressive, or to wait if one is not very patient. But I have come back to fight. I am going to find the jewels that He has hidden here.” Meanwhile I continued to give talks[^] and to teach, not in Jamestown, but in Rochester, Geneva, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland. I turned 40 and noticed the advance of my weight and dress size, and felt the physical contrast I made with the younger students in the classes that I continued to take. Lucy Wilson was the only light in this grey world and, in June, she would leave to return to Cambridge Springs. The prospect of her leaving was frightening. The grey world, how I struggled with it. In the spring, I wrote:

[^] [Many of those talks were given in the Black churches in Pittsburgh.]

“I have eaten all the food in my spiritual cupboard and stare now at bare shelves. Outside of the two Pittsburgh trips, there has been no replenishment for eight months. Now I see that what I had brought with me is gone. I must face an adjustment to the altered conditions. I must ‘plow the rock until it bears.’ My restlessness is of a vague desire to serve the Cause, not knowing how. Once I asked Mother Beecher what to do and she said, ‘Prepare yourself and God will open the way. Pray that the wisdom will be revealed.’”

On one of the Pittsburgh visits, replenishment had come from Emogene Hoagg. Those days were without flaw. Mrs. Storer was away so it was decided that we were to stay with the Sekers at our old Homewood address. The Sekers gave us the warmest, sweetest welcome and I enjoyed every minute of the two nights we were there. {{p312}}

On the first night, Emogene and I talked until three o’clock in the morning and found that we saw eye to eye in all matters mystical. We decided that “attainment” depends upon complete, constant, and unflinching servitude. Servitude even in sleep, servitude in our prayers, in our work, in our going out and coming in. She was as delicate and pure as my intuition had told me. She was a passionate lover of the Beloved of the world and her heart seemed broken with her love for Him. Emogene was very frail in body and she was not very eloquent or dynamic. Yet there was a blue fire in her eyes as she talked. Her three meetings in Pittsburgh were thoughtful and searching rather than brilliant. The people who came wanted to talk and they asked many questions. We took turns in answering. We spent Friday and Saturday nights at the Browns, and I later stayed with Alice. My prayers then went west with Emogene. I wrote: “Now she will belong to me the way Alice and Lucy belong to me.”

Mrs. Storer returned before I went back to Jamestown. We had •several long talks about the Cause, the law of cohesiveness bringing us into a closer relationship – part of the machinery of love.

After completing my first year in Jamestown, I looked back and observed:

“I have learned to be alone; to live happily on a little solid island in the midst of social nothingness. My occasional trips to the mainland have shown me an added power and poise. That study in the College Center is the only other gain. Willard has gotten on top of his work and made a good record for himself. We can’t see far ahead, but this must be part of some big picture – one of those jigsaw pieces you can’t fit in until you see some more of the design.” {{p313}}

In November ‘35, at the encouragement of my English teacher, I began to write a longer work. A novel he called it. Hole in the Wall was about Homewood. Homewood had been a hole – a hole in which to hide and a hole to get out of. We all have a personal Homewood and the theme of the novel was escape, escape from the living spiritual reality which lies one step beyond the day-to-day sordidness. It was about how we tend to submerge our inner life under outer interests which, in time, define for us, our world. My school work for example. In hiding in our personal Homewood this way, we become less sensitive to beauty and become physically remote and somehow estranged from God. In the newly published translation of the Gleanings I read, “Know ye that by ‘the world’ is meant your unawareness of Him Who is your Maker, and your absorption in aught else but Him... Whatsoever deterreth you, in this Day, from loving God is nothing but the world.”[^]

{{Gleanings}}. The book was a present from Neysa Bissell on her farewell visit. She responded early to the call of the first Seven Year Plan and pioneered to Rutland, Vermont. Willard and I started each day by reading a section of it at breakfast and when we were finished, we started again. During the first five days, I read until I reached the point where I not only wept, but shook. These Writings filled me alternately with terror and with joy and with the presence of Bahá’u’lláh. His Words threw me into agonized self-searchings such as would the prospect of death. Yes, that is it. If we truly read them, we face eternity, while at the same time we see the world with a lucidity that gives us a pain behind the eyes like that of too bright sunshine on snow. Interspersed are essences of protection, of a great heart beating, and of loving helpful angels whose task is to inspire, answer our prayers, comfort and guide us. I was so moved by import of the publication of the {{p314}} book that I saw it to be the “the big event” I had been waiting for. I told Lorna, “It is the Scriptures raised to the Nth power.”

Martha Root: “Thou art ever pervading the universe.”

On August 3rd, 1936 I wrote in my diary:

“Willard is away teaching at Louhelen summer school. Today I was meditating as I worked on some quotations to be used in the Green Acre devotions – quotations on the marked contrast between the spiritual consciousness and our comfortable earthly reactions. I thought of the latter as the world of make-believe; children playing with dolls, getting frightened in the dark. An imaginary built-up existence with playhouse tasks and dark-corner boogies. People read novels, go to the movies, and play games to escape still farther into the world of make-believe; it is a form of semi-life and few people dare to venture into the Real World.

“Then I thought of the spiritual world as a medium in which you have to learn to maintain yourself. You are ascending in a balloon. The cords are released. If you hover too near the treetops you throw out sandbags. To stay up you must not carry too much weight. We have to have the ‘thinness’ of air if we would penetrate, while still in the earth consciousness, ‘the realms of the unseen’.

“Yet, miraculous as it may seem, we do belong to those transcendent heights. How to exist there? By forming habits of prayer, working with the spirit of worship, reading the Word, teaching the Faith by word and deed.

“A very lovely thing happened this afternoon. Martha Root and Lucy Wilson drove over from Cambridge Springs and we had an hour to visit together. With Martha’s dear sympathetic presence I felt expanded. I was simply on fire, happy beyond {{p315}} all belief, eloquent, loving, free of shyness. Oh, to be like that and to make others experience, if only for an hour, eternal life.

“Something BIG happened. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said that He saw His Father’s face in the faces of those who came to Him and that was the reason they came forth from His presence radiant. Martha did that to me today and I know that she and Lucy carried away a picture of my true self that few see.

“It was heavenly. Nothing must ever happen to make me forget.”

Nothing has made me forget that time, and I need to say more about it.

On that afternoon I was sitting in the garden among the flowers. Except for the stimulation of my own thoughts and meditations, it was a rather typical Jamestown afternoon rather boring. I looked up and saw two approaching figures, Lucy Wilson and Martha Root. I had known that Martha was coming sometime because of the letters Lucy had shared with us.

Martha had prayed that her work wouldn’t be incapacitated by ill health. That was the word she used, “incapacitated”. Now, in the opinion of the Guardian, Martha was incapacitated. She was worn out by a long struggle against ill health combined with tireless exertion. The Guardian left it now, in the hands of a committee of the National Spiritual Assembly to decide when Martha, our most cherished teacher, was to be allowed to start on her trip to India. She was told to recuperate, to rest.

On the day that they visited, Martha seemed elated to have had a legitimate reason to rest. I was pleased that she was so relaxed and happy. Later I told Willard that she was like a little girl who needed pampering and I felt a need to do things for her. I discovered that many people were feeling this {{p316}} way. People who were arranging her meetings. People who were working for her. All wanted to spoil her. Our feeling for her was tenderness. With her I felt that the spiritual powers were playing with us as though she were a window through which poured the “all pervading influence”. We experienced a different atmosphere, a different vibration. This was sheer magic. Everyone who had contact with her felt a rising spirit. We all seemed to be touched by her power. She looked at us with such love that we would have believed anything she said. She looked at everyone with a look that goes beyond acknowledgement. It was a look of recognition that made us know of ourselves as better than normally we thought we were. Her look and love elevated us. This was the atmosphere of the vibrating influence of the Holy Spirit released by her faith and actions. It was very much out of this world and I only wish that I could express it more clearly and credibly.

Martha and Lucy were like two schoolgirls on vacation, joking and laughing, on the start of a journey. They were looking for something to do that was fun and they invited me to come to Cambridge Springs. There, Martha could show me her life as it had been.

I stayed at Lucy’s house but spent hours every day with Martha. In this little town in the Allegheny Hills were the roots of Martha’s heart. She – was devoted to her memories of her people and to her brother and his family. It had been a keen personal sacrifice to be away for years at a time from this environment and now she was exultant and happy at being home again, so much so that she wanted to share her happiness with Lucy and me.

Early the first morning Martha came to take me to the Polish college where she used to teach English in her pre-Pittsburgh days. This was one of two Polish institutions in the United States designed to keep the culture of the ‘old-country’ alive by educating young men in the language and traditions {{p317}} of Poland. The buildings were in a wooded hilly section and we approached them by a wooden bridge crossing over a ravine. Martha was welcomed by her friend, the bearded principal, who explained that because of the summer vacation, the students and teachers were away. It was an unlikely and dreamlike environment with portraits of Polish heroes staring at us from the walls of the long corridors.

The next day we sat with Martha’s brother and his wife in the Baptist church where, many years ago, Martha had been denounced publicly by the minister of those days – the very place, probably the very pew, where this shattering experience came to Martha. How her heart must have broken when her townspeople withdrew from her!

That night we went to supper at her home and the neighbours were invited to a meeting. Martha, the world traveller, was treated now with honour and respect, even if the people still held to their old ways and did not accept Bahá’u’lláh. A few gathered in the country sitting room, but Martha became ill and asked me to speak to the people.

The next morning she started out, on foot, to show me more of the town. On the way to her brother’s grocery store, again she became suddenly ill, had an attack of pain, and had to lean, for a few minutes, against a tree until her strength came back. Then we went on – the same cheerful, enthusiastic, Martha! The next day there was dinner at Lucy’s with two Bahá’ís from New Castle, Pennsylvania.

Twice during the fall and winter ,Martha came to Jamestown, a short train-ride from Cambridge Springs. She was with us about a month. That winter of 1936 may have been the most difficult test of her entire Bahá’í life. She felt impelled to go to India and was slowly getting to feel that perhaps this was not to be. She was disturbed. The lack of physical activity transformed that disturbance into rather unpleasant states. She became more and more depressed and became increasingly {{p318}} restless as she waited to hear from the committee. The power of the spirit around her seemed to have relaxed a bit. She was not getting the rest she was supposed to have. Why was she not told to start, she wondered. Why had not Horace Holley and the others corresponded? Why did not the Guardian tell her to go? He had always advised her before.

On the visits to Jamestown, ever self-denying, Martha took the least expensive room in the hotel. She lived on buns and tea made with hot water from the ‘ bathroom tap. When I came to see her, I would bring some fruit and we would share the food laying on the bed talking about “the Beloved” and about the Guardian. I have heard that Martha’s relationship to him was motherly. They, the two great overworkers, were concerned about each other’s health. One day I found Martha shedding bitter tears. The hoped-for letter with the permission for her to be on her way, still had not arrived. Martha Root wept in my arms.

Eve Nicklin returned in September. She had been with us for a few days in the spring and, while she was away from the orphan asylum, her supervisor had opened some of her Bahá’í mail. Eve was in trouble because her job was with the Methodist Church and the woman who had opened the mail was not very warm about it. She had called in Eve’s two assistants, Wreatha (a Bahá’í) and Betty (about to become a Bahá’í). Eve eventually lost her job with the Church, the job for which she had been trained. Now she was living in Rochester working as a housekeeper. She told us how she had been saving money from her paltry wages; how she had been preparing to offer herself as a pioneer to Peru. As she described her intentions, Willard and I exchanged a glance which needed no words. We gave Eve one of the two hairs of Bahá’u’lláh that Martha Root had given Willard after his southern tour with Louis Gregory. Eve was leaving Jamestown {{p319}} to consult with members of the National Assembly about pioneering. But this Eve, of the daring black beret and bright red earrings had left her lipstick at home. She fretted, “I’m sure they won’t take me without my lipstick.” I made a concoction from cinnamon candy which worked as a poor substitute.

Eve was accepted and became the second pioneer to leave from Jamestown for South America. (John Stearns, who I will introduce later, was the first.) I saw Eve several years ago in the movie, Green Light Expedition. Hand of the Cause, Rúhíyyih Khánúm, had called her the “Mother of South America”.

More Lessons in the Power of Prayer

January 29th, 1937

I credit the change to the prayers of Dorothy Baker. Of course, there had been my own, too. In the spring of '36 I had prayed for a miracle. Something inhibited my love for the people and I told myself, through my diary:

“I never want to be anywhere again where we are not known as Bahá'ís from the start. That is what made Pittsburgh such a happy hunting ground. It is a harmful thing to have to inhibit the Cause.”

I was asking God for a miracle, to manipulate events that would break the spiritual ice in Jamestown. The miracle was given.

Dorothy came in January 1937, full of the spirit of faith and the purity of aim and intention. Willard and I had been in Jamestown for more than three years. We had little money and were down in our inspiration. We were the “righteous”, {{p320}} while Dorothy was of the “near ones.”[^] We had had our fill of firesides and meetings to which no one responded and we had had our fill of giving invitations to the unaccepting.

[^] [“The good deeds of the righteous are the sins of the Near Ones.” {Some Answered Questions}, p. 126.]

When we told Dorothy of our situation she suggested that we say the invocation of “El-Mustagáth.”

I hesitated, “But Dorothy, that prayer is to be used only in dire circumstances, life-and-death situations.”

Dorothy looked at us and said, “What greater calamity. than for Doris and Willard to have spent three years in this town with no result?”

Dorothy washed her hands and she and Willard said the prayers. I had the flu so I did not go through all the prostrations with them. Ninety-five times they called, “Yá Alláh El-Mustagáth.” We would know, in relatively short time, the answers to the prayers.

Meanwhile Martha Root had returned from Cambridge Springs and was again staying at the hotel. The day before I had invited Dorothy to meet her for lunch. Dorothy was stirred and excited at the prospect of meeting this Bahá'í teacher who was back from one of her trips. I planned to have them meet at the YMCA restaurant. Martha and I went there and watched for Dorothy.

She swept into the room looking lovely, triumphant, like an angel. I introduced them to each other in some ordinary way. “Martha, here is someone you would like to meet, Dorothy Baker.” Visibly, Dorothy was the prominent one, distinctive in her dress. In contrast, Martha's style lacked style and was unassumingly plain. But Dorothy saw with the spiritual eye and recognized Martha's station, for she showed, in her presence, such a submission, such a humility of spirit.

She watched Martha's every move and anticipated serving her in {{p321}} any way that she could. It was a very noticeable attitude, similar to that of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's in the {Tablet of Visitation}:

"Make me as dust in the pathway of Thy loved ones, and grant that I may offer up my soul for the earth ennobled by the footsteps of Thy chosen ones in Thy path, O Lord of Glory in the Highest."

Martha spoke at the YMCA. A cousin of Paul Haney's mother was on the Board and we had used her name to get the room for the meeting. She spoke on Oneness or some other seemingly inoffensive subject but, later, we were told that the Board was disturbed that we had held a Bahá'í meeting there. The Secretary said to us, "We thought you were Brahmans. Now that we have found out that you are Bahá'ís, we hope there won't be any more of your talks here." Ironically, I was a member of a social club of world-minded people devoted to the oneness of mankind and, as a member of that club, I was invited later to speak at the YMCA and to give the Bahá'í message directly. I was not embarrassed at all for I was not speaking under YMCA auspices. I guess Martha's prominence had caused more publicity than they wanted.

Last Sight of Martha

When it was decided at last that Martha was able to start out again, she flew like a bird from a cage.

I went down to the train station to see her off. She was there and yet she wasn't. This was the atmosphere again. This was my one experience of the presence of another world of spiritual heat that the mystics talk about. It was a winter day, not at all warm, and yet I felt a heavenly and delightful rise of temperature within me as I searched for her face in the coach windows. I found her and it was as though my physical {{p322}} heart was on fire. I boarded the train and joined her. Martha had her usual bunch of packages, seemingly excessive in number. We used to have bags that we put things into, paper bags with handles, and Martha had an unusual supply of them – a cheaper way to travel without luggage. I gave her a basket of fruit and she told me that she was going to share it with the other passengers. I soon heard the warning of the conductor, bid her farewell and left the train.

Martha was going on an expedition more glorious than any she had taken before. Two years later, in Australasia, her legs gave out. Cancer had reached her bones and she died in terrible pain. I found a copy of a letter that I had written to her in which I had begged her to give her pain to Bahá'u'lláh as a martyr's ransom, that we might know, as she did, the fire of the love of God.

When she died, the Editor of Bahá'í World asked me to write about her. Martha Root. However was I to sum her up? I sat down at my writing table and asked, "Martha, what do you want me to say of your life?" And she answered, "Love. Write about love." After all, Martha was under obligation to spread the love of God among the Bahá'ís first, then among the nations. She had the experience of it and could not live without it. It was out of this world. Martha wrote the article through me, through the “interpenetration of spirit.”[^]

[^ ] [43. It was May Maxwell who introduced me to the concept of interpenetration of spirits, but I believe its origins are with Evelyn Underhill who wrote, in one of her books: “The interpenetration of human spirits is a mere shadow of the deep and actual penetration and influence of God on souls.”]

After Dorothy and Martha left I continued to suffer intensely, imagining all too clearly the futility of our lives in Jamestown. Later we would see that the effects of Dorothy's prayers of El-Mustagath were the beginnings of the Jamestown Assembly. The lives of at least four people were influenced dramatically at about the time the prayers were said. The first was John Stearns. He had lost his wife through divorce and was mourning the loss of her love. John was looking for company and new ideas and told us that he was attracted to us by our happiness. (He had wondered how people so poorly dressed could be so cheerful!) We contrived to ask John to drive us to Green Acre, offering to pay for his gas and oil, and he accepted. Once there, we let the atmosphere of the Bahá'í school work its magic. But John was distant, not an easy person to get to know. He was not very sociable and did not join us. One day I saw him sitting on his bed in one of the rooms at the Inn. He did not look like the rest of us. His eyes were like cold fish eyes. He was so forlorn. I went to my room and prayed that he would have soft eyes. Those prayers were answered. John started reading Bahá'í books that he took out from the library. He became fascinated with {The Dawn-Breakers} and took to carrying it around with him. He opened up, developed soft eyes and, later, became a Bahá'í. John would become Jamestown's first pioneer – moving to Ecuador. His fascination with {The Dawn-Breakers} attracted the attention of Greg Wooster, who later borrowed the book and became confirmed by reading it.

Freddy Reis was John's cousin. At the time of Dorothy's prayers, Freddy suffered the loss of his job. John hired him and introduced him and his wife Audrey to the Faith. Vivian, 'Vivo' Lawson, a violin student was number four. Her loss was that of her father. She became attracted to the Faith and began coming to meetings.

After Dorothy and Martha's visit, Willard and I began to say every evening, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Prayer for the Northeastern States. No matter what company we had or what event might be happening, we excused ourselves, retired from the living room, and said the prayer. Ken Christian was once visiting from Binghamton before pioneering to Greece. He claimed that the room shook, vibrated, when we were saying the prayer. {p324}}

Doris and Horace Holley came in May '37. There was a marked increase in warmth on the part of all who were present to hear Horace speak. We prayed for all the speakers. Before he was to talk, Horace asked me for suggestions. I told him, “Anything you say will be all right. All of the Bahá'ís will be praying for you.” He gave his strange laugh and spoke to them. When he came back I said it was a good talk. “Why shouldn’t it have been? How could there have been any mistakes with everyone praying for it?” I had prayed that he would be inspired out of his intellectual and administrative reaction to the Faith, and I noted in my diary, “A delightful social contact was established ... the minds had been stimulated. Now I want the hearts to be touched.”[^]

[^ ] [I had a similar incident in Toronto with John Robarts. He was just a good member of the community then, not a Hand of the Cause. I was asked to speak and had not had time to prepare or think about a talk. John said he would pray for me. I told him not to pray for me, but to pray for my audience. “They are the ones who need prayers,” I said. In introducing me, John told them what I had said and that became the life of the meeting.]

The hosting of study classes had been a goal of mine since our first week in Jamestown. Now there were enough people interested in the Faith to invite to meetings. Wilfrid “Willo” Barton, a believer from Detroit had joined us. I remember the evening of our first study class.

On that night Willard, “Willo,” and I sat for the holding of the meeting and, as usual, no one came. We had made some wonderful refreshments for the introduction of the study class. The house was polished and clean and, surely, after all of those prayers, they would come. We waited and they did not come. The appointed time passed, and they did not come. I was so disappointed, my spirit – crashed and I began to cry. I talked of giving up. We had tried so hard and this was to be a big occasion – so many were invited .. I was rescued by Willo’s inspired power. He grabbed me heartily in his arms and ordered me to stop, to have faith and to stop giving up and to stop crying. We looked out again from the little back porch. Sure enough at eight o’clock, when it was getting dark, we saw a group of people, a small crowd, coming up the street. In it were John Stearns and Dorothy Ferguson, whom {{p325}} we had known at the College Center, and there were others. All of our contacts were coming at once! That was the beginning. Some of them declared later and became members of the “Jamestown Fireside” which grew to become a group of thirty people.

There was one woman who became a Bahá’í through the influence of a dream. She dreamt that we had surrounded her and were chanting “Bahá’í, Bahee, Baho, Bahum”. Her dreams persisted until she declared. Later, that chant would become our Jamestown cheer, heard often at the end of our Feasts.

But the successes were less constant than my struggles struggles which continued to search for a different, more interior, victory. There were many nights in which I experienced the “dark night of the soul”. It was a time of severe testing for me and I fought on by developing new ways of rededicating myself to God and by experimenting with Christian mysticism and the focus of my energies. I made schedules or programs of discipline that I would put myself on for periods of nineteen days, after which I would evaluate their effects, a practice I would long continue. Some of the schedules included physical exercise and times set aside for writing. All were founded on repetition of Bahá'í prayers and meditation. I remember one in which I would go up to the attic and prostrate myself in prayer, putting my head in a literal dust. I wrote:

“It was the catnip my spirit wanted. I built more of an habitual attitude toward my spiritual goals, with my head in the dust during those thirty minutes, than I could have learned in a month of ordinary effort. The feel of it is in me, the feel of supplication and nothingness.” {{p326}}

This became my “upper room” and soon I began trying to translate those special prayers into service. I experimented with the household tasks that I had always hated and had wanted to neglect. I tried to carry them out with the same spirit of supplication. In my relationships with others I concentrated on the spirit of worship and on refusing to allow myself to descend to an ordinary human plane. My notes tell me that I found myself much more helpful to others. There is no mention of success with the home chores.

The personal struggle for discipline and the maintenance of an altitude of spirit and the practice of universal love is a theme. I once described my state in this way: “Love is the wind in my sails, but now I am becalmed. I am drifting away from the use of love and falling back on ordinary practicality and logic and finding them inadequate.” While I was acutely aware of and sensitive to my own lack of progress and failings, I was’ also unnecessarily aware of it in others. I felt like I did when I had overconfidently confronted May Maxwell with her intimidation of the two sisters. This is one self-awareness that always is accompanied by pain. This is my darker side, which often forgets events like the fireside that Dorothy Baker gave at the Woosters’ in ‘39.

Many were attracted to this meeting. Forty-one attended, twenty-six non-Bahá'ís. Dorothy’s talk was so brilliant, I felt so humble. Evelyn found me afterward and said, “Dorothy’s talk was inspired, but do you know that it is the love you have been showering upon us, that moves our spirits.” That, of course, is what I was needing to hear. We try to maintain a constant altitude of spirit and experience a roller coaster through troughs of despair and glorious heights of nearness.

After the fireside Dorothy and I sat up until four o’clock in the morning and she revealed her heart to me. When we had said our ‘good night’ she threw me three or four kisses and {{p327}} slipped away to her room. She came running back to place ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s prayer beaus in my hand, the ones He used the day He died. She told me she had bared her heart to me as to no other human being.

The growth of the Cause in Jamestown would quicken in time. After a while it seemed that there were declarations at each Feast. Twenty new believers by the time we pioneered to Canada.

Finances

While we were in Jamestown, Willard worked at Sears Roebuck. He was now farm machinery and garden supplies manager, making a dollar a week more than he had in Pittsburgh. At one time his boss asked him if he would take on extra work, work which would require him to go to the store several evenings. "I won't have a lot of time," he said, and asked me what he should do. We were not without our financial worries, but I told Willard, "No." He disliked his job very much and that was the answer he was hoping for. Ironically, it was I who would begin to work in the evenings. Earlier, in the fall, I had offered to teach a class at the College Center, in Commercial Art. I had written to the President enclosing a proposed course outline.

One day a simple-looking man came to our door. I greeted him by saying, "No, I don't want to buy a vacuum cleaner." There had been several salesmen calling that week. He said, "I am the College President and I have come to discuss your application to teach." In spite of my welcome he gave me the job. I would be earning a $1.00 an hour or $8.00 a week. I taught that class for four years. Willard's income was still low, but this extra money was reserved for Bahá'í purposes. We stored the bills in the pages of Maeterlinck's {The Treasure of the Humble}. When twenty, thirty, or more people began {{p328}} showing up for meetings and firesides, all of the money went for refreshments. It takes a bit of planning to have tea and cookies or cake for so many people. Our contribution to the •Fund was normally very, very low. I remember having some money left over once and being able to send a cheque for the enormous amount of four dollars to the Temple fund. I wrote to Horace Holley at one point. I told him that we were spending money for our firesides and asked, "What do you advise? We can't give to the Temple." He wrote back and said that the National Assembly was pleased that we were having the meetings and to continue them.

Our finances were small and tight, but we never became frantic. We were always assured. Normally others paid for, or assisted, our travel to this or that Bahá'í school or meeting where we were teaching. I still have a letter from Willard written to me from Louhelen, where he was giving a course. He had had an offer to teach elsewhere in Michigan. He wrote to ask if he would be justified in spending the six dollars required for the bus ticket. He felt he had to write to get my O.K.

The Jamestown summers, summers of the late 1930s, followed a pattern. My classes would break. I would go to Convention and later teach at Green Acre. In '36 I taught Public Speaking. My Creative Writing Outline was approved and published and I used it at Green Acre in '37 and, in '38, Willard and I taught Comparative Religion. {Prayers and Meditations} was the subject we taught in '39. And for several years, Willard taught at Louhelen.

At nearby Lake Chautauqua there was a summer music program. We would go and enjoy performances such as Gilbert and Sullivan's, {Gondaliers}. These summers were reminiscent of our cultural revellings in Geneva. Lorna Tasker came to visit in August of '37. She noted in her diary: {{p329}}

August 1. John Stearns took us to see the Davises. Mrs. Davis asked about our religion and we had a chance to talk about it.

August 5. Mr. Stearns took us to Chautauqua for a concert.

August 6. Mrs. Howes came and we had a lovely afternoon with her. She read some of her poems. That night I wrote 'The Perfect Answer'.

August 7. Willard and Doris and I had a beautiful evening at home. Ate ice cream and peaches, played chess, read poetry, and a chapter in Davis' {Capitalism and Its Culture}, also Willard read the Word, as he did every night...

August 8 ... We had seen the movie {The Good Earth}. Eleanor Eckbert came after breakfast and talked about Christian Science...

August 14. We left Jamestown to go to Hartford.

August 18. We were in Beverly [Massachusetts] – Doris was working on her Creative Writing Course which she will give at Green Acre.

National Convention: 1938

The Departure of Grace Ober

As soon as the 1938 Convention opened, I knew why Harlan had asked Lorna to pray for it. There was, he said, a "special reason". Some believers with weak heads for the Administration had been making trouble. They had sent a circular letter criticizing and accusing the National Spiritual {{p330}} Assembly and actually had travelled to many local Assemblies with the intention of broadcasting their views. The Guardian had cabled and had called it a crisis. Before the Convention proceeded, this matter had to be brought out and the delegates had to speak their minds. It took nearly two days.

It was the third time I had been present when this spirit of opposition swept all business out of the way. It made me feel as if the earth might quake and the stars tremble in heaven! The second day I heard that two, older, wonderful Bahá'ís had been mixed up in it. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had known them and had honoured them. That night, in bed, I wept suffering with deep disillusion. But I prayed on till peace came.

After the election on Friday, tension cleared. Earlier one of the women had been handing out a list of names of people to vote for. Now, the voting over, the agitation quieted. But the delegates were muddled and confused and we never did get much business done. We had to learn, belatedly, that Bahá'í laws are to be obeyed. We felt our condition to be a divine rebuke. Then, on Saturday morning, just as we were leaving for lunch, came the news of the death of Munírih Khánúm, wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Ridván Feast was called off and for once, we were still and quiet before the Throne.

At the end of the afternoon session, Grace Ober took her departure to the celestial realm. It was time for reports from the travelling teachers and Grace was called to report of her work in Louisville, Kentucky. She flared up in the brilliant way she had and called for pioneers. She told funny stories and coaxed the people. She took us with her as she described her teaching activities. It was as if her soul were a ransom that we might be awakened. She finished the talk, sat down, and slumped over in her chair.

She was carried out and the Convention continued. Harlan, chairing the session, called for more reports. Dr. True came to the door of the hall and called for healing prayers, and {{p331}} Harlan leapt down from the platform and raced out of the hall. Grace was taken into a small room and the door closed. We could hear Harlan chanting in a powerful voice, the Greatest Name. A Black girl fainted. The Convention sat obediently in its seats, prayed and wept and, at last, experienced unity. Dr. True was addressing us from the doorway, "Friends, will you say the prayer for the departed." I was then standing with my arm around Mabel Ives. It was if an electric shock went through her. But she rallied, and so did Harlan who had exchanged a few words with Grace before she left him.

Another event also marked the 1938 Convention. On the 25th of March 1937, Shoghi Effendi announced his marriage to Mary Maxwell. Her mother, May had come back from Haifa to attend the Convention. The first session was waiting to begin when she and her niece, Jeanne Bolles entered the hall. We stood until they were seated. Now, more than ever, May was our mystery. Whatever had been her inner experience, she had moved away from us into a realm of detachment. At least it seemed that way to me. When I talked to her, I knew no longer how she was feeling.

May seemed to glide, rather than walk, as she moved through the ranks of her friends. She had moved away from us. My instinctive practice of detachment, from the temptation of being dazed by her and thus forgetting God, was a protection. It allowed me to realize that her personality had withdrawn. Someone wrote to me weeks later commenting that she was still "the same May", but I was never to see this. Our paths lay in different directions. My eyes were on her lovingly, from afar, and I was resigned to the distance between us, resigned except for a sadness.

I recalled that May had said once that Lua [Gettsinger], her teacher, was really great because she never deserted a soul to {{p332}} whom she had given birth. She was there as long as that soul needed her.

On the last morning of the Convention, I stood with the other leave-taking Bahá'ís in the corridor of Foundation Hall. May, walking alone, was coming toward us. We stood silent. For a moment she stopped by my side and whispered in my ear, "Doris, our hearts will never be separated!" Even now, I write these words with tears of gratitude and praise to God.

1939 Was Different

I looked at the people in Foundation Hall. So many of them, filling that great nine-sided room. I thought, "Suppose every one of Us should become ablaze and, by the grace of God, drop off all 'our limitations and all sense of the lower self? Could we ever do it?" Already the pressure of the Divine World was painful in its insistence. I noted:

"I am seeing in a few people the apostolic spirit. It flashes suddenly like sunlight on a keen flexible sword. It is not a soft light.

"Saturday was the anniversary of Grace Ober's passing. In the afternoon I was sitting by myself, on one of the seats along the wall. As I sat alone I had the experience of smelling attar of roses. This heavenly fragrance came and went in waves. It wasn't steady. It was a moving fragrance coming in gusts. I looked up at the clock and noted that it was three o'clock. Mabel Ives was sitting as a delegate, and I passed her a note: 'Grace died at this hour a year ago. Please stop the Convention and ask for a prayer mentioning her name.' Mabel stood up, raising her hand with a commanding signal to stop, and called for the prayer. The delegates sat in silent prayer and then quietly went on with their business. The mysterious fragrance faded gently away and I knew that Grace {{p333}} said, "Thank you." About four hours later, the fragrance of attar returned while I was having dinner with Mabel and some friends from Toronto. We were talking about Grace – how, at one of the Conventions of the Depression, the difficult appeal was made for funds for the Temple dome. It was Grace who spoke. She stood with arms raised, hands together above her head and she pleaded for the Temple, "Clothe me, clothe me." That was the year that Fred Schopflocher responded with a gift of $100,000. Again the rose perfume enveloped me. It was incredibly strong. My eyes met those of the Toronto girls. They were having the same experience."

The big thing I got from this Convention was that, at last, the Bahá'ís, in general, were fully awake, dedicated, and hard-working. And that these were very precious days for the immediate spreading of the Teachings.

After Convention I rode with Dorothy Baker to Cleveland. We felt a strong tie between us and she commented that I was like her twin. We did not understand each other particularly well, we just wanted to cry when we heard the other's name mentioned. Dorothy was then a thoroughly awake and radiant maidservant of God, soaring in a continuous and swift flight in the heavenly atmosphere.

I stayed with the Coles in Cleveland and visited with Emogene Hoagg.

These were precious days. 1939 was a boom year of intense activity and fruitful writing. Before going to Convention, I had noted how precious they were. I wrote to Lorna:

[Jan. 1939] "My writing for the Cause is being confirmed efforts meeting with enthusiastic approval. I have six private drawing pupils and two more starting Saturday. Everything seems to move without effort or stress: the writing, the art {{p334}} work, the forming of the Assembly. And why not, if it is the Divine Power that is allowed to manifest?

[Feb. 1939] “We have had fourteen at our last two study classes, all possible prospects. I have had an article on ‘The Bahá’í Faith: What Is It?’ on the first column, first page, of {The Graccian Magazine}, which is. passed out to at least six centres of businessmen who club together to study one another’s ideas. They live in six different towns around here. ‘Time does not fly, it flows.’

“Snowed under with people coming to see us, and with things I have to write. No time...

[March 1939] “After starting this letter to you, the telephone rang and events just tumbled over one another like puppies from 11:00 a.m. to midnight... Life is so strenuous, sometimes I feel all stretched out...

[April 1939] “Since Christmas I have done ten book reviews for the Publicity Committee and four {World Order} articles. I am going to try hard to write six radio talks for Mrs. Morton before Convention, but I am afraid there isn’t time. Have been asked to speak in Geneva and Canadargia, so will dash over and right back for the forming of our Assembly on the 21. What great and wonderful days these are...”

On April 21st, Riḍván, we elected the first Spiritual Assembly of Jamestown. Mabel Ives came down from Toronto to join the celebration.

First International Picnic – July ‘39

We crossed the lake on a steamer. Seventy-two people gathered near Brock’s Monument (Brockville, Ontario); more than half were either new Bahá’ís or newly attracted. Howard, very feeble and greatly aged, came down from Toronto in his {{p335}} longing to meet his Jamestown grandchildren. It seemed as if the living Presence had moved into him, like the Friend into His house. He had lived so much with the Word in his writing of {Portals to Freedom}, this year and last, that, almost unconsciously, he speaks the Word instead of his own language. He took the Jamestown people aside and poured out his love, tenderness, and counsel on all of us. We had invited a middle-aged Syrian rug dealer, Namaan Hadbeh, to go with us. He used to live in Haifa and had met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Howard took him in his arms, called him by his first name and questioned him tenderly. He told all the Jamestown Bahá’ís that he knew all of them by name and was eagerly interested in all of them. He said that he thought the sense of kinship he felt was because of the special closeness that he and I had between us. Howard told them that he prayed every day, for all of them. They loved him. He took down the walls of his heart and gave them his whole life in those brief moments.

The picnic was a typical Ives’ idea. It was a real “get together” in other significant ways, too. There was some consultation and it was agreed that the travel teacher circuit which included Pennsylvania and New York would be extended to include neighbouring Canadian Bahá'í communities and that we would concentrate on exchanging teachers. It was also an occasion for the Bahá'í youth of both countries to meet one another and, at this picnic, the first youth conference was planned. It would be held later in Jamestown. I think that it was at this picnic that I met the youthful Lloyd Gardner and his brother Cliff. They taught me how to make "proper" tea. Another youth, Grace Ober's nephew, was also there – John Robarts. The picnic was truly a cross-border event signalling an increase in shared teaching activity. {{p336}}

Prelude to Pioneering

The sequence of events that led to our becoming Canadian pioneers began in 1939. Howard and Mabel Ives were then living and teaching in Toronto. Because of her enthusiasm, Mabel was a genius at finding work for other Bahá'ís. In July, I wrote to Lorna:

"I have said 'yes' to an, as yet, unofficial proposal to take charge of the Bahá'í booth at the Toronto Fair [Canadian National Exhibition or CNE] for two weeks starting Aug 25th. Mabel Ives says the Committee will write me, offering me a room – in the house with the Ives – and $35.00 to cover other expenses. Rosemary Sala is to be asked also. It seems to be taken out of my hands, with the expenses covered that way, and already, I am anticipating the experience."

With the exception of our teaching trip of 1928 and our visit with the Maxwells in Montreal, I had never been in a Canadian city. I was starry-eyed about the opportunity to serve in a "foreign" land. The Canadian Union Jack flags were floating and, before this, I had known only the 'Stars and Stripes'! And there was a difference in the people which I found charming, a story-book quality. I was to stay at Laura Davis' house at 44 Chestnut Park, where the Ives had a living arrangement and there were other Bahá'í roomers in the three storey brick mansion.

Every morning after breakfast, it was like going out to work, taking a trolley for the long ride to the Fair grounds. In a leisurely way, the public walked past our booth. There was an exhibit of washing machines across the aisle, which represented for us the "worldly things" in contrast to what we had to offer. Against a backdrop of a rising sun, a white model of the Wilmette Temple sat on a table. A table with {{p337}} flowers, cases with Bahá'í books displayed. As each group of stragglers came by, I thought "what will they choose, this life or the next?"

I remember one night when a small group formed opposite the booth. It was led by someone from an evangelical rally. I knew I had cause to be nervous when the "mob" started to move toward the booth. The leader approached and asked me:

“Who is the prophet of the Bahá’ís?”

“Bahá’u’lláh, the Glory of God,” I replied.

“Is Bahá’u’lláh buried?”

“Yes, He died in 1892.”

“But is He still buried?” he demanded.

Fortunately a policeman arrived who ordered the group to move on.

At Chestnut Park I expanded under the loving concern of the four hosts: Howard and Mabel, and Laura and Victor Davis. Another member of the family was Laura’s mother, Mrs. Violet Rumney. There was a painting in the house by Romsey, the famous English artist of the last century – a connection of which her family was proud. Mrs. Romsey was a member of the first Bahá’ís group in Toronto years before George Spendlove moved there.

On the first afternoon I was weary from standing all day at the Exposition and was glad to be back to Chestnut Park. Howard invited me to rest on the couch. Placing pillows lovingly at my head he said, “I have just finished the last chapter of {Portals to Freedom}. How would you like me to read it to you while you rest?” The sound of Howard’s reading voice enjoyed the same effect as Willard’s Washington speech. {{p338}} In a few minutes I was ungratefully asleep. When I awoke with a guilty start Howard was sitting beside me with the palms of his upturned hands raised to receive heavenly blessing as he prayed earnestly that I might be refreshed.

The Hidden Gift

I have said that 1939 was different. Our experience in teaching at Green Acre that year was” special, too. The Green Acre committee had asked Willard and me to consider the subject of {Prayers and Meditations}, a new book of Bahá’u’lláh’s Writings translated by Shoghi Effendi. We had been thrilled by the appearance of Gleanings a few years earlier and now we were being asked to give a week-long course to introduce this new book to the friends, most of whom had not yet seen it. We prepared, from our notes of the Christian mystics, what was meant to be an intellectual introduction to the general subjects of prayer and meditation. Willard had taken a large notebook page and had single-spaced the different names of God mentioned in the book’s invocations.

Green Acre was an ideal place to discuss this book. Bahá’u’lláh’s Writings, as given to us through Shoghi Effendi’s precise choice of words, are poetic. {Prayers and Meditations} beckons some previously unaroused faculty within us to answer the eloquent call of the Words. That faculty awakens to an impression which is not of this world, yet one which has been communicated and transcribed for us on this plane by God Himself. Green Acre’s atmosphere is a reflection of that impression, something special not quite of this world. Here, at Green Acre, was to be found “a draught of soft-flowing waters of Thy knowledge,” on the “shores of the ocean of Thy nearness”. In the pines warbled “the birds of the hearts of them that are nigh unto Thee,” that we “may listen to the melodies of the Dove of Thy transcendent oneness”. At {{p339}} Green Acre were “the wonders of Thy perfect tranquillity,” and the “fragrant breezes of Thy joy,” the perfume which was “the fragrance of the raiment of Thy Revelation”. At Green Acre, if you are not an artist or a poet, you may find yourself wanting to become one.

This was our fourth year with the same people who gathered there, and we were very much at home with them. There was the crowd that had come up from Boston. Louis and Louise Gregory were there and Marguerite Reimer, who one day would marry Bill Sears. We had brought with us a few women from Jamestown who later would become Bahá'ís. Really, this was an extraordinary group, the Green Acre community, and awaiting it was an extraordinary experience.

The classroom filled up at nine o'clock on the morning of the first day. About thirty came. We entered with our notebooks and a copy of {Prayers and Meditations}. I remember Willard, notebook in hand, standing behind my chair. In our preparations we had selected some Writings from the book and distributed them for readings. We began our class speaking rather academically and dryly from our notes. The students scribbled in their notebooks. When I turned to my list of quotations, I decided that, after each reading, we would sit for one or two minutes in silent meditation. And so began our experience of {Prayers and Meditations}.

In the silence that followed each of the readings, an extraordinary power became apparent in the room. It was sensed by many, sensed as a combination of bliss and uneasiness. A sense, a power, that grew and intensified. Marguerite was sitting next to me and our chairs were shaking so much that they were squeaking. The unleashed power of the Word was becoming a group experience. As one of the teachers, I was aware of my responsibility to keep the class from becoming hysterical. It reminded me of some of the old camp meetings we had had as children. I knew that the excitement {{p340}} must be guarded against. I think we were all relieved when we returned to our everyday notes and gave people something that could be copied down and understood.

It was a group of excited people who walked for lunch, up to the Inn. There was much comment about our experience. Some of the Boston people said that what they had experienced was not spiritual but psychic and that we needed to be careful with our investigations. Others said that it was the presence of the Holy Spirit. A friend of ours, who was teaching in the Stanwood Cobb day school, joined our class late. She came in with a raging headache and claimed that it disappeared the minute she joined us.

Another Green Acre visitor was inspired to tell me of an experience she had had with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She remembered that, when He visited the United States, her mother had taken her to see the Master off on the train. She was but a little girl of about seven at the time and was sitting on a stairway which the Master was about to descend. She said that He approached and stepped on her shoulder and that He had not had any weight nor did He hurt her. It was her own experience and she said that, whenever she had doubts about her faith she recalled that memory.

Willard explained that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá tells us not to tamper with psychic forces. Yet the Master had said, “...the power of the Holy Spirit is your assistant. Above and over physical forces, phenomenal forces, the Holy Spirit itself shall aid you.”[^] We talked about these differences.

When I was asked for my opinion of our experience, all I could say was that SOMETHING had come into the room and a power was added which had not been present before. I told them that these stories of people’s reactions are side effects. Let us not become so fascinated with them that we lose sight of the reason. It was the reading of the Word that released {{p341}} the power. Bahá’u’lláh has told us of the power of reading the Word, a Word that is meant to be read aloud. He says:

“Intone, O My servant, the verses of God that have been received by thee, as intoned by them who have drawn nigh unto Him, that the sweetness of thy melody may kindle thine own soul, and attract the hearts of all men. Whoso reciteth in the privacy of his chamber, the verses revealed by God, the scattering angels of the Almighty shall scatter abroad the fragrance of the words uttered by his mouth, and shall cause the heart of every righteous man to throb. Though he may, at first, remain unaware of its effect, yet, the virtue of the grace vouchsafed unto him must needs sooner or later exercise its influence upon his soul.”[^]

As I attached energies to new hopes, the separation from Jamestown was beginning. In November I was back in Canada, scheduled to give talks in Toronto and Hamilton where I was making new friends. The Ives had also asked us to go with them to Memphis, Tennessee, where, it was hoped, I would look after Howard and assist with Mabel’s teaching. In the months ahead, I would be travelling most of the time.

Jamestown was my testing ground. I had had my own spiritual struggles and I had been in the company of spiritual powerhouses. I must have learned something, for now it seemed I was called out for greater service. Martha once wrote to Lucy, “We can’t all be called to be Hands of the Cause. But we can all dedicate ourselves as if we were. “ When I look back I see that every moment in the Faith has been a moment of history, a moment of vital importance. Nothing we ever give to the Faith is enough. So little is given all the time and we are sleepy Bahá’ís called upon to awaken and give all that we have, to donate our spirits to the Faith. {{p342}} The greatness of Dorothy, Martha, and Howard was that they became slaves to giving.

Before leaving on another trip to Hamilton, Lorna had written to me a letter in which she restated our Covenant of the Burning Log – our promise to practice universal love. She had said:

“The whole message now seems to be a call to come out from behind these walls that have held us in, to give of the reality we are – deep within; to be to the world what we are in our hearts with all the tenderness and wonder and shining, all the unexpressed and, un-lived things, like poems – to give them all as Philemon and Baucis gave of their hospitality to a stranger, only to find that, unaware, they had entertained a god.”

I replied by saying:

“I accept it, and I will try to arise to its challenge. Part of my failure to do so is inertia; some of it is pride and withdrawal; some of it is fear of making hurtful contacts with people who fray my wings. I should have to make myself over to live by such lines; they are like a searchlight piercing into the sincerity of all our words and stated goals.”

The Jamestown community was full of problems. Each member faced some serious difficulty in his or her personal life. Before I left again Willard and I said some very intense prayers for them.

Lorna shared in my teaching trips, a silent spiritual partner, my “Bahá’í twin”. If I had any success, certainly she and Willard shared in it. My letters to her tell as much about our relationship and finances as they do of my teaching activities. {{p343}}

Letters To Lorna

On the train [near Buffalo, New York] Feb. 8, 1940:

“...I am full of anticipation. A letter from Hamilton has announced that four new people believe in Bahá’u’lláh. What a privilege is being given to me. If these join, there will be eight and there are several others that I should have thought nearer. I am meeting with about fifteen of them tonight and a Feast is being held.

“I had a letter from the Teaching Committee yesterday, encouraging me in my work and offering more funds to carry on this Canadian work. I am going to support Willard’s going next time. He had one day of vacation left which he could combine with a Sunday. Pray the Prayer for Canada, if you want to help...”

April 15, 1940 – Jamestown

“Thursday night in Hamilton at a pilau supper at which I entertained ten Toronto people and the Hamilton friends. Six people formally joined the Cause making a wee trembling little community of ten. I was pressed for time and sleep when I left. I went, held nine major meetings, got swollen glands, achieved an Assembly, got over the cold, slept an average of about five hours a night, and here I am feeling a little apologetic for skipping out this afternoon. In an hour I'll be hurrying down town. Tonight I'll teach my last class at the College Center. I leave for Convention next week. I am churned inwardly by the new phases of the war. I am haunted by a sense of the dipping motion of airplanes that I saw in a newsreel..." {{p344}}

May 25

"Thanks for sending so promptly, the cheque to Willard. What a hand-to-mouth existence we live – but I don't know how we could do otherwise without curtailing our Bahá'í work. I did not take my private pupils this year because of the many calls out of town. Fourteen Bahá'í trips, my dear! But how glorious to have the opportunity."

May 29

"I am waiting for my train and will soon start to write my customary report to the Ives of my Canadian doings. I had thirteen meetings in ten days, and half a dozen special appointments with people who wanted to talk with me. Every afternoon and evening and some mornings were filled. In all my spare moments I visited with Laura Davis, whose house was my headquarters. I wish you could meet all my wonderful friends in Toronto. I never saw so many adorable people in one place."

September 23

"I am filling every day to brimming over. I keep saying that, don't I? When I went to Toronto this time it was more or less grim duty; my face over my shoulder. I am ashamed of that. I came back in an entirely different mood after the resplendent confirmations at Hamilton."

September 27

"Your pale-green surprise cheque is already adorning my back! I was fortunate enough to get a really warm and good looking fall coat for $ 10.88. I don't know how it happened. {{p345}} The thrift shop in Bigelows. The other coats were almost twice as expensive."

"What a lift! Two days before I had said to Bahá'u'lláh, "If I am going to be clothed adequately, I shall have a little help, dear God!" The ten helped me to reinstate my credit at the store. I had already paid one ten when I returned from Canada. Usually I take care of that with night-school money and now I can go and do my fall teaching work with a feeling of looking all right. I ought not to mind shabby, chilly, spring coats in autumn. I haven't had a good between-season coat since the year we had a good cherry crop and that was 1927 or 1928! Now I am snug and comforted in my very soul. You know what a coat can mean. It was an unbelievable piece of good fortune finding one for ten. It was the only one on the rack and it was perfect.”

Mabel Ives and I continued our separate teaching trips to Hamilton. We had helped the Bahá’í community there to grow close to the required nine for the Assembly, an Assembly which formed in ‘40. I remember that Laura Davis and John Robarts drove from Toronto on a stormy night for the occasion. Mr. and Mrs. McGregor were there too and I happened to ask them what had confirmed them in the Faith. They answered by recalling an earlier Hamilton meeting at which I spoke about life after death – a meeting which I had mentally labelled as “very discouraging” as I had rarely felt less inspired as I did on that night. Mrs. McGregor said, “I always thought that when you were dead, you were dead. But after that meeting I KNEW you weren’t!”

The strength of the Jamestown community was also developing. Freddie Reis had started a class in “Bahá’í Administration” and I held one called “Bahá’í Expression”. It was much like the “Practice in Speaking” sessions that we had had when we were new believers. For this class, however, the {{p346}} practice was in answering questions. One night that spring Audrey, Freddie and Onolee came. There were three seekers who asked some very good questions. The new believers took turns in answering and the anticipated 45 minute class expanded to an hour and a half. It was live wire! Onolee [Eddy] walked home with me and we talked until 2:00 a.m. She was reading every Bahá’í book she could get her hands on and was beginning to dream of being a “pioneer teacher”. She said she would not want to attempt it “without having the facts at her tongue’s end.”

The Death of May Maxwell

I was at another meeting that spring, probably in March. I wrote to Lorna:

“I was at a friend’s house. As I was leaving my hostess brought out a clipping, a New York newspaper notice of May Maxwell’s death in Buenos Aires. It was as if I were under a cold shower. I took a step backward as I felt an icy current flow over me.”

“My hostess witnessed my shock, ‘Did you know her? Oh, I am so very sorry.’

“I hurried home to tell Willard, who said, ‘Whatever we are, May Maxwell helped to make us that way. She certainly influenced our lives.’”

I remember how she whispered to me at the 1938 Convention, “Our hearts will never be separated.” As I write this ,waves of an ocean of ineffable tenderness wash over me from another realm and I know she is near. I do not have to understand this with my mind, but I know that the rainbow swirling of my atoms has expanded and heightened just now. {{p347}} My infant soul seems rocked in its own atoms. It comes and goes as I write of her.

It was with May that we talked often about the “interpenetration of spirits” between friends who are in unity. It was May who taught us that unity was a hidden mystery, “the key to the treasure house to be worn next to our hearts.” It was May who opened our comprehension to the mysteries of the spirit. This was not the last time that I would feel the presence of May and the connection of our hearts.

National Convention – 1940

I went to Convention in May. The Bahá’ís at the 1940 Convention were, as a whole, just their lesser selves, their regular everyday selves, living in the little things they had done for the Cause the last year. They gave signs that unity at home was needed – as it was needed here. The mischief of some troubled person had been the cause of difficulties and our unity was beclouded. It seemed to be that way in many assemblies. The ingredient UNITY was not yet with us in realization. Yet, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said that if even two would unite, they might save us all – release the divine forces.

Except for the stir created by the attendance of Georgie Wiles and a new group of Black Bahá’ís from Nashville the Convention moved slowly. People seemed to be in a daze. There was almost no mention of the war. We did not face that reality and there was a lull over us all.

I had been reading an article, “Out of This Agony” by Horace Holley in the October, 1939 {World Order Magazine}. Horace wrote:

“The vast spectacle proceeds, whilst we fear for the fate of the few we love, or shed tears because one tree falls one home burns, one child lies crushed beneath the wheel...” {{p348}}

But of the prospect of war and of a grief for massive losses of human life Horace said, “Human feeling was not created to mourn the death of a world.” But Bahá’í feeling was.

In the summer I returned to the Canadian National Exhibition to preside, a second year, at the Bahá’í booth. Canada had joined the United Kingdom in entering the war and a new song “There’ll Always Be An England” seemed constantly to be in the air. It was heard everywhere, and everyone seemed happy to be united in a common cause. How the bands played it at the “Ex”!

At the time the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá’ís of the United States and Canada was meeting at the King Edward Hotel. On the last day, the Bahá’ís were invited to an open meeting to discuss the sending of pioneers to complete the first Seven Year Plan. It called for a local assembly in every province and state by the spring of 1944. The members of the National Assembly spoke urgently on this theme and we were invited to respond with comments of our own. Dorothy Baker gave a rousing call to action in which she said the Bahá’ís needed the equivalent of a pentecostal baptism in the Faith. I raised my voice and made a talk in similar vein. I said that we needed a “holocaust which would consume our lesser selves in a spiritual flame.” I made it sound so HOT that I think they laughed. I was a little rattled at my own nerve and, with a red face, collapsed into my seat. Did I see a loving gleam of amusement in Dorothy's eyes?

I shared a hotel room with Dorothy and we talked most of the night. She confided to me how Louie Mathews had told her that she must take off the "Princely Cloak" and put on the "Robe of Light". For her, the robe of light was to mean "freedom from love and hate," a detachment from emotional involvement with people who were attracted to her personality. It represented the lonesome road she had been walking, one of separation for months at a time from her adoring family in Ohio. Dorothy had become a person with a special duty, a special destiny. In her heart was a special kind of martyrdom. She had a martyr's spirit. She had prayed for it years ago in the dome of the Temple. I would write later to Lorna:

"I have concluded that we have to take one role only – the one where we do the most effective work. Dorothy Baker has done that. She is like a candle sacrificing herself to the Light. We had breakfast together in Toronto and again she laid bare her heart to me. She told me about riding home in the car with Frank and Louise and loving them and knowing that again she must leave them. In thinking about it, she unconsciously moaned so that they heard her. Their glad chatter was stilled until she reassured them that she was all right. But Frank knew. He just patted her shoulder."

With that fiery little talk of mine I should not have been surprised when, after our stint at Green Acre, the National Assembly asked me to make a teaching trip to New Brunswick. Amidst great uncertainty about indefinite plans, I left in October and, after a day in Rochester, New York, a day in Hamilton, two in Toronto and two in Montreal, arrived in Moncton on the 22nd.

The presence of May Maxwell joined me when I was in Montreal. Montreal would have been a home-coming, only no one was home. I was feeling the absence keenly, the actual loss of May. All of the Maxwells were gone. Mary was now Rúhíyyih Khánum, wife of Shoghi Effendi. She and her father, Sutherland Maxwell, were living in Haifa. And May, my mentor and close friend, had died that spring, Early in the morning, around dawn, as I felt this absence and pondered the unknown land that was before me and as I wondered about the experiences I would have, she came to me and I heard her whisper again, audibly, "You know, dear heart, our hearts will never be separated."

The weeks in Moncton followed a pattern of social rounds and meetings not unlike those in Hamilton and Toronto. The fledgling community there was the child of Mabel Ives' efforts and the purpose of my own visit was to deepen and consolidate the believers. I wrote to Willard,

"My personal work with the Bahá'ís absorbs a great deal of attention. They pass me around and around like a box of candy and it is like a perpetual love feast. I am associating with them constantly, praying for them and trying to lift them all into a self-sufficient band who will do their own teaching. A number of the people here are natural born teachers...”

With some, the practice of universal love would be confirmed. The practice was not limited to the enlisted members of the Bahá’í community. Leila Wells joined the Cause and, soon after, wrote to me of how she saw the attraction of others to the Faith. She said, “not for anything that we of ourselves could do, but just that the light might be so bright I that the lamp would not be obscured.”

I stayed with different people in Moncton, but 32 Ralph Street, the home of the Gearys, would become headquarters. Here was an attraction of kindred spirits. Irving had a talented subtle turn of wit, a talent possessed also by Willard. I felt that I had been bottled up and serious for too long and we spent our first afternoon together in delightful gales of laughter. We enjoyed much companionship and had an intimate exchange of personal histories. We laughed and we cried. I found Irving and Grace to be the loveliest people and took to calling them the “Dearys”. {{p351}}

Being with the Gearys would be a confirmation of another sort, a confirmation that was to be the start of a special Canadian relationship. As had Leila, Grace described her experience in a letter she wrote to me.

“I tell you that I have had a spiritual renewal and you tell me that you have been evoking power through prayer. But I think what has happened has been my spiritual birth into the Cause. For three years I have sincerely believed the Teachings, I have tried to live them but I see now it has been a cold, formal, intellectual acceptance and only vaguely and at rare intervals has my heart been stirred. I remember hearing Mabel Ives speak of someone who had suddenly become a ‘flaming Bahá’í’ and wondering rather wistfully how that miracle was accomplished and then concluding that things like that happened to some people but not to me. Then last week came that rushing Tide of Spirit that flooded my heart and melted the ice of indifference and swept away the mud of self, and now prayer is a reality. The Cause is real and everything is bathed in a new light. The winter of my spirit is over and spring has come. And now Irving and I are able to ascend to that plane together and we are truly united at last. When I surrendered to your love, I opened every door in my heart. There is no nook or cranny that does not belong to you. If you find any riches there you must help me to bring them to the surface, that they may be used in the service of Bahá’u’lláh for all that I have or am is dedicated to His Cause.

“Sometimes I tremble when I think of where this experience may lead me. I am so weak and feeble. But I have put my hand in yours and where you go I will dare follow.”

There were brief trips to Saint John and Halifax. Six of us piled into a car and went to Halifax for two nights. It was more a scouting trip of looking up the believers, sandwiched {{p352}} between a lot of driving and my marvelling at the landscape. I remember leaving at dawn, seeing the ships in the harbour and thinking that I should sometime go back to Halifax. Somehow I felt the field of Bahá'í work was greater there.

I returned to Jamestown in December to find letters from Mabel and Dorothy insisting that I go to Memphis right after the New Year. I was all “hollowed out”; and I seemed to have few feelings about it one way or another. I remembered a tradition attributed to Muḥammad, “Pass through this world as if you were already dead.”

Letter to Lorna: Dec. 24, 1940

“Willard is working tonight and I have been trimming my little Christmas Tree. I am not in a ‘merry’ mood this Christmas, I have to admit it. I have been sad today almost to tears. The holiday time makes so much more poignant the world conditions, the confused and wilful humanity, even the Bahá'ís themselves. Why is it that there are not others as qualified to go way down there to Memphis? Why must it be me, when my Canadian teaching work in Hamilton and Toronto will suffer by my not returning to them after this long absence? I long to answer Hamilton's request, and yet I must turn and go the other way. Dorothy Baker, Mabel Ives, and Horace Holley are so sure, what else can I do but comply? The final arrangements are not made but I think I'll be leaving the end of the first week in January to go first to Cleveland, which I promised in October, then to Lima to confer with Dorothy. My days at home with Willard are so precious and so fleeting. He is so perfect.

“Dear Willard, he showers such love upon me because he feels I may be leaving him soon. He follows me around the house. The other night I ran upstairs to get a book and he came with me, just to go along. {{p353}}

“It is interesting how my non-Bahá'í friends are flocking around me and wanting me. I could lead an intensely social life, with very fine intelligent people, if I had the time to spend in Jamestown...”

Preparations

The Guardian had written to us,

“As to racial prejudice, the corrosion of which, for well nigh a century, has bitten into the fibre, and attacked the whole social structure of American society, it should be regarded as constituting the most vital and challenging issue confronting the Bahá'í community at the present stage of its evolution.”[^]

Memphis was called “the Gateway to the South”. Its racial situation had been described as “unusually acute.” I was briefed on a situation which found two Bahá'í groups: a White one and a Black one. My assignment was to bring them together into one administrative unit. Memphis would be a real test of sincerity.

My Memphis assignment began and ended with visits with Dorothy Baker. From Jamestown I went first to Cleveland. An afternoon fireside was given at the Coles' and that evening I shared the platform with Louis Gregory at the Bahá'í Room downtown. Many of the Cleveland friends were Black and were eager to offer their prayers for my work in Memphis. The next evening I took the Nickel Plate Line #9 to Lima, Ohio. I had a lovely visit. That night Frank Baker laid the table in the breakfast nook with crackers, five kinds of cheese and coffee. And there was "Heavenly Hash" – a concoction of jams. Frank Baker was very human, down-to-earth, and in a wonderful expansive and beaming mood – a mood which was so contagious. The Dorothy of that night was so much the {{p354}} homebody. She had all of Frank's qualities, but she was the one who had to sacrifice them. This night, however, she was warm and responsive to friendship and thriving on her own hospitality. It was a view of her that few had seen.

Dorothy and I shared a room with twin beds and talked until 3:00 a.m. The next day she and I escaped from the lively house for another two or three hour conference and prayer session as we drove in the sunshine throughout surrounding countryside to Mother Beecher's grave site. Dorothy, who took a special interest in the Memphis situation, told me a little of what I was about to enter and the problems she perceived. Dorothy was so wonderful to me. She fluffed me up by calling me her "superior officer". She said she was Mullá Ḥusayn and I, Quddús! In her humility she really meant it. She saw such a vision of me while I thought of myself as "Lot's wife," insecure in my capacities to give to the Cause in this soul-stirring field. I had to put on my armour and go bravely into the battle and, to do so, I had to be detached. I had to be a real Bahá'í.

Horace Holley came to Lima for supper on the last night of my visit. He discussed with me the Memphis situation before going to the Hotel where he gave a brilliant talk to about 100 people. It would have been a classic had it been transcribed into a printed article. I left early and caught the train for Memphis. It would be an 8 Y2 hour run with a stopover in St. Louis. Lima had been an out-of-the-way and costly routing. But now I economized by renting a pillow and taking a day coach. In Memphis, Howard and Mabel met me at the station.

The First Day – Tuesday, January 14, 1941

Carlotta Pittman and another lady came with a car and took me to a panel discussion of H. G. Wells' {Bill of Rights}. {{p355}} Before I knew it, I was seated in the front of the Church Women's Council room with the five others on the panel! Before us were about 100 fine-looking southern representatives and the minister. For me it was "sink or swim". I plunged into the discussion, offering Bahá'í-ish remarks and making a hit with the liberal minister. He asked me if I would like to be his secretary and said that he needed someone "on her toes intellectually" and, as he put it, "full of the idea of oneness." I could not accept, but I did agree to address his Council in a month's time. I followed up by going to his church the next Sunday.

I was soon to meet the White Bahá'í group. Three of the seven came from a Unitarian background, one had been a Jew, and it did not seem to me that the others had been anything. Most of these people had been taught by Mabel. This was her group. A Feast was held at the apartment of Miss Pittman, a retired school teacher and sister of a judge. Mrs. Kelly was there. She had a big house and she was willing to use it for future meetings. Mrs.-Clara Keller who had gone with Mabel to the Black business college was present also. Mrs. Bogan, the newest member, was ill and facing an operation. Miss Johanna Zimmerman was the first Memphian Bahá'í of Mabel's group. She told me at this meeting that she had given the Faith her "academic approval," but after a year in the Cause hadn't found any life or heartfelt excitement. After that first meeting I thought all of the White Bahá'ís were in that condition. The other missing member was Alvin Blum, a travelling salesman who was out of town.

Some decisions were made. Their regular Tuesday-night meetings were to be turned over to me and I was to give them the McKay course in comparative religion and in {Prayers and Meditations}. They had been reading together the {Kitáb-i-Íqán} and had not really been enjoying it. It was decided also that those interested in an afternoon study class in Bahá'í {{p356}} metaphysics would gather for tea that next Thursday, at Mrs. Florence Kelly's. During the whole time of this Feast no mention was made of the Black Bahá'ís.

Mabel departed a day or so later and I was left to care for Howard and to carry on the Bahá'í work. I soon realized that Mabel's trip to Little Rock was an important teaching campaign and that it could not have happened without me or someone else coming here to look after Howard. Her pioneer venture in the south was just the sort of thing the Guardian would have stressed most. If I had not done another thing but just keep house so that Mabel, with a free mind, could open up the southern cities, I would have been giving Bahá'u'lláh sufficient service. I was getting more and more into the habit of accepting service by envisioning my response not as one of reacting to a person or a committee, but to Bahá'u'lláh Himself. In that way I found it easier to render a full and agreeable service. At first I tried to put my heart completely into the care of Howard, whose delicate health made him so dependent. Something could have happened at any time to snap his hold on life. I prayed that, should such an emergency occur, my chicken heart would turn into that of a lion. I told Willard to remember the position of this man who had taught us the Faith and I asked him to see in all the housework chores he was doing in Jamestown, the things I was now doing for Howard in Memphis.

To Lorna:

"I have been desperately homesick. I' am busy building bridges to a number of people but when I get there it will be merely to deliver a gift and go. I have decided that I am on a kind of Fast and these attacks of desperate loneliness are hunger pangs of the heart. {{p357}}

"I had a letter from Willard today and its tenderness nearly capsized my frail craft. I said to Howard "Should I pray to have this homesickness taken away?" 'No' he said. I guess he is right. I know I am winning through to a new sensitiveness. When I sit quiet for a moment, my 'particles' begin to float and I sway as if on a gentle swelling tide. I feel as if a slow fire were burning in my human self. Howard is right. I will not try to extinguish that fire. 'Create in the hearts of Thy beloved, the fire of Thy love, that it 'may turn away the thought of everything save Thee.' I know what to pray for. The ME dies hard!"

My first contact with the Black group was through Professor Henderson who conducted a Business College. Call it innocence or call it ignorance, I wasn't aware that I was being tested by him. I called him, on several occasions, to arrange a meeting and was put off. I persisted and, finally, he offered a date. He told me that he would send a car for me. Well, when the day arrived a car was sent indeed. It was a dilapidated and battered hulk of a taxi that probably would compare to the one driven by Amos 'n Andy. The chauffeur was a Black cabby in shirt sleeves. I got in and rode in regal style to the Business College.

Thirty or so bright and neat girls were tapping away at typewriters to the strains of victrola rhythms. Stepping into the school was like stepping onto a well-propped stage. It was positively theatre! Ruby Jenkins, the secretary, greeted me and took me to Professor Henderson's office. Here was a dapper person, more than well dressed, with a flower in his lapel and a white silk kerchief tied in a bow under his chin. He introduced me to the Dean and then had Ruby escort me around the school, upstairs and down. It had been waxed until it shined and was the model of cleanliness. I saw the rooms in the girls' dormitory. Back downstairs they put on an exhibition {{p358}} of typing coordinated to music. It sounded exactly like tap dancing. As a show alone, this tour was worth the price of a ticket. The Professor joined us and introduced me to all of the students and I made a short Bahá'í talk. I remember how bright some of the faces looked and how at ease and intimate I felt with them all. Professor Henderson then donned a light overcoat, throwing it around his shoulders like a cape and put on a wide-brimmed hat. All of us were marshalled outside to pose for what seemed like an hour of picture taking.

When we went back in, Professor Henderson played and sang some delightful music for me until a few of the girls served for us a sumptuous repast in the office. There was beefsteak, sandwiches, tea, toast, nuts and candy. We were joined by the Dean, Ruby Jenkins, and Corella Grey. Corella was one of the teachers. Ruby and Corella would be two of the students in my Bahá'í classes. Only one knife had been brought, so the Professor cut up all of our beefsteak and buttered all of our toast. We called it the "family knife".

Then we got into a real discussion of the Black situation in Memphis. Both men were highly intelligent. Professor Henderson was a member of the Urban League and said that, if I desired, he would introduce me to the secretary. The Dean was a member of an interracial committee to which prominent citizens of both races belonged. He told me that he could arrange for me to speak at a Black high school where there were thousands. I was tempted by having too many doors open for me. I realized that, with time enough, I could spend all my time in teaching the Blacks. At any rate my job was not to throw my energies to one side exclusively. We arranged for a class that I would give in “Bahá’í Qualifications,” a small informal class which I would continue each week until the Regional Committee was satisfied with the Black students’ eligibility for enrolment. I would learn later that I had passed my tests. In my ignorance I had not seen {{p359}} them as tests at all. It was all matter of fact for me to accept the offer of the taxi, for me to have my photograph taken in public with them and, especially, to “break bread” together. I would discover that some of these things had not been done before in Memphis. The next week I went back and gave my first class on the station of the Báb.

To Lorna: January 22

“I’ve just got back from a meeting [with the White Bahá’ís] in which I have been talking all the evening on metaphysics. A nice old lady and her daughter brought me home, and as I left the car, the old lady said innocently, ‘The Negroes are a lower race. God created them to be servants. It says so in the Bible.’”

I continued my consolidation work with the separate Bahá’í groups. I found through my social activities, many doors opening for teaching. I worked also on developing relationships with the individual friends.

Grace Bogan

Mrs. Grace Bogan was a new Bahá’í, not too well established in her faith, something that could be said as well of most of the other, older, believers. Grace was from Mississippi and well rooted in a southern tradition of fear of the Black race, a fear that was amplified by a natural desire to protect two attractive daughters. Grace would soon learn that to join the Bahá’í Faith was to invite contact with her source of fear.

Grace was ill and, before meeting her, I considered her to be “out of the running” for active participation. I visited her and said healing prayers for her. She told me she had “inside” trouble that she had ignored for some years. It was cancer. {{p360}} From time to time she would be examined by the doctors and the examinations would leave her in pain.

She called me a few days after my visit. It seemed the doctors had examined her again and had found the cancer had reached an acute stage. They told her that it demanded immediate attention. She telephoned me to ask for prayers, hoping that I would encourage her to use the prayers as a substitute for medical treatment. Somehow I was given credit for getting her to go to the hospital. While ostensibly giving her an examination while she was under anesthetic, the doctors cut her open and removed some of the diseased tissue. After a brief stay, Grace went home and the doctors gave her a favourable report. “No cancer!” The results of the biopsy had the physicians puzzled. Not only had the growth disappeared but Grace reported no pain from the surgery, although earlier examinations had left her distressed. Word of my efforts and the confirmation of the prayers spread. One of the friends told me that if this healing were the only thing that happened as a result of my coming to Memphis, then that alone was enough to justify the effort and sacrifice involved.

To Willard:

“I go through every door that opens a crack, even a hospital door as today [with Grace Bogan]. Everything is considered a possible lead when you are in the employ of Bahá'u'lláh.”

Mrs. Watkins

Mrs. Watkins was another seemingly isolated Bahá'í with whom I spent time. She had been ill when I first arrived and had been “unseeable.” She telephoned later and gave me a date on which to pay her a visit. As it turned out she was a {{p361}} doctor's wife and, if I remember correctly, had been educated at A & M College and knew Walter and Ida Buchannan. Both she and her husband had been taught by Louis Gregory so many years ago; they must have been children then. I began to see Mrs. Watkins as a vital link and prayed that she would use her influence to encourage the friends at the Business College. I offered to give her daughters drawing lessons on a weekly basis. For me it was so important to set up regularly scheduled events – my meetings with the Whites, my classes at the Business College, and this, the drawing lessons. That was how I fought disorganization. After my first visit with Mrs. Watkins, I wrote to Willard:

“This sense of belonging to the ‘untouchables’ does devastating things to the Coloured psychology – Jim Crow regulations and • all the rest! It is insidious, takes away self-respect, and the sense of responsibility that is part of self-respect and personal validity.”

The Feast of Dominion – Mulk

On Friday, February 7th, I went to the Feast. It was a White one, of course, but it signalled a turn of events. I was given the floor and asked to talk on Bahá'í Administration. The people were attentive, intellectually mature and had no difficulty with the words I was using. For some, however, the concepts would later prove difficult to swallow. Essentially, this is what I told the White Memphian Bahá'ís:

“The Feast is more than a community meeting. It is an Institution, a convention of spirit in which each member is a delegate, regardless of whether he is on the Assembly or not. Each member has the opportunity to bring forward recommendations to the local Assembly, or through its Secretary, to the National Assembly. Local Bahá'í administration, as it {{p362}} could come to exist in Memphis, could be a small working model of the World State. ‘Abdu'l-Bahá had said, ‘Those Assemblies are the emblems of the Supreme Concourse and the prototypes of the congregations of the spirits in the Kingdom of Abhá.’”[ ]

[^ ] [{Bahá'í Scriptures}, #889, p. 472.]

When I began to talk about true Bahá'í consultation being a form of prayer in which the group begs for the power of Bahá'u'lláh to reveal His Will, the members realized that we had not started with prayer. Someone then read the prayer for those who take counsel together and it produced a deeply spiritual effect. After the prayer, I spoke about the qualifications of those who take counsel together, and the effect deepened in intensity. Then came the questions about forming the Assembly: "Should we have an Assembly this spring? Are we ready for it?" I gave them the list of believers that Marion Little from the Regional Committee had sent. The list included Professor Henderson and Mrs. Watkins. I told them that if there were nine eligible Bahá'ís at the beginning of the administrative year, April 21st, the formation became a necessity and that the National Assembly would expect it. 'Abdu'l-Bahá had concluded his comment about the Assemblies by saying, "Avail yourselves of the opportunities of this time, neither let the occasion slip by unheeded."[^] Someone then asked, "Could we hold Feasts separate from the Coloured members?" The consultation pursued this point, cautiously and gently and to the extent that they were able to think it through for themselves.

[^ ] [{Bahá'í Scriptures}, #889, p.472.]

The concept foremost in this discussion was this: that Bahá'í Institutions are divine, and that nothing can injure or retard the Cause as much as a disregard of its requirements; that the institution, in its form, centres in the Feast as an inclusive community meeting. It is through this institution that we demonstrate the oneness of mankind to a sceptical world {{p363}} made up of warring nations. It is through the Feast that we prove that we are not just one more selective society but a unit truly composed of diverse elements which have learned to function together. In its spirit the "breaking of bread" together with a feeling of love and fellowship becomes a sacrament, something which would represent the appearance of the New Day in our southern states...

Then I went around and asked each member, one by one, for an expression of feeling. Clara Keller and Johanna Zimmerman were the first to respond. "If we are going to call ourselves Bahá'ís, let us BE Bahá'ís." Some of the others were worried. Decisions were made however. They were:

1. The Assembly would be formed if there were nine believers of any colour.
2. A suitable place of meeting would be found and all Bahá'ís would be notified of administrative activities.

I went home and prayed.

The following Tuesday I was back at the Business College, conducting my class in "Bahá'í Qualifications". My lessons focused on the Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and its provisions. In those days the reading of the Will was a prerequisite to becoming a Bahá'í.

Professor Henderson asked me about the forming of the Assembly and the eligibility of the three people studying with me. I told him that I expected them all to be eligible and that I expected the Assembly to form. I had written to Willard:

“One girl has not been able to attend the classes, but the other two are stars, Irene Gleason and Corilla Grey. I am {{p364}} proud of them. We are sailing right into Administration full tilt; going to put on a trial consultation next week.”

With Howard

From my Diary:

“I am out to make use of this opportunity to harvest the late autumn crop of the wisdom of Howard Ives. I offer him some provocative questions as we meet at mealtime and I pray silently while he answers. At times I take down a note or two. I have great faith in his inspiration. He has always had the ability to open new worlds to me and I know that it was written in the stars that I should have had the bounty of being with him again.

“I will try to reconstruct with some of my own comments a conversation I had with him the other night, beginning with ‘What is the love of God – our love for God?’ My sense of his answer is that God is for us a sense of the atmosphere of the Manifestation. We yearn to be in that atmosphere and, when it is attained, rise to an Nth degree of elation.

“Then I asked, ‘Where does our love for people come in?’ He said that, in our fellow men, we see our Master’s face. That when we attain to the love of another that relationship is a symbol of our life on the next plane of existence, a foretaste of the joys and release that will be ours. It transports us to heaven: He quoted from Gleanings, that knowing our own selves is the same as knowing Himself: and that this can also be true if we really know the reality of another soul. In other words, if we love that soul, it becomes the mirror of the qualities of the Beloved.

“I said, ‘Should we expect to love all people alike?’ He said, ‘Certainly not!’ There are as many kinds of love as there are people. Then he quoted the {Baghavad Gita} to the effect that {{p365}} ‘if you lose discrimination, you lose everything.’ Everyone speaks to us in a different way and reveals a different degree of reality. I suppose destiny determines who shall speak to us in the most thrilling of voices. The quality of our love, says Howard, is determined by our loss of the consciousness of self. If we can lose ourselves in the object of our affection, be it an intermediary human spirit or the Divine Beloved, we merge or fuse ourselves with it. The loss of self is that fluidity we mention – the softening of outlines, evanescence. The mystics sought thus to merge and lose themselves when they meditated on ‘a little thing the quality of an hazel nut.’

“Then he told the story about Grace Ober’s conversation with an elderly lady. The woman said: ‘I hear that the Bahá’ís believe in free love.’

Grace: ‘We do!’

Lady: ‘Oh!’

Grace: ‘Do not mistake me. I said love, not lust.’

Upsetting the Apple Cart

Believing myself to be in accord with the decisions arrived at the last Feast, I told the friends that I intended to host the Feast of Loftiness (Alá) at the Ives’ and that I would be inviting the Black believers. I felt supported by the National Assembly, especially after receiving a letter from Horace Holley in which he said:

“The situation in Memphis seems to be unusually important as it is part of the fundamental race work being done in the southern states, and therefore our success in Memphis is vital to the progress of the Cause.” [Feb. 24]

Two days before the Feast I was invited to dinner at the home of two White Bahá’ís. The husband had been ill and had not attended any of the Feasts since I had arrived. The p366 subject of the Feast came up. “Out of the question!” he insisted. The “breaking of bread” with the Blacks, he said, “will ruin us and the Cause.” And as far as forming the Assembly went, “we should not try it until we have 1,000 members.” And he meant White members. I began to explain some of the principles of administration that I had shared at the Feast. His wife piped in and said that she realized that she could not be a Bahá’í because she could not accept any authority other than her own self; no other authority whatsoever, even if it came from God. A third member was also present, who, although she had earlier expressed support for the spiritual principles, now stood behind the husband and wife. I was shocked by her present change of attitude and denial. A division was beginning to crystalize as these three people thought that my presentation of Bahá’í Administration was simply one of my personal interpretation. For me the situation was made even more delicate because these were people who had been taught by Mabel and were loyal to her. The situation would put Howard between two fires: Mabel and me.

Prayers had always been an essential, but extra efforts were needed now. I wrote to Lorna:

“I am having one of my intense prayer times – two or three hours each night after going to bed. I am able to go a little earlier than at home. I am praying for a spiritual heat that will fuse these diverse racial elements. It will take a spiritual bonfire...

“I have Martha Root’s picture (1938) propped up where it makes her my daily companion. Her eyes and smile speak to me and test my sincerity. I doubt if any going-forth will ever strike as hard as this one has...” p367

Since the beginning, Willard and the Jamestown community, Lorna, Dorothy, and a number of others had been praying with me for these efforts. I had told Willard, "Don't forget the prayer squads are pioneering with me right over the top of the colour line. I am holding my breath in order to maintain a nicety of balance, as if I were walking on a very narrow path and must not fall off on either side." I felt particularly vulnerable now and wired Jamestown for additional prayers from the squads there. And then I wrote to Horace.

"Last night I was invited to the [ ] home for dinner and [ ] was also present... Mrs. [ ] said that my proposal to invite the Coloured friends to the Feast had met with Mr. [ ] emphatic disapproval. He came in at this point and we reviewed the necessity for preparing our community to take the two steps mentioned above (the two decisions from the previous Feast), a need which we now had to face because of the approach of April 21st. [ ]'s comments were:

"1) that any such moves would be ruinous to the social and business position of the White Bahá'ís,

"2) that no inkling of this situation was made clear to him when his name was included on the list of Bahá'ís...

"...He said that they had known of the coloured believers but had thought of them as a group that could go on indefinitely operating separately. Also that they had supposed that the time of forming the Assembly was optional, and that it was much too soon to form it.

"Miss [ ] and Mr. and Mrs. [ ] were unanimous in their support of all these ideas, all elaborating the point that the 'breaking of bread' at the Feast is social dynamite, that it would inevitably become known and that the prospects of the Cause in Memphis would be blighted. For at least an hour {{p368}} they suggested alternatives including asking the Guardian's permission to indefinitely postpone the Assembly.

"The legal end of it was brought up. Anything, they said, may constitute a 'nuisance' according to definition by a judge. Someone offered to look in the city records to find examples of cases where Coloured-White association has been so considered. If we can prove this point, they said, would it not be our obligation to comply with the law (written or unwritten) of the City of Memphis? Please answer this point, Horace. I admit that the race situation here is very bad. The enclosed clipping from yesterday's paper is an example of the unfortunate publicity that has been in the papers recently.

"[Heading of article was 'Preacher of Racial Equality Shooed from Jail and City'. They had kept him locked up for fourteen days without a formal charge.]

"...[since] four out of seven registered White believers here were not qualified by understanding or belief to function under our Administration, may I emphasize what seems to me the necessity for tightening up on the membership qualifications of those still under group administration..."

The Jamestown friends wired back, “Render thy Lord victorious by that which is within thy Power.” I had also written to Mabel and shared the situation with her. Howard, who was deeply upset by this turn of events, agreed to meet with the group. I dropped the idea of hosting the interracial Feast until I heard back from Horace, and I went to the Black Bahá’ís and told them that I had been unable to arrange it. On March 2nd we held another White Feast. We sat there bright and cordial, but as dead souls avoiding argumentative issues. The atmosphere would not lift. {{p369}}

From my diary – March 12:

“Yesterday I was reading ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Will with two of my Coloured students and I came to this:

‘...Should other peoples and nations be unfaithful to you show your fidelity unto them, should they be unjust toward you, show justice towards them, should they keep aloof from you attract them to yourselves, should they show their enmity be friendly towards them, should they poison your lives sweeten their souls, should they inflict a wound on you be a salve to their sores. Such are the attributes of the sincere!’[^]

“I saw something in their faces and my eyes filled with tears. I said, ‘Girls, these things have already happened to you because of racial prejudice, isn’t that so?’ And they said ‘Yes.’ We had a deep talk and they told me they were ready to accept the Bahá’í consciousness and to live by that rule. It was beautiful, that talk. None of us will forget it...”

The response of the National Assembly came, one which re-emphasized the import of the Guardian’s statements about “The Most Challenging Issue” and the need to push on toward consolidation. According to Horace, there was no alternative. We had received also, the support of Miss Nellie Roche in Nashville. She wrote that they had ten Black and five White Bahá’ís there and that they had had Feasts in the homes of the Blacks because the White members weren’t ‘keeping house’. She also said that they were having an interracial Naw-Rúz. I called Mrs. [ ] and asked her if the White group could meet at their house and read the statements prepared by Horace. She said “No.” It had all been settled as far as she was concerned. She and her husband had never intended to join a “legislative religion” and it was necessary for them to remain “free agents”. {{p370}}

A few days later Clara and I went to visit Professor Henderson. I shared with him, the Jamestown telegram and he shared a letter he had recently received from Louis Gregory. This sharing was a moment of unity of spirits, made even more magical when the Professor began to recite:

Bowed by the weight of centuries he leans Upon his hoe and gazes on the ground,

The emptiness of ages in his face, And on his back the burden of the world. Who made him dead to rapture and despair, A thing that grieves not and that never hopes, Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox? Who loosened and let down this brutal jaw? Whose was the hand that slanted back this brow? Whose breath blew out the light within this brain? Is this the Thing the Lord God made and gave To have dominion over sea and land; To trace the stars and search the heavens for power; To feel the passion of Eternity? Is this the Dream He dreamed who shaped the suns And pillared the blue firmament with light? Down all the stretch of Hell to its last gulf There is no shape more terrible than this More tongued with censure of the world's blind greed More filled with signs and portents for the soul More fraught with menace to the universe.

What gulfs between him and the seraphim! Slave of the wheel of labor, what to him Are Plato and the swing of Pleiades? What the long reaches of the peaks of song, The rift of dawn, the reddening of the rose? Through this dread shape the suffering ages look; {{p371}} Time's tragedy is in that aching stoop; Through this dread shape humanity betrayed, Plundered, profaned and disinherited, Cries protest to the Judges of the World, A protest that is also prophecy.

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands, Is this the handiwork you give to God, This monstrous thing distorted and soul-quenched? How will you ever straighten up this shape; Touch it again with immortality; Give back the upward looking and the light; Rebuild in it the music and the dream; Make right the immemorial infamies, Perfidious wrongs, immedicable woes?

O masters, lords and rulers in all lands, How will the Future reckon with this Man? How answer his brute question in that hour When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world? How will it be with kingdoms and with kings –

With those who shaped him to the thing he is –

When this dumb Terror shall reply to God, After the silence of the centuries?[^]

[^] [Edwin Markham, {The Man with the Hoe and Other Poems}, (New York, Doubleday & McClure Company, 1899) p. 15. “The Man with the Hoe” was written after seeing Millet’s painting of the same name.]

It was a beautiful and inspired recitation. We were all elated and when I rose to leave, I asked him, “Professor Henderson, may we bring our Feast to you at six o’clock a week from today [Thursday, March 20th]?” He agreed. Corilla Grey, one of the teachers at the Business College and one of my students signed her enrolment card that day. {{p372}}

The announcement was given. The Feast of Naw-Rúz for the Memphian Bahá’ís of both races would be held at Professor Henderson’s Business College.

The time was approaching when Marion Little would be coming to test my students and to evaluate their eligibility for Bahá’í membership. She inspired within me a fear of being disappointed because she carried with her the power to kill these efforts. Here she was, a society woman and looking very much like one, in a very correct dark suit and stylish hat. This was the woman who took my students and grilled them with questions about the Faith and its Administration. Howard came to hear Marion's report. He comprehended the situation and shared Marion's unspoken concerns. Loyal to Mabel and fearing the downfall of my hopes, he summoned me and said, "You know that 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said that no sincere effort is ever lost. No matter what happens, you musn't feel too badly about how things work out." We waited. When Marion came back to us, she told us that she had to accept the Black girls as Bahá'ís. There was no doubt. They all knew what they were getting into. But what I remember most was Marion herself. As we left, this woman so properly and conservatively dressed danced down the street, responding to a spontaneous and ecstatic heart.

What was lost in the White group was gained in the Black. Dr. Watkins said that he would "go with us 100 per cent," and that, if necessary, he would sign another card. He had believed in Bahá'u'lláh for seventeen years after hearing about the Faith from Louis Gregory. I went to Grace Bogan, who was entrenched in the social values of the "old south", and had doubts about her ability to accept these new values. I gave her a copy of "Bahá'í Procedure" and told her that, when she had read it, she would know whether she should attend and continue to call herself a Bahá'í. {{p373}}

On the day of the Feast I called the White members and • reminded them of the exact hour. The girls from the Business College and I planned the details and went out and bought refreshments to be delivered to the school. Dr. and Mrs. Watkins came to help us set up the tables and to prepare sandwiches and a fruit salad. Alvin Blum came back from a long trip. Clara and Johanna came. Surprise of surprises, Grace Bogan came. Counting Howard and myself, there were twelve confirmed adult Bahá'ís and two youth members. Howard said a prayer and the silence persisted as we 'broke bread' together. After the feasting, the reading of messages from absent friends, the taking of a group photograph, reading from the sacred Writings and music, members of the Bahá'í Community and future Assembly of Memphis elected temporary officers. We discussed the Nineteen-day Feasts, the National Fund, and the obligations of the Local Spiritual Assembly.

My job was over. The amalgamation of White and Black groups had happened and we discovered that we were not oil and water. We had mixed and were all enriched by that event. The evening was not exuberant, but the flow of the spirit was authentic and many of us were quiet in the significance of our act. After all, this was history.

Grace Bogan called me the next day and said, "When you saw me there, what did you think?" She told me that she had followed my advice, read the book and had prayed for guidance. The answer had come. She told me how her inner voice had said, "Bahá'u'lláh has done so much for you, now you must do something for Him!" For her, there was no longer any doubt. It was not only tradition that she had to put aside, but her fear of Blacks and the rejection of White society. She put that fear aside. We "fear no one save God". I would meet

Grace in a year's time, as a delegate to the National Convention. {{p374}}

The Memphis community was now one and the Assembly was on its way. The credit needs to be shared with Georgie Wiles. One day I lunched with Alvin Blum. He had known Georgie very well and told me about her sudden and almost incomprehensible death. (She died from a hemorrhage from a relatively simple operation.) Alvin said, "She had reached her limit on this earth." As he was telling me this, I remembered suddenly, how Georgie had begged me to come to Tennessee to work with her. I told Alvin, "Georgie Wiles is still working in the southern states!" With my prayers, her confirming influence had found a channel.

I left Memphis on the 28th and met Alvin Blum in Nashville. He drove me across the state of Kentucky to Cincinnati. It was a beautiful trip on a bright day. The Race Amity Committee was meeting there and I was to report on my work in Memphis. They were thrilled, and I received from the National Assembly a letter expressing their great appreciation of my "remarkable piece of teaching work." A work assisted by my prayer squads.

Dorothy was at that meeting and we spent together another night in conversation, picking up where we had left off two months ago. As we lay down in the hotel room, it filled with the fragrances of spring flowers. Neither of us was wearing perfume, but for an hour we inhaled a divine aroma.

I later went with her to Lima and I remember a day when, after driving around, we returned to the house to rest. At the end of that time Dorothy arose and prayed the long obligatory prayer. I watched her until I could bear it no more and I lay blinded by my tears. Something was happening to Dorothy as she prayed. She explained later that, through her own tears, she had come to know the meaning of the tears of adoration that the Báb had shed when He addressed His Lord. {{p375}}

In her own strange way, Dorothy was offering me a love in that far clime where she had her being. Martha Root had turned to me too, giving me her most intimate heart. She had wept in my arms and I had comforted her. Literally, I had laid my hand on May Maxwell's heart. In thinking over these great gifts of friendship with the chosen ones of God, I realize that Bahá'u'lláh has used this way of awakening me. Certainly I have never been worthy of equal association with those who have chosen the station of martyrdom, yet they have given their hearts to me as if I were one of them in that sisterhood.

A woman I met in Lima told me that, when she had met Dorothy in Pittsburgh, she did not believe that Dorothy could be real. She moved to Lima and worked for Dorothy for three years. This woman said that, in all that time, Dorothy never failed, not even for a moment, to exemplify the station that she had elected to occupy.

I remember the afternoon when Dorothy told me what I had meant to her. I had responded, "But I thought you were the one who didn't need a friend." She said, “I did think so once, but now I know that I do.”

I shared the room in Lima with her for two nights and I watched her retire in exhaustion. I heard the alarm clock awaken her before dawn.

I returned from Memphis, but Jamestown was still more a point of departure than a home,. the home of my affectionate dreams, the home Willard and I called McKaydia. Grace Geary came to visit us in Jamestown and to share the atmosphere of McKaydia. We had a wonderful time, our friendship deepened and she said that she had become thirty years younger. In the late spring and early summer I returned to Toronto and Hamilton and was asked by the Teaching Committee to make the rounds of the western New York “circuit”.
{{p376}}

We went again to Green Acre and repeated our course in {Prayers and Meditations}. I remember talking to Doris and Horace Holley about Canada and the fields of work there. Horace responded by suggesting that, if the doors should open, we should pioneer to the Maritimes. Soon after, the National Assembly received the recommendation for me to make another extended trip to the Maritimes, concentrating in Halifax.

“There never was such a teaching challenge as these Maritimes.”

On the last day of August, 1941, I was back in Canada. I spent a week on a holiday with Irving and Grace. We drove to Halifax and met Beulah Proctor and then went on to Peggy’s Cove, where Irving and I did a lot of sketching. We returned to New Brunswick and spent a most enjoyable three or four days at their cottage, called “the Hideout”, at Point de Chene. I bought a book of foolscap, took my fountain pen and labelled it “Maritime Diary – 1941” and began to write.

Sunday, September 7th: the Feast of Might “Suddenly it was warmer and the sun shone, and we went to the beach. Grace and Irving had gone ‘in’ on a day when it was simply awful – raining and cold, oaf! What a hardy people the Maritimes raise up. This day I wore first my ‘play suit’ to the beach then came back and changed to the all-out bathing suit that I had purchased for a dollar at J.C. Penney’s in Jamestown. I got a little wet, then went, clinging to Grace and Irving, for a little ocean walk. The clouds overshadowed us again and we returned to our little house after our play. I’m glad we did, because the radio music was exquisite that afternoon – Sibclius’ 2nd Symphony seemed to be full of the {{p377}} purpose of my coming out here. That night I was to meet the Moncton friends at a Feast at Leila Wells. They are now old and tried friends, and I was delighted to see them again.

“After the Feast we drove back to Moncton and our holiday was at an end. Irving parked the car, but we were not ready to go in. I said I wanted to see The [Tidal] Bore. As the Bore appears, quite ostentatiously, on schedule, it was a preposterous suggestion. But Irving said, ‘Very well, we will make it come in now.’ We drove down to the park and there, at twenty minutes of midnight, was a row of people lined up and waiting for the spectacle. In five minutes a nice big bore rippled in and filled up the brown banks of mud with swirling tidewater. Triumphantly, we returned home.”

The next day I went back to work in earnest, began seeing people, getting my clothes in order, going out to tea or lunch, holding meetings. On Friday, September 12th I mounted a bus and started out for a trial two weeks in Halifax.

During that time I toured the ingenious and complicated beds of flowers in the famous Public Gardens. I went up Citadel Hill one night and saw a dazzling display of northern lights. But, for me, so much of Halifax was permeated by a brooding sense of coming disaster, an uptight fatalism. The fleets were leaving the harbour under convoy and people were alert for spies. The Bahá'ís with their talk of Universal Peace were deemed impractical, harmless.

Max Mosher was one of the Bahá'ís then in Halifax. I remember meeting him later, and being taken by him for a drive out to the Northwest Arm and along the road through the white birch wood called The Dingle. Glimpses of the Arm and the harbour were beautifully framed by the trees. On this trip, “Mac” spoke of the Halifax Explosion which occurred in 1917, when he was a boy of nine. Usually he did not like to talk about it, and this moment was a rare one. He told us p378 enough to convey the sense of shock and ‘awful’ activity that accompanied the disaster – the dead and injured, the burning houses, the refugees gathering in the parks and open spaces and the unseasonably heavy snowstorm that enveloped them. The story was vivid because it was usually locked away, a complex resulting from the shock given to a young boy. This submerged shock, now twenty-five years past, coloured the psychology of the city. I realized that this event, now legend, gave rise to the war fears of that time. Instead of saying “This can’t happen to us,” like the citizens of many other cities, Haligonians knew that war-related disaster had happened and could happen again. They were fully awake to the perils that existed. We continued our ride to a park where an anchor from one of the vessels which exploded in the harbour in 1917 had landed and lay embedded in the ground. Halifax. I was told that it was a Mecca for German spies and full of ammunition of one form or another.

Beulah Proctor conducted a boarding house on Morris Street and, while her contacts were mostly with transients, she was an active teacher. Her distinction comes from being the first pioneer to Nova Scotia during that Seven Year Plan answering a personal appeal of May Maxwell. She had emigrated from Worcester, Massachusetts, and was responsible for attracting a youthful Muriel Sheppard [later Muriel McLeod]. It seems to me that Beulah was also managing a canteen at the military base at Debert. One time she and I took the ferry to Dartmouth. We went up on deck and were admiring the beauty of the harbour – the vessels in a grey mist, the irregular line of the city and the islands, the distant expanse of water. Beulah was very much moved and said, “It is all so beautiful and we may never again see it like this.”

This trip was like most of the others in that my days were filled to the brim with the making of social contacts and the hosting of meetings, study classes, and firesides. But this trip {{p379}} was especially significant for two events – the first public meeting to be held in Halifax (and perhaps all of Nova Scotia) and the organization of the Halifax Bahá'í Group.

On Monday, September 22nd, Emeric and Rosemary Sala arrived. Dorothy Wade picked them up and we had supper together at her apartment. That evening we went to Eve Morley's and they spoke to ten who gathered there. The next night Emeric would speak at the Nova Scotian Hotel. The title of his talk was "Out of Venezuela". We had prepared publicity, which appeared in the three newspapers, and we had advertised it on the YMCA bulletin board. Salon E of the Hotel had been reserved. That night nineteen attended, ten of whom were non-Bahá'ís. Two men came from the Y , one of whom was a Hungarian from Emeric's home town. We had a good discussion period and collected the names and addresses of a number of people to follow up. Three carloads went back to Dorothy Wades' for coffee and cookies.

Toward the end of that week, on the 26th, we held a supper and celebrated the Feast of Will (Mashíyyat) at the Wades'.

'REPORT OF TWO WEEKS PRELIMINARY WORK DONE IN HALIFAX SEPT. 12 TO SEPT. 26 [1941]

"On the night of Sept. 26 a supper Feast was held there at which Beulah and I, five Halifax Bahá'ís and Eve and Pat [non-Bahá'í guests] were present. After supper and a discussion of teaching plans, our two guests excused themselves and we proceeded to a move which we all felt most momentous , that of consolidating our ranks by discussion of Bahá'í Administration and the election of officers. In a talk full of inspiration, Beulah summed up the purposes of her stay in Halifax and pointed out to them that the next step was to establish a working unity in accordance with the Administrative {{p380}} pattern. Individuals were now to be merged into a . new concept of group activity. I gave a further talk on Bahá'í Administration, sharing with them my experience in a number of other Bahá'í communities. We then elected the following officers:

Sec. Maxon Mosher – – – – 51 Vernon St. Chairman Dorothy Wade – – – Pinehurst Apts. Treasurer Wm. Laurie – – – - Prince Arthur St.

"With the election of the Treasurer, the Bahá'í fund was forthwith established. We are sorry to say that we will have to elect another Treasurer because Bill has been transferred to Montreal. Dorothy Wade was appointed Convener of Feasts."

The next morning Beulah and I drove out of Halifax, leaving the work in the hands of our newly elected officers. We parted at Masstown, Nova Scotia where I took a bus for Amherst. I was met there by Grace and Irving, and • we departed on a two-day scouting trip to Prince Edward Island...

Prince Edward Island: First Glimpse and a Birthday

From my Diary:

“Irving and Grace were waiting for me at the bus stop. When I saw them after my brief two weeks I realized what a strain I had been working under in Halifax. All at once I was so tired from relief of being out of that war-jittely spot and embarking on an expedition to the peaceful Island, that I felt wobbly in the knees and tongueless for at least fifteen minutes.

“It was a perfectly day with the foliage at its most gorgeous hue, reddish purple of the oaks, orange and red of the {{p381}} maples, yellow orange of the beech trees and the dark blue green of the pines. Before I got off the bus, I was drunk with the beauty of the Nova Scotian landscape. Now, the three of us good friends and jolly companions were off to catch the ferry at Cape Tormentine...

“We had coffee on the ferry and watched the sunset from the upper deck. From here the lights of Summerside made a brilliant frontage. It was completely dark when we reached the Island side. We found the tourist cabins we were looking for and the proprietor told Irving, looking at the two women [Grace and me], that he would leave the sleeping arrangements to him. Grace and I slept in one bed and Irving slept on the other side of a rather flimsy curtain.

“The next morning was sunny again and, in the direct sun, quite warm. I was filled with anticipation now that I was actually on P.E.I. Prince Edward Island is a dimpled darling, there is no doubt of that, ‘rolling agricultural paradise with lakes and woods and sea vistas’ [quoted from tourist book]. We stopped at Summerside and met Rosemary Sala’s sister, then we drove on about one o’clock in the direction of Charlottetown. We visited Green Gables, scene of L.M. Montgomery’s famous stories, and signed ourselves in a register where 4,000 tourists had inscribed their names. We drove to a great sweep of beach and sea. The wind was now blowing a gale with a slight wintery edge in it – warning of what to expect later...

“It was late afternoon when we reached our tourist-lodge destination about an half hour outside of Charlottetown. There was a curving row of little houses facing a field. In front of our cabin was the aerial tower of the CFCY radio broadcasting station. We took a little rest and drove on to Charlottetown arriving in the town in the late twilight. It has a fine old hotel, The Charlottetown, with a high pillared entrance, the mansion-style of building with a wide hall, {{p382}} parlours and dining room – very dignified. This was the eve of my birthday, [Sept.] the 28 and I was given a birthday dinner in the beautiful old room. It was served quite elaborately – Malpeque oysters on the half shell, local to the Island, duckling, empress potatoes. We sat later in the main salon and listened to the Sunday evening concert which was interrupted rudely by the war news turned up too loud. The guests of the hotel came in to listen – men in uniform, and well-dressed conservative-looking middle-aged men or couples. We went out and drove by lamplight around the town, then went back to our cabin home, parked near the red and green-lighted broadcast tower, and said some potent Bahá'í prayers for the work on the Island.

“When we awoke the next morning, the 29th, the wind was blowing almost at hurricane speed. We had visions of our cabin rolling around the field, but, mercifully, this did not happen. We drove to Charlottetown, shopped, studied the agricultural situation – then back to the cabin. There is a cabin with a kitchenette and, in it, my birthday dinner of chicken ‘a la king’ was prepared and eaten on crackers. Grace had brought the things in cans from Moncton. A small stove supplied the warmth and we ran out in the streaming wind for wood. It was a novel birthday party. I had also been given some presents at breakfast. Later we washed up, repacked the basket of food and dishes, and returned to Charlottetown.

“We revisited Province House and met the Archivist who guided our inspection of the ‘Cradle of Confederation’. We were taken to the room where the representatives of the colonies had convened in 1864, saw their pictures, the chairs where they sat, the table...

“P.E.I. is a ‘pocket’ province. This city, its capital and metropolis has a population of 16,000, the size of Geneva, New York. The stones in front of Province House and its stairs are worn into hollows by the tread of perhaps 100 years. {{p383}} We sighed our names in the register where at various times, royalty had been given an entire page. The Duke of Kent had passed that way a few days before.

“Irving and Grace left me at the public library, sunk in a book of Maritime history. About an hour later, they returned to take me to their friends’, the Sinclairs’, for tea. Mrs. Sinclair had been told about my birthday, and my cake came in with a lighted candle on its top. After a very jolly time we emerged into a landscape calm in the rosy light of a marvellous sunset. We would be on our way back to take the ferry for Tormentine. The ride through the hills and valleys of this pastoral country was never to be forgotten. The light would be purple in the valleys and fiery red and orange on the hilltops. The farm people were doing their chores. There were dark pine woods and the shining waters of coves and inlets and, everywhere, a bewildering amount of space.”

In November I went back to Halifax (or a month, accompanied by Grace, her first foray into the field of travel teaching. Grace and Irving were not so accustomed to prolonged separations as were Willard and I. I wrote to Willard:

“I hope you write to Irving and commiserate with him from the Bahá'í husband viewpoint. He is being as generous in his attitudes as you are. He writes grand letters to Grace...”

Grace and I established a regular Monday-night study group which met in a basement-level apartment that we rented at 346 Quinpool Road. Sometimes we would meet at the Wades’. We made as many contacts as we could, turned over every stone. I noted that Halifax needed a “real resident teacher”. {{p384}}

Thoughts of Farming

The earlier trip to P.E.I. had, for Irving, been more than holiday. He began to investigate farming on the Island and checked with the real estate brokers for a listing of farms and prices. He was beginning to consider buying a farm in the spring. The effects of the war made us think that this kind of investment in self-sufficiency could be the means of creating a Bahá'í community and a self-contained refuge where work would be needed.

To Willard, November 11, 1941:

"Your letter was forwarded to us by Irving, who has put an ad in the paper advertising for a farm! If you and I join in Moncton in April, they will have their nine [to form the local Assembly] by Convention time. We start from there, and a very good beginning. I will stick around here as long as I can, but plan to be home on or about Dec. 15th and won't it seem like heaven."

Irving had written to Willard about the prospect of farming. This would be one way in which, to facilitate our emigration to Canada, work could be offered to Willard. Willard was most practical in his response. He wrote to me:

"...apparently the farm idea right next to Moncton is taking shape in his [Irving's] mind. I should think that might be an all-right idea. I could make a dandy garden and put in a few acres of sweet corn and cabbage. It seems to me that a part-time farm job would help get the farm into good shape against the time when we might need it as a Bahá'í refuge. Here again is the thought that if we have livestock on the farm they might be postponed for a year or so, because {{p385}} someone has to tend them every day. If the four of us were actually living on a farm we would want some animals. To make money on a farm calls for a considerable investment and an all-out expenditure of determined effort. It would not be necessary to get a farm merely for me to enter Canada as a visitor for a few months. By the way, I suppose the farm season does not open up so early in New Brunswick."

For almost a year now, while I was called away on other trips, Willard had been making visits to Hamilton. During this time he went back to Hamilton again and I suggested that he enquire about immigration with the officials face to face. He was also developing, through correspondence, a relationship with Irving.

Bill Laurie was another Bahá'í, then in the Royal Canadian Navy as a non-combatant electrician. I had met him on my earlier visit and he had been elected Treasurer of the Halifax Bahá'í group. When I had said prayers with him during that trip, he said that, through me, he had heard the voice of May Maxwell whom he had known in Montreal. By this time Bill had shipped out for England on a Corvette. He had said his goodbyes a few weeks ago. I remember sitting with his new bride, Margaret Mosher, in the apartment on Quinpool Road. Her brother Max, was also present. There was a blackout and we sat in our little subterranean shelter imagining what the 'real thing' would be like. A bomber flew overhead and they set off a few booming guns, but no one was scared. After the blackout we had a discussion about protection and we read from {Promulgation of Universal Peace} about the Titanic disaster:

“...these events have deeper reasons. Their object and purpose is to teach man certain lessons. We are living in a day of reliance upon material conditions. Men imagine that {{p386}} the great size and strength of a ship, the perfection of machinery or the skill of a navigator will ensure safety, ‘ but these disasters sometimes take place that men may know that God is the real Protector. If it be the will of God to protect man, a little ship may escape destruction, whereas the greatest and most perfectly constructed vessel with the best and most skillful navigator may not survive a danger such was present on the ocean. The purpose is that the people of the world may turn to God, the One Protector; that human souls may rely upon His preservation and know that He is the real safety.”[^]

We said prayers and read the {Tablet of Ahmad} for the protection of Halifax and for Bill. Three days later we learned that Bill had lost his life with the sinking of his Corvette.

The work in Halifax was different from Memphis and western New York State. I found it much more difficult to get started and, once started, to assess my progress. The population was so transient and the work, at best, could be described as “vague”. Yet I knew I was pioneering. I wrote:

“Pioneer work is slower gauged and the station of one’s apostlehood is more often assailed. I do not feel satisfied with my efforts, even though I am apparently doing all that I can.”

Teaching in the Maritimes was both an inner and outer struggle. Outwardly I found that if ever there were a heavy atmospheric pressure that needed to be lifted, then here was its spiritual equivalent. When urgent opportunities to teach are available at every turn, there is not so much an inner struggle as there is a struggle to summon additional energies. Those opportunities seemed to be non-existent here and needed to be created. I confided in Lorna, “My work here {{p387}} calls for a constant exercise of the will to climb – the need for ‘brass-like feet’ and an ‘adamant’ soul. This is a most subtle requirement ... in times of lull.”

Muriel Sheppard asked us to go with her to the Victoria General Hospital to visit her mother, Rebecca, who was ill. Rebecca had a strong, beautiful, and careworn face. She related to us that Muriel had told her about the Faith and that we had come as teachers. Would we, she asked, answer her questions? We had been starving for an occasion to teach ‘deeply’ and here was a wonderful, ‘prepared’ soul who was asking to be taught. What a joy! Rebecca accepted the Faith that night and we learned later that another of her teen-aged daughters, Audrey [now Audrey Raine] had become a Bahá’í too.

We arranged for another public meeting and, on November 25, I was the speaker. The press clipping began:

“BASIS FOR WORLD ORDER IS OUTLINED

Mrs. Willard McKay, Jamestown, N.Y., international lecturer for the Bahá’í Faith, spoke last night at the Nova Scotian Hotel, her topic being ‘Our New World Destiny.’”

Soon afterwards I left Halifax and went home via Boston and Beverly, Massachusetts where I visited Lorna. I remember listening to the radio with her on December 7th. Pearl Harbor had been bombed and the United States was at war. I returned to Jamestown, where the friends were gathering to make ‘a voice recording to send to John Stearns, our pioneer in South America. I returned to Jamestown, but not for long. {{p388}}

To: Lorna Tasker, Jamestown, Jan 20-30, ‘42

“We are going, dear! Willard got a letter from the Immigration Commissioner at Ottawa and then over a week ago now he took a trip to Fort Erie, Ontario, and straightened out the rest of our doubts. Since then things have moved so fast that I am in a state of perpetual amazement so that I tweak my whiskers in wonder. I am being most extravertish in order to cope with two ‘Ps’ that now dominate my life – people and packing. You know how hard it has always been for me to get away anywhere. Well, now that the news is out I am constantly answering the phone and the doorbell. People who have had me filed away somewhere are now frantically trying to catch up in a week or two, the Bahá’ís are trying to extract the last drop, parties are being planned, and dinners given.

“Yes, I suppose it is destiny calling me to Canada. The call had been there ever since my Canadian National Exhibition experience. When we went to Convention in the spring of 1940. after the Hamilton Assembly was born and I heard myself called a ‘Canadian Pioneer’ it was like a strain of music to my ears. Then Grace and Irving opened the door. There has been divine guidance all along. I remember so eagerly, staring out of the window on my first trip to Toronto feeling the heightened sense of ‘Place’. I felt ready to go in accordance with the Will of Bahá’u’lláh.

“We are leaving Jamestown in a blaze of glory. Bahá’ís and non-Bahá’ís are rushing out to touch us with their love. I’m like a ‘bride’ in the midst of presents, parties, teas – a very exciting, thrilling, touching leave-taking.

“I am to speak Sunday afternoon at the Hotel Jamestown, a last call to any who will hear. We had our last fireside last night with over thirty attending.” {{p389}}

We entered Canada, as landed immigrants, at Fort Erie. Irving had written a letter to accompany our documents stating that he would accept responsibility for us. He was our ‘sponsor’. We stopped in Toronto to visit Laura and Victor

Davis, went on to spend a week with Rosemary and Emeric Sala in St. Lambert, and we had a meeting with the Canadian Teaching Committee in Montreal. Then on to Moncton.

Years later, Willard would write to the Jamestown community:

“It is twenty-three years ago this month since Doris and I left you and ‘landed’ as they call it, as immigrants at Fort Erie, Ontario, in Canada. I had three reasons for wanting to tear up our Jamestown roots: one was a desire for a change in occupation after eight years with Sears, Roebuck and Co. Another was the feeling (fostered by John Stearns) that my Bahá’í work in Jamestown was completed; and, finally, if! was ever to see anything more of Doris it would only be if she and I went pioneering together.”

Willard didn’t write of his real sacrifice. In coming to Canada both of us gave up invitations to continue race amity work in the south – work for which we were better qualified and probably would have been much more successful. The need in Canada, however, was urgent.

In Moncton, Irving had renovated the upstairs of their house at 32 Ralph Street into an apartment with a bed-sitting room and kitchen. Willard was able to find some work and we began to host firesides and other meetings. It was a beautiful beginning and the Moncton Assembly reformed on April 21st. John Stearns sent us a postcard from Quito, Ecuador which read, “Welcome to Moncton. Place your whole faith in God and never look back.” We had consulted with the Assembly {{p390}} about extension teaching and in two weeks time, Grace and I were on the road again, back to Prince Edward Island:

“The situation is not rosy...”

Charles Murray was the first pioneer to Prince Edward Island. He had moved to the Island from the United States sometime in the 1930’s and had remained for about ten years. When I first began visiting P. E. I., Charles was employed at the airport near Summerside.

To Willard, May 17, 1942:

“Charles Murray came to the house about 8 Saturday night and we held, in the following way, the first 19-day Feast ever held in Charlottetown. We walked over to Victoria Park and consulted until the sun dropped below the line; then, we sat on a park bench and read and said prayers for half an hour or more. After that, we carried on a more formal consultation. Charles brought a bag of cookies which we took with us on our further perambulation. We continued our visit, in the Charlottetown Hotel writing room, and went over the telephone book for a list of names. Then we walked around another park and ate our cookies, hilarious at our very funny way of holding a feast with no place on which to light. We, speaking of the dove sent out by Noah, decided to call this the Feast of Ararat instead of Azamat!

“I got a lot of practical information and advice from Charles. He knows the people very well and the situation is not rosy. I am established well-enough here now to go ahead and do a few things – let the chips fall where they will. I am going to advertise and hold a public meeting about the middle of next week, sending out cards to a certain list of people. It will be centered on my Confederation studies carried on so {{p391}} ostentatiously at the public library. I am sure I can get some people, at least, and follow-up with publicity. Having proclaimed the Cause in Charlottetown I will hope for some follow-up leads, enough to help us here a little longer.

“I will be quite busy this week working up my Confederation article mornings when I wake up early and doing direct-contact work with some of the people I have met already and some others that Charles and Mrs. Coles have suggested. This is all routine. If nothing comes of it directly, perhaps a secondary opening will come, one thing leading to another. At least, having gone through the schedule, I will feel that my duty has been formally done.

“The more I think about it, the more it seems as if a number of Bahá’ís will have to move here ... perhaps come from the United States. It is encouraging that the long deadlock as to jobs for ‘foreigners’ promises to lift from sheer necessity – or perhaps a farm project to raise food and provide shelter, similar to the Elgin plan, will attract the numbers as the need increases. I do not feel that P.E.I. is our responsibility as far as residence goes because New Brunswick needs us almost as much. But others might come from somewhere if it were put up to them. The nine do not seem inherent in this soil.”

I remember that the cookies Charles shared during that first Feast were rather tasteless and I pretended to eat them while quietly stuffing them down through the cracks of the park bench we shared in Rochford Square.

During the administrative part of the Feast we planned the first public meeting, which was given in the Charlottetown Hotel a week or so later, about the time of the 50th anniversary of Bahá’u’lláh’s Ascension, May 29th. Grace chaired the event and I was the speaker. I talked about World Federation, basing my comments on my research on Canadian {{p392}} Confederation. I entitled the talk after an Island assessment, “They builded better than they knew.” Four people came. We were complimented by one of that audience who noted that we were not discouraged at so small a turnout, proceeding as if the hall had been filled. Discouraged? How could we be discouraged with four souls sitting there! One was Flora Rogers whose husband owned the CFCY radio station. She would give us, throughout her life, her friendship and support. Another was a corporal in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Charles Murray had taken Grace and me to the “Mounties” and introduced us to Corporal MacArthur who was responsible for investigating “queer ducks and geese” and other wartime visitors like ourselves. He seemed to be glad to “get in on the ground floor”. Whether he came to the meeting out of interest or duty, I would not know.

There might have been more people out for our meeting if there had not been, that night, a War Defense Rally at Prince of Wales College.

The audience was curious and plied us with questions until after eleven o'clock. Mrs. Rogers asked, "How long ago did Bahá'u'lláh die?" She was told, "Fifty years ago tonight." The audience was curious, but the response was one of polite interest. They neither accepted nor rejected.

Grace and I returned to Moncton via Summerside where we held the overdue Feast of Núr with Charles. We had, before leaving the Island, an interview with the editor of the {Journal Pioneer} newspaper.

In June we found ourselves at Port Elgin, New Brunswick. The DeMilies were friends of the Gearys. They were not Bahá'ís then. Mrs. DeMille had a rustic camp which she rented to groups of summer tourists, mostly from the United States. Camp Hermit Thrush was big, with several log cabins, a large central building with a fireplace and an open-air {{p393}} pavilion for eating; perfect for a Bahá'í summer school. Mrs. DeMille offered the camp for our use. About fifteen people attended with Harlan Ober as the featured teacher. Mrs. DeMille[^] declared herself soon after, as did an Amy Wier of Moncton.

I returned to P.E.I. in the fall. Rosemary Sala accompanied me, and Emeric later offered to sponsor regular travel trips to the Island. I rekindled my friendship with Mrs. Rogers and, through her, was swept into an active social life.

"Tonight we are going to have The Authors' Club meeting at Dorothy Duchemins'. I am going to give them some exercises in writing and I hope they will rally and turn out some good results. I do feel very much at home here now kind of on the inside, and anything might happen. At least my potential mailing [contacts] list is growing by leaps and bounds, and I have been very active considering that I have been here only four whole days. But what next? That is the problem we have to pray about..."

Rosemary spoke at the Duchemin's the next day on "The History of the Bahá'í Faith". My darker side offered another perspective. It found that my social rounds on the Island were not so productive as they had been in Memphis. I even felt that they were hampering my efforts:

"In a way it's too bad I struck this whirl because the mood has had to be extravertish ever since I came, with practically no opportunities for the talks I had on my last visit – that and social doings like the wedding and the teas and the clubs [Art Club] have taken up so much time. Last night a big local concert [or Russian relief for which Flora was playing came off... "

On the Day of Covenant, November 23rd, 1942, Grace and I were staying in Charlottetown at the Blair-Athol House at {{p394}} 19 Euston St. We had recited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s {Tablet of Visitation} with a very real sense of His presence. Then I remembered, “We have forgotten to provide for the material Feast.” Almost at once a knock sounded on our door, and in the lighted doorway stood one of the daughters of the landlord with a tray of delicious refreshments. For all the times that we would stay at the Blair-Athol House, this would be the only time that food would be offered to us. It seemed as if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had sent it Himself.

Harlan Ober met us in P.E.I. twice during that late fall. He gave a fireside to about fifteen people, gave a radio broadcast, and was guest speaker at the Rotary Club. He spoke on World Order.

Willard and I were in the Moncton community for a year and a half. This was the fourth Assembly we had helped to build – the others, Jamestown, Hamilton, Memphis. We were the only ‘qualified’ speakers in the area and we continued, for several years, to make travel teaching trips. I gave another course at Green Acre entitled “Fathoming the Most Great Ocean” and taught at the Rice Lake school in Ontario. Willard made several teaching trips to communities in Western New York, Halifax, and Saint John. The objectives of the Seven Year Plan wanted local Spiritual Assemblies in every state and province of the United States and Canada. In July of 1943 the National Teaching Committee, then, far off on the American west coast, realized that Prince Edward Island was, of itself, a province. In accordance with the Plan, it would have to have an Assembly by Ridván’44. While at breakfast with Grace and Irving Geary, the wire arrived: “Would the McKays leave Moncton and re-pioneer to P.E.I. at the earliest possible date?” A letter followed with the news that the Guardian had cabled the National Assembly saying that, due to the insularity of the people, P.E.I. was a most difficult place to teach. The letter posed the question: would we settle there, planning to remain, if necessary, the rest of our lives? We wired back. “Yes, we would.”

Pioneering: “Plowing the Rock...”

In the early 1980s the National Spiritual Assembly [Canada] asked three people to write their descriptions of my pioneering efforts in P.E.I. Those three were close friends all: Louise Mould, then pioneering in Zaire; Ann Boyles, working on her doctorate at the University of New Brunswick and Linda McMahon, pioneering in Madagascar. Linda sent me a copy of her account and I responded with my concerns:

“But please, since it is my image you are dealing with, let me help you keep it more realistic and true. My first years here, I’ll admit, had their ghastly tests and crushing disappointments, but I praise them for the lessons they taught me and the proofs they gave of our own persistent strength and purpose. The later pioneers, too, were up against the problem of growth. We all functioned actively for a dozen years with only one declaration of an Islander, Leila Morris in 1956.

“But how do you assess ‘evident failure’ when we, the pioneers involved, would never accept it? While we were digging the soil and heaving the foundation stones, none of us ever succumbed to the thought that we were digging a grave!

“I remember eating lunch at the Inn at Green Acre one day. A very large lady from New York City came over to my table and knelt on the floor insisting, ‘Come back, Doris. You belong to the world!’ I could smile and shake my head and realize how deeply rooted I was already in Canada’s untilled soil.” {{p396}}

The McKays moved to Charlottetown, renting Alfred Duchemin’s house at 279 Richmond Street. The Gearys came with us and others responded to the call as well: Helen Gidden from Toronto; Christine McKay, Willard’s sister moved from Rochester, New York. Edna Halloway came from Dorothy Baker’s community in Lima, Ohio.

We met Edna at the station and brought her “home”. I remember how she became suddenly quiet and withdrawn as we approached the house. The next day she told us that she had had a dream in which she saw the house and everything in it before coming to the Island.

Agnes McKinnon, originally from Scotland, pioneered from Lorna’s town of Beverly, Massachusetts. Elizabeth Cowles moved from Montreal but, just before Naw-Rúz, she had to return and Elsa Yentu arrived to take her place. On April 21, 1944 we formed the first Local Spiritual Assembly on Prince Edward Island – Charlottetown.

Sometimes we do not care what happens to us in the service of Bahá’u’lláh. And sometimes we do care, but go anyway. It helps to be reminded that painful sacrifice is acceptable, and, if it is met with prayers and meekness, it leaves an impression upon the spiritual soil of the region.

There were hard times ahead for the pioneers who had left everything to answer the call of P. E. I. The trained people who came took menial jobs, when they could get them. Some took on housework, others farm labour. We were not young, our average age about fifty. Heien was a skilled stenographer and took a job handing out ice cream cones at the Pure Milk Company. Edna, who had sold out a private hairdressing business and her house, worked six days a week babysitting twins. She received six dollars a week and a meal a day. Christine and Agnes shared accommodation in two rooms heated by a Franklin stove and an antique oil cooker. Both did housework and their combined weekly income totalled ten {{p397}} dollars plus meals while working. Elsa Ventu, the Finnish newspaper woman, was another to take a housekeeping job. She slept in a damp basement which aggravated her arthritis.

Elsa’s health suffered and, after six months, she had to return to Toronto. But her influence was felt. Years later when Trinity United Church was holding a discussion series on Non-Christian sects and religions, the Bahá’í Faith came up for consideration. Some of our friends spoke out in our favour. “But,” replied the minister, “at least it is not Christian.” At this point Elsa’s former employer arose and said that the Bahá'ís were not anti-Christian and that her Finnish maid had been very religious and quoted her Bible frequently and to good effect. Elsa's father, by the way, was a minister in Finland.

One day during our first year on the Island, Irving received a call from a lawyer in town advising him of a farm going up for public auction. The four of us gathered at Vernon Bridge and met with the people who owned it, talked with them, and decided to put in a bid. We were able to secure the farm for about three thousand dollars. Irving had sacrificed his pension with Eaton's to pioneer. But they did agree to give him a fixed amount for a year after he left. For us the farm became the primary economic focus. When Irving and Willard could not find work in town, they worked at the farm. I remember Willard applying for a labourer's job in town and being turned down. They worked very hard because neither of them knew anything about "dirt" farming.

To children I gave art lessons, after school and on Saturdays. The children would come to the house and I charged them twenty-five cents a lesson – thirty-five if two came together. I started with four students, two of whom were nieces of Rosemary Sala. Rosemary's sister lived in Summerside and I would meet her daughters at the bus. In time I had about forty-five students and I earned about ten dollars a week that way. I remember seeing a group of children standing outside the window, watching us do our art and thinking, "Oh, if I could only get art to all these children." That wish was to come true later.

Charlottetown was a joint teaching responsibility. There were nine, sometimes as many as eleven pioneers. We became a composite functioning body, helped by many visiting Bahá'ís. Our teaching efforts were financed by the National Assembly and the Teaching Committee and whatever we did to proclaim the Faith was a credit to their support. We could not have accomplished it on our own. Teaching campaigns with public meetings, newspaper publicity and radio interviews were launched. Travelling teachers flocked here and we found speaking engagements for them with the service clubs. John Robarts almost "commuted" from Toronto. Harlan Ober, William Sears and the Salas ventured here. Ruth Moffett came for several consecutive "campaigns" and Jamie Bond, then a student at the University of Toronto, came for an entire summer, taking a job as a newspaper reporter.

Tony and Mamie Seto were early teachers coming for five weeks in November of '43. They had offered themselves as pioneers, but the Guardian had advised them, because of Tony's important business connections in San Francisco, to make this a temporary teaching visit. The Setos engaged rooms at the Charlottetown Hotel and, with the utmost dignity and style, afforded the townspeople a model of American-Chinese marriage. For a time they met people at firesides and teas, and made contacts of their own. Tony addressed the Authors' Club and different men's discussion groups. Then they were ready for their "campaign", as they called it. It began with very impressive newspaper spreads which they financed and were to be followed by three public meetings at the Queen Hotel – on January 3rd, 4th, and 5th. Twenty-five or so attended the first. Shortly after this, the Setos left to {{p399}} visit Moncton. While they were away, the news came that Tony's San Francisco partner had died suddenly. The Setos had to leave with their plans unfulfilled. Tony came back for one night, only to gather their belongings and to •check out of the hotel. We voted to hold follow-up meetings at the Queen Hotel on January 13th, 26th and February 4th with Willard and I speakers on those dates. For several years we would use the 'Queen'. Emeric Sala, John Robarts, and Dorothy Baker would later speak there.

In 1945 Mrs. Florence Cox was sent to the Island by the Teaching Committee. Florence, a very ardent, older Bahá'í, had a small income and rented a room on Rochford Street opposite the Square. She got permission from the Assembly to rent the living room of the house as a Bahá'í Reading Room, an effort the Assembly agreed to try for four months, June to October. Books were provided, a sign, BAHÁ'Í READING ROOM, was put up and a schedule of hours posted. There was an opening reception and Thursday-night meetings were advertised weekly. If no sincere effort is ever wasted, this venture had its reward, but since the visible response was almost nil, we suspended the activity and tried other plans.

We were still being supported by funds from the Teaching Committee. A special contribution had been earmarked for broadcasts and together we went and tried out our voices on a tape recorder at CFCY. Elizabeth Cowles, back on a visit, Christine, Irving, and Willard had the best. Grace and I wrote a script every week, which was broadcast on Sunday afternoons. In those days a 15-minute talk cost seven dollars.

We held the Maritime Summer Conference in Keppoch, P.E.I. that year with Doris Richardson as teacher. About fifteen attended and Fred Izzard of Halifax announced his intentions to join the Faith. Doris stayed on to speak at the Queen in July. {{p400}}

In the fall of 1945 the National Assembly sent in a "bulldozer" to break up the hard soil of Maritime resistance. That bulldozer was Ruth Moffett. She gave a series of five seminars at the Queen Hotel. There were afternoon and evening meetings daily. A great many people were canvassed by letter and telephone and there was extensive newspaper publicity. The opening response saw about twenty-five in attendance. After the campaign we could count about fifty to sixty different people who had come out for a meeting. Toward the end of the campaign, however, attendance dropped off. In the beginning it had been hoped that one or two series of seminars would attract sufficient people. This not being the case, we pressed on desperately until sometime in March. Most of the people who came were older and well entrenched in their own church life. They had come out of curiosity and had been attracted more by Ruth's personality than by the Message of the Faith.

In October I sent for Dorothy Baker. I had been introduced around and had joined two clubs; one for art and the other literary. I found the members of these groups friendly and marked with the social stamp, willing to listen but not to get involved. In my wishful thinking, I set my hopes on Dorothy Baker's magic ability to create a spiritual atmosphere. Sure that she would confirm them in a single meeting, I delivered my invitations in person at a number of homes, beseeching people to come and meet this wonderful speaker who was also my personal friend.

I asked Dorothy to speak on {The Seven Valleys} at our tea. People filled the room sitting in a circle around the fireplace. I was never so happy! Until Dorothy gave her talk, that is. She spoke only to their minds. The ladies were charmed, but Dorothy's heart was not in it. Later, I asked, "Dorothy, WHY did not you give them the 'works'?" She shook her head, "Did {{p401}} you think I would cast my Beloved at the feet of those women?"

She wrote to me from the train, "At first I thought all those people were dead! But this morning, on second thought, I think they may have been asleep. But I would have to work there six months to make any impression on them."

Dorothy had also spoken on radio, CFCY. Keith Rogers and the staff were astonished when she went on the air without any notes.

When John Robarts came he worked like a person trying to "close a deal" with the fourteen or so people he contacted. He was the one who introduced {Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era} to Margery Patterson, who would later lift our hearts greatly.

For the small band of pioneers it was a treat to be entertained by John at the Charlottetown Hotel. He was then chairman of the new Canadian Teaching Committee and came often to the Island. At times it seemed to me that John personally adopted the young Charlottetown Assembly. I remember a particularly hard period when most of us were relatively poor and feeling somewhat "homeless." When Christmas approached, John sent the community twenty-five dollars with which to celebrate and the Bahá'ís got dressed up and went to a show together.

When the Guardian died in '57, it was a different story. John came to the Island to talk to us about the problems the Hands of the Cause were having with Mason Remey. He asked Willard and me to have lunch with him at the Charlottetown Hotel. But this time, it was ham sandwiches sent to his room. John told us then about the search for the Guardian's will. It was not a time for celebration.

The Cause is indebted to the loyal friendships of the Rogers and Duchemin families. They fought battles for us with some of the suspicious people in town. In fact, they said {{p402}} later that "we would never know how much they had had to defend us." One day Corporal MacArthur called at 2'19 Richmond Street. He had known us from our first visits, had attended the first public meeting, and had come to hear the Setos speak, but this call was a police matter. He said that he had told enquirers that the RCMP knew all about the Bahá'í Faith and that it was entirely acceptable to the police. But now he had been called to ask if a Miss Christine McKay working at a house on North River Road was Willard's sister. People in an adjoining apartment, an English physician and his wife, had noted to the police that Christine was "suspiciously superior" for a housemaid, perhaps a spy! Later the Corporal reported to us that all was well. The doctor's wife became friends with Christine and was entertained by her at tea. Quite an experience to relate back home in England that the doctor's wife had gone to tea with the housemaid!

I now think that we pushed it too hard. The Island people are not pushable. But we thought we had to try as hard as we did because of money. Everyone was running low on funds. The time came when some of the pioneers had to call on the newly created Canadian Bahá'í Fund for help. There were only a few hundred Canadian Bahá'ís to contribute to that Fund and a drive was on for the ornamentation of the Wilmette temple. The Secretary of the National Assembly called us to put on more steam, to teach and confirm the Island people, so the pioneers could leave. How we laboured to plant the Faith! Our very lives were ebbing away with the discouraging years. Some of us watered the seeds with our tears, some got sick and left and some were replaced by others.

After three years (in 1946), our friend Margery Patterson came to the house and declared herself a Bahá'í. We had come to know her when Willard met George Patterson at a talk he gave to discussion group made up mostly of Prince of Wales College faculty. George taught mathematics there and he must have mentioned the Faith to his wife. Later he ordered some apples from our farm and, when Irving went to deliver them, Margery asked a lot of questions. Before coming to visit and to announce her intentions, she had, on this day, seen the minister and resigned from the church. She came every Wednesday, for a month, to study the Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and to deepen in the Teachings. She said, "Whenever you say I am ready, I will sign my card." When she did sign, she was a fully confirmed Bahá'í. You can imagine how our hopes rose.

One soul like Margery was worth it all. She was the hidden jewel "beyond the seven seas". There were other people too, who had been exposed to the Faith as much as Margery, and I think some of them accepted it logically. These people would defend and stand up for the Bahá'ís and even lend their homes for meetings and offer lifelong friendships. They were called, but not chosen. Only Margery had the courage and the integrity to stand with us. How different it might have been! And how different it might have been had Margery been an Islander. [^]

[^] [As far as we know, Fred Graham was the first Islander to declare his belief in Bahá'u'lláh.]

Speaker after speaker, firesides and public seminars, radio broadcasts, the Reading Room and the "bulldozer." Our beleaguered little band had thought that, with Margery, better days had come at last. But soon the hopes that we had clung to for the past three years would be crushed. The very reason for our Island existence would be pulled from underneath us. Laura Davis was Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly. At its request she had written us a letter, but had waited five days before summoning up the courage to mail it. Because of our drain on the Fund, the National Assembly was asking us to disband the Charlottetown Assembly. The sudden interruption to the momentum of our efforts, which had become our way of life, overwhelmed us with, what then seemed to be, an irrational sense of defeat. Most of the pioneers had little or nothing to return to. It seemed that Bahá'u'lláh had turned us down, had rejected our efforts. The group of pioneers who were the first Island Assembly broke up. Our companions went back to Rochester, New York, Lima, Ohio, Toronto and Montreal. The Gearys and McKays moved on a more permanent basis, to the little farmhouse at Vernon Bridge. There were many out there that had heard Bahá'í talks given by Willard or Irving and it was known as “the Bahá'í Farm”.

In Charlottetown, Margery was left on her own. She started firesides and we helped when we could. The next spring the Gearys left to aid the Halifax community. Later, they moved to Cape Breton where they became Knights of Bahá'u'lláh for opening up that virgin territory.

This relatively short period in the '40s I have described as one of “isolation, deprivation and evident failure”. I remember being uplifted then by the words of one of the Tablets of the Divine Plan addressed to the pioneers:

“The darkness of this gloomy night shall pass away. Again the Sun of Reality will dawn from the horizon of the hearts. Have patience, wait but do not sit idle; work while you are waiting; smile when you are wearied by monotony; be firm while everything around you is being shaken; be joyous while the ugly face of despair grins at you; speak aloud while the malevolent forces of the nether world try to crush your mind ... The trees of hope will become verdant.”[^]

Vernon

For the first time since we became Bahá'ís in Geneva, New York, Willard and I were alone. I'll admit that a passing wave of desolation struck us on that October morning when our friends Grace and Irving drove away. The nervous depression that had assailed Grace in Charlottetown had not lifted when we moved to the country. Although they had left their part of the house furnished for a probable return, we knew that they would not be back. The parting was tearful and the sadness lingered for a time. But our temperament was to be positive and hopeful. I recalled John Stearns' postcard from Ecuador. “Never look back.” Well, there are worse places to live in than the present! But the future was a blank.

We continued to proclaim the Faith. In Charlottetown we used publicity and in Vernon, contact with the people. I joined the Women's Institute and held Saturday art classes with children. Later the Institute engaged me to teach art two days a week in the country school.

I had learned that 99% % of the Islanders were church members. The church was more than a religion; it was a culture, a way of life. Here, in the country, as well as in Charlottetown, people were interested in us, but closed their minds to our Faith. There did not seem to be many young people on the Island in those days of war; we knew people only of our own age or older. They would listen with an inhibited curiosity, never a question expressed. They were afraid of knowing something that would set them apart from the social norm, something that threatened an older sense of unity. Over the years we would find close Islander friends and true neighbours. People, like the members of the Crane family, the Howletts and “Pru” Drake have demonstrated an exemplary hospitality and an instinct for giving. They, as well as Belle and “Vernie” Ross, have long continued in offering appreciated friendships upon which I have often, and with gratitude, relied. Mine is a retrospective appreciation. Forty years ago it was different.

Willard and I laboured on the farm, managing to keep out of debt and enjoying our independence. We grew vegetables and small fruits and raised chickens – subsistence farming. {{p406}} Willard drove a horse and two-wheeled cart. Later we bought an old car that got us to town. Our ancestors had been “settlers” too, back in the 1700s in the United States. Perhaps that is why there were so many periods of “radiant acquiescence” in our lives.

I cannot bear to be pitied or praised for these years. There were always ways to serve the Faith in spite of our difficulties. Uppermost was our fixed commitment. We had given ourselves to Bahá'u'lláh for this undeveloped territory. What did He want us to do?

Well, at the time, we were the only Bahá'ís in the Atlantic provinces who had speaking experience. We had a deep comprehension of the Covenant, taught by the great early Bahá'ís. We had the experience of applying the Administration. We taught at every summer school from the beginning and we were on call for public meetings in Moncton and Halifax – expenses paid.

And we had company. There were a number of friends in town who were lifelong in their loyalty. I painted and artists came to paint our beautiful landscapes. Old Bahá'í friends came from the United States. The Salas, always involved with their interest in the Bahá'í Farm came often. John and Audrey Robarts did not forget us.

In 1953, the National Bahá'í Convention was held in Moncton and I was invited to chair one of the meetings. Shirley and Bob Donnelly were there on their honeymoon. Bob sought me out to talk about Charlottetown. The Guardian had cabled, “Charlottetown must be maintained at any cost.” It was his second cable regarding the Island. The first pioneers had scattered, and now, new ones had to be found. Bob and Shirley drove to Charlottetown and, in one day, secured jobs for which they had had recent training. They spent their first days on the Island with us in Vernon and the McKays were enchanted. Seven Bahá'ís followed and we were {{p407}} in business again. Margery Patterson, the first declarant, stood out like a landmark.

Our fortunes changed with the new upsurge of life. Dr. Ken Parker was Superintendent of Schools, interested in putting art into the curriculum. He asked me to speak to the Rotary Club about my experiences in teaching art to children, and there were present about a hundred men who heard me support Dr. Parker's ideas. The decision to include art in the public schools was made and, although I was in my fifties, I got a job that turned into quite a dazzling career. I was teaching the teachers in art instruction and was going monthly into seventy-five classrooms to demonstrate the lessons. I had been given the authority to work out my own plans, and the plans were for Bahá'u'lláh, built out of prayer and inspiration. It seemed as if the creative power was fresh from the next world. I was in a space capsule with access to unusual energy, my mind full of ideas and ambitious projects including a book, {Art in the Schools}. It was used throughout the province and saw three printings. I blazed on with undiminished enthusiasm for sixteen years, retired, then took another school in Sherwood for a year, and stopped at seventy-four.

Because of my school work in the Charlottetown area) I kept an address in town – an address that qualified me to become a member of the Charlottetown Bahá'í community. In the spring of '54, I filled the vacancy on the Local Spiritual Assembly as the needed ninth member. The teaching impasse had not changed over the years. More pioneers came, including the return of the Gearys, and yet I was the needed ninth member for fifteen years.

Over those years I was home three nights out of seven and on holidays. Willard's heart was failing and he had lost most of his hearing. I stayed with him, instead of travelling, but I continued to be a combination settler (in Vernon) and pioneer (in Charlottetown) and a career lady. Willard died in {{p408}} 1966 and I came home to stay in '69. The house was, and still is, a shrine for Willard. People who come felt his presence here. He was the real settler, still much beloved by the older Vernon neighbours. He never wanted to move, a saint in that place with his gardens, his fruits, his prayers, recitations and teaching.

“Plowing the Rock”: Summation

I can sum my early years on PEI this way. The first pioneers were crushed between the urgencies of material existence and an unyielding wall of public apathy. The more secure we had felt in our earlier American teaching work, the worse we felt here. When I went out on errands, walking alone on the streets of Charlottetown, I would often feel the tears running down my cheeks and I would fight them back to conceal them from others.

We were faithful. We had many meetings among ourselves, studied the Word, held firesides, and observed the anniversaries and Feasts. We had lists of people to telephone. In the evenings the shabby Bahá'ís would go to one another's houses to hold weekly business meetings and to pray. But the heat would begin to fade out of the mystic coil of our isolated unity that held us together until we would have another visitor from “away.” For a week the glow would brighten and we would warm our hearts and be near.

When Dorothy Baker had visited in the late 40s, she inspected my black cloth “pioneer’s coat:”, then showing a greenish grey at the elbows and collar. She said, “I will make you some cuffs and a collar with some fur I have at home.” In her closely programmed life Dorothy found the time to cut the fur and to make neat circular cuffs and it collar stitched on a dark wool. In the box I received from Lima, Ohio, there were two housecoats that I had seen her wear at her home. {{p409}} One was a rose-coloured chenille. In 1954, on a snapping cold night in Vernon, came the telephoned news of Dorothy’s death. I was stunned. I sat down on the stairs and cried for her – and noticed that I was wearing the rose housecoat that she had sent.

Second Childhood

When I came back to Vernon to live, there was yet time allotted generously to me for another life. It was a rebirth of sorts, in which I found myoid friends again. My early days in the Faith had begun four short years after the passing of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá – early days which had a story-book quality. There were few Bahá’ís in 1925 and our first teachers were like apostles sent out to deliver the Message. These delightful and inspired teachers were destined to become our intimate and loving friends, promising an eternal relationship with us “in all the worlds of God”. For years their radiance was like stardust that brushed off on our young souls. It was now forty years since I had known them: Howard Colby Ives and Mabel, Grace and Harlan Ober, May Maxwell, Martha Root, Louis Gregory. Now, even Dorothy Baker had slipped through the door to the next world, although she was younger than I. While still in Charlottetown I began to write my stories. I took them to the Magdalen Islands and later on a teaching circuit in New Brunswick. At that time biographies of these people had not been written and the young Bahá’ís were eager for “real-life” stories about the heroes and heroines I had known. It seemed as if, at the mention of their names, these angelic beings came and joined us. I remember telling the stories in one place where the people stayed all night and we continued at breakfast the next morning. {{p410}}

I used the stories for a series of fireside talks that I gave at Bob and Shirley Donnelly’s. Young people were there now and music and a magic hospitality. Then, one night, it happened. All those years of Bahá’í Administration and school teaching and all the scar tissue of a childless life of pioneering were swept away by a waterfall of universal love. I had surrounded myself with fences, and now they were being washed away. I was “in my second childhood” in the Bahá’í Faith. “The more you love, the nearer you will be to God.”

That night I found a spiritual son, cold and isolated, critical, perhaps in self-defense, a youth from another province and new to the Faith. “He needs to be loved,” whispered the inner counsel, and I remembered how May Maxwell, of whom we had been speaking that night, had rescued ME from the prison of self. What had she done? What any of us can do if we care for one another. With a warm regard she had encouraged me to talk and she had listened – not talking much but with sometimes a quiet question. She did not veil her eyes. This was her way of teaching. She reached out for the soul at the same time saying inwardly the Greatest Name to establish the rhythm of the spirit.

So much is said about Love in the Teachings. It is a great and vital power, a worker of miracles because it is the key to the heart of the True One. It is, to recall the short obligatory prayer, the reason why we are created.

Bahá’í love is phenomenal; it is only partially of this world. The person facing you is a dwelling with two windows, the eyes. Sometimes these windows are veiled. You whisper the Greatest Name – the intimate one, “Yá Bahá’ul’Abhá” (O Thou Glory of the Most Glorious); you ask for a contact between yourself, the person or persons to whom you are guided, and the Beloved of the divine world. You ask that the Holy Spirit will vaporize the veils and that the fragrance • of the divine attar be diffused. You offer yourself to the {{p411}} network of helpers between this world and the next. Helpers like Howard, May, Martha, and Dorothy. .

Whom shall we love? Some people are known intuitively as I was known to Howard and May and Martha – people who knew me before I knew myself. You sense the capacity of the listener, a capacity which is from God. You ardently seek for a meeting of souls and are illumined.

That night I realized what I had lost in my years of faithfulness to the obvious duties of the Faith and knew, at nearly eighty, that life had just begun again.

In another year that young friend left this house in Vernon to start a brilliant career as a pioneer in the land he called “overseas”.

The years since have been wonderful. I am welcomed back to love. It is a concentration of love power that goes out like an arrow to certain hearts and seems to enter them. There have been many hearts – youths of more than usual capacity that I have come close to. They have borne me along on their young, strong wings. They have taken me with them to their pioneer posts in Finland, Vanuatu, Madagascar, Haiti, Macau and French Guyana. They have said prayers for me on their pilgrimages, deepened with me in their search for Bahá’u’lláh. The thoughts of my days are magnetized by a bond between my heart and the souls I have come to know since my rebirth into spiritual childhood. To these magnificent souls, who are the lights of my life, I want to say that the . bond between us, wherever we are, is charged with a redeeming power. If I had not stayed on Prince Edward Island I should never have known you; you are all iridescent motes in the atmosphere I breathe. I pray with you more than for you.

This book is also a result of that love power. It began with Howard Colby Ives.

He had not veiled his eyes when we gathered to hear him speak in 1925. He gave us the gift of a {{p412}} message that became life indeed. Howard Colby Ives, who had been taught the lesson of Love by the Master Himself, was truly “a lighter of fires in many hearts”. As one of his spiritual daughters, I aspire to be a link in the love-chain, passing on that heritage.

{Fires in Many Hearts} was encouraged first by Dr. ‘Abbás Afnán during a visit he paid to me Vernon. Gail Bowes assisted in the typing of the early drafts, which was then entitled {A Record of a Bahá’í Life}. Theresa Maloney helped me to sort through paper mountains and John Ward kept the copies of my manuscripts together. Roger White was one of the first readers and, through his brief notes, conveyed a supportive enthusiasm for my continuing efforts. Ann Boyles introduced the manuscript to an appreciative public when she produced a dramatic reading, {A Life of Service – A Life of Love: Excerpts from the Memoirs of Doris McKay}, at the Bahá’í Arts Festival in Lennoxville, Quebec in 1989. I am grateful to Don Maclean who took an editor’s fine tooth comb to the work and to Alanna Robertson Vreeland, Eric Maloney, Rosalind Cross, Kay Muttart and Ann Boyles who proofread the final drafts. Those who demonstrated a faith in this work by their material contributions include Eric Maloney, Louise Polland, Paul and Alanna Vreeland, and Bob and Shirley Donnelly. Herb Lee, presently pioneering in Macau, coordinated the final printing. Paul Vreeland, is truly my collaborator. It is his labour which carried Fires through to publication.

Lastly, the contributions of Lorna Tasker are obvious. In 1941 I wrote to her from Memphis:

“Our letters may not be the least part of our career. Parts of them may live after us, in fact I know they will if we ever {{p413}} get time to go through them and glean out the parts that belong to universal experience. We could spend a summer sometime and make a job of it with your letters and mine in one place.”

Lorna did make a job of it. The care with which she catalogued years of my letters and her dedication to our personal covenant of the “Burning Log” have also been critical in making {Fires} possible.

Foreword

From the Treasury of Remembrances of ‘Abbás Effendi

The following is taken from a letter by Frau Doctor J. F. to Frau Alice Schwarz-Solivo of Stuttgart concerning the interview the Doctor and Miss Stephens had with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the first week in March 1910. It was one of the many enjoyed by this German doctor, who was practicing in Haifa from 1906 to 1911. {{p1}}

Miss Stephens asked: “how does the bulime [sublime? — ed.] message of the Manifestation explain the controversy between predestination and man’s free will? How did it happen for instance, that I was born a female, an English woman, a Christian during the nineteenth century? Why am I not a man, a Chinese, a Confucian born in the year 1000?”

The Master replied: “O my daughter, you are asking so very much that His Holiness, Bahá’u’lláh could teach you all of this only in many days and weeks. Notwithstanding the short time (it is already ten hours — i.e. five o’clock p.m.) I shall try to open the door of understanding to the inquisitive knocker.

“It has pleased the Lord God to endow the child of man with three great mysteries. The complete unveiling of these mysteries takes place when our soul is stripped of the earthly body. The three great mysteries are:

1. The mystery of Good and Evil.
2. The mystery of the suffering of children and of animals (i.e. of the blameless creatures.)
3. The riddle of the human right of self-determination (i.e. free will)

“All of the great Manifestations of God, Moses, Christ, Muḥammad, Bahá’u’lláh and others show that these three different questions are co-related. As the speedily moving sun allows us but scant time to live, we will now in a general manner discuss the riddle of the human will with the hope that God the Lord may present us with a beautiful hour as we delve into the eternal laws of life and death.

“Listen then my children. The human soul is to be compared to a weaver; the human life is the thing woven, the cloth; the human body, principally the brain, is the tool, the instrument with which the weaving is done.

“God the Lord, the Master of the works, prepares the loom, that is the warp for the loom, the human milieu or environment with the ground — threads of fate. Thereby will be forced on the human being, the place, the time, the parents, the religion, nationality, society qualities, that is of gifted persons etc. The human soul then throws across the warp-threads the filling or woof by means of the shuttle that is the five senses, imagination, action, whereby up to the end of life as we say, are developed the masterpieces of the human life.

“The materials for weaving may be of hemp-yarn, wool or silk, or some other mixture — which cannot be chosen by the soul, nor can the soul select the tools, but only the pattern and the method of weaving, insofar as it is not already predestined by the material itself to a certain degree. The material represents the inherited, (that is taken over) body organization. {{p2}}

“What then is ‘freedom of will’, predestination, determination? A human being is absolutely determined by means of inheritance and from instinct. Your modern European philosophers and medical men lately define the instinct, as I am told, by the word subconscious, that is sympathismus, Lordsmain. The human being has, however, a relative freedom of will, or even better said, a freedom of choice, a variation of the will. Man is able to resist the insistence of instinct, the thriving impulses which come from knowledge and imagination, etc.

“O ye children of the Occident! I give you also a modern parable. Inheritance or instinct is the solid immovable track on which the train of life must travel. But the engineer, the soul, who directs the engine and steers, may go back and forward; he may go fast or slow, he can switch over to other tracks, stop at main or small stations or skip. And he observes or does not observe the technical, commercial, (that is the traffic and work) regulations.

“There exists in man a harmony, a quiet inner harmony, in brief, the unity between free and not free happenings, between conscious and unconscious will, that is desire. Thus there develops a harmony of human will and divine will, or better said, the unity of the human will of action with the eternal will of God. This results in peace of mind for man, his highest and most valuable treasure on earth.

“Our mission lies between will and duty. God alone can judge and measure the responsibility of our free will, brought about from inheritance or instinct, and demanded from us as duty. This He will do in His eternal justice. To whom God has given in the cradle much, from him He will demand sometime much.”

‘Akká Notes

Howard Struven

8 May, 1910

While in ‘Akká, and since my return, I have greatly regretted my inability to take in shorthand the talks given while we were there, but I am giving the few crumbs I gathered from the feast prepared for us, because every word of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s is a “wide-spread back.” This is a simple account of the manner in which we passed the days in Haifa, and I shall be most happy if I can convey even a little of the spirit which surrounded us to those who read these pages.

On Sunday morning, May 8th, 1910, after a stormy and restless night, we found ourselves at daybreak under the shelter of Mt. Carmel where we tossed about in the rough sea until a small boat took us ashore about six o’clock where we were immediately surrounded by many Arabs clamouring for passports, baggage, etc., but our brother Mr. Remey, who knew their ways went in search of a Bahá’í brother who returned with him and we passed the Custom House officers without delay or trouble.

At last I was in Haifa, the Mecca of all hearts in the Bahá’í world. Word having been sent to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá of our arrival, we went into Muḥammad-‘Alí’s Cafe, which was nearby, for breakfast while waiting for instructions, and shortly received word to go to the Grand New Hotel and make ourselves comfortable. This we did, accompanied by Enayatullah, and were scarcely established when our dear brothers Mírzá Núrí’d-Díne Janie, his brother Mírzá _____ and Mírzá Asadu’lláh came to bid us welcome, and our meeting was a happy one, and the morning passed pleasantly.

After the departure of our guests we had dinner, and feeling and feeling somewhat fatigue after our stormy voyage we laid down and slept soundly until five o’clock, when Mírzá Monever came for us to accompany him to Mírzá ‘Ináy-atu’lláh’s shop, where we met several believers, who proposed that we take a short walk, returning to the house ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lives for tea, which was served on the steps at the entrance, that we might enjoy the view.

To the left lay Mt. Carmel giving a splendid view of the Tomb of the Báb; just in front nestled close to the feet of the mountain was the German Colony, and away to our right stretched the beautiful Mediterranean.

Upon request, we related some of our experiences while drinking tea and left as the sun sank behind the mountain accompanied by Mírzá Núrí'd-Díne, who kindly consented to be our guest at supper though obliged to leave immediately afterwards. As we had received no word from 'Abdu'l-Bahá we remained at the hotel, but our instructions were not long in coming, for very soon Mírzá Munír came with the glad tidings 'Abdu'l-Bahá wishes to see you." Needless to say we hastened joyfully to His house and were told to be seated in a room with Mírzá Ḥaydar-'Alí, one of the son-in-law, Mírzá Haddi and another who greeted us. We sat quickly until 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered.

I knew him at once, though I could not tell why, as there is no resemblance to the photograph we have. Turning to Mr. Remey He said: "My dear son, Mr. Remey, Mr. Remey," then greeted and embraced Tamadden-ul-Maulk from Shíráz, Persia, who was with us, and myself.

After seating Himself, He motioned us to chairs near Him and said: "You are very welcome, I am very happy to see you! I have been waiting long for you. I would have seen you this morning but had promised your Persian brothers to go with them to 'Akká." Then followed inquiries about our health, the different assemblies and conditions in Japan, to which we replied to the best of our limited knowledge. Then He said: "The trip will bring eternal fruits and the results will be seen in the future. Many people make long tours and do much sight-seeing, but their journeys are fruitless."

Next He inquired about Professor Barakstullah, Siyyid Mustafa, Siyyid Ismail, Mírzá Maḥmúd, Mírzá Mahrean and others, and we conveyed their message of love and spoke of the loving kindness which he been shown us by the friends of God everywhere. This pleased Him very much. In speaking of Dr. Moody He said: "I have just received a letter from Dr. Moody in which she writes that at sixteen of the nineteen stations between _____ and Ṭíhrán the beloved came from the surrounding country to meet her just for the short time the train stopped, and showed her great love and affection." We mentioned the great need we had seen everywhere for teachers, especially teachers from America for the East, because the Eastern people are watching the rapid development in America, and an American commands in audience everywhere, and He replied: "When you return to America you must encourage the beloved to go to the East and teach. I have already written to Mr. McNutt, telling him to send believers and teachers to Japan." Arising He left us, after ordering tea, and soon after sent for Lammaden-el-Mulk for a private interview and when he retired I was sent for. I entered His room, which was plainly and poorly furnished and 'Abdu'l-Bahá sat on a divan near the window, occasionally looking out towards the sea.

At His request, I took a rocker near Him, and He said: "When I saw your cheerful face it caused me happiness. What is in the heart is revealed in the face.” I told Him of the joy I had felt when I received the beautiful tablet in Port Sa’id, adding that if He had commanded me to return to America without seeing Him, I would have gone with joy. With a smile He answered: “By these little papers or messages I have spread the great message of Bahá’u’lláh all over the world, and this would be impossible if all the armies would come together.” I asked what a teacher should do when at a loss to reply to a question. He said: “Turn your face to the Kingdom of God and whatever comes to the heart is the reply. Forget self.” “But I am so material” I protested, and he continued, “You will become enlightened and very spiritual. You must carry to the people the glad tidings.”

After getting permission to visit the Holy Tomb I placed in His hand all the supplications entrusted to me and left the room quietly, returning to this group of believers. Then Mr. Remey spent a short time with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and had just joined us again when eight Persian brothers entered: Mírzá ‘Alí Khán, Áqá Bahran Bahmaman, Behman Khoda Moradi, as Hadn Asys, Áqá Mírzá Habelbullah Khán, Mírzá Ḥabíb’u’lláh Khán, Rustaner Jamished and Áqá Mírzá Eaague and again tea was served and we told them of our good brothers everywhere, returning to the hotel at an early hour.

The following morning I woke early and immediately arose and looked out of the window toward the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, later joining Lammaddan el Mulk, who had also arisen early after a restless night, and talked with him until Karon joined us at breakfast, after which they visited ‘Ináyatu’lláh at his shop and I wrote letters until Mírzá Munír came to accompany us to the home of Mírzá Jalál who lives next to the house of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, where we had an interesting and instructive talk with Ḥájí Mírzá Hayde ‘Alí. While standing near a window ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left His house and in passing through the garden looked up and greeted us and sent for Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí, and we watched them as they passed from view down the street. Before returning to the hotel we spent a pleasant hour with ‘Ináyatu’lláh and Mírzá Haddi, after which I continued writing while my good companions read.

The weather was perfect, and Mt. Carmel looked so inviting that we took advantage of this opportunity to get some much needed exercise by walking up to the Light House and Monastery, first calling on several believers at their shops and partaking of tea with one hospitable brother, we wandered our way through the streets of the Colony of Germans who settled here many years ago to await the coming of their Lord. At the end of the main street in Haifa. In ascending the mountain we passed one of the caves where in olden times the dead were buried. Arriving at the monastery we looked down upon the city with its red-roofed houses, well kept gardens, dotted here and there with cedar trees with the sea sparkling in the sunshine. Just beyond and away in the distance lay ‘Akká, the City of yearning hearts, and we could but exclaim “How How beautiful! How beautiful!” One of the monks showed us the cave where Elijah the prophet had lived, over which the Altar of the Chapel is built. Before reaching the mountains we had passed the nunnery where it is said the nuns watch constantly at a window, which faces the Tomb of the Báb, for the coming of the Saviour. Some years ago ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went to this nunnery and was turned away. When we left the Monastery we passed through the gate leading from the grounds to the road along which we walked to the Tomb of the Báb, where we were greeted by the old gardener and shown into the room where the Blessed remains of the Báb are interred. While there I prayed for all of the Believers, mentioning individuality those of Baltimore Assembly, and my heart was filled with the spirit. The gardener gave us each a rose and we continued to a house which is being erected near the Tomb by M.D. Hádiéff, a believer in Russia, where the Persian pilgrims will be entertained when visiting ‘Akká. Returning to the hotel we were informed by Mírzá Munír that we were to dine with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá taht evening, so after a change of linen we hurried to his house and for an hour or more, talked with several believers, then we were invited to the dining room where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá awaited us.

Mr. Remey was given a seat on Hid right with Lummadden El Mulk next, and I was about to take a seat beside Him when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked me to sit in His left, a change I was most happy to make. During dinner He inquired about the food in India and asked about the capacity of the people there, to which Mr. Remey replied that our experience had been that love attracted them much more than argument, which was most fortunate, as our hearts were filled with love while we knew but a little about their Holy Books. In reply to questions concerning the Theosophists, we told him of the two meetings we held in Bombay which were largely attended by Theosophists who were greatly attracted and expressed a desire to have the Bahá’í books in their libraries. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The Theosophists say that punishment before the crime is not just – a man who has not committed a crime should not be punished. Thus when a child is born blind, crippled or otherwise defective they ask what this child has done and why it should suffer. In the animal kingdom we find deformed beasts and in the vegetable kingdom defective plants, trees and fruits. What are the fruits in these kingdoms? Have the vegetables and animals also existed before? These differences and changes are a proof of God. For example, an artist can paint a beautiful picture perfect in every detail and also he can paint an imperfect one. If he cannot do both he is not a true artist. The same is true of writers, etc.” This subject was more fully explained, but owing to poor memory I have but these few brief sentences. Several times during the meal ‘Abdu’l-Bahá looked at me and smiled and I noticed Him watching me as I peeled an orange. After I had separated the parts I offered it to Him and was made happy by His acceptance of it with a hearty “thank you”.

Then he arose from the table and we stood while He washed His hands and bade us “Good night, Good night,” in English. Following the example we washed our hands before retiring to the parlor where later in the evening coffee was served, after which we returned to the hotel and I closed another busy, happy day by writing until very late.

Owing to the long walk over the mountain I slept soundly and did not wake until seven the next morning and spent the time until dinner writing and calling on the friends at their shops in various parts of the city. Then continued my writing until two o'clock when we went to the home of Hájí Mírzá Muḥammad where we were served with tea and later joined by the eight Bahá'í brethren from Persia.

While we talked 'Abdu'l-Bahá came and took a chair in the corner near the window and as we resumed our seats He asked us to come closer, which we did, then He said: "the English King with his pomp and majestic grandeur used to address the sun and say: "Whenever thou movest thou art never disappearing from my lands'; to the clods said: 'Shower down the rains for they shall not fall outside my plains.' To the breeze he said: 'Whenever thou art wafting, a portion of my dominion shall meet those.' But now he is buried under the earth and is lost." Sometime ago we saw the flags on the top of the masts and they said it was the day of the ascension to the throne of the fore-mentioned King, but today the flags are half-masted because he is dead. The flags and banners of the Beloved are ever waving on the tops of the masts, it is never inverted, nay, rather, it grows brighter day by day, in fact theirs is the sovereignty. Without fighting forces they conquer the cities and without taking any tribute they bestow and give freely. The kings gain their victories through bloodshed and the taking of life whereas the Beloved of God confers life and are victorious. The sovereignty of the friends is an eternal one.

In speaking of our trip He said: "Trials and hardships, ordeals and oppressions befall the Beloved of God in Persia. In America the people will serve you, they will not allow you to escape. You cannot get rid of them." Mazon spoke about the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands, that many different nations were represented yet they were in great harmony, to which 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied: "Place and time play a great influence over conditions; when strangers meet in a certain place necessity requires that they should be in harmony, but our purpose is this: that the Divine unity and concord may become well established among all nations, so that they may become as one spirit in different bodies ; the drops of one ocean, the fruits of one tree and the rays of the same sun. In America when the different people united together they were enabled to drive away the English Government and establish a new kingdom for themselves. Then consider how great and grand is the result of unity and harmony. There has never been any action performed nor any philanthropic deed achieved except through unity and concord. Disagreement and dissolutions have always been the means of evil and corruptions."

In praising Mr. Remey and myself because we had been together in harmony for months, He said: "Animals are of two kinds, one is grazing and domestic and the other ferocious. If these wild animals be near each other for ten years still at the first opportunity they attack one another and tear each other into pieces; whereas the tame and blessed creatures show their kind feelings toward each other. But the people are not so, are they? The Beloved of God are like the blessed birds, they are so kind and merciful."

He then said that there was an amount of contributions sent from Persia for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in Chicago and we should take the same with us to the United States. I told Him since contributions had been sent to us from the East, we felt ashamed and He replied: "You should not be ashamed, nay rather you must be very happy, realizing the power of the word of God which has enabled the Beloved to send contributions from the small villages of Persia. Sometime ago, a few souls in America expresses their wish to journey to Persia but I told them to defer this undertaking for a while. Now the time has come and they can go in these days as there is no fear. As you both have been together during this long winter I hope that you shall be together on your journey to Persia in the future."

Concerning the different assemblies in America He said: "These centres must have a complete connection and a firmer union with each other, just as this fact is so strongly established between the various assemblies in Persia. Rest assured all this shall come to pass. Now is the commencement of the daybreak and the radiant morn is approaching. Look at the trees all over there; as soon as they peep out of the earth they receive the bounty of the sun, the shower of Mercy, the gift of breezes and though the same bounty is being bestowed upon them when they yield forth the leaves, blossoms and fruits, still there is great difference between that estate and the present." Turning to Mr. Remey He asked if he remembered the few Persian words he had learned and added; "the Beloved of God are endowed with a particular language through which they express their feelings and converse with one another. The sun speaks to the existing beings, the cloud communicates with the earth and the gentle breezes whisper to the trees. The help and confirmation of God which shall attend you in the future will be so great and magnificent that if you compare them with the present ones the former will be far greater. The two words East and West are imaginary words, there is no East and there is no West, all are one."

He then left us and one of the friends suggested that we visit the "Afnán" one of the oldest and most faithful believers in the ____ who lives in the house once occupied by Bahá'u'lláh. He is relative of the Báb and was one of the elderly Bábí's. Our meeting with the dear soul was most touching as he insisted upon being helped to his feet before greeting us, which was quite an effort as he is very feeble and bent with age. His spirit however is buoyant and young and he was most loving and kind. Tea was served by a young man who cares for him, and after an hour or more we took our leave and walked with some of the friends toward the convent and I noticed particularly how the window where the nun watches, faced the tomb of the Báb and home where 'Abdu'l-Bahá lives. Many have eyes to see, and see not. After supper at the hotel we joined the pilgrims and friends at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house and sat on the floor in true Persian fashion, partaking of sweetmeats which we had taken with us and talking until ten o'clock, when we returned to the hotel and retired.

On Wednesday morning, our Persian brother awoke with the birds and called us but I did not join him until time for breakfast. A trip to the photographers and a visit with the friends at the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and 'Ináyatu'lláh's shop kept us occupied until noon, when we had a dinner and a nap. Later Mírzá Nouradeen came and we accompanied him to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s home and I was shown to His room as He desired to see me. He shook my hand and told me to be seated near Him. I told him of the many presents sent by the friends and then spoke of the conditions in Baltimore, mentioning the need we had of a teacher whom we could depend upon for assistance and he inquired if there was anyone who could go to Baltimore and serve in this capacity. I explained that we had repeatedly endeavored to arrange meetings for various speakers and that frequent disappointments had caused us to cease the attempts and do what we could ourselves. His face lighted and He seemed so happy as He replied: “I am closely connected with Baltimore and have devoted friends there. You must teach and in the future many wonderful shall arise in Baltimore. The confirmation of the spirit will be much greater and stronger if the friends themselves arise and they will be assisted by the Power of God.” I mentioned a list of questions and replying in the affirmative to His question as to whether they were written, He said I was to give them to Mírzá Núrí’d-Dín and that he would answer them later.

In speaking of the need of education in Burmah and of the Persian American Educational Society, He said teachers must be sent to Persia, to teach the girls and women and that a school must be opened in Bombay. Mr. Remey was then called and many questions regarding education, the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár and the Universal House of Justice were asked, to which He replied, in part: “How is the time to establish a Bahá’í School in Persia for girls and now is the time for American teachers to go to Persia, but they should not go without the proper means of support.” About the temple. “Let the Believers have meetings and hold consultations. I must have something for them to do in order that they may come into closer relations with each other. Consult together and decide the matters. The Mashriqu’l-Adhkár must have nine sides, doors, fountains, paths, getaways, columns and gardens with the ground floor galleries and dome and in constructions and design must be beautiful.”

The Universal House of Justice will be composed of men from all parts of the world who will be selected from the various centers by the people, the number of members to be regulated by the people also. The laws made by the House of Justice will be as though made by God and whoever breaks them will be breaking the laws of God. It will cause unity in the world just as the Congress of the United States causes unity there. When Congress makes a law the people obey it. So it shall be with the House of Justice and Kings and rulers will be under its laws.

At this point we were interpreted by a caller whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wished us to meet and He said we would continue our talk another time. We adjourned to another room and I was given a seat beside Him while tea was served. After perhaps an hour He gave us permission to leave and by bidding us goodnight signified that we would not see Him again that evening. From here we went to the Tomb of the Báb and on our way met our good Persian brothers coming down the mountain and after a word of greeting we proceeded to the Holy Place and at the Threshold I prayed for all the Believers in the world, mentioning many by name, and I was bathed in the spirit. When we arrived at the hotel for supper we found the dining room filled with tourists who had arrived during the day, but we did not carry with them. Taking some pictures we wished to give to the Persian friends, we again wended our way to the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and I spent some time with Mirz Monever before joining the assembled group. One of those wonderful old pioneers in this Great Cause, who now lives in Haifa, told us how Bahá’u’lláh and His followers, also some of the “Nackazeens”, were sent to Haifa on an Austrian Lloyd steamer, then transferred to a sailing vessel and upon their arrival in ‘Akká were surrounded by soldiers and then began their long years of suffering a living martyrdom. He also told of meeting Prof. Browne, of Oxford University, in Persia, and those who have read Prof. Browne’s books remember the mention of ____.

The following morning after an exchange of greetings with the friends in ‘In-áyatu’lláh’s shop, was spent in a most unsatisfactory shopping expedition in which our patience was sorely tried and returned empty handed, though we had succeeded in getting a money order. I soothed my troubled spirit by talking with a good Persian brother. Immediately after dinner we sat out again and as before returned without the desired articles. Writing, talking and a refreshing nap took up a good part of the afternoon and we went again to the Tomb to pray, finding several other pilgrims there.

We were to dine with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá so, after the necessary preparation, betook ourselves to His house and were called to His room and after seating us rubbed attar of roses on our faces with His own blessed hand and said “Last night at midnight I was thinking of the trials and hardships you endured on your trip,” then He blessed us. After telling us that the Persian Believers had supplicated that they might dine with us, He told us to speak. Mason asked what about our future trip to Persia and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied that it would be best to have both men and women in the party as sometimes women can do greater work than men. Mr. Remey remarked that often we had wished that one of us was a woman as we felt we could accomplish more if this were true and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá laughed heartily.

After we had described the conditions in Burmah and India, mentioning the need of education, He said: “It will be better if some of the friends travel frequently through those parts rather than to settle there. If these instructions are followed by the Bahá’is in the various centres will do the rest. The Bahá’is in America could sent teachers to India.”

He then expressed a wish that we call upon an English woman in Haifa who was interested in the Cause and tell her of the kindness of the believers in different parts. Just here a believer came in and with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we went into the next room to greet him and after giving me a seat beside Him ‘Abdu’l-Bahá conversed in Arabic until supper was served. After seating us, eighteen in all, He walked up and down and said “Among the human race the bonds and means for love are numerous, for man cannot live without it, nay, rather the human life is dependent upon friendship and affection. Both the material and intrinsic development of man are conditional on unity and love, the greatest honor and pleasure in the human world is love, but the ways and means are different. Sometimes the cause of love is simply relationship and sometimes it is a racial bond, patriotism and political affairs, etc., but through all these bonds and means it is impossible to obtain a real and pure love, it is superficial and temporary. Such love may easily be changed into rancor and enmity, for it is subject to the slightest means of hostility, whereas a true and ideal love is faith and assurance. Those who believe in God and are confident in His word shall enter the kingdom and the essential oneness shall appear among them to such an extent that all become the drops of one ocean, the rays of one sun, the fishes of one sea, the trees of one garden, the birds of one orchard, the candles of one assembly and the stars of one heaven. This love is a real love, there is no interruption in this connection nor any separation in this union; this foundation shall never be destroyed for it is eternal, _____ it is established that the love which exists among the beloved of God is everlasting for it is a divine Bounty, a Godly appearance, a melody of the Kingdom and a heavenly connection. In the Qur'án it says: 'They love Him and He loves them.' That is the Bounty of Love is one of the Divine bounties which comes to man from God just as the sun when it sends its rays to the mirrors illumines them, this effulgence and splendour is from the bounty of the sun. Therefore, this love which exists among the beloved is a Divine Bounty, a Godly splendour, an eternal manifestation and the Power of Divinity; it is perpetual. Praise be to God! Ye are gathered here under the shadow of the Blessed Bounty and your hearts are overflowing with His love, your souls are rejoicing in His favors and 'Abdu'l-Bahá is serving you. What do you need further!" Jews, Zoroastrians, Christians and Muḥammadans, listened to these beautiful words. The meal finished, the most of our Persian friends left the room and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the son-in-law, interpreters, and servants eat down at the table and Mr. Remey had the privilege of serving this, the Greatest Servant of all.

As He passed into the next room after washing His hands and face, He turned towards us and said in English: "Come in, Come in." I chose a chair opposite to Him that I might look at His face while He talked.

On Friday morning we arose later than usual and had nearly finished breakfast when one of the son-in-law came on an errand for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to tell us we are to go to 'Akká in the afternoon. The Persian friends going in the morning.

At one o'clock a Persian friend, whom we had previously met in Port Sa'íd, joined us at the hotel as he was also going to 'Akká, and in fifteen minutes we were driving down town for Mírzá Haddi who was to accompany us. At last we were on the road to 'Akká, driving over the well known route by the sea with 'Akká coming nearer, nearer. Just before entering the city we left the carriage and walked to the house which for so many years was the prison house of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, made familiar by the many descriptions given by returning pilgrims. After a cup of fragrant tea we were shown the pictures of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb and I was struck by the great resemblance of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the picture of Bahá'u'lláh, and when I mentioned it to some of the believers they said there was also a great similarity of ways and voice. From the house we went to the Holy Tomb, leaving the carriage at the tea house. Just ahead walked 'Abdu'l-Bahá his long coat blowing about in the wind. When about half way to the Tomb He turned and smiled at us but did not stop. As we entered the Tomb, after removing our shoes, he gave us rose water saying in English, "Come in, Come in." Some fifty or sixty believers were assembled, and in the quiet of this Holy spot 'Abdu'l-Bahá chanted two prayers, then we entered a small room on the side while the Persian friends quickly withdrew, leaving Mr. Remey, our young Persian friend, Badi' Yazdí and myself to kneel at the threshold and lift up our hearts in prayer and supplication and once again I begged of God His blessing for all the friends. After finishing my supplications I rose quietly that I might not disturb my brothers who knelt beside me and was astonished to find myself alone. Just then 'Abdu'l-Bahá came from the little room, kissed the threshold and then joined the ladies who were assembled in an adjoining room.

We lingered for a time beneath the great trees near the Tomb before returning to the Tea House, where, from 'Abdu'l-Bahá we received instructions to enter the carriage and drive to the garden of the Ridván and were presented to the Governor of 'Akká upon our arrival as he was just leaving the garden. Returning to 'Akká we were joined by Mírzá Haddi and drove back to 'Akká at the close of a beautiful clear day to spend another evening with the friends in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house.

Saturday morning found us again at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house at an early hour and had been talking with Mírzá Munír but a few moments when Nashive came to tell us 'Abdu'l-Bahá wished to see us. We found Him correcting a tablet and after seating us with the usual kind inquiries about our health He returned to His work, saying we must wait as He had much work to do, so we sat quiet, happy to be in His Blessed Presence. I wish it were possible to describe the hour which passed all too quickly in this atmosphere of peace, harmony and love. It was a wonderful hour of contentment and bliss. The work completed, He turned to us saying: "You were with us in the Holy Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh yesterday and our hearts were gladdened and all were happy. Because of a dinner with the Governor I was unable to join you in the garden of the Ridván. You also saw the picture of Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb." When I told him that in seeing Him I saw Bahá'u'lláh He smiled and replied: "I am only one particle of Bahá'u'lláh. He was independent. He was the sun, while I am to Him as the moon is to the sun." Mr. Remey said both were the same and again he smiled saying: "I am depending on Bahá'u'lláh while He was independent."

Mr. Remey then asked many questions for the believers, receiving answers to many. In speaking of the House of Spirituality 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Every Assembly is a House of Spirituality and men and women must unite in these assemblies. The House of Justice has not as yet been formed; it will be formed of men.”

Mr. Remey asked if, since ladies were to accompany us on our journey, would it not be well if we were married. This ‘Abdu’l-Bahá highly recommended, adding they must be Believers so as to assist us in our work and perhaps have offspring to carry on the great work we had started. After asking us to come again in the evening to meet a lady who was interested in the Cause, He excused Himself, saying He wished to walk as He was tired. At His suggestion we joined the Persian friends but did not tarry long as they were busy. Later we saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá standing in one of the door of the Believer’s shops as we were going down to the Bazaar to again try our hand at shopping, and perseverance brought its reward and we returned bearing precious bundles, stopping a few moments in the shop where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had been standing. Refreshed after a nap, after dinner we dressed and walked out to the foot of the mountain to the School of the Prophets and saw from the outside of the room in which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived for some time after the departure of Bahá’u’lláh, and continued our walk to the Nunnery, visited the chapel and returned to the hotel for dinner.

When we arrived at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s home the Persian friends and many resident believers were assembled in the living room and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá joined us soon after and spoke to the Persian friends, until Miss Stevens was announced and was presented. The friends soon left and Mr. Remey and I talked with Miss Stevens about the cause until she took her leave, then we asked permission to leave also as we knew He was fatigued. A heavy shower came up so we remained below with some of the friends until it had passed and we were able to return to the hotel.

This evening, while sitting before this group of twenty-five or more believers, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá more than ever before appeared to me as a great and mighty king. The greatest monarch we ever lived had not even a small portion of the love and devotion which the people offer to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, before bidding us goodnight ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said “Tomorrow you must come to the mountain with us and then I will answer the rest of your questions.”

The next morning we slept later than usual and after a hearty breakfast accompanied Mírzá ‘Ináyatu’lláh to the Travellers’ house near the Tomb of the Báb where the Believers were preparing a feast in celebration of the Báb’s declaration. When the preparations were completed, tablets were chanted until noon when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá arrived. The friends, probably seventy went forward to meet Him and after greeting us he preceded us to the house. One could almost fancy that once again Christ walked with His disciples on this Holy Mountain, this glorious day.

Entering one of the rooms He took a seat in the corner of the divan and as the friends entered directed them where to sit. I wished to sit opposite that I might look into his wonderful face while He talked but He said in English “come here” and placed me by His side. For a few minutes He talked with one of the believers, a beautiful soul who had been exiled from his city four times. Then asked a believer to chant a tablet revealed by Bahá'u'lláh especially for the celebration of the Báb's declaration, after which He walked about talking with the friends until the feast was served, when He seated and served twenty six of us at a time until all had been served, being the last to partake of the Feast. While we were eating He walked up and down and said "There are different gatherings and various meetings held in the world which apparently are in the utmost degree of arrangement and order. In the places of the kings many a feast and banquet are held which are incomparable and peerless, also in the countries of the opulent once great entertainments are presented and all manner and various kinds of food and victuals are served," singing melodious tunes and musical instruments exhilarate and deeply strike the concourse. Associations for political affairs are formed and convivial banquets for _____ are offered. Assemblages for exhibit _____ literature and acquirements are _____ promotion of industry and _____ and extraordinary conventions and . But all these assemblies and _ not to be compared as equal to this, our _____ those gatherings and conferences _____ are produced which render grand service _____ cause mankind to progress and develop on _____ and promulgate the attributes and virtues of humanity, yet the results are limited, the _____ are finite and the signs bounded; whereas the _____ and results of this gathering are unlimited, _____ infinite for it is held on the Supreme Spot (the Tomb of the Báb) and under the shadow of the Blessed Beauty.

"This feast is one eternal feast. It has connection with and relation to the soul and the body; it shall be continued everlastingly. At least a hundred thousand feasts shall follow this one. All the other gatherings shall be forgotten whereas the commemoration and celebration of this meeting shall remain and be observed forever through endless ages. It is under the merciful glances of the Blessed Beauty."

"Once His Holiness, Christ, gathered the disciples together and having offered to them the Lord's Supper He advised them, admonished them and uttered certain teachings to them and then said: 'this is the Lord's Supper.' Now as this meeting was held under the shadow of the Blessed Beauty it should be called the 'Lord's Sustenance' and as the consequences of the Lord's Supper continued until the present time we hope that the results and affects of this 'Lord's Sustenance' may also become permanent and perpetual. In fact, there is no meeting better than this, for it is held in the vicinity of the Supreme Spot and the faces are so brilliant and radiant. What is there superior to this!"

How truly this scene reminded us of the picture of the Lord's Supper! The feast over, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the Tomb to rest, many of the friends doing likewise. I talked with Mírzá Núrí'd-Dín under the olive trees until tea was served at the Tomb after which the photographer of the group was taken. Soon after, with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, we entered the Tomb and each placed a rose on the Threshold, and then bowed our heads while 'Abdu'l-Bahá chanted.

Just previous to this Afán was helped to a chair which had been brought by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, as he was far too feeble to stand. After the chanting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left and we walked down the mountain to the hotel, returning again in the evening to pray before retiring.

Monday morning we arose early, for the days were passing, and every moment was precious. After making a few purchases we went to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house but being informed that three Mullás were waiting to see Him we remained outside, talking with Mírzá Asadu’lláh. Presently, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came up the street and stopping in front of me said; “You came in the afternoon,” then passed on and we went with Mírzá Asadu’lláh to his house, later returning to the hotel to do some writing.

We rested a while after dinner and then returned to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house and were summoned to His presence, and as we passed through the Hall he opened a door and in English bade us enter.

Joining us presently He came to me and patted me two or three times on the left cheek and kissed me twice on the right. Taking a seat He looked at Mr. Remey saying, “You have many questions; ask them.”

Later I asked about starting a centre in Sunbury and He replied “Very good. Tell the people there that I send my love and greetings to them and tell them about the cause. You are very fortunate to be here at this time. In the past some of the friends could only see me on a balcony from a distance. You came and it is easy for you to meet me here. Now you must go back to America and encourage the Bahá’ís to hasten to India, both men and women teachers must go to India, women in particular. Delay not. Now is the time for a party to go to Persia. Now is the time for teachers to go to Persia. The results of your journey you cannot now realize, but in the future the results will be clear and evident. Now you must go back to America and rest. You must be as clouds of rain to the people. Tell them of the glad tidings and of the love of the friends. You must leave on the Wednesday best.” I asked by what route we should return and He said it would be well to return via London and Paris. When I mentioned a previous plan of ours to visit Naples, Rome, Stuttgart, etc., He recommended it highly saying: “If you can do this it will bring good results.” After suggesting that we take tea with the Persians assembled in His room. He talked for some time with the Persian pilgrims when told a story of how and officer tried without success to obtain money from Him by trickery. Strangers coming in interrupted us so we bid him goodnight. Tuesday morning we arose earlier than usual, hoping to get to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house before He went out, but were disappointed, as we went to the post office, inquired about the steamer on which we were to mail and returned again to His house but we did not see Him. A walk with Mírzá Munír filled the morning. Twice during the afternoon we presented ourselves at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s with the disappointment of the morning repeated each time. A pleasant hour with Mírzá Stevens and consultation about our return to America left us occupied until evening when we retraced our steps to that most attractive of places, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house, and with the other friends had the pleasure of being with Him again and listening to His words. He spoke of our friends for some time and was just bidding them goodnight when Miss Stevens entered. He spoke to her about the greatness of the Cause and then asked if she had ever seen an Oriental Father with an American sin, and she confessed she had not. While holding Mr. Remey's hand in His left He said "I can something passing from his hand to mine, I can feel it is in my right hand, though it is free, I feel it rested. Love cannot be expressed in words, it is beyond expression and must be felt." Then He shook hands with us and we left.

The following morning we arose early after a restless night, finished packing and after breakfast went to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house, still undecided as to our homeward journey. We were received at once and we praised Mr. Remey and said: "Your body is tired and you must return to America to rest and regain your strength. Study Persian with Mírzá Aḥmad and after a while I will send you out again to fight. This I command you to do." Then, turning to me asked, "How do you wish to return?" to which I replied: "As you desire." He said: "You are strong, you have great strength, and as you are not worn out you must go to Cairo, Stuttgart, Paris and London, and travel in some cities in the United States. You must tell the glad tidings. You must be a column of fire. I want to hear good results from your journey." When I asked for His blessings, He replied: "Rest assured my prayers will follow you." After kissing my right cheek and embracing me He shook my hand and I returned to the hotel to make final arrangements for departure. At two thirty we had tea with Mírzá Asadu'lláh and then Mr. Remey went to the steamship office and I retraced my steps to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house and talked with the friends until our steamer came in sight, then all were called to His room, Mr. Remey having returned meanwhile, and He said: "You have had a long trip, in fact, you have shown a wonderful devotion. You left the West and you came to the farthestmost part of Asia. All tour journey you experienced hardships and difficulties yet the confirmations of God enabled you to spread the Cause and raise the summons of the Kingdom in all regions. The sun of truth shall send forth its rays, the breeze of favour shall pass over and rains of money shall be down upon the seeds which you have scattered and there shall be gathered many harvests. The results shall indeed be magnificent and glorious. Some of them you shall soon witness with your own eyes. When you return to America you must circulate in detail all the news and incidents of your long trip and fully inform the friends of the works successfully achieved throughout the different countries."

Now you have to rest for some time that your health and strength may be renewed. When a bird has for a long time been soaring in the air, it must come down for a while; after a long walk one must sit for awhile.

"I pray and supplicate at the divine threshold to confirm and aid you in all conditions and that the seeds scattered may grow rapidly and form a charming plantation."

Turning to the Persian pilgrims who were leaving also that day He gave them instructions and while tears rolled down many manly cheeks He embraced and kissed all of us and it was a sad moment. I went with Him to all other rooms and asked about my business, receiving this answer: "Visit some cities after reaching America, and after you arrive at your home continue in the same business, striving day by day to become more efficient. Treat this matter seriously and endeavour to learn as much as possible. With your right hand attend to your business, the left devote to the Cause. Rest assured you will be helped and you will be successful."

I said: "Now I am ready to go and serve the Cause and I seek your blessing and protection as I go alone." And He replied: "You are under the protection of God and I will pray for you."

After an embrace and a kiss on the right cheek He shook my hand and I left His presence with a sad heart, thinking that perhaps I should never see Him again.

The Persian friends were gathered about the gate and we embraced and kissed each other one as we bade them "goodbye and God bless you."

I looked up at the window of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room and there He stood. It was the last time that I saw Him but His glorious face will live in my heart forever. When receiving His kindly instructions I saw Him as a loving Father and as He embraced us and said goodbye, I felt that I was leaving home, my home of rest. To do my small part to serve His Cause.

From the hotel we drove to the custom house and with our Persian brothers who were also taking the steamer we had supper at a Cafe. Two of the sons-in-law and some of the friends came to bid us God speed. We embarked in the little boat for the steamer, waving farewell to our friends, as the sun sank behind the mountain.

Thus ended our last day in 'Akká.

“Prayer and supplication are two wings whereby man soars toward the heavenly mansion of the True One. However, verbal repetition of prayer does not suffice. One must live in a perennial attitude of prayer. When man is spiritually free, his mind becomes the altar and his heart the sanctuary of prayer. Then the meaning of the verse “We will lift up from before his eyes the veil” will become fulfilled in him. Whenever I wanted to go to the Palace of Bahjí to meet the Blessed Perfection, I walked alone and on foot, in order to be in an attitude of prayer. In the Mosque of ‘Akká for many years I had a simple room all to myself to which no one had access. New and then I would go there and stay one whole day, passing the day time in quiet Contemplation and prayer. But later on the affairs of the Cause became manifold, practically all my time to their dispatch and management. How I would love to be able to arrange now so that I might go away, alone and live in entire seclusion! For this reason I went to Tiberias, but it was not much of a seclusion.

Question: Is it right to address prayer to a Manifestation of God?

Answer: It is difficult for the human mind to understand the essence of God as for a watch to understand His spirit and therefore to draw near It. Otherwise we must form for ourselves a mental conception of God, which may be a false one. The only test of its truth lies in the influence this conception has on our lives; if it makes us kind and loving in our relations with our fellowmen, we may know it is a true one. In other words it must produce in our relations with hearts a love of God, which must be transmitted into love for man.

M. Root: “Great patience we must have towards the souls have heard and received this creative seed in the ground of their hearts, causing disturbances at times, even doubts reaching almost to denial. This very often means development, for the earth must be disturbed and ploughed up to bring forth the earth must be disturbed and ploughed up to bring forth. The greatest love and patience are required on our part to assist this development.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: A Bahá’í is one in whom all the human perfections are to be found in activity.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Do not distress others by eating they should not have done this or that. They will see by themselves. Talk about this only, so to speak, one by one with the friends, when you have opportunity.

From my early notes (told by Martha Root)

Bahá and the Governor

“Who are you?” asked the governor.

“You have the records and therefore know” replied Bahá.

“But who are you?” insisted the governor.

And all present saw a light.

“That is sufficient,” said the Governor.

(Bahá said that the Kings and Emperors and 50 million people were his “heralds”, those who persecuted him and the Bahá’ís)

Mrs. Parsons in Haifa

When Mrs. Parsons first learned of the Faith, she was one of the social arbiters of Washington, very conscious of her wealth and position. She decided to go on a tour of the Mediterranean countries and would call on this person ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for whom great claims were made.

On arriving there in the Master’s home, she was met with great courtesy but no one seemed aware or conscious of her position. On awaiting for her first interview with the Master, she was kept waiting for what seemed to her an insultingly long period. At last she was summoned to His presence. With head held high, fully aware of her own dignity, she walked through the doorway to the audience chamber. Immediately, a dazzling, blinding shaft of light seemed to stream from the Master’s eyes to penetrate hers. After a moment of unconsciousness she found herself lying prostrate on the ground and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lifting her up!

On another occasion she asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá if he was the Christ. Immediately the figure of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was replaced by a tree in which stood a blazing fire.

She walked up Mount Carmel to the Báb’s Tomb. She prayed so earnestly that if this Message was the truth for God to send her a sign!

A dove flew to her and nestled on the bosom of her dress.

Mrs. Parsons: ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told her to teach the poor; even those she could not reach. Then in a dream, it came to her that the “poor” were those of her own station in life. She won the co-operation of her natural associates in humanitarian work first, then won them for the Faith.

An American pilgrim spent two months in Haifa. There was one humble insignificant soul who never seemed to perform any service or partake of any of the meetings except to pour rose-water over the hands of the visitors as they passed out of the Master's presence. The American said, "I've forgotten the faces of all the other's present, except his face."

Marjorie Morten: Mrs. Morton visited Haifa when suffering greatly from ulcers. Sitting at the Master's table for her first meal, she wondered if she dared eat of the pélaú which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had set before her. She struggled through it; then He set a second plate before her and told her to eat. This she felt sure would cause her great suffering, but she wished to obey her Lord. The third time, a plateful was set before her. She thought, "I will surely die obeying my Lord!" In the morning she awoke, free from pain for the first time in months — her ulcers had disappeared!

Auto-generated Table of Contents

On my return to Washington in June 1910 from my trip around the world in company with Howard Struven I settled myself at home with the prospect of developing my practice of architecture. To be sure I was more interested in the development of the Bahá'í Cause than I was in my Architectural business, nevertheless it seemed wise for me to try to work both together. That fall and the following winter I had an office in a building on the northeast corner of H Street and Vermont Avenue with rooms facing the old Arlington Hotel opposite. Here I had various small jobs in architecture and this finally led to a fairly important job, the building of the District of Columbia Home for the Blind in Georgetown on F Street opposite Montrose Park.

At this time I was still interested in the teaching of architecture. The George Washington University where I had been Assistant Professor of Architecture for several years had all but gone on the rocks financially during my year around the world so in the fall of 1910 in order to re-trench expenses, the University gave up the school of architecture. Some of the former students banded together and formed an Atelier and at various times I was asked to criticize their work which I gladly did. Then it occurred to me that it might be well for me to open a school of architecture of my own. Later this proved to us to be a burden that I regretted having undertaken but in the enthusiasm of the moment the "Remey School of Architecture" was formed and started in the fall of 1911 with thirty-five students.

In the summer of while I was in the midst of my preparations to open the school, I had a cablegram from the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá sent from Thonon in French Savoy. As I recall it read as follows; "Today I arrived in Europe. Come." It was mid-summer and I was in the midst of a great deal of work, furthermore I had no money for such a trip. However one of the Bahá'ís called to see me and I explained to him the dilemma in which I was. He chanced to have a hundred dollar belonging to someone else but it was in his keeping for the time being. This he offered to loan me and I accepted it with the assurance that at the end of two or three months I would return it. This made my way fairly easy. My parents were at that time summering in Jamestown, Rhode Island. I wrote them my intention of going to Europe. They didn't sympathize with my move but they didn't put any impediment in the way save that I wanted to get into the house at 1527 New Hampshire Avenue to get some clothes for the journey end this they wouldn't allow for fear that something might happen to the house. As it was I went with what summer clothing I had and get along all right. I therefore got my passport, made my reservations and started leaving Washington by a morning train and reaching New York in the early afternoon. I went directly to the Cunard docks where I boarded the Lusitania and sailed within an hour or two for Liverpool.

I travelled third class. As I recall my tickets cost me between $28 and $29. The dollar went a long way in those days. On my arrival five days and a few hours later in Liverpool I took a train for London expecting to continue on after a few hours rest, to the continent for I imagined the Master was still in Switzerland. In order to find out more about His movements I called on Miss Rosenberg expecting in all probability to cross the channel that night leaving my luggage at the station.

On meeting Miss Rosenberg at her apartment she informed me that the Master was at that moment in London Staying at Lady Bloomfield's apartment In Candogan Gardens. At a small nearby hotel several of the Bahá'ís were staying and there I went going over to Lady Bloomfield's that evening to meet the Master. As I enter the rooms after greeting me He said, "I wanted very much to see you but the special reason why I wished you to come no longer exists. However I am glad to see you."

There were a great many things happening those days in the Bahá'í World in London. Every evening after dinner a group would assemble in Lady Bloomfield's drawing room; Bahá'ís and coming with the others interested in the Cause. Hippolyte Dreyfus was there from Paris. Miss Wright we there from Boston and there were various other of our friends whom I had known elsewhere also there assembled.

The Sunday morning that I was there I met Daniel Jenkyn of Saint Ives, Cornwall. He had believed for some time. He had clerkship in a small business in Saint Ives and hearing the Master was in London he took an excursion train up travelling all night long, third class arriving early in the morning in London. He spent the day with the Master and then returned that evening to his home. I went to the station with Him to see Him off. I was much impressed by his devoted spirit and the enthusiasm of his faith. We corresponded for several years until his death. His friendship was one of my many bright Bahá'í experiences.

One every amazing incident happened one night at Lady Bloomfield's. A middle-aged woman, wished to sing for the Master and an appointment was made for her to come. She arrived with her accompanist, a long-haired individual in appearance quite the typical musician of twenty-five years ago. The Master was standing on the balcony looking down into the garden with his back to the room when the music began. The man at the piano striking a great many notes at once and the singer starting in on a very high note. I recall the Master's turning in a somewhat startled manner and then listening attentively to the program.

Mrs. Stannerd and I chanced to be sitting on an over-stuffed sofa. The ludicrous side of the situation and the terrible music started me laughing. I didn't dare look at Mrs. Stannerd for fear of laughing out right, nevertheless from the tremble of that springy sofa I know that she was laughing and I had great difficulty in suppressing my laughter and controlling myself. Finally when the singing was over the Master thanked the lady and told her that he hoped and prayed for her success in her music.

One afternoon Mrs. Thorn-Cropper took the Master driving in her automobile inviting me to be of the party. We drove through London and out into Richmond Park and after an hour or more we returned to Condogan Gardens. Lady Bloomfield's apartment was on the third floor and as we mounted the stairs I offered my hand to the Master and I was surprised at the weight that he placed thereon. All the way up the stairs He bore most heavily on my arm. I have often thought of this.

The highest dramatic point of my visit in London was the night the Master spoke in the City Temple from the pulpit of the Rev. R. J. Campbell. One of my previous visits to London I had been to the City Temple to hear Dr. Campbell preach. The friends at that time felt that he was preaching some of the Bahá'í principles and had made contact with him which resulted in his inviting the Master to his church. Hippolyte Dreyfus and Wessley Tudor Pole sat up in the pulpit with the Master and Dr. Campbell. Mírzá Asadu'lláh was there. He was the only one of the Persians who wore the all white fez and turban like the Master's; all of the others wore the dark colah. The fact that Mírzá Asadu'lláh wore a head dress exactly like the Master distressed some of the Persians very much because they felt that this called away attention a bit from the Master that Asadu'lláh should wear exactly the same head dress. As we were entering the church Hippolyte said to me, "You take Mírzá Asadu'lláh and keep him in the pew with you. He wants to it in the pulpit and we can't have that. It would look to the people in the church as if there were two Masters here instead of one." I therefore sat beside Mírzá Asadu'lláh in the pew. Before the singing of the first hymn Mírzá turned to me and said, "Immooz hexcretta mesic inja es" which Persian words I understood (I write this down as I recall tem. My imperfect knowledge of Persian probably requires correcting). The service that night and the Master's address has been written up so many times, it is not necessary for me to write it again save to say that it was a wonderful occasion. There was spiritual enthusiasm in the audience. After the service was over I and Lad Bloomfield's two daughters went out the main door and around into a side street to the entrance of the pastor's study and here waited for the Master to come out. It was semi-dark in the street and between the door and the waiting automobile was a line of people in the crowd I recognized and spoke to Miss Alma Knobloch who had just arrived in London. As the Master passed out to get into the carriage several people reached toward him to touch his robe. Lady Bloomfield's two daughters and I followed him to the house and the Master then dictated several telegrams and cablegrams to various parts telling of that evening's meeting and Hippolyte and I went to a telegraph office late that night to send these messages.

Leaving the Master after four memorable days with my heart willed with joy and happiness, I took a train for Southampton spending the night there and embarking the following morning on board the "Oceanic for New York". I arrived eight days later. The steerage accommodations on the Oceanic were not as good as on the Lusitania. On the Lusitania there were three of us in the large cabin with bunks for six and the food was good of its kind and fairly neatly served. On the Oceanic things were tougher but the passage was soon over and I was put to very little inconvenience by my surroundings.

One meets all kinds of people in travelling. I remember on the way over a young man in the Steerage, an Irishman by the name of William Power; a gentleman in dress and appearance, but one who seemed to be quite at home in those surroundings. We talked frequently and from the people whom he knew in this country and his general main I recognized him to be of my own class. We nevertheless never alluded to the fact that we were travelling third nor that we were used to anything better than we were having at that moment.

I struck up a pleasant acquaintance with a working man on the return voyage, a Brittisher by birth but who had lived for some years in this country where he worked at the Crane Haper Mills in Massachusetts. He seemed to be a very staunch America. He liked the life here and from what he said I feel that he was most loyal to his company where he had worked for many years. Speaking of his relation to his employer, he told me that when his wife had died that Senator and Mrs. Crane came to the funeral. That seemed to be a very telling thing to him.

I never had any acquaintance with Senator Crane, but I remember Mrs. Crane some time after this when the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in this country. She was attracted, came to some meetings and tried to arrange and interview for 'Abdu'l-Bahá with President Taft. The interview was arranged, the time was set and the Master was taken to the White House, but before he got out of the carriage under the main portico of the building word was sent out that the President couldn't receive him.

I don't think many of the Bahá'ís know this. Very little was said about it at the time, but it made a lasting impression upon me. (Mrs. Crane was formerly Miss Josephine Boardman. The Boardmans were intimate friends of the Tafts. I recall when Mr. Taft came here for his inauguration, instead of going to the hotel as so many incoming presidents have done, he and his family stayed at the Boardman's house.)

Landing in New York about noon I took an early afternoon train down to Washington. On the train I met Mrs. Emmons of Washington formerly Mrs. Ogen-Jones of Paris, a lady whom I had known for some time at home and abroad. By this time I had shifted my steerage clothes to my usual attire. She had just landed from Europe that day by another liner, so we talked of Europe.

On arriving in Washington I found that my business had not suffered during my absence. I had been gone just seventeen days, having spent four days in London and the rest of the time on the ocean and my expenses were just within my hundred dollars. Of course, while in London I had to spend money and live like other people but I made up for that by economizing in travelling. Father and mother were not as upset over my trip as I had feared they might be.

THE MASTER 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ IN WASHINGTON

Some little time after landing in New York the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá came to Washington arriving here one day in the middle of the afternoon. A number of us knew the hour of his arrival and went down to the Main Station to greet Him. I will never forget standing in the station looking toward the train shed as He followed by several of the Persians walked up the platform. I could scarcely believe it possible that He was actually here with us in Washington, for only a few years before He had been held an exile and kept a prisoner in the Fortress of 'Akká.

Mrs. Barney sent her car to the station to take the Master to Mrs. Parsons' home on the northwest corner of R and 18 Streets. Several of us followed Him thither as quickly as possible. I reached the house about half past four and shortly after this Mrs. Parsons ordered her carriage to take the Master out for drive.

Faríd was in the carriage with us, the Master beckoned me to enter. There may have been others in the carriage too, but I only recall the two of us with the Master.

At that time the political controversy was at its height between Roosevelt and Taft. There was much mud slinging and political intrigue. In speaking of this the Master said that the time would come in the history of America when the man best suited for the position would be chosen for president and the office would be, as it were, forced upon him. Then men would cease to go out and try to get themselves elected.

That morning I had had a letter from Miss Celia Hichmond of Green Acre expressing the hope that the Master would come to Green Acre. During the drive I spoke to the Master about Miss Richmond's letter saying that she and others hoped He would come to Green Acre. He made no reply to the direct question but broke silence by saying, "At Green Acre they have espoused many causes but without results. Had they espoused one cause they could have had great results by now. A harlot who has a hundred husbands will have no children." Later in discussing the policies of Green Acre I told this incident to some of the friends and they were much impressed thereby.

As we drove around through the Mall I pointed out some of the public buildings to the Master. When we sighted the Washington Monument I directed attention to it and with a certain feeling of showing-off the beauties-of-Washington I remarked that the Washington Monument was even higher than the Great Pyramid. Where upon the Master replied that every time he had looked at the Great Pyramid it had depressed him very much for he felt the suffer in of the many thousands of slaves who labored and gave their lives in the building of that great structure. Furthermore He remarked on the futility of the Great Pyramid for at most it was but a tomb to preserve the body of the king for a few years, inferring that spiritual realities were to be sought and attained to rather than those of the material self.

As we encircled the Capitol I suggested to the Master that He leave the carriage and walk around on the western terrace or the building to see this view of the city. The sun was low on the western horizon as we arrived at the Center of the long terrace directly west of the dome. I told the Master that many times I had stood at that spot and prayed for the success of the Cause in this country.

It was shortly after my coming to Washington that I made a pilgrimage to the Capitol at sunset for nineteen nights repeating the Greatest Name nineteen times at each corner of the building and once on that spot on the western terrace where we then stood. In all ninety-five times but during those nineteen days it never once occurred to me that the time would come when I would stand at that particular spot with the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself.

The afternoon that the Master arrived in Washington he took me aside and said to me, "You have been many times in my home and my home always is your home. Now that I am in Washington I would like to go to your home and to meet your parents." I told him that I would try to arrange it. I returned to my home at 1527 New Hampshire Avenue, little more than a block from Mrs. Parsons' house and told my parents that the Master was here and that I had been entertained many times in His home and that I would like to entertain Him here in my home. In fact I told them that it was His wish. My parents, who were at that time very much opposed to the Bahá'í Cause, refused to let me receive the Master. My mother said "If you wish to entertain Him make arrangements at some hotel and entertain Him there.

I have thought many times of this blessing that my parents refused. They lived in that house for a number of years. It became an intolerable burden to my mother; so much of a burden that her health broke down under the responsibility of running the house and she and my father were obliged to live in hotels for a number of years. In fact my father died in a hotel; not in his own home. One day father and mother were bewailing their lot, that it was impossible for them to live in that house any longer that they were obliged to live in a hotel and I reminded them of the incident when the Master was here telling them I felt sure that had they received Him in their home they would not have themselves been turned out and obliged to live in hotels. I reminded them also that they had suggested my entertaining the 'Master in a hotel.

When my mother had her general breakdown in health in the summer of 1922 and she was hovering between life and death, I cabled to the family of the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the Holy Land asking for their prayers on my mother's behalf. Within twenty-four hours after the cablegram was sent one was received saying that they had visited the Holy Shrines on Mount Carmel to pray on my mother's behalf. By that time she out of danger and on the road to recovery and although her recovery was very slow she gradually became better and better. When she was able to talk and think of things I told her of my cablegram and of the prayers of the Mater's family on her behalf. Her heart was very much touched as was also that of my father. They could scarcely believe what I told that was true and were heartily sorry for not having received the Master in their home, happily all of this family inharmony has ceased and now my family feel fairly sympathetic toward the Bahá'í Religion.

A year or two after my mother's illness I sent a votive thank-offering to Shoghi Effendi in the form of a nine sided shield of marble inscribed with "The Greatest Name" which he most preciously had placed over the main portal of The Tomb of The Master.

In all during the Master's visit to America He came to Washington three times. The first time he stayed at Mr. and Mrs. Parsons' house. The second time which w short visit of but three dye as I recall it, He stayed in a small apartment house on Irving Street not far from 14th Street. I think the Ripley family lived there at that time and the last time that He visited Washington he rented for a few days a house on the northeast corner of 18 and T Streets and here He stayed and received many people.

Mr. and Mrs. Parsons had finished their new house a few months before the Master reached America and they had just gotten it furnished and settled in time for His visit. He remained there some days. He occupied the corner room on the main bedroom floor. A large assembly room to the left of the entrance in the lower floor of the house was where He held most of His gatherings. There every afternoon at four o'clock numbers of people would assemble. Quite a mixture of people from the social standpoint. Often there would be colored people in the group and in those days the line of social distinction in Washington were much more drawn than at present. However the Master's presence and His spirit dominated these human conditions. I remember at one meeting seeing Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins seated and next to her a colored woman.

At one of the afternoon meetings the Master entered the room with a large rose in His hand. He passed through the doorway little Lelah Bowman, then a child of about three years, was standing near. The Master picked her up in His arms and took her in with Him. At the end of the room a platform about a foot high had been arranged. The Master placed little Lelah on this platform with the rose in her hand. She stood looking at Him with rapt attention and a beautiful child's smile on her face. Then He made a short address. I don't remember His subject but as he talked He walked slowly up and down in front of the platform and seemed to be addressing His discourse to this little child whose eyes followed Him to and fro.

The first evening that the Master was here in Washington. He attended and spoke at a gathering of the Persian American Educational Society that Mírzá Aḥmad had stalled. This was in the auditorium of the Carnegie Public Library. I recall standing in the rear of the hall and there I met a young Episcopal clergyman who asked me a few questions about the Master and the teachings. At the close of the Master's address we went into the lobby and there we had a conversation of some length. I don't recall the young man's name but I saw him several times afterwards and found him sympathetic to the Cause.

As I look back on the Master's visit certain mental pictures come to my mind but I cannot be sure on just which of his three visits many of these events occurred. However I will recount them as I recall them.

One Sunday mornings about quarter to eleven o'clock the Master left Mrs. Parsons house and walked down the west side of 18 Street between Q and P Streets on the opposite side of the street from St. Thomas Episcopal Church. People were going into the church yet many turned to look at the striking figure of the Master as He walked down the street with several of the Persians several us Americans following.

Across the street and evidently bound for the church was a father leading two small children by their hands. When the children saw the Master they started a diagonal course across the street, tugging at their father's hands who followed their lead. They walked up to the Master smilingly and stood before Him. He stopped for a moment, put His hands on their heads in blessing and then passed on. I never knew who they were, but if these children living they are grown up people by now. One often wondered at the things the Master did and why He chose certain ones for certain blessings.

The largest entertainment given by Mr. and Mrs. Parsons during the Master's visit to Washington was a reception in their home with invitations sent out in the name of the Persian American Educational Society. Why they didn't give it in their own name I don't know. It would have been better in my point of view but at that time Mírzá Aḥmad was at the height of his career and it was his plan of bringing the Persian American Educational Society before the social world of Washington, to have the Parsons invitations go out in the name of his society.

Social Washington was there, but it was with a certain amount of difficulty that Aḥmad invited some of his friends. For example, Mrs. McNeal who was always a friend of the Cause and a very fine outstanding character in Washington, was in the business of making surgical supports and one department of her business was that of the making of ladies corsets. Now, Mrs. McNeal was well known to many society matrons of Washington because in her establishment their corsets were made. Now, in the planning of the lists of invitations there was a question as to whether the McNeals should be invited or not. What embarrassments would follow if they should meet? This was Mrs. Parsons' problem. It was purely a social question and as it turned out they were there and I personally was very glad to see them there for I had known Mrs. McNeal and her daughters for many years. They were very good friends of mine, but then an independent man may have friends in various social groups and get by as it were without having many conflicts between his friends if he keeps them separated one from another. But this is a problem all of its own which I will discuss in another chapter of these memoirs.

The reception at the Parsons home was a great success. A string quartet gave music in the assembly room on the entrance floor while the Master received in the library above. Everybody seemed happy except old Seyyed Asadu'lláh. He was a Persian of the old school. It was hard enough for him to meet women in this western world even when they were clothed for the street with their persons covered, but to face a lady in a very décolleté evening gown was more than his modesty can stand. I met him in the upper hall way. He was looking into the library as the line of guests passed to shake hands with the Master. In that year I remember ladies were "laced up" so to speak; drawn at the waist very slightly which lifted their breasts abnormally. They were all passing to shake hands with the Master. Seyyed turned to me in great distress saying, "Haven't they any shame? Didn't they realize in whose presence they are?" and many other similar remarks showing his horror at the situation.

Whatever the Master's sentiments were regarding the evening dress of the typical American woman no one would have ever guessed from His mien. He was perfectly at home. No one would have dreamed that He had never been accustomed to anything else.

One morning when I was at Mrs. Parsons' home many bouquets of flowers had been sent in to the Master and Mrs. Merrideth the housekeeper, was, at the Master's instructions, gathering together an armful of these flowers. The Master was driving over to Arlington with Mrs. Parsons and He wished to place these flowers on the graves of Mrs. Parsons' parents, General and Mrs. Royall. I understand that He made a prayer there at their graves and later drove around through the cemetery. On his way He passed within a few feet of the monument on the Remey plot in the Fort Meyer division of the cemetery my Father is now buried.

Another outstanding incident of the Master's visit was one morning when we all went down to St. Paul's Cemetery, Alexandria, to visit the tomb of Colonel d'Lagnel. Madam d'Lagnel, Claudia Coles, and I were at the Master's house on 18 and T Streets at half past six in the morning. An interpreter accompanied us and we all brought flowers. I had in my hand some chrysanthemums tied with a broad white ribbon. When we arrived at the d'Lagnal plot in the cemetery we got out and handed the flowers to the Master that He might place them on the tomb. When I handed Him my bunch He carefully untied the ribbon, putting it aside, and then placed each flower separately on the marble slab, after which He made a prayer and we all returned to Washington.

On arriving in the city we drove directly to Claudia Coles' apartment in the "Iroqua" on the south side of M Street between 14 and 15 Streets. Her little grandchild, Mary, was there. Marie Hopper was at that time living with Claudia and her little daughter, Lorraine, was also there. Their colored cook whose name I have forgotten brought her two little black children to see the Master. The Master sat in a large arm chair with all four children in his arms. It was one of the beautiful mental pictures that remain of His visit.

On Sunday morning I was calling on the Master at the Parsons home. He and Mr. Farms were in the library talking through one of the interpreters. They were discussing the negro question in America. Mr Parsons remarked that he wished they were all back in Africa; everyone of them. Whereupon the Master replied, "Very well I will take them all back to Africa, your own household servants included." "Oh," said Mr. Parsons, "I don't want them to go." Oh, replied the Master, "Then you don't really want them to go back to Africa after all." and He laughed. (Mr. and Mrs. Parsons had had for years in their employ several very good colored servants. Wilbur, their house man has developed into a firm and ardent Bahá'í.)

One day the Jewish rabbi Dr. Simon called on the Master and asked Him to come the following Saturday evening to the synagogue and there speak to the Jewish congregation. At the appointed time the Master arrived at the synagogue, on the west side of 8th Street between H and Eye Streets, N. W. The building was filled. I with a number of other Bahá'ís was seated in one of the galleries. A service was in progress. The Master and His interpreter were given seats on the platform. Someone was reading a long article in praise of the Rothschild family in Europe. This lasted a long time. All were waiting for the Master to speak.

Finally the Master entered the pulpit and began His address with a resume of the glory of the Hebrew Prophets. Then He talked of Jesus and before that large audience of Jews He declared the Divinity of Christ. As His talk progressed there was a certain uneasiness in the audience. One of the chief members of the congregation, who with others were seated back of the pulpit, spoke to the Rabbi to try to stop the Master's talking, but the Rabbi shook his head. Finally two of these individuals talked to the Rabbi and brought such pressure upon him that he interrupted the Master's interpreter and said that they wished the Master would cease talking. The Master turned to the Rabbi and those behind him on the platform and with all humility and great dignity said, "You asked me to come and speak to you. I am here but I have not yet finished speaking and thereupon He turned and finished His address. Toward the close that teneseness which marked the first phrases of His talk regarding the Divinity of Christ all passed and quietness settled down over the audience.

When the service was over I was one of the first to go down into the vestibule. Before the doors were opened from the auditorium for the people to go out. There were several old Jews in the vestibule expressing their horror that anyone should ever mention the name of Christ in their synagogue. Then the Master left the building and went to His house on 18 and T Streets. I hurried to the house. On the way I chanced to meet my old friend Delos Smith. I told him, where I had been and where I was going and he went with me to see the Master. The Master was seated in a large arm chair and as we came in He said "It was my chance to deliver to them the message of Christ and child they torn me to pieces shred by shred I would have had to speak that message" and then He laughed heartily at the dismay of some of the members of the Jewish congregation. I chanced to be at the Master's house the following morning, when Rabbi Simon came to thank Him for His address. It was plain to see that the Rabbi was very pleased at what the Master had said.

Several people of prominence entertained the Master in Washington. One evening He went to the house at Dr. Alexander Graham Bell and addressed a group of people. I was not there but was told that in His address. He complimented Dr. Bell on the invention of his telephone. Said the Master, "Through your marvellous invention you have united the people of one vest city so that it is us easy for them to converse with one another as if they were all living in one house and through you invention the people of the countries of the world find it as easy to communicate with one another as if they were all living in the same city. This invention is of marvellous material benefit to the world, but had you been able to unite the hearts and souls of mankind spiritually as you have united them in their conversation you would indeed have done a very greater service to humanity. This was told me by one of the interpreters who was present.

At the time of one of the Master's visits to Washington Mírzá 'Alí-Kulí Khán was Charge d'Affaires for Persia and was living with his family in a house then used as the Persian Legation – a private house on the west side of 16th Street one door above the corner of Swann Street. One day the 'Alí-Kulí Khans entertained the Master at mid-day dinner. Persian food was served. Many of us Bahá'ís were there together with other people. After lunch the Master took a short rest and then received people individually and in groups in the library as front room on the second floor of the house. This lasted all afternoon. I remember being in the room when Admiral Peary came to call. Said the Master to him, "You have done a great service to humanity. For centuries men have questioned what there was at the North Pole, Now you, after a long time of effort and much suffering finally went to the North Pole and returned to tell the world there was nothing there at all. You have indeed for once and for all put to rest the mind of the world on this question. You have done a service to humanity. Later on I was talking with one of the Persian interpreters about this interview and he told me that after Peary had gone the Meats had made a remark to the street that Peary had not really gotten to the North Pole and that he, Peary himself, was perfectly aware of this fact.

Among my friends in Washington in those days was Mrs. Buckner M. Randolph whose husband was a practicing physician in this city. Mrs. Randolph was of great personal charm. She was the daughter of Col. Rathbone who married Miss Harris. These two were in the box at Fords Theater with President and Mrs. Lincoln the night of Mr. Lincolns assassination. Mrs. Randolph was a very accomplished musician. She played the piano.

I well remember the first time that I met Mrs. Randolph. I was some years before at the home of Mrs. P. C. Johnson of Washington whose daughter Isabel and I were old friends. I happened to be strumming on the piano when Mrs. Randolph entered the room. I stopped. She urged me to continue playing and I strummed along for awhile picking out a few things by ear, the while she listened very attentively and made some nice remarks about my "touch" on the piano. I thought no more about it until ten days later when my sister, Mary and I were invited to musical evening at the house of Justice Harlan. To my astonishment and amazement I found Mrs. Randolph was the performer of the evening.

Mrs. Randolph and I became very good friends. One of her particular charms was that she always brought out and appreciated the best in people around her. Her enthusiasm for people was very genuine. And of course Mrs. Randolph and I talked about the Bahá'í Cause.

I was present at the Parsons home one evening when Mrs. Randolph came to play for the Master. It was after dinner in the evening and He sat in one room with his head back in His chair. He was tired and when Mrs. Randolph had finished playing He entered the music room and told her that her playing had rested Him very much. Then He gave a talk about the healing power of music. He said in future times when medical science is farther developed than at present some of the mental and nervous ailments will be heeled through music.

I often think of Mrs. Randolph. She died some years ago. Her married life was happy and she left many true friends behind her. But her life had been a tragic one. Her parents were unhappily married. Her father slew her mother in fit of jealous rage actually in the presence of Mrs. Randolph and, her brother when they were both small children, but in spite of this tragedy in her life Ms. Randolph was a very radiant personality. I remember one night at the Wadsworth's Mrs. Randolph was to play an accompaniment for Schamanheink. She was quite nervous as they hadn't rehearsed the song. When she asked Schumanheink a question about the tempo Schumanheink said, "We will feel it together” and they did. They worked together very successfully.

One night the Master asked nine men to dinner as His guests at Mrs. Parsons’ home. Persian food was served. Mírzá Aḥmad prepared the meal and it was delicious. We nine sat at around table in the dining room the Master taking the dishes from the side table and passing them and serving us Himself. He didn’t sit at the table but had His simple meal after we had finished.

Joseph Hannen was at the table. As the Master spoke Joseph took down His words. I have forgotten much of what the Master said, but finally He came to a story which Joseph started to take down but the Master said, “No, don’t write this down.”

The Master spoke of the extreme differences in standards and customs in the different countries and among the different peoples or the world. He said by way of example that in the European countries in speaking of a woman they would say “How beautiful she is; how fair and white her skin,” Whereas in the center of Africa they have an entirely different standard. There they say “How beautiful she is; how black her skin and how thick her lips.” and we all laughed.

Then the Master went on to remember the differences in customs between America and Persia, in America people think nothing of going to bathing beaches and exposing their persons but in Persia it is very different. There is great modesty there even between the men. In order that man should be properly clothed he should have skirts to his cont at least to his knees. Then the Master told of the time that Hippolyte Dreyfus visited Persia. It was in the summer and was very hot. On arriving in Ṭihrán Hippolyte was taken to a large gathering of the Bahá’ís. These friends were assembled in a garden in the center of which was a deep fountain. At one end of this reservoir or water was a platform with the seat of honor for Hippolyte. Around the fountain seated on terraces were three or four hundred of the Bahá’ís. Many of them men of mature years and of the old Persian school. Of course there were no women present as in Persia the Bahá’ís then still clung to their Oriental customs of segregation. It was very hot. When Hippolyte arrived he remarked that the water looked, very cool and thereupon said that he would like to take a plunge in the pool. Divesting himself of his clothing he entered the water and after swimming around for a few moments came out, the friends bringing him towels and then he dressed. In the meanwhile these Persian men were simply petrified with horror at such a proceeding. Words could not express their astonishment and as the Master told this He laughed heartily at the affair. Then He left the table and went to another room in the house where He had a light supper served to Him.

After the Master had gone Mírzá Valí’o’llah Khán, who was travelling with the Master and also was one of our dinner of nine, remarked that he would like to tell us a sequel to the story the Master had just told. It happened when the Master was in Paris. The weather was very hot and as the Master was going to a meeting with Hippolyte Dreyfus, Hippolyte remarked that the Master’s robe was not sufficiently closed at the neck. (Sometimes in warm weather the Master would loosen his robe at the neck that it would be more comfortable.) Hippolyte approached the Master and with his hands adjusted the neck of His robe so as to expose less of His throat, at the same time saying, "Here in Paris people expect one to keep his neck covered."

The Master apparently innocently remarked, "Is that so? And what would the people say if I left my robe open to my waists!" Hippolyte said, "They would be horrified." "Well," said the Master, "What would they say if I didn't fasten my robe together at all?" "Oh," said Hippolyte, "They would be scandalized." "Well," said the Master, "What would they say if I went before them as you did before the people in Tīhrán without any clothes on at all?"

We all laughed very heartily over this story.

One of the most delightfully mental pictures of the Master that I have was when He went to a special meeting of the children of the Bahá'í Assembly held in Studio Hall which was at that time our assembly place of meeting, a hall in a building on the east side of Connecticut Avenue opposite the Longfellow Statue. Thirty or forty little children were in the room each holding a flower in it hand. A few of the parents and older members of the assembly were standing around the room. My remembrance is of the Master in the center of the room with all of these little children clustered around Him, some of them holding to His robe, others holding to His hands. It was a beautiful sight.

One night Mrs. Barney entertained the Master. I have forgotten just what the circumstances were but I longed with all my heart to see Him that night if but for a moment. I had not been asked to the party so I went to the Master's apartment on Irving Street. It was its second visit to Washington. The apartment was vacant. I sat and waited until after eleven o'clock, then threw myself on a divan and slept. It must have been about midnight that I was awakened by the Master standing over me. Someone made a light and I had a moment with Him and then left with my heart much rejoiced.

There was a crippled woman, I have forgotten her name. She was a friend of Mrs. Woodward of Washington and lived on New Jersey Avenue. She wanted very much indeed to see the Master and suggested that she come in a carriage to Mrs. Persons' house some morning when she could be carried from the carriage to see the Master, I explained the situation to the Master and suggested His appointing an hour. Whereupon He said, "No, she should not make the effort to come here. I will go to her" and we were shortly on the way to her house. We went up to her bedroom. The Master embraced her and blessed her and showed her great kindness.

Elizabeth Dunlap, one of the ardent Bahá'ís of Washington, had an accident a few days before the Master's arrival on His first visit here. She was doing something in her kitchen and was badly scalded. Confined to her bed she felt that she might miss seeing the Master. When I told Him of her He immediately went to her apartments. On his other two visits she was well and able to come to see Him.

A certain woman in Washington, Mrs. Peabody and a grievance that she wished to air to the Master. Her daughter was Mrs. D——. and her daughter's husband was Mr. D— They had been married for a number of years. They had two children in their teens. He had lost interest in his wife and was at that time making love to a woman in Washington who had been associated herself with the Bahá'ís. Mrs. Peabody felt very badly about this and she wanted to talk to the Master about it. On her insistence I spoke to Him explaining the situation, but He didn't wish to hear her tale of woe. That love affair eventually caused great trouble in Washington.

While in any respects the Master was lavish in His expenditures in making gifts to people, with His expenses however He was very economical at times seemingly almost penurious. I recall the morning that He and his suite arrived in Washington coming from Cincinnati. I went down to the station to meet them. This was His third visit in Washington. He arrived at an early hour. After spending all night in an ordinary day coach He was quite fatigued. On this last visit to Washington the Master rented a house on the northeast corner of T and 18th Streets and there He received people practically day and late into the night for the days He was here. People came in large and small groups. The lower floor of the house accommodated them, then as the Master was able to see them they would go up in ones, twos and threes to a bedroom; the corner room on the third floor.

The friends with the Master told of wonderful entertainment, a banquet supper given to the Master by the Cincinnati Assembly. Quite the most striking entertainment that He had up to that time received in America and someone suggested that it might be well for us to give a similar entertainment here. In Washington. I took the cue and immediately talked with some of the friends about it, with the result that in less than week from that date we held a beautiful banquet for the Master in Washington.

In order that everybody might come and feel that they were part of it we asked every member of the assembly to give what each felt they could toward the affair. As I recall the entertainment cost between $300 and $400. The expenses and contributions came out even. Some save a great deal and some very little, but even then there were objections to it. Someone or ones went to the Master and complained about me saying that I was collecting money for an entertainment for Him and they didn't think this was right. As the Master was leaving the house one morning He took me with down 8th street for a half a block and the standing on the curbstone told me that someone had complained about the entertainment and suggested that I give all the money that had been subscribed to the poor and that He, Himself would pay the bill and that He would entertain us instead of we entertaining I felt very much aggrieved at this and said to him, "But, Master, we will always have the poor with us and we will not always have you," and He smiled and said "Well, have it your own way."

It was a question where this banquet could be held as there were several colored Bahá'ís at that time and we wished them to participate in the affair. At no hotel in Washington could we have such a gathering with the colored included. I therefore tried Rauschers catering establishment. Now, Rauscher was formerly with Rherry in New York and came to Washington and established a catering business which for many years was the most select place of its type in this city. Rauscher, himself was a Swiss, I think. The staff were mostly French and other foreigners who had no racial prejudice therefore no colored question existed with them, which was happy for us.

Rauschers establishment was on the southwest corner of Connecticut Avenue and L Street. It consisted of one very large ballroom and several smaller rooms for entertainments. The large ballroom we had elaborately decorated with American flags and banners. These flags I borrowed from the Military Order of the Loyal Region. In the center of the room was a large table in the form of a square nine, on either side were four round tables with nine places at each. In all there were about 130 of us to sit down to table, comprising the Washington Assembly and many of our friends and also the members of the Baltimore Assembly. In all the arrangements I tried my best to make everyone happy. The Master, of course, sat at the head of the table with His interpreter at His left. Edward Getsinger who was appointed member of the Master's suite and travelled round considerably with Him, was hot after me for a good seat near the Master. To please Him I placed him at the Master's right.

The tables were decorated with very elaborate candy glasses decorations and at each place was a box of bon-bons as a souvenir of the occasion. There was one little amusing touch. This was before the days of prohibition and among the fancy ladies that Rauscher served to us were little sugar miniature bottles in shape about two inches long. As we bit into these at the table we found our astonishment and dismay that they were filled with brandy. Rather amusing to have happened in a Bahá'í feast!

A unique feature of the evening was when the Master went around the table anointing everyone present with rose water according to the Oriental custom. I remember when He finished making the rounds He still had some rose water in the bottle in His hand. Near Him was standing one of Rauseher's men, a Frenchman. The Master walked up to him and anointed him quite copiously. He was a well trained servant and stood there perfectly stolidly. For some years utter this event from time to time I would see this man here and there catering at various social affairs and I frequently wondered what effect the Master had upon him and just what the Master was doing to him at that moment when He anointed him.

Alias the Master trips were always well planned there was invariable a certain amount of confusion among the people of His suite, as they remember going down to the Union Station to see the Master off one time when He left Washington. He was bound for New York and at the station there was the usual hurry and scurry in getting off. Edward Getsinger was there, but for some reason or other he didn't have a ticket. The party had divided into two parts; one going on one train, another on the other and Edward found himself in the other group from that with which the Master was travelling. He was in a great state of mind. Edward and I were always little bit at "outs". He asked me for $10 for his ticket, but I didn't let him have it feeling that if I did I would never see it again.

I think it was the Master's final goodbye to Washington when He went from here Baltimore for the day. Several of us accompanied Him. The weather we cold. On arriving in Baltimore we went to a church where a meeting had been arranged. It was either a Unitarian or a Universalist Church, I have forgotten which. There was a fair sized audience there. From that meeting we went to the house of Howard and Hebe Struven and there we remained for luncheon and the afternoon. A number of friends from Washington were there, all of the Baltimore Assembly and others. The latter part of the afternoon the Master took an automobile drive. It was an open car and He was chilly and I urged Him to wear my overcoat. Some time afterwards I had this coat placed with my Bahá'í Archival treasures in Chicago.

I saw the Master off that night in Baltimore for New York. Not long after that He sailed for England. Mírzá Valí'ó'llah and I were on very good terms. I had known him in the Holy Land and in Persia some years before. I knew that the Master would have a great many gifts and presents sent Him at the dock so I conceived plan for remembering Him on the way over. I did up six or seven packages each one labelled for the day it was to be given to Him; first day out, second day out and so forth. I sent these in a large package to Valí'ó'llah at the ship asking him to give one of these packages to the Master each day out. One contained a small notebook and pencil bound in Morocco. Another, a billfold, another something else and some contained candies and sweets. Valí'ó'llah told me afterwards that Master after accepting them gave them as presents to various people; the sweets He fed to some children on the ship.

THE MASTER AT GREEN ACRE

Sometime after my visit with the Master in New York City, shortly after His first visit to Washington, He sent word to me telling me that He would like to have me come to Him. At that time He was in Dublin, New Hampshire, with Mr. and Mrs. Parsons.

As soon as I could make my arrangements I left home to go to Dublin by way of New York and Boston. I inquired as to railroad connections and a hotel near the Parsons place where I could stay, but just as I had made my plans to meet the Master there in Dublin word came to me that He was going to Green Acre so I hastened on to Green Acre arriving a few hours after He and His suite had reached there.

On arriving in Green Acre I found the Master lodged in the Inn on the third floor in the corner room at the right as one faces the front of the building from the river. The next room was occupied by one of His interpreters the other Persian friends travelling with the Master were lodged in other parts of the Inn.

The Kinney family were spending the summer in Green Acre, in the old house at the right of the entrance to the Green Acre property as one enters from the main highway. It seemed as if the Bahá'ís from all parts of the country were there assembled. The Inn was filled and cottages were filled but I happened fortunately to get a room in a building that had formerly been the stable of the house in which the Kinneys lived. This stable had been cleaned out and had been divided off into rooms which were rented to summer visitors. My abode was the corner room on the ground floor. It is formerly been a box stall. The remains of a manger were on one side. It was outside room and had windows. There was a bed, a chair and a wash stand. All simple quite to my taste since I had to be very economical with my finances and this room was the least expensive room I could find. I bought some fruit and was able to get a bottle of milk each morning and with this and some cereal I had my breakfasts and lunches there and in the evening my meal at the Inn.

Thus several busy days were spent. Many people were coming to see the Master and there was much activity.

One morning the Master was out for a walk. I was standing in the doorway of my room and He passed at some little distance. Seeing me there He asked what I was doing and one of the Persian friends told Him that that was my room. He came over, entered and sat down on the only chair in the place. He called for glass of water. Fortunately I had a thermos bottle of cool water and in my hand bag a small silver travelling cup. This I filled for the Master to drink from. (Later I had this cup engraved with the date that the Master drunk from it and, it is now in the archives of the Cause in Chicago.) The Master looked around the room and after having been told that it was formerly a stable He remarked on the simplicity of the surroundings saying that much trouble comes to man from complexity of surroundings and the increase of responsibility attendant there to. He congratulated me on being able to live comfortably with such simplicity. Then He remarked that ever since the Holy Family sought refuge in the stable in Bethlehem at the time of the birth of Jesus, that stables had been very blessed places giving me to understand that it was blessing to live in stable because Jesus, the Messiah, had been born in a stable. But said the Master, "You should be very thankful that this was a horse stable and not a cow stable such as that in which Jesus was born," because continued he, "Everyone who knows anything about stables knows that horse stables are far preferable to cow stables."

One night a large meeting was arranged in the Eirenion at which the Master spoke. The building was packed with all the windows open so that the crowd on the porches surrounding the building could listen in. I recall arraying myself in white for this meeting. This was the longest address that I ever remember hearing the Master give. Usually His talks were very short indeed but this talk was long. His address was taken down and spread among the friends.

The Sunday afternoon that the Master was at Green Acre another important gathering was held in the Eirenion. Not only were all the Green Acre people there but also many of the people from Portsmouth the country side around. It was in the days when there were very few automobiles and people for the most part came in horse drawn vehicles. These horses were tethered to the fence near the Eirenion. When the meeting was over and the Master left the building He walked down on the grass and seeing an unoccupied one horse carriage with tie horse tied to the fence lie walked over and climbed into the carriage and sat Himself down. He sat there and presently the owner, a typical Yankee woman with two or three children, came out of the building. When she saw the Master sitting in her carriage he rushed over to the spot levied with rage. She told Him just exactly what she thought of Him for getting into her carriage, shrieking at the top of her voice at the Master. Several of the Bahá'í women collected around her and tried to calm her. They took her aside and tried to calm her. I recall Grace Oher saying to her, "Do you know who you are talking to in that way?" Then the woman burst into tears. As soon as she began crying the Master got out of the carriage without noticing her and walked slowly off up the hill toward the Inn followed by a group of people.

It was one of those any incidents that were always happening near the Master. I never knew who he was nor did I know why the Master chose her carriage to sit in. He was evidently doing something to her and just whit He was to her I have always wondered.

One night between eleven o'clock and midnight I was coming to my room from a late meeting with some of the friends. As I neared the entrance of the Green Acre property I encountered young man who had just gotten down from a passing trolley car. He asked me the direction to Green tore. I told him that he was at the entrance of the grounds and this led to further conversation. His name was Fred Mortensen. He came from Minneapolis. He had a clear blue eye that looked out through a very black and dirty face. He told me that he had come to see the Master, and furthermore that he had beaten his way and ridden on the rods from his home in the middlewest. I was attracted by what saw of him and invited him to my room. I got water and soap and he scrubbed himself clean and then I found that he was very light blond instead of a dark brunette as I had first imagined him to be.

The result of our meeting was that he camped with me in my room for the several days he was at Green Acre. The morning after our meeting he brushed himself up as best he could and went down to see the Master. I was not present at the interview. He told the Master that he had heard the message through Albert Hall of Minneapolis and that he had come to see Him. The Master said, "I hope you had a pleasant trip." Then Fred explained to the Master how he had beaten his way. The Master said, "Bravo!, Bravo!" appreciative of his faith and enthusiasm for the Cause.

As I have already suggested Fred and I were good friends within a very short time after we met. I liked his spirit, although his ways of doing things were so different from mine that at times a good deal of readjusting was necessary. However he was quite unconscious of this so there was no embarrassment on his part.

I recall one day an old woman was coming along the road carrying a heavy package. Fred saw her and picked up her package and carried it for her. When they arrived at the point where she intended to take the trolley car she wanted to give him ten cents for carrying her package. This he refused and in turn he patted her on the shoulder and on the face. She being a native Yankee woman was not prepared for this familiarity, nevertheless she saw that he meant it in a friendly way. During those days at Green Acre Fred attached himself to me. Once or twice I tried to shake him as it were, because I had invitations here and there in which he had not been included, but somehow he invariably turned up.

I remember one night I was invited to the home of Mrs. Magee for dinner. This was the night that the Master gave His famous talk on Monsalvat. The Master and some of the interpreters and a few others of us were invited there for dinner. I slipped away from Fred and went to the Magee's but before we had gone in to sit down to the table he had located me and was there and of course Mrs. Magee made a place for him at the table.

Fred had had a curious upbringing. His parents, who were Norwegians, had died when he was quite a young lad and he was left to shift for himself. He fell into bad way and at one time was a procurer for a house of ill fame. On another occasion he broke into a shop window and stole some things. For this he was caught and taken to jail. On the way to the police head-quarters he was taken down a flight of steps into a basement room, one policeman waked to front and two on his either side. Just as they were going down the steps, Fred who was a giant in strength, hauled off with one foot and kicked the policeman in front headlong down the steps sending the other two after him with a sudden powerful arm movement. He then ran pursued by other policemen. He was chased on a dead run down toward a railroad where there was an embankment wall. He jumped over this wall and miscalculating the distance fell breaking his leg. He was of course surrounded and taken to prison and put into the hospital there. Albert Hall who was a lawyer and a Bahá'í heard of the case. He visited Fred in the prison hospital and talked with him and decided that he was not a criminal but a boy who had fallen into criminal ways through lack of better environment. He presented this before the judge and the judge appointed Albert Hall the boy's sponsor and Fred was given his liberty subject to certain restrictions.

Albert Hall had a small place in the country and in that house he placed Fred to work in the garden and to do other things around the house. In the meanwhile his leg healed and Albert little by little gave him the Bahá'í Message and teaching and he believed. Then when Fred Mortensen heard that the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in this country he made up his mind that he would have to see Him. He had no money so reverting to some of his old tricks he stole a ride under a train and earns in that way on from Minneapolis.

This romantic and picturesque side of life that he told of was all new to me save what I had heard of it from the outside, but now here was a brother who had actually lived these experiences. Fred told me a great deal about himself and I asked him many questions as to his life.

When the Master called Fred to him to say goodbye He gave him a certain amount of money and told him to buy a ticket and go home in comfort and never under any circumstances ever again to steal a ride. Since those days I have seen Fred several times. The last time was in Chicago. I met him at the Bahá'í Temple. He has married since then and has settled down and is an established member of society and is at the present time a firm Bahá'í.

As I have noted things were crowded during the Master's visit. One night after Fred and I had turned in we heard two women arrive and install themselves in the next room to ours. In the morning we heard them talking. Said one to the other, "Did you see that melon last night on the window sill near the door. I wish we had one for our breakfast." This we heard quite plainly so I knocked on the partition said good morning and told them to be ready to catch a melon that I would push between the rafters over the partitions which divided our rooms which I proceeded to do. Later we met them and had a pleasant acquaintance for a few days. I have forgotten their names.

I was told by those who were near him that for some reason the Master didn't like the old Green Acre property as much as He did the more distant country. I understand that this was the reason why He suggested that the future Bahá'í developments be off in the direction of Monsalvat.

Green Acre was always a place for fads of different kinds. In the old days Fletcher the masticator held forth there were he had a following. The summer that the Master was there someone started a diet cult, the adherents ate nothing but lemon juice and water in the morning and at noon and had but one meal of uncooked foods at night. When one of the Bahá'ís told the Master enthusiastically about this cult He advised her to eat beef steak and not starve herself in that way.

One afternoon Dr. Coles brought Miss Farmer over to Green Acre. She drove up to the Inn, as I recall, and went with the Master in an automobile off toward Monsalvat. They had a drive together and then she returned to Portsmouth.

The crowning feature of the Master's visit to Green Acre was the meeting that He held on Monsalvat. It was there that Miss Farmer had long since planned to build a great temple inspired after the Temple of the Holy Grail and it was here that the Master stood on the top of this mountain or hill and receive one of his memorable addresses. After the address was given a panoramic photograph was taken of the Bahá'ís there assembled. We were arranged in a large circle and the camera made a moving exposure taking in the entire group from one extreme and to the other. Somewhere I have a copy of that photograph. It shows Fred Mortensen and myself seated together.

The day that the Master left Green Acre He went to Malden near Boston and to the House of Miss Maria P. Wilson. Many Bahá'ís were there coming and going that day. (I have recently heard that when Miss Wilson died she left this house to Shoghi Effendi). On that day I heard for the first time of Harry Randall and his family. He was just becoming interested in the Cause and had invited the Master to his house and while He was there at Miss Wilson's, the Master departed with several of the friends to go to the Randalls.

The proclaiming of the Constitution throughout the Turkish dominions brought a belated freedom to a famous Oriental prisoner, the living head of one of the most remarkable movements which have appeared in the last century. Imprisoned for forty-two years in the penal settlement of ‘Akká in Syria, the prisoner, now a man of sixty-eight, is at last permitted to leave the precincts of that unhealthy little town, and take up his residence on the airier slope of Mount Carmel, across the bay. Any day in Haifa you may meet an old man whose flowing white hair, gathered up beneath his snowy turban, proclaims his aristocratic birth, accompanied at the slight distance prescribed by respect by Persian followers with folded hands. His long white beard, his blue eyes slightly flecked with brown, his commanding bearing, his dignified walk, his keen kindly face, all proclaim him to be someone of importance and distinction. He wears the simple robe of white linen and grey linsey customary in Persia. This man is ‘Abbás Effendi, or ‘Abdu’l-Bahá (the Servant of Bahá), the recognised head of the Bahá’í movement throughout the world.

Bahá’ís have been accused by their Persian enemies of working an enchantment on those who visit them, so that an intoxication, an exultation like that of the hashish smoker, seizes their intellect and enchains their senses, lifting them into a dream-world of illusion. And anyone who has come into close contact with them, as I have been permitted to do during the past six months, is inclined to endorse this, for it is impossible to be with them long without feeling the infection of this strange enthusiasm, this spiritual hashish, which has sent men to martyrdom with smiles on their faces and joyous ecstasy in their hearts. “So they quenched his thirst with the bright sword of martyrdom,” says the Bábí chronicler, speaking of one of the martyrs in the earlier history of the movement; and any who have read The Traveller’s Narrative know the story of Mírzá Qurbán ‘Alí. The executioner, unnerved because of the sympathy of the onlookers for this good man, struck so badly that he only wounded the martyr’s neck, and caused his turban to fall to the ground. Then {{p1068}}

Mírzá Qurbán-‘Alí uttered this verse with visible joy (I give Professor Browne’s translation) :—

“Happy he whom Love’s intoxication So hath overcome that scarce he knows Whether at the feet of the Beloved It be head or turban which he throws.”

And as late as 1901 one hundred and seventy martyrs suffered together for the cause in the public execution place of Yazd. One day at ‘Akká an aged Bahá’í presented me with a photograph of four of the persecuted sufferers. The history of two of these is very touching. They were father and son, the son a boy of about fourteen years, of great beauty and intelligence. He had made a pilgrimage to ‘Akká with his father, Mírzá Varqá Shahíd Yazdí, to see Bahá’u’lláh in his exile, and had charmed everyone by his good manners, modesty, and skill in writing verse. On their return to Persia they were taken prisoner during the Bahá’í persecutions, and led to execution with chains round their necks. Taking pity on the youth and good looks of the boy, those in authority approached him and said: “You are too young to die, and we will pardon you. As a matter of formality, curse the name of Bahá’u’lláh, and you shall be set free.” But the child steadfastly refused, and implored them to kill him. This they did, cutting his throat before the eyes of his father. The other two prisoners in the photograph, Mullá Husayn Khámsih and Hájí Aymán Khámsih, were, by a subsequent order from the Government, released.

It is not my purpose in this article to give the history of the movement, so I will confine myself to the barest recital of the principal events of the Bábí movement, or the Bahá’í movement, as it is now almost universally called. Should anyone wish for further information, I must refer him to the works of Count Gobineau, Professor E.G. Browne, of Cambridge, Mr. Bernard Temple, Hippolyte Dreyfus, and others, who have made a study of this remarkable religion which is growing so swiftly and surely that it already counts among its adherents one-third of the Persian nation, has many thousands of converts in America, and in almost every part of the Oriental world. It is essentially a missionising religion, in the best sense of the word “missionising,” by which they do not understand the attempt to force their dogmas on those who hold different religious convictions, whether by argument, bribery, or persuasion; but rather the effort to put the beliefs which have illuminated them within reach of those who feel need of illumination. Bahá’ís let their deeds speak for them; but if an inquirer comes to their gates he is never sent empty away. {{p1069}} In the middle of the nineteenth century, then, a Persian youth of noble birth, a Siyyid, whom his companions and friends describe as being of a singularly pure and lofty disposition, gave out that he was the Báb, the Gate of Knowledge of which Muḥammad prophesied in the Qur’án in the utterance: “I am the City of Knowledge and ‘Alí is its Gate.” Contemporaries speak of his beauty, of the conviction which he possessed of his high mission, namely, of proclaiming a purer religion, throwing off the yoke of the priesthood and awakening his fellow-countrymen to their shortcomings. He called them, in fact, to a worthier conception of religion and duty, whether private or public. But, above all, he spoke of one who should come after him, to whom the Divine Inspiration should be given in a fuller degree: one who should be a light to lighten, not only the Persian nation, but the entire world. The message of his successor was to be to the whole of humanity.

After six years of public teaching, four of which were spent in prison, the Báb was publicly shot at Tabriz, in 1850. Thirteen years later, Bahá’u’lláh, one of the most earnest adherents of the Babist philosophy, declared himself to be the Knowledge of which the Báb had been the Gate, and was immediately recognised by the entire Babist community, with the exception of a small section.

Bahá’u’lláh, or Mírzá Ḥusayn ‘Alí, was the grandson of a Grand Vizír of Persia; his father was a Vizír, so that he was of one of the best-known and most respected families in Persia. He was born at Tīhrán in 1817. In 1846, four years before the martyrdom of the Báb, he joined himself to the Bábís, and during the persecution of them which followed the Báb’s death he was exiled to Baghdád, as one of the most prominent among those who taught and promulgated the new religion. While at Baghdád he spent two years in solitary meditation among the mountains near by, and on issuing from his retirement announced to some of his friends and followers that he was the “Manifestation” prophesied by the Báb, that he was the promised Knowledge, to which the Báb had been the Gate. As I have said, his acceptance was immediate. The Bábís became henceforth known as Bahá’ís, and Bahá’u’lláh became the object of their reverence and love as the Supreme Teacher. His growing power and influence caused the Government considerable alarm, and the exiles were driven from Baghdád to Adrianople, and from Adrianople to ‘Akká (Acre); in which latter place he, with those who shared his exile, seventy persons in all, were imprisoned in a very small space. As time went on, towards the end of his long life, this severe captivity was lessened somewhat, but Bahá’u’lláh was {{p1070}} never permitted to leave the precincts of the town. Here in ‘Akká he taught, wrote, and worked till the end.

He was seventy-five years old when he died, and was buried near Bahjí, the house just outside ‘Akká where he had been permitted to reside in the latter days of his old age.

‘Abbás Effendi, his eldest son, who during his father’s lifetime had been his untiring help and companion, had been carefully trained by his father to assume the leadership of the Bahá’í community and to become the head of the movement. With selfless enthusiasm he devoted himself to his life-work, and was recognised by all the Bahá’ís as their head and loved teacher. He was pre-eminently fitted for this important office. He has in the highest degree that great gift which we call personality. His readily-given sympathy, his understanding of human nature, his power of interesting himself in every human soul which asks his advice and help, have made him passionately beloved by his people. Above all, he has that subtler quality of spirituality which is felt rather than understood by those with whom he comes into contact. He receives the long stream of pilgrims, inquirers and pupils who come to ‘Akká, and now to Haifa, with unfailing gentleness, geniality, and courtesy. He takes a personal interest in every one of the Persians in Haifa—there are now about thirty families, some of which were exiled with Bahá’u’lláh, others Bahá’ís who have voluntarily come to Syria in order to be near the Master. He names their children for them, helps to educate them when they are unable to afford education for themselves, and advises them in their material as well as their spiritual life.

It is his habit to receive the men of the community every evening an hour after sunset, and however long and tiring the day’s work has been, he never refuses to admit them and talk with them. It has been my privilege to assist several times at these evening receptions. The Master’s house is simply built and simply furnished. He loves two things: light and flowers, so that the room in which he receives his guests has many windows, and a vase full of flowers stands always on the table. “For the rest, the walls are bare and white, the woodwork is painted white, and the chairs and divans ranged around the room are covered with an unpretentious light-coloured cotton holland material. At seven o’clock the Persians enter together, their hands folded and their heads bent, and, leaving their shoes outside in the Oriental fashion, seat themselves round the room. For each man as he comes in ‘Abbás Effendi has a kindly greeting, a tactful remark, a personal inquiry, or sometimes a humorous ‘sally which brings a smile to then — grave faces. Among them is {{p1071}} often a pilgrim, a believer who has travelled from a great distance to see and learn from the Master. ‘Abbás Effendi will draw him out; and interesting discussions follow, for the pilgrim may be a Zoroastrian from North Persia, a Parsee from India, or even a Japanese. After a moment the talk invariably turns on the spiritual life, and upon the twin Leit-Motive of the Master’s teaching — Love and Unity.

A humanity knit together by the spirit of unity, sympathy, and selflessness; a universal language; a world in which there will be neither war nor intolerance, a universal religion which shall comprise but two essentials, love to man and love to God: these were the ideals of Bahá’u’lláh, the practical realisation of which ‘Abbás Effendi sets before the Bahá’ís. It is not infrequent to find seven or eight different nationalities and religions together at his table, all in the utmost friendliness-and this, in a country where religion and fanaticism are almost synonymous, means a great deal.

Love, he declares, is the beginning and end of all. Before the presence of Love, all disputes, whether national, religious or personal, will disappear like the night before the sun. God has revealed His Light many times in order to bring men to this true religion. Buddha, Zoroaster, Christ, Muḥammad, and Bahá’u’lláh, were all Messengers of God, all Lanterns in which the light of Truth was placed.

Nor is his talk entirely confined to abstractions. He is keenly interested in the political, social, and educational movements in the Western world which seem like the beginning of the fulfilment of Bahá’u’lláh’s predictions. He has discussed Esperanto with me, which may be destined to become the universal language prophesied by Bahá’u’lláh; the efforts of Tolstoi and the Peace Conference towards the abolition of war, and the great philanthropic institutions of Europe and America. He speaks confidently of the day when Chauvinism, the wish to further the interests of one nation at the expense of another, which too often passes for legitimate patriotism, will be replaced by the endeavour to further the interests of humanity at large; of a time when the universal language will be taught in schools founded on an international basis whose educational system shall have no religious bias, no racial bias, no political bias; of an era when the attention of inventors, instead of being directed towards the construction of engines of war and destruction, will be exclusively devoted to the improvement and amelioration of the human race and the alleviation of its miseries. He discusses, too, the scientific questions of the day, and has opinions to offer which are of the most interesting nature.

And this versatility, {{p1072}} this capacity to reason and form suggestive theories on any subject, is the more amazing when one reflects that ‘Abbás Effendi has had no schooling at all. He was nine years old when he was exiled with his father to Baghdád, and during his forty-two years of close imprisonment in ‘Akká there was little opportunity for study, cut off as the prisoners were from relations with the world of culture and science. The same might be said of his father. Bahá’u’lláh came of the aristocratic class, which leaves the study of theology and Arabic to hodjas and mullahs, the teachers and theologians. According to those who knew him, when he went to Baghdád he knew no Arabic; nevertheless, the “tablets” written in Baghdád during the first period of his “manifestation,” among the most beautiful of all his revelations, are written in the purest literary Arabic.

A Frenchman of great intelligence who has lived for many years in Haifa in an official capacity, and who often goes to ‘Abbás Effendi’s house to discuss the questions of the day with him, said to me one day with admiration, speaking of such a discussion, “What a mind! What intuition he has!” And in the early days at ‘Akká, when ‘Abbás Effendi was appointed by his father to receive the visitors who came to their house-for Bahá’u’lláh rarely admitted any to his presence except the faithful-controversialists and religionists of all kinds would come to him with the purpose of confuting him with their arguments. But ‘Abbás Effendi was able to answer them all; and so great is the respect in which he is held, even among the fanatical Muḥammadans, that ceremonial visits have been made to him by most of the principal Moslem theologians who have come to ‘Akká or Haifa.

Another side to his character is his charity. He never makes his charities openly, or even speaks of them; but you hear of them in roundabout ways. A devout Catholic once said to me: “‘Abbás Effendi helps our work among the poor every year, and” — she paused — “if I were only permitted to tell you of the secret good that he has done!” And once in Damascus I ran across a poor Persian, who asked me to take his respectful greetings and a letter to the Master. He spoke of him with emotional affection, and then told me that during the late Adana massacres his shop had been burnt down and his father killed by the Kurds, he himself being left for dead. ‘Abbás Effendi sent him monetary help, wrote him kindly letters which gave the unfortunate man the courage to face life again, and started him afresh. Nor, in spite of his vast correspondence, does he cease to take an interest in his protege.

And the Master himself lives in the utmost plainness. I have said that the furniture of the house is not rich. His own bedroom {{p1073}} is of a Spartan simplicity. His food is very frugal: a little rice and a plate of soup will often represent his biggest meal, which, by the way, is always concluded by the ceremonial washing of the face and hands by water poured over them by a servant, and the rinsing of the mouth in the Persian fashion. His wife and his four daughters clothe themselves in the plain Persian house-dress of print in summer or merino in winter, wear no jewelry, and when they go out of doors dress themselves in the ordinary modest out-of-door habiliments of the Turkish and Persian women—the nun-like black chadur, or black mantle and hood-cape, which covers them completely, and the ru-band, which falls like a thick curtain before their faces.

And this leads me to speak about the family of ‘Abbás Effendi. He is an advocate of monogamy, which he thinks is the higher conception of marriage; and though his only son died in infancy and lies buried in the little Persian cemetery outside ‘Akká, he has never taken a second wife, as Persian custom permits. His daughters address their father as “Áqá” (lord), speak of him as the “Sarkar áqá” (worshipful lord), and hold him in the very highest respect as well as affection. Their life is a very busy one, for from morning to evening their services are required for the entertainment of guests, or as translators should foreign ladies be amongst the visitors, for they are good linguists, and for the superintendence of a very irregular household. Oriental hospitality is a duty, but when the visitors are so numerous and frequent as at ‘Abbás Effendi’s house, it must become a duty not without its burdens. “We never know how many people to prepare for when ordering a meal,” his daughter said to me once with a smile. “We have to be ready for any emergency. Sometimes when a number of Persian pilgrims arrive we may have as many as twenty unexpected guests to our evening meal.” In the andirun, or women’s apartments, the samovar is always boiling, for every visitor is served with a glass of tea in the Persian fashion, and this entails constant labour. But it is cheerfully performed, and though I have practically lived in the house during a very busy time, I never heard an impatient word or complaint.

No Bahá’í visits Haifa without first receiving a permission from the Master. He does not receive everyone who wishes to see him. Those who have nothing but idle curiosity to prompt their visit are not accorded interviews. Indeed, I am told that even to believers he is sometimes difficult of access, so that I have been doubly fortunate in seeing him almost daily and in having continual long interviews with him. During these interviews, one characteristic, not, I think, particularly noticed by those who {{p1074}} have written about him, has particularly struck me. That is, his keen sense of humour. He has the Oriental habit of illustrating his teaching with stories, and sometimes these are of a delightfully ironical and amusing nature. For instance, this was a story which he told me, to illustrate the superstition and ignorance of the Moslem officials. It should be first explained that the Muḥammadan regards the madman as a sacred person and the utterances of the insane as the utterances of Alláh; and also that the dog throughout the East is nothing but a despised pariah. “I was one day visiting the Mutessarif of ‘Akká, a Kurd, when a madman entered the garden in which we were seated. His demeanour was wild, and his shirt blew open and displayed a bare chest. All rose to their feet as soon as they perceived his insane condition, and the Mutessarif gave the madman the seat of honour. In a moment a dog strayed in through the gate which the madman had left open, and barked at the company. Then said the Mutessarif to the madman, with great respect, ‘Tell us, pray, Effendi, what the dog is saying.’ The madman replied, ‘I don’t know.’ ‘Surely your Excellency understands the language of dogs?’ ‘I don’t know,’ repeated the madman. ‘But I am certain that if your Excellency wished you could translate for us what the dog said.’ “Then the madman turned and said to the Mutessarif, maliciously, ‘Who told you that I could speak Kurdish?’”

And the following anecdote shows the absurdities which spring from cleanliness which is purely ceremonial and fanatical. “I was one day about to partake of a meal at Tiberias, when a Jewish priest of a certain sect came in. He was unwashed and unkempt, and smelt very disagreeable, so that it was unpleasant to be in the same room with him. I knew that if he stayed, I myself should be prevented from eating my food, but, nevertheless, I invited him to eat with me. But when the priest saw the food on my table, he made a gesture of abhorrence, and pronounced the word ‘Tarif!’ (Unclean). I inquired what food the man would not consider unclean. He replied: ‘Olives, and white bread, and fish.’ I then ordered these things to be brought, but the man replied, ‘Do not trouble; I have brought my food with me.’ And, opening his shirt, he drew out from next his body a small fish, which he began to eat. “I then said to him, ‘You call the food which I have provided unclean; and yet that fish, which you have carried in your bosom, you consider clean food. Is it reasonable?’ And the man did not know what to answer.”

His philosophy is essentially human, in the highest and broadest sense of the word. He directs the attention of humanity not to the letter, but to the spirit of religion. I remember that once our discussion fell upon the question of asceticism, and I asked whether the crushing of the desires and needs of the flesh, in his opinion, helped the soul in its growth into the spiritual state. He replied :— “Asceticism is not necessary. A soul grows by the exercise of human virtues, and the observance of human morals; and by the Divine Favour. {{p1075}} The extreme asceticism of the saints was superstition. The monasticism of the Christian Church was mistaken. St. Paul was responsible for much of this, because in one of his epistles he praises those who do not marry, and prophesied that sects would arise which would not marry. St. Paul disapproved of marriage. But God did not give us good gifts that we should reject them. He created all these blessings that His servants may bless Him.”

On another occasion an American visitor asked a question about fasting, and whether it would not be beneficial to the spiritual life. He replied :— “Fasting is a symbol. Fasting signifies abstinence from lust. Physical fasting is a symbol of that abstinence, and is a reminder; that is, just as a person abstains from physical appetites, he is to abstain from self-appetites and self-desires. But mere abstention from food has no effect on the spirit. It is a mere symbol, a reminder. Otherwise, it is of no importance. Fasting for this purpose does not mean entire abstinence from food. The golden rule as to food is, Do not take too much or too little. Moderation is necessary. There is a sect in India called the Jats, who practice extreme abstinence, and gradually reduce their food until they exist on almost nothing. But their intelligence suffers. A man is not fit to do service for God in brain or body if he is weakened by lack of food. He cannot see clearly.”

The American then told him of experiments made in America, whereby the mind was supposed to benefit psychically by abstinence. He replied :— “It is imagination. ... To sum up, God knows better than all. He has given us an appetite; therefore we should eat. If the body is deprived of what is necessary to it, the mind suffers. God asks of us according to our capacity. If a man who has only sufficient strength to carry fifty kilos be burdened with a hundred kilos, he will fall. Moderation and commonsense must be used.”

He considers superstition and interest in miraculous phenomena as also tending to divert the mind from the pursuit of real and practical religion. His eldest daughter once said to me :— “We in our religion do not dwell upon the miraculous. A man once wrote a book in which he enumerated the miracles of the Báb. Bahá’u’lláh burnt it, lest it should be the cause of later superstition. And he forbade his people to talk of these things. . . . They tend to lower a religion and to make people think about the things which are not important. Which is most important, the miracles or the life of Christ? And yet, because people have not been able to believe these miracles, they have doubted the teachings of Christ.”

Bahá’ís have no priests, no churches, no fixed order of prayers. Every man is his own priest, is responsible for his own soul growth. It is true that Bahá’u’lláh wrote a book of prayers destined to fit the needs which may arise, but no man is obliged to use them. But prayer is advocated. I once asked if prayer {{p1076}} was necessary, since presumably God knows the wishes of all hearts. The Master replied :— “If one friend feels love for another, he will wish to say so. Though he knows that the friend is aware that he loves him, he will still wish to say so. If there is anyone that you love, do you not seek an opportunity to speak with him, to speak lovingly with him, to bring him gifts, to write him letters? If you did not feel such a desire, it would be that you did not love your friend. God knows the wishes of all hearts. But the impulse to prayer is a natural one, springing from man’s love to God. “If there be no love: if there be no pleasure or spiritual enjoyment in prayer, do not pray. Prayer should spring from love, from the desire of the person to commune with God. Just as a lover never ceases from wishing to communicate with the beloved, so does the lover of God always wish for constant communication with the Deity. Prayer need not be in words, but rather in thought and attitude. But if this love and this desire are lacking, it is useless to try to force them. Words without love mean nothing. If a person talks to you as an unpleasant duty, with no love or pleasure in his meeting with you, do you wish to converse with him? Efforts should first be made to make attachment to God.”

“But how is this attachment to be made?” I asked. “How is the love of God to be obtained? There are many people in the world who admit the existence of a Deity, but without any emotion.” The reply was :— “Knowledge is love. Study, listen to exhortations, think, try to understand the wisdom and greatness of God. . . . The soil must be fertilised before the seed be sown.”

Another time, speaking of love, he said :— “Unity is love: it cannot be established without love. Therefore try, as far as possible, to be filled with love. Love is perpetual life, the most perfect vitality. Consider how love has gathered us together from the East and the West. If there were no love between us, our friendship would have been concluded by salutations, such as ‘Good Morning’ and ‘Good Evening.’ Love draws us in friendship to the people of every race and religion. From whom we breathe the fragrance of this love again, be as a Bahá’í, of the people of Bahá.” ... “The highest love is independent of any personal advantages which we may draw from the love of the friend. If you love truly, your love for your friend will continue, even if he treat you ill. A man who really loves God, will love Him whether he be ill, or sad, or unfortunate. He does not love God because He has created him — his life may be full of dissatisfactions and miseries. He does not love God because He has given him health or wealth, because these may disappear at any moment. He does not love Him because He has given him the strength of youth, because old age will surely come upon him. The reason for his love is not because he is grateful for certain mercies and benefits. No.” “The Lover of God desires and adores Him because He is Perfection and because of His Perfections. Love should be the very essence of love, and not dependent on outward manifestations.” “A moth loves the light, though his wings are burnt. Though his wings are singed, he throws himself against the flame. He does not love the light because it has conferred some benefit upon him. Therefore he hovers round the light, though he sacrifice his wings.” “This is the highest degree of love. Without this abandonment, this ecstasy, love is imperfect.” “The Lover of God loves Him for Himself, not for his own sake.”

This high, mystical fervour, these spiritual ideals, constitute the real life of Bahá’ism. “When true knowledge begins, earthly knowledge drops away,” a Bahá’í said to me once, speaking with some amazement of the habit that European visitors have of asking purely metaphysical questions. To their minds many of these questions are both futile and unnecessary. To endeavour to compass the universe with any philosophical theory appears almost absurd to them. The spiritual life, when entered upon, is beyond reason. Bahá’u’lláh wrote :— “When the fire of love is become ablaze, The harvest of reason will be wholly consumed.”

This, and the practical endeavour to bring about the Kingdom of Love upon earth, occupies their energies. I have often commented to outsiders upon the atmosphere of radiating happiness which surrounds most Bahá’ís. I have found them sincere, unlike other Orientals. And their warm hospitality and friendliness is unfailing. I cannot enumerate the many kindnesses which I have received, kindnesses which I have been totally unable to return in any way. In the course of a conversation with me one day, ‘Abbás Effendi said :— “The religionists of the world have forsaken the essence of the teaching and hold to the letter. It is as if the students in a college quarreled and disputed with each other as to which master was the best, instead of attending to the lessons which were given by those masters. The religious conceptions of every creed postulate the existence of a medium, or intermediary between God and man. The spiritual teaching of each medium, the Word of God, whether Moses, or Elijah, or Christ, or Muḥammad, was the same. The light is the same. The mediums are identical, that is, derive their radiance from the same source. Moses, Muḥammad, Christ—what are these but names? What do names, mere words, matter? And yet people quarrel about these names. And the teaching is that the true object of religion, of spiritual progress, is to make every soul reflect the Divine. Each soul must become radiant as a lamp. And this is our message, our mission. We must labour night and day to establish unity and solidarity among humanity. Enough of quarrels, backbitings, and criticisms. See how the Catholics abuse the Protestants, and the Protestants the Catholics. Do they love each other as Christ commanded? Have they a brotherly feeling towards each other? And so with many other sects, even in one religion, the Christian. . . . But we (the Bahá’ís) hope that these difficulties may be removed, that all may please one another, until the Word of God, with all its perfections, may bring them into the Kingdom of God.”

Once I asked him: “What is essential in the belief of a {{p1078}} Bahá’í?” We were in the low, white house of one of the Persian exiles at the foot of Mount Carmel, and the wind conveyed the scent of almond-blossom from the hillside. ‘Abbás Effendi was seated on the divan by the open window, and was gazing towards the sea beneath us. The kindly face beneath the white turban was turned to me after a moment, and with a smile in his tired blue eyes he answered :— “To be a Bahá’í simply means to love all the world, to love humanity and try to serve it: to work for the universal peace and the universal brotherhood.”

I have said that ‘Abbás Effendi is fond of flowers. He is, in fact, like his father, Bahá’u’lláh, an ardent lover of nature. His favourite flower is the pink Persian rose, not unlike a larger Dorothy Perkins, with pink, fragile petals and an extremely sweet perfume. He likes to have these roses strewn upon the table whenever he has guests. He has a great love for Mount Carmel, and I have often met him with a few followers on the little platform, planted with rose trees, before the tomb of the Báb half-way up the mountain side; for the body of the martyred saint was secured by his followers and eventually interred on Carmel. From this little rose-garden, tended lovingly by the Persians, one has a wonderful view of the flower-covered slopes of the mountain, the little red and white town of Haifa below, and then the wide blue bay with its long crescent of sandy beach, on the further side of which ‘Akká lies close to the water’s edge within her fortified walls, white as the breast of a sea-gull.

One April afternoon, when we had met by chance in the rose-garden and were afterwards drinking glasses of Persian tea in one of the cool, high ante-chambers of the tomb, he remarked :— “This mountain is a holy mountain: it has always been a sacred place. The prophets have always loved this mountain. Christ has trodden on its paths; Elijah lived on it. The wind is sweet on it, the flowers are many, the view is wonderful. When you come up the mountain, there are many fragrances which reach you: the clean air gladdens you, the beauty refreshes you. So the mind is made pure on this mountain, the thoughts are cleansed, the spirit turns to God.”

Every Persian pilgrim visits ‘Akká when he comes to Haifa, as it was the scene of Bahá’u’lláh’s long imprisonment, and the spot from which most of his teachings were given out into the world. I, too, went, curious to see the environments of ‘Abbás Effendi’s youth and manhood, and the spots which are regarded as hallowed by Bahá’ís of the East and West. I went with a gentle old Persian and his wife and daughter in one of the high carriages used for the voyage between Haifa and ‘Akká, for two rivers have to be forded — the Kishon, from which Elijah took {{p1079}} water to pour over his sacrifice, and the Na’amein (the Two Yeses), the river Belus of the Phoenicians. This latter river owes its name to the tradition that Muḥammad, when going from Carmel to ‘Akká, was asked by his followers whether they were to ford the Kishon. He replied, “Na’am” (Yes). But when they came to the Belus they asked again; he answered somewhat impatiently, “Na’am, na’am!” (Yes! yes!)

As we drove along the sand, sometimes going into the sea, the Mírzá talked of the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh, for whose sake, years ago, he had left the world to settle in 'Akká and share the imprisonment of his co-religionists. He is of a very good family, and had a career open to him in Persia; but studying the doctrines of the Bahá'ís, he became filled with the longing to learn at the very feet of the Master. He sent to ask permission. Bahá'u'lláh sent him these verses :— “Come not if love of life thou still must own, But come, if giving life and mind, nor come alone. This is the Path if thou Bahá wouldst meet. If not, abide afar, nor trouble pilgrim feet.”

After this, in his own words, “I sent another supplication. I begged thus: ‘O my Lord, is it meet that, rich as Thou art, Thou shouldst turn away from the door of Bounty one so poor, so humble even as I?’ This time permission was granted me, and I proceeded on my journey there.”

His wife and daughter had their ru-bandehha raised as we rode along in the fresh morning air, and in the best of spirits we laughed and talked all the way to 'Akká, which is a purely Oriental town, almost entirely Moslem, with its palm-shaded mosque, its vaulted streets, and the caravans of camels which pad their haughty way through the narrow alleys. There we visited the house in which 'Abbás Effendi lived before his removal to Haifa. His once carefully-tended garden in the forecourt had been trampled down ruthlessly by the lawless Arabs; but within the little garden was still sweet with flowers, and weeded and watered by the few Persians who take care of the place since 'Abbás Effendi and his family have left. A small number of Persian pilgrims were also staying in the big, empty house, now only occasionally visited by the Master. One of the women prepared us a lemonade. She was a Parsee from India, I was informed, and her history was a sad one. Her husband became a Bahá'í in India, and was an ardent supporter of the new religion. A certain Englishman, also a Bahá'í, was in India, on his way to Persia, when he suddenly fell ill of a terrible form of plague. There was no hospital within reach, and the natives would not go near him, but the Parsee nursed him devotedly through the illness. The Englishman recovered, but the Parsee sickened and died. His widow sold all that they possessed, and came to 'Akká with her two little boys, in order to be near 'Abbás Effendi. The eldest died from the effects of the climate, and her other little son she sent to the Englishman for whom her husband had given his life, so that he might learn English and French, and be enabled to serve the cause. She has certainly given all that she has.

Another of the Bahá'ís there, Mírzá Ḥaydar-'Alí, was especially interesting as being a contemporary of Bahá'u'lláh himself. He was a venerable, smiling old man, with long Persian robes and a spotlessly white turban. As we had travelled along, the Persian ladies had laughingly spoken of a beautiful young man, who they were sure would captivate me. They would make a match between us, they said.

This now proved to be the aged Mírzá, whose kindly, humorous old eyes twinkled merrily as he heard what they had prophesied, and joined in their laughter. They did not cover before him. Afterwards the ladies told me something of his history. He was imprisoned for fourteen years during the time of the persecution. At one time, when he was being transferred from one prison to another many days' journey away, he and his fellow-prisoner, another Bahá'í, were carried on donkeys, head downwards, with their feet and hands secured. Ḥaydar-‘Alí laughed and sang gaily. So they beat him unmercifully, and said, “Now will you sing?” But he answered them that he was more glad than before, since he had been given the pleasure of enduring something for the sake of God.

He never married, and in ‘Akká was one of the most constant and loved companions of Bahá'u'lláh. I remarked upon his cheerful appearance, and added, “But all you Bahá'ís look happy.” Mírzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí said: “Sometimes we have surface troubles, but that cannot touch our happiness. The heart of those who belong to the Malikút (Kingdom of God) is like the sea: when the wind is rough it troubles the surface of the water, but two metres down there is perfect calm and clearness.” They told him that I was seeing much of ‘Abbás Effendi. He turned to me and said: “They tell me that you are clever, that you have travelled, and read many books and seen many people. You have talked with philosophers, learned persons, and psychologists (those who study the soul). Have you ever seen anyone like ‘Abdu'l-Bahá?”

I said, no, I had never met anyone like him.

He said: “He is a teacher of the Kingdom. If you leave your studies and all the world, and follow him, you, too, will be of the {{p1081}} Kingdom. When you and he have the same heart, when you enter into his ways and thoughts, then you will belong to the Kingdom. You have instruction, and Peter was a poor man, an ignorant fisherman — but could you do what he has done?” Then he ended, “All your learning is good, but you must forget it, and become like a child.”

After seeing the outside of the house in which the seventy prisoners were confined in two rooms when Bahá'u'lláh first came to ‘Akká, we drove out to the garden of the Riḍván — which means the Garden of God. The garden has a pretty history. Bahá'u'lláh had suffered very much from his long confinement, and his followers, as soon as the conditions of their imprisonment allowed it, put their money together and bought a piece of land just outside ‘Akká, and made a garden there for him themselves. Here Bahá'u'lláh used to write and teach. The Riḍván lies in the division of the Na'amein, so that the river runs on both sides of it. It is full of every imaginable kind of flower: the bees and butterflies run riot in it, and the prodigal Oriental spring fills the air with a hundred scents. On one side a little square, paved with white marble and black and white pebbles, has steps leading down to the river, and an artificial shallow marble conduit in the centre conducts water from the fountain just above, through the square and into the river, with a very gentle and cooling sound. In this square grow two huge mulberry trees, with a wooden table beneath, and round it are wide benches, painted blue and white and stained by sun and wind. In summer, so thick is the foliage and so wide the spreading branches of the mulberry trees, this square is like a green tent; but when I was there the leaves were still not fully grown, and the shade partial and speckled.

On the table beneath the mulberry trees, chicken, lettuces, vegetables cooked into a cake, eggs, and Persian sweetmeat were served. In addition to this, the gardener's wife fried us some fish that we had bought on our way from fishermen who were drawing in their nets as we passed. Oranges finished the meal, and we all washed our hands, faces, and mouths, Persian fashion, in the river. This little paved square used to be a favourite haunt of Bahá'u'lláh, and the corner in which he sat and taught is marked by a couple of potted plants, one in a rusty petroleum tin, placed there by the gardeners to prevent others from using a spot so hallowed by memories of the prophet. Here, too, he used to write on summer evenings, by the light of a big lantern suspended in the overhanging branches. All around the square lies the garden, threaded in and out by paths, over which the marigolds sometimes grew riot, as if the garden were spilling {{p1082}} its gold, and encroaching on the more utilitarian beaten ways. In the beds behind us as we ate our lunch, around the small white marble fountain which fed the artificial stream, I saw Mary lilies ready to burst their sheaths, red and pink roses, carnations, white stocks, marigolds, verbena, violets, tall Chinese lilies, and sapphire lupins. Presently we walked in the garden, picking flowers and oranges as we went. Further up, more steps lead into the river-date-palms grow on the further bank-and hereon hot days, when the colony was in 'Akká, the Persian girls used to come down and bathe. Then we visited the peacocks, penned together at the end of a marigold-bordered path, and the little summer-house where Bahá'u'lláh used to write. It has many windows, and directly below them grows a little garden, full of sweet-smelling flowers-for Bahá'u'lláh loved the heavier garden scents which draw the moth, and are most fragrant at nightfall. Here grew orange trees in blossom, jessamine, white stocks, frisas and lilies, so that the incense of their white blossoms should rise to the open windows of the summer-house. The room was barely furnished, and has never been used by anyone since his death. A tray with a tea-pot and cups, the bedding, his chair, enclosed in a protecting case, and his writing-table are all there. It is the habit of the gardeners to light the candle every evening, in memory of him whom they call the Greatest of Lights.

I have spoken of the gardeners, and I feel that they should be spoken of, as their loving attention keeps the Riḍván in all its beauty. They are twins, and so alike that one can scarcely distinguish one from the other. Abu'l-Kázim and Ibrahim, his brother, joined the Bahá'ís as children, when the persecutions were at their height in Ṭihrán, and large numbers of the adherents of the new faith were being slaughtered daily. At fourteen they left their parents and the land which they were to have inherited, and came to 'Akká to serve Bahá'u'lláh, and when he died, 'Abbás Effendi. They tend the garden, and live in it: it is their child, so to speak, and they spend the days in the pleasant thousand and one attentions that it needs, for a garden is like a lovely coquette, who needs constant ministrations and care, lest her beauty be impaired by neglect.

Then we visited the tomb of the great teacher, a mile away across sandy ways, around which another garden has been planted. Inside, a roofed courtyard is full of palms and more delicate plants, the path which encircles it being spread with fine Persian rugs. The tomb itself is very sunny and silent. The light streams in through veiled windows, and the carpet that covered the portion of the flooring beneath which the body has been laid is of a tender green. The curtain at the entrance is {{p1083}} green too. Above the tomb is the simple inscription “Bahá,” in Persian script on an illuminated background, and around the square of green carpet lamps and candles and flowers are placed. That is all. There are none of the symbols of grief, none of the ugly trappings which we Westerns associate with death. It is the silent room in an empty house-and nothing further.

In the cool of the evening, before I left ‘Akká, I went with the Persian ladies for a moment to the little Bahá’í cemetery just outside ‘Akká. We left our carriage and walked over the grass, thick with wild flowers, towards the small group of exiled tombs, which are set back from the road. Over the graves were white marble stones with inscriptions in the beautiful, elaborate Persian script, some of which my companions translated for me. I cannot remember the exact wording, but one ran something like this. It was for a Persian girl :—

“This sweet and fragrant flower was plucked by God for the Malikut, that its transplanted perfume might gladden Him.”

And here lies ‘Abbás Effendi’s only son, his mother, his brother, and others of the family of Bahá’u’lláh. They pointed me out the grave of one old Persian who had committed suicide. He had followed Bahá’u’lláh into exile and shared his imprisonment. Fifteen days after the death of the “Blessed Perfection” he was missing. And several days afterwards they found his body floating in the sea. Just before he had drowned himself he wrote in Persian verse that he could not endure life without his master, and that he had gone to join him.

I have spoken at such length of the followers of Bahá and his successor, because each contributes by his personal enthusiasm to this other-worldly, fairy-tale atmosphere which constitutes the charm of converse with them. Ḥaydar-‘Alí, the Parsees, the twin gardeners, and my companions are all typical Bahá’ís. And to judge of the strength and vitality of a movement, one judges it not so much by its head as by its followers. There is a power, there is a force in Bahá’ism which, at least in my opinion, may make it one of the elements to be reckoned with in the history of the future. Sooner or later it must become an important factor in the politics of the Near East. No movement, however rational, has any continued vitality among any Eastern people unless it be religious. Enthusiasm, romance, and impulse to action, to the Oriental, are centered entirely in his religious life. Even when he has ceased, under European influences, to believe in his ancient creeds, his subconscious ego is governed by this inherited sense. So that progressivism in the East must, in {{p1084}} order to permeate the masses, be a religious progressivism. And this is exactly what Bahá’ism provides. It appeals to the religious sense. It makes converts in Islám, both Shí’ah and Sunní. It turns fanaticism into tolerance, retrogression into progression, Sauls with fire and sword in their hands into Pauls preaching brotherly love and goodwill. And it is precisely this alchemist power in Bahá'ism which might make it a factor of untold value to us in our solution of the Young Egyptian problem; just as it is likely to smooth the way of the French Government if it gains a permanent foothold in North Africa. It may become corrupt in the course of time; it may lose the white-hot fervour of its first purity; the clouds of glory that trail behind it may drop away when the first childhood of the faith has departed; but it can never be any other than a civilising and broadening influence. E. S. Stevens.

About the Author

Louis G. Gregory was one of the first African-Americans in the United States to embrace the Bahá'í Faith. He was later named a Hand of the Cause of God. In April and May of 1911, Gregory made a pilgrimage to Egypt, Haifa and 'Akká to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá and visit the Holy Shrines. He wrote a journal of his experiences on pilgrimage, in which he shares several stories about 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the believers. He also provides 'Abdu'l-Bahá's replies to various questions put to Him.

Following Gregory's notes is a selection of Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed to him. Note: the copy I received of this text had no paragraph breaks. I added them where it seemed appropriate, but these are doubtless not the same paragraph breaks of the original text. This aside, I do not know whether or not this is an exact replica of the original Pilgrim's Note. — J.W.

FOREWORD

In the following narrative of events connected with a pilgrimage to Ramleh and the Holy City, many things of a personal nature have been omitted. Yet some things remain, the reason being simple. 'Abdu'l-Bahá the Servant of God and the Center of the Covenant of God, was found to be a loving father, a mighty teacher, and the living Temple in Whom the Spirit of Love abides. With the Manna of this Perfect Love He feeds the hearts of men. To discover His reality is to know this to a certainty. Today, in a world darkened by selfishness and sin, He walks unknown. Tomorrow, when the veils are rent, all men will want to know what He said and did. And the question will often be asked: “Is it possible that He even came amongst us and we knew Him not?”

With the consent of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself this brief and humble word of testimony is added to the voluminous literature of a world movement. The Bahá'í Message of Unity is given in barest outline. Fuller accounts may be obtained from many books, the making of which will have no end. The Word of 'Abdu'l-Bahá touching the problem of races, here put in concrete form, goes to the substance of the issue, and will appeal to the growing world consciousness of freedom and justice. Social scientists and reformers will be guided by this supreme wisdom. The heart-hungry everywhere will seek and find peace in the Creative Word.

Since making this pilgrimage it has been the privilege of the writer to visit various centers in Europe and America, and see the Light of the Kingdom reflected in the radiant faces of many friends. Grateful memories of their love can never depart. Special mention must be made of Mr. and Mrs. J.H.H., the brilliant teachers in El Abhá, who, with wonderful patience, guided an unworthy servant to the Light. America itself has been the scene of many Heavenly Bounties, during the recent tour of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who spent nearly nine months of the year 1912 awakening the people to new life.

THE MESSAGE

Praise be to God, the Mighty, the Supreme! Although forever veiled and hidden from His creatures, in His Infinite Essence unknown and unknowable, yet His Mercies are sure and His Bounties manifest. From cycle to cycle He has revealed Himself under the Names and attributes, according to the capacity and perception of His children. Whether He be known as Elohim, I Am That I Am, Jehovah, the Lord of Hosts, Abba, Father, Mamoud, the Praised One, or Abhá, the Ineffable Splendor of God, He is ever the same in the hearts of the chosen. Holy above all Names, He yet reveals the Names for the Guidance of souls. He is the Creator of all, the Holy One of all peoples and all religions. He rules and illumines all the world of existence, the creation of His Word. He is the Self-subsistent Lord, Who abides in His own Essence, Single and Alone. He is "The Preexistent, the Cause of Causes, the Beginning before which there was no Beginning." Verily, "the sight comprehendeth Him not, but He comprehendeth the Sight."

How marvelous is the age! Great activities in science, education, commerce and laws, know no parallel. New inventions are so frequent that they cease to astonish. The diffusion of learning is vast through multiplied agencies. Commercial relations bind the most primitive to the most highly civilized of nations, making their interests one. Freedom advances with giant strides. Vast forces are marshalled; old leaders are discredited; ancient despotisms perish; new issues are forced. Everywhere the old order changes. Everywhere the despised and rejected among races and classes are moving toward a nobler life while the reality of humanity is being unveiled. The world awakens to new life and men begin to speak of the Dawn of Peace, and the Golden Age. These outward signs of progress indicate an unrest in the hearts of men, who vainly seek without, that which must first of all come from within. The spiritual must out weigh the material. The dream of all the ages, universal peace, can only be realized as the nations turn to God. The condition precedent to universal peace is universal love. And this ideal condition can only be attained through the Divine Religion, descending from God. The Logos or Divine Word, is ever the same. It is both powerful and effective. It never returns to Him void. Whether the mighty Speaker of the Word be Jesus, Moses, Zoroaster, Buddha, Melchisedek or Muḥammad, it becomes the educator of the world of existence, and the Reality of the Word is unity. Today, as the world approaches its maturity, the first fruits of unity have appeared. The Holy One heralded in all former cycles has come. The Promised One has appeared with majesty and power. "The Tabernacle of God is with men!" As in past ages, the few are awake; the many are asleep upon the bed of spiritual negligence. Meantime, the mightiest drama of the ages is enacted. Blessed are those who see with their eyes and understand with their hearts! Yea, "Blessed are those who know!"

The Elijah of the New Day appeared in Persia and made His declaration May 23, 1844, at the time when the Millerites in America, having studied the prophecies of the Bible, expected the Son of Man to drop down from the clouds. Mírzá 'Alí-

Muhammad, known among the Muslims as a young man of excellent character, but following the occupation of merchant, suddenly declared Himself to be the Imám Mahdi whose coming is foretold in their Holy Book, the Qur'án. Among a people noted for religious fanaticism so unusual a claim could not pass unnoticed. He was at first ridiculed, then insulted, threatened, and beaten. But undismayed by affliction, He journeyed about the country, teaching the people and explaining the mysteries of their holy book with so much spirit and power that those who listened to Him were strangely moved. Many believed on Him, and many, for the hope that He held out to them of the coming of the Glory of God, suffered themselves to become martyrs in the dust. The spiritual title taken by this forerunner, or First Point of Revelation, was the Báb, a title which in the Persian tongue means the door or gate. By this it was indicated that He came but to prepare the way for One Mightier. After six years of teaching the Báb was Himself martyred, being shot to death by a regiment of soldiers at the command of the Sháh.

The Sun of Bahá'u'lláh (The Splendor of God) then illumined the horizon. During the brief cycle of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, then known simply as Mírzá Husayn 'Alí Núrí, a young nobleman of blameless life, had become known as a strong supporter of the cause. With many others He suffered persecution, His vast estates being forfeited. He was thrown into prison and threatened with death. But through the intercession of the Russian ambassador and other persons of influence, His punishment was commuted to banishment, and He was carried under an escort of soldiers to Baghdád, beyond the borders of Persia. After the passing of the Báb, although some time passed before His declaration, the Bábís began to look to Him, by an intuition, as their leader. At Baghdád He suddenly left His family and followers, retiring to the mountains, where He remained about two years. He was in close communion with God, and this was the period of preparation for His Divine Mission. In one of His eloquent verses these Words appear: "I was asleep on My couch; the Breaths of My Lord, the Merciful, passed over Me and awakened Me from My sleep, and commanded Me to proclaim between earth and Heaven." Upon His return to those who so eagerly awaited Him, the Book of Íqán (Book of Certainty) was revealed in answer to certain inquiries of the uncle of the Báb. The mysteries of the Bible, the Qur'án and other Holy Books are revealed in this wonderful book, and the explanation of such mysteries and sent marvelous writings to the kings and rulers of the earth.

Among His books are the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, or Book of Laws, and the Kitáb-i-'Ahd, or Book of the Covenant, wherein He appoints His eldest son, 'Abbás Effendi, as His spiritual successor and the Center of the Covenant of God. The appearance of Bahá'u'lláh is the direct fulfillment of the Lord's prayer in the establishment on earth of the Kingdom of the Father. The Manifestation of the Father, Bahá'u'lláh, heralded by all the prophets, comes to unite the souls of His creatures. His Divine utterances reveal the means of harmony for all religions and all peoples. Among the agencies He mentions as conducive to unity are cessation of war, a universal language, to be taught in all the schools of the world, a universal calendar, the education of all classes and of both sexes, religious tolerance and the reign of love. Encouragement is also given to commerce, the arts, science, agriculture and scientific discovery. The people are commanded to bring forth fruit upon the earth. "The principle of faith is to lessen words and increase deeds."

Since the passing of Bahá'u'lláh in 1892, 'Abbás Effendi has led the movement. Among the friends He is known by His spiritual title, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, which means the Servant of God. He is the Center of the Covenant of God, a station conferred upon Him by Bahá'u'lláh and confirmed by the Divine Utterances of both the Book of Laws and the Book of the Covenant. He was born May 23, 1844, the Day of the Declaration of the Báb and at the time the Millerites of America were expecting wonderful occurrences. From His early childhood until the revolution of the Young Turks He was a prisoner, spending most of the time in or near the fortification of 'Akká. Since His liberation He has traveled in Egypt, Europe and America, everywhere teaching peace, service, unity and love, and received with marks of reverence and love.

A PILGRIMAGE

On the afternoon of April 10, 1911, the writer landed at Alexandria, Egypt. As soon as possible my way was made to the store of Mírzá Ḥasan Khurasání, Rue Cherif Páshá, where I met several of the friends who received me with marks of kindness and soon put me at ease. A letter of introduction, written by Dr. E. C. Getsinger and transcribed in Persian, was handed to D. Muḥammad Yazdí, an Oriental gentleman of pleasing manners and placid countenance. "You want to see our Lord?" he half questioned, half asserted. Upon giving my assent, he agreed to act as guide. Although pleased at this mark of courtesy, I reasoned that it was unnecessary, and that I had no wish to take him away from his business. But he put my objections aside, saying, "This is spiritual business!" Thus, escorted by my gracious friend, I went first to my hotel, and soon thence to a modest but comfortable-appearing house with a front garden, the temporary home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Passing through the garden, I was left standing at a side entrance leading to the second story by a flight of steps. After an absence of a few moments my guide returned, indicating that I should follow. I soon entered a reception room on the second floor.

Several persons were present, but among them 'Abdu'l-Bahá was easily distinguished. Majesty and beauty are His adornments. Following a natural impulse, my knee was bent reverently before Him. Feeling Him bend over me, I knew that He touched my head with his lips. He then raised me up and directed me to a seat. Besides my guide, the other persons present proved to be Tamaddunu'l-Mulk and Núri'd-Dín Zayn, Persians, and Nevill G. Meak in and Miss Louisa A. M. Mathew (afterwards Mrs. Louis G. Gregory), English. 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked after my health. I answered that I was well. For the weariness of the long journey, the suspense, and the excitement of landing for the first time at an Oriental port, were all forgotten in His Presence. I never felt more peaceful or composed. I said that I was happy to attain the meeting. He answered: "I am happy to have you here." Mention was then made of fragrant Bahá'í meetings in Washington and New York just prior to my departure, and of letters and tokens of love sent by the friends. Some of the messages being delivered, out of His great wisdom fitting responses were made.

VISIONS

'Abdu'l-Bahá was asked to interpret the vision of Mrs. Amy Wilt, one of the Washington friends. She was left very ill and passed away before my return. In her vision she had seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá leaning on the Blessed Perfection (Bahá'u'lláh), a beautiful light and a shower of white doves. "Have you not read in the Bible how the Spirit was seen descending in the form of a dove?" asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Soon after accepting the Revelation the writer had a vision. (Joel 2-28) Bahá'u'lláh was seen with head bent gently forward. His right arm was extended and from His right side flowed four layers of mellow golden light, each layer containing numberless spirals and beautiful figures. The light was of uniform brightness. This vision soon vanished and I found myself turning into a street in which some enemies of the Cause of God were menacing the believers. I raised my right hand above my head and shouted, "It is all true! Mine eyes have seen the Glory!" 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained. "There are four classes of people. The first is those who have accepted the teachings and occupy themselves spreading the Glad Tidings. The second is those who are good believers, but make no effort to guide others. The third is those who have heard the Message of the Kingdom but have not accepted it. The fourth is those who have not yet heard of this Revelation. As to the contention of those who deny and oppose, you have already had experience enough to know what this means."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Is it incumbent upon the friends to put into execution at once the laws contained in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas, as far as we know them? "There is at present no satisfactory translation of the Kitáb-i-Aqdas. It must first be translated by a board well acquainted with both Persian and English." Shall Esperanto or Ido become the basis of the universal language? "Esperanto is preferred above Ido." What is the meaning of the term Genii mentioned in the Qur'án? "This refers to evil passions in man, as lusts." In reply to another question, 'Abdu'l-Bahá made it clear that this expression does not refer to the forces of nature, such as wind and water. Does the Bahá'í prohibition of gambling and lotteries forbid games of every description? "No, some games are innocent, and if pursued for pastime there is no harm. But there is danger that pastime may degenerate into waste of time. Waste of time is not acceptable in the Cause of God. But recreation, which may improve the bodily powers, as exercise, is desirable." Is it practicable at present to open a Bahá'í home in Washington? "There should be a meeting place." But in New York, it was urged, the friends have opened a Bahá'í home. "There should be a meeting place," repeated 'Abdu'l-Bahá. What is the Will of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá concerning this unworthy servant? “Work for unity and harmony between the races.”

THE RACE QUESTION

‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked, “What of the conflict between the white and colored races?”

This question made me smile, for I at once felt that my Inquirer, although He had never in person visited America, yet knew more of conditions than I could ever know. I answered that there was much friction between the races. That those who accepted the Bahá’í teachings had hopes of an amicable settlement of racial differences, while others were despondent. Among the friends were earnest souls who wished for a closer unity of races and hoped that He might point out the way to them. He further questioned. “Does this refer to the removal of hatreds and antagonisms on the part of one race, or of both races?” Both races, was my answer, and He said this would be done. Here He was told of a suggestion that had been made, that the central Bahá’í meeting in Washington should be open to all races, while group meetings might be organized along racial lines. “The Mashriqu’l-Adhkár must be open to all races.” But at present we have no Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, I answered. “There must be no distinctions in Bahá’í meetings. All are equal.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed approval of the Working Committee in giving representation to the colored race. He said He would pray for them. What should the colored race do to improve its material and spiritual condition? “The best thing for it is to accept these teachings. In this way they will gain the confidence of the whites and differences will fade. The Bahá’í teachings reveal the means of both material and spiritual progress.”

Pleasure was expressed at seeing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá look so well. He replied that He felt well. I am glad that you overlook my shortcomings and receive me so cordially. His beautiful face became illumined by a smile and He answered: “You are welcome, very welcome! I have waited for your coming and (indicating Mr. Meakin) have a special guide to take you around.” He inquired about the amount of time I could stay and said that I might divide it between Ramleh and ‘Akká. Then He added: “And now I want you to see two other friends of mine, one of them a minister” [of state]. Upon shaking hands my first interview with the Center of God’s Covenant was at an end. We had talked long, and twice I paused to ask if I were not consuming too much of His time. Each time He said no, and the tenderest parent could not have been so patient, courteous and loving. This evening I dined with Kaem Makem of Tīhrán, formerly a minister of state. He embraced the Bahá’í Cause against the intense opposition of his proud family, risking place and fortune. He was deeply interested in the progress of the Cause in America and was especially happy over reports of unity. Núri’d-Dín Zayn was present and interpreted.

April 11. This morning at my hotel, the Victoria, I awaited Messrs. Meakin and Molk, with whom I had a tentative appointment. In the meantime I was busy with my diary. At the sound of voices and footsteps, I looked out of the window and saw coming up the steps leading to the broad veranda — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He was accompanied by a tall, Arab-like Persian. Surprised, I went joyfully to meet Him. He took my hand and said, “I came especially to see you.” He then led me to a seat and left me. Not knowing how long He would be absent, as I heard Him going along the corridor and saying in a strong voice, “Good Morning!” I resumed my writing at the table. He soon returned and again led me to a seat against the wall of the room. This time He was accompanied by Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and the other Persian. We were all seated and a few words were said by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Then He left us, explaining that He would visit a sick friend. Then the tall Persian, who proved to be Mírzá Ḥasan Khurasání, embraced me very warmly in Oriental fashion. He explained that he did not sooner address me because of the Holy Presence. Thus the knowing ones in many ways show their reverence for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The Persians whom I met were all silent before Him, unless bidden to speak. Yet He so often responds to silent thoughts.

After a short time ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent for me, and He was found seated in the bay window of a room on the third floor. We were joined by His secretaries, Núri’d-Dín Zayn and Tamaddunu’l-Mulk, to one of whom He dictated Tablets. After a time, His permission was obtained to present letters and tokens sent by the friends in America. The tokens consisted of a number of articles of small value. As each was presented, He examined it with a pleased expression. My own happiness was great, springing from the knowledge that although they were simple and inexpensive, they represented much love on the part of the friends. When the last of these, a bottle of perfume, was presented, He opened it, rubbing a little of it upon His beard and upon the hands of His secretaries. On this occasion, He also sent messages and greetings to the friends, responsive to theirs. Every action on His part was an indication of how full of love, joy and peace is this mighty educator of humanity, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

A SUPPLICATION FROM THE ORIENT

In the afternoon I again sought the Holy Presence, this time finding Him at home. For a time, Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and I were His only visitors. A brief silence was broken by the Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “We are all here together.” By this He meant, as explained by Tamaddun, there was unity between us. Then we were permitted to see a supplication written by Taj al Tatenah, daughter of the former Sháh of Persia, the same monarch by whose orders the Báb was executed, Bahá’u’lláh was imprisoned and exiled, and thousands of the friends of God were martyred in the dust. Now the daughter of this proud and cruel king in deepest humility addresses ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This supplication, translated from the Persian, read: “O, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! Forgiver of sins, Merciful, Bountiful, Pitiful! How can a sinner like me reach thee? Yea, as the shower is pleasant to the drinker, so the Mercy of God is delicious to sinners. The Dawning Place of Mercy guides sinners into the broad way of forgiveness and distressed ones sink into the Ocean of Pardon, until from this world it bears them into the Kingdom.

And in the Stream of Life laves those who would purify themselves and are not refused. Thus with Merciful Hands Thou hast taken hold of this unworthy maidservant and in this worldly state hast bestowed upon her the Bounty of God. Thou are the Merciful through all, and through all the Forgiver of sins! It is best for a servant to confess his sins to God; otherwise no one can do His Will." "So in these few days of life, take Thou this unworthy maidservant under the shadow of Thy Bounty according to the Will of God, and bestow Thou upon me permission to come and visit the threshold of Thy Palace, which, through the Merciful, is my utmost desire." "The servant of Thy Blessed Gate, Taj al Tatenah." This name signifies "Crown of the Kingship of the country."

INTERMARRIAGE

'Abdu'l-Bahá asked: "Are the colored and white believers entirely united?" Referring to the friends, I answered that there was not entire unity, but that there were earnest souls of both races who desired closer unity and hoped that He would point out to them the means of attaining it. He said: "The best means is to accept this Cause. All differences must fade among believers. In the present antagonism there is great danger to both races. Intermarriage is a good way to efface racial differences. It produces strong, beautiful offspring, clever and resourceful." The special consideration of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was asked for the African tribes, in view of their backward condition and ignorance. "I shall supplicate for them at the Throne of Abhá. You must be a leader to them. Guide them to the Truth." Questioned about the ancient Egyptians and Ethiopians, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that they were once mighty peoples, and that many of the arts of the ancients were lost to the present civilization.

He was questioned concerning a theory advanced that the American Indians, who worship the Great Spirit, are the same as the ten lost Tribes of Israel. "This theory is not true. But in very ancient times Asia led all the continents in civilization. At this time there was a connection between Asia and America which was lost and entirely forgotten. As to the belief of the American Indians in the Great Spirit, this is explained by the fact that worship is inherent in the nature of man, who must have something above himself upon which he may depend. Even men who are unconscious of this and deny it, depend upon it notwithstanding. There was a French statesman, an atheist, who opposed religion and advocated its abolition. But afterwards his wife was observed to have their infant son baptized with the water brought from a certain river in Syria. When questioned about this she said it was done at the command of her husband!"

'Abdu'l-Bahá suggested that Tamaddun and I should go for a walk. Afterwards we decided to go to Alexandria, where we were soon joined by Núri'd-Dín Zayn and Mr. Meakin. In this gathering I became conscious of the Reality of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as I said the Greatest Name. The next day it became known to us that 'Abdu'l-Bahá knew how we had been occupied in passing the time. In the evening, after our late Oriental dinner, some time was passed with Kaem Makem and his sick brother, Tamaddunu'l-Mulk and other Persians. All present were in the best of humor, the invalid included. I could not forbear to express to these gentlemen the admiration felt for their noble qualities of mind and heart. At the same time feeling that the courtesies extended me were out of proportion to my station, I advised them of my own humble rank among Americans. They acknowledged the compliment paid them with evident satisfaction. But as Tamaddun began to translate the latter part of my remark, he was interrupted with vigorous shakes of the head and deprecatory gestures. He paused and said: "They will not let me tell them that." Then in his quiet, gentle way, he said: "The qualities valued in the Cause of God are love, reconciliation, harmony, and peace, not worldly power. We value and love you because of these qualities."

April 12. Today I was called to the Holy Presence. Coming to my hotel Tamaddunu'l-Mulk said, "The Master wants you." How impressive were these simple words! Among many of the friends in Europe and the Orient 'Abdu'l-Bahá is known by this title. Its meaning is that of Teacher. But He has donned the Mantle of Servitude and has earnestly requested that He be known as 'Abdu'l-Bahá, or the Servant of God. This question was asked: "In the Old Testament several of the Prophets are mentioned as having lived long periods, as Methusaleh, 969 years. Does not this refer to their cycles as Manifestations?" "Yes, it means that the dominion of their laws and ordinances covered such periods. The allotted span of human life does not vary from age to age. In the pyramids are to be found the bodies of men who lived four or five thousand years ago. They show forth the same characteristics as men of today. There are also records of their births and deaths, indicating that they lived sixty or seventy years, as men do today."

To what extent, if ever, can human affection be unselfish? "To the extent that it prefers another to one's self. A man seeing his brother drowning may risk or even lose his own life to save him. Such an action is unselfish." 'Abdu'l-Bahá was told of an explanation made to an orthodox Sunday School class, concerning the ascent of Elijah in the Fiery Chariot. This was, in effect, that Elijah in the Fiery Chariot was a vision which Elisha had at the moment of the death of Elijah. 'Abdu'l-Bahá approved of this explanation, saying in English, "Very nice." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "I give you good news, the Cause of God will spread in the city of Washington."

Although busy dictating Tablets, 'Abdu'l-Bahá invited me to speak and ask questions. I was filled with a sense of unworthiness. He called my attention to a Tablet being revealed to thirty Persians. Sometimes, He remarked, one Tablet was revealed to a hundred Persians, while many individual Tablets were sent to Americans. My own thought about this was that perhaps it was done upon the principle that the sick need most the physician. For the Persian friends are known to be in the greatest love and unity. The fruits of love and unity, especially with the appearance of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, are manifest to a greater and greater degree in America. Tamaddunu'l-Mulk, said, "This morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá was visited by two ladies who were not believers. They conversed with Him and were deeply impressed. Before departing, they offered to place some gold upon the table, to be used for the poor. He told them that it would be better for them to go among the poor and in person distribute the gold. “‘A very extraordinary man!’ they said in parting.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was asked if, in view of the difficulties in the way of interracial unity for all meetings, the colored friends should organize separately to observe the nineteen-day unity meetings. “The colored people must attend all the unity meetings. There must be no distinctions. All are equal. If you have any influence to get the races to intermarry, it will be very valuable. Such unions will beget very strong and beautiful children. If you wish I will reveal a Tablet in regard to the wiping out of racial differences.” This was not the first time He had spoken of this matter and with emphasis. I thanked Him.

Soon after this He went out upon the veranda, where Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and I followed. He walked back and forth in silence, while we stood, awaiting His bidding. After a short time all returned to His reception room, where we again waited in silence. Soon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá arose, saying sorrowfully that He was very weary. He shook hands with us and retired. My desire to know the Supreme Wisdom in handling a very difficult situation in America had involved a question which made ‘Abdu’l-Bahá very sorrowful. This sadness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was keenly felt by Tamaddunu’l-Mulk and myself. For although the expressive and beautiful face of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was nearly always joyful during my stay at Ramleh, here was a glimpse of Him who carries the burden of the world. Like One of old, how truly must such an one be “a Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.”

April 13. During luncheon at the Victoria the Egyptian waiter, who seemed always pleased to give me information about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, advised me that He was in the hotel. About two o’clock I sought His room, finding Him alone. His smile of welcome was beautiful to see. He was occupied in looking over His correspondence, and for about an hour no one else came. It seemed a great privilege to be alone with Him, and I was impressed with His simplicity as never before. I also felt a longing for greater capacity to serve the Cause. My notebook was in hand and upon the appearance of Núri’d-Dín Zayn, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá advised me to write. I told Him that I valued the privilege, as the friends in America would be interested in all that I could see and hear. He permitted me to write with as much freedom as desired. He then revealed a Tablet, chanting the Word with a strong voice. Question: Is it Wisdom that I should visit Cairo upon returning from ‘Akká? “Yes, I want you to see as much as possible. Attend the meeting at Cairo and at Haifa deliver a lecture. I want the friends to know you. You must also go to Persia.” Surprised, I asked, “Now?” “After two years, when you are prepared for it. I want you to see the friends and how full of love they are. They have passed through many trials and are refined as pure gold. Those who at one time would have received you with averted faces and would have broken the glasses after you had used them for drinking, are now more loving than father or mother.”

APPEARANCE OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared about the medium height, with a strong frame and symmetrical features. His face is deeply furrowed and His color about that of parchment. His carriage is erect and His entire form strikingly majestic and beautiful. His hands and nails are shapely and pure. His silver hair is long enough to touch the shoulders. The beard is snow white, the eyes light blue and penetrating, the nose slightly aquiline. The voice is powerful, but capable of infinite pathos, tenderness and sympathy. His dress was that of the Oriental gentleman of the highest classes, simple and neat and very graceful. The color of His apparel was light, the outer robe being made of alpaca. On His head rested a light fez, surrounded by a white turban. The meekness of the servant, the majesty of the king, are in His brow and form.

A STORY OF PERSIA

‘Abdu’l-Bahá related a story of Persia. “One of the Bábís had a vision in which he saw a passage from the Qur’án written in English upon an arch beneath which sat the Sháh. He reported this vision to friends, through whom it reached the ears of the Sháh, the same monarch through whose cruelty so many of the believers had been imprisoned or martyred. The Sháh, upon hearing of the vision, became very angry, declaring that the English writing indicated some design on the part of the Bábís, whom he would utterly destroy. But the Bábí replied, ‘That this inscription was written in English imports nothing; but its place is significant. So high above the Sháh’s head is the Power of God that he is powerless to reach it.’”

April 14. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in His treatment of the people of all classes, extending courtesies and amenities to those who seek His Presence even though unconscious of His Mission and spiritual Station, gave very impressive object lessons in tolerance. He always looks to the good in people and develops the noble qualities in souls. In His noble charity He is as broad as the heavens and the earth.

April 15. This morning I met Jinábí Hájí Hádí ‘Alí, a venerable teacher in the Cause. He had borne stripes and imprisonment. With him were Jinábí Shaykh Muslim Baghdádí, who was disinherited and otherwise sorely tried by his own father because of his faith, but remained firm throughout all, and ‘Abdu’l-Husayn, who was soon to visit Persia. It is a pleasure to meet veterans in service. They show forth great humility and inspire the recruits in a great army which daily becomes stronger. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was occupied reviewing the work of His secretaries. He went through each Tablet, here and there interlining or changing a word. Afterwards He affixed his own signature and put them in envelopes.

“How many are the colored believers?” asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. As accurately as possible, an estimate was made of the number of those who had heard and accepted the Glad Tidings. He responded: “The Cause will advance among them. There are many good souls among them, and such people are my friends.

You must continue to teach.” “Do you remember My Tablet to you?” Gladly I announced that it was committed to memory. “I liken you to the pupil of the eye. You are black and it is black, yet it becomes the focus of light.”

HUMOR OF ‘ABDU’L-ABHÁ

In the afternoon some of the friends met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the Victoria. He mentioned the Protestants at Haifa, telling Mr. Meakin, who was to remain there some time, that they would show him and other pilgrims great courtesy in their efforts to win them away from their faith. Then with a merry twinkle in His eye, He related several incidents which caused laughter. On one occasion He was invited to a school exhibition among these people. One of them read a Bible lesson from the first chapter of St. John’s Gospel, “In the beginning was the Word,” etc. Then ‘Abbás Effendi, as He is known among them, was invited to speak. Remarking that the chapter just read furnished a good subject, He gave them an explanation of the Word. At this, all of them seemed pleased, and it was stated that never before had they heard so clear and beautiful an explanation. But during these felicitations, one from among them suddenly arose and said, “When He speaks of the Word He does not mean Christ, but Bahá’u’lláh!” Then they became angry.

On another occasion, while visiting a store, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá met the leader among the Protestants and accosted him with a pleasant “Good Morning!” His response was very gruff. “My friend,” inquired ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “why do you return my greeting so coldly? Have I offended you? Here is a Jew, who now believes in Christ. Do you not think well of this?” The Jew then spoke up, testifying to his faith in Christ, and in support of Him offering logical, scientific, or prophetic proofs. At this, the Protestant leader was much pleased and was about to congratulate the Jew. But suddenly taking another thought, he asked the Jew, “But do you believe in Muḥammad also?” “Yes.” “And in Bahá’u’lláh?” “Yes,” again responded the Jew. “Then go hence! I will have none of you!” he declared. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá explained that it was difficult to convert a Jew, since in turning to the Light of the New Day he must believe both in Christ, Muḥammad and Bahá’u’lláh. The case of another Protestant was related. He rejected the Cause because the Báb was killed. “If God is in this movement, why should He allow one of His chief agents to be put to death?” “But how about the crucifixion of Christ?” he was asked. “O, that’s another matter!” he responded.

THE CREATIVE WORD

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said, “The Word is a book. The believers are the letters. The letters of the alphabet taken separately have no meaning. But in combination they form words, which have a meaning. The Word manifested in Jesus is Divine Knowledge. The Knowledge of God is inseparable from the Reality of God. Therefore those who would know the Reality of Christ must perceive His Spirit, by which their hearts become united. They thus become a word and have a meaning through the Reality of Jesus. All that this Word has produced in the way of civilization and progress is a part of its meaning. Jesus is the Perfect Mirror, in which the Bounties and Perfections of God are reflected. Jesus is not separated from God, since He is the perfection of Divine Knowledge." Mr. Meakin asked, "Are not all the Prophets Manifestations reflecting the Word?" 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Yes, but the Word as reflected in Jesus has a special meaning. The sun shines in all the months, but in July it is brightest. "Speak to Me, Mr. Gregory." I stated that I was glad to hear this explanation, as the Christians would be glad to know that He had thus spoken of Jesus the Christ.

ON TEACHING

What is the most effective way of presenting the Cause? Those addressed on the subject meet with so many tests. If one thing does not prove a test, another does. "The most important thing is deeds. Good deeds are accepted by all nations and religions. As to presenting the teachings by word, the teacher must be as a skillful physician to the patient. Adapt the treatment to the spiritual needs of the patient and do not prescribe for those who refuse treatment."

April 16. Mr. Meakin, Miss Mathew, and the writer, three pilgrims about to leave the illumined Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá for the Holy City, went this Sunday morning to take leave. Before entering we met Shoghi and Rhoui, two beautiful boys, the grandsons of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. These children of the Holy household show great affection for pilgrims. 'Abdu'l-Bahá received us with His usual gracious kindness. Mr. Meakin expressed the hope that we would find Him on our return. Mr. Gregory added, another year we hope to see You in America. He smiled and asked: "Will you bring an aeroplane and steal Me away?" He then related how, when persecuted at 'Akká by the former sultan of Turkey, 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, and threatened with crucifixion, the Italian consul at Haifa, a friend, had a vessel brought and urged Him to go aboard secretly and escape to Europe. Had He yielded to the consul's wish, people would have thought that He was running away to escape affliction. But now there was freedom, and if He should set out on a journey perhaps He would be regarded as a tourist in search of health. During the week I have learned many valuable lessons. "I hope that your insight will become so clear that you will not need a teacher; but the Holy Spirit will guide you in all things." "I have prayed for you here and hope that when you visit the Holy Tomb you will pray for Me. I hope the Divine Bounties will descend upon you during your visit." Upon shaking hands we parted.

HAIFA

In the afternoon we embarked on the Austrian Lloyd Line, but a Mediterranean storm delayed us twenty-four hours in the harbor of Alexandria. Sailing on the 17th, the wind had subsided, but the sea was still rough, our passage to Port Sa'id being full of discomfort. Reaching this port the next morning we rested at the entrance of the Suez Canal for a few hours, and then were under way for Jaffa. Here we rested several hours during the landing of passengers and stores. Jaffa is the nearest port to Jerusalem, with which it is connected by railroad. We advanced northward, along the coast of Palestine and in full view of its picturesque mountain range. About dusk we reached the beautiful Bay of Haifa, and in the darkness, by the aid of a small boat, landed at Haifa, which lies at the foot of Mount Carmel. The night was passed at a small German hotel.

The next morning Mírzá Jalál and Mírzá Hádí, two sons-in-law of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in company with Mírzá ‘Ináyatu’lláh, called. In the afternoon, a visit was made to the Tomb of the Báb and the Hospice, both on Mount Carmel, and near each other. At the Holy Tomb we met several other pilgrims. Removing our shoes in accordance with Oriental custom, we reverently entered the Tomb, where prayers were chanted by one of the Persians. The Tomb, half way up the mountain side, is stately in proportions and has a commanding site. Near it is the famous clump of cypress trees where Bahá’u’lláh used to sit. Looking across the Bay of Haifa, ‘Akká is seen within its gloomy walls; while beyond this city Mount Herman, with its snow-capped summit, “mysterious and inaccessible,” rises in the distance. Hence also may be seen the Brook Kishon, where Elijah, the Man of God, slew the false prophets of Bael.

In the evening a Bahá’í meeting was held at the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. About twenty-five men were present and a child. As I entered with ‘Ináyatu’lláh, they arose and greeted me most cordially. Among those present was Mírzá Asadu’lláh, the Bahá’í philosopher, author of The School of the Prophets, and Sacred Mysteries. In his early life he set out from Persia to find Bahá’u’lláh, enduring many hardships by the way. In later years he brought the body of the Báb from Persia to Haifa, surmounting many perils. Present also was Mírzá Hádí and Mírzá Jalál, sons-in-law of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; Mírzá Ḥasan Yazdí, who had spent thirty-five years in ‘Akká; Ḥájí Khán, former governor of Baluch, who gave up everything for the Cause, becoming the shepherd of Bahá’u’lláh; ‘Abdu’l Rassoul, born in ‘Akká, whose father while carrying water was murdered by unbelievers; ‘Abbás Coli, who left all his possessions at Alexandretta and now serves in the Holy Tomb; ‘Abdu’l Shiz Yazdí, who ventured from Persia to serve the Cause; D. Muḥammad-‘Alí, exiled during the days of Bahá’u’lláh; Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn, son of the great writer; Mírzá Moserdin, son of Mírzá Asadu’lláh; Mírzá Ḥusayn, another exile; Mírzá Assha Ḥusayn, named by Bahá’u’lláh, Gabi’o’llah, a relative of the Báb; Mírzá Ḥasan, in charge of the Hospice, who was exiled from Adrianople with Bahá’u’lláh, and Mírzá ‘Ináyatu’lláh, who acted as interpreter.

Mírzá Asadu’lláh asked questions, in answering which it became easy to obey the wish of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that I should lecture at Haifa. I acknowledged the Divine Favor which had brought me to the Holy Presence and asked, “Who is worthy to stand before the King?” He replied, “It is good that your insight has become so clear that you can recognize the King. For many years past, even from the time of Moses, people have come to this mountain to see the Lord. You have attained to His Meeting before reaching the mountain.” “What of the progress of the Cause in America and how does it affect racial conditions?” It was shown how the spirit of unity was gaining ground in America. Prayers were chanted in Persian and read in English.

April 21. With Mr. Meakin as guide, a visit was made to the Carmelite Monastery on Mt. Carmel, where the Grotto of Elijah and other interesting views were pointed out. In the afternoon, Mírzá Asadu'lláh gave lessons in presenting the Message. In speaking to a skeptic, he said, call his attention to the different grades in the world of existence, and the way men are accustomed to look for perfection in each. The highest standard of excellence that can be found thus becomes an authority. So in the kingdom of man we look for the Perfect Man, and when found accept Him as authority. To teach one who believes in God but rejects the Manifestation, show how the bounties and perfections of God are reflected in the Perfect Mirror.

THE FEAST OF RIDVÁN

April 23. This day is the beginning of the Feast of Ridván, commemorating the Declaration by Bahá'u'lláh of His Divine Mission. At prayer in the morning, I was made conscious of the Divine Bounties. We were to join in the observance of the day by making the pilgrimage to the Holy City, 'Akká, and the Tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. A party was formed, consisting of Miss Mathew, Mírzá Asadu'lláh, 'Ináyatu'lláh, Messrs. Meakin and Gregory. As we started at about 9:30 in the morning, the clear spring atmosphere was lighted by a bright sunshine. We drove the distance to 'Akká, nine miles around the beach. Just without the city gates the carriage stopped and Miss Mathew, in company with the venerable Mírzá Asadu'lláh, waited, while the others, with 'Ináyatu'lláh for a guide, set out on foot for a brief visit to this ancient city, made glorious in this latter day by the fulfillment of prophecies. For in this Most Great Prison lived and wrought Bahá'u'lláh, the Blessed Perfection, the Most Great Manifestation of God, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God and the Center of the Covenant of God. Passing successively through two gates, we soon found ourselves within the gloomy fortification. Entering a narrow street flanked by Oriental bazaars, we saw the barracks where the illustrious prisoner and His followers were first confined when brought from Adrianople in 1868. Within a few yards is the home of the governor of 'Akká.

Pressing forward we soon reached the limits of the city, bordering upon the sea. Here stands a tall building. This house was once occupied by Bahá'u'lláh. After a slight parley by 'Ináyatu'lláh, whose uncle is caretaker of the building, we passed through the court and climbed the old stone steps leading to the second story. After waiting a short time we removed our shoes and our faces were anointed with a fragrant perfume. Then we entered the room of the Manifestation and were shown the portraits of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh. These faces are wonderful in their sublimity and beauty. Here is seen the expression of gentleness, meekness, wisdom, light, love, majesty, power, holiness, in short, every attribute of God which adorns the world of existence.

THE HOLY TOMB

Retracing our steps we soon joined our party, and, driving by green fields and fragrant gardens without the city, the desert that now blossoms as the rose, we entered the house adjoining the Holy Tomb. Here some time was spent in pleasant social communion and in the court a most enjoyable luncheon was served. Near at hand and in full view is a house occupied by Náqíḍín; but these we did not see. After luncheon we visited the Tomb, where lies the body of Bahá'u'lláh, the Manifestation of God. We knew that we stood upon holy ground. The place is spiritual and its atmosphere is fragrant with many beautiful flowers. Our Persian friends chanted verses, and, according to His expressed wish, we remembered 'Abdu'l-Bahá in our prayers. The friends in the East and West were not forgotten. Our earnest desire was for unity through the power of the Greatest Name.

We next went to the Garden of the Riḍván where many friends, some like us, pilgrims from distant lands, had gathered to observe the beginning of the feast. We were received with evidences of great affection. With the utmost simplicity Persian tea was served to the friends gathered around, and Mírzá Munír Zayn chanted. Afterwards we entered a small house in the Garden, wherein a room occupied in times past by Bahá'u'lláh was pointed out. The entire garden, with its great mulberry trees, bushes laden with roses, rivulet and flowing fountain, has an ideal beauty. Among the people assembled were Christian, Muslim, and Zoroastrian friends now united and in great love through the power of God. This gathering was truly impressive and also representative of various parts of the world. Returning, we passed through the Garden of Paradise, adjoining. The next after noon, after quiet and pleasant hours with the friends, I sailed for Egypt.

PORT SA'ÍD AND CAIRO

During a few hours at Port Sa'íd I met Aḥmad Yazdí, the Persian Consul, Sa'íd Asadu'lláh, and other friends. Charming courtesies were extended the pilgrim from America. It is thus that one finds the Light of the Kingdom reflected wherever believers in the Cause of God are found. Some time was given to sightseeing among the pyramids, Mosques, Gardens, and museum of Cairo. In wealth of ancient and medieval art, few cities of the world surpass the Egyptian capital.

MÍRZÁ ABU'L-FAḌL

Among the friends met in Cairo were Mrs. J. Stannard of England, Mr. Sydney Sprague, an American, Muḥammad Taqí, 'Abdu'l-Ḥusayn, the two sons of Mírzá Ḥasan Khorassa ní, and others among the Persians. It was a rare privilege to have two interviews with Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, the eminent historian and Bahá'í philosopher. Mr. Sprague acted as interpreter on one occasion and 'Abdu'l-Ḥusayn on the other. Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl returned the greetings of American friends and inquired about the progress of the Cause. He was also interested in the race problem, and was gratified to know that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had approved of intermarriage as the most effective means of effacing racial differences.

He was asked the following question: The ancient Ethiopians are praised by Homer, and today in the Museum of Gizeh the statue of one of their queens was seen mounted on the same pedestal with that of the god Ammon. Does historical research warrant the conclusion that these people were once possessed of a great civilization? “Yes, there are records both among Greeks and Persians pointing to the greatness of the ancient Ethiopians. But the records differ and are often in conflict.” Is there any evidence that the blacks of central Africa were once civilized? “Yes, there are evidences that they were once high in the scale of civilization, but like the American Indians, lost this place for reasons that are not known.” As racial stocks are regarded among historians, are the blacks of central Africa of the same stock as the ancient Ethiopians? “Beyond three thousand years historical records are vague and shadowy. About this time these stocks were distinct. But it is possible that beyond this time, say one hundred thousand years ago, they were identical. Among the blacks those who are Muḥammadans believe in the unity of the human race and their own descent from Adam. It is not known what those who are idolaters believe, as they keep no records.”

A STORY OF BAHÁ’U’LLÁH

Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl said, “You have read in a book written by Myron H. Phelps of New York, a story relating to the appearance of Bahá’u’lláh before the governor of ‘Akká, stating that He declared that He was neither a camel driver nor the son of a carpenter. This story is untrue; but this is what actually occurred.” “‘Who are You?’ demanded the governor of Bahá’u’lláh.” “‘You have the records and therefore know,’ He replied.” “‘But who are you?’ insisted the governor. “‘I am Bahá’u’lláh of Núr,’ replied the prisoner. And immediately those present saw a light.” “‘That is sufficient,’ said the governor, and Bahá’u’lláh in majesty walked away.” Two Kurds entered the apartments of Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl and were introduced. Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl remarked that there were three sects in Persia that held themselves aloof from other religionists, the Zoroastrians, Kurds, and Barataria. Now the Bahá’í teachings are being introduced among them and this makes a change in their attitude towards others.

‘ABDU’L-ḤUSAYN

Among the friends met at the home of Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl was ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn, a youthful believer with a radiant face. Like his father, Muḥammad Taqí, he has shown great devotion to the Cause. He volunteered to escort me to points of interest about the city, among them the Mosque of Ḥusayn (The University of Cairo), where lies the body of the grandson of Muḥammad. He spoke of the Cause almost continuously, giving beautiful lessons. Upon my remarking the happiness so universal among the friends, he quoted from a saying of Bahá’u’lláh,

“My Presence is happiness and peace. Hell is the hearts of those who deny and oppose.” “One of the extraordinary things about this Cause,” continued he, “is the rapid fulfillment of prophecies. Many predictions concerning the Jews, made by previous Manifestations, are just now being fulfilled. But how soon did the prediction of Bahá’u’lláh concerning Napoleon III come to pass!” “In this Revelation, Bahá’u’lláh has closed the gates of interpretation, tradition, and controversy. First the Word must be given out as it has been revealed. Second, stories floating about should not be given currency. Third, disputes must be avoided. If two believers dispute concerning the Word, neither is accepted.” ‘Abdu’l-Ḥusayn also showed familiarity with the Bible. Upon my expression of regret that my connection with the Cause had not been earlier, he said, “Think of Christ’s parable of the vineyard. Some of the laborers were employed early in the day, others at the eleventh hour. But each received his reward.”

MÍRZÁ ABU’L-FAQĤL

Mírzá Abu’l-Faḡl said, “It is a great thing to live in this day and know ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Among the believers in the Báb were some who rejected the Manifestation upon His Appearance. They were left in darkness. And among those who acknowledged Bahá’u’lláh, if now they do not follow His Command as revealed in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas and the Kitáb el Ahd and turn to the Greatest Branch, they, too, are left without Light. But those who accept ‘Abdu’l-Bahá attain to a knowledge of the others. In the Book of Revelation it is written, ‘Blessed are they whose names are written in the Lamb’s Book of Life.’ This prophecy refers to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”

RAMLEH AGAIN

April 29. At the close of a visit among the friends in Cairo that was both pleasant and interesting, I proceeded again to Ramleh. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá received me with gracious kindness and asked, “What day were you at ‘Akká?” Greetings from the friends at the various points visited were delivered and He was also told of the beginning of the Feast of Riḡván. Mention was also made of the great kindness and love found in the hearts of the friends. He repeated, “You must visit Persia.” He also directed me to visit Stuttgart, Paris, London, and various points in America. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared hard-worked and weary. At our parting He lavished His great affection upon me, although the unworthiest of His servants.

April 30. Today ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was asked to bless certain Greatest Name stones and other tokens intended for the friends in the West. He handled each of them, expressing admiration, afterwards adding something to the collection. He was questioned as to the reality of a story related by a young Episcopal clergyman, that on one occasion he saw Mírzá Abu’l-Faḡl surrounded by a halo, as he taught the people at Green Acre, Maine. He said: “The light is of four kinds: First, the light of the sun. It reveals objects to our perception, but cannot itself realize them. Second, the light of the eye. It can realize objects, but cannot understand them. Third, the light of wisdom. This both realizes and understands objects. Fourth, the Light of Guidance. This is the Supreme Light, the conscious Reality which comprehends mysteries.” Can this last ever be cognizable through the special senses, as the eye? “By the insight,” He answered. Is the time fixed when the Bahá’í teachings will be accepted by all men, becoming universal? “You may be sure of that. The Cause is now known in all parts of the world, although more firmly established in some parts than others. Compare this with previous revelations and the time of their spread. Three hundred years after Christ His teachings were only known through Judea and a part of Europe. But now this Movement is only about sixty-seven years (A.D. 1911) old. Think of what may happen by the end of the first century.”

THE GARDEN OF NOUZHA

On my previous visit to Ramleh, Tamaddunu’l-Mulk had spoken with great joy of a visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to a park, accompanied by other friends. So this afternoon my anticipations were high when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá suggested that we might go to the Garden of Nouza at Sidi Gaba. The secretary and I at once set out, and partly by electric tramway and partly by walking, soon reached our destination. In the garden we met a company of Bahá’í friends who at once made us welcome. They offered us tea and other light refreshments. Then with Tamaddun, I went for a walk, viewing with surprise and delight the Oriental luxuriance and splendor of the flowers and shrubs, but always longing for the Presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. After a time, He was seen sitting on a bench, talking to a Syrian gentleman. How majestic and beautiful He appeared amid the trees and flowers! In concluding our walk we approached Him, and seeing Him occupied, were inclined to seat ourselves in silence. But with unfailing courtesy, He interrupted His conversation to greet us and then bade us be seated. Near nightfall He arose and we followed Him across country to the tramway. Our party, including a few who followed out of curiosity, consisted of nineteen persons. We walked in silence, each occupied with his own thoughts. Our leader was just a little in advance of the others and this walk was a great privilege.

THE OPPORTUNITY

May 1. This day I called at the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but found that He was not there. But at nine o’clock in the evening Tamaddunu’l-Mulk called at the hotel and said that the Master desired me to come. About fourteen pilgrims were found seated in His Presence. He greeted me very heartily and gave me a seat by His side. He said that He had been very busy during the day and asked if I had spent a busy day. More than once during my visit did He inquire how I had spent the day, and it gave me great pleasure when I could report that the day had been well spent. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke to us all, calling attention to the different cities represented by those present and how all were drawn together by the Power of God.

May 2. This evening I again saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and He again inquired how I had spent the day. He said, "I regret that I did not see you, but you are on my mind all the time. Christ said, 'Many shall come from the East and the West, the North and the South, and shall sit down in the Kingdom, while the children of the Kingdom are left in darkness.' It is even so today. You have discovered the Light of the Kingdom and have come from your distant home in America, while some who are near at hand, even among my own people, are in the darkness of denial and opposition."

May 3. This morning Mírzá Ḥasan Khurasání and other Persians were found in company with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Tamaddunu'l-Mulk read from a letter received by him, translating its contents into Persian. At the conclusion a Tablet was revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Later it was learned that this Tablet was revealed to one of the noted workers in the Cause and related to the race problem in America and its solution. (It is found elsewhere.) After dictating this Tablet 'Abdu'l-Bahá took a vessel containing blackberries and gave some of them to each of the friends present, serving us with His hands. In the evening 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Presence was again sought, and this time He was alone, save for Tamaddunu'l-Mulk. The latter and I stood at one end of the room, while 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Majesty moved back and forth. The silence was deep but not oppressive, for Light and Cheer are radiated from this living Temple of Love. From the other end of the room in gentle tones He said in English, "Speak to Me, Mr. Gregory." I tried in vain to speak, to think of something to ask, of some want yet unsatisfied. But silent I remained, for my cup was full and running over. The feeling came to me that in order to receive larger gifts I must go out and work, that in His Providence the Giver of all might grant larger capacity. Coming to where I stood, 'Abdu'l-Bahá struck me several times upon the breast, using the palm of His hand. Then He said in English, "My Gregory! My son!" I felt a thrill of joy. So wonderful is His power to make His loved ones happy. And now the opportunity seemed good to ask His permission for a visit the next day to say good-bye. Like a loving father He answered, "Come, My dear, come!" With an embrace of great affection, we parted.

FAREWELL

May 4. This morning was my last at Ramleh. 'Abdu'l-Bahá received me with great affection. His reception room was well filled with the friends. He took a vessel containing very fragrant roses and began to divide them among those present. Upon reaching me in the distribution, He gave two handfuls and said, "Scatter these among the friends." He then began the work of dictating Tablets, but also found time to speak to the friends. Among other things He said, "It is a great blessing for you to be here. The love which is in your heart has brought you and has kept you here." After two hours I arose to depart. 'Abdu'l-Bahá went into the hall near the stairway, where Tamaddunu'l-Mulk and I followed. The Master said, "Although I desired to speak with you, the time was taken up. Go forth and speak of the Cause of God. Visit the friends. Gladden their hearts. You will be the means of Guidance to many souls. The Divine Bounties will be with you. You are always on My mind and heart.” On our way to the hotel, Tamaddunu’l-Mulk said, “This morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke of you and told me to say to you, ‘Keep your face turned toward the Kingdom and fear nothing.’” Thus parting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá need not be sorrowful, because in reality not a parting. The Reality of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá abides with the friends. And those who arise to serve the Cause of God in this, His greatest Day, may become fully conscious of His great Bounties. Praise be to Him to whom Glory belongs! Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá!

“THE MOST GREAT PEACE”

The following is the translation of a supplication written by a Persian lady, Pari Jan, daughter of Mullá Muḥammad-‘Alí and wife of Mullá Ḥasan, both of whom were martyred in the Path of God. It is evident that the writer, through submission to the Will of God, has attained to “the Most Great Peace.”

“Alláh-u-Abhá! O my Lord, my Master, my Confidence and my Hope! O, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! May my life be a sacrifice to Thy trials! Although this humble maidservant has accepted infinite suffering in the Path of the Blessed Perfection and the Greatest Name, and during persecutions and vicissitudes has sought nothing else but the good pleasure of the Beloved of the world, yet I take courage to supplicate the Ocean of Divine Favor and Generosity to bestow upon me and my dear mother patience and forbearance, and give us such firmness and steadfastness that we may accept derision and jeering in the Path of God. Although the honored ones, the martyred father and husband have attained their spiritual station and have drunk the cup of martyrdom in the Path of God from the hand of the Cup-bearer of Eternity, and attained the highest hope of the favored ones, yet this maidservant pleads and supplicates to be assisted and confirmed in the service of those who are left behind.

“I entreat Thy Blessing for my son and daughter, so that they may be educated under the shade of the Word of God and be trained by the Real Educator and desire nothing but the good pleasure of the Lord. O, my Lord, from the Ocean of Thy Generosity, I beg protection and preservation for these two young plants sown in the Garden of the Cause, that they may arise to serve Thee and spread Thy Message. Verily my Lord is merciful to me!”

TABLETS OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

- Through Mr. J. H. H. to Mr. Louis G. Gregory, Washington, D.C. *

HE IS GOD! O, thou wooer of Truth!

Thy letter was received. Its contents indicated thy attainment to the Most Great Guidance. Thank thou God that thou hast attained to such a Bounty, discovered the Path of the Kingdom and received the Glad Tidings of the Universe of the Most High. This Divine Bestowal is conducive to the everlasting Glory in both worlds. I hope that thou mayest become the herald of the Kingdom; become the means whereby the white and colored people shall close their eyes to racial differences and behold the reality of humanity: And that is the universal unity which is the oneness of the kingdom of the human race, the basic harmony of the world and the appearance of the Bounty of the Almighty. In brief, do thou not look upon thy weak body and thy limited capacity. Look thou upon the Bounties and Providence of the Lord of the Kingdom; for His Confirmation is great and His Power unparalleled and incomparable. Rely as much as thou canst upon the True One and be thou resigned to the Will of God, so that like unto a candle thou mayest become enkindled in the world of humanity and like unto a star thou mayest shine and gleam from the Horizon of Reality and become the cause of the Guidance of both races. Upon thee be Bahá el Abhá!

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS.

- Through Mírzá Aḥmad to Mr. Louis G. Gregory. *

HE IS GOD!

O, thou son of the Kingdom!

Thank thou God that thou has stepped into the Arena of Existence in this blessed period, listened to the call of the Heavenly Kingdom, attained to the utmost hope of the Manifestations of Holiness, wast present at the Divine Table and partook of the Celestial Food. Therefore make thy feet firm and remain steadfast in the Cause, so that thou mayest become confirmed and assisted by the Bounties of the Kingdom and the Door of Heavenly Blessing may be opened before thy face. Thou hast asked for permission to present thyself in this Holy Land. It is at present not in accord with wisdom. Postpone this matter to another and more opportune time. Upon thee be Bahá el Abhá!

Mr. Gregory, upon him be Bahá’u’lláh!

HE IS GOD!

O, thou dear friend! Thy letter was received. God willing, we shall endeavor to reach Washington in time and meet you and renew the Covenant of the ancient love. Upon thee to Bahá el Abhá!

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS Translated by Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, April 12, 1912. New York City.

- Through Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab and the Bahá'í Assembly of New York, To Louise Washington. *

HE IS GOD! O, thou beloved maid-servant of God! In thy letter thou hast intimated that thou art colored. In the Kingdom of God no distinction is made as to the color of the skin, whether it be white or black; nay, rather the heart and soul are considered. If the spirit is pure the face is illuminated, although it be black. If the heart is stained the face is dark and depressed, although it be of the utmost beauty. The color of the pupils of the eye is black, yet they are the fountains of light.

Although the white color is apparent, yet in it is hidden and concealed seven colors. Therefore blackness and whiteness have no importance. Nay, rather the circle of distinction is based upon soul and heart. Thou hast made a statement in thy letter, that thou desirest to be freed from egotism. I hope that thou mayest forget thyself and consider thy ego as nonexistent. Depend on the Bounties of Heaven and rest thou assured upon the favor and grace of the Kingdom of Abhá. I beg of God to assist thee with eloquent speech while teaching the truth, to guide the people of thy race and suffer them to become the sons and daughters of the Kingdom. Be not astonished on account of this; for shouldst thou remain firm and steadfast and not waver because of tests, thou shalt assuredly be assisted and confirmed with this Bounty. Upon thee be Bahá el Abhá.

Translator’s Note

Translator’s Note: The following lines are written in the original by the Blessed Hand of our beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

O, ye Dear Ones of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! In the world of existence the meeting is blessed when the white and colored meet together with infinite love and Heavenly Harmony. When such meetings are established and the participants associate with each other with perfect united love and kindness, the Angels of the Kingdom of Abhá praise them and the Beauty of Bahá’u’lláh addresses them: Blessed are you and again, Blessed are you!

Through Mrs. H.

Upon her be Bahá'u'lláh! HE IS GOD! O, ye servants of God and Maidservants of the Merciful! Thank ye God that the Divine call reached the ear of the spirit and the Word of God displayed effect in the hearts. Although apparently ye are living in distant lands, yet in reality ye are present in the heart and soul in this blessed spot, have entered the shade of the Ensign of Guidance and are encircled by infinite Bounties. Praise be to God that the Doors of the Kingdom are opened, the voice of God is raised, no differences remain between the white and the colored races. All of them are favored in the Threshold of the Almighty and all are beloved in the sight of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Upon ye be Bahá el Abhá.

Jenabe Mr. —,

Upon him be the Glory of God!

O, Dear Friend: The contents of your letter to Mr. Molk have become known to me. Praise be to God, that in this triumphant day of Naw-Rúz the lamp of pleasure has been kindled and the time passed in happiness and joy. Surely in these days of Ridván you have been in great harmony and peace, having heard and enjoyed the song of the Nightingale of Mysteries among the fields of flowers and the gardens of roses. As the friends in America are free, verily they are able to enjoy these days of festivals. You have written that there were several meetings of joy and happiness, one for white another for colored people. Praise be to God! As both races are under the protection of the All-Knowing God, therefore the lamps of unity must be lighted in such a manner in these meetings that no distinction be perceived between the white and colored. Colors are phenomenal; but the realities of men are Essence. When there exists unity of the Essence what power has the phenomenal? When the Light of Reality is shining what power has the darkness of the unreal? If it be possible, gather together these two races, black and white, into one assembly and put such love into their hearts that they shall not only unite but even intermarry. Be sure that the result of this will abolish differences and disputes between black and white. Moreover by the will of God, may it be so. This is a great service to the world of humanity. The matters concerning the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár are very important. Strive to the utmost because it is important. Praise be to God, that Mashriqu'l-Adhkárs have been started in many places and even villages. In some it has been built and in others substitutes have been organized and the people are engaged in the morning in commemorating God. Renew my new Bahá'í greetings to all the friends. Upon thee be the Glory of God!

THE CENTER OF THE COVENANT.

O people! The Doors of the Kingdom are opened — the Sun of Truth is shining upon the world — the Fountains of Life are flowing — the Day-springs of Mercy have appeared — the Greatest and most Glorious Light is now manifest to illuminate the hearts of men: Wake up and hear the Voice of God calling from all parts of the Supreme World — “Come unto me, O ye children of men; come unto Me, O ye who are thirsty, and drink from this sweet Water which is descending in torrents upon all parts of the globe!” Now is the time! Now is the accepted time! Look ye at the time of Christ; had the people realized that the Holy Spirit of God was speaking to them through His Divine Mouth they would not have waited three centuries before accepting Him. And now is it meet for you that ye are sleeping upon the beds of idleness and neglect, while the Father foretold by Christ has come among us and opened the Greatest Door of Bounteous Gifts and Divine Favors? Let us not be like those in past centuries who were deaf to His call and blind to His Beauty; but let us try to open our eyes that we may see Him, and open our ears that we may hear Him, and cleanse our hearts that He may come and abide in our temples.

These days are the days of faith and deeds, not the days of words and lip-service. Let us arise from the sleep of negligence and realize what a great feast is prepared for us, first eating thereof ourselves, then giving unto others who are thirsting for the Water of Knowledge and hungering for the Bread of Life. These Great Days are swiftly passing and once gone can never be recalled: So while the Rays of the Sun of Truth are still shining, and “the Center of the Covenant of God” is Manifest, let us go forth to work, for after awhile the night will come and the way to the Vineyard will not then be so easy to find. The light of knowledge hath appeared, before which the darkness of every superstitious fancy will be annihilated. The hosts of the Supreme Concourse are descending to assist all those who rise up to serve their Lord, to subdue and gain the victory over the city of the hearts, to proclaim the Glad Tidings of the coming of God, and to unite the souls of His creatures.

Pilgrim Notes

Agnes Parsons and Mariam Haney

December 3rd, 1912

Arrived in New York City, Tuesday morning, Dec. 3rd, 7 a.m. Breakfast at Cafe in Pennsylvania Station. Then drove to the Lucerne Hotel, 79th st & Amsterdam Av.

After refreshing ourselves, we went directly to the house where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was temporarily abiding, No.273 West 90th St.

(I would like to have time and capacity and ability as well - to prayerfully record the nature of the welcome accorded us by our Divine Father, but this must be deferred until another time).

After most solicitous inquiries regarding our comfort and health - too tender and sweet for human description – we were invited to speak.

Mrs. Parsons said she did not have any works to offer. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: The intense love in the heart – the quality of the love which you have in your heart – both of you, is what you have brought to Me, and it is acceptable. Your hearts are enkindled”.

In a very short time Mrs. Krug and Miss Louise Krug came into the room (‘Abdu’l-Bahá had sent for them). ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself introduced Mrs. Parsons and Mrs. Krug, making a special point of it, and saying that He wished them to know each other very well, to know each other very well. This was repeated again. He also wished that they would correspond, and in the future that they would work together.

After this conversation someone in the room (I do not know who it was, whether Khán or Aḥmad) mentioned my name, and said was one of the oldest believers, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá then said: “Mrs. Haney has strong faith. She is in a state of utmost illumination and Mr. Haney also.”

I then referred to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s last Talk in Los Angeles and the impression it made on me, particularly ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s prophecy that some souls would arise in America who would be like the Persian believers, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “I testify that all those who are in this room now are just the same as the Persian believers.”

(Present in the room then with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were-Mrs. Parsons, Mrs. Krug, Miss Krug, All Kull Khán, Aḥmad Sohrab and Mariam Haney).

After this ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told us to go and rest, and then to spend some time with Mrs. Krug.

We returned to the Lucerene Hotel for a short time. Later lunched with Mrs. Krug at 830 Park Av. Present at the luncheon: Mrs. Parsons, Mrs. Krug, Miss Krug, Mírzá All Kull Khán, MMe.Khán, Valí’o’llah Khán and Mrs. Haney.

A meeting for all the believers at Mrs. Krug’s at 3 o’clock. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed this meeting. (I have given you copy of this Address). After the meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called us into the dining room at Mrs. Krug’s where tea was served.

Soon thereafter ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left the house and called for us, granting us the great privilege of riding by His side in the motor to Mrs. Kinney’s house at 780 West End Av. Mrs. Kinney and Khán also with us at this time.

He told us to remain at Mrs. Kinney’s; that we were His guests that evening and we were to dine with Him. He then left us and went out alone.

On His return He talked informally to some people who were waiting to see Him. (Copy of Notes taken then I have given you.)

Later this same evening He addressed Mr. Kinney’s Bible class. And about 10:30 p.m. our Lord graciously permitted us to sit at His table and partake of material food with Him. After which He took us with Him in His motor to our hotel. Khán was also in the motor at this time.

December 4th, 1912.

This morning we went again to the house our Lord occupied at 273 West 90th St. And again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá permitted us to see Him. (It was at this interview that your dream was interpreted).

After this meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá invited us to ride with Him to the home of the Kinney’s where He was to meet all the believers. While riding He said He had ordered the motor especially for us, otherwise He would have walked. It was on this occasion that He told you to be happy; making a special point of it and repeating “You must be happy.”

At 12 noon, the friends assembled at the Kinney house and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá talked to them. Aḥmad was the interpreter. I did not take this Talk.

Later we went back to the Lucerne hotel for luncheon, returning immediately thereafter to the Kinney home. It was during this afternoon that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called all those up to His room who had contributed for the purchase of gifts to be sent to the members of the Holy Family, and told them they could send their love, that He would take their love but nothing else. (Aḥmad took the Notes of this Talk. I have asked him to translate same for me, but up to date it has not been forthcoming. He doubtless has been too busy. Someday I hope to get ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sublime Instructions at that time).

Later in the afternoon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went to the home of Mrs. Krug, thus very graciously giving an opportunity to Dr. Krug for a private interview.

Returning to the home of the Kinney’s, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the dear Divine Father, and was telling His children of the interesting interview with Dr. Krug, when someone announced that it was time to go to the Theosophical Society where He was to give an Address. Again ‘Abdu’l-Bahá permitted us to ride with Him in the motor, both going to and coming from the hall of the Theosophical Society.

Our Heavenly Father once more asked us to be His guests at dinner that night at the home of the Kinney’s, and after the dinner sweetly consented to allow you to take Him to 273 West 90th St. in the motor which you provided. Khán and Mrs. Maxwell were with us at this time. After leaving our Lord, we took Mrs. Maxwell to her abiding place, and returned to our hotel about 12 p.m.

December 5th, 1912.

We went early to 273 West 90th St. to see our Lord, and He at once permitted us to come to Him. We found Him reclining on His bed. Mírzá Maḥmúd and Siyyid Asadu’lláh were rubbing or massaging His limbs; Khán was reading from a newspaper. In a few minutes Valí’o’llah Khán came into the room with breakfast for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, consisting of bread and cheese. Mrs. Kinney was also in the room. He permitted us to sit on the foot of His bed. In a short time the hour had arrived for going to the steamer which was to carry ‘Abdu’l-Bahá away from the shores of America. The trip to the steamer was made in Mr. Mills’ motor; ‘Abdu’l-Bahá saying He would have accepted Mrs. Parsons invitation but He had already promised Mr. Mills. In the motor with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Mrs. Parsons, Mt. Mills, Mts. Haney, and Valí’o’llah Khán riding by the side of the chauffeur. Arriving at the steamer, all of the devoted children of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá followed Him every minute, even to His state room, where the distribution of all His gifts took place. Then back again to the “lounge” of the steamer where all were assembled and where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave His final Address in America. In a few minutes thereafter, the farewell greeting at the top of the stairs and we left the steamer. We remained on the Pier until the “Celtic”, with the Manifestation of GOD on board as the Real Captain, sailed away at 12 noon.

When the steamer was about out of sight, we left the Pier and Mr. Mills kindly took us in his motor to the Pennsylvania Station, and at one o'clock we left New York, arriving again in Washington at 6.30 p.m. the night of the 5th of Dec. 1912.

#1: Pilgrim's Note from Ann Boylan

FROM THE TEACHINGS OF 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

- Recorded by Ann M. Boylan {{p1}}*

Walking today in the gardens by the Hudson River in the early morning, I had the privilege of being with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and I told Him how some people have tried to spread the untruth that the Bahá'ís teach "free love."

He answered: "The marriage bond is very important." He repeated it again: "Very, very important. Marriage must be strict and pure. You must all be very careful about this." He continued: "Women and men must not embrace each other when not married, or not about to be married. They must not kiss each other. If women kiss women, that is not bad. If men kiss men, that is not bad. But men and women must not embrace. Such conduct is not taught in the Bahá'í Revelation. AND IT MUST NOT BE DONE. IT IS NOT PERMITTED. If they wish to greet each other, or comfort each other, they may take each other by the hand. "Describe how you have seen the women of the East, as in Haifa. The Blessed Beauty directed that there should be great modesty in the women, that they should not bare the neck and bosom, and that the women in the East should wear a veil. "The conditions are different in the West, but the women of the West must see the spiritual significance of this Teaching. Do not distress them by saying that they should not have done this or that. They will see by themselves. Talk about this only, so to speak, one by one, with the friends, when you have the opportunity.”

[^ ] The meaning of this statement can be understood via reference to this passage from J.E. Esslemont’s Bahá’u’lláh and the New Era, pp. 149-150: “In bringing about the emancipation of women as in other matters, Bahá’u’lláh counsels His followers to avoid methods of violence. An excellent illustration of the Bahá’í method of social reform has been given by the Bahá’í in Persia, Egypt and Syria. In these countries it is customary for Muḥammadan women outside their homes to wear a veil covering the face. The Báb indicated that in the New Dispensation women would be relieved from this irksome restraint, but Bahá’u’lláh counsels His followers, where no important question of morality is involved, to defer to established customs until people become enlightened, rather than scandalize those amongst whom they live, and arouse needless antagonism. The Bahá’í women, therefore, although well aware that the antiquated custom of wearing the veil is, for enlightened people, unnecessary and inconvenient, yet quietly put up with the inconvenience, rather than rouse a storm of fanatical hatred and rancorous opposition by uncovering their faces in public. This conformity to custom is in no way due to fear, but to an assured confidence in the power of education and in the transforming and life-giving effect of true religion. Bahá’ís in these regions are devoting their energies to the education of their children, especially their girls, and to the diffusion and promotion of the Bahá’í ideals, well knowing that as the new spiritual life grows and spreads among the people, antiquated customs and prejudices will by and by be shed, as naturally and inevitably as bud scales are shed in spring when the leaves and flowers expand in the sunshine.” — ed.

#2: Letter from John B. Cornell to The Guardian

Laguna Honda Home San Francisco 16, California September 21, 1947

Beloved Shoghi Effendi,

These questions have perplexed me and a number of my fellow-believers:

1. Some of the friends consider that your letter of February 23, 1924, means that local and national assemblies are infallible, or at least not to be criticized, even in the business discussions of the 19-Day Feast. If the assembly decision is “the voice of truth, never to be challenged. . . its verdict truly inspired,” does this mean infallibility, with its implications of no need for community or other advice and of the heretical nature of any criticism of an assembly policy or decision?

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says that it is better to agree on a subject even though it be wrong than to disagree and be in the right, does He refer only to co-ordinating our actions or does He mean (by this and by “. . . if, the Lord forbid, differences of opinion should arise. . .”) that we should also avoid disagreeing with anyone in assembly or community consultations?

2. Does the desirability of unanimity in assembly decisions imply that a member with a minority opinion should vote against his conscience? If he feels very strongly that the other eight members were wrong may he, while obedient to the majority decision, bring the matter up at a subsequent assembly meeting and try to persuade the others to his point of view; or does the instruction to not “object to or censure, whether in or out of the meeting, a decision arrived at previously” preclude such reconsideration?

Some societies have artificial methods of achieving unanimity, such as motions “that the secretary be directed to cast a unanimous ballot.” Is it proper, where the “voice of the majority” is regarded as “the voice of truth, never to be challenged,” for an assembly to achieve a unanimous vote by taking a revote following a majority decision, in which case it is considered wrong for anyone to vote opposed once the voice of truth has been discovered and established?

3. Although the principle of chastity has been strongly emphasized, I have been unable to find any authoritative writings that explain clearly enough what it means for Bahá’ís. English dictionaries define chastity as freedom from unlawful sexual intercourse, and no believer doubts this requirement, so that free love, companionate marriage, etc., are regarded as wrong. However, not all can agree on whether any of the forms of sexual activity which stop short of intercourse are forbidden. A pilgrim’s note by Ann Boylan reports the Master as saying: “Women and men must not embrace each other when not married, or not about to be married. They must not kiss each other. . . . If they wish to greet each other, or comfort each other, they may take each other by the hand.” Many believers do not know this or do not believe it. The term, “easy familiarity,” is thought by many to mean simply rudeness and not applicable to invited or accepted demonstrations. Even some of the most unquestionably loyal follow the Christian custom of “kissing the bride” at Bahá’í weddings. Would you explain for us what our conduct should be in order to uphold the Bahá’í concept of chastity?

Do you give your permission to publication of your answers to the above questions in “Bahá’í News”?

Yours in His service, (Signed) John Bernard Cornell John Bernard Cornell

#3: Response from the Guardian to John. B. Cornell

Oct. 19, 1947 Dear Bahá’í Brother:

Your letter dated Sept. 21st has been received and our beloved Guardian has instructed me to answer it on his behalf.

Regarding your questions: No. 1. There are only two institutions which are infallible, one is the guardianship, the other the International House of Justice. What the Master desired to protect the friends against was continual bickering and opinionatedness. A believer can ask the Assembly why they made a certain decision and politely request them to reconsider. But then he must leave it at that, and not go on disrupting local affairs through insisting on his own views. This applies to an Assembly member as well. We all have a right to our opinions, we are bound to think differently; but a Bahá'í must accept the majority decision of his Assembly, realizing that acceptance and harmony — even if a mistake has been made — are the really important things, and when we serve the Cause properly, in the Bahá'í way, God will right any wrongs done in the end.

No. 2. Bahá'ís are not required to vote on an Assembly against their consciences. It is better if they submit to the majority view and make it unanimous. But they are not forced to. What they must do, however, is to abide by the majority decision, as this is what becomes effective. They must not go around undermining the Assembly by saying they disagreed with the majority. In other words, they must put the Cause first and not their own opinions. He (an S.A. member) can ask the Assembly to reconsider a matter, but he has no right to force them or create inharmony because they won't change. Unanimous votes are preferable, but certainly cannot be forced upon Assembly members by artificial methods such as are used by other societies.

What Bahá'u'lláh means by chastity certainly does not include the kissing that goes on in modern society. It is detrimental to the morals of young people, and often leads them to go too far, or arouses appetites which they cannot perhaps at the time satisfy legitimately through marriage, and the suppression of which is a strain on them. The Bahá'í standard is very high, more particularly when compared with the thoroughly rotten morals of the present world. But this standard of ours will produce healthier, happier, nobler people, and induce stabler marriages. The Master's words to Ann Boylan, which you quoted, can certainly be taken as the true spirit of the teachings on the subject of sex. We must strive to achieve this exalted standard.

Assuring you of his loving prayers for the success of your Bahá'í services.

With warm greetings, R. Rabbání

P.S. If the N.S.A. wish to publish this in Bahá'í News he has no objection.

May the Beloved bless your efforts, guide your steps, and enable you to promote the best interests of His Faith,

Your true brother Shoghi {{{p3}}}

“We have your letter...asking about a Tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on the subject of embracing. We have seen no such Tablet, but we have seen reference to a pilgrim’s note and the comment of the beloved Guardian on it.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ IN SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA

BY

FRANCES ORR ALLEN

These are wonderful days which we are living with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in our midst. Our longing to see him was great, but much greater is our joy that our prayers were answered.

A house was taken for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at 1815 California Street. As our Assembly is composed of the friends in San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley and several adjoining towns, each day has been filled to the utmost — receiving the friends and others interested in the movement, speaking to large audiences, giving talks in the parlors to groups of earnest seekers, and giving personal interviews to others. All, alike, are recipients of his favors.

The afternoon of the day of his arrival he crossed the Bay to Oakland where he met the friends at the home of Mrs. Helen S. Goodall. For twelve years this home has been a meeting place, but on the afternoon of October 3rd it became a memorable place — blessed by the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. After a beautiful address he took the children in his arms, kissed them and blessed them; they felt his love, even following him into the adjoining room, and one dear baby of four wanted to know if she “might pet the God-man.”

Friday evening, October 4th, he received many people at his home — people from all the cities about the Bay, and after a short address, he greeted them, welcoming them to his home. Saturday from early morning he met the friends, and in the evening attended the regular Assembly meeting held each Saturday night at the Lick building, Montgomery street, where a most wonderful talk was given — only the immediate friends being present.

Sunday, October 6th, two public addresses were given — in the morning at the First Unitarian Church in San Francisco, and in the evening at the First Congregational Church in Oakland.

Monday was also a busy day, with interviews, talks in the parlor, and in the evening an address before the Japanese Y. M. C. A. of Oakland, in the Japanese Independent Church (formerly a branch of the Congregational Church). The meeting was opened by the president of the society, Mr. Toga, reading a Scripture lesson in Japanese; this was followed by the singing of "Nearer My God to Thee" also in Japanese, then prayer was offered by the pastor of the church, Reverend Kazahira, to which all present said "Amen" in English. Following this a short address was given by Mr. Kanno, a Japanese poet and philosopher, at the close of which he read a poem in honor of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke, and it was a most interesting occasion, for the words were spoken in Persian, translated into English by Dr. Faríd, then from English into Japanese by Reverend Kazahira. It was a marvelous mingling of the East and the West and the Islands of the Sea. In the audience were Japanese students and philosophers as well as those who serve in the humbler walks of life. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed down the aisle, mothers held out their babies for his blessing and smiled most happily as he said in English, "Good baby; Japanese baby."

Early Tuesday morning, October 8th, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, accompanied by the Persian friends and fifteen others, went to Leland Stanford Junior University, where an address was given before the student body. He was enthusiastically received by the 1,500 students who listened attentively to his address, the theme of which was "The Oneness of All Phenomena." At the close of the address 'Abdu'l-Bahá was given a perfect ovation by the students, who thus showed their appreciation of his wonderful knowledge, not alone of religious and philosophical subjects, but of scientific as well. For the remainder of the day he was a guest of Dr. David Starr Jordan, with whom he drove in the afternoon, going later to the home of Mrs. Merriam[a1].

In the evening 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Unitarian Church. The impressive service opened with soft music as 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered accompanied by the pastor, Mr. Reed, who introduced him in the following words: "It is a great privilege to have with us tonight one who calls himself a Servant of God; one who also is a great lover of mankind."

The theme of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's discourse was "The Reality of Divinity." Mr. Reed closed the service by saying:

"I feel that a man of God has spoken to us tonight. I know no better way to close the service than with a prayer; not a prayer in spoken words, but a prayer in silence. Let each person pray in his own way for the coming of the universal religion, the religion of love, the religion of peace — a religion of the fullness of life." There was a moment's silence, then the pastor said in quiet tones, "You are dismissed."

An interesting incident in the day at Palo Alto and the University was the attendance of Professor Rogers and the boys of his school, which is located near Los Gatos. They came a distance of thirty miles by train and walked five miles each way to the station. But Professor Rogers said as they took the late train home, “We are well repaid — more than repaid, and all very happy.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the Persian friends spent the night at the home of Mrs. Merriam[a2], after a most joyous day in which he expressed himself over and over as having been made so very happy.

Early the following morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and party returned to San Francisco. (From Star of the West, Vol. III, No. 13, 11/4/12)

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ IN SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Continued from last issue of *Star of the West

By FRANCES ORR ALLEN.

The only public address of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Berkeley was given the evening of October 9th at the High School Auditorium before a large and representative gathering. He had been invited by Mr. J. Stitt Wilson, the Mayor of Berkeley, to be the guest of the city. In the Mayor’s absence, he was introduced by Mr. H.I. Stern, of the Public School Department.

The next morning, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá made quite a different visit — not to one of the great universities, but to the humble home of one of the friends, Charles Tinsley, a colored man, who was confined to his bed on account of a broken leg. During this visit, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told a beautiful story of a ruler who trained the subject he loved best in order to fit him to hold the most important place in his kingdom — told how he scourged him, and maimed him, and caused him all manner of sorrow and suffering that he might know for himself what these conditions were in reality, meanwhile assuring him that he loved him and that only through this training could he be fitted for the great place he had destined him to fill.

The evening of the same day, October 10th, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave an address before the Open Forum, an organization for the discussion of economic and kindred subjects. His discourse was scientific, contrasting the philosophy of the East with that of the West.

Friday evening, he spoke before the Theosophical Society and their friends, being introduced at length by the President of the Society, who presented ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as one of the Enlightened.

The most remarkable public address given during the visit to the Coast was on Saturday morning, October 12th, at Temple Emmanu-El. It was a wonderful sight, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá standing in the pulpit of that magnificent synagogue, between pillars of palms. The morning sunshine came dimly through the beautiful colored windows, descending as in benediction and approval of the call to righteousness, once more being given to the chosen people of the Lord. In their own synagogue, he proved to the congregation the validity of Christ. He called upon them to investigate Reality, — not to be bound by dogma. He urged them to respect the name of Christ and of Muḥammad, and, above all, exhorted them to be kind.

From the synagogue ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was driven to Mrs. Goodall’s Oakland home, where Children’s Day was to be observed. The afternoon was especially for the little ones, whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá loves so tenderly. The spacious parlors were filled with the children and their parents and friends, and the rooms were sweet with the fragrance of many flowers. The children greeted him with the beautiful song, “Softly His Voice Is Calling Now.” Calling them to him, he gave them candy and flowers, and then went to each one, child and adult, and gave an envelope, containing rose leaves. He named the children “radiant children.” They followed him about and he took the little ones in his arms. Later the children gathered on the steps, where a photograph was taken. It was a beautiful afternoon. Truly one who has not seen ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the children has missed a great deal.

At 3:30 o’clock of the following day, Sunday, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke in the reading room of the blind, at 1665 Jackson Street, San Francisco, where during the week instruction is given in manual training. To this meeting were invited, also, the blind from the Adult Home in Oakland, and the children and youth from the State Educational Institution in Berkeley. The service opened with a beautiful song by a child. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá first paid a tribute to Mrs. Rowan, through whose efforts the teaching at this place is made possible. Then he spoke of how, in receiving education, the blind are being endowed with sight. He told them — even though deprived of sight, having insight — they must not sorrow. Sight is only for a time, but insight is divine and discovers the Kingdom, sees the beauty of God. Though deprived of a drop, they possess the ocean, for insight comprehends all the other senses. He closed by saying, “May you not see dust, but purity — see the beauty of Christ, of Bahá’u’lláh and all holy souls.”

In the evening, many of the friends gathered in the parlor and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told them of his visit to the beach. He likened humanity to a sea, — at times smooth, at other times in motion. The sea in motion is most like life, even when tempestuous; when in motion, each hour brings results. He said: “Seek to dive in the spiritual sea and bring up pearls; seek to find that sea.”

At the conclusion of the talk, he spoke of musical instruments, saying all are imperfect, but that BAHÁ’U’LLÁH brought to earth a heavenly, divine instrument where each soul could find and strike his note and the music would be a heavenly chorus, and eternal. At this gathering there were Persians, Swiss, Hindu, Holland, Canadian, French, English, Japanese and Americans — all in love and fellowship.

Wednesday, October 16th, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and party returned from a short visit to the country. To the nine Portland friends, who had arrived, he said, “Be happy, no tears! no tears!” Some of these friends had come at great sacrifice. One little boy said to his mother, “Why do you cry, mother? It is silly to cry here.” In the afternoon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed the Century Club on Equality between men and women. He spoke of woman's superiority in kindness and tenderness, and, when necessary, in valor and courage.

The evening of October 16th will never be forgotten, because of the memorable feast, held at the home of Mrs. Goodall, in Oakland. The beautiful rooms were filled with tables, adorned with yellow chrysanthemums and pyramids of fruit. The friends gathered quietly and talked in low but joyous tones. All seemed to feel the evening to be one set apart from all other evenings, for at this feast it was our great privilege to have 'Abdu'l-Bahá with us. There were one hundred and ten present, friends from the Bay Cities and also from Portland and Seattle.

When all were seated at table, 'Abdu'l-Bahá requested that we partake of the food so bountifully provided, while he walked about speaking words of wisdom and love, giving us the spiritual food, for which we hungered. Then, from the stairs, he pronounced a benediction upon all assembled, and soon the friends quietly withdrew. It was the most spiritual meeting. Gathered under one roof were people of different nations and various nationalities, the young and old, all meeting in love and fellowship, and in devotion to the Servant of God in this day.

Thursday passed in the usual way, with private interviews and talks. Friday, 'Abdu'l-Bahá and party, accompanied by several of the friends, left for Los Angeles, returning early the following morning. During the day, friends from Seattle, Tacoma and Spokane arrived, and were welcomed and made very happy.

Tuesday evening, the farewell meeting of the friends was held at the home of Mrs. Goodall in Oakland. This was another especially memorable occasion. All realized that at this meeting would be given final words of exhortation and farewell. There was a reverent hush as 'Abdu'l-Bahá told of BAHÁ'U'LLÁH and of the two years He passed in solitude. At the close of this narrative, 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose, and, in no uncertain terms, declared himself to be the CENTER OF THE COVENANT; and exhorted all believers to firmness, calling upon them to spread the message of the Kingdom both by deed and word. In farewell, he took each one by the hand, giving to each the Greatest Name.

Wednesday and Thursday went all too quickly, filled with the usual interviews and talks. The friends spent as much time as possible at the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, realizing that the days of great privilege were swiftly passing. All the public discourses were well received and will bear much fruit; but it was through the more intimate and personal talks that the friends received greatest quickening and instruction.

From the University at Berkeley many of the East Indian students came to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and to them and to the Japanese friends he showed great favor. It was most interesting and gratifying to witness the beautiful spirit of love and kindness in the friends who gathered to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

'Abdu'l-Bahá expressed himself much pleased with San Francisco and greatly enjoyed his visits to Golden Gate Park. He took especial interest in the flowers and would often leave the automobile for a walk along the shore of some one of the small lakes. But even on the drives and during the walks he dispensed blessing — giving many wonderful lessons to those whose great privilege it was to be with him at those times.

Early Friday morning, the friends gathered at the house to say good-bye. The admonition to be happy was given, the last words were said, the wonderful days were ended. Our cups have been filled to overflowing with blessing and it is for us now to give out to others some of the light and love we have received.

“THE PALO ALTAN”

Friday, November 1, 1912, The Palo Alton, edited by H. W. Simkins, devoted its entire sheet to a presentation of the visit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to California. On the first page, under a six-column heading, appears an excellent half-tone portrait of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. An introductory article telling of the visit to Leland Stanford Junior University — which we reproduce in this issue of the STAR OF THE WEST — is followed by a sketch of the life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, under the heading, “Bahá’ism and Its Prophet.” Page two contains an editorial, “The New Evangel,” and the Address delivered by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the University — published in our last issue. Page three contains the “Message to the Jews.” Page four, Address delivered in the Unitarian Church, Palo Alto; also a reproduction of the original Tablet and translation of same to Mr. H. W. Simkins. We quote it as follows:

TABLET TO THE EDITOR OF “THE PALO ALTAN”

To his honor Mr. H. W. Simkins — Upon him be Bahá-O-llah-El-Abhá!

At the time I met you and felt the susceptibilities of your conscience my heart and soul became greatly attached to that dear friend (i.e. yourself) and the utmost love was produced, and the spiritual emotions were obtained. Your visit gave me the utmost happiness. The address delivered in Stanford University and published completely in your paper was observed today — and on account of it I became both pleased and grateful. In order to express my pleasure and appreciation for this service of yours I am writing you this epistle.

I shall never forget your cordiality, and as long as life lasts I shall remember you. I beg of God, that that dear friend (yourself) may become like unto a shining star in the horizon of Reality, and become the cause of bestowing spiritual life upon the world of humanity.

The address delivered at the Jewish temple establishing the validity of His Holiness Jesus Christ and inviting the Jews to believe in Him is enclosed herein. From its powerful contents you will realize that though there were many conservative Jews in the audience, yet in the most dauntless manner the validity of Christ was proven. After reading its contents should you think it best you may print it fully without abbreviation in the columns of your paper that others of the Jews may read it. Perchance this may prove an impetus for their respect for, and belief in Christ, that this strife and contention that has lasted between the two nations for two thousand years may disappear, and the oneness of the world of humanity be unveiled.

Upon thee be greeting and praise!

- ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS. *

On behalf of the Bahá’ís in America, the STAR OF THE WEST not only congratulates the editor of The Palo Alto in that he became the recipient of such words of commendation from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but that he was assisted to render such excellent service through the medium of his newspaper — a service that shall be effective in these great days and remembered throughout the coming years. We take pleasure in reproducing his editorial herewith:

EDITORIAL FROM ‘THE PALO ALTO.’

THE NEW EVANGEL.

Wednesday morning at the University assembly and in the evening at the Unitarian Church in Palo Alto appeared and spoke the leader in a world movement for unity in religion, international peace and universal brotherhood. This is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, a native of Persia, who has devoted his life to the mission handed down to him by his father. This mantle of inspired evangelism was consecrated by the persecution of forty years of imprisonment imposed by the Sultán of Turkey upon BAHÁ’U’LLÁH, the elder.

As the stone that was rejected may become the head of the corner, or like the prophet’s dream expand until it fills up the whole world, so may be the mantle of the wise men of the east, who rediscover a glorified star shining over the birth of a world movement toward idealism.

This idealism is the further perfection of the ideals of all the great religions of the world. In the science of photography there is a process by which any number of images of different faces may be composited together to produce the dominant type. What is truly representative leaves its impress upon the final result. What is vague and non-intrinsic surpluses into the shadow and disappears. Such a scientific process to arrive at the true composite of religious truth may be likened to the aim of the Bahá’í movement.

It seeks the true common denominator of all religions, rejecting nothing which is good and afraid of nothing which is true.

The spiritual kingdom is full of clashes and contradictions, just as the political and industrial worlds are full of contention and strife. And just as in the latter fields volunteers are spending their lives to pave a better way, so in the spiritual kingdom we have the dawning of a more perfect light. This light will shed its peaceful rays over all contentious factions and will show them the form and substance of truth, which may have been obscured by the dust of strife.

To build a structure by taking a plank from here and plank from there and a stone from hither and a stone from yonder, as some vague fancy might dictate, would result in an architectural monstrosity that would violate all the rules of unity and proportion. In no such way is the temple of true light to be founded. It is to be brought together in one focus of rays forming an image of all the elements which stand the searching test. This temple may be surrounded on all sides by the images of those beautiful non-essentials which have not gained entrance to the inner structure, but which the true spirit within may yet see as outer landscapes unfolding before the temple windows.

This is the task of the Bahá'í. It is a true ideal. Truly catholic and universal, it provides a meeting ground for Christian, Jew, Moslem and Buddhist. There is one God who is the God of all religions. His will is the law of all harmony and good. He stands revealed in the last analysis of universal truth. His truth is a gospel of love which surrounds and comprehends all things. In this there is no room for strife and discord, no place for darkness or deceit, and no beginning for bitterness and woe.

Whenever science discovers any great truth, that truth is not the property of science, but it is the heritage of the whole world. We do not refer all the marvels of electricity to Edison nor worship his laboratory at Menlo Park. We use the blessing and pass it along. It matters little, in the long run, who made the discovery. If the founders of Bahá'í arose from the ancient plains of Persia and sent out the true message, it matters little whether Persia is of the east or of the west. From the cradle of the human race and the oldest nation of the world comes a voice reaching down the centuries, to bring a message of peace to the strong young giant of the west, bidding America to usher in the dawn.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ AT THE GRAVE OF THORNTON CHASE.

Los Angeles, Calif., Oct. 19, 1912.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in speaking of Mr. Chase, told the friends in San Francisco and Los Angeles to annually visit the grave of Mr. Chase, to pray and have a meeting there and detail his earnest endeavors, service and great love for the Cause. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that Mr. Chase’s station was not known while he was alive but in the future years it will be known. Among the friends are many whose stations are not known while alive, but after their death, in the course of time their station becomes manifest. Annually the friends will visit the grave of Mr. Chase on the day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá visited it.

Upon our arrival in San Francisco, Oct. 4, 1912, when one of the Bahá'ís gave the news of the departure of Mr. Chase, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "This revered personage was the first Bahá'í in America. He served the Cause faithfully and his services will ever be remembered throughout future ages and cycles. He has written many books in this Cause and they will be studied carefully by the coming generations. He traveled once to 'Akká and there we associated with each other for several days. Indeed he became free from the troubles of this world. No matter how long he might have remained here, he would have met nothing else but trouble. The purpose of life is to get certain results; that is, the life of man must bring forth certain fruitage. It does not depend upon the length of life. As soon as the life is crowned with fruition then it is completed, although that person may have had a short life. There are certain trees which come to fruition very quickly, but there are other trees which attain to fruition very late; the aim is fruit. If the tree brings forth its fruit young, its life is short; it is praiseworthy. How regretful it is that a man may live a long life and yet his life may not be crowned with success, like unto the cypress tree which does not give any fruitage. Praise be to God! the tree of Mr. Chase's life brought forth fruit. It gave complete fruit, therefore he is free. He attained to eternal rest. He is now in the Presence of Bahá'u'lláh. His Holiness Jesus Christ lived only thirty-three years, but the world is filled with the fruits of his life. Others have lived a hundred years, with no result and no fruitage from their lives. There was a rabbi in Tiberius who lived 120 years, but the tree of his life was fruitless. He had great enmity against Jesus Christ. He often used to argue: 'The ephemeral life is subject to many trials and vicissitudes; there is no enjoyment in it.' The life of Mr. Chase was spiritual in character; his services will ever be remembered and he has already attained to the desire of his heart."

On Saturday, Oct. 19th, at 1 p.m., 'Abdu'l-Bahá and about twenty-five Bahá'ís of Los Angeles arrived at the cemetery Inglewood. The place is charming, the meadows are green and there are many trees. 'Abdu'l-Bahá silently walked ahead of the friends and he was followed reverently by them. There are many flower beds and the fragrance thereof reached the nostrils. Most of the friends carried bouquets of flowers in their hands. After arriving at the grave, 'Abdu'l-Bahá scattered his flowers and then one after another of the friends gave him their bouquets and he divided them and scattered them over the grave. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá, standing at the head of the grave and raising his hands toward heaven, uttered the following prayer:

PRAYER

O my God! O my God! Verily, this is a servant of Thine, who did believe on Thee and in Thy signs; verily he hearkened to Thy summons, turned to Thy Kingdom, humbled himself at Thy holy threshold, was possessed of a contrite heart, arose to serve Thy cause, to spread Thy fragrances, to promote Thy word, and to expound Thy wisdom.

Verily he guided the people to Thine ancient pathway, and led them to Thy way of rectitude. Verily he held the chalice of guidance in his right hand and gave unto those athirst to drink of the cup of favor. He presented himself at Thy lofty threshold, where he laid his brow on the fragrant soil of Thy garden and circumambulated Thy all-glorious and sublime abode, the traces of which are wide-spread and the fragrances of whose loyalty are sensed everywhere. Later he returned to these vast and extensive countries and proclaimed Thy Name amongst the people, until his respiration ceased and his outward sensation was suspended, returning to Thee with a heart throbbing with Thy love and with an eye opened to Thy direction.

O Lord! O Lord! Submerge him in the ocean of Thy glory. O Lord! O Lord! Usher him into Thy delectable garden. O Lord! O Lord! Usher him into Thy lofty paradise and cause him to be present in Thy meeting of transfiguration. O Lord! Submerge him in the ocean of Thy lights.

Verily, Thou art the Clement! Verily, Thou are the Merciful, the Precious, the Omnipotent!

Then after the prayer he spoke as follows:

“Mr. Chase was of the blessed souls. The best time of his life was spent in the path of God. He had no other aim except the good pleasure of the Lord and no other desire except the attainment to the Kingdom of God. During his lifetime he bore many trials and vicissitudes, but he was very patient and long-suffering. He had a heart most illuminated, a spirit most rejoiced; his hope was to serve the world of humanity; during the days of his life he strove as much as he could — he never failed — until he witnessed the lights of the Kingdom of Abhá, and he was guided by the lights of Guidance. He summoned the people to the religion of God; he suffered them to enter into the Kingdom of God; he wrote books and epistles regarding the proofs and evidences of the Manifestations of Bahá'u'lláh. In reality he has left behind him certain signs which will never be forgotten throughout ages and cycles. In reality this personage was worthy of respect. This personage is worthy of having the friends visit his grave. The traces of this personage will ever shine. This is a personage who will not be forgotten. For the present his worth is not known but in the future it will be inestimably dear. His sun will ever be shining, his stars will ever bestow the light. The people will honor this grave. Therefore, the friends of God must visit this grave and on my behalf bring flowers and seek the sublimity of the spiritual station for him and have the utmost consideration for the members of his family. This personage will not be forgotten.”

Portion of Tablet from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás

To Ella Goodall Cooper, San Francisco, California.

Thou hast written concerning the death of the believing and assured maid-servant of GOD, Mrs. H..... This news grieved me deeply, but my consolation lies in the fact that that respected soul has been freed from the prison of this earthly abode and has hastened to the divine court. She was a drop that attained the ocean, she was a ray that returned to the sun; she was a bird that flew to the divine rose-garden and a star that gained admittance into the solar system. A prayer supplicating forgiveness for that respected one, has been written and is herewith enclosed. Publish it among the firm friends that it may perpetuate her memory. Although at present it is not known, yet in the future her name shall be uplifted and her fame shall spread abroad. Mary Magdalene was, during her lifetime, destitute of any fame or position, she was a peasant, but now consider what has happened!.....

Praise be to GOD, that in the last hours of the respected maid-servant of GOD, Mrs. H....'s life, thou hast been enabled to meet her, and hast been the cause of her uttering nine times the Greatest Name and turning her face to the Abhá Kingdom. In the utmost of faith and assurance she hastened from this mortal world to the immortal realm. Her face, therefore, like unto a star, shall shine at the horizon of the kingdom of GOD and her spirit shall fly in the limitless realm, and her memory shall live throughout cycles and generations. It was highly favorable and fitting that thou didst meet her; it was indeed providential.....

Has L. A. friends sent [unreadable] of [unreadable] Bahá'ís 2 days there? 18 to 20th 2. OCT?[a3]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s farewell words to the friends gathered around him, October 25, 1912, 8 A. M., 1815 California Street, San Francisco. Interpreted by Dr. Faríd; stenographic notes by Miss Straun.

I am to say farewell to you. It is the last meeting of ours. It is the last quaffing of the chalice. It must indeed be very effective, because those who drink wine say the last of the cup is the sweetest.

How grateful I am to Bahá’u’lláh for anointing you at this time. This is an indication of the fragrance of the paradise of Abhá, which proves that the fragrance of Abhá is indeed most centered.

I feel sad indeed at parting with you. I do not know how to express my sadness at parting. Howsoever I may express the feelings of my heart at present, they are beyond description, — they cannot be expressed. It grieves me excessively to leave you and I have sensed the fragrance of the love of Bahá’u’lláh from you and I have witnessed the light of the love of Bahá’u’lláh in your countenances, and I have ever longed to sense this fragrance and to behold this light; hence I am unable to express my feelings of regret and remorse and I let your hearts sense them. Refer the matter to your own conscience and you will know how deeply I feel the parting.

Although I am going away from you a separation seemingly takes place, nevertheless you are in my heart. Your abode is in my heart. You will never be without<sup>[a4]</sup> it. Be assured of this. When I reach the Holy Tomb, there I shall lay my head at His Threshold, supplicating, invoking, seeking for each and all of you <sup>{{p2}}</sup> (Farewell).confirmation and assistance. Have no doubt whatsoever as to being aided and assisted.

Another thing of which I will speak to you is that some of you have endeavored and have assisted the school of Tarbíyát, in Ṭihrán, in Persia. The more you cooperate with the East, — the Easterners assisting you Westerners, and you assisting them, — this will be the cause of increase of love. I wish you to feel this. May God aid you and confirm you. May He ever keep you joyous and under His protection and favor. I will ever look forward to receiving joyous news from you. Wherever I shall be, know you that I shall supplicate and invoke, seeking for you confirmation and aid. You will never be forgotten and I feel very sad at parting. I cannot speak more than this.

The days passed here were most happy, and my association with you was most pleasant. Daily did I meet with you, commemorating Bahá'u'lláh. There could not have been better days than the days we spent here, for all them were passed in the commemoration of God; all the hearts were set aglow; all the eyes were perceptive; all the spirits were exhilarated. No better days could have been imagined. Forget not these days. I shall ever remember them and seek from God that the results of these associations may come to pass. The results of these associations are the illumination of the world. The results of these associations are the spirituality of the world. The results of these associations are the unification of men. I hope that these results will come to pass. Let not our meeting be like those of people who come together in a certain place, who convene, expressing affiliation and love toward each other, and when they disband they <sup>{{p3}}</sup> (Farewell)forget it all, — nay, rather, even erase it absolutely from their mind. But our meeting being as assemblage of God, I hope it will never be forgotten. It will ever remain fixed in memory. Whenever it shall come to mind an exhilaration shall overtake us, a fresh joy may encompass us, a great motion may set up in the hearts. This is what I wish.

(On leaving the house).

I leave you as trusts in the custody of Bahá'u'lláh. You are my trusts in His kingdom. He will ever protect you.

(On the [unreadable] A. M. ferry to Mr. Ralston.)

We are traveling for you, I travel that you may travel too. I came from Syria to this part in order to make you leave here and travel to the kingdom.

TRIBUTE TO THORNTON CHASE FROM BROOKLYN, N.Y.

The report of the illness of Brother Chase reached us after his spirit had ascended to the Supreme Concourse. Not aware of his departure, a number of the friends met at 935 Eastern Parkway to pray for the descent of the Divine Confirmations upon this blessed and faithful servant of the Heavenly Kingdom. It was a holy gathering, sanctified as we now know by the spirit of the attained one, forever free from the prison of the mortal body. Truly the benediction of his life, words and works haloed the meeting. Verily his spirit is still moving, his voice still upraised in the Cause of God.

On October 16th, the Nineteen Day Feast of Ilm was celebrated at the same Bahá'í home. Fifty of the heavenly companions were present and services commemorating the beloved brother were held. Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá were read and the invocation from Kitáb-el-Aqdas offered in behalf of the attained one.

The readings included the Tablet written by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in memory of another brother:

“O Beloved! O Faithful Brother! Where is thy beautiful face? Where is thy eloquent speech? Where is thy serene brow? Where is thy radiant beauty? Where is thy flame enkindled by the Fire of the Love of God? Where is thy attraction to the Perfumes of God? Where is thy discourse in praise of God? Where is thy determination to serve in the Cause of God? Where are thy beautiful eyes? Where are thy smiling lips? Where is thy noble countenance? Where is thy graceful form? Thou hast abandoned the human world and ascended to the Kingdom. Thou hast attained to the Divine Grace. Thou hast reached the Threshold of the Lord of the Celestial Kingdom. Thou hast abandoned the bodily lamp, the mortal garment, the earthly elements and the life of this world. Thou hast kindled thy flame in the Lamp of the Supreme Concourse and thou hast entered the Paradise of El-Abhá. Thou hast taken shelter in the shadow of the Tree of Life and attained the Meeting with God in the Abode of Paradise. Thou wert a divine bird which has forsaken its mortal nest. Thou hast flown to the Garden of the Divine Kingdom and attained thy brilliant station. Thou hast already sung the verses of the Mercy of the Lord the Clement. Thou art a grateful servant, and thou hast entered into the joy of thy Lord. Verily thy Lord hath chosen thee for His Love; — hath guided thee to the side of His Holiness, caused thee to enter into the Garden of His Nearness and permitted thee to behold His Beauty. Thou hast laid hold of Eternal Life and attained to Everlasting Well-Being, — to the Good-Pleasure of God, — to His Delight — and His All-Sufficient Favor. Thou hast become a star in the Highest Horizon, a light among the Angels of Heaven, and a living soul in the Exalted World, resting upon the Throne of Immortality. I ask God to enable thee to attain to His Nearness and His Union; — to rejoice thee by His Presence; — to increase thy brightness and thy beauty; — to grant thee honor and glory. We remember thee continually and never forget thee. We pray for thee night and day. We see thee in the Supreme Horizon of El Abhá!

History of the San Francisco Bahá'í Assembly.

The Bahá'í Message was first brought to California in the early summer of 1898 by Dr. and Mrs. E. C. Getsinger. They met Mrs. Phoebe Hearst who, becoming interested, gathered a few friends at her country home in Pleasanton and Lua Getsinger became their teacher.

Shortly afterward Miss Helen Hillyer (now Mrs. Philip King Brown) a member of the class, brought the Cause to the attention of Mrs. Helen S. Goodall and her daughter Ella F. Goodall, (now Mrs. Charles Miner Cooper), who became so deeply interested that they went to New York to receive further teachings as Mrs. Getsinger was leaving California. She accompanied Mrs. Hearst to New York in order to make the pilgrimage to ‘Akká with the first American group of believers.

Mrs. Goodall and her daughter arrived in New York in November only to find that Dr. Khayru'lláh had also joined Mrs. Hearst's party and was on his way to the Holy Land. Fortunately, however, Anton Effendi Haddad, a Syrian Bahá'í, was living in New York and was able to give them the lessons they were seeking. He was engaged in translating Dr. Khayru'lláh's book and taught them from the manuscript which he read without comment. He afterward confirmed them with the Greatest Name. At this time the only literature available in English was the First Commune and the Morning Prayer which the new believers were instructed to memorize. The effect of these creative words only deepened their first profound impression.

At the end of January 1899, Mrs. Goodall returned to her home in Oakland, where she began immediately to teach, and in February the way was opened for her daughter to accompany Miss Hillyer to ‘Akká. During the Winter of 1899-1900, meetings were held at regular intervals at the home of Mrs. Goodall. This tiny group became the nucleus of the first Assembly in California, known for many years as the Oakland Assembly.

There were very few of the writings translated into English for them to study. In 1900 they received the first translation of the Persian Hidden Words. A little later followed the booklet, “Tablets Revealed by the Blessed Perfection and ‘Abdu'l-Bahá ‘Abbás” which was brought to this country by Ḥájí Mírzá Ḥasan Khurasání, Mírzá Asadu'lláh and Mírzá Ḥusayn. Then came the pamphlet, “Tablets from ‘Abdu'l-Bahá ‘Abbás to Some American Believers in 1900”, which was published in 1901.

In the Spring of 1900 one of Persian teachers, Dr. Rafael Sadri with his servant Nassim, was sent to San Francisco by ‘Abdu'l-Bahá. They both attended the meetings on Oakland, but they did not remain long in California.

In 1901 Mrs. Emogene Hoagg returned from her first pilgrimage to ‘Akká, bringing many instructions. She invited the friends to her hotel rooms in San Francisco which was the first Bahá’í meeting ever held in that city. A year or two later she held another meeting and still later a group of enquirers — Theosophists — were given the Message by Mr. Thornton Chase at the request of Mrs. Mary Bell, but an Assembly was not established until the Spring of 1911.

In the Spring of 1904 Mr. and Mrs. George T. Winterburn arrived from ‘Akká with full notes of their visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Due to this, fresh, inspired regular weekly meetings were soon established.

In the Fall of 1905 there was a demand for ever more frequent meetings, therefore Friday afternoons were given to the devotional service and Tuesday afternoons to study. These two forms of meetings continued for some months.

In February 1907 Mrs. Brittingham in accordance with special instructions from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to California, her contemplated visit of the year previous having been postponed on account of the great earthquake and fire of April 1906. She gave several lectures for enquirers at the home of Mrs. Goodall.

In this quiet way the Message was spread, members being drawn from San Francisco, Alameda and Berkeley, the home being always open to visiting teachers or returning pilgrims.

In 1907 Mrs. Goodall and her daughter were given permission to make the pilgrimage to the Holy Land. During their absence the meetings were transferred to the home of Mrs. Emogene Hoagg who has moved to Oakland in the meantime, and she assumed charge of the work, being especially interested in the study meetings. In 1908 the meetings were resumed at the home of Mrs. Goodall in Oakland and continued there until 1918 when she and her family moved to S. F. In 1909 the meetings residence passed out of her hands, according to definite instructions received from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In 1906 an appeal was sent out from Chicago for funds for the Temple. Due to the efforts of Mrs. Goodall, Oakland was first among the Assemblies in America to send a contribution.

In 1910 Lua Getsinger came again to California, in San Francisco and vicinity, and in cooperation with Mrs. Goodall planned quite a teaching tour for the state. Mrs. Goodall and her daughter accompanied her to Southern California to begin the work in San Diego. This work was later carried on by other devoted friends, among them Mrs. Brittingham serving in connection with Mrs. Laughlin, an old-time friend of Mrs. Goodall, and the first Bahá’í there.

By this time Los Angeles boasted its own Assembly, Pasadena also, ably assisted by Mrs. Winterburn, Mr. Chase. Mrs. Haney, Miss Wise, and other pioneers. Santa Barbara came later still, the tiny Assembly being started by Mrs. Flora Clark, aided by Mrs. Brittingham, Mrs. Goodall and her daughter, Mrs. Frankland, and others, followed up the work, up to the time of their last pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1920.

In the Spring of 1911, the "Assembly of 'Abdu'l-Bahá" was established in San Francisco. Confirming this action 'Abdu'l-Bahá sent a Tablet addressing the friends as "The Members of the Assembly of 'Abdu'l-Bahá" and saying, "This assembly was organized at the right time. It is my hope that it become the magnet of confirmation. If it remain firm and steadfast this Assembly will become so illumined that it will be a full, refulgent moon in the horizon of everlasting glory".

In April 1912 when 'Abdu'l-Bahá arrived in America, Mrs. Goodall and her daughter went to Washington to meet him. After spending some weeks with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, they returned to California, but early in July they received a telegram from Him summoning them to New York, having special instructions to give them before sailing for the Holy Land. His plans were changed, however, and much to the joy and surprise of the California friends, he decided to visit the Western Coast and arrived in San Francisco early in October.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was accompanied on this trip by Mírzá Maḥmúd Zarguani, Mírzá 'Alí-Akbar, Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, Dr. Faríd and little Fugeta. He and his party were the guests of Mrs. Goodall at 1815 California Street in San Francisco and at her Oakland home whenever He had engagements across the bay. It was at this home in Oakland that the memorable Feast of October 16th was held.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was invited to speak at the First Unitarian Church, the Temple Emanuel, Stanford University, the Japanese Congregational Church, as well as many other organizations of widely differing interests, in San Francisco and vicinity.

In addition to these public meetings, He gave many talks to the constant stream of visitors who gathered at His home daily to do him homage, to learn of His Message and to bring their personal problems for His kind counsel. A number of these visitors were believers from the North Western States which 'Abdu'l-Bahá was unable to visit.

On October 19th, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to Los Angeles, the purpose of His trip being to visit the grave of Thornton Chase.

On Oct. 15th, He spent two days at Pleasanton with Mrs. Phoebe Hearst who, as before mentioned, was the first person to become interested in the Bahá'í Cause in California.

Leaving San Francisco for New York where He was to embark for the Holy Land, 'Abdu'l-Bahá remained two days in Sacramento, the capitol of the state, where he gave several public talks. He was accompanied this far on His trip by a number of the Bahá'ís who were eager to remain with Him as long as possible before bidding Him a last farewell. It was at this time that 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave us warning concerning the member of His party who was secretly unfaithful, commanding us to protect the Cause in California against Covenant breakers as He was leaving all the affairs in our hands.

When it was first proposed that the Panama-Pacific International exposition should be held in San Francisco, Mrs. Goodall and others were inspired to write ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asking if He would approve of a plan to call the annual Temple Convention in San Francisco at that time and to prepare for an International Bahá’í Congress in connection with it. Upon receipt of His affirmative answer, Mrs. Goodall and her daughter journeyed east to visit some of the Assemblies and interest the friends in this plan. Thus the first International Bahá’í Congress was instituted conjointly with the Temple Convention in San Francisco beginning April, 1915 and, notwithstanding the World War proved to be a surprising success. It has since continued to be a regular feature of the Annual Conventions in America. At this Convention the Feast of Ridván was held in Mrs. Goodall’s Oakland home, the photograph taken of this representative gathering of the friends being sent to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In 1916, Mrs. Goodall invited Mrs. Brittingham to come again to California to assist the friends in spreading the Message of Unity. She remained in the Western region until August 1921, working constantly and effectively in the Cause.

The next important event in the annals of the San Francisco Assembly and its branches was the commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Blessed Perfection, Bahá’u’lláh, November 10, 1917. It remained memorable for another reason also as it proved to be the last gathering of the friends in the Oakland home.

New work was accordingly started in cooperation with the friends up and down the Coast, and teachers were sent throughout the Western States Region. Among those who responded to the call to spread the Message in this field were Mrs. Brittingham, Mrs. Ella Bailey, Mrs. Martha Bullock, Mrs. Latimer of Portland, Mrs. Charlotte Sillen, Mrs. Littleby of Seattle. ... Kennedy [?] and Mrs ... [?] made an interesting water trip through ... five western states. In November 1922, the first Teaching Conference was called in the west. This Conference was a gratifying success. The teaching work was greatly stimulated and a second Teaching Conference was held in San Francisco in 1924.

Following the disposal of the Oakland home, the meetings were held in San Francisco. A little later, however, a small group was formed in Berkeley under the guidance of Mr. and Mrs. Frankland who had come there from Southern California to live.

The five great Teaching Tablets in 1916, aroused the San Francisco Assembly to a realization of the vital importance of teaching.

For many years the San Francisco Assembly meetings were held in various places, but in 1924 the friends were enabled to rent a house that was suitable for all their activities. This house was dedicated to the Bahá’í Cause during the Western States Teaching Conference, Mr. and Mrs. Grundy were in San Francisco and were the first guests to be entertained there.

At the beginning of the year 1918, Mrs. Goodall suffered a nervous breakdown from which she gradually recovered enough to continue to act in the capacity of consultant and counselor, but was forced to give up much of her active work.

In 1920, Mrs. Goodall and her daughter with Mrs. Frankland and Mrs. Ralston received permission to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at Haifa and, although Mrs. Goodall was very frail, the anticipation of seeing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá again gave her sufficient strength to make the journey.

Shortly after her return from Haifa in 1921, Mrs. Goodall had a relapse and, after the ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, failed rapidly and passed away February 10, 1922.

In 1910 Lua Getsinger has developed into a remarkable teacher, came again to California, while responding to many calls to give The Message in San Francisco and vicinity. [?] been the call to a larger work and Mrs. Goodall cooperated with her in a plan for a teaching tour of the [?] state. Mrs. Goodall and her daughter accompanied her ... [?] California to begin the work in San Diego.

In Geyserville, north of San Francisco, Mr. John D. Bosch, also a “spiritual child” of Mrs. Goodall, began early to spread the Message, mainly by lending and giving away a large number of the Bahá’í books. He likewise made a point of entertaining all visiting teachers and returning pilgrims at his ranch home. A few years ago he married Mrs. Louise Stapfer, and together they established an Assembly there, and carried the Glad Tidings by automobile trips to Santa Rosa and a wide radius of country towns.

O ye friends and maid-servants of the Merciful!

Your letter was received. Its perusal conveyed the utmost supplication and communion. Your lamentations and cries in reality affect the hearts, especially the heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. If you could realize what an effect your letter produced, undoubtedly you would feel assured that the heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has the utmost attachment to you, and day and night He is supplicating toward the Kingdom of ABHÁ and begs for you confirmation, for you are firm in the Covenant and are the heralds of the Testament.

To-day the greatest of all affairs is firmness in the Covenant. This Covenant is the Covenant of GOD, and this Testament is the Testament of the Lord of Hosts. If you consider that any soul shows the slightest weakness in the Covenant, undoubtedly counsel him and guide him so that he may become firm.

To-day no soul has any station or enjoys any title except the soul who is firm in the Covenant and steadfast in the Testament, who entirely forgets himself and is released from the world.

I have the utmost longing to meet you, and I am hopeful from the Bounties and Favors of the Blessed Perfection that the meeting be destined with the utmost joy and fragrance.

Upon you be Bahá El ABHÁ.

(Signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás.

The Bahá’í Message was brought to California in the early Spring of 1898 by Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Getsinger. Shortly after their arrival Mr. Getsinger called upon Mrs. Phoebe Apperson Hearst at her country estate at Pleasanton, not far from San Francisco.

Mrs. Hearst was so greatly moved by Dr. Getsinger’s dramatic recital of the rise of the Bahá’í Movement that she proposed bringing together a few of her immediate family and friends for a private class. Dr. Getsinger’s wife, Lua, who was given charge of that little group, taught them for about three months.

Among those students was Miss Helen Hillyer, whose keen and increasing interest led her to take into her confidence an intimate friend, Miss Ella F. Goodall. Miss Goodall, in turn, told her mother, Mrs. Helen S. Goodall. However, when they expressed a desire to attend the class they found they were too late, as Mrs. Hearst was on the eve of leaving for the Holy Land, taking with her, among others, Dr. and Mrs. Getsinger, as her guests. Mrs. Goodall and her daughter therefore determined to go East for lessons, and as Miss Hillyer had already left for New York they joined her there about the middle of November. They were fortunate in soon securing a competent teacher in Anton Effendi Haddad, a Syrian Bahá'í whom they met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur P. Dodge.

In the meanwhile Mrs. Hearst and her party had sailed for 'Akká.

(Toward the end of the year) In January, 1899 Miss Hillyer received a word from Mrs. Hearst to meet her in Cairo at once. Mrs. Hearst had already returned to Egypt from 'Akká (completed her visit to 'Akká), and she having been so deeply impressed by her rare experience that she was eager for Miss Hillyer to have the same privilege. Miss Hillyer urged Miss Goodall to accompany her, and accordingly a cable was sent asking 'Abdu'l-Bahá's permission, for Miss Goodall also to make the pilgrimage. Upon receipt of the reply, granting permission, "Yes, but secretly," the two young ladies, early in February, 1899, sailed from New York. Three weeks later they met Mrs. Hearst in Cairo and heard the story of her visit to the "Most Great Prison," listened to the absorbing details far into the night.

Mrs. Getsinger — Lua — was asked to take charge of that small group and for a period extending over three months she taught them by means of 12 preparatory lessons leading up to the appearance of the Manifestation.

Among those students was Miss Helen Hillyer, whose keen and increasing interest led her to take into her confidence an intimate friend, Miss Ella F. Goodall, hoping she might feel inclined to attend the class with her. In turn, Miss Goodall consulted her mother, Mrs. Helen S. Goodall, who sensing the import of the subject, suggested that they join immediately. However, they found they were too late as the course had been finished and Mrs. Hearst was on the eve of leaving for the Holy Land, taking with her Dr. and Mrs. Getsinger, among others, as guests. Mrs. Goodall and her daughter therefore determined to go East for the lessons. About the middle of November they left for New York, Miss Hillyer having preceded them.

Previous to the overthrow of the old Turkish regime in 1908 the utmost secrecy had to be observed, owing to the suspicion and surveillance of the government officials, consequently it had been necessary to separate the visitors into small units that they might be less conspicuous. The second group of Mrs. Hearst's guests were on their way back to Cairo as Miss Hillyer and Miss Goodall departed for 'Akká, which they reached on the 5th of March. Before returning to Cairo they took opportunity to visit believers at Nazareth, Beirut and Port Sa'íd, and also made a trip to Damascus (Baghdád). Upon reaching Cairo, on the 6th of April, they remained there, at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s suggestion, for a time, studying with Mírzá Abu’l-Faḍl.

That first party to make a pilgrimage to ‘Akká from America was composed of the following persons:

1. Mrs. Phoebe Apperson Hearst;
2. Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Getsinger;
3. Dr. Ibrahim Kheiralla and his wife Mariam;
4. Miss Anne Apperson (Mrs. Hearst’s niece, now Mrs. Joseph Marshall Flint);
5. Miss Julia Pearson (governess in the family);
6. Robert Turner (Mrs. Hearst’s faithful servant, the first Negro believer in America);
7. Emily Bachrodt (Mrs. Hearst’s German maid);
8. Mrs. Thornburgh-Cropper (American-born but then living in London);
9. Miss May Bolles (an American then living in Paris, who later married Mr. William Sutherland Maxwell of Canada);
10. Mrs. Thornburgh (Mrs. Cropper’s mother, London);
11. Miss Helen Hillyer (now Mrs. Philip King Brown), (now deceased);
12. Miss Ella F. Goodall (now Mrs. Charles Miner Cooper);

In the meantime Mrs. Goodall had returned to her home in California from New York and had begun to teach her own close friends. In December of 1899 her daughter rejoined her (from her trip to ‘Akká to Oakland) (and co-operated with her) and together they laid the foundation for the first Bahá’í assembly on the Pacific Coast.

In the beginning, there being no Bahá’í books available in English, the believers were dependent for their teaching upon some of the communes and an occasional tablet from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The receipt of a tablet caused the greatest joy and the friends would be called together at Mrs. Goodall’s home and many hours would be spent in making long-hand copies to share with one another.

In this quiet way the Message was spread, and for many years Mrs. Goodall’s home at 1537 Jackson Street, Oakland, was always open to visiting teachers and pilgrims.

(In the same way a meeting would be arranged for any visiting teacher or pilgrim, and for many years Mrs. Goodall’s home at 1537 Jackson St., Oak., was the scene of these delightful informal gatherings. In this quiet manner the Message was spread.)

(The first of) Among such teachers was Dr. Rafael Sadri, who, with his servant Nassim, was sent to San Francisco by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. They arrived in the spring 1900. Dr. Sadri attended the infrequent meetings held in the Oakland home and, in addition, offered his services as a teacher of Persian to those who cared to learn the language of Bahá’u’lláh. Miss Hillyer and Miss Goodall during their pilgrimage to the Holy Land had made a special trip to Nazareth to meet Dr. Sadri, and they had found him such a winning personality, with such a spirit of Bahá’u’lláh, that they were more than glad to welcome him to California. But circumstances cut short his stay and he was obliged to return to ‘Akká, where he died soon afterward.

In 1901 Mrs. Emogene Hoagg, returning from her first pilgrimage to ‘Akká and bringing authoritative instructions, invited the friends to meet her at the old St. Nicholas Hotel in San Francisco where she was stopping. This was the first Bahá’í meeting ever held in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. George T. Winterburn, travelers from California who for several years had been studying art abroad, heard the Message in Paris from Mr. Charles Mason Remey, and they made a trip to ‘Akká in 1904. Arriving home with notes of their visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, a meeting was arranged for them in Berkeley, it being the first Bahá’í gathering ever held in the university town. There the Winterburns made their abode for a short period, but were nevertheless considered members of the Oakland group or “assembly” as it was called when regular meetings had been established.

The small group which met at Mrs. Goodall’s home was the nucleus for the Oakland assembly, which then drew its members from San Francisco and other Bay communities.

Following Mrs. Brittingham, Mr. Thornton Chase of Chicago whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called “the first believer in America,” was the next visitor. Early in 1907 business began to require his presence on the Pacific Coast quite often and on such visits he was ever a welcome guest at the Oakland home. Referring appreciatively to those happy occasions, he once wrote: “It is in those home meetings that listeners are found and one is able to speak from the heart.”

Mírzá ‘Alí Kuli Khán was the next teacher of note to pay the West a visit. He made a hurried trip in February of 1909, and on several late occasions came again for longer periods, when he gave a series of lectures on the Cause.

During the same year, 1909, Mr. Charles Mason Remey of Washington, D. C., and Mr. Howard Struven, of Baltimore, were sent by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to India via San Francisco and Honolulu. Several meetings were hastily arranged for them in Oakland and Berkeley.

The second trip of Mrs. Lua Getsinger to California was in 1911, when she came in company with Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, son of Mírzá Asadu’lláh, who had been one of the first Oriental teachers sent to America by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. With Mrs. Goodall’s assistance a teaching tour of the state was begun to supplement courses of study being carried on in the Bay Region.

All these traveling teachers and pilgrims were the means of attracting many new souls to the Cause. Gradually assemblies were formed in Northern California, Oregon and Washington. However, it was not until January of 1911 that a permanent assembly was organized in San Francisco. Concerning the consummation of this long cherished desire the following tablet was received from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

Through the maid-servant of God, Mrs. Helen S. Goodall,

To the Members of the Assembly of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, San Francisco, California.

HE IS GOD!

O ye, faithful friends!

The maid-servant of the Kingdom of Bahá’u’lláh has written the joyful news that the friends in that region have established an Assembly, have engaged in the spreading of the teachings of God and have arisen with the utmost endeavor, sincerity of intention, and enkindlement with the fire of the Love of God so that that country may become a main-spring of the signs, and that city become illumined, and a number of souls like stars of the Horizon of Holiness may shine in the assemblage of the Kingdom of man (humanity).

This Assembly was organized at the right time. It is My hope that it may become a magnet of confirmation. If it remain firm and steadfast this Assembly will become so illumined that it will be a full, refulgent moon in the Horizon of everlasting Glory.

Report and write to Me the services which are accomplished by this Assembly so that they may become the cause of spiritual happiness and joy to the heart.

Upon thee be Bahá-el-Abhá!

July 11, 1911.

By the time it was certain that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would visit America, the believers in San Francisco were prepared for and anxiously awaiting his arrival. He reached New York April 11, 1912, and among those who met him there was John D. Bosch of Geyserville, California, representing the San Francisco and Oakland assemblies. Mr. Bosch was one of the first believers taught by Mrs. Goodall.

(and among those who hurried to New York to see him was Mr. John D. Bosch of Geyserville, California. He carried greetings from the S. F. and Oakland assemblies.)

After a short stay in New York, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went to Washington, D. C., escorted by a number of the friends, Mr. Bosch being among them. Mrs. Goodall and her daughter and Miss Ella Bailey had already arrived from California, and at the end of a week's visit accompanied 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Chicago for the Bahá'í convention and dedication of the Temple site.

Mrs. Goodall's party, Dr. Frederick W. D'Evelyn and Mr. Bosch were fortunate in being accommodated at the Plaza Hotel where 'Abdu'l-Bahá was domiciled. They were joined by Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Latimer and their son George from Portland; Mrs. Ida Finch from Seattle; Mrs. H. Emogene Hoagg, Mrs. Cordie Cline, Mrs. Grace Lamb, Mrs. Henrietta Wagner, Mrs. Georgia Ralston from California; Miss Elizabeth Muther from Honolulu; also Mrs. Lua Getsinger, who had been teaching in California for more than a year.

All these believers brought 'Abdu'l-Bahá beseeching messages from the western friends, supplicating him to extend his journey, as otherwise so many (they) who so longed to see him would be unbearably disappointed.

At those meetings tea and refreshments were always served, which helped to foster sociability and good fellowship. This pleasant duty was the special province and pride of Kwanichi Yamamoto, an employee of the household since May, 1904. He was the first Japanese believer having received the Message from Miss Elizabeth Muther in Honolulu in 1902.

In the fall of 1905, as the need was felt for more frequent meetings, Friday afternoons were set aside for regular devotional readings and Tuesday afternoons for study.

Among other teachers who came prior to 1912 was Mrs. Isabella D. Brittingham of New York, who in 1907 made a western circuit at the special command of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

“ ... Go thou to California and enter the meetings of the maid-servants of the Merciful with a heart attracted by the fragrances of God, a spirit pure and holy, and with a tongue expressing the commemoration of God. Become thou a heavenly angel, and be thou the candle of the meetings of the Merciful. This is my counsel. Hold thereto.”

Mírzá 'Alí Kuli Khán was the next teacher of note to visit the West. In February, 1909, he was invited to deliver a lecture on Persia at the University of California, and the Assembly had the pleasure of entertaining him at that time. Later on he came again for a longer stay and favored the friends with a series of talks on the Bahá'í Movement.

During the same year 'Abdu'l-Bahá sent Mr. Charles Mason Remey, son of Rear Admiral Remey of Washington, D. C., and Mr. Howard Struven, of Baltimore, to India via San Francisco and Honolulu. Although they had spent but a few days in San Francisco before the sailing of their steamer, several successful meetings were hastily planned for them in Oakland and Berkeley.

Another was Mr. Roy C. Wilhelm of New York who also made occasional business trips to the Pacific Coast. His genial personality and simple yet convincing presentation of the Cause won for it many friends in the West, especially among the younger generation for whom he had a special appeal.

Very early one morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá granted an interview to the California group (coterie). Dr. D’Evelyn had addressed a note to him saying: “The people of the Golden Gate yearn to greet the advent of the Golden Branch on his mission of establishing the ‘Most Great Peace’ in this Golden Age.” Smilingly ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “This age is not the Golden Age. It is the Diamond Age, and I hope that California will become the Diamond State, that souls may arise in it who will represent precious gems — not mineral gems but the gems of the Kingdom. The jewels of the mineral world are stonelike, whereas the jewels of the Kingdom are spirit. The light of the diamond symbolizes the light of the spirit. And I, God willing, will go to California for I am longing to see the friends.”

The western party (contingent) dispersed after a few weeks, some returning to California jubilant over the (their) supposed success of their appeal. But notwithstanding A. B.’s willingness to make the long journey westward, his time proved too limited and he telegraphed to Mrs. Goodall and her daughter saying that as he would be obliged to leave for the Orient he desired them to go to New York to say good-by. They went immediately, taking Miss Harriet Wise of Pasadena, and bearing with them the heart-breaking lamentations of the Western friends to fulfil their longings. Regardless of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s decision such a stream of petitions and telegrams continued to be dispatched to him that in the end he responded to the appeals and postponed his departure in favor of the memorable trip to California.

Mr. Thornton Chase had taken up his permanent residence in Los Angeles a short while before and he, too joined in importuning (importuned) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the same time, extolling his praises in a rhapsodical ode (This ode at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s direction has been preserved in the Star of the West (Volume IV, page 188.)) Unhappily, Mr. Chase did not live to see the fruition of his yearnings as he succumbed to sudden illness and passed away three days before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s arrival.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá with his suite reached San Francisco in the wee small hours of the morning of October 3rd. He was met at the ferry by Dr. D’Evelyn and escorted to the residence prepared for him by Mrs. Goodall at 1815 California Street.

There a surprise awaited him for at the door he saw Mírzá John Buzurg from whom he had not heard for years. Mírzá Buzurg was a Bahá’í, formerly of Tíhrán, and had come to America in 1900 (or 1902) as interpreter for Mírzá Asadu’lláh (or ‘Abdu’l Kerim), afterward drifting to California, and finally becoming a member of the S. F. Assembly. Upon hearing that A. B. was coming he offered to serve in the kitchen in order that A. B. might have Persian food while in S. F. sojourn. In this service he was cheerfully assisted by Marie, his little French wife.

One who came with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá from Chicago was Haritsu S. Fugeta, a young Japanese who had received the Message while working as “school-boy” in the home of Mrs. Kathryn Frankland in Fruitvale, California. Afterward at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s command he had gone to Chicago to study. He was living with the family of Mrs. Corinne True. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, as he passed through Chicago, attached Fugeta to his party (retinue).

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was immediately in demand. In fact, his entire sojourn was divided between pre-arranged public meetings and interviews granted the hundreds of callers who had read in the newspapers of his arrival with dozens of impromptu gatherings for the Bahá’í friends, interspersed between. Notwithstanding his time was so fully occupied, he made a point of motoring nearly every day in Golden Gate Park, where he could enjoy the trees and flowers and walk around the numerous lakes watching the birds. He also walked frequently in the neighborhood parks (plazas), sometimes with his secretaries, but often alone. October is such a beautiful month in San Francisco and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was very appreciative of the Indian summer weather.

In the afternoon of the day of his arrival ‘Abdu’l-Bahá crossed the bay to Oakland to greet intimately the assembled friends at the home of Mrs. Goodall.

The next afternoon he met some of the friends who had called at the San Francisco house, but it was not until evening that he met the entire assembly at the Bahá’í headquarters in the Lick Building. After expressing his happiness at finding himself in such a well organized assembly in the distant West, he compared the spread of the Cause to the growth of early Christianity and spoke of the small number of Bahá’ís at the time of the exile from Persia. There were thirty stages on the way from Tīhrán to Baghdád, he said, and in those thirty stages they did not find one Bahá’í, and yet now in each one of them there are great numbers of Bahá’í friends. Despite the fact that the governments of Persia and Turkey united in tyranny and oppression to extinguish the lamp of God, yet its radiance extended throughout the world, even as far as San Francisco, half way around the world from its birthplace. He exhorted the believers, few though they might be, to strive day and night to give forth the summons of God, inviting the souls to the Kingdom; otherwise God would create those who would hoist the standard and conquer the cities of the hearts.

These meetings were for the Bahá’ís and were quite informal.

His initial public appearance in San Francisco was at the First Unitarian Church where he was the guest speaker at the morning service Sunday, October 6th. Before presenting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the minister Reverend Bradford Leavitt, read an account of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s travels from the “Contemporary Review” of London and the “Boston Congregationalist”, and at the conclusion of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s address invited him to pronounce the benediction.

In the evening of the same day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá occupied the pulpit of Congregational Church in Oakland. Reverend Herbert A. Jump, the pastor, spoke quite at length on the rise of the Cause and then introduced A. B. as a “prophet of God.” At the close, he, too, requested ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to pronounce the benediction.

The next day Oct. 7th ‘Abdu’l-Bahá talked to the friends in San Francisco after his early morning walk in the garden nearby. He said: “You have many parks here. They are all very delightful, but the heart must be open to that delight and charm. If the heart be not cheerful and happy, if it have not ease and serenity, if it be agitated, when one enters these parks, one will be more agitated; but if the heart be happy — like unto my heart — then even in prison it is as a rose garden.”

Continuing, he told the story of the time when ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd, the Sultán of Turkey, threatened to exile him to Fezzan in the African desert; and how he had changed the Sultán’s intentions by writing him a poem lauding the beauties of prison life and the happiness to be attained if he should be sent to Fezzan. The Sultán decided that it was dangerous to send such a person where he could spread his seditious ideas among the Arabs and the negro tribes in the interior of Africa, and it was therefore better to let him remain in Syria.

The evening he spent in Oakland at the Japanese Young Men’s Christian Association in the Japanese Independent Church. This was a unique event as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s address in Persian was translated into English by his interpreter and then into Japanese by the Reverend Kodahira, pastor of the church, and was later published in full in the Japanese newspaper.

Another interesting feature was the reading of an original poem dedicated to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá by the famous Japanese philosopher and poet, Takishi Kanno.

A very happy day for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the 8th of October when he visited Leland Stanford University as the guest of its president, Dr. David Starr Jordan who, in addition to being a great educator, was also a famous scientist, being a naturalist of world-wide reputation.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was met at the train by Dr. Jordan, and at ten o’clock he addressed the student body and faculty in the Assembly Hall. His topic was “Universal Peace”, a subject very dear to the heart of Dr. Jordan, who, an earnest advocate of international peace, was at that time chief director of the World Peace Foundation. The audience of two thousand students and faculty present gave ‘Abdu’l-Bahá a rising vote of appreciation, and then the cheer leaders led [unreadable text, meeting? visiting?] in the college yells, at which he was very much amused and congratulated them on their lusty voices. Scores of Palo Alto residents attended the lecture and many others came from a distance, even as far away as thirty miles, as in the case of Professor Ernest A. Rogers and his students from the “Montezuma Mountain School for Boys” at Los Gatos.

Then for an hour Dr. Jordan drove ‘Abdu’l-Bahá about the grounds to see the campus buildings, especially the beautiful Memorial Church, at the entrance to which was a plaque bearing the all-inclusive inscription:

After luncheon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was driven by Dr. Jordan to 925 Waverly Street, the home of Mrs. Isabel C. Merriman's daughter, where Mrs. Merriman had prepared a tea and dinner in honor of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence in Palo Alto. The dinner followed a special service that had been arranged for eight o'clock at the First Unitarian Church. The Reverend Clarence Reed conducted 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the church and the entire congregation arose spontaneously as he entered. At the conclusion of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's discourse on "Unity the Fundamental Basis of Divine Teachings" Reverend Reed very impressively said: "I feel that a man of God has spoken to us tonight. I know no better way to close the service than with a prayer — not a prayer in spoken words, but a prayer in silence. Let each person pray in his own way for the coming of the universal religion; the religion of love, the religion of peace, the religion of the fullness of life."

At the dinner there were present among other guests the Reverend Reed, Professor Samuel S. Seward, Jr., and Professor H. D. Gray, both of Stanford University, Mr. H. W. Simkins, editor of "The Palo Alto", with the latter of whom 'Abdu'l-Bahá had a long talk after the other guests had left, and as a result of which Mr. Simkins issued an edition of his paper entirely devoted to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to Palo Alto.

Reed's closing. Original

I feel that a man of God has spoken to us tonight. There is no way I know to close the service than with a prayer — not a prayer in spoken words, but a prayer in silence. Let each person pray in his own way for the coming of the universal religion the religion of love, the religion of peace, a religion of the fullness of life.

"Whosoever thou art that enterest this Church, leave it not without one prayer to God for thyself, for those who minister, for those who worship, and for those you love."

Professor Seward's impressions are recorded in a letter written to Mrs. Cooper, which may be of more than passing interest:

"... 'Abdu'l-Bahá came down to Stanford to give an address at a general student body assembly. It was very well attended and very well received, and I should have known no more about him had it not been that Mrs. Merriman had invited him to take dinner and spend the night at her house. She belonged to the Winchester family, lived alone, and devoted herself with tremendous energy to the work of protecting children and animals from abuse. The dinner was held at her daughter's house, her own being too small. When I arrived it appeared that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had brought down a large train of admirers with him, all of whom looked for hospitality, and the good will of the hostess met the requirements.

"I found myself at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's right hand, and could have conversed easily were it not for the fact that his lack of English and mine of Persian made such a thing impossible. With the help of an interpreter, however, I asked a couple of questions. Knowing the intolerance and passionate bigotry with which he had had to struggle at home, I asked him whether he felt that the open welcome he received here was more encouraging than the reception he met with elsewhere. I felt in my heart that our reception meant very little, rather an easy curiosity than an eagerness for light, and I wondered whether he would set a higher value upon it. To my delight I found that he had anticipated my attitude, and did not set an undue importance upon our good-natured welcome. The only other question that I asked escapes me in detail, but I remember that I had the wicked intention of testing his alertness. There was, therefore, a meaning behind a rather innocent remark that I made. When the interpreter passed the question to him he paused for a moment thoughtfully, and then looked at me with a shrewd twinkle which I reciprocated; and then he interpreted his twinkle with an understanding comment that showed alertness and humor and grasp. I was delighted, and felt more than ever that the restriction of free intercourse prevented what might have been a most interesting give and take, and we established in the shortest time a friendly sense of understanding.

“[a5]The rest of the story may amuse you. Our hostess and her daughter managed, with great ingenuity, accommodations for the whole party. After midnight, when the last one was disposed of, Mrs. Merriman balanced a chair back among the overcoats in the hat closet, and in that position closed her eyes and got such rest and warmth as the night was to have for her. It would take more than that to affect her resolute sporting spirit, and she was a reasonably aged lady at the time ...

“So there is the story. It simmers down to very little, and I doubt whether it can really serve you, but at any rate you have whatever is there.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) Samuel S. Seward, Jr.”

Early the next morning, October 9th, Reverend Reed called to escort ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the party to the train returning (bringing them back) to San Francisco.

The evening of the 9th ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was guest of the City of Berkeley, at the invitation of the Mayor, Mr. J. Stitt Wilson. He addressed the citizens in the High School Auditorium, members of the Board of Education being present (Interview?)

‘Abdu’l-Bahá made (went on) quite a different visit on the morning of the 10th — not to a great institution, but to the humble home of Charles Tinsley, a negro believer who was confined to his bed on account of a broken leg. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told him the story of the Prime Minister and left him comforted and happy despite his pain.

In the evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not feel very well, but he insisted upon keeping an engagement to speak before the Open Forum of San Francisco, a club devoted to the consideration of economic and kindred subjects. His lecture was along a scientific line, contrasting the philosophies of the East and the West. Although it was their custom to have an open discussion following the speaker, yet on this occasion, in deference to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s indisposition, the regular procedure was waived and he was permitted to leave immediately upon the close of his address.

Friday morning, October 11th, at the morning meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá announced that he had received from the Orient a letter which made him very happy, for it contained the good news that the Persian believers were on fire with enthusiasm, at the same time he was saddened because it also told of the pilgrims who had traveled under great difficulties to ‘Akká only to find him gone, and they were beseeching him to turn his face homeward. On the other hand many cities on the Pacific Coast were imploring him by telegraph to visit them. So he was perplexed and said: “Let us consult together. What shall I do? Which call shall I heed? Let us consult together. Point out the way to me.” In the afternoon he returned to the same theme when walking through Sutro Heights, the beautiful gardens on the cliffs by the ocean, belonging to the estate of an early settler. He went over the subject with Mrs. Goodall and her daughter, asking again for consultation, and the following conversation took place:

(Mrs. Goodall) “‘Abdu’l-Bahá asks for my opinion. The Persian believers have suffered and sacrificed so much. I feel that if the Western believers were to realize the situation it would mean far greater spiritual development for them if they would forego their desires and [unreadable text] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to leave.”

(‘Abdu’l-Bahá) “Very good. I want you to write this exactly to the believers, giving the details ... if they do sacrifice themselves to this extent it will mean their spiritual development and attainment. Whoever can may come from the North to visit me. While I am here I will see them. Send this word to all the Northern cities ... You may write it in my behalf. Say that the Master says so and so, that he is longing to see them, excessively longing, but he is compelled to go.”

In the short house talk he gave in the late afternoon he again dwelt on the beauty of the Sutro Gardens and the capacity of San Francisco to achieve great spiritual progress.

That evening when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke before the Theosophical Society he was not so fatigued as on the previous evening, and he granted the audience the privilege of asking questions a number of which he answered at length. He then repaired to 2115 Baker Street where Mr. and Mrs. William T. Grosse had prepared a Persian dinner for him and his party.

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

I am going to say “Welcome!” to you, instead of your saying “Welcome!” to me. I am most happy to be here with you. I am exceedingly joyous, and I offer thanks to His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh that the potency of his word has been instrumental in bringing about such a meeting.

There are many people in the world who travel from one country to another. Perchance some may go from here to the Orient, others may come from the Orient here; but these journeys are undertaken in the interests of commerce, politics, or science, or for the sake of travel, or simply to meet friends. All such meetings are accidental (non-essential) because they are concerned only with the exigencies of the world of nature. But I have come from the Orient to the Occident — that vast distance have I journeyed — with no commercial purpose in view, nor travel as an object, nor politics as a reason. It has been simply to meet the friends of God. Though the meeting of others is generally accidental, our meeting is real, essential, because the hearts are connected, the souls are attracted, and the spirits are exhilarated. Our meeting is spiritually significant, and great will be the results therefrom; they will be everlasting.

Consider bygone times: there occurred a meeting like this one; that is to say, it emanated from the attractions of the conscience; it was due to the spiritual bond; it was due to the heavenly fraternity. Consider the results which later became evident, superstitions that animate them along the lines of prejudice, hatred and rancor, and these various traditional superstitions, having no foundation in reality, are the cause of warfare. The fundamental basis of all the divine religions is reality, and the revelation of Bahá’u’lláh, because it is reality, will be the cause of creating love among the hearts of men and uniting all humanity.

The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh are concerned also with good conduct, good conduct being the greatest effulgence of the All Glorious. The ethics of the world of humanity must be improved that morality may keep pace with material advancement. Real advancement is dependent upon the world of humanity becoming a center of divine morals, a mirror that will reflect the bestowals of God and the effulgences of the Merciful. Thus will mankind show forth the image and likeness of God. Until divine virtues become revealed in the world of humanity real progress and advancement will not be possible.

His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh addressed all mankind, saying, “You are the fruits of one tree and the leaves of one branch,” which signifies that the world of humanity is symbolized by a tree, mankind being likened to its leaves, blossoms and fruits. Hence, all the inhabitants of the earth have grown through their attachment to this blessed tree, and all have been nurtured and reared through the shower of divine mercy. It is self-evident that this teaching is the very spirit of the age. It is life-giving, because through love it animates the people, casts hatred utterly aside, and brings all into friendship and unity.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is the one requiring man under all conditions and circumstances to be forgiving, to love his enemy and to consider an ill-wisher as a well-wisher; he should not consider another as an enemy and merely put up with him or simply endure him; nor should he consider another as inimical and yet be forbearing toward him. That is hypocrisy. On the contrary, man must regard an enemy as a friend, an ill-wisher as a well-wisher, and treat him accordingly. That is, his kindness must be real; his well-wishing must be real; his love must be real, not merely forbearance, because forbearance is hypocrisy. The people of reality will not accept it.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is one on the station of sacrifice. Man must strive at the station of sacrifice, which means complete severance from the things of the world. His possessions, his comforts, even his life, must he sacrifice for humanity. Until man arrives at such a station he deprives himself of the effulgences of God, the bestowals of the Merciful, and the breaths of the Holy Spirit, which in this radiant century have become apparent and resplendent.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is one to the effect that God has created man to yield some fruit from his existence — an eternal fruit, an everlasting result. The life of this world is short; the blessings, virtues and happiness of the world of nature are temporary, hence relatively useless. Therefore when man devotes his energies to the accomplishment of results in the material life only it cannot be called fruitage. Man must be a blessed tree bearing eternal fruits in order that everlasting spirituality may be his. The real fruit of the human tree is eternal. It is the love of God, the knowledge of God, service to the world of humanity, kindness toward all mankind, and endeavoring and striving for the material and spiritual, or ideal, development of the world of man. This is the everlasting fruit. This is the divine effulgence. This is the divine bestowal. This is the everlasting life.

The teachings are lengthy, but I have stated them briefly, and from my brief statements of the fundamentals you must learn the full teachings.

Praise be to God, we are assembled here through the love of God. Praise be to God, the hearts are kind toward one another, and heavenly radiance is resplendent.

I am hopeful that hearts will be moved, that souls will be attracted, and that all will act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

This is a blessed day because the love of Bahá'u'lláh has gathered us together. It is a blessed day because it attracts the bounties of God. It is a blessed day because it is illumined by the heavenly light. It is a blessed day because the breaths of the Holy Spirit are being wafted from the Kingdom of Abhá. It is very blessed. Its results will be most wonderful. Its praises will be never-ending. You will see later on!

San Francisco, October 4, 1912, 8. P. M.

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

All phenomena excepting man, whether major or minor, are possessed of one aspect. For example, consider the vegetable kingdom. One piece of ground is fertile, producing fruits and flowers; another produces only thorns and thistles, while another is sterile or desert-like, producing no plants. So also with a tree. It may be a fruitful tree, bearing either sweet or bitter fruit; or it may be a fruitless tree. It is either a good tree or, prophetically speaking, an evil tree. Consider the animal kingdom. Animals may be classified as the ferocious (wild) and as the blessed (domestic), but each class is possessed of but one aspect.

Man, however, has two aspects: the aspect of radiance and the aspect of darkness, the aspect heavenly in character and the aspect animal in character, the aspect representative of virtues and the aspect representative of defects. Good and evil, virtues and vices, perfections and imperfections, are potentially possible in man. In man there are present the faculty of reason and also the spiritual faculty, both belonging to the superlative world. In man there is also the ego, which is animal in character and which belongs to the world of nature.

Hence in the human world men have appeared who have presented the most virtuous aspect, and men have appeared who have presented the most defective aspect. Divine men have appeared, likewise satanic men. Certain men have appeared who have proved to be the very light of guidance; others have been absolute darkness. Certain souls have contributed to the welfare of humanity; others have been a menace to society. Certain souls have appeared whose lives become examples of adoration among men — human temples; and some have been so degraded as to worship stone, the lowest of phenomena. Consider the difference in degree between the man who becomes an object of reverence among men and the man who is so degraded as to worship a stone, or a mountain, a sea, a tree, or a plant. There are certain sects in India who worship plants. There are certain people who worship monkey. Consider how degraded is the man whose object of worship is monkey. On the other hand, consider how His Holiness Christ and the other manifestations of God in human temples have proved to be examples of humanity worthy of adoration.

Therefore it becomes evident that in the world of humanity there are present two aspects. One is the merciful aspect, and the other is the satanic aspect. One is the aspect of virtues, the other the aspect of vices. There are present two forces in man. One is a force appertaining to the kingdom; the other consists in certain energies and powers that man shares in common with the animals. But man's intellectual faculty and spiritual capability are the effulgences of the Merciful and are the bestowals of the heavenly realm.

When the heavenly forces overcome the satanic or animal forces in man he then becomes angelic, and he is then worthy of presenting the image and likeness of God. That is to say, the divine virtues become resplendent in the world of humanity, like unto the light of the sun, which shines upon all objects, making radiant that which was dark. When this aspect of spirituality, this force of the kingdom, overcomes the natural forces, it is the process of rebirth, or second birth. This signifies baptism through the Holy Spirit, because divine radiance has overcome the darkness of animalism. For this reason His Holiness Christ declared that man must be born again.

The first birth is from the matrix of the mother, but the second birth is from the matrix of nature; that is to say, the forces of the kingdom overcome the animal forces and man ceases to be a captive of nature. He will then no longer act in accordance with the tendencies of the realm of nature, but will conduct himself in accordance with the teachings of the Holy Spirit. If man be not educated, be not guided, receive not the radiance of divine light, be not reborn by the breaths of the Holy Spirit, he will become like unto the barbarous people who inhabit Central Africa, or like the animals, or even lower than the animals.

Hence it is evident that the attainment of virtues is possible through the teachings of God, the bestowals of religion, and divine inspirations. This is possible through the baptism of the Holy Spirit — through rebirth.

When the natural or animal forces in man overcome the spiritual tendencies and satanic darkness overcomes the merciful radiance, then the dark aspect becomes dominant and man lingers in the world of darkness and ignorance; he becomes a center of defects, a captive of vices; he becomes ferocious, bloodthirsty, degraded, covetous, lazy, and completely enchained by the forces of his lower nature. He is then baser or lower than the animal.

God has sent the prophets, or divine teachers, in order that man may be educated, so that through the breaths of the Holy Spirit his physical forces may be dominated by his spiritual forces, that his radiant aspect may flood with light the dark recesses of his animal nature. When man reaches this supreme state he attains unto life everlasting; he attains to the image and likeness of the Lord; he becomes a reflector of the light of the Sun of Reality and the attributes of the Merciful. Otherwise he will remain in a state of ignorance, inadvertence and despair.

The prophets of God endured all hardships, all ordeals, and all difficulties, sacrificed self and forfeited their lives, in order that man might rescue himself from the darkness of such defects and reach the highest plane of attainment.

The world of existence has been likened unto a circle. It possesses two arcs: the arc of descent and the arc of ascent. In this circle, the circle of human existence occupies the middle station, or the meeting point of the extremes of the two arcs, which comprehends the last degree of the arc of descent and the first degree of the arc of ascent, or the darkest stage of the night of human ignorance and the dawn of human enlightenment. Hence man is possessed of these two aspects. The station of the animal man is in the arc of descent; it is the world of nature. When man chooses to remain in this station he is the lowest of existent beings, but when he progresses from this station he is the most noble of creatures. Therefore the manifestations of God have come to educate souls and to uplift them from the arc of descent into the arc of ascent. What does the arc of ascent represent? It represents divine guidance, the knowledge of God. It represents all the virtues of human attainment, sciences and arts, the perfections of the kingdom, faith, assurance, praiseworthy deeds, the process of regeneration through baptism by the Holy Spirit, entrance into the kingdom of God, and life everlasting.

Therefore we must act in accordance with the teachings of God. We must strive to rescue ourselves from the last stage of the arc of descent and begin ascending the arc of ascent. Thus shall we be enabled to attain to our utmost desires, which are the promulgation of the principle of the oneness of mankind, achievement of deeds beneficial to all humanity, service in the path of international peace, entrance into the kingdom of God, and the acquirement of life everlasting.

I hope that you may attain to this great bestowal and this beneficent grace.

We have been driving in your lovely park. I found it so charming that I alighted from the automobile and walked along the pathways. It is a very beautiful park.

This is a good city. It is a new city; that is, newly built. One does not often see a city like this. Most cities are old, but this is new. If in this city the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh be promulgated — that is to say, if the inhabitants act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh — this city will become matchless, peerless. It will become like a paradise of Abhá. Its outward appearance is radiant, and its inward life should become brilliant. Everything about the city is good. The human body is beautiful, but it requires life. When a body is endowed with life it is good, but when it is devoid of life, no matter how beautiful it may be it is only an image of clay. This city should become alive. It should be quickened by means of a new spirit. It should be rejuvenated by the infusion of new susceptibilities. It should become a city with eyes and ears; it should become eloquent. Then it would be a wonderful city. And so it shall be!

In truth, the American people have capacity, greater capacity than the Europeans. I have pondered over the condition of the masses of the people of Europe. They are like machines that work day and night unconscious of their motive power. They seem to be divided into two classes. The religionists are submerged in superstitions and prejudices, and those who are not religious are materialists.

The people of America are noble, energetic, spiritually susceptible and keen. That is why the Bahá'í cause has spread here. Europe is nearer the Holy Land, but America was first to accept the message. No matter how distant a mirror may be from the sun it will reflect as though it were near, but a stone, no matter how near it may be, can never reflect the sun. Therefore distance is of no importance. Europe was near but did not see the sun. America was far but received illumination because of its capacity.

As soon as a spark is applied to dry wood that is soaked with oil or alcohol it is at once ignited. Why? Because it is combustible. But stone, though it remain a long time in the fire, would not be ignited. Rain descends throughout the land, but only the pure soil is fertile. In that soil hyacinths and other flowers will bloom, but sterile soil will not be benefited by the rain. Hence capacity is necessary. Unless there be capacity the bounties will not be effective. Therefore strive to obtain capacity.

The bounties of the kingdom of Abhá are successive; the effulgences of the Sun of Reality shine gloriously. But capacity is necessary. The soil of the hearts must be receptive and pure so that it may be benefited by the downpour of rain. The mirror must be clear, delicate and polished to reflect the light; then the light of the sun will be revealed therein. But if the sun shine forever upon a black stone its rays and heat will not be effective and there will be no result. Therefore man should endeavor day and night to obtain capacity. The bounties of the kingdom of Abhá will then become manifest, and the light of the Sun of Reality will dawn.

Upon what does capacity depend? It depends upon sanctity, purity of heart, attentiveness to the kingdom, detachment from the world, and the glorification and praise of God. Unless this capacity be obtained the bounties of the kingdom of Abhá will not be resplendent, and the light of the Sun of Reality will not be effective in us.

We sometimes hear the questions: "Where are the bounties of the kingdom of Abhá! Where is the radiance of the Sun of Reality? Where are the heavenly blessings?" The heavenly blessings continue to descend, but sterility is without capacity to comprehend or to receive.

I hope all of you will acquire capacity and ability, and that the bounties of the kingdom of Abhá will become manifest within you.

You are welcome, most welcome.

We have come here to be your guests. Do you accept a guest? This guest has come from a far distant land. He has traveled over nearly half the globe to reach this point, which is the farthest West on this continent. Consider how much this guest of yours has longed to see you to travel all that distance. I have come from afar, although in the pathway of love this point is near, for love makes the distance short. I should have been exceedingly joyous if I could have made this long journey on foot. Then I should have been much happier, for in the pathway of true love every difficulty is mercy, every hardship is easy, and every catastrophe is a blessing. Hence I hope that this meeting of ours may produce results great in proportion; that it may be akin to the meeting of the shower and the meadow; that it may be similar to the meeting of the zephyrs and the trees; that it may be like the gentle breeze in springtime. May its results be great!

What should be these great results? The ignition in America of the fire of the love of God and the encompassing of all the souls by the heavenly radiance. May the hearts become attracted. May the spirits be exhilarated. May the eyes become radiant. May the ears hearken to the melody of the kingdom of Abhá.

I hope that you will strive for these great results.

THE BAHÁ'Í ASSEMBLY

San Francisco, Saturday Evening, October 5, 1912

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

I have the utmost joy that in the distant West I find such an organized Bahá'í center, where the friends of God have assembled, associating with each other in the utmost love. This affords me great joy, and I ask God that this revered assemblage may be made the cause of illuminating the East and West. This is my wish, and with the utmost of happiness I am grateful on account of the susceptibilities of your conscience.

To-day the people of the world in general are self-occupied. They are either engaged in warfare, or in commercial pursuits, political pursuits, industrial pursuits, or agricultural pursuits. The interests of all are of a personal nature. They are thinking of self-aggrandizement, no desire save the destruction of the world, no purpose save the thoughts which are directed to the acquisition of their worldly possessions.

The assemblage in the world which to-day is thoughtful of God, the assemblage which is occupied with the thought of illuminating the world of humanity, the assemblage which is thoughtful of the oneness of the world of humanity, the assemblage which is occupied with the mentioning of the kingdom of God, the assemblage which has its main motive the good pleasure of the Lord of Hosts, is verily the assemblage of the Bahá'ís, for they (the Bahá'ís) have no intention, aim or purpose save the attainment of the good pleasure of God, and entrance into the kingdom, and being the promulgators of the religion of God they are the spreaders of the fragrance of God. These are the desires of the assemblage of the Bahá'ís. That is why all the sects of the world are on the wane and destruction, except the Bahá'í assemblages, which day by day are achieving ideal progress, for they are confirmed by God's assistance.

I hope that many such assemblages may be founded in America, and that from all the centers of the world may people come to the Bahá'í assemblages, and thereby manifest the oneness of the world of humanity, for the people are all asleep, they are all inadvertent, they are all slumbering, because their thoughts are confined to materialism. They are not at all thoughtful of God's thoughts, except ye who are thinking of God. Verily ye are the spirit of the world. Ye are the cause of the light of the world. Ye are the salt of the world.

Do not look at your limited number now. Ere long you will see that the divine radiance has flooded all regions. All the peoples are decreasing, whereas the people of God are constantly increasing, progressing, developing, day by day growing stronger and greater, day by day becoming more effective.

Consider how the assembly of his holiness Christ which was limited or confined to eleven souls, has given birth to innumerable assemblies. How many denominations are sheltered beneath it! What efficacy it has come into possession of! Its efficacy is evident in all the world, and it evidently becomes the dominant factor.

Now, praise be to God, your assembly is a great one. You are about one or two hundred, and judge thereby of the future. And it is not in one place. In most parts of the world you will find Bahá'í centers, and they are daily increasing and daily spreading.

You must rest assured, knowing for a certainty that the confirmations of the kingdom are yours, that the favors of Bahá'u'lláh are with you, that the power heavenly is with you, that the assistance of God is with you. If all the inhabitants of the earth should gather they will fail in withstanding you, for they are on the wane, whereas you are waxing greater. They are being degraded; you are progressing.

When they exiled us from Persia, from Tīhrán, to Baghdád, there are thirty stages — in these thirty stages we did not find one Bahá'í. We did not meet one. And now in every one of these stages there are great numbers of Bahá'í friends.

Notwithstanding that the government of Persia and the government of Turkey — 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd the Sultán arose against the Cause so severely, they strove so violently, they exercised tyranny and oppression, thinking of extinguishing the lamp of God, but this lamp day by day grew in radiance, its power became greater, its illumination became greater, until it reached this degree, that now the lights are spread throughout the world, even as far as San Francisco, which is very far from Persia, which completes an arc of the circle, and it cannot be any further. See what it will mean in the future.

After his holiness Christ there were eleven disciples who were confirmed and even they were doubting, Peter heading them, until Mary Magdalene, that lioness of God, confirmed them, and was the cause of confirming them. Then consider what occurred. And now his holiness Bahá'u'lláh, when he ascended he had half a million of souls who were all self-sacrificing and all of whom were perfectly firm and staunch. Regard what a marvelous potency this will exercise.

Rest assured in the favor of God and know that God is your assistant, and with great power, with great confidence, strive that the lights of God may be spread and in this country from East to West the light may be shining, be confident, have no doubt about it. The banner of Bahá'u'lláh will be unfurled, waving towards all regions. The lights of the kingdom will illumine all these climes, and the call of God will reach the hearing of all the American Republic. Hence ye must be in the utmost of love, in the utmost of spirituality, in the utmost of detachment. In the utmost of sanctity must ye strive, night and day, that ye may be the cause of spreading this light. This spreading will grow. If we are not the instruments in it, others will be instrumental, but let us strive so that this crown may be placed upon our heads, that we may be the promulgators of the lights, that we may be the resuscitators of the souls, that we may be sight-givers to the blind, that we may be the remedies for the sick, that we may guide the people. Otherwise, God will create a people who will hoist the standard of God, who will ignite the lamp of God, who will conquer the cities of the hearts, who will show forth the potency of the Word of God. But for us the desire is that we may be instrumental and thus we may be crowned there. Otherwise, God is able to create instruments whereby his Cause shall be spread, whereby his Word shall be published broadcast. If this does not happen to-day, and if not on the morrow, then on the day after the morrow. But the desire is that to-day the Word may be spread, that our motion shall be beneath this banner and standard, that we shall be the cause of giving forth the summons of God, that we may invite the souls to the kingdom, that we may be the guides of the souls. Thus may this be the cause of illuminating the countenances in the kingdom of God and which will win the praise of all the manifestations of God. This is our hope. This is the utmost of our desires. And I ask God that he may aid you all, that he may aid me, that together we may be occupied in the service of the kingdom of God.

This is a very blessed gathering. It is the source of great joy. It is a source of great potency in the world. This very gathering has its effects. The assemblage here and the fellowship exercised is a magnet attracting the confirmations of God. Just now the confirmations of God are surrounding such a gathering as this. Ere long you will see its signs and your joy will reach the superlative degree.

Translated by Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab from his Persian notes

Last year I went to Europe. After a few months I returned to Alexandria. When I was ready to start for America, many people advised me to go by the way of Europe and take the steamer Titanic, but I came directly on the steamer Cedric. Bahá'u'lláh was with us. We are always confident that he is with us, no matter where we are. Although the trip was fraught with a great many troubles, yet God guided us to take the direct line. We were fifteen days on the sea. We might have gone by the way of Europe and might have taken the Titanic for America. On the steamer from Alexandria to Naples Mr. and Mrs. John Jacob Astor were with us. I delivered an address on the occasion before the passengers and they were somewhat interested. They told us that they were going to take the steamer Titanic, as it was the greatest passenger steamer in the world and which was on its maiden trip, so they left us at Naples. God protected us. God assisted us. The providence and protection of Bahá'u'lláh were with us. God has protected us under all circumstances.

‘Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, the Sultán of Turkey, was the greatest despotic monarch of Turkey. He dealt with us very unjustly. He was so cruel that in the middle of the night he did away with people who displeased him. He tied very heavy stones to the feet of his victims and cast them into the sea. At one time a steamer sank near the scene of these awful crimes. The company to which the steamer belonged desired to salvage the cargo. When divers went down they found, to their amazement, what seemed to be a tangle of trees, but which, on closer examination, proved to be human bodies floating erect in the water. There were so many of them they resembled a tangle of trees. For forty-five years God protected us from the tyranny of such a man!

To-day a newspaper reporter came to see me and asked some very irrelevant questions. One of his questions was, “Where do you get the money to travel with?” This was a very unnecessary question. I answered that the same power which had supported me while I was at home is taking care of me while I am traveling. Another question was, “Have you come here to convert the people to your religion?” I answered, “I have come to interest people in the establishment of universal brotherhood and international peace.”

While I was in Alexandria a very sagacious man from Ireland came to see me. He was a professor. He said, “I heard of you when I was in Cairo, and I have taken this trip to see you.”

I asked, “Why?” and he said, “Because all my religious opinions are disturbed and in a state of agitation.”

I asked, “For what reason?” and he replied, “Because I do not believe in God.” I said, “You are a Catholic; why do you not ask of the priests who God is, and where he is?”

He replied: “I have been with the priests. I have been two years in Vatican. I have spoken repeatedly with the Pope himself. Neither the Pope, nor the cardinals, nor the grandees of the Vatican could explain to me these religious problems. They could not prove satisfactorily the existence of God. I asked the Pope, ‘How can we know that there is a God, and how can you prove it?’ He said, ‘Because it is recorded in the Bible that God created the earth and heavens.’ I said ‘I desire evidences in regard to the existence of Divinity. First prove to me that there is a Divinity. Then you can speak of the Bible.’ I desire proofs, first of the existence of God, then of the necessity of inspiration, then of the revelation of God to man through the prophets. But simply to state that Moses was a prophet of God, that God inspired him, and that he recorded in the Bible such and such a statement, is not satisfactory. I do not believe in the Bible. I do not believe in God. I do not believe in Christ. You must prove to me first that there is a God, then that God inspired the prophets to reveal the Torah and the Gospel. Our philosophy denies the existence of God. We deny God according to certain scientific reasons. We do not merely say that we do not believe in God, but we substantiate this assertion with intellectual proofs and evidences.”

If one takes the Bible out of the hands of these priests they know nothing else. They cannot say anything. They know only how to manage the ceremonies of the church, and the knowledge of the Pope consists in the ceremonies and rituals of the Vatican.

I asked, “What are your proofs and evidences?”

He answered: “You say these endless phenomena and infinite objects are created by God, and that he is the creator of the whole world and that these phenomena are evidences of his existence, just as a work of art is the evidence in regard to the existence of the artist. A house connotes the existence of the architect, and a rose garden proves the handiwork of the gardener. But we prove, scientifically, that nature is independent of any creator, that these endless images of life are nothing but the variations of the productive power of nature.”

Then I asked, “How can you prove all these things?”

He answered: “These contingent elements are nothing but the composition of various single atoms. The individual atoms appear from time to time in various forms. Therefore composition is the sign of life, and decomposition is the sign of mortality. With this principle well established, where can you prove the necessity for the existence of a creator? There is a natural law which impels the various single atoms to come together involuntarily and to form a composite object. When these various segregated atoms are brought together then the result will be a flower, a human being, or any other given object. One can see the working of this natural law throughout all the different kingdoms of existence.”

I said: “Very well. There is no doubt that the infinite phenomena are the result of the composition of the different elements. Every composition is the aggregation of various individual molecules, but let us ascertain to which kind of composition it belongs.”

He said, “There is only one kind of composition.”

I answered: “That is where you are mistaken. There are three kinds of composition: the accidental (or involuntary), the essential (sometimes called compulsory), and the voluntary. Every composition of atoms is in these three divisions. Now let us investigate as to whether or not the composition of certain atoms is accidental — whether or not these elements have come together involuntarily to compose a given object.”

He said, “Certainly they have.”

I said: "That is a mistake, because every effect is the result of a cause, and as the affinity of these atoms depends upon a higher power, impelling them to come together, there must be a cause behind this kind of composition.

"Again, we may say that the composition is an essential composition. What is an essential composition? An essential composition is one wherein every cellular element seeks the association of other elements so that a composite object may be revealed. This longing for affinity is in the very nature of the atoms. For example, the essential nature of fire is heat; the essential nature of water is moisture; the essential nature of the sun is light. This is what we mean by essential composition. In case we consider this an essential composition, that is, the various atoms having been brought together with an inherent desire for mutual association, just as there is an inherent heat in the fire or moisture in the water then there will be no disintegration afterward, because these attributes are in the very innate nature of the object, and according to science an inherent attribute of an object will not separate from the object itself. Therefore, inasmuch as involuntary compositions are subject to decomposition and disintegration, we can clearly see that it is unscientific and untenable to say that they belong to the essential division.

"The only one that remains is the voluntary composition, and that is through the will of the Creator or self-subsistent Law."

It is strange that these philosophers do not consider that the Divine Will is the creator of life. Had you been in Dublin (New Hampshire) you would have heard how I spoke at the gatherings of these noteworthy thinkers and scholars.

These professors labor for many years to acquire scholastic virtues. They go through colleges and universities, try to inform themselves of sciences and arts, master minutely the various theories of life, and when they leave college they say: "We deny God. We have become free from all superstitions. We do not have any spiritual susceptibilities. Where is God? What are ideal realities? We believe in the evidence of the senses and we do not believe in the ideal verities. Spiritual susceptibilities are superstitions. God and the prophets are for the ignorant. Revelation and divine teachings are for the weak-minded. All these are the creation of human imagination. That which is tangible is real. We are the people of reality. Everything except that which is tangible is superstition."

If such should be the case, these philosophers have labored in vain for years to attain unto this station, for the animals have reached it without any labor. They are entirely free from spiritual susceptibilities. They are ignorant of God, the kingdom, heavenly attractions, divine bestowals. His highness The cow is the greatest philosopher. These professors should go to the cow school, and sit at the feet of the great professor emeritus to learn the minute lessons of philosophy and materialism. As an example of this "natural" philosopher consider the cow, for without any labor, or study, the cow is ignorant of divine philosophy, and of the existence of the prophets.

One day in Dublin (NH) we were driving with some of the ladies who had attended the meetings at which I spoke on these subjects every day. Suddenly there appeared in the field a herd of cows. The honk-honk of the automobile made them afraid and they began to run away. One of the ladies pointed to them and said: "Look at the philosophers. They are all running away!" Since that time, whenever I think of this incident, I laugh, and laugh, and laugh.

Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, Interpreter

I have been walking in the garden. There are many parks and gardens here. They are all very delightful, but to enjoy them one's heart must be receptive in order to possess that delight and charm. If the heart be not cheerful and happy, if it have not ease and serenity, if it be agitated when one enters a garden the heart will become more depressed; but if the heart be happy — like unto my heart — even a prison will become as a rose garden.

While I was in the barracks of 'Akká, than which there is no worse place — I know, for I was incarcerated there, — I was in a state of perfect happiness. That prison was like unto a real rose garden. And I was still happy, even when threatened with exile to Fezzan, which is among the blacks in the desert region of Africa. It is a journey of about one month by camel from Tripoli. No news whatever is received by any one sent there, and no one hears anything from the exile. He is lost to the world. And 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, the Sultán of Turkey, wanted to send me there! Upon receipt of the telegram stating that a steamer would arrive at the port to take me from 'Akká, I wrote a verse in Turkish to 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, and according to the poetic custom of the East I first expressed sentiments of love and kindness before proceeding to the real subject matter of the letter. Among other things I wrote the following:

"I wish those who desire to investigate reality to know that this is not my prison. This is my rose garden. Here I am intoxicated with the wine of love, and am ever happy and rejoicing. This is not a barracks. This is an orchard. This is a theater. This is a banquet hall. I rejoice in the greatest happiness and serenity."

Toward the end of the poem I wrote: "People of every community desire happiness and recreation, but when the people of light desire recreation or sight-seeing they go from 'Akká to Fezzan. Their place of recreation is Fezzan. They are happy to go there."

When 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd received this poem he said: "What a strange person is this! He is not defeated by threats to kill; he is not defeated by imprisonment; he is not defeated by threats to send him to Fezzan. Nothing defeats him! We gave orders to send him to Fezzan, and he writes to us that Fezzan is his park, his paradise, and that he wants to go there to enjoy himself. Why, then, should we send him there? He would go into that desert and sow the seed of sedition among the Arabs. Let him stay where he is. Let him stay with his sedition in Syria. That is enough. If he should go to Fezzan the sedition would spread. He might flee away from there into the heart of Africa and accomplish great things among the negro tribes. No, there is no need of sending him to Fezzan!"

The purport is that the heart of man receives happiness through the fragrances of the paradise of Abhá and the breaths of the Holy Spirit. Mundane things do not bring any lasting happiness. Earthly happiness endures but for an hour or two. A poor man who becomes rich will be happy for a few days only. After a time he will forget his good fortune and will again be a captive of sorrow and sadness. A prisoner set at liberty will be happy because of his freedom, but from other points sorrow will attack him. He may become sick, he may fall into the hands of enemies; one of his loved ones may pass away from life. In brief, many events may occur that will bring him sorrow. But nothing will affect that happiness which is obtained through the breaths of the Holy Spirit.

One of the believers of God in Persia was taken into custody and was thrown into prison. Thereupon he said: "How fortunate it is that I have at last found rest. Formerly, when I arose in the morning, I commenced to plan to do this or that work. I was constantly planning. Now I am free from all that. I am perfectly at ease."

When the news was brought to him that all his properties had been confiscated and that his possessions had been taken away, he said: "O, how delightful! What glad news you have brought to me! My possessions were always a care to me. One house was in need of repair; the lease of another house had come to an end and would have to be renewed; the harvest of one piece of land was not good, consequently something would have to be done so that the following year there would be a better harvest. I was continually thinking of all these things. Now, praise be to God, I am at rest, perfectly at ease."

In a day or two he was told that his son had been killed. He said: "This is the acme of all my happiness, because I have always been afraid that this son of mine might waver in the cause, might fall in the love of God, might fall into trials and vicissitudes, and might not be able to withstand all these tests. Now my heart has been set at rest. Praise be to God, he left this life illumined and while he was supremely happy. He has been freed from the darkness of this mundane world. He was like a bird that flew high, and he has been released from this cage. The end of his life was perfect. On this account I am very happy."

More sad news was brought to him, but it had no effect upon him, for he became more and more happy every day. His enemies were astounded, saying: "Why is this man so happy? Why is he so exhilarated? Why is he so attracted? He was surrounded by loving friends, now he is without them. He was living in a mansion; now he is below in a dungeon. He had only one son, and that son was killed. Notwithstanding all this, he is happy. Notwithstanding all this, he is attracted. Notwithstanding all this, he is most cheerful. What a calamity it is to be a Bahá'í when it causes one to attain to such a degree of happiness!"

San Francisco, Thursday morning, October 10, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

I have received a letter from the friends in Persia, who send greetings to you. They long to see you, and their greatest desire is for the day to come when the way will be opened for them to visit you. May this association be a bond that will unite the East and the West. My desire is that only love may exist, and that the East and the West may become united through this ideal bond.

The Persian Bahá'ís are very sincere. Each one longs to endure hardships, to suffer ordeals, and to offer his life for the world of humanity. Many have forfeited their possessions; many have suffered imprisonment; many have been killed. The Persians are steadfast and firm. They are ever ready to sacrifice life for humanity's sake. At all times they have been self-sacrificing, and I hope the results of their self-sacrifice may be the removal of foreignness and warfare from the world of humanity, so that no hatred or animosity will linger and that all will become as one family.

Differences are the result of thoughts and imaginations. Human thoughts have only an ideal, not a tangible existence, yet they have become the cause of enmity and dissension. Though the thoughts of man have only an ideal existence, man himself has both an ideal and physical existence, and his different personalities or variations of form and physiognomy have been made the basis of estrangement and strife. However, these differences have not proved to be worth the struggle of war. No man should hate another because his image is different, or because his habits and customs are different. Man is possessed of intelligence, and he should know that such differences do not constitute a reasonable cause for war. What thoughtlessness, what inadvertence! God created all to be friends. He bestowed upon man freedom of thought, the power of idealization, understanding and intelligence. Therefore man should not fight with his fellow-men because of thoughts, or beliefs or racial prejudices.

The bestowals of man belong to the realm of idealism, and is[a11] in the hands of God. All that concerns man is the necessary bond to bring about the happiness of humanity. This bond is for attraction, fellowship, love, self-sacrifice and unity.

Man must exercise fellowship and love in order to prove that he is distinguished above the animal kingdom. If he engage in strife and warfare he is no better than the animal. Strife is an animal tendency, an attribute of nature, for nature is dominated by the law of the survival of the fittest, which ever causes enmity, rancor and warfare, and when nature is left to itself corruption prevails. Man must be educated according to the teachings of God in order that the natural or animal tendencies may be eradicated, and so that he may be enabled to acquire spiritual virtues, attractions of the conscience, fellowship and love. Nature is aggressive. Nature tends to oppression. Nature tends toward tyranny. Nature tends toward monopoly. These are natural tendencies that must be trained. Man should live in union, harmony and love, for the honor of man depends upon the intellectual possibilities overcoming natural susceptibilities.

Intellect judges according to justice, nature according to force. Intellect judges according to equity, nature according to aggression. Intellect judges according to solidarity, mercy and love. Nature, on the contrary, is governed by the law of the survival of the fittest, whereas the distinction of man is to be sanctified above such a law.

Therefore the world of humanity should live as one, according to the law of love, for the honor of man is in the attainment of those virtues which constitute the image and likeness of God. This is the eternal honor of man. This is the sublimity of man. This is the life everlasting of man.

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter[a12]

Since the beginning of the world there have been a number of philosophical thoughts and theories. When we glance at history we find no end to these concepts. Some of these concepts have been considered useful, others imagined to be the visions or spiritual inspirations, whereas most of them emanated from superstition. Inasmuch as such thoughts were various and contradictory they could not belong to the matter of reality because reality is one and does not permit of multiplicity.

Inasmuch as these thoughts are various and contradictory, how can we judge regarding them?

There are many religions in the world today each one claimed to its adherents to be the true one and that all other beliefs are false. The same is true of sects, philosophies and other schools of thought. Hence how can we know which is reality and which is imagination? We want this made clear.

Thoughts must correspond with science and reason. Any thought that presents reasonable proofs leaves no ground for doubt, and thereby proclaims itself as reality. But mere conception without decisive proof is like a wave in the ocean of imagination. The sea of thought has its waves every hour, and imaginings are like these waves — from one side they come, to another they go, and pass away. But one who presents proofs, decisive arguments and conclusive evidence — evidence that is permanent and lasting — sets forth reality. Mere imaginings are not acceptable. Therefore all questions must be compared with science and reason. If they prove and mature reasoning, has expounded every question, leaving no ground for refutation or denial.

The majesty and divinity of God are inconceivable. God is holy and sanctified, lofty and great. Human thought is not capable of forming any conception of the divinity of God.

In the world of phenomena there is no conception of God, because every inferior degree is entirely out of touch with the degree superior thereto. For example, the mineral kingdom, howsoever it may advance, can never conceive of the vegetable kingdom, although both are accidental or created. The vegetable kingdom, howsoever it may advance, can never have any knowledge of the animal kingdom, and can never conceive of the human kingdom, because the animal grade and the human kingdom are above the vegetable kingdom. For instance, a flower can have no knowledge of mind, reason or spirit. The animal, howsoever it may advance, cannot know consciously the human kingdom, cannot conceive of the intellect or of the processes of reason, because the human degree or kingdom is above it, though both are accidental or created.

Therefore, since difference in degree is a hindrance to comprehension, how is it possible for man, the accidental, to comprehend God, the eternal reality? How is it possible for the accidental to comprehend the grandeur of God, or the divine attributes and virtues of God? It is utterly impossible. The proof is evident and conclusive.

The bounties of God are continuous. The effulgences of God are never-ending. The lights of the virtues and attributes of God are ever shining. Man can comprehend these. Man can comprehend qualities such as the mercy and the power of God. But the reality of divinity is beyond human comprehension.

All that comes within human conception is man's own creation. That is to say, it is surrounded by the human mind and is finite in relation to man. But the reality of divinity cannot be surrounded or encompassed. Were the reality of divinity to become finite or limited it would not be divinity but a creation of the human mind, and man would therefore be greater than his own creation.

Which is greater — the infinite or the finite? Without doubt, the infinite is greater. That which comes within human grasp is finite. Therefore God, being infinite, is undoubtedly greater than the finite.

The reality of divinity has never been comprehended by the human mind. Everlastingly has it been in its holy state, sanctified above comprehension.

In brief, the human mind can comprehend only the names, attributes and bounties of God. Man can comprehend the effulgences of God, and can attain to the divine favors and guidance, which are the evidences of God's love toward man.

Praise be to God you have been rescued from imaginings and false conceptions.

Every assertion must be proved. Do not accept anything without conclusive proofs.

You are all welcome, exceedingly welcome.

I have journeyed a great distance to visit you, having longed to see you, for Bahá'u'lláh has created a marvelous love in the hearts, and a wonderful bond among the souls. He has caused the hearts to be attracted to one another. I have traveled far to see you. Bahá'ís journey long distances to see one another. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has said: "My comfort, my ease, my life, my honor, my family, my household, all have I sacrificed in order that blessed and holy souls may appear, souls that will become the centers of the virtues of mankind. Thus may they be souls of the kingdom, heavenly, lordly, free from attachment to this world, sanctified above all the vices of human nature, and qualified to acquire beauties from the perfections of God." Bahá'u'lláh endured every difficulty. He suffered every ordeal. He sacrificed himself for all mankind.

Praise be to God we are in receipt of good news from the Orient. The Orient is exhilarated. The fire of the love of God is ignited everywhere. The Orient is moving, just as tree moves in the way of a breeze, and the breeze of the love of God is now setting the Orient in motion. All the people there are truly seeking, and are either becoming believers or out and out enemies. Throughout Orient there is now a great commotion. The believers are on fire with enthusiasm, and we shall see the results. They are begging me to return to Syria, for many pilgrims have journeyed to 'Akká, enduring great hardships, and must return disappointed.

In the Orient one travels under great difficulties. It is necessary to go on horses, or mules, as there are no railroads there, and some even go on foot. The Bahá'í friends traverse long distances in order to visit the Holy Tomb and to sense the fragrances of holiness. If they should arrive at the threshold and find the guardian away they would become sad and disheartened. So I wonder what to do. On the one hand, many cities on this coast are telegraphing and writing, "We are waiting for you to come." On the other hand, from beyond the seas the believers are imploring me to return. Consequently I am perplexed. What shall I do? Which call shall I heed? Let us consult together. Point out the way to me.

The Persian Bahá'ís have endured excessive hardships. Their ordeals cannot be described. They have been imprisoned, some of them not once but many times. They have been bastinadoed. They have been persecuted. Their possessions have been confiscated. Many of them have been obliged to pay exorbitant tributes. They have endured great ordeals, but praise be to God they have remained steadfast and firm. In the arena of tests they have not been found wanting. On the contrary, they have proved to be most staunch, and their faith has shone even as the sun. Recently, in the city of Jawakan, near Shíráz, two Bahá'ís were martyred while proclaiming in the utmost of firmness, "Ya Bahá el Abhá!"

Notes of a "Consultation," — 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Mrs. Helen Goodall, Dr. Faríd, present.

Friday, October 11, 1912, Sutro Heights, San Francisco,

Dr. Faríd to Mrs. Goodall: “‘Abdu’l-Bahá asks for your opinion as to whether he should go to visit the Northern cities or return to the Orient!”

Mrs. Goodall: “‘Abdu’l-Bahá knows best what to do.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I want consultation — this is not the way to consult (laughing). I ask your opinion — If it were my will I would not have asked you.”

Mrs. Goodall: “‘Abdu’l-Bahá asks for my opinion. The believers in Persia have suffered so much. I feel that if the western believers understood the situation, (their sacrifices) it would mean far greater spiritual development for them if they would sacrifice their desires and give ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the Persian believers.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Very good. I want you to write this exactly, to the believers, giving the details. Tell them I have many letters from the orient — all stating that the believers in the Orient have travelled long distances and they are disappointed that I am not there. They are constantly coming there from afar, from great distances to see me. They feel disappointed and very sad. The believers in the Northwest will realize greater development if they sacrifice themselves to have me go to those pilgrims. Write that exactly — state that: If they do sacrifice self to this extent it will mean their spiritual development and attainment. Whoever can may come from the North to visit me here. While I am here I will see them. Send this to all the Northern cities, Seattle, Portland, all the Northern cities. Tell them the believers have gone to ‘Akká, some of them taking three months journey on mules or horses, and some walking, and they do not find me there.

“You may write it in my behalf — say that the Master says so and so — that he is longing to see you — excessively longing — but he is compelled to go. The winter is before us and how can I cross the Atlantic. It would be arduous — and then the Master’s health. He cannot endure excessive cold. Send a night letter in which you say that a lengthy letter will follow.”

(To Mrs. Goodall and Mrs. Cooper) “You are the one to confer life to them and whenever you have the time and inclination, make a trip to those cities. Your cities should associate one with another. For instance, they should come from Denver and Chicago and you should pay them visits.”

Upon seeing a steamer that was once owned by Mr. Goodall passing in through the Golden Gate, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Captain Goodall never thought that his daughter was to be an Admiral.”

Dr. Faríd: “Dr. Cooper should have been at last night’s meeting (At the Forum).”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Let him have an account of it. Let him read it.”

Mrs. Goodall: “When the man who was to follow ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, got up to speak, some one in the audience said, ‘There goes the first cow.’ The Professor said, ‘I would not criticize anything he (meaning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá) said because he was in prison for so long a time — everything was so clear, etc.’”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Be very kind to Mrs. Kanno because she is the wife of a Japanese. She has been persecuted for marrying a Japanese. It is well to become the wife of a Japanese. This is a bond, uniting the East and the West.”

Mrs. Cooper: “Mr. Latimer is a splendid young man. I would like to adopt him.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Do so.”

Mrs. Cooper: “What shall I do with his mother?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Make her your sister. He is an exceptional young man — splendid, perfectly truthful, perfectly sincere. I love him very much. Such young men are rare, and he is always smiling.”

Dr. Faríd: The Master goes to meetings and often does not mention the name of Bahá’u’lláh. What necessitates the mentioning of a name? You can discuss a subject without mentioning any name.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “We do not do like Dr. Campbell did in a certain meeting. He commenced to speak in such a way that nobody would listen to him.”

Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, Interpreter

We have just been for a short drive and a walk through the Sutro Gardens, which are very beautiful.

San Francisco has capacity — capacity for many things. It has both material and spiritual capacity, and is progressive. Just as this city is achieving material progress I am hopeful that it may also achieve ideal progress, and that through the divine illumination heavenly civilization may be established here. Thus it may become a center of light and of the Most Great Guidance, a city of freedom, happiness and honor, joy and tranquility, a paradise of Abhá, a heavenly Jerusalem on earth.

You remember it is prophesied in the Gospel that the New Jerusalem will descend from heaven, and if the supplications of the friends of God should ascend heavenward, and if the lights of God should shine upon it, then you should know that the New Jerusalem had descended upon this city.

God should be commemorated in every city; the lights of guidance should be diffused; the souls should be attracted to the beauty of God; the doors of knowledge should be opened; the teachings of God should be practiced — and the tongues should be eloquent in the praise of God. When these virtues become apparent within a city, the heavenly manna will descend, and that city — wherever it may be — will become a New Jerusalem.

MEETING FOR THE BAHÁ'Í CHILDREN

Oakland, California, Saturday Afternoon, October 12, 1912

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: What radiant children these are! How radiant! What radiant and beautiful children! These will become very good, because they will receive Bahá’í education. They will be reared beneath the shelter of Bahá’u’lláh.

They are just like fresh plants which have been sown in the Garden of Abhá and they receive the water of the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. They will be reared through the heat of the sun of reality.

Assuredly, amongst them there will appear souls — most blessed souls — each one of whom will be a radiant candle in the world of humanity, souls who will shine from the eternal horizon even as stars shine.

They are very, very pleasant indeed — exceedingly pleasant!

There is a difference in the development of a tree which is nigh unto fruitage, which comes under the education of the gardener when a fresh plant, from the very beginning to be reared and cultured by a skilled gardener, because the latter — the fresh plant — can be educated according to the wishes of the gardener, and the gardener can train each branch just as he wishes it to grow.

Such a tree, when reaching fruition, will reveal the handiwork of the gardener, showing full well the care given it by the gardener.

Now, these children are fresh plants which have fallen into the hands of the gardener. Therefore, they will be very well educated; they will become fruitful trees; they will become very blessed trees; they will become most delectable trees. The gardener is blessed, and the skill of the gardener will become manifest in them.

(‘Abdu’l-Bahá then distributed among the children candy and envelopes containing rose leaves)

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: You are all my grandchildren!

I feel the utmost joy to be present here with you, especially to be surrounded with such radiant children. They are the very flowers of the Paradise of Abhá.

Surely, a man in a rose garden is to be happy, and now I am happy in a rose garden. On one side, trees most fruitful and delightful do I see, and on the other hand, or across, I see my children who are flowers and most delightful to look at, and assuredly they give joy to be in such a place.

In San Francisco, through the hand of the gardener of God, who has appeared in the Orient, to see such a garden as the result of his handiwork in the West — this is a source of great thanksgiving in the East. Hence, I am hopeful, through the favors of that real gardener, that He may ever care for these trees and water them; that He may ever refresh, through His holy dewdrops, His flowers; may shower upon them from His clouds of mercy. May the sun of His reality shine upon them all. May they bask in the sunshine of His praises. May, day by day, this garden become more green and verdant, its trees become mightier and more beautiful, its flowers become more delicate and fresh, in order that the delightful fragrance of this garden shall refresh the nostrils of the longing ones both in the East and the West.

An Oriental personage, having come from the most remote part of the Orient, were he to breathe there, were he to inhale the fragrances which are wafting from the distant parts of the West he would say: "How fragrant are they! Evidently the rose garden of the West is most beautiful. Its flowers have blossomed delightfully. The fragrance thereof is reaching even this remote district."

May this cause the rose garden of the East to be proud of this, that, praise be to God, the rose garden of the West, in a short space of time, has assumed most delightful freshness. Most magnificent flowers have become apparent therein. Variegated flowers can be seen there. White flowers have grown in it; colored flowers have grown in it; red flowers can be seen in it; and yellow flowers can be seen in it. All of these together are in the utmost of freshness and verdure, and each lends a charm and harmony to the others. Each one is a cause of the adornment to the others.

This is my hope and so do I hope, through the favors of Bahá'u'lláh, may he bless these children.

(Going to each child separately) "May He bless this child!"

Oakland, 8.30 P. M., October 12, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

This morning we spoke in the pulpit of the Temple Emanu-el, at the invitation of Dr. Meyer who is a most broadminded man.

In Persia there are a great many Jews who have become followers of Bahá'u'lláh. Thus they believe in the Báb as the "Gate of God," and likewise in His Holiness Christ as the Word of God, the Spirit of God. They acknowledge the Gospel as the Book of God. And believe that the disciples were the servants of God even as were the Israelitish prophets. They are capable of advancing rational, conclusive arguments concerning the prophethood of Christ, citing proofs and quoting prophecies that are not known to the Christians. These Bahá'í Jews acknowledge Muḥammad also, and are able to offer rational and traditional proofs regarding his prophethood. Religious tolerance of this kind would have been hitherto impossible and inconceivable but during this century of radiance such progressive thought is made possible by the dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh.

There were once some missionaries in 'Akká who felt exceedingly grieved whenever they observed that the people of many nationalities who visited me were satisfied with the Bahá'í principles. Especially sad were they when the visitors were Americans. They used to say: "We strive to usher other people into the religion of Christ, but here we see the Christians becoming Bahá'ís!"

Among these missionaries was a woman who always exhibited great displeasure whenever she saw me. One day I chanced to meet her in a merchant's shop when a certain Jewish Bahá'í happened to be there. I said to her, "You are very much displeased with me, but do you know how much I love you?"

"How much do you love me?" she queried.

I answered: "I love you as much as you hate me. That is the ratio. The amount of love I entertain toward you is equivalent to your hatred for me."

She laughed. Then I remarked: "You have no right to be displeased with me, because I am doing a good work. Through rational proofs I make those who deny God, such as atheists, believe in God and in His Holiness Christ. Therefore you should be very happy. As you are displeased, suppose I send them all to you, that you may do this work. Will you convince them concerning God? If you will convert them to Christianity I shall be very grateful to you. Here is a Jew whom I have caused to become a believer in Christ. You may question him."

Thereupon she asked him, "Are you a Christian?" He answered, "Yes, and I have greater faith in Christ than you have."

Then I suggested that she ask him what he meant by that and how he could prove it. So she asked him, and he straightened himself and said, "Do you want rational proofs?"

She answered, "I want rational proofs."

Then he cited many verses from the Bible, and quoted many prophetic words of which the Christians are ignorant. He elucidated and expounded them, and proved that Christ was the Word of God, the Spirit of God.

She was well pleased and said. "Now let me have your rational proofs."

Then he talked, and talked, and talked, until she was tired. She was quite convinced, then she said to me: "If you had caused this Jew to believe in Christ, and had been content with that I should be forever grateful to you. But you do not leave him there. You make of him a Bahá'í! That is what we do not like. When you have converted a Jew to Christianity is that not enough? Why do you then make of him a Bahá'í?"

Consider what a vast difference there was between the teachings of Moses and those of Christ. The teachings of Moses were severe and rigid laws, whereas the commandments of Christ were fragrance, spirituality and love. Hence what injustice and inadvertence it was for those who believed in Moses as a prophet of God to apply the opprobrious term Beelzebub to His Holiness Christ. What inadvertence!

Inadvertence causes man to see the sun as darkness, to consider a most beautiful countenance as ugly, to regard a source of absolute good as evil itself. Inadvertence caused the people of Egypt to regard the Pharaohs as the godhead. Inadvertence so blinded the people to the light of Christ that they crucified that glorious personage who had been the cause of life to man.

We should seek shelter in God's protection lest we become deprived of the mercy of God through inadvertence, prejudice, the desires of the animal world, bad conduct and immorality.

Through inadvertence one who is dear in the kingdom of God may become degraded, one who is radiant may become benighted, one who is merciful may become satanic. Inadvertence may cause one who believes in the prophethood of Joshua to become so unjust as to deny the prophethood of Christ. Through inadvertence one who acknowledges a star will deny the sun!

San Francisco, Sunday evening, October 13, 1912

Interpreter —?

This afternoon we drove out to the sea-shore. We looked upon the beautiful sea with its high waves, and pondered over the time when the Sea of Love will be set in motion.

When the waves of the sea are high there is a tempest, vessels are sunk, and ports receive injury. But when the Sea of Love shall be set in motion its tempest will be life, ports will be adorned, ships will be saved, happiness and composure will prevail, pearls will be cast ashore, everything will become brilliant, and great will be the results.

It is my hope that the Sea of Love may be set in motion. The Sea of Love is the sea of sanctity. It is the sea of knowledge. It is the sea of peace and reconciliation. When that sea shall be set in motion new results will appear every hour — results that will be age-abiding. It is our great wish to dive into that sea, to swim in that sea. Therefore, let us strive to find that sea that we may swim therein. Thus may we be enabled to recognize truth in any form, wherever it may be.

Our aim should be to promulgate reality, not our own opinions. We should strive to promote the truth regardless of what our opinions may be. In this way the divine confirmations will surround us.

In the estimation of the people of Turkey, Arabia and Persia there is nothing worse than Buddhism. The Buddhists are shunned as makers of images, and Buddha is considered a founder of heathenism. As you know, the Muḥammadans are iconoclasts to such an extent that they regard a painting as blasphemy and a painter of pictures, or a maker of images, as an infidel. They declare that at the time of the resurrection God will say to such a man: "You have painted a man, and as I have breathed into man my spirit so you must put breath into this picture.” Or, “You have drawn a bird, therefore you must put life into it, and if you do not you will go to hell and remain there until you can breathe life into it.”

Notwithstanding this extreme prejudice of the Muḥammadans, I often proved to them in their meetings the prophethood of His Holiness Buddha. None opposed, some accepted, while others remained silent because they realized that the proof was clear and indisputable.

We have no other purposes than to teach reality. We have no prejudice. Our aim is unselfish. Our only desire is for unity. That is why God assists us.

His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh has closed the door of hell. This is a brief but significant statement. He has delivered all from the fear of hell.

His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh likened the religions of the world to musical instruments, each divine messenger having been sent to sound a different key, but the instruments have become out of tune and discord has resulted. Therefore Bahá’u’lláh brought a new musical instrument and put it into our hands, saying: “Play on this. It includes all notes, all harmony. This harmony will exhilarate even the angels and will set them to dancing. The Supreme Concourse will rejoice, for this harmony will be never-ending. The melody will be eternal.

San Francisco, Monday Morning, October 14, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

Welcome, very welcome!

Praise be to God that he confirmed me to come here to see you, for I had the greatest longing to see the friends in America, to see those souls who are joyous because of the glad tidings of God, who are attracted by the fragrances of God, who are rescued from traditional imitations of the past, who are freed from superannuated dogmas, who ever investigate reality, who desire only to do the will of God, who are endowed with seeing eyes and hearing ears, and whose hearts are sensitive like the hearts of little children, perfectly pure and holy. I hope that this journey of mine to America may cause souls to arise in perfect sanctity and purity to ignite the lamps of the world, and to become as stars shining from the eternal horizon. May this be the cause of life to the people of the world.

In these days the darkness of war has overspread the world, and thick clouds of bloodshed and ferocity have covered the horizon of humanity. Perchance, God willing, you will be instrumental in abolishing the great tyranny of war and in transforming the gloom of battle into the light of the love of God. Thus, through the rays of the Sun of Reality, these clouds will be dispelled forever, and the hearts that are now filled with enmity and rancor will become so purified as to attain to love, and all will rest under the tent of the oneness of humanity.

Strive for it! Strive for it! Strive for it!

Talk of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, given at 51 Grosse Bldg., Los Angeles, Saturday evening, October 19, 1912.

- (Steno notes by Mai Auforth) *

This is a good gathering, a good meeting. The assemblage is the assemblage of God, for it is not convened for any worldly purpose; it is not organized because of any commercial purpose; it is not held because of any political purpose; nor is it held because of some material end or purpose. It is held purely for the sake of God. Therefore I am very pleased. I am very glad to find such a meeting in this city — an assemblage, the members of which are in the utmost unity; an assemblage which does not entertain any desire save the good pleasure of God; an assemblage which has responded to the call of the Kingdom of Abhá, saying, Ya; an assemblage, the purpose of which is the illumination of the world of humanity, an assemblage, the purpose of which is universal guidance. Surely, such an assemblage is blest. Today, the various nations of the world are all submerged in the sea of materialism, having no purpose except material profits, and they are working for naught save the realization of their own ends. An assemblage which is turned to the Kingdom, which is possessed of the spiritual subtleties; which is possessed of attractions of the conscience, which is directed to God — This is a Bahá’í assemblage. Outside of that, all the others are submerged in the sea of materialism, Therefore, you must thank God that — Praise be to God! — The sun of reality has shone upon you, the breezes of favor have blown toward you, heavenly Manna has descended upon you, the Signs of God have been revealed to you; the hosts of the Blessed Beauty have surrounded you. You have hearkened to the admonitions of God and you are pursuing the straight pathway. Therefore, you must thank God for the manifestation of such boundless bestowals.

I hope that you may act in accordance with the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh, that you may conduct yourselves in accordance with the behests of the Blessed Beauty. If you do so, I have no doubt that the lights of this assemblage will shine upon the world; this assemblage will be the cause of guiding a goodly number of people; this assemblage will be the cause of uniting the people of the world; this assemblage will be assisted to establish the peace of the world universal.

Do not look at your small numbers. Plurality of numbers is not important. It is, rather, the Bounty of God that is essential; it is the confirmation of the Heavenly Kingdom. Consider past times. How often it has happened that a limited meeting, a small number, has finally widened its circle and grown in proportion to the extent of including all nations and regions. Therefore, the hearts must be looked at, not the pluralities. If a limited number of souls are possessed of hearts which ARE PURE AND tender, that limited number is equivalent in strength of character to the whole population of the earth. Consider how, after the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, fifty days thereafter, a limited number of disciples gathered together on the Mount of Transfiguration, not far from Joppa.

The number of these was eleven; but because they gathered with hearts pure, with intention sincere, with spirits exhilarated, in the utmost sincerity, without greed, without any intentions save the desire to do the Will of God, this limited number gathered there and held a meeting upon the Mount. Because of the purity of the hearts of those souls, because of the trustworthiness of those souls, because of the reliance of those souls, because of the attraction of the hearts of those souls, the world was illumined, Christianity advanced; the Roman empire became Christianized; the Greek nation was Christianized; the Egyptian nation was converted; the Assyrians were converted, also the Chaldean nation. In other words, the illumination of His Holiness Christ illumined the whole region. All these were the blessed results of that meeting of eleven souls on the mountain. They held that meeting in the utmost of purity and sincerity, in the utmost of faith and assurance; in the utmost of attraction and zeal was that meeting held. And these colossal results were accomplished; these wondrous light were expressed, this heavenly affair was promulgated. Therefore, do not look at your limited number, that you are not capable of having a meeting the same size as other people. Remember that importance is not attached to numbers; rather what is most important concerns faith, concerns assurance, it concerns veracity, concerns firmness, concerns attention to the Kingdom of Abhá; concerns self-sacrifice in the path of God. If you attain to this, though there be but two people, remember those two people are equivalent in strength and character to the whole world. Therefore I pray, asking for your confirmation and assistance, that the aid and uplift of Bahá'u'lláh may reach you, the hosts of the Kingdom of Abhá may reinforce you, that the powerful angels of God may assist you. Be assured of the victory; rest assured that you will be confirmed: That which is of essential importance is your unity and agreement. You must be in the utmost state of unity and agreement. You must love one another; you must be self-sacrificing for one another. If you observe any shortcomings on the part of any, as much as you can, be forgiving and do not be hard. Even if you wish to admonish let your admonition be with justice, let your admonition be in symbols; do not express explicitly lest any heart should be saddened. Remember that in the world of existence there is nothing so bad as injuring the heart, for the heart of man is the place of the descent of the Merciful, and man must not at all disquiet or harm the place of the Merciful. Man must ever strive to make the hearts grateful, to rejoice the spirits, to render the thoughts radiant, to be the cause of comfort and ease of others. This is the station of the Bahá'ís, and this is the utmost desire of those who are divine. Now the friends of God in Persia have reached such a stage that each is willing to sacrifice his life for the others, each one accounting himself the servant of the others. How many of the nobles are occupied with the service of the poor! How many of the dear ones are most humble and submissive in the presence of the lowly! What is this for? It is for the Love of God. It is for sincerity. It is for faith. It is for certainty.

I came from San Francisco to see you and to visit Mr. Chase's grave. Truly Mr. Chase was a glorious personage, having no desire save the good pleasure of God. His attention was directed to the Kingdom of God. He served during his life time. He was not at all wanting in service. He compiled certain books proving the validity of the Movement. As much as he could he endeavored to guide the people. You will never forget him. May you ever pray for him, be ever respectful to his family and be a source of comfort to them. As many times as possible — at least once a year — you should make a point to visit his tomb, for his spirit will be exhilarated through the loyalty of the friends, and in the world of God will he be happy. The friends of God must be kind to one another, whether it be in life or after death.

The Blessed Beauty appeared in Persia, in Ṭīhrán. He was in the utmost ease and affluence. He was most influential and surrounded with luxury. All the pleasures of the transitory world were provided for Him, and all the grandees of Persia longed to enjoy the influence and affluence, the things of wealth and position of Bahá'u'lláh. But consider that He suffered all these things to be separated from Him. He sacrificed His Honor, His fame and His station among men; sacrificing all, even His life. Ever was He subjected to the sword, and many were the ordeals which He endured, and numerous were the disturbances to which He was subjected. How many night He passed beneath chains, and many were the days He passed in dark dungeons. When I visited the dungeon in Ṭīhrán, as a child, in order to see Bahá'u'lláh — when the door was opened there were some steps leading down into the place. They took me as far as midway. I peered through the darkness; I could not find any one; it was exceedingly gloomy. Then I heard the Blessed voice saying, “Take him away.” When I heard His voice I tried to see the Blessed Beauty, but because of the great darkness I could not. Then I was taken out; they seated me. They said it is customary, about midday, to take the prisoners out for their meals; so there I sat. About noontime the jailers were all ready and the prisoners were taken out. I saw Bahá'u'lláh's neck in chains, to another, both of them chained to the same link, one about His neck and another about the person who was chained to Him. The weight of the chains was so excessive that His neck was bent and He walked with great difficulty, and He was in a very sad condition. His clothes were tattered and battered; even the hat on His head was torn. He was in the utmost of ordeal and His health was quite visibly failing. They brought me and seated me, and they took Him to the place where there was a pond, in order that He might wash His face. After that they took Him back to the dungeon, and I, although I was a child, I was so overcome I was unconscious. And then Bahá'u'lláh said “Take the child away to the house” and therefore I was taken away.

This shows one of the ordeals of His life, and you can judge of the others accordingly. During fifty years, many were His vicissitudes. He suffered all these ordeals for us. He suffered all these catastrophes for us, that we may attain to faith; that we may attain to certainty; that we may turn to God; that we may act in accordance with His Teachings; that we may be the cause of the illumination of the world; that we may be the means of guiding the people. And now I wish that you — in the light of these sufferings of the Blessed Beauty for our guidance, for our illumination — likewise may be self-sacrificing. We must not forget His favors; we must not forget His troubles; we must not forget

His catastrophes. We must ever remember them, striving that, perchance, in thanksgiving for these favors, we may offer worthy service; we may be the cause of guiding the people; we may act in accordance with His instructions; we may live in accordance with His behests; we may forget ourselves, and that, like these holy souls who have sacrificed their lives, we may likewise sacrifice our life; we may be the cause of the heavenly peace; be the cause of the spread of His fragrances; be the cause of the spread of His Teachings. For His Teachings are the Spirit of the world; His Teachings are the cause of the order of the world; His Teachings are the cause of the life of humanity; His Teachings unify mankind; His Teachings render eternal honor to men; His Teachings are the cause of the sublimity of human nature; His Teachings cause men to attain to progress and prosperity. His Teachings are conducive to man's entrance into the Kingdom of Salvation.

All the people of the world look at us to see how we act; what our characteristics are; what our attributes are; what our mode of procedure is; They all look toward us, and we must act in such wise, we must live in such wise that we may not be the cause of the degradation of the Cause of God. Nay, rather, we must be the cause of the glory of God, and if we do not do so, how can we behold His face in His Kingdom? What shall be our apology? Did He not teach us according to His deeds? Did He not teach us through His self-sacrifice? Did He not teach us through His ordeals and difficulties? Is it meet that we should forget them? No, indeed, it is not meet, it is not loyalty, and it is not behooving at all. Thank God that He has suffered you to attain to this great bestowal. Let us praise God that he has suffered us to be sheltered beneath the Tree of Life. Let us thank God that He has accepted us in His Kingdom. Let us offer thanks to God that He has specialized us for the favor which was the utmost aim of the Holy saints. Let us thank God that, notwithstanding the lack of capacity, every favor did He bestow upon us, every grace is showered upon us, and every bounty is revealed to us. He prepared for us the good of both worlds; He prepared for us eternal honor; He gave unto us the Life everlasting; He chose us out of all the nations of the world, and He caused us to attain to that which is the sublimity of the human world. Praise God for such an attainment as this! Thank ye God that such guidance is yours! And strive with life to hold aloft the banner of the Great Guidance; to be the cause of the illumination of the East and the West; the cause of the unity of all nations; that ye may be instrumental in spreading the heavenly morals; that you may be the cause of manifesting spiritual attributes; that you may become characterized with the characteristics of the Bountiful, that you may become imbued with the qualities of the faithful; that you may be distinguished in all virtues; that you may be set aglow with the Fire of the Love of God and attracted by the Love of God.

This blessed dispensation is distinguished from all other dispensations. There are special features of it which are not to be found in all the other dispensations. In the other dispensations the doors of differences were opened, but the Blessed Perfection, in this great dispensation, closed the doors of all sorts of differences, so that no more shall there be a Catholic sect, or a Greek orthodox sect, or a Protestant sect, or an Arian sect, or a Nestorian sect. All shall be in the same faith, all shall follow along the same way. During the Christian dispensation, as recorded in the glorious Gospel, there was no distinct standard given whereby you could differentiate the false from the true. That is to say, if various sects were created it was unavoidable, as there was no standard to show what was right and what was wrong. At most, Jesus said to Peter, “Who dost thou think I am?” His Holiness Peter said “Thou art the Son of God.” And then Christ said to Peter, “Verily thou art the Rock, and upon this Rock will I build My Church.” This was the confirmation of Peter’s faith; that the faith of Peter in Christ was perfect; but He did not say, if any differences should arise, you should refer them to Peter, and whatever he says is right. He did not say that Peter was the promulgator or expounder of the Gospel. He did not say, Turn to Peter. Therefore, there were differences caused; there are various sects created; there were alienations. But the Blessed Perfection in this great dispensation, in order to close the doors of differences, and in order that no one should create any new sect, according to the explicit text of the Holy Book of Aqdas, has clearly recorded that “after I depart, turn to Him who is the Branch extending from this ancient Branch, from this Pre-existant Root.” And in the second verse, likewise, and most explicitly does He state in the Book of the Covenant, in His own handwriting, He has recorded as to whom He meant and what His purpose was regarding the “Branch extended” All the branches, all the twigs, all the relatives were addressed by Him explicitly saying that all must turn to the personage, and that personage is the expounder of the Book; that is, no one has a right to say that Bahá’u’lláh said this or that. Where in the Gospel is anything recorded like this? Now He is the expounder; whatever He expounds is correct, and beyond that it is incorrect. Likewise, in all the Tablets He says, “O God, help those souls who are firm in the Covenant! O Lord, render radiant those who hold to Thy Testament! O Lord, those who are infirm, meet them with Thy wrath! O God, be an assistant to him who is an assistant of the Center of the Covenant; help those who help Him! O God, avenge him who is wrathful to Him.” and such statements in all the Tablets and Prayers which He revealed. The Blessed Perfection saw that no dissension should take place in this dispensation. Lest there should be any dispute, He appointed a Center to ward off differences, and whatever He was to say was to be right — just to ward off the differences. Now my purpose is this, let there be no differences here, there shall be no difference of opinion or any person; The friends, who are to be the cause of the oneness of the world of humanity, should thus disagree — just as His Holiness Christ says, “Ye are the salt of the earth, and if the salt loses its saltiness, wherewith shall it be salted?”

And now, God forbid that any inharmony or disagreement should exist among the friends. How could there be unity amongst the people of the world if the friends of God are not in unity? If the friends of God be not attracted to the Kingdom of Abhá, who are to be attracted? Praise be to God! In this age the doors of disagreement have been entirely shut. Even He has said, “Whatever the International House of Justice decides upon, that is the Law of God. Why?

In order that no discord shall be created; in order that the friends of God shall be united and agreed. For this no soul shall have any opportunity. He has said, “Whatever of the texts is not explicit, the International House of Justice is the Law-giver, and the Law given by it is the Law of God, and its prohibition is the prohibition of God. Whatever the International House of Justice shall decide, if any soul should dispute, he is deprived of God’s Mercy, and I verily shun him, because the demands of the House of Justice are final. Thus He has emphasized this fact, lest in the future times there should be discord and differences of opinion, and that when these differences obtain there shall be a House of Justice to refer to. Whatever it decides upon, that is ever the Law of God, and there will be no room for disagreement. Consider how distinguished this dispensation is! This dispensation is one people; it presents one pathway. Therefore, I admonish you for God, if any soul here should disagree amongst themselves, know that these disagreements are not accepted at the Threshold of Bahá’u’lláh. If anything should happen to you, you should ask, in order that it may be decided according to the Law of God.

Again, here in America I hear so many reports and traditions attributed to Me, of which I know nothing. For example, it reaches Me here that I have said such a thing that the City of New York was to be inundated at a certain time and this city should be destroyed. Of this my spirit never dreamed. Therefore, if any soul should say anything, should prophesy, you must say “Let me have a writing on that subject; let us have some trace of His pen concerning this. If he should present to you a written statement of such a thing, then it is worthy of credence, otherwise you may know it is not from Me. This is a tradition and it is an imagination. It is a dream of the person speaking. Would I ever say such a thing as that the City of New York is to be drowned, or part of the country destroyed? Such a thing never emanated from my tongue. That which I have to utter has to do with the Blessed Writings, with spirituality. I am not an astrologer, nor am I a sorcerer, nor a fortune-teller, to speak about mountains, seas and the happenings of this world. This is only the work of astrologers; it is the function of sorcerers. It is not worthy a conscientious man, to say nothing of those who believe in God. The purpose is this, that Praise be to God! Bahá’u’lláh did not leave anything latent. He uttered that which He should and must, and we must act in accordance with His utterances; we should act in accordance with His Teachings; we must be like a pen in the writer’s hand, so that, whatever emanates from the pen must be from the writer. We must act according to the explicit texts of the Blessed Beauty, and to that which is explicit we must direct our attention. If any discord should arise, the matters must be referred to the Expounder, and whatever He says, it is His explicit text and it is correct. Otherwise He has said that, if two people disagree, both are wrong. Beware lest ye have any disagreements, beware lest you have any lukewarmness, beware lest you have any vain thoughts. Strive with your hearts to promulgate the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh; to be the cause of the illumination of the world; to be the cause of the guidance of the people; that you may be the cause of honoring the world of humanity and winning hearts to this firm purpose.

(Final word, after He turned to the door)

We talked a great deal. Good night to you all. Perchance I will leave tomorrow. I did not even have time to come as far as this, but out of love for you I came. I am hastening back to the Orient, perhaps day after to-morrow. Therefore, I beg to you not to forget me at all. Pray for me! Ask from God confirmation in my behalf. Beg for me the assistance of the Blessed Beauty, for I have a weighty burden. No one could bear what I bear. I can do nothing unless the power of His confirmation should assist me. Hence I beg of you to pray for Me ever. Supplicate, asking assistance, for my days are numbered. Ere long I shall have to say good-bye — a few days left for Me in the world. May the confirmations of the Blessed Beauty, may the assistance of Bahá'u'lláh be Mine! Perchance I may breathe in His service. Perchance I may offer worthy service. Hence I request you especially to pray for Me ever, asking confirmation in My behalf.

Sunday Morning, October 20, 1912

Some of the words spoken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Los Angeles from notes taken by Miss Mai M. Auforth.

Very welcome! Very welcome! Are you all well? Very Welcome!

Very welcome. Very, very.

I am very glad to see you all, exceedingly glad to see you. Praise be to God Bahá'u'lláh has such friends in this city, such radiant friends; such shining faces, such pure hearts is He possessed of. I am thankful, I am very, very glad to see you indeed, and I hope that in this city you may prove to be the standard of guidance; that you may be the cause of the uplift of the Cause; that you may be the means of promoting the Word of God; thus may the people declare that, indeed you are Bahá's, real Bahá's; that your attributes are glorious that your conduct is glorious as Bahá's; that your attributes are Bahá's; that your works are Bahá.

The purpose of being a Bahá is this, that man should be adorned with all the virtues of humanity. Bahá means a School, and we are the children in that School; we are the pupils in that School. And when we graduate from that School, we must have a certificate showing that we have acquired virtues; and when we are capable of graduating from that School, when we leave this world, when we hasten to the Kingdom of God, what is our certificate? It consists of good deeds — consists of attractions of the heart, it consists of philanthropies we have achieved. It is Faith, It is Knowledge, It is the love of God. It is Unity and Agreement; It is the fellowship of the hearts. This is the certificate we should carry to the Kingdom showing that in the School we have become imbued with these characteristics, and from the endless bounties of God we have been blessed. I hope that our certificate will be full and valid, and that it may show full well our achievements; that we may be enrolled on the Wonderful Scroll; in short, I hope that this visit of mine to this city shall be productive of results, and that these results may be that all humanity may enjoy the fragrances which shall emanate from your regions, that news reaching any part shall be the cause of joy to the hearts, shall be the means of dilating the breasts. Thus may all the friends thank God saying: "Praise be to God, in Los Angeles there have appeared certain Bahá'ís who are truly the radiant candles of humanity; are blessed souls; They are the means of admonishing the people, they are progressive amongst mankind; they are very ethical people; they are the cause of the shining forth of the Sun of Reality. May they all thank God; may they all desire and long to become like you.

This is My Hope; and the foundation of this is firmness in the Covenant. If you are firm in the Covenant, you may rest assured that the aid and confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh will reach you. Consider how it is in Persia. The friends of God, notwithstanding their many enemies, in their hearts are firm in God's Covenant. Day by day they are growing brighter; day by day they are becoming uplifted; day by day becoming dearer; day by day their hearts are more attentive. This is the fundamental; because firmness in the Covenant insures Bahá'í oneness. If there is no firmness in the Covenant, this Bahá'í oneness will be dissipated and the Bahá'í world will be like other worlds, like other religions, and will be subjected to various sects and creeds; and there is no greater injury to the Cause of God than this — that the Bahá'í Cause should be composed of various sects and denominations. The Blessed Perfection has uprooted the cause of this, and unless some souls outwardly stand against Bahá'u'lláh, should go contrary to His commands saying, Bahá'u'lláh did not know, that Bahá'u'lláh made a mistake, that He did not understand, why did He do this? But if you prove firm in the Covenant, the confirmation of the Kingdom of Abhá will reach you successively and assist you and will be your helper, your assistor and your confirmer, thus will these confirmations of yours under all conditions, even as it is in Persia. In Persia you have a specimen of this. See what it has done; and this was due to their firmness in the Covenant. If they had not remained firm in the Covenant now they would have been scattered entirely, there would have been no mention of it, there would have been no trace. Now you read in the papers what they are doing, what progress, what attractions are accomplished. Of what power are they possessed, what minds! That is why I speak of this, and I know that you are firm. You do not listen to the nonsense of the people for this sort of thing has always been. Read the history of Christ; read the history of the Church; consider what things have happened. They were a mighty people, but the people you have here, they are not important at all. You must be steadfast — you must be firm.

Sunday Afternoon.

Welcome, very Welcome. Are you all well? You must be happy, very, very grateful because it was very difficult for me to come and reach this part. It was beyond possibility. It was divine confirmation for me to reach here at all;

even those in the far east do not believe that I had come as far as Los Angeles. Where is 'Akká — where is Los Angeles? These regions are far away, what vast distances between them and you, distance indeed; but consider how I longed to see you wherefore, I traverse such distances across country and ocean; otherwise this great distance between Los Angeles and the far East was impossible for me, but because of excessive longing, I came. I hope this meeting will bear great results, may it be like the meeting of the rain with the earth; may it be like the meeting of the breeze with the garden; may it be like the meeting of the Sun with the mirror — May great results come from it, may wonderful traces emanate from it amongst humanity. There are many meetings, one is due to family relations, another because of commercial ends or another meeting may be for political reasons. All are due to one or another purpose, but all such meetings no results are forthcoming, anyway if they do bear results it is only temporary, not lasting. There is the meeting for the sake of God. This causes ideal attractions. It is the proclivities of the conscience and such meetings bear great results, and now praise be to God our meeting is perfect. We have no purpose, no desire, no consideration save for your assurances for the love of God and surely results will be forthcoming, they may be quick or they may be long in coming. If we turn to the Kingdom of Abhá, if we supplicate the Kingdom of Abhá, if we be lead by the difficulties of Bahá'u'lláh, if we forget ourselves, if we shun all passions and desires and, in the utmost of humility and submissiveness rely on the Kingdom of Abhá, if we achieve good deeds, undoubtedly quick results will be forthcoming, to the extent that we ourselves will be astonished. If we do not attain to this, the results will be long in coming, delayed. Other people will come and they will be able to achieve these results. At all events this is the object, there is no doubt about it, but there is the difference, whether we are enabled to accomplish it or others. We must strive to be instrumental ourselves; otherwise God has many servants, He will have other people who will be instrumental in serving, and they will serve the Kingdom of God. We must strive that this crown of glory may be placed on our heads. This is our desire.

(‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Los Angeles, October 19-20th 1912) From notes by Miss Mai M. Auforth

Last talk.

Come My Dears: Praise be to God that this city is progressive, that it is adorned with the existence of the believers. One would not have dreamt that this city contained such beautiful friends. The friends in this city are divine from every standpoint; their characteristics are very praiseworthy; their behavior is very lovely, in reality you are befitting to be known as believers of Bahá'u'lláh, and you are worthy of becoming the servants and maid-servants of Bahá'u'lláh. I have been made hopeful, looking into your faces, and I am made sure that in America believers will be found like unto the believers in Persia. These believers and these friends will advance daily; they will become superious beings, the confirmation of the Kingdom of Abhá be with you; the fragrances of the Blessed Beauty are surrounding you, the glances of The Merciful are surrounding you, the heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is with you, the spirit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is with you, the eyes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are with you. Day and night do I supplicate and entreat and call you. Be confirmed and constant, that from the fragrance and protection of Bahá’u’lláh, you may become personified spirit; that you may become embodied mind; that you may become worthy personages, that all over the world your fame may be spread; that in reality in the city of Los Angeles there are real Bahá’ís who will live in accord with the teaching of Bahá’u’lláh. Therefore they are distinguished above all other people. Their faces are illumined, their characteristics are perfumed, their hearts are brilliant, their spirits are attracted, and although they are walking on the surface of the earth, yet they are traveling in the Kingdom of God; although they are active physical bodies, yet in the Kingdom of Abhá do they soar. Day and night do I pray and entreat and commune with God that day by day you may advance; day by day you may progress spiritually; day by day you may become greater; day by day your spirituality may become brighter; may day by day you receive spiritual life so that you may attain to the highest point of your desires.

The deceased one, Mr. Chase, was a blessed soul. He was a holy reality. His station in this life was not known. Yesterday I specially took a trip to visit his shrine. At the time of visiting the shrine I found wonderful spirituality. You must celebrate yearly the day of his departure from this life, and all of you on my behalf be good and visit his blessed shrine, and if it is possible, spread a feast for the poor and give charity to those who are deprived. On that occasion mention the service which he has rendered and read passages from his works, and explain the history of his life. This is my wish of you. I have arranged that they may place a tombstone on his resting place, and have a sentence which may be engraved on that stone. I love Mr. Chase very much indeed, for his heart was pure. He had no other aim except the purpose of the Cause. He had no other thought except the Kingdom, therefore he was very much nearer to me and had the assurance of Bahá’u’lláh. He was accepted and blessed, perfect. At this very moment he is submerged in the Kingdom of heaven.

Now I say good bye, but I will never forget you. You will ever be in my memory. I will ever pray for you and beg assistance and confirmation for you.

(Late afternoon)

I desire to say farewell today as I am going to leave in a few hours, but I do not say goodbye. I repeat “Au revoir”. It is my hope that another meeting will be realized. Some of you will be fortunate enough to come to the Holy Land and will visit the Holy Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh, and there you will meet me. I will be made very happy, exceedingly happy to meet you there, for we will converse there at the heavenly court. Now, temporarily, I say to you au revoir. After my leaving this part you must arise and show the utmost firmness and conviction, for God has chosen you. The light of guidance has illumined your heart and you have become real Bahá's under the shade of His protection. You are all living, you are the bright candles of the Cause for you have discovered the Sun of Reality. You are the brilliant stars of this horizon, for you have stepped in the Kingdom of God. You are the fruitful orchard trees of this orchard, you are implanted in the rosegarden of Abhá, you are the flowers of the rose garden of significances, for you have attained to reality of the Cause of God. You should not think that you are like other people. They are dead and you are living, they are blind and you are given the power of insight. They are deaf, and you are given the power of hearing, they are mute and you are given the power of speech, and the signs of these bounties will appear in the future. Your lights will flood their world in the future. For the present, it is like unto a gardener who scatters seed in the field. In the future these seed will grow and develop; they will grow into beautiful trees with overshadowing branches, and they will bring forth blossoms and fruits. Then all the people will be astonished, and you will be astonished thinking what wonderful bounty has been bestowed upon you, what a great bestowal and what a wonderful gift; what outpouring of heaven and what divine effulgence. You will be astonished, and all the people will be astonished. Just as this condition is realized today in Persia. The believers of God are astonished, and the people are astonished.

It is My great hope that under the protection of the True one you may always be protected; that you may be submerged in the sea of Divine Mercy; that you will be set aglow with the fire of His love, that you may be resuscitated with the water of eternal life. Day by day you may develop in spiritual life, so that you may attain to the apex of the Kingdom, and there you may witness the lights of the Kingdom of God.

Be happy! Be rejoiced! Live! If you are not Happy who on earth will be happy? If you are not rejoiced, who will be rejoiced? If you are not illumined, who will be illumined? If you are not honored, who will be honored? Are you not getting the wonderful bounties surrounding you? You will attain to wonderful spirit. You will receive new power; you will soar.

Know this for a certainty. The darkness will not be dispelled except through the light of Bahá'u'lláh, and this tribulation cannot be calmed save through the tranquility bestowed by Bahá'u'lláh.

San Francisco, Monday Morning, October 14, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

I want to tell you a remarkable story — the strangest of the strange — so that you may have an illustration of the great power of the cause of God.

When we were exiled from Persia our family was in a most sad condition, though formerly Bahá'u'lláh had enjoyed great affluence. By exiling us and confiscating all our estates the government hoped to blot out the family.

At the time of our exile the most noteworthy man, the first man of Persia, was Mírzá Áqá Khán, the prime minister. All the important officials of the country were related to him, and his family, having affairs in their hands, virtually ruled the nation.

It was the custom of the prime minister to hold late conferences with the members of his family, and one night, when all were assembled together, his son, who was minister of the treasury, commented most regretfully upon the episode of Bahá'u'lláh's exile, saying, "What a pity it is that such a noteworthy family should be annihilated because of the acceptance of such a faith!" The prime minister asked, "What art thou saying?" The son answered: "I was just expressing my regret that the distinguished family of Bahá'u'lláh, one whose lineage is of the most ancient in Persia, should be thus destroyed. I feel very sad at heart." The father said: "Dost thou realize what thou art saying, my son? I say to thee that verily it is our family that will be destroyed. Let me tell you this: when a family meets destruction in the path of religion, that destruction is in reality construction. So have no regret for them, because it is our family that will be obliterated."

That conversation took place fifty years ago, and I have just received a letter from Ṭíhrán from a Bahá'í who writes:

"The palace that was occupied by Mírzá Khán, who was prime minister at the time of Bahá'u'lláh's exile, is now the home of a Bahá'í friend. On account of governmental changes it had to be sold. The famous council chamber, which is built in the gorgeous style of the architecture of ancient Persia will accommodate one thousand persons, and in this room, on the evening of the fifth of September, we held a most wonderful conference of Bahá'ís. There were present many members of the great families. Following the program of the West, we arranged the meeting systematically. Many persons spoke from the platform, and several of the addresses you have given in America were read."

This meeting occurred in the very room in which the prime minister had made his great prophecy. And so it has come to pass. His family has perished, and the power of the cause of God has become evident!

THE UNITY FEAST

Oakland, 9 P. M., October 16, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

(‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke as he walked about among the tables, at which were seated Bahá'ís from California, Oregon, Washington, San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, Fruitvale, Piedmont, Mill Valley, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle and Spokane.)

Praise be to God, you are the guests of Mrs. Goodall, who with greatest love has prepared this bountiful feast. The effulgence of the mercy of Bahá'u'lláh is resplendent. The hearts are attracted to the love of God. The eyes are turning toward the kingdom of Abhá. This is an excellent meeting, a heavenly feast. The Supreme Concourse is now beholding this assemblage, proclaiming aloud: “Blessed are you! Blessed are you! Blessed are you who are the servants of Bahá’u’lláh! Blessed are you who are the manifestors of faith! Blessed are you who have such radiant countenances! Blessed are you whose hearts are like unto rose gardens!”

Consider what a favor, what a great bounty has been bestowed upon you, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is now circumambulating this meeting, commemorating Bahá’u’lláh, and greeting each and all of you in the utmost love.

In the human world there are two types of susceptibilities, one being physical, the other spiritual. The physical susceptibilities have certain channels of expression, and the spiritual susceptibilities likewise have their avenues of expression.

The physical susceptibilities have their channels of expression in the material world, for the earthly bond among men is due either to family relationship or to commercial, political, racial or patriotic interests. These are the avenues of expression for physical susceptibilities and ordinary outward love. But spiritual susceptibilities, real love and heavenly fraternity, are expressed through divine channels, because they emanate from faith, from knowledge, from the bounty of the Holy Spirit, from the effulgence of the Sun of Reality.

Praise be to God, you are endowed with spiritual susceptibilities, for verily you have been gathered together in this meeting through the love of God. You have been drawn together through the power of attraction. You have been summoned to this feast through the bounty of the Kingdom of Abhá. You have been called here by the Most Great Guidance. This is the evidence of your spiritual susceptibilities.

His Holiness Christ on a certain eve gathered the disciples at this table and revealed unto them special prophecies and admonitions. As a result of those admonitions and benedictions, that supper was called the Lord’s supper and inasmuch as the material blessings were provided and the heavenly manna was descending upon them, it was verily the Lord’s supper.

This evening you are gathered together and are seated at this bounteous table. Praise be to God, the material food is provided, and the heavenly manna which consists in the word of God and in the love of God is descending. You are turned toward the kingdom of God; you are overshadowed beneath the providence of God; you are surrounded by the eternal bounty and by the light everlasting. Therefore this supper is heavenly in character, and I earnestly hope that from it may be realized results such as followed the Lord’s supper — that supper which was administered in the greatest unity and love and in severance from all else save God. May you associate with one another in perfect fellowship and friendship; may you rejoice in many such feasts; may your hearts be exhilarated, and may your faces be turned toward the kingdom of Abhá. You will then be instrumental in reconciling all religions and all races, and in creating a bond that will unite all nations. Thus the tent of the oneness of humanity shall be pitched in the very center of the world, and the standard of universal peace shall be unfurled and wave over all the earth. Therefore in future times there will be no doubt as to this supper having been a Lord's supper, because it will have been a cause of spiritual illumination and a means of engendering amity and love, for every supper that is productive of love and unity, international peace, and the solidarity of mankind, is undoubtedly a Lord's supper.

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh shone forth from the horizon of the Orient, even as the sun, casting a radiance over the world. During his lifetime he did not rest a moment, nor did he repose comfortably a single night. He suffered many trials. He was imprisoned. He was enchained. He was exiled. All these ordeals he endured in order that perfect fellowship and love might blend the hearts together. Praise be to God, the tribulations of Bahá'u'lláh have not been in vain, for love has been created in your hearts and you are associating in spiritual unity. I hope that you may be the cause of transforming the whole world into a feast like unto this, whereby the hearts may be welded together and the lives of all mankind may be as glad tidings. Humanity may then be likened unto a tree, all men being as its branches, twigs, blossoms and fruits. This is my hope. It is also yours.

In the utmost joy partake of this feast.

Supplication following the feast

O kind Lord, verily this assemblage is longing for thee and is loving thy beauty. Verily these friends are set aglow with the fire of thy love, and are joyful because of thy presence. They are turned toward thy kingdom, seeking naught but to deserve thine approval, desiring naught but to pursue thy pathway and to do thy will. Not a day passes but they are occupied with thy commemoration and are ever eager to serve thee.

O God, illumine these hearts. O God, make joyous these lives.

O Lord, aid these souls to attain to the superlative degree in the world of humanity. O Lord, assist these souls to become spiritually distinguished, to become the manifestors of thy favor and the recipients of thy bountiful gifts. Shine upon them with thy radiant splendor, waft over them the breeze of thy providence, and shower upon them the rain of thy bestowals from the clouds of thy generosity. Thus shall they grow, like the flowers of a rose garden, in beauty and perfection, and among all mankind shall they radiate spiritual fragrances.

O Lord, confirm these souls in thy service, and help them to guide others to thee. Brighten their eyes through witnessing thy great signs, fill their ears with harmonies through thy melodies, and refresh their nostrils through the fragrances of thy kingdom.

Gather these souls beneath the tabernacle of the oneness of the world of humanity, and confer upon them the life everlasting.

Verily thou art the Almighty. Verily thou art the Powerful. Verily thou art the Bestower.

Are you all well? Are you all happy? If you be not happy, who could be happy?

Look at the people of the world and observe them carefully. You will see that they are like farmers or gardeners, and though life to all these farmers is very dear yet they are planting the seed of life in poor soil or in sterile ground. The seeds sown in sterile ground are absolutely of no value. Those that are sown in poor soil will grow a while, but later they will wither away and be without result.

A worldly man, if he reviews his past life, may soliloquize thus: "I have been in the world a long time and I have toiled day and night. I have sown many seeds, but what are the results?" He discovers that he is absolutely empty handed. What greater remorse could be imagined? What greater misfortune could there be? What greater deprivation is there than this? Consider it carefully. Is it not true? At his death mention will be made of him for only two or three days at most. It will be said that So-and-so was a good man, nothing more.

Praise be to God, you are sowing your seeds in fertile and most blessed soil, wherein they will grow and flourish and yield good fruit. The harvest will be boundless and everlasting. If you be not happy, who could be happy? You have entered the world in the day of Bahá'u'lláh. You have hearkened to the summons of Bahá'u'lláh. You have turned to the kingdom of Bahá'u'lláh and are manifesting the favors of Bahá'u'lláh. Verily the light of the Most Great Guidance has become iridescent in your hearts, and in the wilderness of the world you are proving to be fruitful trees. What reward is greater than this? This is a great bounty, a great bestowal. If you be not happy, who could be happy? If you be not attracted, who could be attracted? If you be not radiant, who could be radiant? If you fly not away with joy, who could fly away?

I have been out for a walk. After speaking all morning and all afternoon I was in need of fresh air. I walked for nearly an hour.

Motion is very good. Motion is a sign of life. Stagnation is a sign of death. All forms of life are in motion. There are various kinds of motion. All the stars in great firmament are in motion. Even the sun, with its numerous satellites revolving around it, has its motion. Everything is constantly moving. The earth is revolving on its own axis. The moon is revolving around the earth. The earth, with the moon, revolves around the sun, and on a larger scale the sun, with its satellites, revolves in another orbit. In brief, all these infinite bodies are constantly moving. All the atoms of existence are traveling, having either a special motion or a general motion.

Lack of motion in any form of life is a sign of mortality. Any form of life that is motionless is subject to disintegration. Still water becomes stagnant. Air that is motionless becomes stale and impure. One who does not exercise will be attacked by disease. A tree that is not subjected to the motion of breezes will become dry. Therefore all forms of life must be constantly in motion.

There are other kinds of motion. One is a local motion, which is dependent upon condition. For example, the turning of wine into vinegar. A second is an essential motion, such as when the body of man develops into maturity. Another is a spiritual motion, which is the attraction of the hearts.

The real foundation of all motion is spiritual motion. It is the essence of all motion. The results of other motions are limited, but the results of spiritual motion are unlimited, because divine virtues are unlimited. The results of spiritual motion are infinite, because divine virtues are infinite. Hence for you I desire this spiritual motion.

When machinery is set in motion there are results, otherwise there are no results. Likewise, as long as man is moving with the spiritual motion there is life and he is advancing, but as soon as he stands still he ceases to progress spiritually.

Therefore you must strive that you may be constantly moving forward. Strive that you may be constantly exhilarated by the wafting of the breezes of the grace of God. This is my advice. This is my counsel to you.

A long time ago His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh wrote an epistle in which he said that man must attain to such a condition that his spirit will be soaring though he is sitting in a state of tranquility and serenity. That is the kind of sitting that is like unto walking. That is the kind of serenity that is really motion. That is the kind of tranquility that is really flying.

- At the grave of Mr. Thornton Chase. *

O my God! O my God! Verily this was a servant of thine, who believed in thee and in thy signs. Verily he harkened to thy summons, turned to thy Kingdom, and with a contrite heart humbled himself at thy holy threshold. He arose to serve thy cause, to spread thy fragrances, to promote thy word, and to expound thy wisdom. Verily he guided the people to thine ancient pathway, and led them to thy way of rectitude. Verily he held the chalice of guidance in his right hand, and he gave to drink of this cup of favor unto those who were athirst. He journeyed to thy lofty threshold where He laid his forehead on the fragrant soil of thy garden, and circumambulated thy glorious and sublime abode. The traces of his visit and the fragrances of his loyalty are evident. He proclaimed thy name among the people of this vast country until his outward sensation was suspended and his respiration ceased, and he returned to thee with a heart throbbing with love, and with eyes opened to thy guidance.

O Lord! O Lord! Submerge him in the ocean of thy glory. O Lord! O Lord! Usher him into thy delectable garden. O Lord! O Lord! Usher him into thy lofty paradise, and cause him to be present in thy meeting of transfiguration. O Lord! Submerge him in the ocean of thy lights.

Verily thou art the Clement. Verily thou art the Merciful, the Precious, the Omnipotent.

Following the prayer ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

Mr. Chase was of the blessed souls. The best of his life was spent in the path of God. He had no other aim than to do the will of the Lord and no other desire than to attain to the kingdom of God. During his lifetime he bore many trials and vicissitudes, but he was very patient and long-suffering. He had a heart most illumined, a spirit most joyous. He was led by the lights of guidance. He desired to serve the world of humanity, and was unfailing in his effort, until at last he witnessed the lights of the kingdom of Abhá. He summoned the people to the religion of God, and aided them to enter into the Kingdom. He wrote books and articles regarding the proofs and evidences of the manifestations of Bahá’u’lláh. In truth, he left behind him certain signs that will never be forgotten throughout ages and cycles. In truth, this personage was worthy of respect. He was worthy to be honored by pilgrimages of the friends to his grave. The traces of his life will ever shine. He was a personage who will not be forgotten. At present his worth is not known, but in the future it will be inestimably dear. His sun will ever shine; his star will ever bestow light. The people will honor this grave.

Therefore the friends of God must visit this grave, and on my behalf bring flowers and beseech for him a sublime spiritual station. They must have the utmost consideration for the members of his family. This personage will never be forgotten.

Welcome! Welcome! Are you all well? Are you all happy? I am very happy to see you all. I have come from a far distant point to see you, and I am very happy to find you in good health, enjoying the fragrance of spirituality, and I hope that, God willing, your happiness may be complete, that every day a new joy may be added unto you, that God may protect you beneath the shelter of his care and providence, and that each day you may witness a new confirmation. May each of you become like a fruitful tree, increasing in verdure and freshness and finally yielding luscious fruits. May you become enriched through the treasury of the kingdom, acquiring boundless bestowals. May you guide the souls to God.

Thus Los Angeles will become a city of God, a center of the kingdom of God. If the friends of God act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, become confirmed in guiding the nations, ever serving the cause of the oneness of the world of humanity and ever offering their assistance toward the establishment of international peace, undoubtedly Los Angeles will become a center of the kingdom, the lights of divinity will shine, the heavenly manna will descend, and you will attain to that which was the utmost desire of sages and heavenly ones.

Los Angeles, 4 P. M., October 19, 1912

Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab, Interpreter

You are most welcome. Are you well? Very happy? Are you attracted to the kingdom? I came especially to see you, that I might know how you are, that I might inquire about your health and your faith, and ascertain whether you are engaged in the service of the kingdom of God. It was a great exertion for me to come here. It was very difficult; nevertheless I came, because I love you so much, but I cannot remain long.

It is my earnest hope that great results will be the outcome of these meetings, because in these days seeds are being sown. The Blessed Perfection scattered the seeds in the Orient, and we who are his servants have watered those seeds. Those seeds have developed so rapidly day by day that now they are very strong plants, and we have almost the harvest. Likewise you must water the seeds which are being sown in this day[a14], so that they may grow and develop and attain to fruition, in order that in the West also there may be a harvest.

Every sowing is in need of irrigation to cause the growth and development of the seeds. To-day the vineyard of the kingdom is irrigated by the water of the covenant. The seeds will not grow and develop except by this water. No matter how otherwise irrigated, they will not grow, but will perish.

The believers must be confirmed in the covenant, and they must know for a certainty that to-day there is no greater necessity than to be confirmed in the covenant of God. That which issues from the Center of the Covenant is the truth, which is unchangeable, and that which issues from his pen is true and everlasting. All contrary thereto is like parasitic growths having no roots. Such growths may live for two days, or five days, or ten days, but at the first breeze they wither. This has been proved in former dispensations.

If you desire that this vineyard of God be ever verdant and luxuriant, that day by day it may grow and advance, and that there may be many harvests, you must always irrigate this orchard with the water of firmness in the covenant. Then you will witness the results and taste of the fruits. You must take fast hold of that which emanates from the Center of the Covenant. That which issues from my lips, and that which is written by my pen is reality. With that you can water the vineyard of God. With that you can cultivate the tree of the Cause of God.

Through this the name of the kingdom of God will be spread over the world. Through this the Sun of Reality will shine. Through this the clouds of mercy will shower.

I have great love for you, and my hope is that you may attain to the essence of your desires and obtain the desire of your hearts.

***** Get translation from Aḥmad[a15] so that each of you may become a candle, literally a light of guidance, and a manifestor of power. As Bahá'ís you will be accepted as a proof of Bahá'u'lláh. What wonderful words of instruction! This is a miracle of Bahá. It is unlimited teaching. You must be newly created. You must not be the same as you were before you became Bahá'ís. A transformation must take place. Your words must be changed, your name must be changed, your very being must be transformed, just as when a child is born from the matrix of the mother into this world. Day by day you must grow. Day by day you must develop. Day by day you must attain to beauty. Day by day you must draw nearer to maturity. This is the new birth. When a man is attracted to the fragrances of God and becomes a Bahá'í, showing forth certain signs, then he is born out of the matrix of night into the kingdom. Day by day he becomes more illumined, more attracted, more wise, and his love to God becomes more manifest. This is the real proof.

I have come from a far country just to see the Bahá'ís, and I have found great joy in meeting you. My hope is that daily you may become more radiant, that your perceptions may be quickened, that the fruits of the world of humanity may become more evident in you, that you may advance. You must associate together in love. Whenever you meet let your conversation be heavenly in character. Speak of reality. Speak of the history of the prophets and of the reality of the religions of God. Speak of the history of Bahá'u'lláh and of the proof of the Blessed Perfection. Each one of you should strive with all your heart to become a manifestor of God's inspiration.

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

This is a good gathering, a good meeting. This assemblage is an assemblage of God, for it is not convened for any worldly purpose; any commercial or political purpose, nor for any other material purpose, but purely for the sake of God. Therefore I am very pleased. I am very glad to find in this city such an assemblage for you are firmly united and have no other desire than to serve the cause of God. You have responded to the call of the kingdom of Abhá. Your purpose is to illumine the world of humanity and direct mankind to the universal guidance. Surely this assemblage is blessed. The various nations of the world are submerged in a sea of materialism, having no purpose except material gain, and striving for naught except the realization of their own ends.

However, any assemblage that is possessed of spiritual susceptibilities and attractions of the conscience, and that has turned to the kingdom, is a Bahá'í assemblage. The people of the world are submerged in a sea of materialism. But the Sun of Reality has shone upon you; the breezes of favor have blown toward you, heavenly manna has descended upon you; the signs of God have been revealed unto you; the confirmations of the Blessed Beauty have surrounded you; you have harkened to the admonitions of God, and you are pursuing the right pathway. Therefore you must thank God for having become the manifestors of such boundless bestowals, for having become a proof of Bahá'u'lláh. I hope that you may continue to act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh so that the lights of this assemblage will be witnessed in the world, that you will guide great numbers of people to unity and that you will be instrumental in establishing universal peace.

Do not look at your small number now. Number is not of importance. The bounty of God and the confirmation of the heavenly kingdom are the essentials. Consider how in past times a small number has widened its circle to such proportions as finally to include many nations. Consequently quality is essential, not number. If a few be possessed of hearts that are pure and tender they are equivalent in strength of character to the whole population of the earth.

Reflect how the disciples gathered together on the Mount of Olives forty days after the resurrection of Jesus Christ. Their hearts were pure, their desires unselfish, their intentions sincere, their spirits exhilarated. Because of their purity, trustworthiness, firmness and attraction, Christianity advanced and the light of His Holiness Christ illumined the whole world. This was the blessed result of that meeting of eleven souls on the mountain. Therefore do not be concerned about your limited number. Remember that importance is not attached to number but to the acquirement of faith, assurance, firmness, attraction to the kingdom of Abhá, and self-sacrifice in the path of the kingdom; and though only two souls attain to such a station yet they are equivalent in strength of character to the whole world. Hence I shall pray for you, that you may be confirmed and assisted, that the aid of Bahá'u'lláh may uplift you, that the hosts of the kingdom of Abhá may reinforce you, that the powerful angels of God may assist you. Be assured of confirmation. Be assured of victory.

The unity of this assembly is an essential necessity. You must love one another. You must be self-sacrificing. When you observe the shortcomings of any one you must be forgiving, and not harsh. Even though you desire to admonish, let your admonition be in symbols. Do not express disapproval explicitly, lest any heart should be saddened. Remember that in the world of existence there is nothing so wrong as to injure a heart, for the heart of man is the home of the Merciful, and we must not disturb or harm that home. We must ever strive to cheer the hearts, to illumine the thoughts, to bring joy to the spirits, and to be a cause of comfort to others. This is the station of the Bahá'í.

In Persia the friends of God have reached such a degree of unity that they are willing to sacrifice their lives for one another, for each one considers himself a servant of the others. How many of the nobles are occupied in serving the poor! How many of the dear ones are most humble and submissive in the presence of the lowly! Such service emanates from faith, sincerity, certainty, the love of God.

I came from San Francisco to see you and to visit the grave of Mr. Chase. Truly Mr. Chase was a glorious soul. He had no desire except to please God. His attention was directed to the kingdom of God. He served the cause of God unceasingly. He compiled many books proving the validity of the Bahá'í movement. He constantly endeavored to guide the people. You will never forget him. You must ever pray for him, be respectful to his family, and be a source of comfort to them. At least once a year, or as often as possible, you should make it a point to visit his tomb, for his spirit will be exhilarated and will be made happy through your loyalty. The friends of God must be kind toward one another, both during life and after death.

The Blessed Beauty was born in Tīhrán amid the greatest ease and affluence. He was surrounded with luxuries, and all the pleasures of the transitory world were provided for him. He was most influential, and the grandees of Persia longed to enjoy similar influence, affluence and position. But consider how all these things were taken away from him. He lived constantly under the menace of the sword. Many were the ordeals that he endured, and great were the indignities to which he was subjected. Many were the days he spent under chains and in dungeons. For fifty years he suffered all these ordeals for us. He sacrificed his honor, his fame, his station among men, and even his life. He suffered all these catastrophes for us, that we might attain to faith and certainty, that we might turn to God and act in accordance with his teachings, that we might guide the people and thereby illumine the world. In the light of these sufferings of the Blessed Beauty for our guidance and illumination, we must be self-sacrificing. We must not forget his favors. We must not forget his ordeals. We must ever remember them and strive to offer worthy service in thanksgiving for his favors. We must live and act in accordance with his instructions, and endeavor to establish the heavenly peace. We must forget ourselves, and like those holy souls who sacrificed their lives for this cause we too must sacrifice life. We must spread the fragrance of his teachings, for they are the spirit of the age. They give life to humanity, unite mankind, and create order in the world. They are conducive to the progress and prosperity of man and to the sublimity of human nature. They bestow eternal honor upon man and guide him into the kingdom of salvation.

People will look at us and observe our actions. Therefore we must take heed that we do nothing that will degrade the cause of Bahá'u'lláh. Did he not teach us by deeds? Did he not teach us through ordeals and self-sacrifice? Is it meet that we should forget? No, indeed, that would not be loyalty.

Let us praise God that he has suffered us to be sheltered beneath the tree of life. Let us thank God that he has accepted us in his kingdom, and that he has bestowed upon us the favor that was the utmost desire of the holy saints. Let us thank God that notwithstanding our lack of capacity every favor has been bestowed upon us, every grace has been showered upon us, and every bounty has been revealed unto us. He has prepared for us the blessings of both worlds. He has prepared for us eternal honor. He has given unto us the life everlasting, and he has chosen us from all the nations of the world to attain to the sublime in the human world. Praise God for such guidance and attainment. You must strive through life to hold aloft the banner of the great guidance, to illumine the East and the West, to unite all nations, to spread the heavenly virtues, to manifest the spiritual attributes, to become imbued with the characteristics of the faithful and of the holy ones, to be distinguished in all virtues, and to be aglow with the fire of the love of God.

This blessed dispensation is distinguished by special features from all former dispensations. In other dispensations the door has been open to differences, but in this great dispensation the Blessed Perfection has closed the door upon all differences, so that no longer shall there exist sects such as Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Protestant, Arian or Nestorian, for all shall be of the same faith and shall follow the same path. In the holy Kitáb el Aqdas the Blessed Perfection explicitly recorded that after his departure the Bahá'ís should turn to the branch extended from the Pre-existent Root. But in the glorious gospel of the Christian dispensation there was no such standard appointed, and hence divisions into the various sects was unavoidable. At most it is recorded that when Jesus asked Peter, "Whom say ye that I am?" and Peter replied, "Thou art Christ, the son of the living God," Jesus then said to Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." But this was merely a confirmation of Peter's faith. Jesus did not say that difference should be referred to Peter and that his decision would be final. He did not say, "Turn to Peter; he is the expounder of the gospel." Therefore, when differences arose, various sects resulted. But the Blessed Perfection provided against dissension in this dispensation. In the Kitáb el Ahd, in his own handwriting, he recorded whom he meant and what his purpose was regarding the "branch". All the branches, all the twigs, all the relatives, were commanded by him to turn to that personage whom he appointed to be the expounder of the books. Furthermore, in many tablets the Blessed Perfection said, "O God, help those souls who are firm in the covenant! O Lord, make radiant those who hold to thy testament. O God, assist those who assist the Center of the Covenant, and woe be unto those who oppress him." To prevent disputes he appointed the Center of the Covenant to be the expounder of the books, his interpretation to be accepted as absolute, and after him the Bahá'ís are to defer to the International House of Justice as authority. Whenever there is a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the texts the matter is to be referred to it and its decision shall be final. But God forbid that inharmony or disagreement should exist among the friends. How could there be unity among the people of the world if the friends of God should disagree? Has His Holiness Christ not said, "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savor wherewith shall it be salted?" Praise be to God that in this dispensation the door of disagreement has been entirely closed. This dispensation is for a united people. It presents one pathway. Therefore, in the name of God I repeat that disagreements are not acceptable at the threshold of the Blessed Perfection, and if discord should arise the matter should be referred to the Center of the Covenant and whatever he may say will be the truth.

In this connection I desire to mention another important point. Since my arrival in America I have heard many reports of strange prophecies that have been reputed to have emanated from me. For example, it has reached me that I have prophesied the inundation of the city of New York at a certain time, whereas my spirit never dreamed of such a thing. I am not of the astrologers, sorcerers and fortune tellers who deal with the happenings of this world. My utterances concern spirituality and the blessed writings. Hence you must not accept any statement purporting to have come from me unless it bears my written signature.

Praise be to God, the Blessed Perfection did not leave anything obscure. We must act in accordance with his commands and teachings. We must be like a pen in a writer's hand, so that whatever emanates from that pen will be from the writer. We must act according to the explicit texts of the Blessed Beauty, and he has said that if two people disagree both are wrong. Beware of disagreements. Beware of apathy. Beware of selfish thoughts. Strive with all your heart to promulgate the teachings of the Blessed Perfection. Thus you will guide and illumine the people and be an honor to the world of humanity.

You are very welcome. I hope you are well and happy. I am exceedingly glad to see you all. How thankful I am to find that Bahá'u'lláh has in Los Angeles so many friends whose faces are radiant and whose hearts are pure. I hope that you may become standards of guidance, that you may upraise the banner of the Cause, that you may spread the word of God. Thus you will become known as real Bahá'ís through your glorious words and deeds, for as Bahá'ís we should be adorned with all the human virtues. We are pupils in the school of Bahá'u'lláh, and when we finish that school and hasten to the kingdom of God we should have a certificate to show that through the endless bounties of God we have acquired all these virtues. That certificate will consist in good deeds, attraction of the hearts, benevolence, faith, knowledge, love of God and spiritual unity. I hope that our names may be enrolled on a wonderful scroll, and that our certificates may be complete and valid. In short, I hope that this visit of mine may be productive of such results that news of you will give joy to the hearts, and that all humanity may benefit by the spiritual fragrances that shall emanate from this region. The friends will then thank God that among the Bahá'ís of this city there are blessed, progressive, spiritual souls who are truly as radiant candles, who are a proof of Bahá'u'lláh, and they will long to become like you.

Attainment to such an enviable station is dependent upon firmness in the covenant. Be assured that if you remain firm in the covenant you will be confirmed by Bahá'u'lláh. Consider the high station attained by the Persian Bahá'ís. Notwithstanding their enemies, they have day by day become more attentive, illumined and uplifted and dearer to God; but had they not remained firm in the covenant they would now be divided and no trace of the Cause would remain. Firmness in the covenant insures Bahá'í oneness. Unless the Bahá'ís remain firm great injury will befall the Cause, even as the other religions have become divided into numerous sects and denominations. However, the Blessed Perfection has provided against such a possibility by appointing a center of the covenant, and if you be firm in this center you will be assisted under all conditions by the successive confirmations of the kingdom of Abhá.

I speak of this because I know that you are firm. The history of Christ and of the church teaches that though the opposers of Christ were a mighty people yet they could do nothing to prevent the progress of his cause. Therefore, in this dispensation, it is incumbent upon the Bahá'ís to be firm.

Welcome! Are you all well? You must be very happy and grateful, as it has been exceedingly difficult for me to come so far. The friends in the Orient could scarcely realize that I have traveled so far west as Los Angeles. It has been well nigh impossible for me to come such a great distance, but because of my excessive longing to see you I have been able through the divine confirmation to meet you here. Therefore I hope that this meeting will bear great results. May it be like the meeting of the rain with the earth. May it be like the meeting of the breeze with the garden. May it be like the meeting of the sun with the mirror. May wonderful traces emanate from it.

In the world of humanity there are many meetings. If they be due only to family, commercial or political bonds the results will be but temporary, but if they be held for the sake of God they will undoubtedly bear everlasting fruit. Praise be to God, our meeting is based upon faith, assurance, ideal attractions, susceptibilities of the conscience, and the love of God; therefore it will never be forgotten.

If we turn to the kingdom of Abhá, if we become characterized with the Bahá'í qualities, if we renounce all selfish passions and desires, if we achieve good deeds, and in humility and submissiveness supplicate at the threshold of Abhá, the results will come so quickly as to astonish us. But if we neglect to take advantage of our opportunities there will be no immediate results. However, God has many servants who will arise to accomplish that which we should have done. But we must earnestly and prayerfully strive to have the crown of glory placed upon our heads. This should be our desire. There is no doubt about the results. The only question is who shall be instrumental in accomplishing them. The Cause of God is like unto a fruitful tree. It is destined to bear fruit. If we be faithful in service, it will bear fruit quickly, otherwise it will bear no fruit for us. It matters not to the tree, but it is of importance to us.

We must ask God to confirm us. If there be one blessed soul entirely freed from attachment to the earth and its superstitions, that one is better than a thousand people without deeds; one active servant is preferable to a thousand inactive and useless persons. There is a difference between one who sits at home doing nothing and one who is striving, running, active and putting forth all his efforts. Surely the latter will attain great results. God loves those who work in his kingdom, and as long as we live we must strive to be active in the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. We must always strive to draw nearer to God and to guide others to God. We must be thoughtful of serving humanity, because there is no service greater than attracting souls to God.

I desire to say farewell to you to-day, as I shall leave within a few hours. I shall not say good-by but au revoir. It is my hope that another meeting may be realized. Some of you may be fortunate enough to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Threshold of Bahá'u'lláh, and I shall be exceedingly happy to meet you at that heavenly court. Therefore I say au revoir. After my departure you must manifest the utmost firmness and conviction. God has chosen you. The light of guidance has illumined your hearts. You have become acceptable to Bahá'u'lláh. You are living under the shade of his protection. You are the bright candles of his cause, for you have turned toward the Sun of Reality. You are the radiant stars of his horizon, for you have stepped into the kingdom of God. You are fruitful trees in his orchard. You are flowers in the rose garden of Abhá, for you have comprehended the reality of the Cause of God. In this you differ from worldly people. They are dead, but you are living, they are blind, but you have the power of insight; they are deaf, but you have the power of hearing; they are mute, but you have the power of speech. The signs of these bounties will appear in the future and their lights will flood the world. This is the seed sowing season. Seeds scattered now will develop into fruitful trees, with overshadowing branches that will bring forth blossoms and fruits. This condition has already been realized in Persia. Consider what a wonderful bounty, what an outpouring of heaven, what a divine effulgence has been bestowed upon you.

It is my great hope that you may be always under the protection of the True One, that you may be submerged in the sea of his divine mercy, that you may be set aglow with the fire of his love, that you may be resuscitated with the water of eternal life, that day by day you may develop in spiritual life, and that you may become shining lights in the kingdom of God.

Be happy! Rejoice! Laugh! If you be not happy, who could be happy? If you rejoice not, who could rejoice? If you be not illumined, who could be illumined? If you be not honored, who could be honored? If you could understand the wonderful bounties with which you have been surrounded by Bahá'u'lláh, you would receive a new power and would aspire and attain to a new spirit!

Praise be to God, Los Angeles is a progressive city. It is adorned with the presence of the believers. You are spiritually distinguished. Your characters are praiseworthy. Your behavior is very commendable. In truth, you are fittingly known as followers of Bahá'u'lláh, and you are worthy to be servants and maid-servants of his Cause. From what I see in your faces I am hopeful and assured that the believers in America will become like unto the believers in Persia, and that you will become more spiritual day by day. The confirmations of the kingdom of Abhá are with you; the favors of the Blessed Perfection surround you; the glances of the Merciful are directed toward you. My heart is with you; my spirit is with you; my eyes are upon you. Day and night I supplicate that through the providence and protection of Bahá'u'lláh you may be confirmed and assisted to become embodied mind and personified spirit, that your fame may be spread throughout the world, that in this city there may be real Bahá'ís who live and act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Thus you will be distinguished above all other people, for your faces will be illumined, your characters will be perfumed, your hearts will be attracted, your spirits will be radiant, and though you be still captives in physical bodies yet you will soar in the kingdom of God. Day and night do I commune with God and entreat that your knowledge may daily become greater and that you may attain to the highest degree of spiritual life.

Honor Mr. Chase, who recently passed away, was a blessed soul. His was a holy reality. His station in this life was not known. Yesterday I went to Inglewood Cemetery for the purpose of visiting his tomb, and there I found wonderful spirituality. You must commemorate his departure from this life and on my behalf annually visit his blessed tomb. It is my wish that you explain the history of his life, mention the services he has rendered, and read passages from his books. If possible, spread a feast for the poor, and in charity give to those who are needy. I loved Mr. Chase very much. His heart was pure. He had no other aim than service to the Cause. He had no other thought except service in the kingdom. Therefore he was very near to me, and he has been accepted at the threshold of Bahá'u'lláh. The Blessed Perfection has invited him to the kingdom. At this very moment he is submerged in the sea of the bounty of Bahá'u'lláh. I have arranged for a tombstone to be erected on his resting place, and have written the inscription to be carved on it.

I now say good-by to all of you. At five o'clock I leave the hotel. I shall never forget you. You will ever be in my memory. I shall ever pray for you and beg for you assistance and confirmation.

This morning we were speaking of the fact that God never leaves anything unexplained. He will make everything manifest, even though it may remain hidden for a long time. For example, certain holy personages dwelling among us may not be appreciated during their lifetime, but after their departure from this life their reality will become manifest. Such a one was Mary Magdalene. The greatness of her station was not known during her lifetime, but after nineteen hundred years God has made it clear that this woman was the most steadfast of all the followers of His Holiness Christ. After the crucifixion his disciples were greatly agitated, even Peter who, although he had denied His Holiness Christ to be, was considered the chief of the apostles, but this marvelous woman caused them to become firm and steadfast. Through the power of her faith they were able to see that though the body of Christ had been crucified yet his spirit or reality had not suffered but was with them still; that his body was like a torn and discarded garment, but that his spirit was eternal and indestructible. Thus the disciples became reorganized through her exhortations and exhibition of firmness. Now, after this long period, the station of Mary Magdalene has been revealed. Hence we must have faith that at the proper time every reality will likewise become revealed.

Seeing him that upon this happy occasion he was remembering his absent friends, each verse ending with a refrain indicating regret that his place was empty.

His Holiness the Báb — may my spirit be a sacrifice to him! — appeared in Shíráz. Soon after his declaration he wrote his first book, called “The Best of Stories,” and in it the Báb confessed his evanescence and acknowledged himself to be in a state of spiritual communication with Bahá’u’lláh, and many times addressed him. This book has been spread throughout Persia. No one can say it is not the book of the Báb. It is incontestable. It was written in red ink as symbolic of his martyrdom, and in addressing Bahá’u’lláh wrote: “O thou, my supreme lord, verily I have sacrificed my all for thee, seeking naught but martyrdom in thy path and anathema in thy way.”

The Báb wrote another book, called the Bayán, which is divided into nineteen vahids (unities) of nineteen babs (chapters) each. In this book he mentioned Bahá’u’lláh by the name of “Him whom God will manifest,” and one of his commands was “If any soul should displease another he must give nineteen drachmas of diamonds as atonement. He believed this would train people in such wise as to hinder them from injuring the feelings of “Him whom God will manifest,” when he should appear. In a word, every chapter culminates in the mention of “Him whom God will manifest.”

The prophets of God in past times declared that the coming of the successive manifestations of God would be recognized by certain signs symbolically expressed. For example, Isaiah prophesied that when the promised one should come he would sit upon the throne of David; he would conquer the East and the West; he would organize a new sovereignty; he would uphold the law of the Torah; he would usher all the nations under his dominion; during his time the lamb and the wolf would dwell together; the mountains would depart and the hills would be removed; and the earth and the heavens would pass away. All these were the signs of the coming of the Messiah, but they were only symbols. Therefore, when Christ appeared the Jews did not believe. They said: “Those signs have not come to pass. Where is the sovereignty of the Messiah, and where is his scepter — the rod of iron?”

In reality all of these prophetic signs did come to pass, that is to say, the inner significances appeared, but not in an outward and literal sense. For instance, it was prophesied that the promised one should come from a place unknown. So the Jews said of Christ: “We know this person. He is from Nazareth. We know his house; whereas the promised one is to come from a place unknown.” In truth Christ did come from a place unknown — for his reality — the Christ reality — came in the body of Jesus. Though the body of Jesus came from Nazareth, yet the Christianity — the spirit of Christ, — being divine, was placeless. His rod was the iron of the will of God. His sword was his blessed tongue, which separated truth from falsehood. He promulgated the teachings of the Torah, the fundamental law of the prophets. During his time the lamb and the wolf did dwell together, not literally because that would be impossible, but in the sense that antagonistic religionists became pacified and associated together at the fount of Christ. He founded a sovereignty and was enthroned, but the Jews did not understand and said: "Where is it? This man is not possessed of a mat, to say nothing of a throne." His Holiness Christ did establish a sovereignty, — an eternal spiritual sovereignty. He did not establish a sovereignty like that of Bonaparte or Hannibal. His sovereignty was of God. His dominion was of the heart.

His Holiness the Báb did not condition the appearance of the promised one upon any such signs. On the contrary, he warned his followers lest they should become veiled and as in past times say that certain signs had not come to pass. He said: "When he appears you must believe and accept." This command he gave frequently and with great emphasis. In the Arabic Bayán he said: "When he proclaims himself you must not watch to see whether I become a believer or not. Beware lest you be veiled by me!"

His Holiness the Báb and nearly all his followers were martyred. Upon the death of the Báb, Mírzá Yahyá, my uncle, who had been appointed viceregent of the Báb, fled, and thus the Bábí movement was virtually ended, however there are a few Bábís today. These Bábís believe that the Báb was the actual founder of the Bahá'í movement, whereas he was only the herald, even as John the Baptist, who was the herald of Christ, who in some parts of Arabia is still considered to be the essential personage of the Christian movement.

When Bahá'u'lláh appeared he was recognized as the promised one heralded by the Báb, and every one knows that were it not for the appearance of Bahá'u'lláh there would not have been a Bahá'í movement to-day.

During the time Bahá'u'lláh resided in Mesopotamia he displayed marvelous grandeur and power, notwithstanding the enmity and opposition of the Sháh and the noblemen of Persia. Learned men of all nations sought him and were humble in his presence. They received from his holy tongue answers to their questions, and not a single soul left his blessed presence unsatisfied. When the ulama saw that Bahá'u'lláh exercised such influence in Baghdád they caused him to be exiled to Constantinople. However, he was sent, not as other exiles, but with honorable escort, and the officials en route, including the governor general, showed him great respect.

He remained four months in Constantinople. When it was discovered that he was gaining converts he was sent to Adrianople, where he spent five years. Then, at the instigation of the Sháh of Persia, he was banished to the fortress of 'Akká.

Bahá'u'lláh was a prisoner, yet at all times, he upheld the banner of his cause with dignity and power.

***** On the other hand, we have the demonstrative teaching which means that you must be proof personified and evidence embodied, that is, live the life in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, so that you will become the embodiment of those teachings. In other words, all the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh must be personified in you. You must be an illustration of severance; and by severance we mean simply that man's heart should not be attached to the things of the world. If fortune smile upon him, he should not be excessively joyous, and if fortune forsake him he should not be grieved. It does not mean, remember, that man should not be occupied with his profession, or means of daily living for in this Cause it is a duty incumbent upon every Bahá'í to be occupied in some useful vocation, the conscientious pursuit of which is devotion.

TALK BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

Oakland, California, 8 P. M., October 22, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

Praise be to God, this is a good meeting. This is a blessed meeting. This is a spacious room, and praise be to God it is well filled. It is like a beehive at present.

This evening I shall relate to you the story of the sojourn of Bahá'u'lláh during the two years of his solitude on the mountain of Sarkalu.

When we were exiled from Ṭihrán to Baghdád we remained there one year. Then, suddenly, Bahá'u'lláh disappeared. We endeavored to find him but were not successful. For two years there was no news of him.

At that time most of the Bábís had been killed, and the few remaining lived in a state of fear. Since the attempt on the Sháh's life in Ṭihrán, the viceregent of the Sháh, Mírzá Yaḥyá, who was the half brother of Bahá'u'lláh, had been in hiding. He had traveled in disguise with a company of dervishes from Mazindarán to Rasht and Kermanshah, and after arriving at Baghdád had feared to leave his house. Thus the Bábí movement had virtually no leader.

One day, while my uncle and myself were seated on the bank of the river Tigris, a Persian gentleman, Ḥájí Ferajullah, came from the consulate toward us. My uncle asked him what was going on at the consulate. He answered that they had just received a newspaper from Persia containing several interesting items of news, the last, but not the least, being about a certain strange incident that had occurred in Kurdistan. A traveler by the name of Abu'l Kasem, a merchant from Hamadán, upon arriving at the frontier of the Ottoman empire, had become the guest of a person known as Ḥasan Sulṭán. The following day Abu'l Kasem had requested that he be escorted onto Ottoman soil. Ḥasan Sulṭán had allowed him to take two horsemen, by whom he had been conducted to a mountain, where, because of his possessions, they had attempted to behead him, and after robbing him they had left him for dead. A shepherd passing by, and seeing this apparently dead man, had found upon examination that his head was not entirely severed, but though still alive the man was unable to speak. The shepherd had thereupon secured help, and had had the man carried to a near-by village, where the wound had been quickly sewed together. At last, when sufficiently resuscitated, the man had made signs for paper and ink to be brought to him, and he had then recorded the whole story, giving his name and address and the amount that had been stolen from him, ending as follows:

“About two years ago I left Baghdád with a certain person known as Dervish Muḥammad. We went to Kurdistan, and he remained in Sulaymáníyye, in the district of Kurdistan, while I went to Hamadán. Just now I was on my way to Sulaymáníyye to visit him. If my possessions be restored, pray present all of them to this dervish, and he may dispose of them according to his will, which is also my will. This dervish has impressed me as a most unique personage. He is the first man of the world. His knowledge and wisdom are supreme, and I believe in him. Whatsoever he shall command as to the disposition of my effects, must be carried out.”

And then Abu'l Kasem had died, and very soon thereafter Ḥasan Sulṭán had been imprisoned by the Persian government.

When we heard this story that was reported in the paper, we immediately concluded that the person known as Dervish Muḥammad was no other than Bahá'u'lláh, for we recalled the fact that during his sojourn in Baghdád there was a man there by the name of Abu'l Kasem who had often come to see him. Furthermore, we knew that when Bahá'u'lláh left the city of Baghdád this person also had disappeared.

So we went to the Shaykh Sulṭán, and to another man known as Javád, and arranged for them to carry letters to the retreat of Bahá'u'lláh, the name of which we had thus secured — Sulaymáníyye. They went there and inquired about Dervish Muḥammad from Shaykh Sulaymán, who said: “There is a person of that description here. We have found him to be a man of great erudition, great wisdom, and deep insight. He lives in a cave on a mountain known as Sarkalu. Every three months he visits this place, staying two or three days.” When the two messengers asked to be directed to that cave the Shaykh said: “It will take you three days to walk there, and as it is situated among the rebellious and bloodthirsty Kurds they will rob you of your belongings and will kill you. It is better to wait here until he comes, because his time is close at hand.”

So they remained there until Bahá'u'lláh arrived, and then they presented their letters, saying: “We beseech you to return. We cannot return without you. Either come with us, or we will go with you to the cave.” Bahá'u'lláh finally listened to their entreaties to return with them, and when he arrived in Baghdád he declared himself to be the one heralded by the Báb. The Bábís who had been living in fear came forth from their hiding places and immediately accepted him, and soon people of all races and religions hastened to the blessed presence. Among them were people of every condition — princes, nobles, Persian scholars, and sages of the Ottoman empire. To all the questions asked of him he gave enlightening answers.

As to the cave, it still exists. It is on a very high mountain. It is about two and a half miles distant from any habitation, and there Bahá'u'lláh dwelt alone. An aged Shaykh — Abu'l Ghader by name — daily carried to him a morsel of bread and some cheese, alternating with bread and milk, or bread and matzoon (Sour milk). This continued for two years.

In those days the garments of Bahá'u'lláh were most plain, and the furniture of his cave consisted of a mat. He had not even utensils with which to make tea. During the day he remained within the cave, but the moonlight nights he spent outside chanting and praying, as he was greatly charmed by the moonlight. At such times the Kurds from the nearest villages were in the habit of going to the mountain to listen. Though they could not understand him, as his chanting was in Persian or Arabic, yet they were captivated by his voice. A certain Kurd, speaking of his experience, said: "I was wont to go slowly, slowly, most quietly, until I reached a point where I could hear him clearly. Though I could not understand his words, yet his thrilling voice so affected me as to make me weep involuntarily." All the Kurds of those regions were attracted to Bahá'u'lláh by his love, even highway robbers and the most rebellious characters, likewise noblemen, sheikhs and scholars, for his magnetic chanting, marvelous patience, long suffering, great knowledge, sanctity, purity and spirituality creates love in the hearts of men.

Here ends the account of the sojourn of Bahá'u'lláh in the cave of Sarkalu. This I have told in order that you may be informed. It has never before been given in such detail.

It is now some time since I arrived in America. I have visited many cities and have met many people. In numerous churches and other assemblages I have heralded the kingdom, and have given the message concerning the appearance of the Blessed Beauty. Day and night I have beseeched the Lord, begging that the light and effulgence of the sun of reality may be cast upon these regions, that the American people may become informed of the teachings of the Blessed Beauty, that all the remote parts of America may be illumined, that the breath of life may resuscitate the heart of the nation, and that the American people may thus receive new life.

Praise be to God, the call of the kingdom has been raised in America through the grace and favor of Bahá'u'lláh. By means of periodicals and journals the name has been spread. Many souls have heard the blessed name. In short, by the grace and favor of the Blessed Perfection, and the confirmations of his kingdom, seeds have been sown. If they are now watered and cared for by the friends of God and the maid-servants of the Merciful, they will without doubt yield a tremendous harvest.

The first watering of this real plantation is unity among the friends of God. To-day there is nothing so essential and so indispensable for the glory and honor of the Bahá'í cause as the unity of the beloved of God. The more the friends of God are united the greater will be the success attending their efforts, and the greater will be the confirmations of the Lord. Discord is destructive and is the cause of separation, whereas unity results in progress and power.

Let it be known that to-day the greatest service to the kingdom of Abhá is unity. The people of Bahá must be instrumental in creating good fellowship among all the nations. If they should be discordant, how could they ever create harmony. Therefore I beg and counsel you to continue in good fellowship and unity, to co-operate with and be kind toward one another, to exalt one another, and to be the means of comfort and ease to one another, in order that other nations may learn from you how great are the fruits of unity, and thus through your influence the peoples of the earth may be united, and agreement be established between all races and religions. Then, through the confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh, the banner of the solidarity of mankind should be unfurled and become the standard of all nations.

Praise be to God, Bahá'u'lláh in this marvelous dispensation has given teachings that will prevent every disagreement. During the Mosaic dispensation various denominations resulted from the different interpretations of the teachings of Moses. Such was also the case during the Christian dispensation. After the departure of His Holiness Christ — may my spirit be a sacrifice to him — dissensions arose among his followers, and the various sects which resulted therefrom have in turn been divided, there being to-day over a hundred denominations among the Protestants alone, each one claiming to teach the original truth of Christ.

Bahá'u'lláh, desiring to prevent similar dissensions resulting from the misinterpretation of his words, wrote a book which he entitled Kitáb el Ahd (Book of the Covenant). In this book, which is incontestable, being in his own handwriting, he appoints a center of his covenant, who is to be the expounder of the books and the judge between the false and the true. The Bahá'ís are commanded to obey him and to accept his interpretations. Thus there will be no danger of disagreement and consequent schism among the believers in Bahá'u'lláh, such as arose during the dispensation of Christ. The Bahá'í cause should not be an aggressive one. Those who wish to deny the Book of the Covenant and thereby deprive themselves of the light of this day are like those who close their eyes and deny the existence of the sun. With them we have nothing to do.

Furthermore, Bahá'u'lláh has commanded the organization of an universal house of justice, which shall have power to legislate regarding all questions not elucidated in the books, and the decisions of this body are to be accepted as the law. Hence there should be no excuse for dissensions among you, and I hope that you will always be willing to agree and to love one another. However, should there arise a difference of opinion concerning any important matter, you should ask regarding it and you will receive an answer that will avert all discord. This is a peculiar feature of the great dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh.

Now that I am leaving you I counsel you not to accept any one coming to you with strange stories attributed to me without first demanding his signed credentials which must be in my handwriting. After I arrived in America it reached my ear that I had prophesied the inundation of New York and the submersion of many parts of America. Is it likely that I should make such an absurd prophecy? It is not reasonable. It is not my purpose. Therefore do not credit such statements. Accept nothing purporting to come from me without my signature.

Beware lest dissensions divide you. You must be agreed and united. You must always turn to the kingdom of God, be attracted to Bahá'u'lláh, be filled with Bahá'u'lláh, and ever be the recipients of the favors of Bahá'u'lláh. Your utterances and your hearing must be concerned with the name of Bahá'u'lláh. Your faces must be radiant because of the glad tidings of Bahá'u'lláh. Your hearts must be attracted to Bahá'u'lláh. Thus you will be filled with the love of Bahá'u'lláh, and you will have no thought for aught else. This is my admonition, my behest to you. I beg you so to live that you will prove yourselves to be true Bahá'ís, not by confession merely, but by showing love toward all humanity without distinction or prejudice, considering all as servants of God. If he had not loved all mankind he would not have created nor have provided for them; nor would he have nurtured and have sheltered them beneath his providence. Since God is compassionate toward all, even so must you be kind and tender toward all. Then the bounties of Bahá'u'lláh shall encompass you, and eventually all dissension shall disappear from among mankind.

Oakland, 9.15 A. M., October 23, 1914

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

I hope you are all well.

I am very grateful that this meeting has been made possible, for it is extraordinary that after forty years' imprisonment, and the consequent infirmity of the body resulting from great hardships, and climatic conditions, I should be able to accomplish the long journey from the Orient to this far western point. Therefore, you will know how greatly I have longed to see you.

Every action in the contingent world that emanates from physical susceptibilities is difficult; on the other hand, that which emanates from or owes its origin to the emotions of the conscience is easy. The least self-sacrifice that is based upon material origin seems to be arduous. For instance, it is difficult for man to sacrifice his ease or his possessions for racial love, but the giving of life in its entirety in the pathway of God is easy. Since self-sacrifice owes its origin to the emotions of the conscience man gladly offers his very life for a cause. Consider how willingly and with what great joy and happiness the disciples of Christ sacrificed their lives, because their love for their cause was based upon the emotions of the conscience. Had it been based upon the natural susceptibilities their sacrifice would have been very difficult if not impossible.

In short, I give thanks to God that by reason of my excessive longing I have reached this coast with great facility, every difficulty having been made easy. I am hopeful that this journey may be productive of results in the establishment of a bond between the East and the West. In these days the East is in a condition of ferment. The Balkans have proved to be a volcano, when the fire of warfare is raging. Blood is being shed, properties are pillaged, children are down-trodden, and countries are laid waste. Perchance through the grace and favor of God the endeavors of the American people may provide means to establish amity among the nations, so that hate may be replaced by love, and war by peace.

Truly the American people are noble in character. Their philanthropic endeavors are an evidence of their desire to serve others and to benefit the body politic. They are thoughtful of the poor; they are interested in the questions of education, capital punishment, and the alleviation of suffering. They are occupied with activities relative to the betterment of their kind. Their endeavors are exceedingly praiseworthy, and I am hopeful that through their united efforts war and the making of infernal instruments may be abolished. Only by this means will universal peace be established, and the barriers of hatred between races, countries and religions be forever obliterated. It is my hope that the American people may be eternally honored by this distinction.

The question of paramount importance is universal peace, and when man recognizes the fact that all human beings belong inherently to one family, then the difficult problems confronting the nations of the world to-day will solve themselves. Nothing is so true as the oneness of the world of humanity. Verily it is the foundation of the divine religions. But a thousand times alas! religions have discarded this fundamental basis, and have held to certain traditional dogmas, which have resulted in dissension and warfare, which was not the intention of religion. Religion should be a remedy for the afflictions of humanity, but it has fallen into the hands of unskilled physicians and the results have been disastrous. Religion ought to be the cause of amity and fellowship, whereas it has been the cause of war. Religion ought to be the cause of life, whereas it has been the cause of death.

His Holiness Christ laid the foundation of the oneness of humanity, which principle was the basis of Christianity, of universal love and of universal peace. But consider how this basis has been discarded by the Christians themselves, and how many wars have occurred because of religious prejudice. His Holiness Christ taught that when a man's enemy smites him on one cheek he must turn the other also, and that he must say a prayer for those who curse him, and that he must return good for evil. His Holiness Christ was the essence of love; but his followers have shown hatred and rancor. He promulgated life; they have caused death. It is indisputable that the fundamental principles of the original teachings of religion have been forsaken, and that traditional dogmas have been substituted therefore. As these dogmas always have been at variance, discord and dissension have naturally followed.

In a word, according to the explicit text of God, to be found in all the heavenly books, religion must needs be the bond of amity and love among men. If religion should prove to be the cause of alienation, then it is not divine religion, but an imitation that man has created, because divine religion, being a bond to unite human hearts, creates fellowship, love and life. Anything contrary thereto is not religion but man made superstition.

He declared that, having been created by God, all are the servants of God, the provider and the protector of mankind. He proclaimed the oneness of the world of humanity. He declared that all are the servants of God. As not a single human being has been created by any other agency save God, hence if even one human temple be destroyed it is a grievous injury to the whole edifice of God. Therefore all races and religions must associate with one another in fellowship and love.

This fundamental teaching of Bahá'u'lláh created such love among the antagonistic peoples of Persia that those among the Christians, Mussulmans and Zoroastrians who harkened to his call dwell together as one big family regardless of their inherited beliefs. This proves that true religion is the cause of amity, love and life. If religion should cause the reverse then irreligion would be better. If a remedy should cause disease it would be better to discard it, for a remedy should be productive of health.

We have come from the distant Orient to create the bond of amity between the East and the West, hoping that by this means humanity at large may advance to an extraordinary degree, for if the Orient and the Occident would unite to hold aloft the banner of international peace, tyranny and oppression and in the mediaeval ages they were cruelly persecuted. At one time in France the Jews were used as targets by the noblemen when they practiced to become marksmen. All this blood need not have been shed had the Jews been willing to accept Jesus, even as the Christians had accepted Moses and all the other prophets of Israel. If the Jews would make this admission to-day future strife would be avoided and religious peace would prevail between them and the Christians.

It is equally possible to reconcile all the religions of the world by this simple means. Therefore let us direct all our efforts toward this end that, God willing, this dark world may be illumined, that this material world may be transformed into a veritable paradise. This should be our purpose. I hope you will strive to promulgate the principle of the oneness of the world of humanity and to upraise the banner of international peace.

May God bless each and all of you, and aid you to become better day by day, more radiant, more successful, more alive, ever nearer to God. This is my desire for you all.

We have been for a drive in the Park as far as the lake — a most beautiful spot, with lawns about it, trees and flowers, and pure air. It was most delightful. One rarely finds a place as charming as that. It cannot be surpassed. I alighted from the automobile, and as I walked around that little lake and looked about I thought of something that made me very sad.

The thought was this. Bahá'u'lláh spent years and years in prison. He passed the greater part of his life in places where no one would want to live a day. I recalled how as a child I was taken to see him at the prison where he was confined in Tíhrán. I went down a long flight of steps leading to the dungeon, which had no other outlet. It was absolutely dark. I peered through the gloom endeavoring to see some one, but could see nothing. Then I heard his blessed voice saying to the guard who had brought me, “Why did you bring that child? Take him back! Take him back!” I was then led upstairs. The guards told me that it was customary to bring the prisoners out at midday for half an hour, at which time they were allowed to breathe the fresh air and wash. I waited until noon, when they were brought out. They bore chains so heavy that some could hardly carry them. Among them I saw Bahá'u'lláh and one of his followers chained together. His neck was bent under the weight of the chain, and he walked with great difficulty. His clothes were tattered, and he was in a very pitiable condition. His health was visibly failing. The guards took him to a pool that he might wash his face. When he was led back to the dungeon my emotion was indescribable. Although I was only a child I was so overcome that I lost consciousness.

During my walk this morning it made me exceedingly sad to remember all that Bahá'u'lláh had suffered in order that we to-day might be free to enjoy these wonderful blessings.

In Persia we have a unique custom. When we write to a friend most dear we place at the end of the letter a seal that is perfumed with musk, which signifies the fragrance of friendship, and the friend writes that he has been most happy because the ending of the letter was in musk. Similarly we say of anything that we desire to praise very highly, ‘The ending thereof is in musk.’ Now this being our last day together, its close should be most fragrant, even as musk. Therefore let it be in commemoration of Bahá'u'lláh.

Bahá'u'lláh revealed heavenly teachings that will reform the phenomenal world, the world of spirits and hearts, the world of thought and capacity, the world of religion and philosophy. Verily the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh will reform all that pertains to man. Hence in thanksgiving for this great bounty, we must manifest great capacity and worth, because if capacity be not proportionate to the bounty the result will be unworthy of the bounty. For example, consider the shining of the sun upon a common stone. Even though the sun should shine upon it for ages the stone would never become a ruby or a diamond, as it lacks that capacity. The showering of the water of life upon sterile soil does not produce anything, because that soil is without capacity. However, an equal bounty showered upon fertile soil brings forth plants and flowers. In like manner the bounty of Abhá has shone upon us with all its effulgence of mercy. Hence it is our duty to increase our capacity in order that we may bring forth results worthy of this divine bounty. This is what His Holiness Christ meant when he prayed that his disciples might become one with him and the Father, for he desired that they should reflect from him the divine virtues that he reflected from the Father. Even so should you reflect the beauties of Bahá'u'lláh in such manner that it may be said of you that verily the Bahá'ís are possessed of the virtues of Bahá'u'lláh; they are illumined with the light of the sun of reality; verily they are the mirrors of Bahá'u'lláh and if people desire to know the virtues and attributes of Bahá'u'lláh they should look at the Bahá'ís, for in them are personified his attributes, aims and achievements; consider how well they have been educated by Bahá'u'lláh, what a great bestowal He has given them, what lights and virtues he has caused to become revealed through them; verily the Bahá'ís are distinguished among them; they are the proof of Bahá'u'lláh.

It is my hope that each one of you may become a mirror of Bahá'u'lláh, and that the beauties of Bahá'u'lláh may become resplendent in your hearts. Then it is certain that you will be confirmed in your efforts to establish the oneness of the world of humanity, and to transform the human world into the world eternal.

I will pray in your behalf and will seek for you the benefits of the Blessed Perfection, and I desire you to pray that I may be confirmed in his blessed service. This is the “musk”.

I am to say farewell to you. It is our last meeting. It is the last quaffing from the chalice. Therefore it must be very effective, even as it is said by those who drink wine that the last of the cup is the sweetest.

How grateful I am to Bahá'u'lláh for anointing you at this time, It is the symbol of the fragrance of the paradise of Abhá, and proves that this fragrance is indeed most centered.

I am sad indeed at parting with you. I cannot express my sadness. The emotion of my heart is beyond description. It cannot be expressed.

I am exceedingly grieved to leave you, for I have sensed from you the fragrance of the love of Bahá'u'lláh, and I have witnessed in your countenances the light of the love of Bahá'u'lláh. I always long to enjoy this fragrance and to behold this light; hence I am unable to express my feelings of regret at leaving you. Let your hearts sense them, and verily you will know how deeply I feel this parting.

Although I am going away from you, and a separation seemingly takes place, nevertheless you are in my heart. Your abode is in my heart, and you will never be deprived of this home. Rest assured of this.

When I reach the holy tomb of the Blessed Perfection I shall prostrate myself at his threshold and supplicate for each and all of you confirmation and assistance. Doubt not but that you will be aided.

For a moment I will speak of the Tarbíyát School in Tíhrán which some of you are assisting. Let me say that the more cooperation there is between the East and the West the greater will be the bonds of love between you. I desire you to realize this.

Our meeting should not end in forgetfulness like those of the people of the world. When they meet they express great affection for one another, and when they separate the matter is erased entirely from their minds. But our meeting, being for the love of God, should not be forgotten. It should ever remain fixed in memory, and I hope that whenever it comes to mind it may be as a fresh joy to us, and that a spiritual exhilaration may quicken our hearts.

May God aid and confirm you. May he ever keep you happy, and under his favor and protection. I shall look forward to receiving joyous news from you. Wherever I may be, know that I shall supplicate and invoke, seeking for you aid and confirmation. You will never be forgotten. I feel very sad at parting. I cannot say more than this.

The days passed here have been most happy, and my association with you has been most pleasant. Daily have we met commemorating Bahá'u'lláh. There could not be better days than those we have spent here, for they have been passed in the commemoration of God. All the hearts have been set aglow; all the eyes have been seeing; all the spirits have been exhilarated. Forget not these days. No better days could be imagined. They shall ever remain in my memory, and I shall supplicate God that the fruits of these meetings may be the illumination of the world and the unification of mankind.

I leave you as trusts in the custody of Bahá'u'lláh. He will ever protect you, for you are my trusts in his kingdom.

How negligent people are! What insignificant things they consider necessary for their happiness! How negligent they are! Like unto animals, they eat, they sleep, they walk, they sing, they dance, and after the manner of their kind think they are having a good time. But in truth the animals are better off, for without toil or trouble they enjoy all the material blessings necessary for their existence. They enjoy the expanse of desert; they graze on the green meadow; they drink from the cool spring; the birds are provided for; their flight is high; they inhale the pure air, they perch in the trees and enjoy their own most melodious music, and in the loftiest branches they build nests more wonderful than the palaces of kings. But their enjoyment of life, though great, is purely physical. On the other hand, the honor and true enjoyment of man do not depend upon material things. His blessings emanate from the divine benediction and the bounties and love of God. Were it otherwise, the animal would be better off than man for man must labor a thousand times more than the animal in order to secure what the animal has already. No matter how man may build his house, it cannot compare with the nest of the bird. The wealth of the bird consists in all the waters, all the meadows, and all the harvests of the fields. Its domain is vast but untrammelled. It has no army, no politics, no toilsome labors, yet its domain is a kingdom. Hence, if happiness be dependent upon these things, the life of the animal is most enviable. But God has bestowed upon man a certain bounty — the mind or intellect — whereby he becomes the most distinguished of creatures. This bestowal is not given to the animal. The ideal happiness of man, if he be spiritually confirmed, consists in the acquisition of knowledge, in the love of God, in the knowledge of God, in the attractions of the conscience, and in service to the world of humanity.

The guidance of God, the bounty of the Kingdom, the life everlasting, the bounty of the Holy Spirit, are special bestowals to man. These are the greatest attainment of the human world. Man is specially chosen to receive good gifts of God. If he be not mindful, then the status of the animal is superior.

All the prophets of God have come for the purpose of bestowing upon men the heavenly bounties, in order that through the breaths of the Holy Spirit man might be resuscitated and thus become the noblest of creatures.[a17]

Everyone is welcome!

Sacramento is a good city. It is a well built city. You must strive to make it a center of radiance and mercy.

America is a marvelous country, and it is daily growing. From every standpoint it has achieved material advancement, but for perfection there should be spiritual progress also.

Consider a human being. From the beginning of his life the body grows day by day, mentality develops likewise, for were there only physical growth there would be no intellectuality. The mind must develop as well as the body. Likewise, in the world at large, both moral and material civilization must advance together, for without moral progress the world will remain defective, the same as a child whose body is developed but whose mind is deficient. Physical development is praiseworthy, provided it is accompanied by spiritual development also.

When God created Adam he made for him a physical body, which is the material aspect of man, but he also conferred upon Adam his own image and likeness, for it is recorded in the Bible that man was made in the image and likeness of God. This signifies the divine attributes, not the outward form or figure. The divine image and likeness signifies the attributes and names of God, the virtues of God. Hence it becomes evident that in man there are two realities: one is the physical reality, or the body; the other is the spiritual reality, or the image and likeness of God.

Just as the body is subject to growth and development, so spiritual reality must develop in man. If man should acquire only material virtues, what difference would there be between him and the animal? The animal is a body. It has the powers of growth and the virtue of sensation. It has the five senses. All these material gifts the animal shares in common with man. But man, being in the image and likeness of God, has been given also mental and spiritual powers, such as reason and the capacity for the attainment of ideal virtues. Thus he is the most distinguished of creatures.

Therefore man must strive to acquire the virtues and qualities of the Kingdom in order to attain perfection. Otherwise he remains like the animal. In fact, the animal is nobler, because not being endowed with reason and capacity its lack of spiritual development is excusable. But since man has been given the divine bestowal of the mind he must therefore ever acquire virtues, for without the divine attributes he may become lower than the animal.

The prophets of God have been sent to educate humanity. Christ appeared that mankind might be so trained that in human hearts the image and likeness of God might become manifest, and the utmost of human perfection be attained. However, we have forgotten the teachings of these divine educators; we have become submerged in materialism; we have become utterly bereft of spiritual susceptibilities; we have become negligent of God; we have closed our eyes absolutely to the kingdom of God. We must heed the call of the Kingdom that the doors may be opened unto us, if we strive sincerely that endless bounties may descend upon us and ideal reality will become revealed in us. This is the utmost attainment of man. This is the superlative degree of human attainment. It is my hope that you may achieve this distinction.

READING BY REV. BRADFORD LEAVITT

For our lesson this morning I will read first from the Hindu scripture.

“Be thy creed or thy prayers what they may, unless thou hast truth within thee, thou wilt not find the path to true happiness. He in whom the truth dwells is twice born.”

“The Supreme Being is sometimes with him who counts his prayers on sacred beads in the mosque, and sometimes with him who bows down before idols in the temple. He is the friend of the Hindu, the intimate of the Muḥammadan, the companion of the Christian, and the confidant of the Jew.”

“Heaven is a palace with many doors, and each one may enter in his own way.”

And from the Persian:

“Abraham would scarce break his fast for a week, lest some hungry traveler might pass who needed his store. Daily he looked out upon the desert, and one day he beheld an aged man, with hair white as snow, tottering toward his door. ‘Guest of mine eyes!’ exclaimed Abraham, ‘enter with welcome, and be pleased to share my bread and salt.’ The stranger entered, and the place of honor was given to him. When the family gathered round the board, each one of them said, ‘In the name of God!’ but the aged guest uttered no word. Abraham said: ‘Old man, when thou eatest food, is it not right to repeat the name of God?’ The stranger replied, ‘My custom is that of the fire worshippers.’ Then Abraham arose in wrath, and drove the aged man from his house. But even as he did so, a swift-winged Spirit stood before the patriarch and said: ‘Abraham! for a hundred years hath the divine bounty flowed out to this man in sunshine and rain, in bread and life. Is it fit for thee to withhold thy hand from him, because his worship is not thine?’”

And from the Qur’án:

“God’s is the east and the west, and wherever ye turn there is God’s face; verily, God comprehends and knows.”

“Every sect has some one side to which they turn (in prayer); but do ye hasten onwards to good works; wherever ye are God will bring you all together; verily, God is mighty over all.”

From the Arabian:

“The Jews and Christians say that they are sons of God; that they are his beloved. Nay, they are but a part of the men whom he hath made. To every one has been given a rule and a beaten road.”

“If thou art a Mussulman, go stay with the Franks. If thou art a Christian, mix with the Jews. If thou art a Shuah, mix with the Schismatics. Whatever is thy religion associate with men of opposite persuasions. If thou canst mix with them freely, and art not the least angered while listening to their discourse, thou hast attained peace, and art a master of creation.”

And from the Christian Scripture:

“Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, and saying, “Master, which is the great commandment in the law?

“Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

“This is the first and great commandment.

“And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

“On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.” (Matt. 22:35-40)

“And they shall come from the east, and from the west, and from the north, and from the south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God.” (Luke 13:29)

“The woman saith unto him, Sir, I perceive that thou art a prophet.

“Our fathers worshiped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship.

“Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father.

“Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship: for salvation is of the Jews.

“But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him.

“God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth.” (John 4:19-24)

(After responsive reading of the Sermon on the Mount Rev. Leavitt offered the following prayer:)

Father of all men, we, thy children, come to thee for thy blessing. We thank thee for everything, and we ask thee for everything, most of all that thou wilt teach us and lead us in all thy ways, and teach us in the way that we have to go, that we may be about our Father’s business.

We thank thee, Almighty One, that thou hast nowhere left thyself without continuance, but hast been in all times and in all ages, in the prophets of old and in the prophets of modern times, everywhere, among all nations and races, raising up prophets, who, by the inspiration that thou didst put upon them, have been a guiding light to their brothers.

We thank thee this day for that great prophet who comes to us, and who is in our worship this morning. We thank thee for the noble work he has done and is doing. We thank him for breaking the bonds of superstition, and for the work of uniting in one great brotherhood the different sects and men of different races all over the earth. And, Father, our prayer here is always his prayer, and the prayer of our Master, Jesus Christ, that thy children may be one, that the nations of the earth may be one in thee, that the people, that the rulers, and the rulers with their people, may be one, and that all races and all creeds, the rich and the poor, the master and the servant, the old and the young, the learned and the unlearned, may be made perfect in one, even as Jesus with thee and thou with him, that this world may be made a part of thy kingdom.

How much of error and of evil remain to be conquered by the power of truth and of love. How reluctantly and slowly the old falsehoods and wrongs give way before the advancing light. How slowly through the weary centuries has the gospel of the fatherhood and of the brotherhood made its way among the warring and the still barbarous nations, and among those who still profess the fellowship of the Prince of Peace, and yet thy increasing purpose runs through the ages, and with thee there is no disappointment, and no delay. So may we, leaving the things that are behind, join with all who reach forward to those things which are before, striving to attain for all mankind that ideal which to us represents the perfect will of God.

Bless all thy children in thy world. We ask it in the name of him who to us hath been the way, the truth and the light.

Toward the end of April there landed in New York an old man with a white turban and flowing beard, clad in strange garments, and speaking a strange tongue. Hundreds welcomed him at the dock. Thousands have attended his receptions and public addresses in many American cities. He is 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the "Servant of God," head of the Bahá'í movement, and one of the most distinguished religious figures of the age. Those who have met him bear witness to his loving kindness and spiritual breadth.

For forty years he was imprisoned in Syria. His father, Bahá'u'lláh, died in prison. The forerunner of the Bahá'í faith was martyred, and so were thousands of his followers, and they suffered persecutions, and the sufferings were frightful.

It is only during the recent years, since Turkey has had a constitutional government, that 'Abdu'l-Bahá has been free to travel. He visited London first, spoke in the City Temple of Rev. R. J. Campbell, and was invited by Archdeacon Wilberforce to speak in his pulpit, and now he has come to America to expound his teachings and to come into personal touch with his followers, who are building a great temple in Chicago. He appeared first in this country in the Church of the Ascension in New York City. Since then he has appeared in many churches, of many faiths, and in a great many of the Unitarian churches. In fact, in our church in Boston he was the guest of honor, and the entire assemblage arose when he entered the City Temple.

"Bahá'ism claims to have the adhesion of at least one-third of the Persian people (including members of the ruling family, viziers, parliamentary deputies, governors, and many religious teachers or mullahs), and has not less than three million adherents throughout the world."

I am quoting now from the Contemporary Review of London, from an article by Harrold Johnson.

"It has numerous followers in European and Asiatic Turkey, Egypt, India, Burma, and has excited considerable interest in Japan, Siam, Ceylon, Russia, Germany, France, the United States of America, and in Great Britain. The main bulk of its followers is Muḥammadan, the non-Muḥammadans not numbering probably very many thousand, though these are rapidly increasing and include, I am told, some ten thousand Jews in Russia and North Persia whose attitude toward Christ has been thereby completely changed. It counts followers also among all the great religions of the world, and it is not an infrequent occurrence in such a cosmopolitan city as Rangoon, for instance, to find Buddhists, Muḥammadans, Christians, Jews, Zoroastrians, and Hindus, met together, united by Bahá'ísm into one family of love — race, caste, sect, dietary distinctions, age-long severing customs and prejudices all obliterated and merged in the white light of the unity of faith. What Christianity has failed to accomplish Bahá'ísm has already accomplished. Nor does it appear improbable that Bahá'ísm may yet exercise a profound influence on religious developments in Western Christendom, and especially upon Christian missionary propaganda in the East. The false dictum that 'East is East and West is West, and never the twain shall meet' is challenged at length. The first contacts of this movement with our own country have been remarkable. 'Abdu'l-Bahá arrived on our shores a few months back, himself and the movement he represents almost unknown to most of us. A week after his arrival he delivered an address from the pulpit of the City Temple, being introduced by Mr. Campbell as 'the leader of one of the most remarkable religious movements of this or any other age,' and, a week later, spoke and pronounced the benediction in Archdeacon Wilberforce's church. We also find him commanding the respect of a Roman Catholic writer who refers to 'his undoubtedly sincere and sublime aspirations and oracles,' and recommends the church's missionaries, 'with sympathy and equity,' to examine the phenomena of this movement. ....men."

I need not, of course, then say there are very close affinities between this and all that we of this church profess, and have been nurtured, and to work therein to purify, ennoble, enlarge, spiritualize, and merge in the larger unity the expression of our particular faith. To a Christian, Bahá'ísm is Christian; to a Buddhist, Buddhist; to a mystical Sufi it speaks in the mystical language of the Sufi; to a rationalist it is logical. It becomes all things to all men; for it has faith that there are deeper depths than all differences and a unity underlying all diversities.

"In a sense, Bahá'ísm is proselytizing. It desires ardently to lift us from the merely local and the temporary and the particular to the omnipresent, the eternal and the universal. It would have us remain Christian or Buddhist or Muḥammadan, but Christian or Buddhist or Muḥammadan in the deepest senses these words originally conveyed through the lives and utterances of their loftiest exponents, and embodying the finest implications modern insight may perceive in them. It would, however, encourage no such propagandist missionary efforts as those which exist to convert the Jew or 'the heathen' to Christianity. 'Abdu'l-Bahá writes in Persian in the City Temple pulpit Bible: 'This book is the Holy Book of God, of celestial inspiration.' In the same spirit he would have written the same words upon the Qur'án or the Vedas."

The supreme need of the hour, as he sees it, is a deeper unity. His gospel finds fruitful soil in America and is treated with respect wherever discussed, and the Boston Congregationalist declares: "The religion of the Bahá'ís has nothing of the eccentricity or faddism of so many modern religions and none of their shallow philosophy. It is simply a synthesis of the noblest ethics of the world around one common center — love and good-will to all

From the Hidden Words of Bahá'u'lláh

- (Read by the Interpreter) *

"O son of man! I loved thy creation, therefore I created thee. Wherefore love me, that I may acknowledge thee and in the spirit of life confirm thee."

"O son of man! In my ancient entity and in my eternal being, was I hidden. I knew my love in thee, therefore I created thee, upon thee I laid my image, and to thee revealed my beauty."

Man was to be created after the image and likeness of God. This is so wondrously expressed by the message of Bahá'u'lláh.

"O son of spirit! Justice is loved above all. Neglect it not, if thou desirest me. By it thou wilt be strengthened to perceive things with thine own eyes and not by the eyes of men, to know them by thine own knowledge and not by the knowledge of any in the world. Meditate on this — how thou oughtest to be. Justice is of my bounty to thee and of my providence over thee; therefore, keep it ever before thy sight."

"O son of spirit! I have created thee rich: Why dost thou make thyself poor? Noble have I made thee: Why dost thou degrade thyself? Of the essence of knowledge have I manifested thee: Why searchest thou for another than me? From the clay of love I have kneaded thee: Why seekest thou another? Turn thy sight unto thyself, that thou mayest find me standing within thee, powerful, mighty and supreme."

ADDRESS BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

The origin of creation is love, inasmuch as love is the greatest of divine effulgences. The reality of divinity has cast an effulgence of love upon all phenomena. Were it not for the divine love, no genesis at all would be possible. Hence, among all phenomena, you will see expressions of love and peace.

When we glance at phenomena, whether major or minor, we find they are interdependent and connected by a bond, and this bond is peace. Were there no such connection among phenomena — in other words, were there no peace among them — the world of existence could not possess immortality. Existing phenomena, therefore, owe their endurance or permanence to this peace, or love, which exists among them.

The selfsame power of attraction that exists among phenomena, and is observable in cellular expressions of life, is an emanation of love in the mineral kingdom, because the mineral kingdom has not the capacity for any greater expression. When it comes to the vegetable kingdom, the virtue augmentative is added to this power of attraction, and love and unity make themselves more manifest. When it reaches the animal kingdom, inasmuch as that kingdom is more specialized, more sensitive, and its capacity greater, the expressions of that love are more observable. When it reaches the human kingdom, inasmuch as that kingdom is possessed of extraordinary capacity, the lights of love are there more evident and manifest, and there they occupy a station similar to that of the spirit.

Love, then, confers life, while dissension, sedition and discord are ever conducive to destruction and extinction.

Were there no power of attraction, of gravitation, among the great planets which occupy interminable space they would drop, because their poise and endurance are due to that power of attraction which serves as a bond among them, and that bond is peace. If among the colossal planets there were to be discord, which is a form of warfare, undoubtedly there would be an explosion among them. Hence, warfare in the mineral kingdom is the cause of destruction, the cause of death.

Likewise, in the elemental world, affinity and amity of the elements give birth to myriad forms of creation. Were you to investigate the composition of any expression of life, you would find that it is the result of the coming together of single elements. For example, in man, certain single elements have been brought into affinity, into composition, and man is the result. Therefore, the assemblage of elements is conducive to the composition of phenomena. When dissension obtains among the elements, separation takes place, and disintegration results. Such is also the case with other expressions of life, whether minor or major, single or combined. From the composition of elements life results, and this is peace. From difference and divergence, disintegration and separation, annihilation results. In all phenomena peace and amity tend toward life, whereas warfare and dissension are the cause of death.

When we consider the animal kingdom, we find that the blessed (or domestic) animals are in accord and fellowship. For example, among a flock of sheep or of doves there is no dissension. They enjoy the greatest agreement. But among the ferocious animals there is no fellowship. They seem to choose solitary life and ever exhibit ferocity toward one another. Hence we learn that fellowship is a particular quality of the blessed or domestic animals, whereas warfare is a peculiarity of the ferocious animals.

It is astounding that man, in possession of such knowledge, still exercises such ferocity, and thinks nothing of destroying one hundred thousand men on a battlefield. Consider the blood now being shed in the Balkans, the young men being killed, the mothers losing their children, the children being made orphans, the homes being destroyed. All these horrors are the result of war. Astounding and strange it is that man, who calls the wolf a ferocious animal, considers a ferocious human animal praiseworthy! How thoughtless man is. How unjust man is. The wolf that devours one sheep is condemned, but if a general in the Balkans should cause the destruction of one hundred thousand men all would praise him. All would say: "He is a great man. He is a hero. He is worthy of our mention. He is worthy of great commendation." If a man should commit theft to the extent of a dollar, or should destroy property, he would be called a thief, a criminal; but if a general should pillage a whole country he would be hailed as a conqueror.

In short, the world of humanity is just now set aflame with an awful fire. Were you to scan history you would find that from the inception of human existence to the present time there has been continuous bloodshed. There has ever been warfare. There has ever been pillage and carnage. The world of humanity has never rested nor found repose. But now that this century of light has dawned, and the minds of men have developed, and science has expanded, it is expedient, and in accordance with the precepts of the Holy Book, that during this period unity should be established between the East and the West. Let this be the time when the wolf and the lamb shall dwell together. Let this be the season when the owl and the vulture shall rest together. Let this be the season when the lion and the calf shall enjoy the same pasture. In the holy Bible so has it been prophesied. Thus will the world of humanity find peace. It is our duty to strive and to be self-sacrificing, enduring every difficulty, in order that during this century international peace shall be established and the oneness of the world of humanity become manifest.

Praise be to God, all are servants of God, and all are submerged in the ocean of his mercy. The ray of the Sun of Reality is shining upon all. The shower of the mercy of God is refreshing all. The breeze of God's providence is blowing toward all. God has willed for us love. He has wished for us unity and agreement. He has ordained for us reciprocity and cooperation. He has wished for us kindness. So long as the Lord is kind to all, provides for all, protects all, and shelters all of us, without exception, beneath his overshadowing protection, why should we not avail ourselves of this bestowal? Why should we change this light into darkness? Why should we transform this life into death? Why should we transform this love and fellowship into hatred and rancor? Since the Lord of creation has reared us all, and is so kind to all, is it meet that we should injure his servants, pillage the properties and shed the blood of one another, and act contrary to his will, in opposition to his institutes? Verily he has created us angelic. Is it for us to be like ferocious animals? How pitiable it is that man should remain in such a state of barbarism!

All the divine manifestations have appeared for the purpose of creating love and unity. All the heavenly books have descended for love's sake. All the divine teachings have been for the purpose of effecting love and unity. But we have forgotten this reality. We have held tenaciously to certain traditional beliefs, and inasmuch as these beliefs differ they have proved to be the bone of contention, the cause of warfare. Hence, it is better for us to refer now to the original reality, to investigate the reality of the divine teachings.

There is no doubt that the reality of the divine teachings is centralized in love and should cause the abolition of warfare. The reality of the divine teachings is light, whereas rancor and hatred and war are darkness. The reality of the divine teachings is life, whereas warfare is death. Superstitious traditions are ever the cause of the destruction of humanity, for they are conducive to fanaticism, and fanaticism is ever productive of war.

The manifestations of God endured great difficulties and tremendous vicissitudes, sacrificing even their lives. They endured all these ordeals that love might be created in our hearts, that we might be welded together in amity, that we might exercise loving kindness toward one another. They forfeited their comforts and possessions, passing their lives in the midst of afflictions, in order that they might guide us, that they might lead us to reality. Is it just that we should waste their sufferings, that we should render fruitless the seeds sown by them, that we should act contrary to the teachings instituted by them? Is it just that we should follow satanic promptings and shed the blood of our fellow-men?

These things have ever been displeasing to God, and humanity has thereby deprived itself of God's mercy. For many centuries and ages we have seen what havoc and destruction have been caused by hatred and rancor and warfare. Have we not seen enough? Then let us exercise fellowship in this radiant century. Let us be loving. Let us proclaim international peace. Let us strive by day and by night that among all mankind unity may result. At least, let us give this plan a trial. If we should find that love and unity and peace result in harm, then we may revert again to warfare. But should we find that they result in better lives and comfort, that they are an impetus to the development of humanity, causing the illumination of mankind and attainment to the approvement of God, then this course should be given our fullest and heartiest support. Therefore, day and night must we pray, supplicating at the threshold of God that the fire of war and corruption may cease, and that the fount of peace and fellowship may gush forth.

I hope that all of us will strive, and, if need be, forfeit our possessions, our comforts, our rest, and even our lives, in order that the light of peace may illumine the world and the lives of all mankind joyously reflect this radiance.

The main cause of the war that has broken out in the Balkans is religious prejudice — sectarianism. God has revealed religious teachings for the purpose of creating fellowship and love, but religion has been used as an excuse for contention and warfare. This bond of unity has been used as an excuse for shedding blood. Religion, which was meant to be the foundation of justice, has been used for boundless tyranny. If religion should be the cause of warfare and contention, assuredly irreligion would be better. The foundation of religion is love; its purpose is to weld together the hearts. Should religion prove to be the cause of alienating the hearts and result in enmity and rancor, then it would not be religion but absolute misguidance, and irreligion would be better, — without religion we could do better.

All the holy manifestations lived in the greatest concord and love. They praised one another. They glorified and sanctified one another. For example, His Holiness Moses exalted and glorified His Holiness Abraham, declaring that he was a lamp of guidance. Likewise, His Holiness Christ praised to the utmost His Holiness Moses, exalting and glorifying him. It was His Holiness Christ who spread the name of Moses throughout the East and the West. He praised the prophets of Israel and all the Israelitish people. It was through the New Testament that the Old Testament was spread throughout the world.

Likewise, when Muḥammad appeared he praised to the highest His Holiness Christ. It is written in the Qur’án that His Holiness Christ was verily the word of God, that Christ was the spirit of God, that Christ was born of the Holy Spirit, and that Mary was virtuous and sanctified. The highest commendation and homage are expressed for His Holiness Christ, to the extent that in several suras, or chapters, in the Qur’án there are praises of John the Baptist, His Holiness Christ and virtuous Mary.

So also did the Báḅ and His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh praise and exalt all the divine manifestations. They praised His Holiness Christ beyond description or imagination. Were all their references to that holy personage to be put into a book they would form a large volume. Bahá’u’lláh wrote many commentaries on the gospel, bringing to light its inner significances.

The prophets had for one another the utmost love. They exalted one another. They offered one another the greatest homage. Then why should the followers of these mighty teachers wage war on one another and kill one another? Why should they lay waste the homes and spill the blood of one another, even as you witness now in the Balkans? This barbarism, bloodthirstiness, wrong and oppression emanate from religious prejudice. There is no other cause. Therefore, let us pray that God will guide the souls, that he will rescue the “wolves” from their ferocity, so that they may become as lambs and as birds of peace and flock together. Thus will darkness disappear from the horizon of the world and the teachings of God illumine the East and the West.

This is our utmost desire. This is our most fervent supplication at the divine threshold.

I have come from the far off Orient, traversing long distances, because I have loved you very much. The American people being most peace loving, desire peace for all humanity; therefore your noble thoughts and strivings afford me great joy.

REMARKS BY REV. LEAVITT

We are very grateful to this prophet of peace and good will from the East, also to Dr. Farid for his beautiful translation.

We shall close our service by singing a hymn, after which I shall ask ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to pronounce the benediction.

BENEDICTION BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

O Lord, thou who art merciful, thou who art generous, verily thou dost witness what a fire of corruption has been ignited and is flaming in the Balkans. Verily thou desirest peace for those ignorant people, but they seek warfare. Thou desirest for them love, whereas they seek strife. Thou desirest for them heavenly illumination, but they remain in the abyss of ignorance and despair.

O God, have mercy on them. Cause them to cease their ferocity and carnage. Regenerate them. Change their hatred into friendship and love. Transform their warfare into peace. O God, transform these wolves into lambs and their ferocity into humanity. Bind together their hearts with an indissoluble bond. Dispel this darkness by the light of thy compassion, and cause the light of peace to shine upon all.

Verily this earth is the graveyard of humanity. It is the everlasting cemetery of man. Notwithstanding this, these negligent souls are waging war, destroying the homes and shedding the blood of one another. O God, lead them aright. Regenerate them and endow them with morals. Imbue them with virtuous qualities and characteristics. Guide them that they may receive illumination from thy kingdom of fellowship and peace.

O God, have mercy upon us. O God, guide the people.

Verily, thou art the generous, thou art the merciful, thou art the omnipotent.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Oakland, Sunday evening, October 6, 1912

REMARKS BY REV. HERBERT A. JUMP PRECEDING THE ARRIVAL OF ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Before reading our scripture lesson to-night I would like to interpose a few words of explanation, which will be easier to say now than later on.

The western world will undoubtedly be remembered for what it has given the race of achievement in practical affairs. But the Orient will be remembered for what it has given to the race in the shape of philosophy and religion. The man whom we are to hear to-night comes as near being the founder of a religion as any one we could invite to speak from this platform. He is, perhaps, not technically the founder of the movement which he represents. That movement really began in 1844 when a Persian, ‘Alí-Muhammad, who came to be known as the Báb, announced that he had a message of brotherhood which the world ought to hear. The government, however, was hostile, and six years after he began to preach he was put to death.

The mantle of his prophet's robe fell on the shoulders of Bahá'u'lláh, who was the father of the present Bahá'í whom we are to hear to-night. Bahá'u'lláh enlarged the message which came to him and interpreted it in more generous terms, until it became a message of universal brotherhood and love, founded on the words of Jesus Christ, but broader than any sect or ecclesiastical organization. The government liked his teaching not any more than it had liked the teaching that came before, and he and his son were sentenced to prison in 'Akká. During their years of imprisonment, their truth has won many followers, and thousands of pilgrims have made the trip to 'Akká simply to talk to these men and feel the beauty of their lives of sacrifice and meditation.

In 1892 Bahá'u'lláh died, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the present head of the movement, entered into the succession. Four years ago, at the time of the Turkish revolution, he was freed from sentence of lifelong exile, and since then has been able to go and come. He has made one trip to Europe, and now he is making this trip to the United States. He is not making the trip for money.

This is the most modern and notable attempt to express the simplicity of a religion of fundamental brotherhood, and those who are Muḥammadans and Hebrews, and those who believe in any other spiritual religion, can come together in terms of actual, mutual understanding and practical fellowship and cooperation.

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá in his oriental costume speaks to you, you come as near to seeing a religious teacher of the early days of oriental civilization as you ever will see in your experience. As you understand the spirit in which he comes, simply to proclaim the truth, — even as Christ walked up and down Galilee proclaiming his message of truth and brotherhood — I am sure you will remember, and long remember, the experience of to-night.

The movement of which 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the head is called the Bahá'í movement, and his definition of what it is to be a Bahá'í is: "To love all the world, to love humanity and to try to serve it, and to work for universal peace and universal brotherhood."

Meeting him a couple of days ago, I asked: "How does your truth relate to the truth of Jesus Christ?" He answered: "The truth of Jesus Christ is the foundation, for what Christ said was reality, and we are but trying to make application of that reality in terms of the modern world."

'Abdu'l-Bahá has spoken in the City Temple, London, and in St. John's, Westminster, London, and while crossing the continent of America he has spoken from many platforms and pulpits, limiting himself to no creed, no sect, always proclaiming the gospel of human fraternity.

Because he is a seer of the East, we will read for our scripture lesson verses one to twelve taken from the second chapter of the gospel of Matthew.

In introducing ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Rev. Jump said:

“It is a very great privilege to welcome into this church of God a prophet of God — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá of Persia. He will now give to us a message, interpreted by Dr. Faríd.”

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

The most important issue confronting humanity to-day is one religious in character. Religion should be the cause of fellowship and unity among mankind, but misunderstandings have made it the cause of discord, dissension, sedition and hatred. Religion is a remedy destined to be the means of healing unto the nations, but the misapplication of that remedy has caused disease, resulting in the greatest dissension and discord. For six thousand years there has been continuous warfare, pillage and carnage among the nations, and even the war in the Balkans to-day is but another instance of the religious prejudice caused by the misunderstanding existing among the people of different religions. Were this misunderstanding to be removed and reality to be investigated, it would become evident that the foundation underlying all religions is one and the same. The foundation of all the divine religions is reality.

His Holiness Abraham was a herald of reality. His Holiness Moses was a promulgator of reality. His Holiness Christ was a founder of reality. His Holiness Zoroaster was a herald of reality. His Holiness Muḥammad was a promulgator of reality. His Holiness the Báb was a herald of reality. His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh was a founder of reality. All these holy souls were founders and promulgators of the one reality, and this reality is not subject to plurality or divisibility.

The manifestations of God endured many vicissitudes and ordeals. Not a day did they enjoy peace. They passed their lives in the greatest hardship, finally suffering martyrdom. All these ordeals they endured for the purpose of bringing about fellowship among men, and for the purpose of giving forth the effulgence of love, in order that the hearts might be united.

However, the reality having been forgotten, or having been discarded, the religionists have substituted certain blind traditional beliefs, which beliefs, being ever at variance, have resulted in naught but dissension, sedition and warfare. Until these superstitious beliefs be discarded and reality be investigated, discord will not cease and ferocity and carnage will not pass away.

His Holiness Moses was sent to unite the hearts of the children of Israel, and he gathered them beneath one tabernacle. At a time when the children of Israel were scattered like unto a flock of sheep, His Holiness Moses proved to be a real shepherd, for he gathered together these sheep of Israel, united their hearts, and ultimately led them into the Land of Promise. Through the blessing of this unity, the Israelites advanced and became possessed of virtues to the superlative degree of their time. Whereas they had been ignorant before his appearance, they later became wise. Whereas they had been barbarous, they became an educated and refined people. whereas they had been degraded, they became elevated and reached such a degree of civilization that they were able to found the Solomonic sovereignty, and many learned men of other nations considered it worth while to take long journeys to the Holy Land to study with the philosophers of Israel. Such were the blessings resulting from the unity wrought among the children of Israel, and the cause of this unity of the hearts was His Holiness Moses who brought the law of God.

Thus it becomes evident that religion is the cause of creating love and unity and promoting fellowship and peace, that religion is an ethical system for the improvement of morality, that religion is an impetus to civilization, that religion is the cause of the spread of education.

After Moses, His Holiness Christ appeared. He was a single and unique personality, with no hosts, no army, no sovereignty nor dominion, no influence nor affluence. He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, and yet, solitary and alone, he was able to hoist aloft the banner of solidarity and peace. He was capable of uniting various peoples and different races. He unified the hearts of men. The Greek nation, the Roman, the Syrian, the Chaldean, the Assyrian and the Egyptian nations were united through the efficacy of his word. Through him their differences were removed, their dissensions dispelled, and no longer did warfare exist among them. Through him all these scattered sheep were assembled and educated beneath the care and shelter of the real Shepherd, and the light of divine morality flooded the world.

The Jews, however, being blinded by traditional superstitions, or dogmas, believed that Christ was inimical to Moses. They imagined him to be the destroyer of the Mosaic law, whereas His Holiness Christ upheld the standard of Moses. He promulgated the fundamental law of Moses. He caused the name of Moses to become known throughout the East and the West. Through the New Testament the old Testament became widely known. Prior to the rise of Christ the name of Moses was confined to Palestine and the Torah was known only to the Jews, but after the rise of His Holiness Christ from the horizon of eternity the name of Moses became known in all regions of the world. He declared the Israelites to be the people of God, holy people, and all their prophets valid. Therefore, had Moses any friend as great as Christ? Did Moses have any witness so fair as Christ? Did Moses have any advocate more fervent than Christ? But pitiful was the state of the Jews, for they were captives of dogma. They supposed His Holiness Christ to be an enemy of Moses, and in the greatest hatred they crucified him.

All the differences existing between the Jews and the Christians have been due to misunderstandings and to traditional beliefs. If the Jews were to investigate reality they would praise His Holiness Christ, and they would be confident that His Holiness Christ did not question the validity of His Holiness Moses, but that, on the contrary, he indorsed the institutes of Moses, the foundation of which was the ten commandments, and these commandments were promulgated by His<sup>2</sup>>st. Thus it becomes evident that differences among the religionists are ever due to misunderstandings resulting from clinging to traditions and ceremonials.

In this century of radiance, wherein the minds of men have become developed, the perceptions keen, the hearts receptive, and all the realities resplendent, the religionists must discover the fundamental reality that the foundation of all the divine religions is one. It is a cause of creating unity and love among humanity, and all the differences and discords are due to misunderstanding, fanaticism, or the prejudice of ignorance.

His Holiness Christ and His Holiness Moses were in the fullest accord, and the greatest love existed between them. His Holiness Moses prophesied the advent of Christ, and His Holiness Christ confirmed those prophecies. But a hundred thousand times, alas! among the Jews and the Christians, even to the present day, there have existed enmity and discord, traceable to misunderstanding based upon prejudice and fanaticism.

All are the servants of God, all are submerged in the sea of God's mercy, and all are protected. God is God of all, and he provides for all. He is the resuscitator of all, and for all humanity has he willed love. But, sorrowful to tell! men have acted contrary to the decrees of God, and have held tenaciously to superannuated beliefs that are opposed to reason and science and are the origin of strife and bloodshed.

Consider. Investigate. Examine. Search. You will be surprised to find, for instance, that in the Qur'án, the bible of the Muḥammadans, there is praise offered His Holiness Christ that cannot be surpassed. Explicitly is it stated that His Holiness Christ was the word of truth; that His Holiness Christ was the spirit of God; that His Holiness Christ was born of the Holy Spirit; that His Holiness Christ was radiant. There is even an account in the Qur'án which is not to be found in the Gospel itself. In bearing witness to the station of that wondrous being it is stated that when Christ was an infant in the cradle he fluently spoke these words: "Verily I am the servant of God; he hath given me the book of the gospel, and hath appointed me a prophet."

Also is it stated in the Qur'án that Her Grace Mary was reared by Zacharias within the temple; that her nourishment was miraculously provided; that after she had conceived of the Holy Spirit and His Holiness Christ was about to be born she rested near the withered trunk of a palm tree, which suddenly attained fruition and bore most luscious dates for the sustenance of the virgin mother.

It is also recorded in the Qur'án that the angels of God, addressing Mary, said: "O Mary, verily God hath chosen thee, and hath purified thee and hath chosen thee above all the women of the world."

The continuous warfare of the last thirteen hundred years, including the crusades, has been due to religious misunderstandings, and even to-day it is aflame in the Balkans. What havoc misunderstanding creates, and what great harm is attendant upon blind belief in superstitions and traditional dogmas! Men go to war: blood is spilled, countries laid waste, homes destroyed, women and children left destitute. They exercise the greatest tyranny against one another, showing no justice, no mercy, no compassion.

The manifestations of God offered their lives in order that humanity might enjoy fellowship. Is it meet that we still should be inimical toward one another, that we still should have differences, that we still should be hard of heart? God has created us that we might live together in perfect amity and love. Therefore, is warfare becoming to the human station?

When we observe the various animals we see that among their own species there is no such discord. There is no strife or bloodshed among them. For instance, among the sheep, or the deer, or the blessed (domestic) birds, you will not discover any warfare. They are animals, supposed to be bereft of reason, while we are men, supposed to be endowed with intelligence. Considering man's intelligence and wisdom, considering the mission of all the prophets, considering the appearance of all the holy manifestations who brought the divine teachings or admonitions of God, is it meet that we still should settle our disputes by the sword? Is it meet that we should be lower than animals? If animals should exhibit hatred and ferocity they should be excused, because they are not endowed with reason. No book has descended upon them. No prophet has been sent to them. No philosophers have appeared among them. No teachings have been given them. Should they be hostile and have differences, they should be excused. But considering the divine precepts and teachings of the prophets that have been given to man how can he expect to be excused when he acts in this wise? What inadvertence! What ignorance! What falseness! What injustice! What irreligion!

When His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared he gave forth the declaration concerning the oneness of the world of humanity. He expounded the principles of international peace. He sent epistles to the kings and rulers. He endured all difficulties and ordeals. His life was spent amid great trials. He was incarcerated in prison. He was enchained. He was banished from city to city. All his possessions were confiscated. At last, in the Great Prison, he departed from life. All these ordeals and hardships he suffered in order that among mankind love might be established. There was no advice which he did not eloquently give. There was no admonition which did not fall from his lips. He promulgated the fundamental principles of the divine religions. He confirmed the teachings of all the prophets of God.

In Persia, among those who have harkened to the admonitions of Bahá'u'lláh, you will find Zoroastrian, Jew, Christian, Muḥammadan, Buddhist, associating one with the other in perfect accord and good will, entertaining no ill thought or enmity, no rancor, no feeling of estrangement or alienation, but all living together in complete understanding and love. Is this not better than shedding the blood of one another, anathematizing and calling one another infidel, and sacrificing innocent, helpless creatures because of religious prejudice?

I have come from distant countries, and I am glad to find that the United States is such a populous and prosperous country. The American people are noble in character. They have lofty thoughts, keen perceptions, and a superlative degree of civilization. I am hopeful that this noble nation, this fair government, will incorporate with the principles of its administration those of the divine civilization also, and promulgate the heavenly teachings of God.

The heavenly civilization consists in the oneness of the world of humanity and universal peace among men. It consists in the investigation of reality and the removal of misunderstandings among nations. I am hopeful that this noble nation may attain to this; that it may uphold the standard of international peace in the world; that it may be the herald of love and good will toward all men. Thus the darkness of ignorance will pass away, the thick clouds of misunderstanding will be dispelled, and the light of reality will shine forth with the utmost brilliancy.

May the world of humanity become reformed. May it attain to a new spirit. May it receive a new bestowal. May it attain to the blessing of God. May it obtain that which is conducive to everlasting happiness. This happiness consists in kindness to all humanity, love in all hearts, amity and peace among all nations. This is God's desire for humanity. This is the quintessence of the teachings of His Holiness Christ and of all the other prophets. Therefore, with a contrite heart and a spirit of supplication, do I pray to God, begging him to confirm you that you may accomplish the great work of the establishment among men of unity, universal peace and all that brings happiness and comfort to mankind.

May you all be confirmed!

BENEDICTION BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

O Lord, thou who art the clement, verily we have gathered together in thy temple. We are thy servants and in need of thy bestowals.

O God, attract the souls, unite the hearts of thy servants; rescue them from the realm of darkness and cause them to dwell in friendship and love.

O Lord, we are shortcoming, but verily thou art merciful and generous. We are inadvertent and impotent, but verily thou art gracious and mighty. We are poor and incapable, but verily thou art rich and able.

O Lord, glance not at our unworthiness, but ever deal with us through thy favor and kindness. Forgive our sins, and in our association, which should be kind and loving, confirm us. May our hearts ever be attracted through thy glad tidings. May our souls be sanctified and our minds sound.

O thou kind Lord, aid us to pursue thy pathway, to turn to thy kingdom, to be steadfast and firm in thy love, and to be worthy of thine infinite bounties.

O Lord, O Forgiver, be compassionate and generous. Verily thou art the merciful, the clement, the gracious. Verily thou art the mighty, the powerful.

JAPANESE INDEPENDENT CHURCH

Oakland, 8 P. M., October 7, 1912

The services were opened by the congregation singing in Japanese “Nearer My God to Thee,” after which a prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Togo, president of the Japanese Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Takeshi Kanno, the Japanese poet, then read an address in Japanese, also an original poem in English dedicated to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, which was translated into Persian by Dr. Ameen Faríd, after which Mr. Kanno introduced ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s address was translated from Persian into Japanese by the pastor, Rev. K. Kodahira, from the oral translation into English by Dr. Faríd.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

I feel great joy in being among you this evening, especially considering the fact that many here belong to my own region, the Orient. For some time I have had a special desire to meet the friends from Japan, for, as I have often mentioned, the Japanese nation has achieved extraordinary progress in a short space of time — such progress, such achievements, as have astonished the world. Just as they advance along material lines, assuredly they must possess the capacity to advance along spiritual lines also. On this account I have longed exceedingly to meet them. Praise be to God, this pleasure is now afforded me, for here, in this city, I am facing a revered group of Japanese.

Judging by the accounts which have reached my ears, the Japanese as a nation are not prejudiced. They ever investigate reality — truth. Wherever they find reality they prove to be its lovers. They are not attached tenaciously to certain traditional superstitions or dogmas. Therefore I entertain the greatest desire to speak to them, in order that through these remarks there will result more of a blending together, more of a unity between the eastern nations and the western peoples. Thus may religious, racial, political and patriotic prejudice, partisanship and sectarianism disappear from among men, for prejudice of any kind is destructive to the body politic.

When we refer to history we find that from the inception of human existence unto this day of ours every form of warfare has been due to some sort of prejudice. All the wars that have occurred have been due either to religious, racial or patriotic prejudice, or some kind of partisanship. Even in this present day there is an upheaval in the Balkans that is due to religious prejudice.

Once upon a time, when I was living in Rumelia, war broke out among the religious peoples. There was no justice whatsoever among them. The people pillaged properties, set homes and houses afire, and caused wholesale slaughter of men, women and children, for they imagined that such warfare was the means of drawing near to God; all of which clearly proved that religious prejudice was a destroyer of the foundations of the world of humanity, whereas religion was meant to be the cause of fellowship.

Religion should be the cause of love. Religion should be the cause of justice. According to divine wisdom, the manifestations of God are sent to establish the bond of love, which is indissoluble. The bonds holding together the body politic, such as the patriotic, racial and political bonds, are not sufficient. For instance, how often it happens that people of the same country have become involved in civil war; how often it occurs that tremendous wars have broken out among people of the same race; how often it happens that the policy of nations may decide to-day upon a treaty of peace and to-morrow upon a declaration of war. Hence it becomes evident that these bonds in themselves are not sufficient.

The real bond of integrity is religious in character, because religion points to the oneness of the world of humanity. Religion serves the world of morality. Religion purifies the hearts of men. Religion compels men to achieve praiseworthy deeds. Religion proves to be the cause of love among the hearts, for religion has a divine foundation, and the divine foundation is ever conducive to life. The teachings of God are the cause of the illumination of the people of the world. Religion is not destructive, but ever constructive.

The foundation of all the divine religions is one. All are based on reality. Reality does not accept plurality. However, concerning the manifestations of God, there have arisen differences among men, some having become Zoroastrians, some Buddhists, some Jews, some Christians, some Moslems, though the manifestations brought one and the same message. All served the world of morality. All invited souls to peace and concord. All summoned the people to the acquisition of the virtues of humanity.

Among the nations certain dogmas, or blind belief in traditions, have arisen. These dogmas are not the foundation of the divine religions. Inasmuch as these dogmas are different, discord has been created, and dissension has culminated in prejudice. Thus prejudice has become the cause of war. However, if we renounce these time worn, traditional superstitions and investigate reality, no discord nor warfare will remain, and we shall become united and associate together in fellowship. The world of creation will then attain to peace; the gloomy clouds caused by clinging to traditions and dogmas will be scattered and dispelled, and the Sun of Reality will shine forth most gloriously.

Verily the prophets were intermediaries of love, though they have been used as pretexts for dissension and warfare. If they did not establish fellowship and love among men, then undoubtedly they were not true prophets, for the object of sending the prophets was to create love in human hearts. Therefore we must investigate reality. Let us first ascertain whether or not the prophets were valid, but let us use lucid arguments and rational proofs, not simply traditional proofs, because traditions differ and are the cause of dissension.

Among the manifestations of God was His Holiness Moses. If he educated a people, it is evident proof that he was a divine educator, that he was a true prophet. The sending of the prophets is for the purpose of educating humanity, because they are the first trainers and the first educators.

Consider how His Holiness Moses was sent to the children of Israel when they were in the abyss of despair, in the lowest stratum of ignorance and inadvertence, and in a state of bondage. He rescued the degraded people of Israel from that condition of slavery and ignorance. He saved them from barbarism. He led them to the Holy Land. He educated them. He caused them to become wise and honorable, and a people beloved of God. He civilized them and caused them to reach such a plane that they were able to found a sovereignty — the great kingdom of Solomon. His Holiness Moses had neither army nor dominion, nor did he have wealth. It was through the power of idealism only that he gathered them together. Hence this proves that he was a divine teacher and educator, that he was a prophet.

We must set aside prejudice and investigate reality. Therefore, let us consider His Holiness Buddha and His Holiness Confucius. They educated the body politic. They trained mighty nations. There is no doubt whatsoever that they were prophets, because the mission of prophethood is education, and each of these wondrous souls educated a people.

Likewise, His Holiness Christ was a unique personage. He arose, single and solitary, to train great and mighty nations — the Roman, the Greek, the Egyptian, the Syrian, the Chaldean, the Assyrian. In a word, he was able to bind them together. He melted these warring nations, as it were, and poured them into one mold, and thus their enmity was changed into love, war was superseded by peace, ferocious souls became veritable angels, tyrannical princes became fair, the human moral standard was uplifted. This proves that he was an educator, that he was a teacher of the nations.

These blessed souls, whether Moses, Buddha, Confucius, or Zoroaster, were the cause of the illumination of the world of humanity. How can we deny irrefutable proof; how can we be blind to such light; how can we deny the validity of His Holiness Christ! To do so would be injustice, a denial of reality.

We must set aside prejudice and the traditional beliefs of ancestors. We ourselves must investigate reality, and we must be fair in judgment.

The old nation of Persia denied all these proofs and even exhibited the greatest hatred and enmity, but we have investigated reality and have found that all these holy souls were sent by God. They endured great ordeals and even sacrificed their lives in order that they might educate us. How can such love ever be forgotten?

The light of Christ is evident. The candle of Buddha is shining. The star of Moses is sparkling. The flame ignited by Zoroaster is still burning. To deny this light would be injustice and a denial of that which is self-evident. If we should forsake superstitions and traditions then all would be united; no difference would remain.

The Arabian nation was instrumental in exterminating the Parsee sovereignty. Therefore the old Parsees harbored the most intense hatred for the Arabs. But we entertain no prejudice against them or their prophet Muḥammad, and we shall never desert the standard of fairness. The Arabs were a very bloodthirsty and barbarous people, in the lowest state of degradation. They were so savage that the Arab fathers buried their own daughters alive. Is there any greater barbarism than that? Those people consisted of hostile, warring tribes inhabiting the vast Arabian peninsula, and their business consisted in fighting one another. They pillaged properties; they captured women and children; they killed one another. And Muḥammad appeared among such a people! He educated those barbarous people. He unified those tribes. He prevented the shedding of blood. He caused them to reach such a degree of power as to subdue and govern various sections of the world. When reading Muḥammadan history we learn what a great civilization was established in Spain; what a marvelous civilization was established in Morocco by the Moors; what a noteworthy caliphate was established in Baghdád; and how much the Arabians served the cause science. Then why should we deny Muḥammad? If we deny him we create enmity. Such prejudice is the cause of bloodshed, the cause of the ferment which has continued for over thirteen hundred years and is even now witnessed in the Balkans.

Although the Christians number five hundred millions and the Muḥammadans only two hundred millions, yet two hundred millions cannot be annihilated easily. And why should they be destroyed when they also are the children of God? Let us strive to eliminate prejudice in order that between the Christians and the Muḥammadans peace may reign. Is that not better? What is the use of war? What is the fruitage of war? For thirteen hundred years there has been warfare. Is it not folly? Is God pleased with it? Is His Holiness Christ pleased with it? Is His Holiness Muḥammad pleased with it? It is evident that they are not.

The prophets eulogized one another. His Holiness Muḥammad declared Christ to be the spirit of God. It is an explicit text of the Qur'án. He declared Christ to be the word of God. He praised Her Grace Mary most highly.

Likewise, His Holiness Christ praised Moses. He caused the Torah and the fame of Moses to be spread.

In brief, the prophets were in the most perfect accord, but their followers have been inimical and have shed the blood of one another.

Amid such darkness of prejudice His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared from the Persian horizon. He hoisted the banner of the oneness of the world of humanity. He proclaimed international peace. He admonished the Persian nation to investigate reality. He proclaimed that religion must be the cause of establishing love and binding the hearts in unity, and that it must be the cause of the illumination and of the spiritual life of humanity. If religion be the cause of enmity and bloodshed, then irreligion would be better, because religion is a remedy for every ailment, and if a remedy should be the cause of differences then to abandon it would be better.

In Persia you will see Muḥammadans, Christians, Zoroastrians and Buddhists assembled in the same meeting, and in accordance with the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh they show the greatest love toward one another. They live together as one family, and rancor and hatred, opposition and molestation, are no longer evident among them.

The Orient has ever been the dawning point of the light, for the Sun of Reality has always shone forth from the East, casting its effulgence upon the West, and therefore you who are the people of the Orient must become the manifestors of light; you must become as radiant lamps; you must shine as stars; and you must radiate the light of love toward all humanity. Thus may you be the establishers of love among all mankind, and the world will bear witness that the Orient has ever been the dawning point of illumination. Make peace with all the world. Love every one and serve every one, for all are the servants of God. God creates all. God provides for all. God is kind to all. Therefore we must be kind to all.

May God assist you!

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY PRESIDENT DAVID STARR JORDAN.

It is our privilege to have with us, through the courtesy of our Persian friends, one of the great religious teachers of the world, one of the natural successors of the old Hebrew prophets. Sometimes he is said to be the founder of a new religion. He has over three million followers. It is not exactly a new religion, however. The religion of brotherhood, of good will, of friendship between men and nations, is as old as good thinking and good living may be. It may be said in some sense to be the oldest of religions.

He will speak in Persian. His address will be translated by Dr. Ameen Faríd, a graduate of the University of Illinois and also of Johns Hopkins University.

I have now the great pleasure, and the great honor also, of presenting to you ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ.

The greatest attainment in the world of humanity has ever been scientific in nature. It is the discovery of realities. Inasmuch as I find myself in the home of science — for this is one of the great universities of the country and well known abroad — I feel a keen sense of joy[a18].

The noblest body of men is one devoting its energies to science, and the noblest center is one devoted to the study of sciences and arts, for science is a cause of the illumination and eternal honor of the world of humanity.

The sovereignty of science is far greater than the sovereignty of kings, for the sovereignty of rulers comes to an end. A king may be dethroned, and a sovereignty may terminate, but the sovereignty of science is everlasting. For it there is no end. Consider the philosophers of past ages. Their sovereignty is still manifest. The Roman empire with all its splendor passed away. The Greek sovereignty with all its grandeur passed away. The ancient sovereignties of the Orient are but memories, whereas the sovereignties of Plato and Aristotle still continue. Even now their names are commemorated in all the schools and universities of the world. But where do you hear the names of bygone kings? They are all forgotten and rest in the valley of oblivion. Hence we learn that verily the sovereignty of science is greater than the sovereignty of rulers. Kings invade countries and conquer through the shedding of blood, but scientists, through their achievements, invade the domain of ignorance and conquer the realm of the mind and the heart. Therefore their conquests are everlasting.

This being a center of education, I am very happy indeed to be present, and in your behalf do I seek confirmation and assistance. May you attain extraordinary progress in your educational pursuits. May you prove to be as radiant lights illuminating the dark recesses of ignorance.

Inasmuch as the fundamental teaching of Bahá'u'lláh relates to the oneness of humanity, I desire to speak to you of the oneness of phenomena. This subject is one of abstruse nature that deals with divine philosophy. By this teaching we prove that fundamentally all existence passes through the same phases, and that every given phenomenon epitomizes the others. An old Arabic proverb says that "all things are involved in all things." You will readily agree that all phenomena are nothing more nor less than aggregate expressions of single elements, and a given cellular element has its coursings or journeyings through various and myriad stages of life.

For example, the cellular elements that have gone into the make-up of the human organism were at one time in the vegetable kingdom, at another time in the animal kingdom, and prior to that in the mineral kingdom. They ever are subject to transferences from one state of being, or life, to another. They go through myriad forms and phases, and in every form exercise special functions. The journeyings of phenomena are continuous. Therefore, you can see that each phenomenon is expressive of all other phenomena. The difference is one of transferences and the length of time required for processes.

For example, it has taken a certain time for any one of the cellular elements in a human body to go through the various processes of metabolism. At one time it was in the mineral kingdom, and had its various changes and transferences in the mineral state. Then it was transferred to the vegetable kingdom, and there it traversed the various grades and stations. Then it reached the animal kingdom, and there also traversed the various forms of animal organism. Finally it appeared in the human kingdom. Thus it has had its transferences and coursings, and again reverts to its primordial elemental state, namely, the mineral. Hence it is subject to infinite journeyings, as it were, from one transference to another, experiencing every stage of being and life. Whenever it appears in any distinct form or image it has its opportunities, virtues and functions. In the mineral kingdom it has certain mineral virtues. In the vegetable kingdom it presents vegetable virtues or qualities. In the animal kingdom it shows animal virtues — the senses. In the human kingdom it is imbued with certain qualities peculiar to the human state.

Every single element of phenomena being subject to transferences in myriad forms and ways, and in every form having its peculiar virtue, therefore it is evident that phenomena, fundamentally, are one; that is to say, existence is fundamentally one. Since that oneness is expressed by all phenomena in the material existence, then how much more should man express it in the state of idealism. It is evident that ideality, as regards oneness, is expressed only in the human kingdom. Verily the origin of material life or existence is oneness, and its termination is the selfsame oneness.

Considering this fundamental unity of all phenomena, is it becoming of man, the noblest of creatures, to sanction strife and wage war?

The human body possesses the mineral virtues; the vegetable virtues, to wit, the virtue augmentative, or the power of growth; also certain qualities, or functions, peculiar to the animal state — that is, the senses; and in addition thereto the human qualities of mind and reason.

In view of this great oneness, is it fitting that man should ever think of strife and sedition? Is it meet that he should wage war when all phenomena are at peace and interdependent? All the elements are at peace. Is it right that man, who is the noblest of creatures, should remain ferocious? God forbid such a thing!

When the contingent elements enjoy a state of commingling, or fellowship, the result is life, freshness, radiance, comfort, peace. All the phenomena that you observe about you are at peace. The sun is at peace with the earth upon which it shines. The zephyrs are at peace with the trees. The elements are at peace. When the least injury attacks them, when the least inharmony occurs among them, what happens? Such calamities as the San Francisco earthquake and fire with the attendant losses. Just a little quarreling among the elements may result in a big fire such as you had in San Francisco a few years ago.

If this be the case in the mineral kingdom, then consider what will be the result of discord, sedition and war in the human kingdom, the superior kingdom of creation. Great will be the attendant catastrophes, because man is endowed by God with mind and reason. Mind is the noblest gift of God. It is verily an effulgence of God. This is manifest and self-evident.

Observe how all phenomena other than man are subjects or captives of nature. They cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the postulates of nature. For example, the sun, colossal as it is, is a captive of nature and cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the laws of nature. Likewise, all the great planets in interminable space are captives of nature. They cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the regulations of nature. This earth of ours is subject to nature. The mineral kingdom in its entirety is subject to nature. The vegetable kingdom, with all its processes of growth, is a captive of nature. So also is the animal kingdom. The elephant, huge and strong as it is, cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the institutes of nature. But man, with his weak body, small as he is, defies the laws of nature, because he is confirmed by the mind, which is an effulgence of the divine effulgences. According to the laws of nature, man was destined to live upon the earth, but through the application of his mental faculties he seemingly breaks this law and becomes as a bird, and soars in the air; he becomes like a fish, and in a submarine investigates the secrets of the sea; or he builds a fleet and sails over the seas.

All the sciences and arts which are now enjoyed were once mysteries of nature, and according to the mandates of nature they should remain hidden and latent. But the human intellect, apparently breaking this law, has discovered nature's realities, and has brought these mysteries out of the plane of invisibility into the realm of visibility.

For example, electricity was once one of the hidden or latent mysteries of nature, and according to the law it should have remained so hidden, but through the power of the human intellect this energy has been brought out of the invisible treasury into the plane of visibility. Little man takes such a mysterious and mighty force as electricity and exhibits it in an incandescent lamp. This is extraordinary. In a few moments the East communicates with the West. This is a miracle. This is beyond the power of nature. Man arrests the voice in a phonograph. The voice naturally should be free, for the law of nature thus demands, but man puts it in a box. Likewise, all the other discoveries were mysteries of nature, and according to nature's postulates they should have remained hidden, but the human mind, which is the greatest of divine bestowals, defies the laws of nature and constantly brings to light latent forces from nature's laboratory.

Being blessed with such a great bestowal of God, does it become us to remain like ferocious animals, like wolves fighting and killing one another? If animals exercise ferocity it is simply to obtain their sustenance. Being deprived of intellect and reason, they cannot discriminate between justice and injustice, and therefore they are excusable. If man displays ferocity it is not for his food but simply for greed.

Is it becoming that man, who is such a noble creation, who is the recipient of such a wonderful bestowal as the mind, should still go to the battle-field? Since man possesses such keen perceptions, and is capable of expressing such liberal and lofty thoughts, making such scientific discoveries and achieving such heights in art and the noble things of life, is it not degrading for him still to shed the blood of his fellow-man?

Man in this world is a creation of God, not a human creation. If the owner of an edifice built by man feel grieved and angry because of its destruction, then how great will be the wrath of God when his creation — man — is destroyed.

God has created man noble. He has made man a dominant factor in creation. He has chosen man for special bestowals. He has endowed him with the five senses. He has conferred upon him mind. He has given him the faculties of perception, discrimination and memory. Considering these good gifts to man, which were supposed to make him as a radiant candle, a manifestor of virtues, an agency of constructiveness, should this great creation of God now be destroyed from its very foundation? Should man allow himself to act in accordance with the exigencies of nature? When he in reality is not a captive of nature but can control his actions. If humanity be not educated, then according to the natural institutes it will be governed by the law of the survival of the fittest.

What is the object of establishing schools and universities? The purpose is to educate man that he may be rescued from the natural or animal condition, from the defects of nature, and thereby be enabled to subvert nature to his use.

Were a plot of ground to be left to nature, it might become a thorny place where only weeds would grow, but if it should be cultivated it would become fertile soil, yielding a harvest. If left in its natural state, it might become a jungle, but if cultivated it would become a garden wherein beautiful flowers and fruitful trees would flourish.

Likewise, neither should man be left in the natural state. He is in need of education — divine education. The manifestations of God were teachers. They were the gardeners of God who transformed the “jungles” of human souls into fruitful gardens.

Therefore the particular function of man is to rescue himself from the defects of nature that he may become clothed with the ideal virtues. Then is it not folly to sacrifice ideal virtues and the possibility of advancement? God has endowed man with a power whereby he can overcome even the laws of nature. It is in his power to wrest the sword from nature’s hand and then use that sword against nature. Is it meet that he still should be a captive of nature and act according to the exigencies of nature’s law of the survival of the fittest? Should he, by following that law, forget his high calling and on the battle-field display ferocity like unto the animal? There is no baser state, no greater degradation for man than this. There is no worse debasement than resorting to warfare. It is a cause of the wrath of God, and the destruction of the foundation of man’s ordained function.

Praise be to God, I find myself among advocates of international peace, the thoughts of all being for the recognition of the oneness of humanity, and the ambition of all being to serve the cause of humanitarianism. Hence I supplicate God that he may confirm and aid you. May each one of you at last become a professor emeritus and cause the spread of science. May each one of you become a standard bearer of peace and a bond connecting the hearts of men.

His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh fifty years ago declared that liberalism among the reli-gionists and peace among the nations must become universal. He declared that the fundamental basis of all religions was one; that religion was meant to be a bond to unite in fellowship all men; that the differences which arose were due to the blind belief in ancestral traditions which differed from the fundamental teachings of the prophets; that because these traditions were at variance differences and sedition were caused among men; that if the reality underlying religious teachings were to be investigated then all religionists would be united and religion would thus be the cause of binding together the hearts of men. He declared that if religion should prove to be the cause of dissension it would be better to do without it entirely. Religion was destined to be a remedy of God. It was to be a panacea for the ills of humanity. It was to be a salve for the wounds of man. If its misapplication or misuse should cause such havoc as war and bloodshed among men then irreligion would be better than religion.

He emphasized the necessity of establishing international peace.

He declared humanity to be one mankind. All are the progeny of Adam. All are one family, the descendants of one person, but it has become such a large family. One cannot conceive of various races in one family. If some of the members were the offspring of a certain person and others the offspring of another person, — in other words, if we had had two Adams for our original father — then there might be a cause for differences. But since all are the progeny of one person and belong to one family it is therefore nonsense to distinguish one from another by such names as Italian, German, French, Russian, etc. All are human. All are the servants of God, and all come from Mr. Adam's family. Then why should differences be created because of superstitious beliefs?

Distinctions of boundary lines were made by despots, their aim being fame or the conquest of land, and for these ambitions they exploited the patriotic feeling of the people, while they lived in palaces in ease and affluence. They ordered to the battle-field the soldiers, the farmers and the laborers, while they as officers continued to enjoy themselves. The despots who instigated wars were self-occupied. They did not forego their pleasures. They lived in luxury, enjoying the richest food, feathery couches for sleep, and the ball-room for exercise. But the blood of the innocent poor was shed for such a superstition as a difference of nationality, whereas all are human, one people, one family, the descendants of Adam.

Such prejudice or limited patriotism is very often exploited when patriotism in a larger sense includes all nations. There should be peace among all nations. God created one earth and one mankind. The earth was intended to be the home of all mankind, but men have made certain arbitrary boundary lines. For instance, one section has been called Germany, another France. When there is war between them men take sides, saying that one is a great country and should be assisted, while the other is a bad country and should be destroyed. These lines being imaginary, absolutely, is it right that the precious blood of man should be shed because of such a superstition?

After all, a claim for territory is a claim just for the dust. Did you ever stop to think that after living upon the earth for a few days man will rest beneath its surface forever? The earth is man's eternal[a19] graveyard. Is it worth while for him to fight for his everlasting cemetery? What ignorance for him [a20]to kill another for his grave! What inadvertence, what thoughtlessness on the part of man!

I hope that you will be reasonable enough not to fight over your graves. It is my hope that you[a21] will attain to the most perfect fellowship[a22], becoming as one family, and ever live in happiness and[a23] peace.

CLOSING REMARKS BY PRESIDENT JORDAN

We are under very great obligation to 'Abdu'l-Bahá for his illuminating expression of the brotherhood of man and the value of international peace. I think we can best show our appreciation by simply a rising vote of thanks.

UNITARIAN CHURCH

Palo Alto, 8 P. M., October 8, 1912

INTRODUCTION BY REV. CLARENCE REED

It is a great privilege to have with us to-night one who calls himself a servant of God, one who is also a great lover of mankind.

ADDRESS BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

Praise be to God, this evening I have come to a unitarian church. Hence I desire to discourse on the subject of unity, which is the fundamental basis of divine teachings, and in all the religions of God there is a teaching concerning unity.

It is evident that the reality of divinity cannot be brought within human grasp. Man cannot comprehend the reality of divinity, because man is accidental (created), whereas the reality of divinity is eternal. Man is limited, whereas the reality of divinity is unlimited. Assuredly the limited cannot comprehend the unlimited, and the accidental cannot comprehend the eternal.

When we observe and study phenomena, we find the mineral, vegetable, animal and human kingdoms.

The mineral kingdom, however much it may advance, cannot be conscious of the vegetable kingdom.

The vegetable kingdom, however far it may advance, cannot have any knowledge of the animal kingdom. For example, a flower, however great may be its advance, cannot conceive of sight and hearing. It cannot realize what is meant by the spirit of man, what intellect signifies, because these bestowals are beyond the possibility of its grasp. It cannot comprehend them, for although both the flower and man are accidental yet the difference in degree is a hindrance to the flower's comprehension.

Since difference in degree hinders comprehension by an inferior degree of a degree superior thereto, how can man ever comprehend God, who is transcendental? Man is accidental, whereas God is everlasting. Man is weak, whereas God is almighty. Man is poor, whereas God is rich. Man is needy, whereas God is independent. Man is mortal, whereas God is immortal. Man is finite, whereas God is infinite. Then how can man ever comprehend or define the reality of God, or even presume to offer unto him homage or praise? All the homage man can offer is commensurate only with his mental understanding. Therefore a divinity that could be brought within the grasp of man's intellect would be but a mental concept. It could not be divinity, because it would have no real existence. All that comes within human conception is man's own creation. Man, being the surrounder of his mental conception, must be infinite in relation thereto; but while a concept is finite and has only an ideal existence, man, the creator of this concept, has a material as well as an ideal existence.

If you ponder over this you will see how clear it is. It is self-evident that the human powers of perception and conception cannot conceive of divinity, because divinity is all-encompassing. The qualities of divinity are evident and shining. The lights of divinity are all-surrounding.

The prophets are like a pure and polished mirror that faces the sun and reflects its potency, effulgence and heat. If we say that the sun is effulgent in the mirror, we do not mean that it has descended from its lofty state and has chosen an abode in the mirror, because that is impossible. For the sun there is no descent. It ever remains in its high station of glory and majesty, but its light and heat may become revealed in a pure and polished mirror, and all its virtues may become visible therein.

The prophets are the pure and sanctified mirrors that reflect the effulgence and power of the Sun of Reality, which is holy and sanctified above descent or ascent, egress or ingress, even as the phenomenal sun.

When His Holiness Christ said, "The Father is in me," he meant that the Sun of Reality had become manifest and revealed in him, even as the phenomenal sun is reflected in a mirror. He did not mean that the eternal Sun of Reality has descended from its lofty station, for that, if possible, would be a limitation.

The light and heat of the sun are one and have become resplendent in all phenomena. There is no earthly form of life that is bereft of the light and heat of the sun.

Similarly the divine light has flooded all regions, inasmuch as the Sun of Reality has become revealed in the pure mirrors of the prophets. This is the meaning of the divine subject of unity and oneness. Consider how evident it is. It is reasonable and in conformity with science, and religious teachings must conform to science and reason.

All mankind receive a portion of the bounty of God. All are the manifestors of the signs of God. All phenomena are expressions of the might and power of God and reveal the handiwork of God. Nothing is the product of Satan. No man has ever been created by Satan. All are the creation of God. All are the signs of God's power. Hence we must reverence the creation of God. We must be kind toward all humanity. Some may be ignorant; they must be educated. Some may be sick; they must be treated. Some may be childlike; they must be aided to reach maturity. Some may be asleep; they must be gently awakened. But everyone must be loved. We must not hate a child just because he is a child and imperfect as compared with maturity, but with the greatest kindness he must be reared and educated in order that he may develop reason, acquire knowledge, attain to wisdom, and become qualified to enter the kingdom of God.

God is most kind. Consider what His Holiness Christ said: "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." What a blessed statement is this! What a sweet utterance! Even the sinner is not deprived of the mercy of God.

Can we deny the efficacy of the sun? It is evident, for although the earth and all phenomena are dark yet they are dependent upon the radiance and warmth of the sun. Thus do we see the signs of God's kindness. Likewise are we dependent upon the Sun of Reality. God bestows his bounties upon all. When we have such a kind God, why should we be unkind? He is our creator, our provider, our resuscitator, and he is gentle and kind toward all. Then why should we not be kind toward one another, instead of creating differences by calling one a Jew, another a Christian, a Mussulman, or a Buddhist? God has created all, and it is our duty to be kind toward all. Their respective beliefs do not concern us. That is a matter between the individual and God, to whom alone each one is accountable.

Our duty is to praise God and to thank him that he has created us human. He has endowed us with sight and hearing. He has made us in his image and likeness. What a bestowal is this! What a glorious crown is this! Then why should we be self-occupied and waste these favors? Why should we deny the favors of God? In thanksgiving for God's glorious bounties we must become united as one family. We must become as one people. We must become as one nation. Thus shall love replace contention and strife, and the world of humanity prove to be the world of the kingdom.

Verily it is the mission of the prophets, the purpose of all the books that have descended upon man, the object of the effulgence of the Sun of Reality, that the fundamental oneness of the world of humanity shall become evident, international policy and the oneness of nationality become established, and the world of humanity become a mirror reflecting the kingdom of God. Thus shall the virtues and lights of the heavenly kingdom become resplendent in the human kingdom, and the oneness of the angelic state become manifest in the human kingdom, that humanity itself may become angelic.

What is the meaning of the word “angel”? The word means a bright and radiant soul, a perfect and holy soul, one who is a manifestor of love, reason and knowledge, not a captive of superannuated, traditional prejudices. Superstitional beliefs, or religious dogmas, are the cause of enmity, tyranny, bloodshed and destruction, and must be cast aside in order that the mysteries of reality may be revealed.

The underlying principle or foundation of the teachings of the prophets, which Christ upheld, concerns the oneness of the world of humanity. That foundation is universal love and peace among all nations, races and religions.

At a time when the Orient was enveloped in the gloom of prejudice and fanaticism, and the horizon of reality was obscured by thick clouds of ignorance, there prevailed religious, political, racial and patriotic prejudice, and a continual state of warfare. Darkness was so dense that not a trace of light was visible. The followers of one religion considered as contaminating those of different religions and displayed the severest enmity toward them. Under such circumstances, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh dawned from the horizon of reality. He revealed teachings that united nations, caused fellowship among the various religionists, dispelled religious, political, patriotic and racial prejudice, and ushered under the tabernacle of the oneness of humanity all the people of reality. Those souls who harkened to the call of Bahá'u'lláh, and accepted his teachings, represented various religions and their denominations, but they are associating together in Persia to-day in perfect amity and love, as though they were of one household.

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh addressed all humanity, saying, “Ye are the leaves of one tree and the drops of one sea.” That is to say, the world of humanity, representing all religions and races, may be likened to a tree. Each nation is like a branch thereof, and each soul like a leaf, but all of them belong to one tree, and that tree is the blessed tree, the tree of life, the tree of sacrifice. Therefore it is not right that strife, hatred, rancor and sedition should remain among humanity. All should live harmoniously in fellowship and love. Thus shall mankind win the bounties of God and in the human kingdom shall be reflected the kingdom of God.

CLOSING REMARKS BY REV. REED

I feel that a man of God has spoken to us to-night. I know no better way to close the service than with a prayer — not a prayer in spoken words, but a prayer in silence. Let each person pray in his own way for the coming of the universal religion: the religion of love, the religion of peace, the religion of the fullness of life.

HIGH SCHOOL AUDITORIUM

Berkeley, 8 P. M., October 9, 1912

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MR. HERMAN I. STERN OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION

It is a distinguished honor, as well as pleasure, to be selected to introduce our guest, our eminent visitor, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

We are familiar with the commonplace remark that the East is given to contemplation and the West to action, the East to mysticism and the West to exact science. We are western — ultrawestern and ultra-modern on this Pacific Coast — yet there is a universal and eternal element that we share with all races and nations. We have learned and mastered a great many little things exactly, but I am afraid we have neglected the one big thing. We are, therefore, glad to welcome a man from the far East who comes with the old message, with the one thing needful:

“Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

“This is the first and great commandment.

“And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

“On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.”

We are, perhaps, more interested in the second than in the first, especially in this time of great social unrest, when we are seeking and reaching out for better social relations, for social justice, for more love for our fellow-man in our actual business.

I know very little about our visitor. I have become interested in his work through friends and have read some of the Bahá’í literature. I understand that his chief work is endeavoring to unify all religionists, to uphold the one element that is common to all religions — the spiritual, the moral and the social. I understand that he comprehends the science as well as the social problems of the West, and so his message certainly is welcome to us. In the Parliament of Religions, in connection with the Chicago World’s Fair, there was a beginning made in this direction. The Bahá’í message of peace seems to be a response to the prayers that went up from the representatives of all the religions of the earth at that time, and I feel honored in being permitted to welcome ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the name of the city of Berkeley, whose guest he is.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Inasmuch as those who are present are especially interested in that which constitutes truth, I shall take truth for my subject this evening.

Truth, or reality, is an exposition of facts as they are — an exposition, however, that is in perfect accord with logic. If a theorem should not conform with the standards of logic it could not be verified, for no issue can be established without proof.

The central reality to-day relates to the oneness of the world of humanity, and its proof is evident, because it is in conformity with reality or fact. The oneness of the world of humanity is self-evident, because the origin and end of human existence are one. All human beings owe their origin to one point, and all return to that selfsame point. The differences of opinion that now exist will be entirely removed, effaced, forgotten. Superstition will disappear and truth, or reality, will become revealed.

Man has a tendency toward certain imaginations or conceptions. For instance, he conceives of certain divisions in the world of humanity, giving a name to each. He calls one member of the human family American, another Chinese, French, German, Turkish, Arabian, or Persian. This is self-evidently futile, because all humanity is one kind — mankind — and there is no distinction whatsoever among men. Racial conceptions are suppositional and baseless. When the fundamental reality is considered it is found that all are human in kind, the progeny of one father, the inhabitants of one globe. That which is reality is the oneness of mankind. Divisions are superstitions. This is self-evident and the proof is manifest. Such a statement is in conformity with reason.

Love is reality. It is the source of life. Consider how love among men is the cause of the life, honor and development of humanity, whereas the lack of love is the cause of degradation and destruction. Hence it is evident that love is truth or reality.

Intellect is reality. It is the discoverer and comprehender of realities. All the wondrous inventions and discoveries are its results. All the sciences and arts are its products. All the conveniences of man are its by-products. It has extraordinary perceptions. It is a dominating force governing nature. Therefore it is reality. This is self-evident.

The foundation of the religions of God is reality, for it is the cause of human development and education, and the source of and impetus to morality. It is the cause of fellowship, composure, confidence of the hearts, glad tidings, spirituality. Hence it is truth, or reality. On the other hand, traditional prejudices, or dogmas, current among men are absolutely without reality, because they are the cause of enmity, alienation and bloodshed. This is self-evident.

The virtues of the world of humanity, which constitute the image and likeness of God, are realities. Science is reality. Perception is reality. Justice is reality. Equality is reality. Solidarity is reality, for a bond of affiliation among men is a necessity. These virtues are the cause of differentiation between man and animal. They are the cause of the life and honor and sublimity of man; hence they are realities. That which is contrary is tradition or superstition, the cause of human effacement.

The knowledge of God is reality. The boundless bestowals of God are realities, for they cause the development of man's spiritual perception and his extraordinary advancement.

In brief, all that tends toward constructiveness is reality, while all that tends toward destructiveness is accidental, imaginary, therefore unreal.

Existence is synonymous with reality. Non-existence is the antithesis of reality. In all degrees of existence reality is visible. Reality is like unto the sun. In the universe there are many luminaries. There are the stars, the moon, the lamp, the torch, and many other light-givers, but all lights have a center, and the center of lights or illumination is the sun. Though a candle may give light, though the moon may reveal light, though the stars may reflect light, yet the center of their light is the sun itself.

Likewise reality, or truth, has a center. Traces of reality can be seen in each one of the phenomena of the world of existence, because each phenomenon has a portion of existence. Existence is reality, and the center of reality is focalized in great souls among men. There are souls who confer life upon the world of humanity, who are the first educators of mankind, who rescue men from the abyss of ignorance and cause them to attain to sublime degrees of knowledge. For example, His Holiness Christ was a center of reality.

All the manifestations of God were centers of reality. They were like the sun. Though it has various dawning points, it is still the same sun, and he who gazes at that sun will recognize it whatever may be its dawning point.

Likewise, he who is a lover of truth, or reality, will recognize the Sun of Reality by its effulgence, regardless of its dawning point.

One of the dawning points of the Sun of Reality was Moses. Another was Abraham. Another was His Holiness Christ. Another was Muḥammad. Another was the Báb. Another dawning point was Bahá'u'lláh.

The people of truth, or reality, are characterized by their recognition of the Sun of Reality reflecting through these different dawning points, while the people of traditional beliefs are characterized by their recognition of only one dawning point of the Sun of Reality. For example, the people of Moses have confined their gaze to the Mosaic dawning point, and though the Sun of Reality appeared also from the dawning point of Christ yet the Jews have not recognized that light.

The people of truth, or reality, are not lovers of dawning points. They adore the Sun of Reality itself, and they will recognize it wherever it may appear, whether in the East or in the West. They do not consider the bounty of God as limitable, but as a continuous bestowal, for were it limited it would denote imperfection, whereas the bounty of God is everlasting. The grandeur of God is everlasting. The sovereignty of God is everlasting.

Sovereignty presupposes subjects, a treasury, an army, and if we say that there was a time when God was not possessed of his creation, or when the Sun of Reality was not shining, or if we say that the time may come when there will be a cessation of the bounty of God, or that the Sun of Reality will not shine, such statements are contrary to the nature of the Sun of Reality, because the sovereignty of God is everlasting. God has always possessed creation, and forever will possess creation, and everlastingly will there be the divine manifestations.

The reality of divinity is not limited. Were it limited it could not be divinity, for how could divinity be limited with finality? It is evident that it could not be. If we say that God could be limited, that a day could come when his bounty would cease and that his names and attributes would no longer be potent, such statements would be contrary to reality, because suspension of the efficacy of the names and attributes of God is not conceivable. It is not conceivable that a time can ever come when there will be no Creator, no Provider, no Resuscitator, no Illuminator of the world. Nor is it conceivable that God can ever be dispossessed of his omniscience, or that he will ever discontinue sending his divine messengers to humanity.

One of the bestowals of God is the sun. Can we conceive of any day when the sun was not? One of the bestowals of God upon humanity is mind. Can we conceive of a human creature without the bestowal of mind? One of the bestowals of God upon the human heart is love. Can we conceive of any day when the love of God will cease? The greatest bestowals of God are the prophets, and the very appearance of Christ and other divine educators of humanity implies the existence of the Creator. Can we conceive of any day when these bestowals will cease?

Superstitions and traditional beliefs are contrary to reality, or truth. Hence it is our duty to investigate reality, no matter whose lips utter it or in which book it may be found. We must not be limited to any one manifestation, because to limit God to boundary lines is contrary to reality.

The reality of divinity has become effulgent or resplendent in all phenomena. Not a single phenomenon has been denied the bounty of God. All phenomena are submerged in the sea of God's eternal bestowals. When God is so kind, his bounty so great, and life so everlasting, how can man be so ignorant as to disregard these self-evident facts to the extent of substituting superstition for reality?

The reality of divinity is manifest in all things, even as the sun is manifest in all phenomena. All earthly phenomena owe their existence and their development to the sun. The bounty of the sun reaches all. The light of the sun shines upon all the earth. It shines upon the trees and upon the plants. It shines upon the mountains and upon the ocean. It shines upon the animal and upon man. In short, the rays and heat of the sun permeate all phenomena. Not a single thing is bereft of the effulgence of the sun.

Likewise, the light and power of the Sun of Reality become effective in each phenomenon according to its capacity. Thus each phenomenon, especially man, is a sign of God's power. Man is the greatest sign, because he is the consummate phenomenon. Man is like a mirror in which is reflected the Sun of Reality with all its radiance.

When we use the word man we refer primarily to the greatest examples of mankind — the noblest men; that is to say, the perfect members of humanity. We do not mean those men who are men in form but animal in character, who are bereft of reason, who are acquainted only with folly, and are submerged in the sea of materialism. When we use the appellation man we signify thereby a perfect man, a man who is created in the image and likeness of God, a man who is a reflector of God's light and guidance, a man who is an educator of his fellow-kind, a man who is a discoverer of the mysteries of God, a man who is a manifestor of the mercy of God, a man who is an advocate of the oneness of the world of humanity. He is man.

Although the effulgence of the sun is reflected in all phenomena, even in minerals, yet the sun has never descended from its lofty position. For the sun there is no descent or ascent, no egress or ingress. Its signs are evident. Its lights are visible. All phenomena declare its glory.

Likewise, the Sun of Reality is revealed in all phenomena of the earth. Its signs, its attributes and its powers are resplendent throughout the endless realms of interminable space. All things attest its grandeur, and all creation is dependent upon it. Neither is the Sun of Reality subject to descent, for that would imply imperfection, and imperfection is contrary to the reality of divinity. Divinity is that which is sanctified above all imperfections. Divinity is an indivisible unit.

Then let us offer thanks unto the clement Lord whose names and attributes are visible in all creation. God has bestowed upon us his gracious gifts. He has given us a body. He has given us mind. He has given us spirit. He has endowed us with faculties and powers. He has given us perceptions. He has given us love. He has given us fellowship. We are the recipients of his favors. We are sheltered in his perfection. We are submerged in the ocean of his mercy. We are his signs. Then let us give thanks unto him, and let us express that thankfulness by associating together in perfect fellowship. Since fellowship is inherent in humanity, why should we shun one another? Considering the divine kindness and everlasting bounties, why should the world of humanity deprive itself of these great bestowals? Since the oneness of God is radiant and manifest, why should humanity be disunited?

It is my hope that you may be rescued from imperfections, that you may be sanctified above all defects, that you may investigate reality, that you may be instrumental in establishing bonds of kindness, fellowship and love. It is my greatest desire that you may receive the baptism of the Holy Spirit and attain unto the life everlasting.

THE OPEN FORUM

San Francisco, 8 P. M., October 10, 1912

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MR. WM. BOON, CHAIRMAN

In introducing to you the speaker of the evening I want to say that the Open Forum always welcomes all speakers who have a message, who have an idea they want to bring before us, but we are particularly anxious to hear from people who are sincere, people who are willing to suffer or who have suffered for their ideas.

I am informed from reading and other sources that the speaker of this evening has spent forty-two years in a fortress. He was taken away from his home by the Turkish government and was placed in a prison. As he has a message, we are very glad to welcome him here. He has traveled considerably and is very tired, and while he would like to answer questions he asks to be excused because of his fatigue, so there will be no discussion. I have now the pleasure of introducing to you ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Although this evening I am feeling indisposed, yet, owing to the love I entertain for you, I have come, for I have heard that you have here an open forum for the investigation of reality, that you are free from traditional beliefs, and desire to arrive at the truth of things, that your endeavors are lofty, that you are not holding to superstitions of the past. Hence I have thought it expedient to discourse this evening on a subject that is of interest both to the East and the West, and to draw an analogy between the philosophy of the East and that of the West.

The criterion of judgment in the estimation of western philosophers is that of the five senses. Their opinion is that only the tangible is reality, and that there is no doubt regarding tangibilities. For instance, they observe light through the sense of sight. They see the sun, or the meadows, and their opinion is that such perception is reality. They maintain that the greatest standard of perception is that of the senses, that one should not doubt a judgment reached by means of the standard of the senses, and that a conclusion reached through the avenue of the senses is a reality, established and certain.

However, among the philosophers of the Orient, especially those of Greece and Persia, the standard of judgment is the intellect. These philosophers are of the opinion that the senses as a criterion of judgment are not reliable, and their proof is that the senses commit mistakes, hence they argue that whatever is likely to commit mistakes cannot be considered as infallible.

Sight is supposed to be the most powerful and reliable of the senses, yet one may see in a mirage a body of water and be undoubting as to its reality, yet the water is non-existent. By the sense of sight one may see as verities images reflected in a mirror, but reason declares them to be non-existent. To the sense of sight the sun and the planets appear to be revolving around the earth, whereas the sun is central and the earth revolves around it. To the sense of sight the earth seems to be a plane, whereas reason proves it to be a sphere. To the sense of sight the stars appear to be small and insignificant, but reason shows them to be colossal bodies. To the sense of sight a spark of fire whirling in the darkness seems to be a circle of light, yet such a circle is non-existent. To the sense of sight, when one is sailing on a ship, the shore seems to be moving, whereas the ship is moving.

In short, there are many instances and demonstrations that disprove the assertion that all tangibilities are certainties, and therefore the senses as a standard of judgment are unreliable.

The perfect standard, according to the philosophers of the East, is that of reason and intellect, because by that standard the realities of all objects can be reasonably compared and judged. They believe that the standard of reason or intellect is perfect and that everything reasonable is true. They consider that all philosophic subjects can be understood according to the standard of reason. They believe that the senses are instruments of reason, and that through their instrumentality an investigation of realities can be conducted. In this belief they differ from the philosophers of the West.

The materialistic philosophers of the West regard man as a member of the animal kingdom. The philosophers of the East, such as Plato and Aristotle and the philosophers of Persia, believe that the world of phenomena represents two great divisions: the animal and the human. There are other divisions, such as the mineral and the vegetable kingdoms, but a sweeping generalization would bring all phenomena into two kingdoms. One is the animal kingdom, which is the world of nature. The other is the human kingdom, which is the world of reason.

Man is distinguished from the animal by his reason. The perceptions of the animal are of one type — the tangible only. The perceptions of man are of two classes: the tangible, which, for instance, perceives the light of a candle, and the reasoning perception, which is capable, for example, of mathematically proving that the earth is spherical in form. The hypothesis of a center of gravitation is a reasonable one, but reason itself is not a tangible thing. Reason is an intellectual verity, not a tangible object. All mental qualities are ideal realities, not tangible realities. Scholasticism is an ideal attainment. It is not a thing that can be felt. It is not a tangible verity. When one meets a scholarly man the eye does not see his knowledge, nor does the ear sense his science, for science is an ideal verity.

The perceptions of man are of two types — the reasonable and the tangible, whereas the animal has but one form of knowledge — the tangible. The animal cannot conceive of the earth as a sphere. It cannot discover a new continent. It is incapable of discovering a latent mystery of nature, such as electricity, and bringing it from its invisible state to the plane of visibility. It cannot conceive of ether as a verity. It cannot delve into the mysteries of creation. The animal is entirely a captive of the senses because it is incapable of conceiving anything ideal. Beyond the tangible it cannot understand anything.

Man is endowed with the ideal perceptions as well as with the senses. For example, astronomical discoveries are among man's achievements, but they have been accomplished through intellect, through the ideal senses. The inventions of man have not been perfected through the tangible perceptions or senses, but through the reasoning faculties. The development of all the sciences has been through the faculty of reason. In short, the traces of the intellect are manifest in man, and man, because of the faculty of reason, is differentiated from the animal. Therefore the human kingdom is distinct from and superior to the animal kingdom.

However, the philosophers of the West endeavor to prove by the human anatomy that man originated from the animal. They say that he lived originally in the sea as an invertebrate, later becoming a vertebrate; after many ages he became so developed that he could creep along the land, gradually his anatomical form showed feet and hands; then he began to walk on his four limbs, after which he slowly developed into the human form, walking erect. These various forms or stages of evolution are like connecting links, but between man and the monkey there is a missing link that the scientists have been unable to discover.

Nevertheless, the western philosophers claim that there are still present in man vestiges of the monkey species. They state that there are remnants even in the animal which indicate that at one time they had organs that are not now present. For instance, the serpent has indications that once it had legs, but because it chose its habitat mainly in holes of the earth it had no use for legs, consequently they became gradually atrophied. The philosophers of the West claim that in the human anatomy also there is a certain vestige of a former appendage, and they assume that the coccyx shows that man once had a tail. On this assumption they base their so-called proof of man's descent from the monkey. This is the quintessence of western philosophy!

Let us now consider eastern philosophy.

As philosophers of the East let us admit that the human anatomy has been evolved from the original form of man when he was a denizen of the sea. However, we contend that man has never at any time been animal in specie, but that from the very beginning of his existence he has been distinctly human.

The evolution of mankind on the earth may be compared to the growth and development of the human foetus. When microscopically examined in an early stage it is seen to resemble a worm, though having two distinct divisions, an upper and a lower, from which are evolved hands and feet. The foetus develops from one form to another until it finally shows that which was potential in it — the human image — and is born into this world. But the fact that the foetus presented many forms, even that of a worm, is not proof that man was ever animal in specie. The transformation from the form resembling a worm to the comely form of man shows the conservation of the human specie.

Even though we acknowledge the fact that at one time man as an invertebrate was an inmate of the sea, that at another time he was a four-limbed being, later assuming an upright position, nevertheless we must also believe that in each of those stages there were peculiarities of his human specie. Even the missing link of the Darwinian theory is an evidence that man is not animal in origin, otherwise the most important link could not be missing, and this link that has not yet been found never will be found.

The philosophers of the East believe that the human kingdom is distinct from the animal kingdom, and their proof is that the animals are captives of nature.

All phenomena are captives of nature. The sun, the innumerable stars and satellites, are captives of nature. The vegetable kingdom and the mineral kingdom are captives of nature. They cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the laws of nature. The sun, colossal as it is, cannot deviate one hair's breadth from the laws of nature. But man seemingly breaks the laws of nature. Though man is an animate being of the earth like the animals, and the exigency of nature demands that he should live upon the earth, yet by defying the laws of nature he can soar in the air, or sail over the seas in a ship, or explore the deep in a submarine. He can imprison in an incandescent lamp such a tremendous and powerful force as electricity and convert it to his use. According to the laws of nature, man is able to communicate with his fellow-man only a very short distance, but through his inventions he overcomes these laws and communicates with the East or the West in a moment. The human voice, according to nature's laws, should be free, yet man can arrest and reproduce it in a phonograph. According to nature, the voice of man should reach a distance of only two or three hundred feet, but through his invention of the telephone it can be transmitted a distance of more than one hundred miles.

In brief, all the arts and sciences, inventions and discoveries now enjoyed by man were once mysteries of nature and should have remained hidden or latent. But through the ideal faculties of man the laws of nature have been defied, and the secrets of nature have been brought out of the invisible into the plane of the visible. In other words, man wrests the sword from nature's hand and uses it against nature, thus proving that in man there is an extraordinary power which is beyond nature.

In the world of nature conscious knowledge is absent. Nature is devoid of memory, whereas man has memory. Nature is without the faculty of perception, whereas man has perception. Nature has no volition, whereas man is possessed thereof. Hence it is evident that there are virtues in man that are not present in the world of nature, and this is provable from every standpoint.

If we assume that the intellectual reality of man belongs to the world of nature and is a part of the whole, is it possible to prove that a part can contain certain virtues that the whole does not possess? For example, is it possible for a drop to contain certain virtues that are not in the sea? Is it possible for a leaf to be imbued with certain qualities that are lacking in the tree? Is it possible to believe that the extraordinary reasoning faculty of man by which he has gained dominance over the earth is animal in character when it is absent in nature?

Only in man is there present the superior faculty that has the power of idealization and that discovers realities. For instance, it makes scientific discoveries, and science we know is not a tangible reality. Science as it exists in the mind of man is an ideal reality, and even the mind itself is an ideal and not a tangible reality. Notwithstanding this, some sagacious men who have attained to a great degree of knowledge in the human world assert that only the tangible is real. In the laboratory of nature they have investigated facts as they are, and have studied sciences and arts, yet they have arrived at the conclusion that only the tangible is a reality worthy of credence and that all else is nonsense and superstition.

How strange it is that men study twenty years in school and college only to reach a point where they accept naught but the tangible and deny the existence of ideal realities! Have you ever stopped to think that the animal has already attained to such a degree of wisdom? Have you ever stopped to think that the cow is already a professor emeritus in such a school of philosophy? Have you ever stopped to think that the cow, without any hard labor or study, is already a philosopher of the superlative degree in the school of nature? Then why should we go to college? Let us go to cowlege!

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, SAN FRANCISCO LODGE

Yosemite Hall, Native Sons' Building, San Francisco, 8 P. M., October 11, 1912

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MR. W. J. WALTERS, CHAIRMAN

Some sixty thousand years ago, when our Aryan race was in its infancy, a great Teacher came to the world — a teacher known as the Lord Vyasa. He gave to the people of the time a message which has come down through the ages. He taught them of the immanence of God, that the divine exists in all men.

Since that time, at the birthing of every race and subrace, great teachers have come to the world. The teacher Vyasa came again at the birthing of the second root race, and was known as Tehuti, Thoth or Hermes. He gave to the people of his day the message of light: the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

At the birthing of the third race, the teacher came and was then known as Zaratushtre — the greatest of the Zoroasters of Persia. There have been a number of Zoroasters since his time.

Again he came, and the world knew him under the name of Orpheus, when he sang into the hearts of his people the message of harmony and beauty, and brought them nearer to God through music.

Yet once more he appeared and was known as the Lord Gautama the Buddha, when he gave to his people the message of the Good Law. Then he passed away from this old world of ours, giving into the mighty hands of his successor the office of world teacher.

Then came one who was known as the lord of love, the Christ, and he gave the message which for the last two thousand years has dominated the thought of Christendom.

But these were not the only teachers. All down the ages lesser lights have shone forth when the people and the times were ready. They were known under many names, but each had a message adapted to the nation in which he made his appearance.

And so to-night we are to be privileged to listen to the message of the great teacher, Bahá'u'lláh, spoken through the lips of his descendant who is with us. He comes to speak yet another message, to show us still another facet of the one truth which men shall recognize once and for all, that they are dependent each upon the other, and nearer that great consummation when men shall be governed by love instead of hate.

It therefore gives me great pleasure, friends, to present to you one of whom you have heard or read before — ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Many investigators of truth hold the opinion that of the seven rays of the Sun of Reality six have emanated and have passed away, but that the seventh ray has not yet appeared. The Bahá'ís, however, claim that the seventh ray, which includes the light of all the others, has appeared in the manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh. We should therefore investigate the merits of this claim, because it is through the seventh ray that humanity will become enabled to attain perfection.

God created the world in six days and on the seventh day he rested. These days symbolize seven stations, seven great manifestations of God. The number seven is oft repeated in the world of creation. The days of the week are seven, and according to ancient astronomy there were seven planets, seven polar circles, and so on.

All the divine manifestations are one reality, but they have appeared from various dawning points. As the phenomenal sun appears at various times from different dawning points, so the Sun of Reality, that reality of radiance which sheds light upon the world of existence, has dawned from various horizons.

The Sun of Reality has appeared heretofore from six dawning points, and religionists are anticipating the coming of the seventh dawning point, or dayspring.

Some are looking for the Messiah, others for the Christ, or the Imám Mahdi, or the Buddha, but the Bahá'ís believe that the Sun of Reality has dawned from the dayspring of Bahá'u'lláh.

The divine religions, by which are meant those based upon divine revelation and possessing a book, are seven in number. Consider the great world religions of to-day. They are Zoroastrianism, Judaism, Christianity, Muḥammadanism, Buddhism and Confucianism, each of which branches into many sects and denominations. According to the Bahá'í belief all the truth of these six religions is embraced within a seventh — the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh — which completes and fulfils the promises and prophecies of the prophets of the past.

The main teaching to be found in the Bahá'í pathway concerns the oneness of the world of humanity. All mankind are the servants of one God. All are submerged in the sea of his mercy. God is the shepherd of all humanity. He provides for all. He protects all, and he is kind toward all. Therefore we likewise should be kind and loving toward all humanity, regardless of race or religion. This is a fundamental teaching of all the religions of God, and the strife and sedition that exist in the world to-day have been the result of blind belief in ancestral superstitions.

One of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh relates to the unification of religion. Religion should be a bond to connect the hearts of men. It should be a cause of the illumination of the human world. It should be a center of attraction to the hearts. It should be a channel for the mercy of God. If it prove to be a cause of discord, enmity and bloodshed, then irreligion would be preferable, because religion should be a door to the knowledge and love of God.

There is no doubt that the oneness of the world of humanity is a reality. Hence religion should be an instrument to promulgate love toward all mankind, because the fruit of religion is love. God did not send the prophets simply that man might acknowledge their greatness. God sent the prophets in order that they might educate man, that they might train him according to love, that they might imbue him with the knowledge of God, that the scales might be dropped from his eyes, and that he might glorify God, the All Glorious, even as your soloist has done this evening. The glorification of God does not consist in merely saying that God is great. That is only verbal and there is no virtue in it. To glorify God means that the reality deposited within the human temple, the reality which is the image and likeness of God, shall become revealed through man. That reality consists in the virtues and perfections of the human world. It consists in the knowledge of all truth. When such lights become manifest from him, then he has indeed glorified God. Otherwise, the glorification of God is only a verbal ceremony.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is one relative to the abolition of fanaticism that is based upon ignorance. Such fanaticism is destructive of the basis of humanity; it is a veil obscuring man's vision and preventing him from seeing reality aright, hindering him from seeking the spiritual development to which he should aspire and thereby attaining to the sublime virtues characterizing perfect manhood. The veils of such prejudice must be rent asunder in order that the light of reality may shine forth gloriously. So long as the world of humanity continues to be controlled by baseless prejudice it day by day becomes more degraded, more steeped in ignorance, until at last the human eye becomes as blind, the human ear as deaf, the human spirit as dead, and man becomes bereft of all the favors. But if this veil of prejudice and fanaticism should be rent asunder, then the light of reality would become effulgent. The light of reality is one, and it is the foundation of all the divine religions.

Another teaching of Bahá'u'lláh is one concerning the correspondence of every religious belief with reality. When a belief is in conformity with truth, and in keeping with science and reason, then it is an established reality, well proved and tried. Otherwise it is a superstition.

In short, the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are numerous, and were I to detail all of them they would not be finished by midnight. Therefore let us consider the quintessence of all the questions.

Man has three aspects. These have been interpreted according to former terminology as three molds.

One is the animal mold, which is also known as the reality of darkness, — that is, a reality emanating from the world of nature, — and in that reality man has faculties and powers in common with the animal.

The second mold is the human reality, sometimes termed the astral reality. It is the mold between darkness and light, in which the soul is able to choose whether it will acquire all the virtues or remain subject to all vices.

The third mold is the spiritual reality, which is light itself.

When man remains in the animal mold, or lingers in the world of nature, he becomes utterly bereft of the light, inasmuch as the world of nature is one of darkness. But when he progresses from the animal mold he enters the human reality, or the stage between darkness and light. From one aspect the human reality is connected with the world of darkness, and from the other aspect it is connected with the world of light, which is represented in man by the third, or spiritual, reality. This third mold comprises the spiritual virtues, and is symbolized by the world of angels.

The human spirit is a center of all virtues. The human spirit is a reflector of the bounties of God. The human spirit is destined to advance and to be enveloped with the effulgence of God, because the human spirit is immortal.

An evidence of the immortality of the human spirit is the fact that it is not affected by changes in the body. The body is subject to various conditions. At one time it may be healthy; at another time it may be susceptible to some pathology. At one time it may be weak or ill; at another time it may be well and strong; or a member may become lost. However, the reality within the body — the human spirit or mind — is the same. If the body should become lean the spirit would not become lean. If the body should become corpulent the spirit would not become corpulent. If the body should be dismembered the spirit would not be affected. In brief, the spirit is independent of the body, and the disintegrations that take place in the body do not affect the soul, for the human reality or spirit is ever the same.

Another indication that the spirit is distinct from the body is the fact that though the body be slumbering the spirit of man is awake. When man is asleep the body is as dead; the eye does not see, the ear does not hear, the tongue does not speak; all the physical forces are quiescent, are as dead. Notwithstanding this, the spirit sees, hears, converses, discovers realities and latent mysteries. Though the physical functions of the body be impaired the spirit is not affected. Though the body become incapacitated the spirit remains intact. Though the body be paralyzed the spirit is not paralyzed.

Among other evidences of the immortality of the spirit is the fact that there can be no effect without a cause. It is impossible for a non-existent cause to produce existent effects. For instance, if we suppose the sun to be non-existent, it would logically follow that its rays and heat would be non-existent. However, we know that the solar energy does exist, because its rays and heat are continuous. The sun being the cause, and the rays and heat the effects, how could the cause be non-existent when the effects are continuous? Likewise, the effects of the Sun of Reality are continuous in the world of reality, for, inasmuch as the influence of the manifestations of God who lived thousands of years ago continues to be felt in the world of to-day, surely the divine manifestations themselves must somewhere be still existent. For example, His Holiness Christ lived upon the earth nineteen hundred years ago, yet the effects of his presence at that time are evident in human minds and hearts to-day. Then how could he be non-existent when his lights are still shining, his praises still sung? He is existent and immortal. The Christ is everlasting, even as its traces are everlasting.

There is another indication that we might mention concerning the immortality of the spirit. When man is confronted with a difficulty he seems to consult himself, as though there were a something within him, a power, a voice. He says, Shall I do this, or shall I not do it? What shall be the consequence? What harm will result? Then from that consultant emanates a certain opinion, and that still small voice says that the results will be either favorable or unfavorable, and advises that the matter should or should not be carried out. What is that something man consults when he thus deliberates? It is undoubtedly the spirit, which is changeless and therefore immortal.

In brief, there are three realities in man. One is the animal reality, which represents the world of nature, and which is subject to disintegration. The second is the human reality, which reality is everlasting. If it rescue itself from the baser nature, it will constantly progress and will become a radiant spirit, because the divine virtues possible of attainment in the human world are unlimited. Therefore there is no end to the development of humanity. Progress is interminable.

Confirmation is everlasting.

If the bounties of God should cease existence itself would cease. The darkness of non-existence would then become universal, even as the phenomenal world would perish if the sun that shines upon all phenomena were for one moment to cease shining. If it were reasonable or possible as a hypothesis to suppose that there ever had been a time when the sun had existed without its rays and heat, we should be forced to the conclusion that the sun had never existed, for the essential requirement of the sun is continuous outpouring of light and heat. Likewise, if we assume that there ever had been a time when the bounties of God had had a beginning, we must perforce believe that at one time there had been no divinity; or, if we assume that a time may come when the bounties of God will cease, we must conclude that divinity will sometime cease to exist. But this is impossible, because the essential requirement of divinity is continuous outpouring of bounties, and for the bounties of God there is neither beginning nor ending. God is eternal and his bounties are everlasting.

Notwithstanding this, some imperfect minds imagine that there was a time when the bounty of God was not, when God was not the Creator because he had no creation, when God was not the Provider because he had none for whom to provide. And there are some who say that a time will come when God will no longer create, when provision will cease, and when the world will come to an end. Such suppositions are great errors, for they attribute imperfection to divinity. This would mean the cessation of divinity, the cessation of the bounty of God, which is everlasting. These are suppositions of immature or ignorant minds, for any one who has the least perception knows that the sovereignty of God is eternal. Sovereignty requires subjects. Sovereignty requires a country. Sovereignty requires princes, officials, an army. Could there be a king without a country, without subjects, without a treasury, or without courtiers? Were a king to be without these requirements of sovereignty it would be obvious that his dominion did not exist.

Therefore, to attain unto the knowledge of God's mysteries, man must know God as a real king, everlastingly possessed of subjects, hosts, dominion and power. Otherwise man will remain a captive of nature — which is the station of the animal, not of man — and will deprive himself of the great bestowals of God whereby the spirit of man is destined to become illumined.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY MR. WALTERS

I have asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá whether he is willing to answer questions relative to the address he has given us this evening, and he says he will be very pleased to do so.

Question. Do the Bahá'ís credit the doctrine of reincarnation?

Answer. The question of reincarnation is a very important question. It is in need of elucidation and amplification. It cannot be briefly answered.

When we study phenomena, with the investigation of truth as our object, we discover that the law of conservation of energy is a reality; that the elemental realities are ever existent, and that phenomena are the compositions thereof; that each phenomenon or existent being is composed of certain elements, this being a scientific fact that can be verified by natural philosophy; that every single molecule is composed of certain atoms; that the ion is indestructible and subject to coursing and journeyings throughout interminable space.

In the mineral kingdom, the single element traverses from one state to another until it completes all the stages of that kingdom. At one time it is dust. At another time it is stone, or crystal, or something else. This single element may then be transferred to the vegetable kingdom, wherein it traverses the various stages of that kingdom. Again, this single element may be transferred to the animal kingdom, and in that kingdom become part of various animal tissues, appearing in different forms of the animal type. At another time, this single element may be transferred to the human kingdom and traverse its various stages.

In short, the single element is subjected to coursings and journeyings throughout the interminable universe, and in every stage it has certain distinct virtues. For these virtues there is no end. Thus it is evident that the single element is absolutely indestructible and eternal. It appears in all phenomena, at most being subject simply to transferences, but not to destruction. It is everlasting.

Please ask ‘Abdu’l-Bahá whether the foregoing answer may be finished. The question relates to the spirit, not matter.

Question. What becomes of the spirit of a murderer?

Answer. Human spirits are manifested in physical molds or bodies. One spirit may be imperfect; that is to say, it may be imbued with qualities and characteristics of a baser nature; it may be ignorant, inadvertent, immoral, evil, contaminating, tyrannical. These vices are the retribution of this spirit.

Again, another spirit may be perfect, wise, knowing, possessed of praiseworthy virtues and human perfections. These virtues are in themselves the reward of this spirit.

One spirit may be radiant, lordly, merciful. These qualities are its reward.

Another spirit may be dark, satanic, animalistic. These qualities in themselves are its retribution and punishment.

The reward and the retribution are the result of states of being. The perfections of man are really the rewards of man, and the vices of man are in themselves the retributions of man.

The murderer, therefore, is submerged in the abyss of vices, and surely he will be subjected to the proper retribution in the transferences mentioned in the lecture, which transferences are numerous, appearing in endless forms and images[a24].

In one of your letters you wrote the following. Shall we add it to the foregoing answer? The last paragraph of that answer would indicate that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá believes in reincarnation. In the lecture he did not mention any transferences of spirit, only the atom of matter.

“If in this world the murderer receives capital punishment this alone is his punishment. The justice of God will not visit him with a second punishment after his death, because the justice of God does not permit of double punishment.”

Question. Do you teach of the subconscious mind? Is it the spirit that answers your questions, or is it the subconscious mind?

Answer. In the human being there is conceived a perfect reality which according to various terminologies has received different names.

Man, in infancy, is called a babe. When he reaches maturity he is called a mature man. When he reaches old age he is called an old man.

The sublime reality latent in man is given different names. When it discovers realities it is called the mind or intellect. When it is the cause of life it is called the spirit. It is the same agency functioning in different degrees. When it answers analytical questions it is called the subconscious mind, because it discloses truths. When it is the cause of comfort and life it is called spirit. This is the consultant.

Question. What have you to remark regarding the physical purification as described by Yogis of India?

Answer. Before we begin the process of purification, we ought to know in what the impurity of man consists. We should know what defiles the spirit of man. Then we can investigate the process of purification. We must not be superstitious about these things. We must understand them clearly.

When a man has the vices of lying, dishonesty, tyranny, deceit, these are impurities that have attacked his human spirit, and he is dark, animal, satanic. Such evil qualities are characteristic of the world of nature.

In what does his purification consist? How can he be rescued from falsehood and become truthful? How can he be saved from ignorance and become knowing? How can he be saved from inadvertence and become attentive? How can he be saved from tyranny and become just? Through what process can he be saved from all these imperfections and vices and become enabled to acquire all the virtues?

Since he is ignorant of God, he must be put in touch with God. Since he is ignorant of the kingdom of God, he must be spiritually educated that he may be able to enter therein. This is the process for the purification of the human reality.

It is evident that a great power must rescue man from these impurities and cause him to attain higher degrees of development. This great power is that of the Holy Spirit. It is the divine power which transforms a stone into a diamond, which changes darkness into light, which saves man from the world of defects and enables him to attain the world of virtues. This is possible only through baptism by the Holy Spirit. All the manifestations of God have rescued man from the contamination of the world of darkness, and have caused him to gain the real purification through the power of the Holy Spirit.

TEMPLE EMANU-EL

San Francisco, Saturday morning, October 12, 1912

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY RABBI MARTIN A. MEYER

Brethren of the congregation Emanu-el: It is a privilege, and a very high privilege indeed, to welcome in our midst this morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, a great teacher of our age and generation.

The heart of the Orient seems to be essentially religious, whatever else it may or may not be, and now and again, out of the heart of the Orient, the fundamental religious message of the world is stated and restated.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the representative of one of the religious systems of life, and it appeals to the Jews because we feel that we have fathered that ideal throughout the centuries of men. This morning he will speak in his native tongue, being interpreted by Dr. Faríd, on “The Fundamental Unity of Religious Thought.” I know that what he will say will be of significance to us, and we thank him in advance for his message and for consenting to address us at the service this morning.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

The first bestowal of God in the world of humanity is religion, because religion consists in divine teachings, which assuredly are preferable to all other sources of instruction.

Religion serves the world of morality. Religion impels humanity to progress. Religion guides humanity to eternal happiness and honor. Religion enables man to gain the life everlasting.

In order to prove these truths, let us first investigate religion from an unbiased standpoint in order to ascertain whether or not religion be an impetus to the progress, development, illumination and advancement of mankind. Let us not be bound by ancestral beliefs or dogmas, for were we to be bound by traditional superstitions then some would believe that religion has been a cause of happiness, while others would believe that it has been a cause of degradation. Hence we must investigate impartially and thoroughly as to whether or not religion has been the cause of human honor and development.

We shall first consider the founders of religions — the prophets. We shall review the episodes of their lives, the events prior to their rise and those subsequent thereto. We shall not present to you traditions that are subject to both credence and refutation. We shall cite certain irrefutable historical facts and evidences well known throughout the world.

Among the great prophets was His Holiness Abraham, who was an iconoclast and a herald of the oneness of God.

Let us observe here how religion has been an impetus to progress. His Holiness Abraham founded a family, which was blessed by God, and it was because of its religious basis that the Abrahamic house prospered. Through the divine benediction famous prophets issued from the Abrahamic lineage. There appeared an Ishmael, an Isaac, a Jacob, a Joseph, a Moses, an Aaron. David and Solomon issued therefrom. The Holy Land was conquered by them and became theirs by right, and the great Solomonic sovereignty was established. Hence we learn that religion has been the cause of the honor, advancement and happiness of mankind, as the Abrahamic episode well illustrates, for even to-day the lineage of Abraham is apparent throughout the world.

Let us consider the greater phase of it. When the children of Israel were in bondage in the land of Egypt they were in the lowest state of degradation and slavery. They were in the lowest condition of barbarism and ignorance when His Holiness Moses appeared among them. Outwardly he was only a shepherd, but through the power of religion his influence became so great that the effects of his life are still potent. His prophethood was recognized throughout the land. His law became the foundation of all law. This unique personage, through the power of religion, rescued the children of Israel from bondage. He led them to the Holy Land. He imbued them with qualities that caused them to progress. They became a civilizing people, a scholarly people. Their philosophy became famous. Their industries were well known. Along all lines of advancement that characterize a progressive people they achieved progress. Briefly, Moses laid the foundation of the great civilization and learning which have become permanent, and thereby the children of Israel attained such a degree of honor and glory that they established the Solomonic sovereignty. Their sciences and arts reached an advanced state, and even Greek philosophers, according to eastern history, journeyed to Jerusalem in order to study philosophy and the basis of law with the Jews.

When a religious cause or movement strengthens a weak nation, such as the Jewish nation formerly was, causing it to attain high degrees of attainment and to become a mighty and powerful nation, it becomes evident that religion is the cause of the advancement of the human world and of the honor and sublimity of man.

In speaking of religion, we mean the foundation of religion, not the traditional beliefs or dogmas, which are destructive and ever hinder the progress of nations. It is recorded in the Torah and is confirmed in all histories that when the Jews forsook the foundation of the law of God, and became fettered by ancestral superstitions, then the wrath of God overtook them and Nebuchadnezzar was sent to conquer the Holy Land. He demolished Jerusalem, burned the temple, and took with him to Babylonia thousands of captives. Subsequently, the Jews suffered further humiliation through Greek and Roman conquerors. Under Titus, the Holy Land was laid waste, and the dispersion of the Jews has continued to the present day. All these vicissitudes would have been spared the Jews had they clung to the foundation laid by His Holiness Moses, which had been the cause of the former advancement and honor of the nation; but the blind following of dogmatic superstitions that later crept in proved to be the cause of their downfall and exile from the Holy Land, their land by right.

Thus we learn that adhering to the foundation of the divine religions is the cause of progress, but that when this foundation becomes obscured by certain traditional beliefs then degradation and retrogression result.

In short, what is the mission of the prophets?

The mission of the prophets is to educate the world of humanity. The prophets are the real educators. The prophets are the universal teachers.

When we desire to disclose the proofs of the prophethood of the great souls or manifestations of God who have appeared among humanity our investigation should be along the line of education. If they really educated and trained a people, causing a nation to attain to the highest point of knowledge when it had been in the lowest abyss of ignorance, then we may be sure that they were prophets. As proof, we do not need to cite miracles, such as the one that out of a rock water was made to gush forth, because such a miracle may be refuted by others. We do not need proofs of this kind. The very life of Moses is proof conclusive concerning his prophethood. We are not in need of further evidence. If a man be unbiased and investigate reality, he will, without doubt, bear testimony to the fact that Moses was verily a manifestation of God.

We should search thoroughly for reality. Reality is one and does not accept multiplicity. The foundation of the religions of God is one reality, and the mission of all the prophets is to educate humanity and to establish fellowship and unity among mankind.

Each one of the divine religions has two divisions. One is the essential division. It is concerned with the world of morality, with the ethical sublimity of human nature. It is concerned with the advancement of humanity in general. It appertains to the knowledge of God and to the discovery of the realities of life. This division is not subject to transformation. It is the one foundation of all the religions of God. In this respect, all the religions are one and the same.

The second division is not essential. It is concerned with the rules of conduct governing society. These are subject to change according to the exigencies of time and place. For example, in the time of Noah, certain requirements demanded that all sea foods should be lawful. During the time of Abraham consanguineous marriages were considered lawful, even as Abraham married Sarah, the daughter of his half brother Haran. During the time of Moses many customs formerly lawful were forbidden. For instance, camel's flesh was forbidden, though during the time of Abraham it was a lawful food. Such changes in religious teaching concern the trifling things of life. They are not important. When His Holiness Moses lived in the wilderness, where there were no penitentiaries, punishment according to the law of God was an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Necessity of time and place demanded direct action, but in this day it is not possible to administer justice in this summary manner. In the Torah there are many laws concerning the punishment of murderers, but it is not possible to enforce those laws now. Modern times are such that even capital punishment is a mooted question. Wise men are divided as to its justification. Consequently laws are valid only for the time being. The exigency of ancient times decreed that if a man should commit theft to the extent of a dollar his hand should be chopped off, whereas the theft of one thousand dollars in this day would not justify such a punishment. The times change and likewise the laws. However, such laws are not the essentials but rather the accidentals of religion. The essentials, which are ideal and spiritual in character because they pertain to the ethical development and faith of man, are necessary and permanent. They have one foundation and are not subject to change. Therefore the fundamental reality of the religions of God never changes.

The fundamental teaching of Moses was promulgated by His Holiness Christ, also by Muḥammad, and, in fact, by all the divine prophets. Their aim was one and the same. They were the cause of the advancement and honor of man and of his divine civilization. As stated before, the proofs of the divine inspiration of a prophet are, after all, his very deeds of greatness. If he uplifted a people undoubtedly he was a prophet.

I now ask you to be very fair in your judgment of the following remarks, setting aside for the moment all religious prejudice.

When the Israelites again forgot the foundation of the religion of God they once more became a conquered people. During this period, while they were under Roman rule, His Holiness Christ appeared among them. He proclaimed the validity of the Mosaic law. He declared the Torah to be the book of God, and he testified to the truth of the prophets of Israel. He eulogized Moses, and through the Christian movement the fame of Moses was spread. It was through the instrumentality of Christ, through the translation of the New Testament, that the Old Testament was translated into many languages and was spread throughout the world, many nations becoming converted to the belief that the children of Israel were the chosen people of God, that the blessing of God attended them, and that all their prophets were the dawning points of divine inspiration.

Hence His Holiness Christ really promulgated Judaism. He was a Jew, and was not against Jews. He did not deny the prophethood of Moses. On the contrary, he declared it. He did not abrogate the Torah. Though the Mosaic law concerned with outward ordinances underwent a change, yet the essential teaching of Moses was promulgated by Christ.

Through the power of the word of God, His Holiness Christ harmonized many contentious nations of the East and of the West. He gathered them within the fold of the oneness of humanity. He educated them in such wise as to enable them to become united peoples, and heavenly civilization was the result. These extraordinary evidences of his power are conclusive proofs of his divine inspiration. Consider how his spiritual sovereignty has been permanent. Verily this is manifest evidence.

Then we see, appearing from another horizon, the prophet of Arabia — Muḥammad. Perchance you do not know that one of the first addresses of Muḥammad to his tribe was a testimony to the divine inspiration of Abraham, Moses and Jesus, and to the authority of their books. He exhorted his people to believe in Moses and all the other prophets of Israel. In the Qur'án he offers many praises to His Holiness Moses, saying that Moses was one of the greatest prophets of God, that he was the interlocutor of God, that he was the bearer of the tables of the law, that God guided him through the wilderness, that when the tribes arose against him he was able to conquer them, because truth is ever victorious over wrong. There are many references of this kind in the Qur'án. I am citing just a few.

His Holiness Muḥammad was outwardly illiterate and uninformed of the holy books of God. He was born in Arabia among barbarian tribes who were in such a condition of ignorance and barbarism that they buried their daughters alive. These tribes, living in a state of dependence under the Persian and Roman governments, were scattered over the Arabian desert, and were constantly warring among themselves. When the light of Muḥammad dawned, this darkness of ignorance was dispelled. In a short space of time these barbarian tribes reached a superlative degree of civilization, its center being established in Baghdád, from whence its influence was extended to Spain, and thence to Europe. What proof is there concerning Muḥammad's prophethood greater than this? It is self-evident, unless one should close his eyes to justice and remain obstinately unfair.

The Christians believe that Moses was a prophet of God. Also the Muḥammadans believe that Moses was a prophet of God. Has any loss resulted from such belief? On the contrary. Because they have exalted Moses and have accepted the Torah, it proves their fairmindedness. The Muḥammadans have accepted also His Holiness Christ. Has any harm come to them because of this acceptance?

Then what harm could result if the Jewish people should praise His Holiness Muḥammad and His Holiness Christ? Such a broad view, if generally accepted, would eradicate the hatred, oppression and warfare of centuries, and thus fanaticism would cease and mankind would become united.

Since the Christians and the Muḥammadans believe that Moses was the interlocutor of God, cannot the Jews admit that Christ was the word of God? Can they not say just the few words that are necessary to change these conditions, in order that hatred, fanaticism and bloodshed may pass away and peace reign forever?

I now declare to you that verily Moses was a great prophet; that Moses was the interlocutor of God; that Moses gave the fundamental law of God; that Moses was the founder of the ethical teaching that has brought happiness to humanity. What harm results from this acceptance? Do I lose by saying this to you, and believing it as a Bahá'í? On the contrary, it benefits me as a Bahá'í, and the founder of the Bahá'í movement, Bahá'u'lláh, is well pleased with me and confirms me therein. He says: "Well done; you have been fair in your judgment; you have impartially investigated the truth; you have arrived at a true conclusion; you have believed in a prophet of God — Moses; you have accepted a book of God, the Torah."

Inasmuch as it is possible to remove much prejudice from the world by this bit of liberalism, why not do it? Why not prevent continuous strife? Why not establish thus easily the bond that will connect the hearts of men? What harm could result from a religion that exalts the founders and the teachers of all other religion? Inasmuch as the followers of other religions praise His Holiness Moses, and admit that Moses was a true prophet and the founder of Judaism, why do not the Hebrews praise the prophets of other religions? What harm would come from it? There would be no loss to them. On the contrary, they would be contributing to the welfare of mankind; they would be instrumental in establishing the happiness of the world of humanity, for the eternal honor of mankind depends upon this modern liberalism.

Our God is one. He has created all of us. He protects us, and he provides for us. Since we, his children, his followers, acknowledge this kind and clement Lord, why should we hate or shun one another? Why should we so heedlessly break the hearts of one another? God is merciful and kind, and his aim has always been that religion should be the bond of unity and affinity.

Praise be to God, the mediaeval ages of darkness have passed away and the century of radiance has dawned, the century of service to the world of humanity, wherein the reality of things is becoming evident, wherein science is discovering the very mysteries of nature, wherein we are establishing the foundation of the oneness of the world of humanity. Therefore should we still linger in our fanaticism and tarry in our prejudice? Should we still be bound by old fables and superstitions, and be handicapped by superannuated beliefs of the dark ages, again waging religious wars and shedding the blood of one another? Is it becoming the station of man? Would it not be better to show love toward all humanity? Would it not be preferable to unite in fellowship, and in a fair and liberal spirit praise God and all the prophets? The world would then become a paradise and the promised day would be realized. In that day the wolf and the lamb will drink from the same stream, and, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, the owl and the vulture will nest together, and the lion and the calf will enjoy the same pasture.

In this prophecy the wolves and sheep are symbolic of hitherto contending nations which, through modern liberalism, will associate with one another in perfect fellowship and love. This prophecy will never come to pass literally, for the lamb will always be the prey of the wolf; the calf will ever be the prey of the lion, because the lion, not being herbivorous, is necessarily dependent upon flesh food. Therefore this prophecy relates to the day of promise wherein certain nations or races, symbolized by lions and wolves and sheep, among whom there has been no bond of fellowship or association, will end their differences and display toward one another kindness and liberality.

Briefly, the age is ours wherein fellowship will be established. This is the century wherein all religions will be united. This is the century wherein all nations will enjoy international peace. This is the century wherein all tribes and races of the world will forget racial prejudice and associate freely. This is the century wherein all countries of the world will become one home for the human family, thus enabling humanity in its entirety to live in love and in peace under the great and broad tabernacle of the one Lord.

READING ROOM AND LIBRARY FOR THE BLIND

San Francisco, 3.30 P. M., October 13, 1912

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MRS. ANDREW S. ROWAN, HONORARY PRESIDENT

While waiting for some of our blind friends to come from the Berkeley Institute, I will tell you of the work we have been doing in this room, which was first opened as a reading room and library for the adult blind, there being in Berkeley an institute for the young who had lost their sight.

We began by circulating books and teaching typewriting and reading by touch. At the time of the earthquake we lost everything. Afterward we began our work again in a small way. We then found that it would be necessary to do more than give merely educational instruction, that we must occupy the hands, in order that our dear blind friends might have a source of income and become independent. So manual arts and scientific massage have been taught. As for the manual arts, you can see examples in the mat on the floor and the baskets on the wall. We have instructed them also in piano tuning and in many other useful arts.

Our friends having now arrived, we are anxious to listen to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the great teacher, the great prophet of peace.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

This revered lady, Mrs. Rowan, is indeed doing the world of humanity a great and useful service, for she assists those who are blind and shows them the tenderest kindness. Because she is giving them an opportunity to be trained manually, and is educating them intellectually, she is in reality endowing them with real sight, — that is, insight. What greater attainment than this could be desired? What is more noble than to aid those who are worthy of such service, and to assist those who are deprived of sight to receive their portion in the world of humanity?

There are two avenues or channels whereby man may learn of the outside world. By reading, man is enabled to learn of public thought, to become informed of passing events, and to become aware of all the discoveries of mankind. This is a great blessing for the world of humanity, and inasmuch as this revered lady has contributed to the opening of this reading room and industrial institute she is assuredly preparing these students for and putting them in touch with the world. The oral teaching given them informs them concerning the world, the holy Bible and all the heavenly teachings. This they gain through the sense of hearing. Through the sense of touch they learn to read the books that are provided for the blind. By these two methods they are enabled to receive the benefits of both senses — seeing and hearing.

There is no difference, after all, in result, whether one reads or hears. The processes are two, but the result is one, and this didactic work tends to endow the sightless with sight and to inform them of all verities. Thus they may read the holy books and inspired writings, and may become informed of all the heavenly teachings. Likewise they may become informed of historical and scientific matters and other experiences of the world of humanity, even as those who are endowed with the sense of sight. Therefore we must be most grateful for such undertakings and for such efforts. The body politic, in its entirety, must be grateful for institutions similar to this.

Among the prophets there have been some personages who were sightless, for instance Isaac, but there have been none who were deaf. Why? Because blindness is not a hindrance to gaining information, understanding, or discrimination, but deafness is, for he who is deaf cannot make others understand, nor can he himself understand clearly. If the sense of hearing be defective, the sense of speech also will become defective. He who is congenitally deaf is likewise dumb, and therefore is handicapped in trying to understand and in making others understand; but if he be sightless he is deprived only of visualization.

The instruction given in this praiseworthy institution makes it possible for you to come into full touch with the world, because you are taught to use your other senses, through which you may obtain accurate knowledge of the past and of the present.

You who are bereft of outward sight, be not sad, be not grieved on this account, for insight is all important. Lack of sight prevents man from visualizing objects, but it is not a hindrance to his appreciation of realities. Lack of insight, however, deprives man of appreciating the station of the prophets and understanding their teachings. Lack of insight deprives him of the knowledge of God and the comprehension of realities.

Physical sight is not of great importance, therefore blindness should not be considered a defect. However, to be without insight is verily a great defect, because man is then incapable of understanding the mercy of God. Lack of insight deprives man of faith and of a consciousness of God. That is why His Holiness Christ, referring to the prophecy of Isaiah, said that having eyes they perceived not, having ears they heard not, having hearts yet they understood not. Those of whom he spoke were endowed with sight, with hearing, and with hearts, yet he said that they did not see, nor hear, nor understand. Therefore, it is evident that insight is essential. Man must strive to gain it, for insight is the cause of knowledge and of the life everlasting. Through insight man attains to faith and wisdom, and becomes capable of discovering verities. Insight is all important, and, praise be to God, you are endowed therewith. Because of this, you are in the estimation of Christ as those who see. You see with the inner eye the signs of God; you comprehend the realities of heaven, for you are believing and confident; you have attained unto the knowledge of God.

The sight of the physical and ordinary eye will some day pass away. Only for a short time does the eye exercise its function; then it becomes shut. But the power of insight is eternal; it is a heavenly gift, and through it man discovers the Kingdom. Through it he can see aright the beauty of God and the holy verities, and can discern the very mysteries of God. Praise be to God, you have this insight, therefore be not grieved. Though you are deprived of a drop, yet you possess the ocean. Though you are bereft of an atom, yet you possess the sun. Then praise God, supplicate him to make your insight acute, to increase and strengthen it, so that it will take the place of all the senses. Praise be to God, you are confirmed with a power which comprehends virtually all the others. This is a blessing for which you should be ever thankful, for through this gift of insight you may enter the Kingdom of God and from every standpoint become endowed with all the heavenly blessings.

Though in this world you do not see the dust, yet, praise be to God, in the Kingdom of God, through your insight, you will see purity. Though here you do not see physical objects, yet in the Kingdom of God you will see the holy souls; you will see the sanctity and beauty of Christ, and you will see Bahá'u'lláh, the Glory of God. This is a wonderful bestowal. Therefore thank God for this great bounty.

THE CENTURY CLUB OF CALIFORNIA

San Francisco, 3.30 P. M., October 16, 1912

ADDRESS BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

I am delighted to speak before this gathering of revered ladies who have met for the purpose of investigation the realities of life.

In the world of existence there is nothing so important as the investigation of reality, for the illumination of mankind is dependent upon the Sun of Reality. In the annals of human history we find certain critical epochs wherein the darkness of ignorance prevailed, but when the Sun of Reality shone forth this darkness was dispelled and the world was illumined anew. Among such periods of darkness was that preceding the appearance of His Holiness Christ. When the Sun of Reality appeared through the instrumentality of Christ the horizon of the human world was flooded with light, mankind began to progress, and realities became revealed. Thereby we learn that reality is light, and light is reality. In these modern days there are facing humanity difficult questions and great problems, which can be solved only by means of the light of the Sun of Reality, and the one whereof I shall speak this afternoon relates to the equality of man and woman.

People are divided into two classes concerning this question. Some believe that man is the greater and preferable member of the body politic, that he is created with certain superior virtues, and that woman, however great may be her attainment, can never reach man's level, because she is not endowed with equal faculties. At present the majority is of this class. The other class, now representing the minority, but which ere long may become the majority, is of the opinion that perfect equality already exists. Those who are of this minority declare, first, that God is just, and justice demands an equal distribution of good gifts. They reason logically that it would be tyranny for God to show partiality, and the Lord is free from tyranny. They declare, secondly, that both man and woman being human all faculties and powers should be shared in common; that since creationally one sex has not been shown preference over the other we should not make a distinction that God has not created. They declare, thirdly, that though in all forms of life there is a distinction of gender yet there is perfect equality between the male and the female, even in the vegetable kingdom, wherein there is no conscious knowledge. The male animal does not assert any supposed superiority, nor is there any fight for "suffrage." Then why should man show such injustice, considering that he is of a higher creation, endowed with reason, informed of the justice of God, and capable of discovering realities. God has created man and woman equal — for both are human — yet there are those who claim superiority of man.

In the world of phenomena the co-ordinate elements of male and female may be compared to the two eyes of man. Should one eye be defective undoubtedly the sight of the other eye would be affected, because sympathetic co-operation is necessary for complete usefulness. Unless both eyes are normal the visual process cannot be perfect. Similarly, until man and woman attain the realization of co-equality the progress of the world will be hindered.

The world of humanity is possessed of two wings. One wing is represented by man, the other by woman. When one wing of a bird is defective its flight is hindered, but when both wings are equal in strength and capability then the flight of the bird is made easy. Likewise, in the world of humanity, when its two members shall enjoy equal rights then the body politic will wing its way onward and upward.

The great educator of man is woman, for it is the mother who is the first teacher.

If the mother be deficient in her attainments, if the teacher be illiterate, how can the pupil be perfect? Therefore the teacher must be well qualified that the pupil may be equally qualified. Then how can man assert that his first educator, the loving mother who gave him his first training, is deficient in qualities that make a human being perfect? What ignorance and injustice it is that the mother should rear and educate the child, passing many weary days and sleepless nights laboring and caring for him until he reaches the age of maturity, only to hear him declare: "O mother, you are imperfect, whereas I am perfect. You are weak, whereas I am mighty. You are deficient mentally, whereas I am equipped intellectually. I possess capabilities whereof you are deficient. I am superior to you. I am nobler than you." Is this a just compensation for all the labor and tender care given him? What ignorance, what manifest wrong and oppression that a man should thus imagine his own mother to be imperfect and incapable after twenty years of care and service!

In the world of humanity the most productive and useful member, after all, is woman, for it is woman who educates man, not the reverse. She rears the children; she cares for the home upon which the body politic is founded; she gives birth to mighty leaders. Therefore the right of woman is truly great. Man, on the contrary, does not endure a great deal of hardship. His sleep is not disturbed by night, nor is his attention distracted by day, for as far as the children are concerned the father is quite care free. It is only when they are mature and no longer troublesome that the father revels in their companionship. Hence it is the duty of man to be most grateful to womankind, saying: "O women, O mothers, how kind and tender have you been toward us! By your aid have we been able to reach maturity. Verily, never can we be sufficiently thankful unto you." Regardless of this, when woman demands her rights she is refused, man claiming that in brain efficiency, susceptibility and mental balance she is deficient, and consequently is inferior to him. When asked how he arrives at this conclusion, the only practical and tangible reason he offers is that the weight of her brain is somewhat less than his. However, this argument is not in accordance with facts, since the history of brain efficiency shows that large brains and large heads are not necessarily indicative of intelligence, because the greatest intelligence has often been found in rather small brains and very small heads. If the weight of the brain and the size of the skull were indicative of brain efficiency, then verily the donkey would be more brainy than man!

Brain power is not dependent upon the size of the skull or upon its contents, but upon the character of the convolutions of the brain. The brilliancy of electric light is not dependent upon the lamp, but upon the character of the electric energy. Likewise, the power of mind is not dependent upon the size and weight of the brain, but upon the faculty that operates through it.

It must be admitted that in the past woman has not had the same educational opportunities that man has received, but when she is given equal advantages undoubtedly she will become his peer in knowledge and attainments.

Another objection to the claim of equality advanced by man is that woman has not played the part of valor on the battle-field, and that she has not wielded a sword, nor carried a gun, nor has she ever been a builder of cannon. However, capability in this direction is ferocity, and a lack thereof is not a deficiency. If such capability be courage, then verily the wolf is a most courageous animal, because its ferocity is great indeed. But true courage is not dependent upon an exhibition of ferocity, upon the shedding of blood. On the contrary, it is dependent upon perception, reason, knowledge, attainment, perfection. Therefore lack of ferocity in woman is not an indication of deficiency in courage. In fact, history proves that there have been women who on the battle-field have even surpassed men in point of valor.

Among famous women of history was Zenobia, who, as you well know, was queen of Palmyra in the East. Her conquest of Egypt and her growing power alarmed Aurelian, the Roman Emperor, and he sent one of his generals to check her advance. Zenobia proved her valor by appearing in military uniform at the head of her forces and leading them to victory, causing the Roman army to retreat into Europe. Finally Aurelian decided to subdue her himself, but in his first attempt he was not successful. It was only after a long siege of Palmyra that Zenobia was compelled to surrender. Eventually she was taken a captive to Rome, where she figured conspicuously in the triumphal procession of Aurelian. Bound by golden chains and loaded with jewels, she staggered on foot before the emperor in his magnificent chariot. The array of elephants, tigers, lions, bears, wolves, monkeys, etc., that had preceded her were intended to humiliate her but at the same time to symbolize her valorous character. In point of courage she was compared to the lions and tigers, and because of her cunning and strategy she was likened to the wolves and the monkeys, and so on. Above all, the emperor sought to show how great he had been in taking such a valiant and powerful antagonist. Aurelian ruled virtually half the world, yet for two years Zenobia had defied the power of Rome. Had she been sovereign over as many countries as was Aurelian, what would she not have accomplished through such fortitude and ambition.

Among the heroic women of history was also Catherine of Russia, and had it not been for her the Russian sovereignty would have been entirely effaced and Peter the Great would have been defeated. This woman, through her great shrewdness and valor, protected her realm, and was the cause of its advancement. History bears testimony to the fact that she was a great reformer.[a25]

Another was Cleopatra who by reason of her cunning and cleverness frustrated the plans of a Roman Emperor.

Still another was Esther, a woman renowned among the Israelites, a woman of great sagacity, who really restored the glory of Israel.

Among the noteworthy women of the world was Mary Magdalene. After the crucifixion of His Holiness Christ the disciples were greatly agitated, but Mary Magdalene, that noble and spiritual woman, confirmed their faith. She served the cause of Christ with such devotion that her name will never be forgotten.

There have been many women in Persia who have been eloquent, courageous and long-suffering in the support of the Bahá'í cause. Among them was the famous Kurat-ul-Ayn, a most scholarly woman belonging to the ecclesiastical class. She proclaimed the cause of woman with unshakable courage, withstanding the oppression of the Sháh of Persia and of the ulama. Finally she was martyred, but to her last breath she was eloquent and fearless in defending her faith. There are a number of her type to-day, all courageous, mighty women among men. One is known as Rúhání, another as the "Greatest Holy Leaf."

History proves that woman is not deficient, but is indeed the equal of man when afforded equal opportunity. When given the same education as man, she proves most capable, and her susceptibilities, which are keen, reveal themselves, for her perceptions are acute, her intelligence is great, and all her mental faculties are strong. Especially under difficulties and ordeals is woman more patient and long-suffering. When a father dies, leaving five children for the poor mother to rear, she patiently does it, educating them, and giving them that which no other creature can give — the affection peculiar to her mother nature. But in the reverse case it is very seldom that a father performs those duties, and in most instances the children become as orphans and the home is disrupted; but a mother would care for them, guarding them until they had reached maturity, and would give them that which a father could not give. Woman, in rendering such worthy service to humanity, often endures the greatest hardship. Therefore man should be exceedingly grateful to her, and should not claim superiority. This is an injustice that is soon to pass away.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MISS CHRISTINE FRASER OF THE HOME OF TRUTH

'Abdu'l-Bahá hardly requires an introduction, as nearly all who are present have been looking forward to his coming to Sacramento. We consider this to be a great lesson, to have with us one who has lived so close to God and who has given his life to his cause. We feel that he brings a great blessing to us, and the thought in my own heart to-night is one of thanksgiving and prayer, that some one can come to us from the far ends of the earth, from that beautiful place Palestine for Mt. Carmel, we are told in scripture, was the school of the prophets.

'Abdu'l-Bahá comes to us with the great message of love which he has exemplified in his own life, for we have read that when he was in prison, in chains, he said that still he was happy because he knew God was with him. Let us think of this. We know why he was happy. We cannot be unhappy when we know God is with us. 'Abdu'l-Bahá brings us the message of one who has passed on to the higher realms. It is his mission to give the message of Bahá'u'lláh, which was a teaching of love, one God, one Father, who is above all and in all. When we realize this fatherhood we shall understand the brotherhood of man and we shall then love all mankind.

As I said, my thought is one of prayer, and so we shall repeat first the prayer the Christ gave to his disciples, and afterwards a prayer which Bahá'u'lláh gave to us. When a great truth is given forth it is given to all the world — it is given to us — and you will please follow me as I say: “Our Father which art in heaven. Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen.” This is the kingdom which Bahá'u'lláh came to establish. It was his mission to establish this kingdom of harmony on the earth, in order that all should realize the one God.

I will not talk very long, because we want to hear ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but I desire to read to you a prayer given to us by Bahá'u'lláh, so that we may see how closely it parallels the prayer of the Christ. It is a short prayer for healing: “O my God! Thy name is my healing; thy remembrance is my remedy; thy love is my companion; thy mercy is my need and my aid in the world and in the day of judgment. Verily thou art the Knower, the Wise”

Let us think of the divine presence while we repeat another prayer by Bahá'u'lláh: “Thou art my God and my beloved. Shower upon me from the right hand of thy mercy and providence the holy waves of thy beneficence, and draw me from myself and from the world unto the shore of thy presence and communion. For thou art powerful to do whatever thou wishest, and thou art ever pervading the universe.”

These are the thoughts, and this is the teaching, which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá brings to us, to draw us closer to God and to one another over all the world.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá will now speak to us.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

When His Holiness Christ appeared, certain blessed souls followed him as his disciples. They were with their master, Christ, ever watching his conduct, behavior and movements, and listening to his words. They saw the ordeals that were heaped upon him. They became well-informed of all that appertained to that marvelous example, because they were witnesses of his deeds of kindness and of his holy life. Hence, after the ascension of Christ, they hastened to various parts of the world to spread the teachings and instructions which he had given them. Thus the East was illumined, and the light spread to the West. Indeed, this light was the cause of guiding great hosts of people. It proved, in many instances, to be a preventive of war. This is well evidenced in the commingling and unification of the various nations that had formerly been hostile, such as the Greek, Roman, Egyptian, Syrian, Chaldean and Assyrian nations. Through His Holiness Christ the fundamental principle of the oneness of humanity found its expression, and proved to be the cause of spiritual illumination for men, and thereby the breaths of the Holy Spirit became effective in the hearts of the people.

Likewise, we have journeyed to proclaim the appearance of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, for we were witnesses of his deeds and actions. We were witnesses of his imprisonment, of the calamities and ordeals that befell him, and of the persecutions that were heaped upon him. Now we who are his disciples are scattered throughout the world, in order to spread the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh that they may be heard by every ear. Thus may the people become aware of the traces which became manifest through him, and become informed of the great episodes connected with his marvelous life, how he withstood the kings of the Orient, how he upheld under all circumstances the standard of the oneness of the world of man. Perchance you have heard or read of him, but, even so, on this occasion I will give a brief account of his life, the history of his great movement, and the teachings which he gave.

In those early days, in 1844, there appeared a youth whose personal name was 'Alí-Muḥammad, but who called himself "The Báb." The bearer of this title was a great soul, one who showed forth most spiritual signs and evidences. This personage, acting in opposition to the customs and beliefs of Persia, revealed a new system of faith and promulgated certain new thoughts. Therefore the Persian government imprisoned this remarkable man and eventually martyred him.

This revered personage, The Báb, heralded the advent of another, of whom he said, "When he comes he will reveal greater things unto you." Thus, after the martyrdom of The Báb, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared. He was a Persian nobleman, descended from a noteworthy lineage. The Persian government, incited by the priesthood, arose in opposition, and the persecution to which he was subjected was most severe. His possessions were confiscated, many of his friends and followers were martyred, and he himself was incarcerated in a dungeon. For a long period he was enchained, and dire indeed was the calumny that was heaped upon him. Subsequently he was banished from Persia to Irak Mesopotamia[a26]. From Irak Mesopotamia he was exiled to Rumelia, thence to Constantinople. From Constantinople he was transferred to Adrianople, and then to 'Akká.

For twenty-five years Bahá'u'lláh endured great ordeals in the prison of 'Akká. Not a day did he repose. Day and night he was without rest. Notwithstanding this imprisonment and all these persecutions, he manifested the utmost power and strength. Though he was imprisoned, yet he withstood two kings, and eventually he conquered both. While incarcerated in that dungeon, he addressed tablets to the rulers of the world, summoning them to establish universal peace, inviting them to live in unity and good fellowship. Among those sovereigns was the Sháh of Persia, who had sent him to prison, and Bahá'u'lláh prophesied clearly the downfall of the Persian monarchy, for he wrote: "Thou art a tyrant, and thy country will be laid waste, and thy family will be humiliated and debased." Likewise he arraigned the Sultán of Turkey, addressing to him these words: "Thy dominion will pass away from thee." He addressed epistles to all the crowned heads of Europe, enjoining them to establish international peace, and that which he wrote fifty years ago to the kings has, without exception, come to pass. These letters to the kings were published in Bombay, India, thirty years ago, and are well known, especially in Persia, also in most countries of Asia.

In brief, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh endured fifty years of vicissitudes, ordeals and hardships, all for the purpose of spreading certain teachings, some of which I will enumerate.

The first teaching is that man should investigate reality, the dogmatic beliefs current among men being contrary to reality[a27]. All the nations adhere tenaciously to certain blind beliefs or ancestral traditions that are contrary to the fundamental basis of the divine religions, for the divine religions have really only one basis, upon which are to be founded amity, love and unity. But traditional superstitions are various, and are ever productive of sedition, strife and warfare. Therefore all human souls should consider it a duty incumbent upon them to investigate reality.

Reality is one, and when that reality is recognized all mankind will be unified. Reality is the love of God. Reality is the knowledge of God. Reality is the knowledge of verities. Reality is justice. Reality is the oneness or solidarity of mankind. Reality is international peace. Reality is the unifier of humanity.

Briefly, the message of Bahá'u'lláh was that reality underlies all the great religious systems of the world, and he summoned all the nations[a28] and peoples of the world to return to this central reality. Hostile peoples who have accepted this teaching have become united. Contention, strife and sedition have passed away from among them. They have attained the highest state of love. In Asia you may observe that those who have emulated his example and have followed his teachings associate with one another in good fellowship and accord, and the strife and warfare of past times have ceased. The peoples who have heard the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, whether Jews, Zoroastrians, Christians, Muḥammadans, or others, have attained to the superlative state of amity and love. They now present the example of one united family, for they have investigated reality. Reality does not accept multiplicity, nor is it subject to divisibility. Consequently, they have become united and agreed.

The second teaching of Bahá'u'lláh concerns the principle of the oneness of the world of humanity.

God is one. His servants likewise are one. God has created all. All humanity has been protected by God, and toward all has he been kind. Since God is kind toward all and is such a tender, heavenly father, why should we, his children, disagree? Why should we wage war? Why should we not live in love and content? Man is the edifice of God. He is in the image and likeness of the Lord. Surely, if one should destroy this edifice he would merit the displeasure of God. Bahá'u'lláh addressed the world of humanity, saying, "Verily, ye are the fruits of one tree and the leaves of one branch," which signifies that humanity in its entirety is like unto one tree, the nations and the various peoples being compared to its branches and the individual souls to its twigs and blossoms. Therefore all must strive to live in the utmost amity and love and discontinue warring against one another.

The third teaching of Bahá'u'lláh concerns universal peace: universal peace among the nations, among the religions, among the races, among the countries. He declared that so long as sectarianism, sedition, and prejudice, — religious, racial, patriotic, political, — continue to exist among men universal peace cannot become a reality in the world. From the inception of humanity to the present time all the wars that have taken place, all the bloodshed that has occurred, have been due either to religious prejudice, sectarianism, or racial or political bias; and so long as these prejudices continue the world of humanity cannot attain peace.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is the following: religion must be the cause of creating fellowship and love and uniting the hearts of men. If religion be the cause of enmity and hatred, then the abolition of religion would be better than its promulgation. Religion is a remedy, but should this remedy be productive of disease then to abandon it would be preferable.

Further, the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh contain the following: religion must be in conformity with science and reason. If religion be not in conformity with science and reason it is superstition, because reason and science are realities, and true religion must needs be in conformity therewith. God has bestowed upon man the mind in order that he may weigh every fact or truth presented to him. That which agrees with his reason is a reality, and that which reason and science cannot sanction is a phantom. Inasmuch as the traditional superstitions or dogmatic teachings current among men do not coincide with the postulates of reason and science, there are consequently many in the world to-day who shun religion. As these superstitions, when weighed according to the scales of reason, do not appeal to the mind, these people have become irreligious. On the other hand, when the reality of the divine religions is manifest, and the foundation of the heavenly teachings is revealed, every one can acknowledge them, because they coincide with facts and are ever in conformity with reason and science, and by this means irreligion will cease and all humanity will become religious.

Also, among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, there is the principle inculcating the equality between men and women, for he declared that all are the servants of God and are endowed with capacity to attain virtues and to receive bestowals. All are the recipients of the mercy of the Lord. In the creation of God there is no preference. All are his servants. In the estimation of God there is no gender. The one whose deeds are good, whose words are praiseworthy, whose accomplishments are useful, surely is near and dear in the estimation of God, be that one male or female.

When we study nature we find that the male and female exist in all phenomena. In the vegetable kingdom, for instance, there are the male and female fig trees, the male and female palm and mulberry trees. In other trees and plants there is this difference in gender, but perfect equality exists. Also in the animal kingdom there are the male and female elements. Nevertheless there is no superiority observable. Although they are bereft of reason and comprehension, there is perfect equality among them. Then why should man, who has reason, who is accomplished, who comprehends realities, be content to see a great member of the human family remain defective or deprived? This is the greatest injustice.

The world of humanity is possessed of two wings. One is represented by the male, the other by the female. So long as the two wings of a bird are not equal in strength the bird cannot fly. Likewise in the human kingdom: until woman reaches the same level as man, until she enjoys the same scope of activity, exceptional attainment for humanity at large is not possible and humanity cannot wing its way upward; but when the two wings become equivalent in strength, when they enjoy the same prerogatives, the flight will be exceedingly lofty and most extraordinary. Therefore woman should receive the same education as man; she should be given equal opportunities and privileges; she should be allowed to progress along all lines of human endeavor. Thus she will become the peer of man, but until this be done the progress and prosperity of humanity will be retarded.

Woman by nature is averse to war. Consequently she is an advocate of peace. The children are reared by her, and it is she who labors so assiduously in their behalf. Therefore, if a woman have charge of a child until he reaches maturity, surely she will not want to see him killed in war. Hence, should suffrage be granted to woman, most assuredly warfare would cease, for she would be the most staunch advocate of international peace.

Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is this: material civilization not being sufficient, divine civilization must needs be established. Material civilization relates to the world of matter, or bodies, but divine civilization is concerned with the realm of ethics or morality, and until the morality of nations advances and human virtues reach a lofty level happiness for mankind is impossible.

The philosophers have founded material civilization. The prophets have founded divine civilization, even as His Holiness Christ was a founder of heavenly civilization. Therefore mankind, receiving the bounties of both material and divine civilization, has capacity to achieve praiseworthy and extraordinary progress, but heavenly civilization is not possible of accomplishment except through the breaths of the Holy Spirit. Hence the need of humanity is for the heavenly bestowals, and until these bestowals are received eternal happiness will not be realized by humanity.

In short, the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are many. It will not fatigue me to enumerate them, but as you may be fatigued by hearing them brevity is preferable in this instance.

Briefly, the foundation of the progress and prosperity of mankind is reality, for reality is a divine bestowal and is ever the same. Reality is in conformity with reason and is always conducive to the honor of man. Reality is the guidance of God. Reality is the cause of the illumination of humankind. Reality is love, ever working for the welfare of humanity. Reality is the bond which binds together the hearts of men, and which uplifts them to higher and higher degrees of progress. Reality is the unity of mankind, which confers life everlasting. Reality causes perfect equality and solidarity to obtain among all nations, and this is the first step toward international peace.

ADDRESS BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

I have just visited your capitol and its delightful gardens. No other capitol has such charming surroundings. It is most beautiful.

Just as I have found your capitol to be so imposing and distinguished above others, I earnestly hope that especially the people of this most delightful state of California will prove themselves to be the most distinguished altruists of the world. Indeed, this land of California seems to be blessed. It is abundantly fruitful. The climate is temperate. The sun is ever shining. The fruits are delicious and luscious. All the outward blessings are evident here, and the Californians are a noble people. Therefore I hope that they make extraordinary progress and become renowned for their virtues.

The issue which is of paramount importance in the world to-day is international peace. The European continent is like unto an arsenal. It is a storehouse of explosives, ready for just a spark, and one spark could set aflame the whole of Europe, particularly at this time when the Balkan question is before the world.

Even now war is raging furiously; the blood of innocent people is being spilled; children are being captivated; women are being left without support; homes are being destroyed. Therefore the greatest necessity in the world to-day is international peace. The time is ripe for it. It is time for the abolition of warfare. It is time for the unification of nations and governments. It is time for love. It is time for the East and the West to become cemented together.

Because[a29] the Californians seem to be so peace-loving and possessed of such great worth and capacity, I hope that peace advocates among them will daily increase in numbers, until the whole population stands for peace. May the men of affairs in this democracy uphold the standard of peace. Thus may these altruistic thoughts radiate from this center toward all other regions of the earth, and may this glory exist forever for this country. May the first flag of international peace be upraised in this state. May the first illumination of reality shine gloriously on this soil. May this center become distinguished in all degrees, for the virtues of humanity and possibilities of advancement are boundless. There is no end to them, and whatever be the degree to which humanity may attain there are always degrees beyond. There is no phenomenon in the contingent realm of which it can be said, "Beyond this state of being and perfection there is no other," or "This has achieved the superlative degree." No matter how perfect it may appear to be there is still a greater degree of attainment to be reached. Hence, howsoever much humanity may advance there are higher degrees to be attained, because virtues are unlimited. For everything there is an end save virtues, and although this country has achieved extraordinary progress I hope that its attainment will be even greater, for the divine bounties are unlimited.

There are some who believe that the divine bounties are subject to cessation. For example, they think that the revelation of God, the effulgences of God, and the bounties of God have ended. This is self-evidently a mistaken notion, for none of these is subject to termination. The reality of divinity is like unto the sun, and revelation is like unto the rays thereof. Hence, if we should assert that the bounties of God are not everlasting, then we are forced to believe that divinity can come to an end, whereas the reality of divinity comprehends all the virtues, and by reason of these bounties is perfect. Were it not possessed of all these perfections or virtues it could not be divinity. The sun is the sun because of its rays, light and heat. Could it be dispossessed of them it could not be the sun. Therefore, if we say that the divinity or sovereignty of God is accidental and subject to termination, we must perforce think that divinity itself is accidental, without foundation, and not essential.

God is the Creator. The word "creator" presupposes or connotes creation. God is the Provider. The word "provider" connotes recipients of provision. Another name for the Creator is the Resuscitator, which demands creatures to be resuscitated. If he be not the Provider, how could we conceive of creatures to receive his bounty? If he be not the Lord, how could we conceive of subjects? If he be not the Knower, how could we conceive of those known? Hence, if we should say that there was a time in past ages when God was not possessed of his creation, or that there was a beginning for the world, it would be a denial of creation and the Creator. Or, if we should declare that a time may come when there will be a cessation of divine bounties we should virtually deny the existence of divinity. It is as though man should conceive of a king without country, army, treasury and all that constitutes sovereignty or kingdom. Is it possible to conceive of such a sovereign? A king must be possessed of a dominion, of an army, and of all that appertains to sovereignty in order that his sovereignty may be a reality. Even so is it with the reality of divinity, which comprehends all virtues. The sovereignty thereof is everlasting, and the creation thereof is without beginning and without end.

Among the bounties of God is revelation. Hence revelation is progressive and continuous. It never ceases. It is necessary that the reality of divinity, with all its perfections and attributes, should become resplendent in the human world.

The reality of divinity is like an endless ocean. Revelation is akin to the rain. Can you imagine the cessation of rain? Ever on the face of the earth, somewhere, rain is pouring down.

In short, the world of existence is progressive. It is subject to development and growth.

Consider how great is the progress in this radiant century. Civilization has developed. Nations have developed. Industrialism and jurisprudence have developed. Sciences, inventions and discoveries have developed. All of these show that the world of existence is continuously progressing and developing, and therefore assuredly the virtues characterizing the maturity of man must likewise develop and grow.

The greatest bestowal of God to man is the capacity to attain human virtues. Hence the teachings of religion must be reformed and developed, because past teachings are not suitable for the present time. For example, the sciences of bygone ages will not do for the present, because sciences have undergone reform. The industrialism of the past will not insure present efficiency, because industrialism has advanced. The laws of the past must be reformed, because they are not applicable to this time. All material conditions pertaining to the world of humanity have undergone reform and have achieved development, and the institutes of the past are not to be compared with them. The laws and institutes of former governments cannot be current to-day, for legislation must be in conformity with the needs and requirements of the body politic at this time.

This has been the case also with the religious teachings that so long were given in the temples and churches, because they were not based upon the fundamental principles of the religions of God. In other words, the foundation of the divine religions had become obscured and certain non-essentials had crept in; that is, the kernel of religion had apparently disappeared and only the shells remained. Consequently it was necessary that the fundamental basis of all religious teaching should be restored, that the sun of reality which had set should rise once again, that the springtime which had refreshed the arena of life in ages gone by should reappear once more, that the rain which had ceased should shower again, that the breezes which had become stilled should blow once more.

Therefore His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared from the horizon of the Orient and re-established the essential foundation of centuries of sectarianism have ended. The periods of inadvertence have gone by. The mediaeval ages of ignorance have ceased to exist.

Verily the century of radiance has dawned. Minds are advancing. Perceptions are becoming keen. Conceptions of human possibilities are becoming universal. Susceptibilities are developing. The discovery of realities is progressing. Hence it is necessary that we should cast aside all the prejudices of ignorance and superannuated traditional beliefs of past ages and hoist aloft the banner of international peace. Let us co-operate with one another in love, and through reciprocity enjoy eternal happiness and peace.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to San Francisco in October, 1912, one of the firm believers was Charles Tinsley, a Negro butler formerly in the household of Mrs. Phoebe Apperson Hearst at Pleasanton. He had received the Bahá’í Message from her niece, Miss Anne Apperson, and was eagerly anticipating ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit. But alas! shortly before the Master arrived, Mr. Tinsley had been unfortunate enough to meet with an accident in which his leg was broken and he was laid up in bed for many weeks. Being thus obliged to miss all the meetings and the feast, and the intimate association the other friends were privileged to enjoy with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá during His stay, poor Mr. Tinsley was very unhappy. When we explained to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that he was suffering mentally as well as physically in his bitter disappointment in being so deprived, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied. “Well, if he is not able to come to see Me, I will go to see him.” And so we drove to the humble home of Mr. Tinsley and his wife and found him in bed not only sad but even rebellious.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá entered the room like a burst of sunshine, saying in His vibrant voice, “How are you? How are you? I am very glad to see you.”

Mr. Tinsley replied, “I am well except for this broken leg which has kept me in bed for a long time. I am impatient to be up and out and working for the Cause, and I cannot understand why I should have been so afflicted.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “You must not be sad. Cheer up. Praise be to God, you are dear to Me. Come, I will tell you a story.” Seating Himself on the edge of the bed, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took Mr. Tinsley by the hand and began.

“Once upon a time there was a great king who, having much love for one of his subjects, wished to appoint him to a high office. In order to train him, the king gave orders that he must be thrown into prison, and after he had been there a certain length of time he was to be taken out and bastinadoed. He was then to be allowed to recover from this suffering, and finally the order came from the king that he must be hanged on the gallows until he was nearly dead. He was then to be taken to the hospital, and when he had sufficiently recovered he was to be brought before the king. It is easy to imagine the feelings of the poor man who, through these many trials, had had no word from the king whom he loved so devotedly. He was unable to understand the meaning of these strange orders, and he suffered intensely both mentally and physically. When he was finally brought before the king he threw himself on his knees and cried, ‘O my Lord, my Liege, your Majesty, what does this mean, these terrible ordeals? I thought you loved me.’ The king lifted him to his feet and tenderly embracing him said: ‘I do love you. I have chosen you from among all my subjects to make you my prime minister, and these ordeals you have suffered are to make you know what punishment means. When you become prime minister you will have in your hands the lives of countless thousands. Whenever it may become necessary for you to order a man to be punished by being cast into prison you will know how it feels. If it should become necessary for you to order a man to be bastinadoed you will know how that would feel. If you should be obliged to condemn a man to death on the gallows you know how even that feels. It is because of my deep love for you, it is because of your great capacity, that I have chosen you for the highest office in the land, and have trained you for that purpose.’”

Then, turning to Mr. Tinsley, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Even so it is with you. After this ordeal you will reach maturity. God sometimes causes us to suffer much and to have many misfortunes so that we may become strong in His cause. You will soon recover and be spiritually stronger than ever before. You will work for God and carry the Message to many of your people.”

The presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the vibrant tones of His voice as He told the old oriental story had the effect of immediately changing Mr. Tinsley’s attitude toward his misfortunes, and, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left the room, he was smiling happily. When, a few moments later, Dr. E. D. Shaw[a30], one of the members of our Bahá’í community, made his usual call upon Mr. Tinsley, he was amazed to see the change that had taken place. He reported to us later that the atmosphere of the room had been charged with spiritual radiance, and Mr. Tinsley had been so deeply impressed that he eagerly repeated every detail of the heavenly visitation. He seemed to have grasped the true meaning of such tests and trials, and we can all testify that since that time no trouble has ever daunted him or clouded his spiritual happiness.

Even now, again laid low by a sudden affliction, his spirit is serene and his faith unwavering, and it is he who cheers those who call to condole with him.

116. Sects. - Muḥammadan sects are almost as numerous and varied as the sects of the Christian church. Attention can be given here only to the most important. The Karejites (Khawagri), or "Come-outers," were a group that grew up in the early days of Islám. They were radical reformers, and sought to establish a theocracy, urging that a pious man of whatever tribe or nation might be called to the caliphate. They, too, afterward broke up into many minor sects. The greatest cleavage in Islám is, however, that between the Shiites and Sunnites.

Keep for reference

From Ahmad's translation of tablet, dated June 5, 1913:

It is recorded in the histories of the Orient that Socrates traveled to Palestine and Syria and while staying there he acquired certain divine subjects from divine philosophers. Upon his return to Greece he founded two schools of thought. One the idea of monotheism and the other the immortality of the soul after the dissolution of the bodies. The spread of these ideas created great commotion amongst the people of Greece because they were in opposition to their established doctrines. Finally they gave him the hemlock and thus ended his life. The above statement is authoritative. The Greek people believed in many gods, but Socrates proved to them the singleness of God which is a belief entirely against their ideas of Deity. However, the founder of the school of monotheism was his holiness Abraham and afterwards this belief became the corner stone of the Israelitish religion from generation to generation, even up to the time of Socrates. But these facts are not recorded in the Jewish history. There are many things about which the Jewish history is silent. The appearance of his holiness Christ and the events connected with his personality are not at all recorded in the history of Josephus, although he has written the history of the time in which the Christ lives. Therefore one cannot justly deny the appearance of Christ and the events of his manifestation simply because Josephus has not written anything about them.

Likewise it is recorded in Oriental history that Hippocrates lived for some time in the city of Shur, which city is one of the cities of Syria.

10 SCHULKINS 1411

Comprehensive addresses at the Jewish synagogues are proving the validity of the promised Messiah (Christ), and the embodiment of the truth of his holiness the Messenger (Muhammad) is evident.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Irrefutable evidences are being given, brilliant proofs made manifest; all are silent and quiet and happy.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

In the Christian churches the power and greatness of His Holiness the Messenger are quite apparent, the manifestation of the power of His Holiness the Supreme (the Báb) is a radiant proof and the rising Sun of Reality is brilliantly shining.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The ears are delighted with these melodies. All the listeners are astonished and amazed and the eyes are dazzled.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The cup of the love of God is overflowing. The assembly of the friends is full of light and the hearts are discovering the mysteries.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Mr. Ralston is present. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is speaking. Mírzá Aḥmad Sohrab is writing. The Blessed Beauty is here watching.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The beloved are assembled. The friends are like candles and all are beholding and listening.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The light of the Sun of Reality is shining. The blessed Tree is overshadowing and the breeze of the most glorious Rose Garden is life-imparting.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Yesterday in Pleasanton we were at the palace of the maidservant of God, Mrs. Hearst. The palace is very lofty. The white roses are like pearls, the red roses are like red rubies, the violets are intoxicating and droopy, the sun-flowers are like brilliant stars, the fragrant lily flowers and musk scented king of the roses adorn the garden and meadow. The clouds are weeping. The roses are laughing. The trees are laden with fruits. The orchards are green and radiant. The breeze is in the utmost gentleness and the landscape in the utmost beauty.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Events are many. Happenings are minuteless[a32]. Hidden meanings are unfolded. Yet the friends are urgent, granting no time. They are impatient, waiting for the address, expecting answers. There is a tumult, commotion, excitement, clamour! Obligated to be brief, I am waiting as time permits.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

In short, the (situation) is this, I am thinking of returning (to the Holy Land). Busy night and day, without a moment’s rest, either delivering an address, or writing letters, or answering questions or traversing desert or crossing the ocean or passing over a high mountain — the body cannot endure it: the bones turn to water.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

In the photographs which you have received the pictures tell to what extent is the degree of fatigue and weariness.

My hope is this, that ere long I shall return to these regions. The heart is yearning for the threshold. The soul is longing for the faces of the friends.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

In brief, the journey is finished. The morn of return has appeared, for the Pacific Coast has been reached. Beyond are the Hawaiian Islands and the countries of China and Japan. The distance is great. Endurance and strength have come to an end. Therefore I must go to the center of the Sun of Reality and hasten to the blessed Spot (the Holy Land) and I may lay my face in the dust of the Threshold and perfume my tunic. Praise be to God! We are gathered together. In the meetings we are like candles one with another in the utmost fraternity. It is love upon love! Fellowship night and day! The accompanying friends are companions, and assemble united and singing together in the mentioning of the Blessed Beauty.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Convey to all the friends of God the wonderful Abhá greetings.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Upon thee be El Bahá El-Abhá — The Glory of Glories.

O THOU partner of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and sharer in servitude at the Threshold of Bahá! It is night in California, in the city of Oakland at the home of the maidservant of God, Mrs. Helen Goodall. Here these wandering birds have a nest and shelter. It is the Nineteen-Day Feast, a gathering of faithful friends and pure illumined leaves (ladies), and assembly of invocations to the Abhá (most glorious) Kingdom. All the bounties are prepared and made ready, and the table is laid in utmost perfection.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

They are playing wonderful music, while they are praying with a new reciting the ideal anthems and are in the utmost love and supplication.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The faces are illumined with the light of the love of God. The spirits through the fragrance of the most glorious Paradise are like flower gardens. The hearts are like orchards and rose gardens.

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

Great meetings are prepared. Large churches are ready. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is shouting, “Ya Bahá’u’l-Abhá!”

O thy place is vacant! O thy place is vacant!

The publication of the addresses of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in each city depends upon the consent of the believers of that city. Mr. Y. Ishimura, 828 Ramona Street,
Palo Alto, California.

Dear Friend:

Your postal received and we are very glad that you enjoyed the Palo Altan. It may interest you to know that we are preparing for publication a number of the addresses given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in California. One of them was before the Japanese Y. M. C. A. at the Japanese Independent Church in Oakland. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke in Persian, which was translated into English by his own interpreter, and from the English into Japanese by the pastor of the church, Rev. Kunio Kodahira, who astonished every one by his remarkable accomplishment. This talk was published in one of the Japanese newspapers, and much interest was thus created among the Japanese people in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's personality and teachings. We have borrowed a copy of this paper and when we go to Palo Alto to see you we will take it with us to show you. Assisting me in this work is Miss Bijou Straun, one of our Bahá'í friends, who took stenographically all of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's talks. I should like to take her with me, as she is particularly interested in meeting the Japanese - in fact all Orientals - and I know you would be happy to know her. As I, too, am anxious to see you and Mrs. Ishimura soon again, I am wondering whether it would be convenient for you to have us next Sunday or the Sunday following.

Mrs. Frankland is in the mountains with her daughter and does not expect to return before August.

With kindest greetings to both of you,

Cordially yours,

Mr. McCarthy: I would like to ask the meaning of the capital letters at the commencement of the suras of the Qur'án.

A. B. These letters are symbols predicting future events. If you add these letters, each representing a number, without repeating any one of them, the sum total will be the year of the appearance of his holiness the Báb. And in this instance it is recorded in the tradition that in that year Caem (the Promised One) shall appear. If you gather again Alef, Lam, Mim, Ra to Alef, Lam, Mim, Sad, without repeating any of the letters, you will have the following sentence: "Verily 'Alí is the straight path of God. Walk in it." 'Alí was the successor of Muḥammad. Moreover, every letter indicates a station, for example:

Alif, Lam, Mim.

Alif is a sign indicating the station of Divinity.

Lam is a sign indicating the station of Successorship.

Mim is a sign indicating the station of Prophethood.

Again: Lam is 'Alí.

Mim is Muḥammad. This latter is a prophecy regarding the coming of the Promised One whose name will be 'Alí-Muḥammad.

These letters indicate stations.

Beloved Sister:

Enclosed is the talk which was held out. It is not a complete report, but is what three of the friends here can remember of it.

I saw Miss Chevallier on Sunday. She warmed up to us and seemed to enjoy the meeting and feast that followed. The following is the way she gave, or rather dictated what Mr. Blight said, but says we had better get it from Mr. Blight direct, as it is not as fresh in her mind as it was when she first quoted him:

"There is in this city today the greatest man living in all the world, without any question, one who is a veritable prophet, not only to millions of Persians, but to faithful followers all over the civilized world. His followers are numbered by millions, and yet the press of this city gave but a passing notice of this great event, while giving much space to trivial matters, society news, scandals, etc."

I found that Miss Chevallier had her feelings hurt by something that was said to her by one of our best believers on that Sunday 'Abdu'l-Bahá was here, and has been absenting herself, as she stated, for the reason that she does not care to place herself in a position where she will be subjected to such treatment. How very careful we should be to avoid wounding the feelings of anyone.

The MacNutts due to arrive this afternoon. Harriet improving very, very slowly.

In haste, Henrietta.

NAMES OF FRIENDS (REPRESENTATIVE PEOPLE) WHO MET 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ IN SAN FRANCISCO AND VICINITY IN 1912

Mrs. A. P. Black 1035 Bush St., S. F.

Well-known club woman. In 1912 she was president of the California club, and in later years has been active in the Women's City Club, serving a long term on the Board of Directors, and one term as president, and always doing important committee work.

Mrs. David Starr Jordan Stanford University, California

She may have something to add to what her late husband. Dr. Jordan, said about 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1912, and again to Martha Root shortly before his death. But I rather doubt it! However, we can try.

Mrs. Andrew Rowan 1036 Vallajo St., S. F.

Founder of the work among the blind in San Francisco which she carried on for many years. She invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak to them at Blindcraft headquarters. She is the wife of Col. Rowan, the man who took "the message to Garcia," made famous by Albert Hubbard. She is a cultured, charming woman and was the originator of a great work which still goes on, although she is no longer able to be active, owing to the long continued illness of her husband.

Rev. Reuben R. Rinder 3277 Jackson St., S. F.

Cantor of the Congregation Emanu-el, the largest synagogue in San Francisco where 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke. Dr. Rinder was cantor at that time and has always been a sympathetic friend.

Rev. Clarence Reed 515 Glenview, Oakland, Calif.

Minister of the First Unitarian Church in Oakland. In 1912 he was minister of the First Unitarian Church in Palo Alto where he invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak. Broadminded, with an international outlook and deeply interested in universal peace, he, too, has always been a sympathetic friend.

Prof. Ernest A. Rogers President Montezuma School for Boys Los Gatos, Calif.

Prof. Rogers took his boys to Palo Alto to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá and hear him speak at Stanford University. Deeply impressed, he also came to San Francisco several times to talk with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and in fact he is one we may call a Bahá'í but not a voting believer. I feel sure he will be very glad to make a statement regarding 'Abdu'l-Bahá's influence upon his life's work.

Mrs. Willis J. Walker 640 Powell St., San Francisco

Mrs. Walker formerly lived in Minneapolis where she met 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1912. Her father-in-law, Mr. Thomas Walker, possessed quite a famous art gallery which was built as an extension on his own home, and it was there that Mrs. Walker had the privilege of conducting 'Abdu'l-Bahá through the gallery. A few years afterward she and her husband moved to California where they have lived ever since. It is since she came to California that she has become more and more interested in the Faith. She is connected with many clubs, is very prominent socially, and takes part in various progressive civic affairs. In addition, she is a charming person, extremely popular socially, yet always appreciative of the spiritual side of life, and has a truly bountiful character herself.

My dear friend - These notes are very sketchy, it being impossible to take everything deserving [a33] long hand - I hope you can [?] please let one have a copy.

The Bahá'í movement is a Peace movement - for international peace - that all warfare may cease - why this war and strife - this contention? I will tell you a story.

One day when I was in 'Akká, looking out of the window I saw a number of dogs contending over a bone. A donkey stood out [?] and tried to separate the dogs to put a stop to the fighting without success, he turned around and began kicking at them. This separated them and they ran to all directions.

Man must constantly receive assistance from God so that there may be no interruption of His bestowals whatever. Though I may be tired the confirmations of God always descend otherwise how difficult would be my work. Every machine must have rest - how much more the tongue. [?] It is my hope that you may attain joy never ending - incessant. That happiness is of the Love of God, that is in the heart. It is age abiding. What was the reason that the prophets overlooked the conditions of life? They overlooked the material side entirely. They well knew that the mortal happiness ended in sorrow. Life [?] temporal ending - death - strength was followed by weakness - health was followed by sickness, consequently they did not give importance to the body. They overlooked all material conditions entirely. They entered the Kingdom of God - there they obtained eternal happiness.

Welcome, most welcome!

Come here - sit down (in English)

[?a35]

The object of the Prophets is the education of the people.

The Prophets laid a foundation to sublimity for humankind.

Whosoever can do this has sufficient proof that he is a Messenger of God.

The proof of the prophethood Moses was His ability to lead the people of Israel. In His time the Israelites were in the claws of ignorance; they were debased. He freed them from captivity; - took them to the Holy Land. He educated them. Thus sovereignty was established.

The Greeks travelled far to learn from them.

Some souls receive early training in dogmas. They take naturally to them - they live by tradition - they like dogmas - they follow the same road their fathers had travelled. This is blind imitation. All followers have the same religious opinions hands of [?]. They claim their religion is best - even idolators - they think their religion is best.

Those who live by tradition will not listen - will not investigate reality.

The foundation of all real religions is one. The foundation is Truth - Reality.

What is the sense [?] of religion? The knowledge of the Love of God. No one can deny fellowship. No one can deny that the foundation of all religions is one.

One tradition of the Jews is their particular day of keeping the Shabbath - 'Abdu'l-Bahá told a story to show the absurdity of this custom. "At the time Bahá'u'lláh was in Adrianople the Jews there were very wealthy, having large possessions. One Shabbath (Saturday) the home of one of these wealthy ones was on fire. One room contained spirits and liquors and a corner of it was aflame. They had measures of water and could have put the fire out, but, instead, the owner ran out and called in a Mussulman to put it out, which he did" - [?] he did not want to touch fire on the Shabbath."

These prejudices and superstitions will not remain. This century will [?] all this wiped out.

The prejudice of caste will also be wiped out.

The purpose of the Bahá'í movement is to free the people from dogma - to free them from all former attachment to superstitions & prejudice. It takes the manacles from the people - frees the bird from the cage of tradition.

God created [?], the devil has not created anything.

The devil has brought about all prejudice.

A. B. in Golden Gate Park

A. B. Good trees, good weather, good sand, good people, good believers. (In English)

Man must not imagine disease but must ever trust God. Anyway, man's life here in this world is temporary. He is in a world that is like a house, susceptible to every invasion, and God must protect man — man must be submissive to God. He must not occupy himself with the thoughts of things — imaginings. If a man thinks too much of his health he will become afflicted.

There was a man, a grandee among the Turks, in the utmost health, but he was very careful about his health, he was constantly referring his case to skilled physicians, asking them for thorough examinations, saying, Please find out if there is any disease, and because of this constant thought of health he became possessed of a mania that at the time of sleeping he thought a serpent entered his mouth and went into his abdomen, and people tried to remove this delusion from him. They told him that a serpent could not enter into his stomach and if it should enter there he would have been poisoned, but it would not leave his mind. And they brought warm water and threw the serpent into the warm water and it died. And they said Your stomach is warmer than this water, the temperature is greater, therefore the serpent would have died in your stomach, but it was useless. They could not convince him. He said No, I must care for myself. Finally this delusion caused his death, although he was a very wise man, a sagacious man, and had learned all the sciences. Therefore man must not have hallucinations and must be resigned to God.

If you go to Asia and see the Kurdish tribes, they do not know what health is, what disease is, and what medicine is, and yet they are so sturdy, their health is so good. A man may be very sick, may be tubercular; he does not know it, and because he does not know it he may have it for 20 years, but he does not die.

One day I saw a Kurd and he had prostrated himself over a fount drinking. I said, Do not drink that water because it will injure your stomach. He said What do you mean by stomach? And I said, Go on drinking it as much as you like, for as long as you do not know what a stomach is it will do you no harm.

These rules of hygiene of yours are nonsense and thoughts of sickness and doctors examining is a very bad thing and will cause a man to be possessed of delusions and hallucinations, and man must trust God.

Dr. Allen. We American doctors spend our time seeing people with these imaginary disorders, and some with serpents in their stomachs.

A. B. Not a serpent. You mean a worm.

Dr. Allen. I meant an imaginary serpent.

A. B. I was joking. This elemental life is not of so much importance. In the twinkling of an eye a man gets old, and in the twinkling of an eye a man is dead. The Governor of Safed was with me one day, and we were walking hand in hand, and we came to the stairs, and we took the first step together, I took the second step, and upon looking at him saw that he was dead. They brought doctors and physicians but they did not help. He was gone.

The spiritual life of man is important. The everlasting life of man is of the utmost importance. A man must be thinking of that. It happens that a man may be bitten by a mosquito, then playing with that sore spot scratches it, it becomes infected, gangrenous, and he died.

One of the grandees of Arabia loved cats very much. He was always playing with his cats. One day his cat bit his finger and wounded him. He paid no attention to it and it became inflamed, gangrenous and he died. How unimportant is this life. The everlasting life of man is important and man must be thoughtful of that.

Dr. Allen. Why should we pay attention to the everlasting life? We give up all of our time to this life, and why should we be thinking about the rest of it?

Mrs. Getsinger: You mean why should we not wait until we get there and take it up then?

A. B. Because whatsoever a man soweth here he reapeth there. This world is like a school. He must learn lessons here so that when he issues from this school he may become learned. He must not be ignorant.

For phenomena in general, there is one virtue. It is innate virtue. For example, this tree, its verdure is innate, its flowers are innate, they are creational. It does not interfere with them, it has no will of its own. As to animals, all their virtues are innate. The sun, its virtues are innate; therefore there is no credit to be given it. You do not say to the sun, What an achievement! You are not grateful to this tree because it is so verdant, it gives you shade. Are you grateful to the water that quenches your thirst, or are you grateful to the food that satisfies you, or are you grateful to the breeze because it passes over you? Are you grateful to any of these, not especially, as they are innate, involuntary virtues. But the virtues of man are acquired. Why do you say to this man, You are ignorant or degraded, Why do you molest him, why do you upbraid him? Because he is deprived of the acquired virtues, therefore for man there is need of the acquiring of virtues.

All the philosophers have come with the intention of teaching man to acquire virtues. All the prophets who have come have come to endow man with acquired virtues. Now we will go.

This is the purpose of it all — if you are perfectly all right you are well. Let go of these imaginings.

On the return to Calif. St. house from ride in G. G. Park with Dr. Allen as interviewee.

Thursday, Oct. 10, 1912

An old man came from the Alms House to see A. B. and said he had been in the Himalaya Mts. and was there cured by a Parsee Dr. although all other doctors consulted had pronounced him incurable.

The old man said to A. B. "You must have suffered."

A. B. It was in the path of God, therefore it was not suffering, not trouble. You must strive in order that you may acquire the blessings of the Holy Spirit. If you attend thereto you will attain to the life everlasting. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh during his lifetime was subjected to every hardship and ordeal. Many nights did he pass in his chains, and many days in fetters. How many months was he imprisoned in the dungeon and many were the severe blow at him. Many were the years he passed in exile and tribulation. Many years did he pass in the Most Great Prison — 'Akká. He endured all difficulties. He suffered all ordeals in order that we may attain to the life eternal.

A. B. (addressing all the people in the room): You are all welcome, exceedingly welcome. I have come a long journey to see you, having longed to see you, to visit you, for Bahá'u'lláh has created a marvelous love in the hearts, a wonderful bond has been created among the souls. He has caused the hearts to be attracted to one another.

I have traversed long distances to see you. Bahá'ís traverse long distances to see one another. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh says: "My comfort, my ease, my life, my honor, my faith, my family, my household, all have I sacrificed, in order that blessed souls may appear, in order that holy souls may appear, souls that might be the centers of the virtues of mankind. May they be the souls of the Kingdom, so heavenly, so lordly, and freed from the attachments of the nether world, sanctified from all the vices of human nature, acquiring beauties from the perfections of God." Thus he endured every difficulty. All these ordeals he suffered and he sacrificed himself for all of us.

Oct. 10. 1912 In the automobile (Speaking of a visit by A. B. to a sick man)

A. B. Yes, he is happy. Love makes him happy. Nothing makes a man so happy as love.

Dr. Allen asked if he were not tired.

A. B. replied: Yes, I am tired today speaking so much. I am tired of talking nonsense, nonsensical questions tire me, but when I am speaking of things that are noble I am never tired. (In English, “Good trees, good green.”)

Mrs. Goodall: We need the nightingale. Can you not send them over to us from Persia?

A. B. There will come a day when you will see how the nightingales of Persia will sing their songs of God in these gardens. Likewise the quails of America in the mountains of Persia, shall cause such a “quailing” as to cause the Iranian mountains to dance. The East and the West will then have a feast, and in one direction the song of the nightingale will be heard, and in the other direction you will hear the songs of other birds. In one direction you will hear the music of God, and from another region you will find the outpouring of God’s blessings. In one direction you will see the lights of the radiance of guidance, in the other direction the sun of reality will shine. In another you will find the chalice of the Love of God passed around. In the world there will be a spiritual feast. From the beginning of the world to the present day there will be none similar; hearts will be rejoiced, spirits will be exhilarated. The world will become a paradise of Abhá.

MEETING FOR THE BAHÁ’Í CHILDREN

Oakland, California

Saturday Afternoon, October 12, 1912 3:50 p. m.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: What radiant children these are! How radiant! What radiant and beautiful children! These will become very good, because they will receive Bahá’í education. They will be reared beneath the shelter of Bahá’u’lláh.

They are just like fresh plants which have been sown in the Garden of Abhá and they receive the water of the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. They will be reared through the heat of the sun of reality.

Assuredly, amongst them there will appear souls — most blessed souls — each one of whom will be a radiant candle in the world of humanity, souls who will shine from the eternal horizon even as stars shine.

They are very, very pleasant indeed — exceedingly pleasant!

There is a difference in the development of a tree which is nigh unto fruitage, which comes under the education of the gardener when a fresh plant, from the very beginning to be reared and cultured by a skilled gardener, because the latter — the fresh plant — can be educated according to the wishes of the gardener, and the gardener can train each branch just as he wishes it to grow.

Such a tree, when reaching fruition, will reveal the handiwork of the gardener, showing full well the care given it by the gardener.

Now, these children are fresh plants which have fallen into the hands of the gardener. Therefore, they will be very well educated; they will become fruitful trees; they will become very blessed trees; they will become most delectable trees. The gardener is blessed, and the skill of the gardener will become manifest in them.

(‘Abdu’l-Bahá then distributed among the children candy and envelopes containing flowers)

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ: You are all my grandchildren!

I feel the utmost joy to be present here with you, especially to be surrounded with such radiant children. They are the very flowers of the Paradise of Abhá.

Surely, a man in a rose garden is to be happy, and now I am happy in a rose garden. On one side, trees most fruitful and delightful do I see, and on the other hand, or across, I see my children who are flowers and most delightful to look at, and assuredly they give joy to be in such a place.

In San Francisco, through the hand of the gardener of God, who has appeared in the Orient, to see such a garden as the result of his handiwork in the West — this is a source of great thanksgiving in the East. Hence, I am hopeful, through the favors of that real gardener, that He may ever care for these trees and water them; that He may ever refresh, through His holy dewdrops, His flowers; may shower upon them from His clouds of mercy. May the sun of His reality shine upon them all. May they bask in the sunshine of His praises. May, day by day, this garden become more green and verdant, its trees become mightier and more beautiful, its flowers become more delicate and fresh, in order that the delightful fragrance of this garden shall refresh the nostrils of the longing ones both in the East and the West.

An Oriental personage, having come from the most remote part of the Orient, were he to breathe there, were he to inhale the fragrances which are wafting from the distant parts of the West he would say: “How fragrant are they! Evidently the rose garden of the West is most beautiful. Its flowers have blossomed delightfully. The fragrance thereof is reaching even this remote district.”

May this cause the rose garden of the East to be proud of this, that, praise be to God, the rose garden of the West, in a short space of time, has assumed most delightful freshness. Most magnificent flowers have become apparent therein. Variegated flowers can be seen there. White flowers have grown in it; colored flowers have grown in it; red flowers can be seen in it; and yellow flowers can be seen in it. All of these together are in the utmost of freshness and verdure, and each lends a charm and harmony to the others. Each one is a cause of the adornment to the others.

This is my hope and so do I hope, through the favors of Bahá'u'lláh, may he bless these children.

(Going to each child separately) “May He bless this child!”

San Francisco, October 6, 1912

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

I am the lover of all the friends of God — from the heart and soul I love them. This will become manifest. It is not only words. I would offer my life for each friend. When the time of trial comes then it will become manifest — now it is in words.

You have a radiant face, and the signs of Bahá'u'lláh are manifest in your face.

Mr. McC. McCarthy?

I desire to be directed in the true way.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Is there any greater desire than this? It is a big desire. This desire cannot be compared to all others. It is hard to be steadfast, to follow the straight path —

there is nothing harder. There are many who take ten steps in this path, some travel ten miles, are tired, and then stop. Some travel only four miles, but there are some who never grow tired and keep traveling as long as breath lasts and reach the home. There are some here in America whose faces are turned toward God, and some have become withered.

For a soul to travel in the path of Bahá'u'lláh, receive confirmations, and then become lukewarm, is very astonishing to me. I was astonished to see this in America. It is true that to pursue the pathway of God is very difficult.

In these days when people assemble together the conversation is all about the acquiring of wealth. Man in this way becomes self-centered, spirituality leaves him, and he becomes like children who delight to play with pebbles on the shore. When a matured man associates with children, his heart will become depressed. Likewise when people of faith associate with material minded people their hearts are depressed too. Therefore whenever you meet the friends of God be very happy; speak about spiritual things so that you may find heavenly susceptibilities. Association of the friends is the greatest of divine bounties.

Mr. McC.

I would like to ask the meaning of the capital letters at the commencement of the suras of the Qur'án.

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

These letters are symbols predicting future events. If you add these letters, each representing a number, without repeating any one of them, the sum total will be the year of the appearance of his holiness the Báb. And in this instance it is recorded in the tradition that in that year Gate (the Promised One) shall appear. If you gather again from Alif, Lam, Mim, Ra to Alif, Lam, Mim, Sad, without repeating any of the letters, you will have the following sentence: “Verily ‘Alí is the straight path of God. Walk in it.” ‘Alí was the successor of Muḥammad. Moreover, every letter indicates a station, for example: Alif, Lam, Mim. Alif is a sign indicating the station of divinity. Lam is a sign indicating the station of successorship. Mim is a sign indicating the station of prophethood. Again, Lam is ‘Alí. Mim is Muḥammad. This latter is a prophecy regarding the coming of the Promised One whose name will be ‘Alí-Muḥammad. These letters indicate stations.

The Qur'án is an inspired book and very significant. The Christians have not studied it and it is badly translated. If you had the knowledge of the Arabic language you would understand what a wonderful and inspired book it is.

Mr. McC.

(Something about his journey to San Francisco to meet ‘Abdu’l-Bahá)

‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

When love obtains a man can travel one hundred thousand miles without fatigue and enjoy it. Love renders the bitter sweet. Love renders fatigue as rest. When man exercises the power of love he is very joyful, he will obtain spiritual susceptibilities. The bounty of love is the greatest bestowal of God.

There is nothing as extraordinary or supernatural as my coming here to see you. A person in prison for life — forty years — to come to San Francisco and meet the friends. How impossible it seems! God dethroned two sovereigns — two kings he dethroned — so that I could come here. How difficult it seems! This is a miracle. This is the power of God. Every inconceivable thing and impossible thing becomes possible so that we know that the affairs are in the heaven of his power. [the people of the world] All of the heavenly spheres are incapable of [acting contrary to his will]. — One is capable.

Praise be to God, this is a good meeting. This is a blessed meeting. This is a spacious room, and praise be to God it is well filled. It is like a beehive at present.

This evening I shall relate to you the story of the sojourn of Bahá’u’lláh during the two years of his solitude on the mountain of Sarkalu.

When we were exiled from Tihrán to Baghdád we remained there one year. Then, suddenly, Bahá’u’lláh disappeared. We endeavored to find him but were not successful. For two years there was no news of him.

At that time most of the Bábís had been killed, and the few remaining lived in a state of fear. Since the attempt on the Sháh’s life in Tihrán, the viceregent of the Sháh, Mírzá Yaḥyá, who was the half brother of Bahá’u’lláh, had been in hiding. He had traveled in disguise with a company of dervishes from Mazindarán to Rasht and Kermanshah, and after arriving at Baghdád had feared to leave his house. Thus the Bábí movement had virtually no leader.

One day, while my uncle Mírzá Mussa and myself were seated on the bank of the river Tigris, a Persian gentleman, Ḥájí Farajullah, came from the consulate toward us. My uncle asked him what was going on at the consulate. He answered that they had just received a newspaper from Persia containing several interesting items of news, the last, but not the least, being about a certain strange incident that had occurred in Kurdistan. A traveler by the name of Abu’l Kasem, a merchant from Hamadán, upon arriving at the frontier of the Ottoman empire, had become the guest of a person known as Ḥasan Sulṭán. The following day Abu’l Kasem had requested that he be escorted onto Ottoman soil. Ḥasan Sulṭán had allowed him to take two horsemen, by whom he had been conducted to a mountain, where, because of his possessions, they had attempted to behead him, and after robbing him they had left him for dead. A shepherd passing by, and seeing this apparently dead man, had found upon examination that his head was not entirely severed, but though still alive the man was unable to speak. The shepherd had thereupon secured help, and had had the man carried to a near-by village, where the wound had been quickly sewed together. At last, when sufficiently resuscitated, the man had made signs for paper and ink to be brought to him, and he had then recorded the whole story, giving his name and address and the amount that had been stolen from him, ending as follows:

“About two years ago I left Baghdád with a certain person known as Dervish Muḥammad. We went to Kurdistan, and he remained in Sulaymáníyye, in the district of Kurdistan, while I went to Hamadán. Just now I was on my way to Sulaymáníyye to visit him. If my possessions be restored, pray present all of them to this dervish, and he may dispose of them according to his will, which is also my will. This dervish has impressed me as a most unique personage. He is the first man of the world. His knowledge and wisdom are supreme, and I believe in him. Whatsoever he shall command as to the disposition of my effects, must be carried out.”

And then Abu'l Kasem had died, and very soon thereafter Ḥasan Sulṭán had been imprisoned by the Persian government.

When we heard this story that was reported in the paper, we immediately concluded that the person known as Dervish Muḥammad was no other than Bahá'u'lláh, for we recalled the fact that during his sojourn in Baghdád there was a man there by the name of Abu'l Kasem who had often come to see him. Furthermore, we knew that when Bahá'u'lláh left the city of Baghdád this person also had disappeared.

So we went to the Shaykh Sulṭán, and to another man known as Javád, and arranged for them to carry letters to the retreat of Bahá'u'lláh, the name of which we had thus secured — Sulaymáníyye. They went there and inquired about Dervish Muḥammad from Shaykh Sulaymán, who said: “There is a person of that description here. We have found him to be a man of great erudition, great wisdom, and deep insight. He lives in a cave on a mountain known as Sarkalu. Every three months he visits this place, staying two or three days.” When the two messengers asked to be directed to that cave the Shaykh said: “It will take you three days to walk there, and as it is situated among the rebellious and bloodthirsty Kurds they will rob you of your belongings and will kill you. It is better to wait here until he comes, because his time is close at hand.”

So they remained there until Bahá'u'lláh arrived, and then they presented their letters, saying: “We beseech you to return. We cannot return without you. Either come with us, or we will go with you to the cave.” Bahá'u'lláh finally listened to their entreaties to return with them, and when he arrived in Baghdád he declared himself to be the one heralded by the Báb. The Bábís who had been living in fear came forth from their hiding places and immediately accepted him, and soon people of all races and religions hastened to the blessed presence. Among them were people of every condition — princes, nobles, Persian scholars, and sages of the Ottoman empire. To all the questions asked of him he gave enlightening answers.

As to the cave, it still exists. It is on a very high mountain. It is about two and a half miles distant from any habitation, and there Bahá'u'lláh dwelt alone. An aged Shaykh — Abu'l Ghader by name — daily carried to him a morsel of bread and some cheese, alternating with bread and milk, or bread and matzoon (Sour milk). This continued for two years.

In those days the garments of Bahá'u'lláh were most plain, and the furniture of his cave consisted of a mat. He had not even utensils with which to make tea. During the day he remained within the cave, but the moonlight nights he spent outside chanting and praying, as he was greatly charmed by the moonlight. At such times the Kurds from the nearest villages were in the habit of going to the mountain to listen. Though they could not understand him, as his chanting was in Persian or Arabic, yet they were captivated by his voice. A certain Kurd, speaking of his experience, said: "I was wont to go slowly, slowly, most quietly, until I reached a point where I could hear him clearly. Though I could not understand his words, yet his thrilling voice so affected me as to make me weep involuntarily." All the Kurds of those regions were attracted to Bahá'u'lláh by his love, even highway robbers and the most rebellious characters, likewise noblemen, sheikhs and scholars, for his magnetic chanting, marvelous patience, long suffering, great knowledge, sanctity, purity and spirituality creates love in the hearts of men.

Here ends the account of the sojourn of Bahá'u'lláh in the cave of Sarkalu. This I have told in order that you may be informed. It has never before been given in such detail.

It is now some time since I arrived in America. I have visited many cities and have met many people. In numerous churches and other assemblages I have heralded the kingdom, and have given the message concerning the appearance of the Blessed Beauty. Day and night I have beseeched the Lord, begging that the light and effulgence of the sun of reality may be cast upon these regions, that the American people may become informed of the teachings of the Blessed Beauty, that all the remote parts of America may be illumined, that the breath of life may resuscitate the heart of the nation, and that the American people may thus receive new life.

Praise be to God, the call of the kingdom has been raised in America through the grace and favor of Bahá'u'lláh. By means of periodicals and journals the name has been spread. Many souls have heard the blessed name. In short, by the grace and favor of the Blessed Perfection, and the confirmations of his kingdom, seeds have been sown. If they are now watered and cared for by the friends of God and the maid-servants of the Merciful, they will without doubt yield a tremendous harvest.

The first watering of this real plantation is unity among the friends of God. To-day there is nothing so essential and so indispensable for the glory and honor of the Bahá'í cause as the unity of the beloved of God. The more the friends of God are united the greater will be the success attending their efforts, and the greater will be the confirmations of the Lord. Discord is destructive and is the cause of separation, whereas unity results in progress and power.

Let it be known that to-day the greatest service to the kingdom of Abhá is unity. The people of Bahá must be instrumental in creating good fellowship among all the nations. If they should be discordant, how could they ever create harmony. Therefore I beg and counsel you to continue in good fellowship and unity, to co-operate with and be kind toward one another, to exalt one another, and to be the means of comfort and ease to one another, in order that other nations may learn from you how great are the fruits of unity, and thus through your influence the peoples of the earth may be united, and agreement be established between all races and religions. Then, through the confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh, the banner of the solidarity of mankind should be unfurled and become the standard of all nations.

Praise be to God, Bahá'u'lláh in this marvelous dispensation has given teachings that will prevent every disagreement. During the Mosaic dispensation various denominations resulted from the different interpretations of the teachings of Moses. Such was also the case during the Christian dispensation. After the departure of His Holiness Christ — may my spirit be a sacrifice to him — dissensions arose among his followers, and the various sects which resulted therefrom have in turn been divided, there being to-day over a hundred denominations among the Protestants alone, each one claiming to teach the original truth of Christ.

Bahá'u'lláh, desiring to prevent similar dissensions resulting from the misinterpretation of his words, wrote a book which he entitled Kitáb el Ahd (Book of the Covenant). In this book, which is incontestable, being in his own handwriting, he appoints a center of his covenant, who is to be the expounder of the books and the judge between the false and the true. The Bahá'ís are commanded to obey him and to accept his interpretations. Thus there will be no danger of disagreement and consequent schism among the believers in Bahá'u'lláh, such as arose during the dispensation of Christ. The Bahá'í cause should not be an aggressive one. Those who wish to deny the Book of the Covenant and thereby deprive themselves of the light of this day are like those who close their eyes and deny the existence of the sun. With them we have nothing to do.

Furthermore, Bahá'u'lláh has commanded the organization of an universal house of justice, which shall have power to legislate regarding all questions not elucidated in the books, and the decisions of this body are to be accepted as the law. Hence there should be no excuse for dissensions among you, and I hope that you will always be willing to agree and to love one another. However, should there arise a difference of opinion concerning any important matter, you should ask regarding it and you will receive an answer that will avert all discord. This is a peculiar feature of the great dispensation of Bahá'u'lláh.

Now that I am leaving you I counsel you not to accept any one coming to you with strange stories attributed to me without first demanding his signed credentials which must be in my handwriting. After I arrived in America it reached my ear that I had prophesied the inundation of New York and the submersion of many parts of America. Is it likely that I should make such an absurd prophecy? It is not reasonable. It is not my purpose. Therefore do not credit such statements. Accept nothing purporting to come from me without my signature.

Beware lest dissensions divide you. You must be agreed and united. You must always turn to the kingdom of God, be attracted to Bahá'u'lláh, be filled with Bahá'u'lláh, and ever be the recipients of the favors of Bahá'u'lláh. Your utterances and your hearing must be concerned with the name of Bahá'u'lláh. Your faces must be radiant because of the glad tidings of Bahá'u'lláh. Your hearts must be attracted to Bahá'u'lláh. Thus you will be filled with the love of Bahá'u'lláh, and you will have no thought for aught else. This is my admonition, my behest to you. I beg you so to live that you will prove yourselves to be true Bahá'ís, not by confession merely, but by showing love toward all humanity without distinction or prejudice, considering all as servants of God. If he had not loved all mankind he would not have created nor have provided for them; nor would he have nurtured and have sheltered them beneath his providence. Since God is compassionate toward all, even so must you be kind and tender toward all. Then the bounties of Bahá'u'lláh shall encompass you, and eventually all dissension shall disappear from among mankind.

I was out in this garden near by, walking through it.

You have many parks here. They are all very delightful, but the heart must be open to that delight and charm. If the heart be not cheerful and happy, if it have not ease and serenity, if it be agitated, when one enters these parks one will be more agitated; but if the heart be happy — like unto my heart then even in prison it is as a rose garden

Put this in original record

Interview with Stitt Wilson [a37]

The afternoon was devoted to the children's meeting at Mrs. Goodall's home in Oakland. The children sang "Softly His Voice is Calling Now" for 'Abdu'l-Bahá and he expressed his pleasure at seeing such a goodly number of fresh young plants in this "Rose Garden of the West." He said: "These children are fresh plants which have fallen into the hands of the gardener. Therefore, they will be very well educated, they will become fruitful trees, they will become very blessed trees; they will become most delectable trees. The gardener is blessed, and the skill of the gardener will become manifest in them.” He then distributed candy and flowers among them, and calling them his “grandchildren” he blessed each one separately. Afterward all went outside and a photograph was taken of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the children.

Several Hindu students from the University of California at Berkeley called that afternoon and spent a considerable time with him, and as they were leaving, some kodak pictures were taken.

Sunday afternoon, October 13th, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke at the “Reading Room and Library for the Blind”, at 1665 Jackson Street, San Francisco. To this meeting were also invited the blind from the “Adult Home” in Oakland and the children and youth from the state educational institution for the blind in Berkeley. He was introduced by Mrs. Andrew S. Rowan, honorary president of the Association for the Blind. Her life had been devoted to the relief of the blind, and particularly she had been instrumental in initiating manual training in S. F. in order that the blind might be equipped to earn an independent livelihood. She was a well known philanthropist and had been active in many other fields of service. In passing, it might be mentioned that she was the wife of Major Andrew S. Rowan, the officer made famous through carrying the “Message to Garcia” in the Spanish-American war in 1898.

A. B. in his opening remarks paid a glowing tribute to Mrs. Rowan, his words to the afflicted ones were full of consolation and hope. In closing he said:

“The sight of the physical and ordinary eye will some day pass away. Only for a short time does the eye exercise its function; then it becomes dust. But the power of insight is eternal; it is a heavenly gift, and through it man discovers the Kingdom. Through it he can see aright the beauty of God and the holy verities and can discern the very mysteries of God. Praise be to God, you have this insight, therefore be not grieved. Though you are deprived of a drop, yet you possess the ocean. Though you are bereft of an atom, yet you possess the sun.

“Though in this world you do not see the dust, yet, praise be to God, in the Kingdom of God, through your insight, you will see purity. Though here you do not see physical objects, yet in the Kingdom of God you will see the holy souls; you will see the sanctity and beauty of Christ, and you will see Bahá’u’lláh, the Glory of God. This is a wonderful bestowal. Therefore thank God for this great bounty.”

Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took a drive to the beach, and at the evening home meeting he told the believers about it, saying:

“This afternoon we drove out to the seashore. We looked upon the beautiful sea with its high waves, and pondered over the time when the sea of love will be set in motion.

“When the waves of the sea are high there is a tempest, vessels are sunk, and the ports receive injury, but when the sea of love shall be set in motion its tempest will be life, ports will be adorned, ships will be saved, happiness and composure will prevail, pearls will be cast ashore, everything will become brilliant, and great will be the results.

“It is my hope that the sea of love may be set in motion. The sea of love is the sea of sanctity; it is the sea of knowledge; it is the sea of peace and reconciliation. When that sea shall be set in motion new results will appear every hour — results that will be age-abiding. It is our great wish to dive into that sea, to swim in that sea. Therefore let us strive to find that sea that we may swim therein. Thus may we be enabled to recognize truth in any form, whatever it may be.”

On the morning of the 14th ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave two talks to the friends at the California Street house. The afternoon was spent motoring to Golden Gate Park, where he desired to see the Museum, the aviary, the apiary and the buffaloes, and to walk around Strawberry Hill.

The following morning, Oct. 15th, Mrs. Hearst came in her limousine to take A. B. to the “Hacienda del Foso de Verona,” her beautiful Spanish home at Pleasanton, about 2 hours’ drive from S. F., where he remained until the next day when she drove him back to the city. This delightful visit had been planned several days before Mrs. Hearst and her niece, Mrs. Flint, called upon A. B. to pay their respects and invite him to be their guest.

Upon his return at noon 16th A. B. found a new group of Bahá’ís who in the meantime had arrived from the northern assemblies.

The afternoon ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed the members of the Century Club of California, 1355 Franklin Street, one of the first women’s clubs in San Francisco, having been established in 1885 for literary and social purposes. His topic was “The Equality of Men and Women.” He spoke of the superiority of women in valor and courage as well as in kindness and tenderness, and cited examples of oriental queens who had been great powers in their day. The ladies were tremendously impressed and gave him a rising vote of thanks, after which he was the guest of the president and board of directors at an elaborate tea.

In the evening the memorable unity feast was celebrated in Oakland, the large gathering representing Bahá’í communities of California, Oregon and Washington, as well as many nationalities and races. The abundance of flowers and fruits used in the decorations made the spacious lower floor of the home a veritable summer garden. When all were seated at the beautiful tables, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá circumambulated the meeting, talking as he walked. He then retired to his room upstairs for a brief time to write a letter by his own hand to his beloved friend, Mirzá Ḥaydar-‘Alí, in ‘Akká. It was in reality a poem, penned in such exalted language that the interpreters had difficulty translating it into appropriate English. As the feast drew to a close, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared upon the balcony of the stairway overlooking the tables and pronounced the benediction.

The 17th of October passed in the usual way with house talks, motor drives, and walks, and in the evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave his famous talk on motion — “Motion is the sign of life.” His closing remarks were as follows:

“His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh wrote an epistle a long time ago in which he said that man must attain to such a condition that his spirit will be soaring though he is sitting in a state of tranquility and serenity. That is the kind of sitting that is like unto walking. That is the kind of serenity that is really motion. That is the kind of tranquility that is really flying.”

Early the next morning, October 18th, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and party, accompanied by Mrs. Goodall and several of the friends, left for Los Angeles for the express purpose of visiting the grave of Thornton Chase.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá remained in Los Angeles until the evening of the 30th, when he returned by train to San Francisco, arriving at the California Street house early in the morning of the 21st.

In the interim more friends had arrived from the North and were welcomed by the San Francisco believers and made comfortable. This group ‘Abdu’l-Bahá greeted with a short talk. In the evening he discoursed at length on the early history of the Bábí movement in Persia. This important subject he continued at the Oakland meeting the next evening, October 22nd.

The following morning, October 23rd, he was still at the Oakland home, and as many of the believers had come in he gave quite a long talk on universal peace, the responsibility of the Bahá’ís, and the American people in general, to overcome prejudice and be the first to establish amity among the races and religions of the world in order to avert further warfare. He said in part:

“Truly the American people are noble in character. Their philanthropic endeavors are an evidence of their desire to serve others and to benefit the body politic. They are thoughtful of the poor; they are interested in the questions of education, capital punishment, and the alleviation of suffering. They are occupied with activity relative to the betterment of their kind. Their energies are exceedingly praiseworthy, and I am hopeful that through their united efforts war and the making of infernal instruments may be abolished. Only by this means will universal peace be established, and the barriers of hatred between races, countries and religions be forever obliterated. It is my hope that the American people may be eternally honored by this distinction.”

That evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expressed a wish to visit the Flower Show which had just opened at the Fairmont Hotel under the auspices of the Pacific Coast Horticultural Society. He had read about it in the papers and was anxious to see all the wonders of the plant world that were to be exhibited during the four days of the show. He asked Mrs. Georgin Grayson Ralston to drive him in her little electric car to the hotel. He was enchanted with the gorgeous display and ordered slips and cuttings of many of the varieties, saying he would have them planted in the garden of the Ridván near ‘Akká.

As on many previous occasions, Mrs. Ralston drove him home via Market Street, which was always brilliant with the street lights from the huge electroliers and the many gaily colored electric advertising signs. He said that all these wonderful lights were as nothing compared to the lights of heaven — that heaven would be so flooded with light that our mortal eyes could not endure it. He said if we must economize, then economize in everything except light, fill our houses with light, and even sleep with upon another occasion referring to the importance of light, he said, if one light will suffice, then have ten!

On the morning of the 24th ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went for a drive in Golden Gate Park and as usual he alighted and walked around the little lake of the “Portals of the Past.” When he spoke to the friends at noon he told them about the drive and said he was very sad as such beauty always made him think of Bahá’u’lláh and the sufferings he had endured as a prisoner and exile that we might be free to enjoy these wonderful blessings of nature.

The final meeting of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the friends took place that afternoon. He said:

“In Persia we have a unique custom. When we write to a friend most dear we place at the end of the letter a seal that is perfumed with musk, which signifies the fragrance of friendship, and the friend writes that he has been most happy because the ending of the letter was in musk. Similarly, we say of anything that we desire to praise very highly, ‘The ending therefore is in musk.’ Now this being our last day together, its close should be most fragrant, even as musk. Therefore let it be in commemoration of Bahá’u’lláh.”

He then testified to the bounty of Bahá’u’lláh and enjoined upon the believers to become mirrors of the attributes of Bahá’u’lláh, that they might be the proof of Bahá’u’lláh. His closing words were:

“I will pray in your behalf and will seek for you the bounties of the Blessed Perfection, and I desire you to pray that I may be confirmed in his blessed service. This is the ‘musk’.”

At last the time drew near for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s departure for the next day was October 25th and all too soon the hour was at hand for A. B.’s departure for the East. A few of the friends, besides those who were to accompany him as far as Sacramento, gathered in the reception hall of the California Street home to bid him farewell. It was early in the morning as he was to entrain at nine o’clock, and his leave-taking, though necessarily brief, was most impressive. As he moved about, diffusing the precious perfume of attar of rose, and voicing regret at the approaching separation, he commended each one to the favor and protection of Bahá’u’lláh. Thus came to an end the unforgettable three days that A. B. tarried by the Golden Gate.

The evening lecture at the Hotel Sacramento, also the one next morning, October 26th, were well attended, having been arranged by Miss Fraser, and at both of which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá expounded the principles of Bahá’u’lláh.

After the morning talk, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went for a long drive with Mr. Thomas Jefferson O'Kelly, a prominent business man of Sacramento. They returned to the hotel just in time for luncheon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá being host to a party of twenty. Immediately thereafter he boarded the train for New York, his intention being to stop over at Salt Lake City, at the invitation of Miss Etta Powers, an old time friend of Dr. D'Evelyn.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's hope for California was beautifully expressed in his final public talk after viewing the Capitol and its lovely grounds:

"This land of California seems to be blest. It is abundantly fruitful. The climate is temperate. The sun is ever shining. The fruits are delicious and luscious. All the outer blessings are evident here and the Californians are a noble people. Therefore I hope that they may make extraordinary progress and become renowned for their virtues ....

"The issue which is of paramount importance in the world today is international peace ....

"Inasmuch as the Californians seem peace-loving and possessed of great worthiness and capacity, I hope that advocates of peace may daily increase among them until the whole population shall stand for peace. May the men of affairs in this democracy uphold the standard of international conciliation. Then may altruistic aims and thoughts radiate from this center toward all other regions of the earth, and may the glory of this accomplishment forever halo the history of this country. May the first flag of international peace be upraised in this state. May the first illumination of reality shine gloriously upon this soil. May this center and Capitol become distinguished in all degrees of accomplishment; for the virtues of humanity and the possibilities of human advancement are boundless."

Thus 'Abdu'l-Bahá's extraordinary journey from the far off Orient to California became a matter of history, but the radiant sense of peace, happiness and goodwill which he diffused will long linger as a fragrant memory in the West. He traversed vast distances and endured much discomfort and weariness to accomplish that meeting. The days were very precious and sped by all too quickly and when the good-byes were said it was with sad hearts. His parting admonition was to forget not those days, for having been spent in the commemoration of Bahá'u'lláh, no better days could be imagined, and he supplicated God that the fruits of those days might be the illumination of the world and the unification of mankind.

This was the "musk[a38]."

TALK GIVEN BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

San Francisco, Monday Morning, October 14, 1912

Dr. Ameen U. Faríd, Interpreter

I want to tell you a remarkable story — the strangest of the strange — so that you may have an illustration of the great power of the cause of God.

When we were exiled from Persia our family was in a most sad condition, though formerly Bahá'u'lláh had enjoyed great affluence. By exiling us and confiscating all our estates the government hoped to blot out the family.

At the time of our exile the most noteworthy man, the first man of Persia, was Mírzá Áqá Khán, the prime minister. All the important officials of the country were related to him, and his family, having affairs in their hands, virtually ruled the nation.

It was the custom of the prime minister to hold late conferences with the members of his family, and one night, when all were assembled together, his son, who was minister of the treasury, commented most regretfully upon the episode of Bahá'u'lláh's exile, saying, "What a pity it is that such a noteworthy family should be annihilated because of the acceptance of such a faith!" The prime minister asked, "What art thou saying?" The son answered: "I was just expressing my regret that the distinguished family of Bahá'u'lláh, one whose lineage is of the most ancient in Persia, should be thus destroyed. I feel very sad at heart." The father said: "Dost thou realize what thou art saying, my son? I say to thee that verily it is our family that will be destroyed. Let me tell you this: when a family meets destruction in the path of religion, that destruction is in reality construction. So have no regret for them, because it is our family that will be obliterated."

That conversation took place fifty years ago, and I have just received a letter from Tíhrán from a Bahá'í who writes that:

"The palace that was occupied by Mírzá Áqá Khán, who was prime minister at the time of Bahá'u'lláh's exile, is now the home of a Bahá'í friend. On account of governmental changes it had to be sold. The famous council chamber, which is built in the gorgeous style of the architecture of ancient Persia will accommodate over one thousand persons, and in this room, on the evening of the fifth of September, we held a most wonderful conference of over one thousand Bahá'ís. There were present many members of great families. Following the program of the West, we arranged the meeting systematically. Many persons spoke from the platform, and several of the addresses you have given in America were read."

This meeting occurred in the very room in which the prime minister had made his great prophecy. And so it has come to pass. His family has perished, and the power of the cause of God has become evident!

To the friends and maidservants of the Merciful in Los Angeles and the other cities of California, Mr. and Mrs. Beckett;

Upon them be Bahá'u'lláh'il Abhá.

HE IS GOD!

O ye friends and maid-servants of the Merciful!

From the spiritual assembly of Los Angeles a letter has been received. It was indicative of the fact that the blessed souls in California, like unto an immovable mountain, are withstanding the gale of violation, have like unto blessed trees been implanted in the soil of the Covenant and are in the utmost firmness and steadfastness. The hope is entertained, therefore, that through the blessings of the Sun of Truth they may daily increase in their firmness and steadfastness. The tests of every dispensation are in direct proportion with the greatness of the Cause and as heretofore such a manifest Covenant, written by the Supreme Pen, has not been entered upon, the tests are proportionately severe. These trials cause the feeble souls to waver while those who are firm are not affected. These agitations of the violators are no more than the foam of the Ocean, which is one of its inseparable features, but the ocean of the Covenant shall surge and shall cast ashore that dead bodies for it cannot contain them. Thus it is seen that the ocean of the Covenant has surged and surged until it has thrown out the dead bodies — the souls that are deprived of the Spirit of God and are lost in passion and self and are seeking leadership. In fine this froth of the Ocean shall not endure but shall soon disappear and vanish while on the other hand the ocean of the Covenant shall eternally surge and roar.

Consider then that Christ, in order to preserve the unity of Christendom, said to Peter — “Thou art the rock and upon this rock I shall build my Temple.” This word has secured every one’s submissiveness and allegiance and has preserved for a thousand years the unity of the Christian world. Notwithstanding the fact that this declaration was not a command to obey and to follow and was verbally delivered, yet it has proved to do away with any foam that might appear on the surface of the ocean of Christ and to cast ashore any dead body that sought the vanities of this world. At present His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh, through His Supreme Pen, has written the Book of the Covenant and has called it the “Book of the Covenant,” and has entered with every one into a covenant and a testament. He first addresses the Aghsáns, then the Afnáns and then the relations bidding them to turn their faces to the Center of the Covenant and has then in accordance with the explicit text of the Most Holy Book (the Book of Laws) made the Center of the Covenant the Expounder of the Book.

From the early days of creation down to the present time, throughout all the Divine Dispensations, such a firm and explicit Covenant has not been entered upon. In view of this fact is it possible for these foams to remain on the surface of the Ocean of the Covenant? No, by God! The violators are trampling upon their own dignity, are uprooting their own foundation and are proud in that they are upheld by flatterers who exert a great effort to shake the faith of feeble souls. But this action of theirs is of no consequence; it is a mirage and not water, the foam and not the sea, the mist and not the cloud, illusion and not reality. All this ye shall soon see.

In short, praise be to God, ye are firm and steadfast and be ye thankful that like unto blessed trees ye are firmly implanted in the soil of the Covenant. It is sure that every firm one will grow, will yield fresh fruits and will increase daily in freshness and grace. Reflect upon all the writings of Bahá'u'lláh, whether epistles or prayers, and ye shall surely come across a thousand passages wherein Bahá'u'lláh prays as follows — “O God! exterminate the violators of the Covenant and defeat the opposers of the Testament,” “He who denies the Covenant and the Testament is rejected by God, and he who remains firm and steadfast therein is favored at the Threshold of Oneness.” Such sayings and prayers abound, refer to them and ye shall know.

In short, be never depressed. The more ye are stirred by violator, the more deepen ye in firmness and steadfastness, and be assured that the Divine Hosts shall conquer for they are assured of the victory of the Abhá Kingdom. Throughout all regions the standard of firmness and steadfastness is upraised and the flag of violation is debased for only few weak souls have been led away by the flattery and the specious arguments of the violators, are outwardly with the greatest care exhibiting firmness but inwardly are engaged in stirring the souls. Only a few who are the leaders of those who stir and agitate are outwardly known as violators while the rest, through subtle means deceive the souls, for outwardly they assert their firmness and steadfastness in the Covenant but when they come across responsive ears they secretly sow the seeds of suspicion. The case of all of them resembles the violation of the covenant by Judas Iscariot and his followers. Consider has any result or trace remained after them. Not even a name has been left behind his followers and although a great number of Jews have sided with him it was as if he had no followers at all. This Judas Iscariot who was the leader of the apostles betrayed His Holiness Christ for thirty dirhams.

Take heed, O ye people of perception!

At present these insignificant violators will surely give away the Center of the Covenant for the large sum which they have begged by every subtle means. It is now thirty years that His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has ascended and these violators have meanwhile striven with the utmost effort. What have they done so far? Under all conditions those who have remained firm in the Covenant have conquered while the violators have met defeat, dejection and disappointment. After the ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, no trace of them shall remain. These souls ignore what will happen and are proud of their own fancies.

In short, O ye friends of God and the maid-servants of the Merciful! The hand of the Divine Bounty has placed upon your heads a bejewelled crown, the precious gems of which shall eternally shine over all regions. Appreciate this bounty and unloosen the tongue in praise and thanksgiving, and engage in the promulgation of the Divine Teachings for this is the Spirit of Life and the means of salvation.

Upon ye be Bahá’íAbhá.

To Mr. Chase. (Upon him be Bahá'u'lláh El ABHÁ!)

HE IS GOD!

O Lord! O Beloved! The faithful servant, Mr. Chase, abandoned home, left his native land and crossed the great ocean until he reached the shore of the Holy Land and arrived at the Blessed Spot. He laid his head upon the Threshold of the Sacred Dust; he implored and supplicated the Gateway of Unity and sought confirmation and strength. Now he is returning to his native clime to serve and to spread the Fragrances of the Holy Spirit.

O Lord! Confirm him, aid and strengthen him through the hosts of the Kingdom, so that he may become the cause of the spread of the Word of GOD, the cause of joy and happiness to the friends and the means of awakening the negligent. Thou art the Mighty and Powerful, and Thou art the Precious, the Almighty, the Wise!

O thou truthful servant of the Beauty of ABHÁ!

With a Power of the Kingdom, a Divine attraction and a Spiritual breath, return thou to that land. Fill to overflowing the lives and hearts with the wine of the Love of GOD. Be the cause of joy to all and the means of unity and agreement to all: because through unity and agreement do the beloved of GOD hoist the standard, shine with the Light of the Love of GOD, and are tender to one another.

This is the attitude of the beloved of GOD, and this is the example and life of the sons of the Kingdom of GOD.

Upon thee be greeting and praise.

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás.

(Dated at ‘Akká, April 15, 1907. Translated at Chicago, June 5, 1907 by Mírzá Ameen Ullah Faríd).

Through Mírzá Raffie, Chicago.

To the honorable pilgrim, Mr. Thornton Chase, the firm (Thahbet). Upon him be Bahá’u’lláh!

HE IS GOD!

O thou herald of the Kingdom!

Thank thou GOD that thou didst come to the Holy Shrine put thy head upon the Holy Dust, arrived at the Gathering-place of the spiritual ones, became a member of the Assembly of the Merciful, found friendship with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and with the utmost love and joy spent a few days there. Then thou didst receive Permission to return so that thou mayst serve the Kingdom in the Continent of America, and show (to the people) the Way to Heaven and lead them towards the Lord of Hosts. I hope that, with a divine strength and a godlike personality, with a heavenly guidance, with a divine attraction and with a spiritual seal, thou wilt educate the people.

O thou the firm one in the Covenant!

Give My respectful greeting to ..... and say (to her) from Me: The Jewish people were expecting the Manifestation of Jesus, and were at the same time attracted to Moses. When His Holiness Christ appeared, they (the Jewish people) thought that Holy Personality intended to take away the eternal honor of Moses. Moses, in the eye of Israel, had no equal. Now, they had never thought that a greater than Him (Moses) would appear. So, this way of thinking became the cause of their being kept away from the Light of Christ, and they were prevented from the precious things of the Holy Spirit, notwithstanding the fact that the greatest friend of Moses was Christ, and He made His Holiness, Moses, great in the eye of the world, and made Him to be glorious in the contingent world; whereas, even now, Israel — that is the Jews — deny His Holiness, the promised Christ, and count Him to be an enemy of His Holiness, Moses, and of Aaron and David; and they were kept away from the Bounties of Christ. They think that no other great person like Moses could ever come upon the earth, and, if such a person should be sent (by GOD), He must come under the shade of His Holiness, Moses, and promulgate the Law of the Torah.

This negligence on the part of the Jews became the cause of keeping away a multitude from the Heavenly Bounties and from the beneficence of the Holy Spirit for nineteen hundred years.

The SUN is ever the same, but the place where the SUN has appeared has changed. Then, at Christ's time, it appeared in the sign of Aquarius, and now it has manifested itself from the sign of Cancer: these signs are only for an illustration. The SUN is the same SUN, no matter from what sign it may manifest itself or from what spot it may arise. Thou must look at the SUN: do not become veiled by the Places from which the SUN appears.

O Mr. Chase!

Likewise instruct and give My Love to ..... and say: O dear one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Be the son of thy father, and be the fruit of that tree. Be a son that has been born of his soul and heart, and not only of the water and clay. A real son is such an one that he has branched from the spiritual part of a man. I ask GOD that thou mayst be at all times confirmed and strengthened.

O thou servant of Bahá!

Thou hast asked regarding the political affairs. In the United States it is necessary that the citizens shall take part in elections. This is a necessary matter, and no excuse from it is possible. My object in telling the believers that they should not interfere in the affairs of Government is this: that they should not make any trouble, and that they should not move against the opinion of the Government, but obedience to the laws and the administration of the Commonwealth is necessary. Now, as the Government of America is a Republican form of government, it is necessary that all the citizens shall take part in the elections of officers, and take part in the affairs of the Republic.

O thou firm (Thahbet) one in the Covenant!

We give thee Thahbet for a name, so that this name be an example of firmness and, in the future, thou mayst, even more than before, be confirmed in service. And upon thee be El-Bahá El ABHÁ!

(signed) ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás.

Questions

‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Oct. 16, 1912 (From interview to Seattle friends)

It often happened in the old days that they were killed on the way, many of them. Amongst them was a man known as ‘Abdu’l Hádí and his son aged eleven who were killed in the desert of Arabia. Then there was Shaykh Sádiq who barefooted ran through the expanse of the desert and hastened to Mousul, where he passed from this life. Among them was a man known as Mullá Muḥammad-‘Alí of Dahaji who was martyred on the way and no trace of him was ever discovered.

Once upon a time in the city of Aleppo they captured two people who were on their way to the Land of Desire (‘Akká). The Consul General to Persia[a39] arrested them, saying: “You are on your way to ‘Akká. It is forbidden for you to go to ‘Akká. Whosoever goes to ‘Akká must be killed. So I must turn you back to Persia.” “Why?” they asked. He replied, “Because you believe in the divinity of Bahá’u’lláh.” The Consul General happened to be a Christian. There was another official, a Persian, who was the Ambassador of Persia to Constantinople, whose name was Mírzá Ḥusayn Khán. The Bahá’í friend turning to him said, “If the Ambassador should object he has reason therefor, but you are a Christian, and Christ made the way easy. You believe in the divinity of Christ. Why are you amazed at this, then?” The Ambassador replied, saying, “He speaks truly. Inasmuch as you believe in Christ, you should also believe in Bahá’u’lláh. You should not object to him. But I do not believe in the divinity of Christ; therefore, if I object, it is excusable — but you have no right at all, because you are a Christian.”

From article in J. A. Soc. Journal, Oct. 1889, page 975:

“A passage now occurs which is important as in some degree fixing the date when the work (Kitáb-i-Aqdas) was composed. Speaking of some event Bahá says, ‘This is what we informed you of when we were in Irak (i. e. Baghdád), and in the Land of the Mystery (i. e. Adrianople), and in this bright watch tower’ (i. e. Acre). Again alluding to his death he says in the next verse.

This proves that he wrote the Kitáb-i-Aqdas in ‘Akká, and therefore the tablets to the U. S. and Germany were written after 1868. At least, they were sent from ‘Akká after 1868.

Lincoln was inaugurated March, 1861, was shot in April 1865.

Grant was elected 1868, inaugurated March 1869, re-elected 1876.

Bahá’u’lláh was in Adrianople from 1864-7.[a40]

From interview given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to an Examiner reporter in San Francisco, Oct. 3, 1912

.... In the religious world, the Israelites wandered for forty years in the wilderness and could not conquer the Holy Land. Finally a woman[a41] achieved the signal victory. ...[a42]

Mrs. Merriman, Oct. 8, 1912, Palo Alto.[a43]

Mr. Reed. In America would there not be other institutions adapted more especially to the needs of American people in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár besides the place for worship?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Yes. There are the accessories of the temple. There will also be two universities; but the school, as an accessory of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár will not be as large as the university. They are the necessary accompaniments of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár. It must be a useful agency. It must not be a worldly one.

Mr. Reed. What is the character of the university?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It is possible, if there be no need for the other institutions, to have just the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, without the other accessories, — if there be no need for it in the community. That should be looked after.

Mr. Reed. What place does comparative religion have in the Bahá’í movement?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It is in fact considered as a necessity. The Bahá’ís have made a special study of other religions. There are some Bahá’ís who know more about the Gospel than the Christians even. Just now our knowledge of the Qur’án is not possessed by the Muḥammadan priests. They have a patriarch[a44] called. He was a well-known man. The Christians were proud of his knowledge. He was a great orthodox. He possessed a garden outside of ‘Akká, and a building there, and we chanced to pass that day (that way — one day?) with some Christian friends. He[a45] said, “Let us go and call on the patriarch. The patriarch is a friend of mine.” So we went there. When we sat in the room I asked the patriarch, “What are you doing all alone here?” He said, “I am not alone.” “Who is with you?” I asked. He pointed to the image of Elijah and said, “I talk with Elijah. I am not alone.” And as he remarked that he communed with Elijah, I recalled a passage from the Bible. I said, “It is most appropriate to cite a verse from the Gospel which has attracted me often. I wonder what your view of the subject is.” “What verse is it? he asked.

“His Holiness Christ said that John the Baptist was Elijah. When they [the disciples] came down from the Mount of Transfiguration Elijah came. We expected Elijah to come before Moses, and now Moses has come before Elijah. Christ said Elijah came but they did not know him. Nay rather, they molested him, and then the disciples learned from that statement that the simile referred to John the Baptist. Then, again, he says that John the Baptist was the Elijah foretold who would come before Christ. This is also an explicit text of the Gospel, whereas when they asked of John the Baptist, ‘Art thou Elias?’ he said, ‘I am not.’ Christ said he was Elijah. The disciples declared that this John the Baptist was the prophet prophesied, whereas when they asked of him he said he was not. Now, he was either Elijah, or he was not! What is your view of it? How can it be interpreted?”

The man was dumbfounded. He simply changed color from red to yellow, he was so shamestruck to find I knew so much.

Mr. Reed. I was very much impressed with the humanitarian spirit of the Bahá’í literature.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh are not yet evident, not yet made known, not all accumulated. For instance, there are teachings in the Book of Aqdas, but they are not all there. There is the tablet of Bishara, etc., but all these do not contain all the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. They are scattered but they will be gathered together. Then it will become evident how important are the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh.

To Dr. Allen, Oct. 10, 1912

A. B. This elemental life is not of so much importance. In the twinkling of an eye a man gets old, and in the twinkling of an eye a man is dead. The Governor of Haifa was with me one day and we were walking hand in hand, and we came to the stairs and we took the first step together. I took the second step, and upon looking at him saw that he was dead. They brought doctors and physicians but they did not help — he was gone.

Mrs. Pell’s interview. Oct, 1912. No date.

(Speaking of healing) In Persia the Arabs have no doctors. All the people submit to God. There are no physicians, nor remedies. When a person gets sick he eats barley soup. When he has a fever he eats dates. This material[a46] health is of no great importance. [a47]

From informal talk Oct. 11, 1912.

(Speaking of the hardships and ordeals of the Bahá’ís in Persia) Recently in the city of Jawakan[a48] near Shíráz two Bahá’ís have been martyred while they were proclaiming Ya Bahá el Abhá.[a49]

From interview given to Sacramento reporter:

Question. Kindly ask ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as to his own religion. Does he adhere to any particular denomination. Is he a Mussulman, or does he inherit any other religion?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Being a Bahá’í, my affiliation is with all religions.

Question. Was he originally a Mussulman?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Originally we were Muḥammadans, but now we love all humanity.

A TIMELY LESSON BY ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ

Ella Goodall Cooper

During ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s sojourn in California in October, 1912, many were the particular lessons he gave to special believers, in addition to his public addresses and his brief daily talks to the groups of friends and strangers who gathered morning and afternoon at his home.

Among the early American believers was Charles H. Tinsley, a Negro formerly employed by Mrs. Phoebe Apperson Hearst as butler in her Pleasanton (California) home. While there he had learned of the Bahá’í Message through Mrs. Hearst’s niece, Miss Anne Apperson; but previous to 1912 Mr. Tinsley had married and was living in his own home in San Francisco. He had joined the Bahá’í group, and with them was eagerly anticipating ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s coming. But, alas! shortly before the Master arrived, Mr. Tinsley had unfortunately met with an accident and for some weeks had been confined to his bed with a broken leg. Naturally he was bitterly disappointed at being unable to attend the meetings which other believers were privileged to enjoy.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá heard of Mr. Tinsley’s plight he immediately said, “Well, if he cannot come to see me I will go to see him.”

Thereupon my mother and I, with an interpreter, drove with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the humble cottage of Mr. Tinsley and his wife. As Mrs. Tinsley led us toward his room she informed us that Charles Was not only unhappy but was even in a rebellious frame of mind.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, quickly entering the room like a burst of sunshine, called out cheerily: “How are you? How are you? I am very glad to see you.”

Mr. Tinsley plaintively replied: “I am well except for this broken leg which is keeping me in bed. I am impatient to be up and out, working for the Cause, and I cannot understand why this should have happened to me.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “You must not be sad. Cheer up. Praise be to God, you are dear to me. Come, I will tell you a story.”

Seating himself on the edge of the bed, and holding Mr. Tinsley’s hand, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá began:

“Once there was a great king who, having much love for one of his subjects, desired to appoint him to a high office. The king, with the intention of training his subject, ordered him to be thrown into prison. After a certain length of time, he was to be taken out and bastinadoed.

“The man was amazed at receiving such treatment, for he had expected great favors from his king.

“No sooner had he recovered from those inflictions than further orders came from the king that he was to be hanged on the gallows until nearly dead.

“Having had no word from his beloved king, and being utterly unable to understand the meaning of all these strange unexplained orders, you can imagine the intense suffering, mental as well as physical, which the poor man had endured through all these many trials.

“When, finally, he had recuperated from the last and most dreadful of the ordeals, and was brought, weeping, before the king, he threw himself at his feet, crying: ‘O, my Lord, my Liege, your Majesty! What does this mean? Why this terrible punishment? I thought you loved me.’

“The king lifted him to his feet and, tenderly embracing him, said: ‘I do love you. From among all my subjects I have chosen you to be my prime minister, and the tests you have undergone were to acquaint you with what punishment means. When you become prime minister you will have power over the lives of thousands of human beings. Whenever it may become necessary for you to order a man to be cast into prison, you know how it feels. If it should become necessary for you to order a man to be bastinadoed, you know how that feels. If you should be obliged to condemn a man to death on the gallows, you know how even that feels. It is because of my boundless love for you, it is because of your great capacity, that I have chosen you for the highest office in my realm, and through this severe training I have fitted you for this service.’ ”

“Even so it is with you. After this trying experience you will attain spiritual maturity. God sometimes causes us to suffer many misfortunes in order that we may become firm in His Cause. You will soon recover and be spiritually stronger than ever before. You will work for God and carry the Bahá’í Message to many of your people.”

The radiant presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, his warm hand-clasp, and the vibrant tones of his voice as he told the old oriental story, so changed Mr. Tinsley’s attitude toward his own mishap that when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá rose to bid him farewell Mr. Tinsley was smiling through his tears.

A few moments later, when Dr. Elisha Douglas Shaw, a member of our Bahá’í community, called at the house, it was instantly apparent to him that something unusual had occurred, for Mrs. Tinsley greeted him breathlessly as she hurried him down the hall, saying, “Oh, Dr. Shaw, Charles is expecting you.” Mr. Tinsley welcomed him affectionately, exclaiming excitedly, “The Master has just been here!" He then proceeded to repeat every detail of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit.

Dr. Shaw was astonished at the transformation that had taken place in Mr. Tinsley, for it was evident he had grasped the true significance of his pain and suffering.

We who have known Mr. Tinsley these many years can testify that since that blessed day in October, 1912, when 'Abdu'l-Bahá paid him such an unexpected visit, no trouble has ever daunted him or beclouded his spiritual happiness. Even now, thirty-two years later, and again laid low by a sudden and greater affliction, his spirit is serene and his faith unwavering. When friends call to condole with him, they are surprised to find him cheerful and uncomplaining, and they listen with interest as he reminisces of his younger days and 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to his humble abode. Perhaps they, too, feel the spirit that still lingers with him, for they return to hear the wonderful story of the wise king again and again.

One of the Japanese friends with a number of persons came to see him early this morning.

He said that he had studied most of the religions and that he did not find one so useful and so effective in reforming the people as this Mighty Cause. The Master replied, "I wish you would become heavenly and not Japanese nor Arab, English, Persian, Turk, and American. You would become divine and would act according to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Observe: I am one of the servants of Bahá'u'lláh, helpless and weak, but as I am under the shadow of his teachings you see what confirmations attend upon me."

'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

to Dr. Woodson Allen, Mr. Warren Allen and Mr. Joseph Catton

7. P. M., Monday, October 21, 1912

Translated by Dr. Ameen Ullah Faríd

Stenographically reported by Miss Bijou Straun

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Did you have any question, Dr. Allen?

Dr. Allen. I want to ask one question. Most of my life has been given to the study and practice of medicine and surgery, and ever in that field of activity I must look for the handiwork of God, and the question that is puzzling me is simply this: if I can give a man any assurance that he can be healed through the power of the Holy Spirit? For instance, I tell a man that he needs a surgical operation and he immediately believes me, but if I say that I believe he might be healed through the power of the Holy Spirit he would probably say to me that I was a fanatic and go to some other doctor.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Diseases are of two kinds. There are some which are due to material causes, and such diseases should be treated according to material methods. For instance, supposing there shall be some sort of process in the liver that is tissue-pathology. Its treatment should be entirely physical. On the other hand, another disease may be spiritual in character. For example, fear is a nervous disease resulting not from any material cause. It is psychological neurosis. That sort of disease has to be treated spiritually.

God has not created all the plants you know and all the various metals for nothing. They are for some purpose. They have their physiologic findings, and each one of them has its physiologic result. They are not for useless purposes. And if we deny pharmaceuticals and therapeutics, then it would mean that all these things are without physiologic effect, when there is use for each one of these plants. For example, if man is stricken with fever, we will say with agree, if we give him quinine it acts as a specific, and we know it is a remedy. Or a man may have smallpox and we vaccinate him. We know vaccination is a preventive. Nobody can deny that. Opium will stop diarrhoea. Nobody can deny that. You see that would be foolishness. Everything has its use and its place. A man may be stricken with a certain form of skin disease — psoriasis, for example — and we use a certain form of mercury. You cannot deny that sort of thing.

Can you deny the effect of those medicines? No! What do you think of that? Don’t you think that is so?

Dr. Allen. It is true.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. But, on the other hand, there may be some diseases due to some spiritual cause. For example, a man may be subjected to excessive joy. Out of that excessive joy may result mental derangement — a sort of emotional shock. It will be an emotional upsetting. That has to be treated spiritually. Or, fear may cause a tremendous shock to the nervous system, and then that should be treated according to psychotherapy. And so on. There are many diseases which are neuroses and have to be treated accordingly.

Suppose a man has an abscess that is suppurating. Unless we do something for that abscess it may go on and become gangrened, it may become diseased. Suppose we leave this abscess. If we say prayers over that abscess — the prayer for that is the knife — the surgeon's knife — it is the lance. We should lance it out.

You see both have their places. Those diseases that are due to psychological neurosis, treat them according to psychological neurosis and suggestive therapeutics, and those that are due to material causes then you have to give them material treatment. For example, an abscess has to be incised. If you do not lance it, it will go on and become gangrenous, because the origin of that is entirely material pathology.

This is the truth of the matter: to discard with medicine is nonsense. Medicine is perfectly reasonable.

Even the animals when they are sick, though they are not intelligent, know where certain grasses grow, and nature leads them to certain herbs, and they taste those herbs and they smell them, and certain grasses that seem to please their taste they eat and get well. This is natural, is it not?

For example, when your finger is wounded you naturally stick it in your mouth. Evidently the saliva has something to do with that and seems to act as a salve. The animals, whenever they have a wound, lick it with their tongue and get well. This is natural. This is not a process of thought.

There are a number of diseases which are psychological. They have to be treated according to suggestive therapeutics.

Your hand may become wounded. Suppose you just imagine that there is no wound there. You say, "My hand is not wounded." Would that help it? Would that cure it? You agree with that, don't you?[a52]

Dr. Allen. There is one point I want to make. Take, for instance, a child that is sick. Everything has been done in the illness — in a surgical case — in a therapeutic way. The doctors have given up, but when some prays for the child it gets well. How is that? The child had whooping cough. It got wet in the evening, and took cold, and got pneumonia, and the doctor treated the child for several hours, and gave all the remedies he could think of, and the child kept getting worse. He called for me and from all appearances it did not seem the child could possibly live. Every paroxysm seemed to be its last, and the pulse could not be felt at the wrist, and when it did come it was simply a flutter. He asked me what I thought, and I said I thought the child was dying. He said what should we do? I suggested some simple remedy, and he gave that along with the one he had been giving. I sat by the child and took its hand, and said the Greatest Name, and in a few hours the child began to improve. As far as my mentality goes I cannot see that the remedy did the child any good.

The question that came to me is: "Did the saying of the Greatest Name make it well?"

In the morning, the Doctor was tired, and he asked me if I would stay with the child while he went home. I stayed a few hours, and the child improved so well I went home, and the Doctor called next morning and said, "That was wonderful medicine you gave the child, for the child is practically well."

Now, what I want to know is what cured that child.

Dr. Faríd. The Greatest Name.

Dr. Allen. That is what I want to know — how can I say that to those people?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The first thing for us to find out is whether the two forms of treatment — the spiritual and material — are real or not. We must investigate that first: whether the material medicine, or spiritual medicine, has a basis for that or not; whether they are real or not. That is the foundation.

We find that in the creation of God there is a basis for material medicine. Even in the animals, which are devoid of thought, there is an instinct which propels them when they are sick. They go to certain herbs which are physiologically suited and they eat them. That is one thing.

Secondly, a man may have malaria, and as soon as we give him quinine it seems to have its specific effect; or, in diarrhoea, opium has its effect, stopping it; or, in psoriasis, if we give a form of mercurial treatment it may heal it, or, in the case of a wound, if we wash it with carbolic acid, it gets well. So you see there is a basis for material medicine. We cannot deny that. Is it not so?

Then we come to the spiritual medicine. We find that it often happens that a man gets sick, and we pray, and he gets well. It often happens. That happens in numerous cases. A man has become insane, and we pray, and he gets well. It often has happened. A man has, day by day, become emaciated, and we pray, and he gets well, gets strength. And so on in many cases.

Therefore, both of these have their provinces. Hence, both of them should be used — both the one material and the other the spiritual. Neither of them has to be given up.

Mr. Catton. Doctor wanted to know whether this whooping cough, which is a material thing, was benefited by a spiritual thing. (To Dr. Faríd) Does he want to treat the material side with material things?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It is possible to treat not every material, not all the material. Some can be treated spiritually. There can be some spiritual disease and material medicine will help it. Both are possible. The spiritual can help the material, too. But there are some diseases that are material that must receive entirely material or physical treatment, just like an abscess, for example. While an abscess is coming to a head, is suppurating, — that has to be lanced. But before inflammation has set in and it is not suppurating, the beginning of it can properly be treated spiritually, but when suppuration has taken place then you have to lance; otherwise, it will become gangrenous, because it is already corrupted — it has to be evacuated. For example, suppose there is an abscess in my hand, suppuration has taken place, and the hand is swollen and has come to a heading. It has to be evacuated.

Mr. Catton. Then the spiritual side can protect the side which is not destroyed? You can hope to cure diseased tissue, but not destroyed tissue?

Dr. Faríd. Even the abscess he is citing has an example.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Sometimes a disease may become very predominant, like melancholia. That can be spiritually cured. Most of the nervous diseases can be treated spiritually, because they are psychical.

Mr. Catton. The question is the spiritual curing of the material. I want to draw the line where you can cure and where you cannot. Take a given cell in the body and start to treat it wrongly, so as to destroy it. Up to a certain place, that cell can still be brought back to life; past a certain stage, it dies. Where it is capable of regeneration, can it be cured spiritually?

Dr. Faríd. There is no line of demarcation.

Mr. Catton. An abscess is only a stage in the disease of a material thing, and if there is a general underlying law that spiritual treatment should be employed to treat material things it does not seem right that there should be a stage where spiritual treatment is of no use, unless you come to a stage where the tissue is actually destroyed.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Is there any law which is not limited? God alone is unlimited. There is no process which is not limited. For instance, whether spiritual or material, can you hinder a man from dying? Therefore, it is limited.

Mr. Catton. Spiritual treatment will help a man that is alive and will not help a man who is dying?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Use both of them. Do not limit. Use both and get results.

(To Dr. Allen) I gave you spiritual treatment. I will tell you that. When you came to me, you were sick. You are quite well now. Without letting you know I treated you. Your pulse was not so good. Your pulse is improved, and now you are a different man. Get up and look in the looking glass. I did not let you know about it.

The spiritual treatment has its effect, of course. I am not saying that this is impossible to be treated spiritually. I am saying that all these are to be used. Pray and give the medicine, too. You pray that the medicine will work, and the medicine will work. One of them will do it.

It is very humorous!

The people who say medicine is not right — these Christian Scientists and so on — are off. If a man gets hungry, he has to have food. He cannot say, “I am not hungry.” If he says, “I am not hungry,” he does not get satisfied, because hunger is a sort of disease, too. Or, if he says, “I am not thirsty,” will his thirst be quenched do you think? Likewise sleep. If he is sleepy and says, "I am not sleepy," and affirms he is not sleepy, he still wants sleep. That is natural.

The point is this, that when a man is hungry, or thirsty, give him his bread and water, his food. There is a void that has to be filled, and something has to go there. A vacuum is there. Give him water. Praying over it will not fill him.

Good-by. Bless you! Bless you!

DATA REGARDING A FEW OF THE PROMINENT PEOPLE WHO CALLED UPON 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ IN SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, IN OCTOBER, 1912

Compiled March 1, 1944

MRS. PHOEBE APPERSON HEARST

Born December 3, 1842, in Missouri. Died at Pleasanton, Calif. Daughter of Randolph Walker Apperson and Drucilla Whitmire Apperson, farmers of substantial means. Married George F. Hearst June 15, 1862, in Missouri, and moved to San Francisco. Son (William Randolph Hearst) born in 1863, in S. F., in Apr. or May. Died April 13, 1919.

Mrs. Phoebe Apperson Hearst was a gentlewoman of the old school. She was broadminded, tolerant, tactful, had great understanding, tenacity of purpose, remarkable aptitude for philanthropic work, extraordinary capabilities, amazing energy, and she was not only the best loved but the most distinguished woman of California. Her husband was a born prospector, a genius-geologist, who, through, his manifold business ventures, became a multimillionaire and outstanding figure in the pioneer mining and financial world of the West. In March, 1886, the Governor of California appointed him to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, and two years later he was regularly elected for a full term. Senator Hearst died Feb 28, 1891, leaving his widow an immense fortune which through the years she munificently shared in the furtherance of countless philanthropic, civic, educational, and anthropological enterprises.

After her return in 1880 from a second trip to Europe welfare activities became the marked feature of Mrs. Hearst's life. Having always been interested in children, she helped to establish in San Francisco, in 1883, the Golden Gate Kindergarten. This school, of which she was honorary vice-president, and which was free for the children of the poor, she supported entirely, and continued adding classes until there were seven in the city.

The Hearst Free Kindergarten that she afterward built was a handsome three-story structure in the early American-Spanish style. The first two floors accommodated one hundred and eighty-five children. The third floor was used as a training school for teachers.

Mrs. Hearst came to be known as the "Mother of California Free Kindergartens," and her methods were adopted by many other schools in the United States.

Having been a teacher herself for a year before her marriage, she was naturally interested also in the Parent-Teacher Association to a considerable extent.

Mrs. Hearst did not confine her assistance to merely one type of institution. To the Young Woman's Christian Association she gave a fully equipped camp at Asilomar in Monterey County, California, and after putting the Travelers aid department of that organization on a firm basis she left a goodly bequest for its continuance. She was a benefactor and fairy godmother to other projects such as the Hahnemann Hospital (Homeopathic), the Children's Hospital, infants Shelter, Orphan Asylum, Old People's Home, young people's clubs, and college settlements.

Besides all these California philanthropies, she was active also in the states where Senator Hearst operated mines — Nevada, Utah, Montana, South Dakota — establishing libraries for the miners and their families, and kindergartens for their children. She built, equipped and maintained for several years a free library at Anaconda, Montana, finally presenting it to the municipality; and she equipped and for years maintained a free library at Lead, South Dakota, where the principal Hearst mining interests were located, and in her kindergarten classes there she cared for about three hundred children.

In 1886, when the center of Mrs. Hearst's philanthropies was transferred from the West to Washington, D. C., where she and the Senator had a splendid establishment and lived lavishly, that city became the recipient in a large measure of her bounty. One of the most conspicuous of her benefactions was the gift of $250,000 for the building and maintenance of the National Cathedral School for Girls as a unit of the great general scheme of the Cathedral Foundation (incorporated by Congress January 18, 1893), which had been a dream of George Washington almost a century before.

Mrs. Hearst came also to the rescue of George Washington's home at Mount Vernon. For lack of funds it had been fast crumbling into ruins when, in 1891, she was elected to the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association as vice-regent for California. This post she held for twenty-nine years, and it was due to her financial aid, and personal time and efforts, that the restoration of the beautiful old place was accomplished.

The Columbia Free Kindergarten Association was organized in 1893 with Mrs. Hearst as president, in which position she was able to introduce the kindergarten into the public schools of Washington. As a private individual she opened three independent kindergartens: two for white and one for colored children. For nearly ten years she maintained classes and a training school for kindergarten teachers, when ninety per cent of the public school teachers of Washington were graduates of her classes.

St. Albans, the corner-stone of which was laid in 1899, was another school made possible by the generosity of Mrs. Hearst.

It was in 1891 that Mrs. Hearst had begun to take that interest in the University of California, at Berkeley, the development of which made her name a memorable one in the history of the University. In September of that year she notified the board of regents that it was her intention to contribute annually to the funds of the University $1,500 to be used for five scholarships for "worthy young women of noble character and high aims," and that she had made provision for a perpetual fund after her death. Soon thereafter she added a sufficient sum to increase the number to eight. As the University was one of the first to open its doors to women, Mrs. Hearst was the first woman to make a gift to the University for the encouragement of undergraduate young women who without such help could not secure a higher education. In 1895 she granted an annual amount for four additional scholarships for especially meritorious young women, to be in force only for the duration of their courses; for these she did not provide a permanent fund as she had in mind other means of aiding the University. However, before her crowning benefactions would be realized, there were many innovations to her credit. For instance, there was the Hearst Domestic Industries that she founded for students working their way through college; also a school for mining engineers which she sustained at the University. And there were from time to time innumerable donations, small and large, for varied purposes: lectureships, fellowships, book funds, etc. She had a gift for the discovery of talent and encouraged ambition wherever she found it.

In the beginning of the year 1896 Mr. Bernard R. Maybeck, architect on the University staff, set forth to Regent Jacob B. Reinstein his long cherished ideas concerning a comprehensive and permanent plan for an architecturally harmonious arrangement of the new buildings which as the years went by would inevitably be placed on the beautiful site at Berkeley. Enthusiastically Regent Reinstein began a correspondence with eminent architects and educators, making a plea for suggestions. By the end of April (1896) he submitted to the board of regents a report based on the replies he had received. Professor Charles Eliot of Harvard University was one who had responded, writing:

"The value of the influence of noble architecture, simple as it may be, at a great seat of learning, especially in our great country, is hardly to be overestimated; ... No one denies that noble and beautiful buildings, in noble association and well designed for the purposes for which they are intended, become more and more impressive from generation to generation as they become more richly invested with associations of human interest. The youth who lives surrounded by beautiful and dignified buildings to which inspiring memories belong cannot but be strongly affected by the constant presence of objects that, while pleasing and refining the eye, cultivate his sense of beauty and arouse not merely poetic emotion but his sympathy with the spirit and generous efforts of his distant predecessors. His inward nature takes on an impress from the outer sight."

At that meeting it was resolved that a program should be prepared for a "permanent and comprehensive plan, to be open to general competition, for a system of buildings to be erected upon the University grounds." A prospectus was published in English, French and German, and the architects of the world were invited to participate in a preliminary competition, from the participants of which selections were to be made of those who would be allowed to submit plans for final consideration and award, and who would be invited to visit Berkeley to acquaint themselves with the site in relation to its locality, possibilities and requirements.

In October of the same year (1896) Regent Reinstein received a letter from Mrs. Hearst, stating that she and her son, William Randolph Hearst, wished to give a suitable memorial testifying to her husband's love for, and interest in, the state, but that the lack of a suitable plan for the University buildings was an obstacle in the way of carrying out their desires; and she would therefore suggest that she "be permitted to contribute the funds necessary to obtain, by international competition, plans for the fitting architectural improvement of the University grounds at Berkeley;" and that while she understood that such plans could be prepared for about $15,000 the success of the enterprise should "not be hampered in any way by a money consideration." The University annals disclose that Mrs. Hearst expended finally in this enterprise nearly $200,000.

Probably no other educational institution ever had such widespread advertising as had the University of California by reason of this building program. Newspapers and magazines all round the world took notice of it. Harper's Weekly commented:

"There has never been anything in the history of education or of architecture quite like the competition which the University of California owes to the munificence of Mrs. Hearst."

Linking the founding of Stanford University at Palo Alto by Leland Stanford with what Mrs. Hearst and others were reported to be contemplating for the University of California, Harper's Weekly continued:

"The multimillionaires of California have attested their interest in education on a scale which has excited the wonder of mankind."

Monsieur Emile Benard of Paris was the winner, in September, 1898, of the final competition and award though he had not availed himself of the invitation to visit the University for first hand study of its site. His plan was colossal and too magnificent for practicality considering the University's funds at the time, as it would have required $80,000,000 to have carried it to completion. However, when M. Benard did arrive in Berkeley he modified his plan to meet conditions. His revised plan was adopted in December, 1900 and steps were taken to put it into execution.

Mr. John Galen Howard of New York, member of one of the participating firms in the competition, in a statement prepared by him in the latter part of 1902, said that while the plans of M. Benard were only preliminary sketches, making no pretense of being more than that, and showed but little more than being the outlines of a scheme, yet

"they embodied in a large way the ideas of one of the most brilliant architectural designers of our time — a man who a generation ago won the ‘Grand Prix de Rome’ with a set of drawings whose charm has rarely been equaled, perhaps never surpassed in the history of the ‘Ecole des Beaux Arts.’ ”

At that time Mrs. Hearst was already putting into effect another work of untold good and far-reaching influence. Having in 1897 been appointed by the Governor of California to the University board of regents, she was able to be exceedingly helpful. In fact, she served twenty-two years on the board, through the administration of six consecutive Governors. In December, 1899, she rented a residence in Berkeley in order to be in social contact with the young women students, and immediately she had erected for them, adjacent to her temporary home, an artistically designed and beautifully furnished building adapted for social and gymnastic purposes. So built that it could be moved section by section, it was transferred to the campus the following year and became a great social center. President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, in his report of November, 1902, stated:

“Hearst Hall has proved itself one of the most useful of all of the University buildings. It has come to be the center of the social life of the women students. There they lunch together, there meet committees, and there are held meetings, concerts, receptions, and college affairs innumerable.”

When Hearst Hall was destroyed by fire in 1922 Mr. William Randolph Hearst offered to erect a new building as a memorial to his mother, and to build it as she would have done. Finished and furnished at an outlay of $650,000, yet it represented, when dedicated in April, 1927, less than half of the contemplated memorial structure which would have attached to the building just completed an auditorium of six thousand or more seats, to afford for indoor facilities such as there were for outdoor in the Greek Theater built by Mr. Hearst in 1903.

Mr. Howard had been engaged by Mr. Hearst to draw the plans for and superintend to construction of the Memorial Mining Building. Following his arrival at Berkeley, the University made him the supervising and executive architect of the whole comprehensive plan, and he was also given an appointment as Professor of Architecture. While the Hearst Memorial Mining Building designed by him was not the first building constructed under the plan, it was the first great educational structure to be erected according to that plan. The corner-stone was laid on the 18th of November, 1902. Speaking of the Mining Building as a memorial to the late Senator Hearst, President Wheeler said:

“It assumes ... the form of a contribution to the service of that technical profession of which he was one of the earliest and one of the most skilful practitioners. Its mission will be to raise and liberalize that profession by freeing it ever more and more from slavery to the rule of thumb and the wastes of amateurism, and placing it ever more and more under the rule of intelligence and within the sovereignty of reason.”

Adding:

“And last of all this memorial assumes the form of a benediction to society, a promotion of the social weal. Out of the seething ebb and flow of shifting public interest, in the midst of the vain and transient cries of market-place and forum arise the solid walls, the stern, clean pillars of the University to vindicate in the name of that assembled and clarified knowledge we call science, of that harmony of form we call art, and of that digest of experience we call history, the steadiness and order of human life, and to proclaim that man liveth not by bread alone, and that it is the things of mind and spirit which are eternal.”

In August, 1907, the completed building, which had cost $645,000, was dedicated. Professor Samuel Benedict Christy, dean of the College of Mining, and who had had a large part in the steps leading to that consummation, said:

“Deep rooted in the eternal hills this memorial to Senator Hearst lifts its noble head into the luminous air and stands in simple dignity, beauty and strength. Hewn from the solid granite of our own Sierra Nevada mountains, moulded from the plastic clay of our own valleys, bound together with bonds of steel, designed with consummate skill and executed by hands that loved their work, it went through the great earthquake absolutely unscathed — as if nature herself had marked it with her approbation.”

Professor Howard spoke of what he had had in mind as he designed the building which he had aspired to make both useful and beautiful:

“Our dearest wish has been that it should be able to brave these times and the times to come with a front modest yet frank, — simple, clean, sterling, permanent; — beautiful in its own sincere and reticent way, though devoid of anything remotely suggestive of overdoing in the way of ornament or pompous grouping of its parts; — its poetic message stripped of verbiage; — classic to the core; yet classic of that primitive type which might almost be called archaic, were it not that it is quickened by the breath of modern life.”

He continued that the symbolic intent was appealingly summed up in Robert Aitken’s “superb corbels of sculptured granite” adorning the front.

“Upon the west the primal elements; upon the east the eternal forces; and in the center, fresh, mysterious, pure, — emerging from the vague of chaos, the ideal arts, the flower of life.”

To fulfil one of her great ambitions, Mrs. Hearst had provided a fund, as early as 1894, for the establishment at the University of an ethnological museum, her own collection to form the nucleus. In 1895 she joined with her close friend, Dr. William Pepper, president of the Department of Archaeology and Paleontology at the University of Pennsylvania, and assisted him in outfitting the Pepper-Hearst Expedition to the Florida Keys where a remarkable collection of antiquities had been found. Whereas in her younger days she devoted herself to the study of art and literature, she now took up the subjects of anthropology and archaeology to the exclusion of all others, and so assiduously did she study that before long she had become an archaeologist in her own right. She was a member of the board of directors, and later honorary president, of the American Exploration Society organized by Dr. Pepper. The Society's scientific search was extended to Peru, Mexico, Egypt, Italy, Russia and Greece; Mrs. Hearst's financial contributions being made with the understanding that a certain percentage of any strange relics of forgotten civilizations that might be uncovered should be given to the University of California. In 1899, Dr. Pepper having passed away in previous year, Mrs. Hearst sent a special expedition to Egypt, under the direction of Dr. George A. Reisner, and made arrangements to keep it there for a period of five years.

Among other interests which Mrs. Hearst aided financially for a number of years were the Green Acre Conferences and the Associated Monsalvat School for Comparative Study of Religion founded by Miss Sarah J. Farmer at Eliot, Maine.

Mrs. Hearst's open-minded attitude toward religion was further indicated by her historic visit, in 1898, to the Holy Land, where she went to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá and to investigate the Bahá'í Faith at its source. Again, in 1912, when 'Abdu'l-Bahá traveled in America and came to San Francisco, Mrs. Hearst called upon him, and he in turn accepted her invitation to be her guest at her nearby country home in the Pleasanton hills.

Mrs. Hearst's several homes were centers for the gathering of persons well known in the worlds of art, literature, music, scholarship, science and politics. During her long life she never ceased to be interested in cultural movements, and she herself belonged to many organizations. She was a life member of the San Francisco Art Association. She had been the first president of the Century Club, and thereafter its honorary president, and she was active, honorary or life member of other prominent women's clubs of San Francisco.

Many were the distinctions heaped upon Mrs. Hearst during her last years. One was her appointment as president of the Woman's Board of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, which honor she declined, accepting instead an honorary presidency. But with the advent of World War I she found herself not only an honorary but an active member of almost every war committee on the Pacific coast. To one of her generous temperament, despite fast failing health, it seemed impossible to refuse any responsibility asked of her. Long after she had become too ill to continue her personal services, her advice and her money were still given freely to the end of her extraordinary and fruitful life at his home, "Serra House," Stanford Un. lately competitive examination now a scholarship in Cornell Un., from which he was graduated in 1872 with degree of Master of Sciences.[a53]

ERNEST ANDREW ROGERS

Born at St. Peter, Minnesota, July 31, 1881.

Educated at St. Peter High School; Gustavus Adolphus College, A. B. 1904; Leland Stanford Junior University.

Science teacher in the public schools of Minnesota 1904-09.

Founder and president-principal of the Montezuma Mountain Ranch School for Boys 1911 —.

Trustee of the Junior Statesmen Foundation, Inc.

Professor Rogers was one of the first to introduce a system of self-government among a student body. The Montezuma School is a unique institution for boys from 6 to 16 years of age, through high school, and also the first two years of college. It is accredited to California, Stanford, and leading Eastern Universities. Its instruction is non-secretarian and non-partisan. An international language (Esperanto) is part of the curriculum. The ideal is to cover the work in a manner best suited to the pupil, preserving his own peculiar initiative while he gains habits that will enable him to live and work with others with the minimum of friction and waste of energy; striving to fit the boys to do their share in the world's work by developing their sense of fair play, love of justice, courtesy, and sincere kindness toward all mankind. Montezuma is not in competition with nor antagonistic to the public schools; it supplements them and hopes to add to their value by demonstrating the better aim of developing instead of standardizing the individual student, making the application more personal instead of drilling in average groups, grading according to personal ability to do the work ahead instead of marking time to preserve classification. The boys are required to do a certain amount of routine work for the common good with cheerfulness and scrupulous efficiency. Fagging and hazing are not permitted. The discipline is non-military, democratic, opposed to autocracy in all its forms. The boys do not use tobacco and visitors are requested to respect the School laws, example being better than precept. The student body is an actual democratic state in miniature, self-governing through a mayor and board of commissioners, acting under a simple constitution and elected by ballot, holding office subject to recall on petition at the pleasure of the electorate. Legislation and administration are subject to review by the faculty which functions as a court of appeals; constitutional amendment and by-laws are initiated from time to time by the commissioners, or petition, as experience shows the need. Montezuma is located on a 400 acre ranch, 1500 feet above the sea level, at the summit of the Santa Cruz Mountains, five miles from Los Gatos, California, fifty-five miles south of San Francisco.

Professor Rogers called upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá in San Francisco several times, and took the boys of Montezuma to Stanford University to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá when he spoke there October 8, 1912.

MRS. ANDREW SUMMERS ROWAN

Born in S. F., educated in England, Mrs. (Josephine Morris) Rowan married 1904 the late Colonel Rowan, hero of Elbert Hubbard's famous essay "Message to Garcia" written during the Spanish-American war.

She was a pioneer in the work for the blind, having founded in San Francisco, as a memorial to her blind brother, the "Reading Room and Library for the Blind," and developing it into a blindcraft workshop whereby the blind could earn their own living. She invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak at their building at 1665 Jackson Street, and a delegation of the adult blind from the State institution at Berkeley crossed the bay to be present in addition to the San Francisco group. Owing to Col. Rowan's last prolonged illness she was obliged to give up active connection with the workshop some years ago, but is its honorary president. She was also prominently connected with other women's clubs, notably the Sorosis Club and the San Francisco Center of the California Club League of Women Voters. Since Col. Rowan's death Jan. 10/43, Mrs. Rowan has been engaged solely in sorting and arranging his papers, memoirs, etc.

MRS. JOHN F. MERRILL

One of the most prominent active philanthropists and social workers in California. Died in S. F.

Identified with the pioneer work of the Children's Hospital in San Francisco, holding office as its chairman of finance at different times during her executive connection with the hospital.

Past treasurer of the Young Women's Christian Association of San Francisco, an organization where she was an active worker in all departments.

MRS. HORACE WILSON

In 1912 president of the Century Club, one of the first social clubs for women of culture organized in San Francisco. Died in S. F.

'Abdu'l-Bahá accepted her invitation to speak at the Club, Wednesday afternoon, October 16th, 1912.

MRS. ALFRED P. BLACK

Well known club woman, wife of a prominent attorney of San Francisco. She was president of the California Club in 1912. She went to greet 'Abdu'l-Bahá at his first public appearance in San Francisco when he spoke at the First Unitarian Church.

She has also been continuously active in the Women's City Club of San Francisco since its pre-organization days during the First World War, having been its president several terms and on its board of directors.

DR. MARTIN ABRAHAM MEYER

Born in San Francisco, January 15, 1879. Died in San Francisco, June 27, 1923.

Educated in public schools of San Francisco; University of Cincinnati, A. B. 1899. Prepared by Rabbi Jacob Voorsanger of San Francisco for Hebrew Union College, from which he graduated in 1901 as rabbi, honor man and valedictorian. As post graduate student at Columbia University, majored in Semitics, PH. D., 1910.

Having won a fellowship in the American School of Oriental Study and Research in Palestine, he spent the winter of 1901-02 in Jerusalem specializing in archeology, ethnology, and Semitic philology. Articles he contributed to American newspapers indicated his disgust with Jewish conditions in the Holy Land.

Elected rabbi of Congregation Beth Emeth at Albany, New York, in 1902, remaining four years.

In 1906 was called to Temple Israel, leading congregation in Brooklyn, New York, serving four years. Helped organize the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities.

In 1910 accepted the unanimous call of Temple Emanu-El, the leading Reform congregation in San Francisco, also the richest, and served the remaining thirteen years of his life.

In 1911 was appointed lecturer in Semitics at the University of California, holding that post with distinction until his death.

Was in popular demand for lectures at western colleges, where he discussed scientific as well as religious topics. His sermons were based invariably on the Bible and Jewish commentaries interpreted in the light of modern events, and he was one of the few Reform rabbis to speak openly for and work on behalf of Zionism.

He was most active in civic affairs along non-partisan lines. In 1911 was appointed a member of the State Board of Charities and Corrections, becoming chairman in 1912, resigning in 1920. Was deeply interested in social service problems, being a recognized leader in western philanthropies. With I. Irving Lipsitch he organized the Jewish Committee for Personal Service in State institutions, a society to care for Jewish wards under State supervision, and to help them after their release.

In 1918 he volunteered for war service under the American Red Cross; returned in 1919, eager to uphold the principles of World Peace.

He was a director of the First Hebrew Congregation, Berkeley, California; president of the Pacific Coast Branch of the Jewish Chautauqua Society; honorary president of the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

Was author of many articles, among them: "Jerusalem — Modern" for the Jewish Encyclopedia, 1904; "History of the City of Gazu," 1907, a scholarly work on Arabic Semitic culture; "Jew and Non-Jew," 1913, published by the Central Conference of American Rabbies; "Methods of Teaching Post Biblical History and Literature."

Dr. Meyer invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak at the Saturday morning service at Temple Emanu-El, October 12, 1912, and while waiting for the moment to introduce him Dr. Meyer conversed with him in Arabic.

DR. CLARENCE REED

When 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited Palo Alto on the 8th of October, 1912, Dr. Reed was minister of the Unitarian Church, a beautiful little church which through his progressive ideas had become well known in San Francisco even as it was throughout the Palo Alto peninsula towns. He devoted his church on Sunday evenings to popular lectures on religious and educational topics of the day and had introduced many notable speakers to the community.

Dr. Reed invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to occupy his pulpit at a special evening service to conclude the day spent at Stanford University as the guest of Dr. David Starr Jordan. After the services, Dr. Reed, several members of the University faculty, and newspaper editors, were guests at the dinner given to 'Abdu'l-Bahá by Mrs. Isabel Merriman, prominent social worker and long time resident of Palo Alto.

For the past 25 years, Dr. Reed has been minister of the First Unitarian Church in Oakland, California, where his delightful, attractive personality makes him as popular as he formerly was in Palo Alto.

Recently recalling that service Dr. Reed said: "The address of A. B. made a marked impression upon all who heard him. It was an occasion that will be long remembered."
